3 Upon that depends the entire universe with its mobile and immobile creatures The religion of disinclination again leads to the unmanifest and eternal Brahma.

4. The Creator (Brahman) has described the religion of inclination. Inclination indicates re-birth or return. Disinclination on the other hand, indicates the highest end.

5. The ascetic who wish to discriminate exactly between good and evil, who is always bent on conceiving the nature of the Soul, and who devotes himself to the religion of disinclination, attains to that high end.

6—7 One who wishes to accomplish this, should know both the Unmanifest and Purusha of which I shall speak now. That, again, which is different from both the Unmanifest and Purusha, and which transcends them both, and which is distinguished from all beings, should be particularly seen by an intelligent men. Both Prakriti and Purusha are without beginning and without end Both are incapable of being known by their likes.

8. Both are eternal and indestructible. Both are greater than the greatest. They are similar in these There are points of dissimilarity again between them

9 Prakriti is endued with the three qualities. It is also engaged in creation The true attributes of Kshetrajna (Purusha or the Soul) are different.

10. Purusha apprehends all the changes of Prakriti (but cannot be apprehended himself) He transcends all qualities. As regards Purusha and the Supreme Soul again, both of them cannot be comprehended. Again for their both being without qualities by which they can be distinguished, both are greatly distinguished from all else.

11. A person putting on a turban has his head circled with three folds of a piece of cloth.

12 Similarly the embodied Soul is invested with the three qualities of Goodness, Darkness, and Ignorance. But though thus invested, the Soul is not identical with those qualities.

13. Hence these four topics, which are covered by these four considerations, should be understood One who understands all this is never stupefied when he tries to form conclusions

20 Knowledge which one acquires gradually by mind devoted to yoga should be made one's own on the verge of death by a forcible stretch of power.

21. The embodied Soul, when divested of Darkness, assumes a subtle form with all the senses of perception and moves about in space. When his mind becomes untouched by acts, he, on account of such renunciation, becomes merged in Prakriti.

22. After the destruction of this gross body, one who through absence of carelessness escapes from all the three bodies, succeeds in attaining to Liberation The birth and death of creatures is always brought about by Avidya (Ignorance)

23 When knowledge of Brahman originates the person no longer feels the pinch of necessity Those, however, who believe what is the reverse of truth are men whose understandings are always busy with the birth and death of all existent things

24 Keeping their bodies by the help of patience, withdrawing their hearts by the help of their understanding, and withdrawing themselves from the world of senses, some Yogins worship the senses for their subtility.

25 Some of them, with mind purified by yoga, proceeding according to the scrip-ments they partake of the nature of Brahma and at last attain to the highest end

30 'Thus persons conversant with the Vedas have described the religion that brings on the attainment of Brahma They who follow that religion according to the extent of their respective knowledge all succeed in acquiring the highest end

31 Those persons who can acquire a knowledge which is incapable of being shaken and which makes its possessors shorn of all sorts of attachments acquire different high regions after death and become emancipate according to the extent of their knowledge

32 Those pure hearted persons who have acquired contentment from knowledge, and who have renounced all desires and attachments gradually approach in respect of their nature nearer and nearer to Brahma which is unmanifest by nature, which is divine, and without birth and death

33 Realising that Brahma lives in their souls they become themselves immutable and have never to come back to the Earth) Acquiring that supreme indestructible and eternal state they leave in happiness The knowledge of this world is this (The erring persons consider) it existing (Persons who have overcome ignorance think that) it does not exist The whole universe, fettered by desire, is revolving like a wheel

35 As the fibres of a lotus-stalk overspread themselves into every part of the stalk, likewise the fibres of desire, which are without beginning or end, spread themselves over every part of the body

36 As a weaver drives his threads into a cloth by means of his shuttle, similarly the threads that constitute the fabric of the universe are woven by the shuttle of Desire.

37. He who understands the changes of Nature, Nature herself, and Purusha, becomes freed from Desire and acquires liberation

38 The divine Rishi Narayana that refuge of the universe, for the sake of mercy towards all creatures, distinctly laid down these means for the acquisition of immortality.'

CHAPTER CCXVIII.

Yudhisthira asked —

1 "By acting how, O you who are conversant with all courses of conduct, did Janaka the king of Mithila, versed in the religion of Liberation succeed in acquiring Liberation, after casting off all worldly enjoyments?"

Bhishma said:—

2 'Regarding it is cited the following old narrative of the particular conduct by which that king a master of all courses of conduct, succeeded in acquiring the highest happiness.

3 There was a king in Mithila of the name of Janadeva of Janaka's race. He was ever engaged in thinking of the courses of conduct that might lead to the attainment of Brahma.

4 One hundred preceptors always used to live in his palace, describing to him the various courses of duty followed by people who had adopted the various modes of life.

5 Well read in the Vedas he was not very well satisfied with the speculations of his instructors on the nature of the Soul, and in their teachings of his extinction upon the dissolution of the body or of re birth after death.

6 Once upon a time a great ascetic named Panchashikha the son of Kapila, having roamed over the whole world, arrived at Mithila

7 Having made conclusions about the diverse duties connected with renunciation, he was above all pairs of opposites and had no doubts

8 He was considered as the foremost of Rishis Living wherever he pleased, he wished to place before the reach of all men eternal happiness that is so difficult of attainment.

9 It appeared that he roamed, amazing the world, having put on the form of none else than that great Rishi, that lord of creatures, whom the followers of the Sankhya doctrine knew by the name of Kapila.

10 He was the greatest of all the disciples of Asuri and was called the undying He had performed a mental Sacrifice lasting for a thousand years.

11—12 He was firm in mind, and had performed all the rites and sacrifices that are enjoined in the scriptures and that lead to the attainment of Brahma. He knew full well the five sacks that cover the Soul. He was devoted to the five acts regarding the adoration of Brahma, and had the five qualities. Known by the name of Panchashikha, he had approached one day a large assembly of Rishis following the Sankhya doctrines and enquired of them about the highest object of human acquisition, namely, the Unmanifest or that upon which the five sacks rest.

13. For acquiring a knowledge of the Soul, Asuri had enquired of his preceptor. On account of the latter's instructions and of his own penances, Asuri understood the distinction between the body and the Soul and had gained celestial vision.

14. In that assembly of ascetics, Asuri described the Immutable, One, and Indestructible Brahma which is seen in various forms.

15. Panchashikha became a disciple of Asuri. He lived on human milk. There was a certain Brahman lady named Kapila. She was Asuri's wife.

16 Panchashikha was accepted by her as a son and he used to suck her breasts For this, he came to be known as the son of Kapila and his understanding became fixed on Brahma.

17. The divine Rishi said to me, all this, regarding the circumstances of his birth and those about his becoming the son of Kapila. The latter also told me about the omniscience of Panchashikha.

18. Knowing fully all the forms of duty, Panchashikha, after having himself gained high knowledge, (came to Janaka) and knowing that that king had equal reverence for all his preceptors, began to startle those hundred preceptors (by a very sensible exposition of his doctrine).

19 Marking the genius of the son of Kapila, Janaka became exceedingly attached to him, and abandoning his hundred preceptors, began to follow him.

20. Then Kapila's son began to discourse to Janaka, who had according to the ordinance bent his head to him and who was fully competent to understand the sage's instructions, upon that great religion of Liberation which is explained in Sankhya treatises

21. Describing first of all the miseries of birth, he spoke next of (the miseries of (religious) acts. Having finished that topic he explained the miseries of all states of existence ending even with that in the high region of the Creator.

22 He also described that Delusion which beget the practice of religion, and acts, and their fruits, and which is highly untrustworthy, destructible, unsteady, and uncertain.

23. Sceptics say that when death is seen directly by all, they who hold, on account of their faith in the scriptures, that something distinct from the body, called the Soul, exists, are necessarily defeated in argument.

24 They also hold that one's death is the extinction of one's Soul, and that sorrow, decrepitude, and disease indicate (partial) death of the Soul He who holds owing to error, that the Soul is distinct from the body and exists after the loss of body, entertains an unreasonable opinion.

25 If that is considered as existent which does not really exist in the world, then it may be mentioned that the king, being known so, is really never subject to decrepitude or death But is he, therefore, to be really believed to be beyond decrepitude and death?

26 When the question arises whether an object exists or not, and when that whose existence is asserted presents all the signs of non existence, what is that upon which ordinary people depend in settling the affairs of life?

27 Direct evidence is the basis of both inference and the scriptures The scriptures can be contradicted by direct evidence. As to inference its evidence is not much.

28 Do not reason on inference only whatever may be the subject There is nothing else called individual soul than this body.

29 The capacity to produce leaves, flowers, fruits roots and bark lies in a banian seed The grass and water that is taken by a cow produce milk and butter, substances differing in nature from that of the causes Various substances when allowed to decompose in water for sometime produce spirituous liquors whose nature is quite different from that of those substances producing them Likewise, from the vital seed in produced the body and its attributes with the understanding, consciousness, mind, and other qualities Two pieces of wood, rubbed together, beget fire Coming in contact with the rays of the Sun, the stone called Suryakanta begets fire. Any solid metal, heated in fire, dries up water when coming in contact with it Likewise, the material body produces the mind and its attributes of perception, memory, imagination, etc. As the loadstone moves iron likewise the senses are controlled by the mind.

30. Thus do the sceptics reason, who are, however, mistaken The disappearance (of animation) upon the body becoming lifeless means death The supplication of the gods by the very men who deny the separate existence of the Soul is another good argument (for the proposition that the Soul is separate from the body) Another argument against the sceptic is that his proposition argues a destruction of acts.

31. These that have been mentioned, and that have material forms, cannot possibly be the causes (of the immaterial Soul and its immaterial accompaniments). The identity of immaterial things with objects that are material cannot be comprehended.

32. Some hold that there is re-birth which is caused by Ignorance, the desire for acts, cupidity, carelessness, and bent towards other vices

33. They say that Ignorance is the soil. Acts form the seed that is placed in that soil Desire is the water that causes that seed to grow. In this manner they explain re-birth.

34 They hold that ignorance being ingrained in an imperceptible way, one mortal body being destroyed, another originates at once from it, and that when it is consumed by the help of knowledge, the destruction of existence itself follows, or the person attains to what is called annihilation.

35. This opinion also is mistaken It may be asked that when the being that is thus re born is a different one in its nature, birth, and objects of virtue and vice, why should it then be considered to be identical with the being that was? Indeed, the only inference that can be made is that the entire chain of existences of a particular being is not really one of connected links.

36 Then, again, if the being that is the outcome of a re-birth be really different from what it was in a pristine existence, it may be asked what satisfaction is to a person from the exercise of the spirit of charity, or from the acquisition of knowledge or of ascetic power, since the acts performed by one are to bear fruits upon another person in another state of existence.

37 Another refutation of the doctrine would be that one in this life may rendered miserable by the acts of another in a pristine life, or having become miserable may again become happy. By witnessing however, what actually takes place in the world, a proper conclusion may be drawn regarding the unseen

38 The separate Consciousness that is the outcome of re-birth is different from the Consciousness that had preceded it in a pristine existence The way, however, in which the appearance of that separate Consciousness is explained by that theory is not at all consistent or reasonable. The Consciousness was the very opposite of of eternal, being only transitory, extending as it did till dissolution of the body. That which had an end cannot be considered as the cause for the production of a second Consciousness appearing after the end If again, the very loss of the previous Consciousness be considered as the cause of the production of the second Consciousness, then when the death of a human body is caused by a heavy bludgeon, a second body would originate from the body that is thus deprived of animation.

39 Again, their doctrine of annihilation is subject to the objection that extinction will become a revolving phenomenon like that of the seasons, or the year, or the yuga, or heat, or cold, or agreeable or disagreeable objects.

40. If for avoding these objections the followers of this doctrine hold the existence of a Soul that is permanent and with which each new Consciousness is attached, they again subject themselves to the new objection that that permanent substance, by being overcome with decrepitude, and with death that causes destruction, may in time be itself weakened and destroyed. If the supports of a palace are weakened by time, the mansion itself is sure to fall down in the end.

41. The senses, the mind, wind blood, flesh, bones, one after another, meet with destruction and enter each into its own productive cause

43 Thus various sorts of speculations arise in the mind Nothing can settle whether this opinion is right or that is right.

44 Reflecting on these opinions, particular persons follow particular lines of speculation The understandings of these, directed to particular theories become immersed and are at last entirely lost in them.

45 Thus all men are made miserable by pursuits good or bad Bringing them back to the right path, the Vedas alone, guide them along it, like grooms conducting their elephants.

45 Many men, with weakened minds, seek objects of great happiness These, however, have soon to meet with a larger quantity of sorrow, and then, alienated by force from their coveted meat, they subject themselves to the sway of death

46 What has one, who is subject to destruction and whose life is fickle, to do with kinsmen and friends and wives and other like possessions? He who meets death after having relinquished all these passes easily out of the world and has never to return

47—49 Earth, ether, water, heat, and wind always keep up and nourish the body. Thinking of this how can one feel any attachment for his body? Indeed, the body, which is subject to destruction has no happiness in it —Having heard these words Panchashikha that were shorn of deception and delusion highly salutary, and treating of the Soul, king Janaka became filled with wonder and prepared himself to address the Rishi once more

(MOKSHADHARMA PARVA) —

Bhishma said :—

1 Thus instructed by the great Rishi Panchashikha, Janadeva of the family of Janaka once more asked him about the subject of existence or non existence after death

Janaka said —

2 O illustrious one if no person, retains any knowledge after departing from this state of existence, if, indeed, this is true, what then is the difference between Ignorance and Knowledge? What do we gain then by knowledge and what do we lose by ignorance?

3 See, O foremost of the twice born, that if liberation be such, then all religious acts and vows terminate only in annihilation? Of what use would then the distinction be between heedfulness and heedlessness

4 If Liberation means dissociation from all objects of pleasure or an association with objects that are not lasting, why should then men cherish a desire for action or having set themselves to action, continue to find out the necessary means for the accomplishment of desired ends? What then is the truth.

Bhishma said :—

5 Seeing the king enveloped in thick darkness stupefied by error, and become helpless, the learned Panchashikha put his mind at rest by once more addressing him thus

6 In Liberation the consummation is not Extinction Nor is that consummation any kind of Existence What we see is a union of body, senses, and mind Existing independently as also depending on one another these go on acting

7 The ingredient that form the body are water, ether, wind, heat, and earth. These exist together according to their own nature They become separated again according to their own nature

8 Ether, wind heat water and earth,—these five objects in a state of union form the body, The body is not one element.

9 Intelligence, stomachic heat and the vital airs called Prana, etc, that are all wind,—these three are the organs of action. The senses, the objects of the senses, the power by which they become capable of being perceived, the faculties by which they succeed in perceiving them, the mind the vital airs called Prana, Apana and the rest and the various juices and humours that are the results of the digestive organs, flow from the three organs already named

10 Hearing, touch taste, vision, and scent,—these are the five senses They have derived their attributes from the mind which is their cause.

11 The mind, which is as an attribute of Chit, has three states, viz, pleasure, pain and absence of both pleasure and pain.

12 Sound, touch form taste, scent, and the objects to which they are attached these till the time of one's death are causes for the production of one's knowledge.

13 Upon the senses depend all acts (leading to heaven), as also renunciation leading to the attainment of Brahma), and also the ascertainment of truth regarding all topics of enquiry The learned say that ascertainment (of truth) is the highest end of existence, and is the root of Liberation, and regarding Intelligence, they say that it leads to Liberation and Brahma.

14 That person who considers this union of perishable attributes as the Soul, feels, on account of such imperfect knowledge, unending misery.

15 Those persons who, however, regard all worldly objects as not-Soul, and who on that account cease to have any affection or attachment for them, have never to suffer any misery, for sorrow in their case stands in need of some foundation upon which to depend

16 About it there is the unrivalled branch of knowledge which treats of Renunciation It is called Samyagvadha I shall describe it to you. Listen to it for the sake of your Liberation

17 Renunciation of acts is (laid down) for all persons who seek Liberation earnestly They, however, who have not been instructed correctly have to bear a heavy load of sorrow,

18 Vedic sacrifices and other rites exist for renunciation of wealth and other earthly objects For renunciation of all enjoyments, exist vows and fasts of various sorts For renunciation of pleasure and happiness exist penances and yoga Renunciation of everything, is the highest kind of renunciation

19 That I shall presently describe to you is the one path pointed out by the learned for that renunciation of everything They who follow that path succeed in driving off all sorrow They, however, that deviate from it suffer distress and misery.

20 First speaking of the five organs of knowledge having the mind for the sixth, and all of which live in the understanding, I shall describe the five organs of action having strength for their sixth.

21 The two hands forms the two organs of action The two legs are two organs for moving from one place to another. The sexual organ is for both pleasure and the continuation of the species. The lower channel, leading from the stomach downwards, is the organ for purging off of all used up matter.

22. The organ of speaking exists for the expression of sounds. These five organs of action belong to the mind. These are the eleven organs of knowledge and of action. One should speedily cast off the mind with the understanding

23 In the act of hearing, three causes must exist simultaneously, viz, the two ears, sound, and the mind The same is the case with the perception of touch the same with that of form, the same with that of taste and smell

24. These fifteen attributes are necessary for the several kinds of perception In consequence of them, every man becomes conscious of three separate things regarding those perceptions.

25 There are again three classes (of mental perception, viz, those that appertain to Goodness those that belong to Darkness, and those that belong to Ignorance With them are connected three kinds of consciousness, including all feelings and emotions.

26 Pleasure satisfaction, joy, happiness and tranquillity, originating in the mind from any perceptible cause or in the absence of any apparent cause, appertain to the quality of Goodness

27 Discontent, regret grief, cupidity, and vindictiveness having no cause or occasioned by any perceptible cause, are the marks of the quality of Darkness

28 Wrong judgment, stupefaction, carelessness, dreams and sleepiness however, caused, appertain to the quality of Ignorance

29 Whatever state of consciousness exists, regarding either the body or the mind, united with joy or satisfaction should be considered as due to the quality of Goodness

30 Whatever state of consciousness exists united with any feeling of discontent or depression should be considered as the outcome of the quality of Darkness.

31. Whatever state, of the body or the body or the mind, exists with error or carelessness is the outcome of Ignorance which is incomprehensible and inexplicable.

32 The organ of hearing rests on either; it is either itself (under limitations), Sound has that organ for its refuge. In perceiving sound, one may not immediately acquire a knowledge of the organ of hearing and of ether. But when sound is perceived, the organ of hearing and ether do not long remain unknown.

33 The same is the case with the skin, the eyes, the tongue, and the nose, forming the fifth. They exist in touch, form, taste, and smell. They form the faculty of perception and they are the mind.

34. Each doing its own particular function, all the five organs of action and the five others of knowledge exist simultaneously, and upon the union of the ten dwells the mind as the eleventh and upon the mind the understanding as the twelfth.

35 If it be said that these twelve do not exist simultaneously, then the consequence would be that there would be death in dreamless sleep But as there is no death in dreamless sleep, it must be admitted that these twelve exist simultaneously as regards themselves but separately from the Soul The co existence of those twelve with the Soul that is ordinarily spoken is only a common form of speech with the vulgar for ordinary purposes of the world

36 The dreamer, on account of the appearance of past sensual impressions, becomes conscious of his senses in their subtile forms, and endued as he already is with the three qualities, he considers his senses as existing with their respective objects and, therefore, acts and moves about with an imaginary body after the manner of his own self while awake

37. That dissociation of the Soul from the understanding and the mind with the senses which speedily disappears, which has no stability and which the mind causes to arise only when influenced by Ignorance is happiness that partakes, as the learned say, of the nature of Ignorance and is experienced in this gross body only.

38 Over the felicity of Liberation also, the felicity, viz, which is created by the inspired teaching of the Vedas and in which no one sees the slightest mark of sorrow,—the same indescribable and truth-concealing darkness seems to spread itself

39 Like to what occurs in dreamless sleep, in liberation also, subjective and objective existences, which have their origin in one's acts, are all discarded. In some that are possessed by Ignorance, these exist, firmly grafted with them They never approach others who have transcended Avidya and have acquired knowledge.

40. Those who know thoroughly well the character of Soul and not Soul, say that this sum total of the senses, etc.,) is body. That existent thing which rests, upon the mind is called Soul.

41. When such is the case, and when all creatures, on account of the well known cause, exist, due to a state of union between Soul and body, which of these two then is destructible, and how can that which is said to be eternal, suffer destruction?

42. As small rivers falling into larger ones lose their forms and names, and the larger ones lose their forms and names and the larger ones falling into the ocean lose their forms and names too, similarly takes place that form of extinction of life called Liberation.

43 Likewise, the individual Soul which is characterised by qualities, is received into the Universal Soul, and when all its attributes disappear, how can it be differntly mentioned?

44 One who is conversant with that understanding which brings on Liberation and who carefully seeks to know the Soul, is never sullied by the evil fruits of his acts even as a lotus leaf though dipped in water, is never soaked by it.

45 When one becomes freed from the very many strong fetters, occasioned by affection for children and wives and love for sacrifices and other rites, when one renounces both joy and sorrow and transcedens all attachments one then attains to the highest end and entering into the Universal Soul becomes immersed in it.

46 When one has understood the Injunction of the Shrutis that lead to correct conclusions (about Brahma) and has practised those auspicous virtues which the same and other scriptures teach, one may lie down at ease, disregarding the fears of decrepitude and death When both merits and demerits disappear, and the fruits in the form of joy and sorrow, originating therefrom are destroyed, men, unattached to everything, seek refuge at first with personal Brahma, and then behold impersonal Brahma in their understandings

47. In course of its downwards descent under the influence of Ignorance Individua soul lives (within its cell formed by acts) like a silkworm living within its cell made of threads woven by itself. Like the freed silk worm again that quits its cell individual soul also abandons its house formed by its acts The final result, is that its sorrows are then dissipated like a clump of earth falling violently upon a rocky mass

48 As the Ruru deer casting off its hold horns or the snake casting off slough passes on without arresting any notice, similarly a person who is unattached renounces all his sorrows.

49 As a bird leaves a tree that is about to fall down upon a water and sits on a (new) resting place, similarly the person freed from attachments renounces both joy and sorrow and dissociated even from his subtile and subtiler forms attains to that end which is full of the highest prosperity.

50. Seeing his city burning in a fire, their own ancestor Janaka, the king of Mithila himself proclaimed,—'In this fire nothing of mine is burning.'

51. Having heard these words capable of giving immortality and uttered by Panchashikha, and arriving at the truth after carefully reflecting upon everything that the latter had said King Janadeva cast off his sorrows and lived on in the enjoyment of great happiness.

52. He who reads this discourse, O king, that deals with emancipation and who always reflects upon it, is never pained by any misfortune, and freed from sorrow, attains to liberation like Janadeva the king of Mithila after his meeting with Panchashikha.'

CHAPTER CCXX.

(MOKSHADHARMA PARVA).—Continued.

Yudhisthira said :—

1 "By doing what does one gain happiness, and what is that by doing which one meets with misery? What also is that, O Bharata, by doing which one becomes freed from fear and sojourns here successfully."

Bhishma said :—

2. "The ancients who had their minds directed to the Shrutis spoke highly of the duty of self control for all the castes in general, but for the Brahmanas in especial

3 One who is not self controlled never enjoys success in religious rites Religious rites, penances, truth,—all these depend upon self control.

4 Self control increases one's energy Self control is said to be sacred The man of self control becomes sinless and fearless and acquires great results

5 One who is self controlled sleeps happily and wakes happily. He lives happily in the world and his mind always remains cheerful.

6 Every sort of excitement is quietly controlled by self-control. One who is not self-controlled fails in a similar endeavour. The self controlled man sees his numberless foes (such as lust, desire, and anger, etc.) as if these dwell in a separate body.

7. Like tigers and other carnivorous animals, persons shorn of self control always strike all creatures with fear. For controlling these men, the Self create (Brahma) created kings.

8. In all the modes of life, the practice of self control is distinguished above all other virtues. The fruits of self control are much greater than those obtainable in all the modes of life,

9—11. I shall now describe the characteristic marks of those persons who value self control highly. They are nobility, calmness of nature, contentment, faith, forgiveness invariable simplicity, the absence of talkativeness, humility, reverence for elders, benevolence, mercy for all creatures, frankness, abstention from talk upon kings and men in authority, from all false and useless topics, and from applause and censure of others. The self controlled man becomes desirous of liberation and, quietly bearing present joys and griefs, is never overjoyed or depressed by prospective ones.

12 Shorn of vindictiveness and all sorts of guile, and unaffected by praise and censure, such a man is well behaved, has good manners, is pure of soul, has fortitude, and is a complete master of his passions.

13 Gaining honors in this world such a man in after life goes to heaven Making all creatures gain what they cannot acquire without his help, such a man rejoices and becomes happy.

14 Devoted to universal benevolence, such a man never feels animosity for any one. Tranquil like a calm ocean, wisdom feels his soul and he is ever cheerful

15 Endued with intelligence, and deserving of universal reverence, the self-controlled man never fears any creature and is feared by no creature in return.

16 That man who never rejoices even at large accessions and never feels sorrow when overtaken by misfortune, is said to be endued with contented wisdom. Such a man is said to be self-controlled Indeed, such a man is said to be a twice born man.

17 Well-read in the scriptures and gifted with a pure soul, the man of self control performing all those acts that are done by the good, enjoys their high fruits.

18. The wicked men however, never follow the path of benevolence, forgiveness, tranquility, contentment, sweetness of speech, truth, liberality, and comfort.

19—20 They follow the path of lust, anger, cupidity, envy of others, and boastfulness Overcoming lust and anger, practising the vow of Brahmacharyya and becoming a complete master of his senses, the Brahman, practising patiently the austerest penances, and observing the most rigid restraints, should live in this world, calmly waiting for his time like one seeming to have a body though fully knowing that he is not subject to destruction."

CHAPTER CCXXI.

Yudhisthira said :—

1. "The three twice born classes, who perform sacrifices and other rites, sometimes eat the remnants, consisting of meat and wine, of sacrifices in honor of the gods, from motives of obtaining children and heaven. What, O grandfather, is the nature of this act?'

Bhishma said :—

2 "Those who eat forbidden food without performing the sacrifices and vows ordained in the Vedas are known as wilful men. Those, on the other hand, who eat such food in the observance of Vedic sacrifices and vows and actuated by the desire of fruits in the shape of heaven and children, ascend to heaven but drop down on the termination of their merits."

Yudhishthira said :—

3 'Commen people say that fasting is penance Is fasting, however, really so, or is penance something different?'

Bhishma said :—

4. "People really consider fast, measured by months or fortnights or days, an penance The good, however, hold that such is not penance On the other hand, fast is an obstacle to the acquirement of the knowledge of the Soul

5. The renunciation of acts and humility form the highest penance. It is superior to all kinds of penance. He who performs such penance is considered as one who is always fasting and who is always leading a life of Brahmacharyya.

6 Such a Brahman will become a Muni always, a deity, and sleepless forever, and one engaged in the pursuit of virtue only, even if he lives in a family.

7. He will become a vegetarian always, and pure for ever; he will become an eater always of ambrosia, and an worshipper always of gods and guests.

8. "Indeed, he will be considered as one always living on sacrificial residue, as one ever devoted to the duty of hospitality, as one always full of faith, and as one always adoring gods and guests."

Yudhishthira said :—

9 "How can one practising such penance come to be known as one who is always fasting or as one who ever follows the vow of Brahmacharyya, or as one who always lives upon sacrificial residue, or as one who always worships guests."

Bhishma said :—

10 "He will be considered as one who is always fasting if he eats once during the day and once during the night at the fixed hours without eating anything in the interim.

11. Such a Brahmana, by always speaking the truth and by following always wisdom, and by going to his wife only in her season and never at other times, becomes a Brahmacharin.

12 By never eating meat of animals not killed for sacrifice, he will become a strict vegetarian. By always becoming charitable he will become ever pure, and by abstaining from sleep during the day he will become one who is always awake.

13 Know, O Yudhisthira, that the man who eats only after having fed his servants and guests becomes an eater always of ambrosia.

14 That Brahmana who never eats till gods and guests are fed, acquires by such abstention, heaven itself.

15 He is said to live upon sacrificial residue who eats only what remains after feeding the gods, the Pitris, servants and guests.

16 Such men acquires numberless blessed regions in next life. The gods and the Apsaras with Brahman himself, come to their homes.

17. They who share their food with the gods and the Pitris pass their days always happily with their sons and grandsons, and at last, leaving off this body, acquire a very high end."

CHAPTER CCXXII.

(MOKSHADHARMA PARVA).—Continued.

Yudhisthira said :—

1. "In this world, O Bharata, good and bad acts attach themselves to man for the purpose of producing fruits for enjoyment or endurance.

2. Is man, however, to be regarded as their doer or is he not to be considered so?

My mind is full of doubts regarding this question I wish to hear this fully from you, O grandfather."

Bhishma said :—

3. 'Regarding it, O Yudhisthira is cited the old discourse between Prahlada and Indra.

4—7. The king of the Daityas, viz., Prahlada, was unattached to all worldly objects His sins had been dissipated Of respectable parentage he was endued with great learning. Free from stupefication and pride, ever pervaded by the quality of goodness, and devoted to various vows, he considered praise and censure in the same light. Endued with self-control he was then passing his time in an empty room. Conversant with the origin and the destruction of all created objects mobile and immobile, he was never angry with things that displeased him and never rejoiced at the acquisition of agreeable objects He considered equally gold and a clod of earth.

7. Earnestly studying the Soul and acquiring Emancipation and firm in knowledge, he had acquired firm conclusions about truth.

8 Acquainted with what is supreme and what is not so among all things, omniscient and of universal sight, as he was seated one day in a solitary room with his senses under complete control Shakra approached him, and desirous of awakening him, said these words —

9 O king, I see all those qualities permanently living in you by which a person acquires the esteem of all.

10 Your understanding seems to be like that of a child, free from attachment and aversion. You know the Soul. What, do you think, is the best means by which a knowledge of the Soul may be acquired

11. You are now bound in fetters, fallen off from your former position, brought under the sway of your foes, and divested of prosperity. Your present circumstances are such as may well give room to grief Yet how is it, O Prahlada that you do not grieve

12. Is this owing, O son of Diti to the acquisition of wisdom or is it on account of your fortitude? Behold your calamities, O Prahlada, and yet you appear like one that is happy and tranquil.

13 Thus urged by Indra, the king of the Daityas endued with firmness and with fixed conclusions about truth, replied in these sweet words showing great wisdom.

Prahlada said —

14. 'He who does not know the origin and the destruction of all created objects is, on account of such ignorance, stupefied. He, however, who knows these two things, is never stupefied

15—16 All kinds of entities and non-entities come into being or cease on account of their own nature. No kind of personal exertion is necessary [for their production] In the absence of personal exertion it is clear that no personal agent exists for the production of all this that we perceive But though the person never does anything, yet through the influence of Ignorance a consciousness regarding agency overspreads itself on it.

17 He who regards himself as the doer of good good or bad acts possesses a vile wisdom Such a person is, in my opinion, does not know the truth

18—19 If, O Shakra, the being known as person were really the actor, then all acts undertaken for his own benefit would certainly be successful None of those acts would be futile Persons struggling their utmost to avoid what is not desired and to bring about what is desired are not to be seen What becomes then of personal exertion?

20 In the case of some, we see that without any exertion on their part, what is not desired is not brought about and what is desired is done. Thus then must be the result of Nature.

21 Some extraordinary persons again are seen, for though possessed of superior intelligence they have to seek wealth from others that are vulgar in features and gifted with little intelligence.

22 Indeed, when all qualities good or bad, enter a person impelled by Nature, what is there for one to boast (of his superior possessions)?

23 All these come from Nature. This is my settled belief Even Liberation and knowledge of self, in my view, originate from the same source.

24 'In this world all fruits good or bad, that attach themselves to persons, are considered as the outcome of acts. I shall now describe fully the subject of acts Hear me

25 As a crow, while eating some food, announces the presence of that food by its repeated cawing, similarly all our acts only proclaim the indications of Nature.

26 He who is acquainted with only the metamorphoses of Nature but not with Nature which is supreme and exists by herself, feels stupefication no account of his ignorance. He, however, who understands the difference between Nature and her metamorphoses is never stupefied.

27. All things originate from Nature On account of one's certain conviction about it, he would never be affected by pride or arrogance

28 When I know the origin of all the ordinances of mortality and when I am acquainted with the instability of all objects, I cannot, O Shakra, indulge in grief. All this is endued with an end.

29 Without attachments without pride, without desire and hope, freed from all fetters, and dissociated from everything, I am passing my time happily, seeing the appearance and disappearance of all created objects

30 For one who is wise, who is self-controlled, who is contented, who is without desire and hope, and who sees all things with the light of self knowledge, no trouble or anxiety exists, O Shakra.

31 I have no liking or aversion for either Nature or her changes I do not see any one now who is my enemy nor any one who is mine own.

32. I do not O Shakra, at any time seek either heaven, or this world, or the nether regions. It is not the fact that there is no happiness in understanding the Soul But the Soul, being dissociated from everything cannot enjoy happiness Hence I desire nothing.'

Shakra said —

33 Tell me the means, O Prahlada, by which this kind of wisdom may be acquired and by which this kind of tranquility may be made one's own I pray you'

Prahlada said :—

34 'By simplicity, by carefulness, by purifying the soul, by controlling the passions, and by waiting upon elders, O Shakra, a person acquires liberation

35 Know this however, that one gains wisdom from Nature, and that the acquisition of tranquility also is owing to the same cause Indeed, everything else that you see is due to Nature.

36 Thus addressed by the king of the Daityas Shakra became filled with wonder and lauded those words O king, with a cheerful heart

37. The king of the three worlds then, having adored the lord of the Daityas, took his leave and proceeded to his own quarter'

CHAPTER CCXXIII.

Yudhisthira said :—

1 "Tell me, O grandfather, by adopting what sort of intelligence may a king, who has been divested of prosperity and crushed by Time's heavy bludgeon, still live on this Earth"

Bhishma said :—

2 "Regarding it is cited the old discourse between Vasava and Virochana's son Vali

3. After having defeated all the Asuras, one day Vasava went to the Grandfather and joining his hands bowed to him and enquired after the whereabouts of Vali

4. Tell me, O Brahman, where may I now find that Vali whose wealth continued undiminished even though he used to distribute it as largely as he wished

5 He was the god of wind He was Varuna He was Surya He was Soma He was Agni that used to warm all creatures He became water. I do not find where he now is Indeed, O Brahmana, tell me where I may find Vali now

6 Formerly, it was he who used to light up all the cardinal points and to set Shaking off idleness it was he who used to pour rain upon all creatures at the proper season I do not now see that Vali Indeed, tell me, O Brahman, where I may find that king of the Asuras now.

Brahman said :—

7 'You should not, O Maghavat thus enquire after Vali now! One should not, however, speak a falsehood when he is questioned by another I shall tell you the whereabouts of Vali

8 O husband of Sachi, Vali may now have taken his birth among camels or bulls or asses or horses, and having become the foremost of his species may now be living in an empty room'

Shakra said :—

9 'If, O Brahman, I happen to meet with Vali in an empty room, shall I kill him or spare him? Tell me how I shall act"

Brahman said :—

10. 'Do not O Shakra, injure Vali! Vali does not deserve death You should, on the other hand O Vasava, seek instruction from him about morality, O Shakra, as you wish.'

Bhishma said :—

11. 'Thus addressed by the divine Creator, Indra travelled over the Earth, seated on Airavata in great splendour.

12 He succeeded in meeting with Vali who, as the Creator had said, was living in an empty room, clothed in the form of an ass'

Shakra said :—

13 'You are now, O Danava, born as an ass living on chaff This your birth is certainly a low one Do you or do you not grieve for it?

14. I see what I had never seen before, viz, yourself brought under the control of your enemies divested of prosperity and friends, and shorn of energy and prowess

15 Formerly you used to march through the worlds, with your train consisting of thousands of carriages and thousands of kinsmen and to move along, burning everybody with your splendour and disregarding us all.

16. Considering you as their protector the Daityas lived under your sway! Through your power, the Earth used to yield crops without waiting for tillage To day, however, I behold you overtaken by this dire calamity! Do you or do you not grieve for this

17. When formerly you used with pride beaming on your face, to divide on the eastern shores of the ocean your vast wealth among thy kinsmen, what then was the state of your mind?

18 Formerly, for many years, when shining with splendour, you used to sport, thousands of celestial damsels used to dance before you

19 All of them were decorated with garlands of lotuses and all had companions bright as gold What O king of Danavas, was the state of your mind then and what is it now.

20 You had a very large golden umbrella set with jewels and gems. Full forty-two thousand Gandharvas used in those days to dance before you.

21. In your sacrifices you had a very large stake made entirely of gold On such occasions you used to give away millions and millions of kine What, O Daitya, was the state of your mind then?

22 Formerly, engaged in sacrifice, you had gone round the whole Earth, following the rule of the hurling of the Shamya. What was the state of your mind then?

23 I do not now see that golden jar of yours, nor that umbrella of yours, nor those fans I behold not also, O king of the Asuras, that garland which was given to you by the Grandfather.'

Vali said :—

24 'You do not behold now O Vasava, my jar and umbrella and fans You do not see also my garland, that was given by the Grandfather

25 Those valuable possessions of mine about which you ask are now buried in the darkness of a cave When my time comes again, you will, forsooth, behold them again

26 This conduct of yours, however does not become your fame or birth? Yourself enjoying prosperity you wish to mock me that am sunk in adversity

27. They who acquired wisdom, and have won contentment therefrom they who are of tranquil souls, who are virtuous and good among creatures, never grieve in misery nor rejoice in happiness

28 Guided, however, by a vulgar intelligence, you are bragging O Purandara When you will become like me you will not then give vent to speeches like these.'

CHAPTER CCXXIV.

(MOKSHADHARMA PARVA) —

Continued.

Bhishma said —

1. 'Again, laughing at Vali who was sighing like a snake, Shakra addressed him for saying something more painful than what he had said before.

Shakra said —

2. 'Formerly, attended by a train consisting of thousands of vehicles and kinsmen, you used to march, burning all the worlds with your splendour and disregarding us all.

3. You are now, however, deserted by both kinsmen and friends Beholding this miserable conditions of yours, do you or do you not indulge in grief?

4 Formerly all the worlds were under your sway and great was your joy I ask, do you or you not grieve now, for this loss of your splendour?'

Vali said :—

5 'Regarding all this as transitory,—due, indeed, to the course of time,—I do not, O Shakra, grieve. These things have an end.

6 These bodies of creatures, O king of the celestials, are all transitory. Therefore, O Shakra, I do not grieve. Nor is this form due to any fault of mine.

7 The animating principle and the body come into existence simultaneously, for their own nature They grow together, and meet with destruction together.

8 Having obtained this form of birth I have not been enslaved by it for good Since I know this, I have no cause for sorrow.

9 As the final place of all rivers is the ocean, so the end of all embodied creatures is death. Those persons that know this well are never stupefied, O holder of the thunder-bolt.

10. They, however, who, overwhelmed with Darkness and loss of judgment, do not know this, they whose understanding is lost, sink under the load of misfortune

11 A person wins a keen understanding, succeeds in dissipating all his sins. A sinless person acquires the quality of Goodness, and having acquired it becomes cheerful.

12 They, however, that deviate from the quality of Goodness, and go through repeated re-births, are obliged to indulge in sorrow and grief, led on by desire and the objects of the senses.

13 I neither dislike nor like success or defeat, regarding the attainment of all objects of desire, life, or death, the fruits of action that are represented by pleasure or pain

14 When one kills another, he kills only that other's body That man who thinks that it is he who kills another, is himself killed Indeed, both of them do not know the truth, viz, he who kills and he who is killed.

15 O Maghavat, that person, who having killed or defeated any one brags of his manliness should know that he is not the actor, but that the act has been performed by another who is the real agent.

16 When it is asked that who is it that brings about the creation and the destruction of things in the world, it is generally thought that some person has caused it. Know, however, that the person who is so known has a creator.

17 Earth, light or heat, ether, water, and wind form the fifth—from these do all creatures originate (When I know this) what sorrow can I feel?

18—19 One who is endued with great learning, one who is not much learned, one who is strong, one who is destitute of strength, one who is beautiful, and one who is very ugly, one who is lucky, and one who is not blessed by fortune, are all carried away by Time, which is too deep to be measured by its own energy. When I know that I have been defeated by Time, what sorrow can I feel.

20 One that burns anything burns a thing that has been already burnt One who kills, only kills a victim already killed. One who is destroyed, has been before destroyed A thing that is acquired by a person is what is already arrived and intended for his acquirement.

21 This Time is like an ocean. There is no island in it. Its other shore is beyond reach Its boundary cannot be seen Thinking even deeply, I do not see the end of this continuous stream that is the great ordainer of all things and that is, forsooth, celestial.

22 If I did not know that it is Time which destroys all creatures, then, perhaps, I would have experienced the emotions of joy, pride and anger, O husband of Shachi

23 Have you come here to condemn me, having come to know that I am now assuming the form of an ass that lives upon chaff and that is now passing his days in a lonely spot remote from the dwellings of men.

24 If I wish, even now I can assume various dreadful forms, seeing any one of which you would immediately fly away from my presence

25 It is Time that gives every thing and again takes away everything It is Time that ordains all things Do not, O Shakra, brag of your manliness.

26 Formerly, O Purandara, whenever, I used to be angry everything used to become agitated I know, however, O Shakra, the eternal attributes of all things in the world.

27. Do you also know the truth. Do not allow yourself to be filled with wonder. Prosperity and its origin are not under one's control.

28. Your mind is like that of a child It is the same as it was before Open your eyes, O Maghavat and acquire an understanding which is sure and true.

29 In days gone by, the gods, men, the Pitris, the Gandharvas, the Nagas, and the Rakshasas, were all under my control You know this, O Vasava.

30—31. Having their understandings overcome by ignorance, all creatures used to flatter me, saying,—Salutations to that cardinal point where Virochana's son Vali may now be living, O husband of Sachi I do not at all grieve when I think of that honor, I am not sorry for this fall of mine My understanding is very strong here viz, that I will abide by the sway of the Ordainer.

32. It is seen that some one of nobly born highly beautiful and powerful, lives in misery, with all his counsellors and friends This happens because it has been so ordained.

33 Likewise, some one born in an ignoble race, devoid of knowledge, and with even a stain on his birth, is seen, O Shakra, to live happily with all his counsellors and friends This also happens because of it has been so ordained.

34 An auspicious and beautiful woman, O Shakra, is seen to pass her life miserably. Likewise, an ugly woman with every inauspicious mark is seen to live in great happiness.

35 That we have now become so is not owing to any act of ours, O Shakra That you are now so is not owing, O holder of the thunderbolt, to any act of yours?

36 You have not done anything, O you of a hundred sacrifices for which you are now enjoying this prosperity Nor have I done anything for which I have now been shorn of prosperity Prosperity and adversity come in succession

37 I now see you blazing with splendour, endued with prosperity, possessed of beauty, placed at the head of all the gods, and thus roaring at me.

38. This would never be but for the Time standing near after having attacked me Indeed, if Time had not attacked me I would have to-day slain you with only a blow of my fists albeit you are armed with the thunder

39 This however, is not the time for displaying my prowess On the other hand the time that has come when I should conduct myself with peace and tranquility It is Time which establishes all things Time acts upon all things and brings about their final consummation.

40. I was the adored king of the Danavas. Consuming all with my energy, I used to roar in strength and pride When Time has attacked even myself, who is there whom he will not attack.

41. Formerly, O king of the gods, singly I bore the energy of all the twelve illustrious Adityas with yourself amongst them.

42 It was I that used to bear up water and then to shower it as rain O Vasava! It was I who used to give both light and heat to the three worlds

43 It was I who used to protect and it was I that used to destroy. It was I who gave and it was I who took It was I who used to bind and it was I who used to unbind In all the worlds I was the one powerful master.

44 That sovereign control which I had, O king of the gods, is now gone I am now attacked by the forces of Time Those things, therefore, are no longer seen to shine in me

45 I am not the actor. You are not the actor. None else, O husband of Sachi, is the doer. It is Time, O Shakra, that protects or destroys all things

46 Persons well-read in the Vedas say that Time is Brahma. The fortnights and months are his body That body is clothed with days and nights as its dresses The seasons are his senses. The year is his mouth.

47 Some people, on account of their superior intelligence, say that the entire universe should be conceived as Brahma. The Vedas, however teach that the five sacs that cover the Soul should be known as Brahma

48 Brahma is deep and inaccessible like a deep ocean It is said that it has neither beginning nor end, and that it is both indestructible and destructible.

49 Though it is by nature without attributes yet it enters all existent objects and as such is clothed with attributes Those persons who know truth consider Brahma as eternal

50 Through the force of Ignorance, Brahma makes the attribute of materiality to invest the Chit or Soul which is immaterial spirit Materiality, however, is not the true attribute of the Soul

51 Brahma in the form of Time is the refuge of all creatures Where can you go transcending that Time? Time or Brahma, indeed, cannot be shunned by running nor by standing still.

52—54 All the five senses cannot perceive Brahma. Some have said that Brahma is Fire, some that he is Prajapati, some that he is the Season, some that he is the Month; some that he is the Fortnight, some that he is the Days, some that he is the Hours, some that he is the Morning, some that he is the Noon, some towards the south. Purandara proceeded towards the north.

38 After having listened to the wrong of Vali which were marked by no pride, the thousand eyed Indra then ascended the skies."

CHAPTER CCXXVI.

(MOKSHADHARMA PARVA).—Continued.

Bhishma said :—

1 'Regarding it is also cited the old discourse between him of a hundred sacrifices and the Asura Namuchi, O Yudhisthira

2 When the Asura Namuchi, who knew well the birth and the death of all creatures was sitting, shorn of prosperity but undisturbed at heart like the huge ocean in perfect stillness, Purandara addressed him these words :—

Namuchi said :—

3 'Fallen off from your place, fettered with cords, brought under the influence of your enemies, and shorn of prosperity, do you, O Namuchi, grieve or live cheerfully.'

4 'By indulging in such sorrow as cannot be avoided one only wastes his body any cheering his enemies Then, again, no one can lighten another's sorrow by putting any portion of it upon oneself For these reasons, O Shakra, I do not grieve. All this that you see has one end.

5 Indulgence in sorrow mars personal beauty, prosperity, life, and virtue itself, O king of the gods.

6 Forsooth, suppressing that sorrow which comes upon oneself and which is begotten by a weak mind one endued with true knowledge should reflect in his mind of that which yields the highest good and which lives in the heart itself

7. When one sets his mind upon what is for one's highest good forsooth the result that all his objects are accomplished

8 There is One Ordainer, and no second His sway extends over even the embryo Controlled by the great Ordainer I go on as He moves me on, like water running along a downward path.

9 Knowing what is existence and what liberation, and understanding also that the latter is superior to the former, I do not, however, try to attain to it Doing virtuous and sinful acts I go on as He moves me on.

10. One gets those things that are ordained to be got. That which is to happen actually takes place

11. One has repeatedly to live in such wombs in which one is placed by the Ordainer. He has no choice in the matter.

12 That person never feels himself stupefied, who when placed in any particular condition, accepts it as that which he was ordained to be placed in.

13 Men are affected by pleasure and pain that come by turns in Time. There is no personal agency in this matter. In this lies sorrow.

14 Who is there amongst Rishis, gods, great Asuras, persons fully conversant with the three Vedas, and hermits living in the forest, whom calamities do not approach? Those, however, who know well, the Soul and the not-Soul never fear calamities.

15 The wise person, naturally standing immovable like Himavat, never yields to anger, never allows himself to be addicted to the objects of the senses; never suffers pain in sorrow or rejoices in happiness. When overwhelmed with even great afflictions, such a person never grieves.

16. That person is indeed, a great man whom even great success cannot gladden and even great calamities cannot stupefy, and who bears pleasure and pain, and that which is between them both, with an unaffected mind

17. A person should always be cheerful and not sorry into whatever condition he may fall thus should a person remove his increasing sorrow which is born in his mind and that is (if not removed) sure to give pain.

18. That concourse of learned men engaged in the discussion of the ethics of both the Shrutis and the Smritis is not a good assembly,—indeed, that does not deserve to be called so—entering which a wicked man is not stricken with fear. That man is the foremost of his sex, who having made a proper enquiry after righteousness acts according to the conclusions to which he arrives.

19 The acts of a wise man are not easily understood. A wise man is never stupefied when afflictions overtake him Even if he falls away from his position like Gautama in his old age, on account of the direst calamity, he does not allow himself to be stupefied.

20 Can a person by Mantras, strength, energy, wisdom, prowess, behaviour, conduct, or Wealth, acquire that which has not been ordained to be acquired by him? What sorrow then is there if a person cannot acquire that which he seeks at heart.

21 Before I was born, the ordainers had ordained what I am to do and suffer I am fulfilling what was thus ordained for me. What then can death do to me

22 One gets only what has been ordained One goes whence he was ordained to go Those sorrows and joys only are obtained that are ordained so

23 That man who knowing this well does not allow himself to be stupefied, and who is contented with both happiness and misery is considered as the foremost of his sex"

CHAPTER CCXXVII.

(MOKSHADHARMA PARVA)—Continued.

Yudhisthira said:—

1. 'What indeed, is good for a man who is sunk in dire distress consequent on the loss of friends or kingdom, O king

2 In this world O foremost of Bharata's race you are the greatest of our instructors! I ask you this You should tell me what I ask"

Bhishma said—

3 'Fortitude is of the greatest good O king for one who has been deprived of sons and wives and pleasures of every sort and wealth, and who has been plunged into dire distress The body is never emaciated of one who is always endued with fortitude

4 Want of sorrow carries happiness with it and also health which is a superior possession. Again on account of this health one may acquire prosperity

5 That wise man, O sire who always follows righteous conduct succeeds in acquiring prosperity, patience, and perseverance in the accomplishment of all his objects.

6 'Regarding it is cited the old discourse between Vali and Vasava, O Yudhisthira.

7. After the battle between the gods and the demons in which a large number of Daityas and Danavas fell, had come to a close, Vali became king He was deceived by Vishnu who once more established his supremacy over all the worlds The god of a hundred sacrifices was once more invested with the sovereignty of the celestials

8 After the celestial administration had thus been re established and the four orders of men had been re established in performance of their respective duties the three worlds once more swelled with prosperity, and the Self create became glad of heart

9—10 At that time, accompanied by the Rudras, the Vasus the Adityas the Ashwins the celestial Rishis the Gandharvas, the Siddhas, and other superior orders of beings, the powerful Shakra seated on his four tusked prince of elephants, called Airavata marched through all the worlds.

11. One day, while thus engaged, the holder of the thunderbolt saw Virochana's son Vali within a certain mountain cave on the sea shore Seeing the king of Danavas, he came near him

12 Seeing the king of gods viz, Indra, thus seated on the back of Airavata and surrounded by the several orders of the celestials the king of the Daityas displayed no signs of sorrow or agitation

13 Seeing Vali unmoved and fearless, Indra also addressed him from the back of his king of elephants, saying,—

14 How is it, O Daitya, that you are so unmoved? Is it owing to your heroism or to your having waited reverentially upon elders? Is it owing to your mind having been purified by penances? To whatever cause it may be due this mood of mind is surely very difficult to attain

15 Hurled from the highest position you are now shorn of all your possessions and have been brought under the sway of your enemies O Virochana's son what is that by adopting which you do not grieve although it is time for grief.

16 Formerly, when you were the king of your own order, you enjoyed matchless pleasures Now, however, you are shorn of your riches and jewels and sovereignty Tell us why you are so unmoved

17 'You were ere this a god, seated on the throne of your father and grandfathers Finding yourself deprived to day by your enemies, why do you not grieve?

18 You are fettered with Varuna's noose and hast been struck with my thunderbolt Your wives and riches have been taken away. Tell us why you do not grieve.

19 Shorn of prosperity and fallen away from affluence, you do not grieve This, indeed, is something very remarkable

Who else, O Vali, then one like you, could dare live thus after being shorn of the sovereignty of the three worlds?

20. Hearing without any pain these and other cutting words that Indra said asserting the while his own superiority over him, Vali the son of Virochana fearlessly answered him thus,

Vali said:—

22. When calamities have assailed me, O Shakra, what do you gain by such brag now? To-day I see you, O Purandara, stand before me with the thunder-bolt upraised in your hand.

22. Formerly, however, you could not behave so. Now you have somehow gained that power. Indeed, who else save you could give vent to such cruel words?

24. That person who, though able to punish, shows mercy towards a heroic enemies defeated and brought under his control, is indeed a great man.

24. When two persons fight, victory is indeed doubtful One of the two surely becomes victorious, and the other is defeated.

25. O king of gods, let not your nature be so. Do not think that you have become the king of all creatures after having defeated all with your might and prowess

26. That we have become so is not, O Indra, the result of our acts. That you have become so, O holder of the thunder-bolt, is not the result of any act of yours.

27. What I am now you will be in time Do not disregard me, thinking that you have performed a highly difficult feat

28 A person gets happiness and misery one after another in course of Time You have O Shakra, gained sovereignty of the universe in course of Time but not by virtue of any particular merit in you.

29. It is Time that leads me on in his course. That same time leads you also onward. It is, therefore, that I am not what you are to-day, and you also are not what we are.

30. Dutiful services to parents respectful adoration of deities, due practice of any good quality,—none of these can confer happiness on any one.

31. Neither knowledge nor penances, nor gifts, nor friends, nor kinsman, can save one who is afflicted by Time.

32 Even by a thousand means, men cannot avert an impending danger. Intelligence and strength are useless in such cases.

33. None can save men who are afflicted by Time's course Because, O Shakra, you consider yourself as the actor therefore it is the root of all sorrow.

33 If the seeming performer of an act is the real actor thereof, that doer then would not himself be the creation of some one else (viz, the God) Therefore, because the seeming doer is himself the creation of another, that another is the Supreme Being superior to whom there is nothing else.

35 Helped by Time I had defeated you. Helped by Time you have defeated me. It is Time which moves all beings.

36. O Indra, because your intelligence is very mean you do not see that destruction awaits all things! Some, indeed, respect you as one who has acquired by his own acts the sovereignty of the universe.

37. But, how can one like us who know the course of the world, grieve for having been afflicted by Time, or allow our understanding to be stupefied, or give way to the influence of error?

38 Even when we are possessed by Time, coming in contact with a calamity, shall my understanding or that of one like me allow itself to be destroyed like a wrecked vessel at sea.

39. Myself, yourself, and all those who will in future become the kings of the deities, shall have, O Shakra, to follow the way along which hundreds of Indras have gone before you

40. When your hour will be full, Time will surely destroy you like me,—who are now so invincible and who now shine with matchless splendour.

41. In Time's course many thousands of Indras and of gods have been swept off cycle after cycle. Time, indeed, is irresistible.

42. Having secured your present position, you think too much of yourself, even as the Creator of all beings, the divine and and eternal Brahman

43 Many before you had attained to this position of yours. With none did it last for ever. On account of a foolish understanding, you consider it immutable and eternal

44 You trust in that which is not worthy of trust You consider that to be eternal which is not eternal. O king of the gods, one who is possessed and stupefied by Time really considers himself thus.

45 Actuated by folly you consider your present regal prosperity as yours. Know, however, that it is not permanent either for me or for you or for others.

46 It had belonged to numberless persons before you Passing over them it has now become yours It will say with you O Vasava, for sometime and then prove its fickleness Like a cow leaving one drinking ditch for another, it will surely leave you for somebody else

47 So many kings have gone before you that I venture not to calculate them In the future also O Purandara, numberless sovereigns will rise after you

48 I do not see those kings now that had formerly enjoyed this Earth with her trees, plants, gems, living creatures, waters and mines.

49—55 Prithu, Aila, Maya, Bhuma, Naraka, Shamvara, Ashwagriva Puloman Swarbhanu whose standard was of immeasurable height, Prahrada, Namuchi, Daksha, Vipprachitti, Virochana, Hrimsheva, Suhotra, Bhurihan, Pushavat, Vrisha, Satyepsu Rishava, Vahu, Kapilashwa, Virupaka, Vana, Karttashwara, Vahni Vishwadangshtra, Nairiti, Sankocha Varitaksha Varaha, Ashwa Ruchiprabha, Vishwajit Pratirupa Vrishanda, Vishkara Madhu Hiranyakashipu the Danava Kaitabha and many others that were Daityas and Danavas and Rakshasas, these and many more not named, of remote and remoter ages great Daityas and foremost of Danavas whose names we have heard — indeed, many foremost of Daityas of former times—have passed away, leaving the Earth All of them were possessed by Time Time proved more powerful than all of them.

56 All of them had adored the Creator in hundreds of sacrifices You are not the only person that has done so All of them were given to righteousness and all of them always celebrated great sacrifices

57 All of them were capable of passing through the welkin and all were heroes that never retreated from the battle field All of them had very strong bodies and all had arms resembling heavy bludgeons

58 All of them were adepts in hundreds of illusions and all could assume any form they liked We have never heard that having undertaken a battle any of them had ever met with defeat

59 All observed the vow of truth and all of them sported as they wished Devoted to the Vedas and Vedic rites all of them were endued with great learning.

60 Endued with great might, all of them had gained the highest prosperity and affluence But none of these great kings had the pride of sovereignty.

61 All of them were liberal, giving to each what each deserved All of them behaved properly and duly by all creatures

62 All of them were the offspring of Daksha's daughters Gifted with great strength, all were lords of the creation. Burning all things with their energy, all of them shone greatly Yet all of them were carried away by Time.

63 As regards you O Shakra it is clear that when you shall have, after enjoying the Earth, to leave her you will not be able to control your grief

64 Relinquish this desire for objects of affection and enjoyment Relinquish this pride begotten by prosperity If you act thus, you will then be able to bear the grief consequent on the loss of sovereignty.

65 When the hour of sorrow comes, do not give way to it Likewise when the hour of joy comes, do not rejoice Not thinking of both the past and the future, live contentedly with the present.

66 When Time that never sleeps came upon me that had always been mindful of my duties bend your heart to the ways of peace, O Indra, for that same Time will very soon meet you

67 You cut me to the quick with your words, and you seem determined to terrorise me Indeed, finding me calm, you think very highly of you

68 Time had first attacked me It is even now behind you I was at first defeated by Time It was therefore that you did afterwards succeed in defeating me for which you are bragging thus.

69 Formerly, when I used to become angry, what person was there on Earth who could stand before me in battle? Time however, is stronger He has overwhelmed me It is therefore O Vasava that you are able to stand before me Those thousand celestial years over which your reign extends will surely come to an end

70 You will then fall and your limbs will become as miserable as mine now even though I am endued with great energy I have fallen away from the high place that is occupied by the king of the three worlds. You are now the real Indra in heaven

71 By virtue of Time's course, you are now an object of universal adoration in this charming world of living beings Can you say what is that by having done which you have become Indra to day and what also is that by having done which we have fallen off from the position we had occupied.

72—73. Time is the one creator and destroyer. Nothing else is cause By encountering any of these, viz, decline, fall sovereignty, happiness, misery, birth and death a learned person neither rejoices nor grieves You O Indra, know us. We also, O Vasava, know you.

74 Why then do you brag thus before me, forgetting, O shameless one, that it is Time that has made you what you are? You yourself saw what my prowess was in those days.

75—77. The energy and might I used to display in all my battles prove it clearly The Adityas, the Rudras, the Saddhyas the Vasus, and the Maruts, O lord of Shachi were all defeated by me You know it well yourself, O Shakra, that in the great battle between the gods and the Asuras, the assembled gods were speedily routed by me by the fury of my attack Mountains with their forests and the denizens, were repeatedly hurled by us.

78 I broke on your head, many mountain summits with craggy edges What, however, can I do now? Time cannot be resisted.

79 If it were not so, do not think that I would not have dared to kill you with that thunderbolt of yours with even a blow of my fist The present, however, is not the hour when I should display my prowess The present hour is such that I should remain silent and tolerate everything It is therefore, O Shakra, that I put up with all this insolence of yours. Know however, that I am less able to bear insolence than even you

80 You are bragging before one who his time being full is surrounded on all sides by Time's conflagration and fettered strongly in Time's cords

81. There stands that dark individual who cannot be resisted by the world There he of fierce form, stands, having bound me like an inferior animal bound with ropes.

82 Gain and loss, happiness and misery, lust and anger, birth and death, captivity and release,—these all one meets in Time's course.

83 I am not the actor You are not the actor. He is the actor who, is omnipotent Time ripens me like a fruit that is on a tree.

84 There are certain acts by doing which one person enjoys happiness in Time's course By doing those very acts another reaps misery in the course of Time.

85 Conversant as I am with the virtues of Time, I should not grieve when it is Time that has attacked me It is therefore, O Shakra, that I do not grieve Grief can do us no good The grief of one that indulges in grief never dissipates his calamity. On the other hand, grief destroys his power. It is therefore that I do not grieve.

87 Thus addressed by the kings of the Daityas, the god of a hundred sacrifices, viz, the powerful and thousand-eyed chastiser of Paka, checked his anger and said these words

Shakra said —

88 'Seeing this uprased arm of mine, equipt with the thunderbolt, and those nooses of Varuna, who is there whose understanding is not moved, including the very Destroyer himself who brings about the death of all beings.

89. Your understanding, however, so firm and so endued with visions of the truth has not been moved O you of invincible prowess, verily you are unmoved to-day on account of your fortitude

90. Seeing all things in this universe as transient, who is there in it, endued with body that would venture to place confidence on either his body or all the objects of his desire?

91 Like yourself I also know that this universe is not eternal, and that it has been thrown into Time's fire that is dreadful though hidden from the view, that is perpetually burning, and that is indeed endless

92 'Every one is attacked here by Time. Nothing among subtile or gross beings can escape from Time's sway. All things are being cooked in Time's pot

93 Time has no master. Time is ever vigilant Time is always cooking every thing within itself No one who has once entered the kingdom of Time which is perpetually going on can escape therefrom

94. All embodied beings may be careless of Time, but Time is careful and is wide awake behind them No one has ever been seen to have driven off Time from him

95 Ancient eternal and the embodiment of Justice, Time is always equal about all living creatures Time cannot be shunned and there is no retrogression in its course

96 Like a usurer summing up his interest, Time sums up its subtile portions represented by kalas, lavas, kashthas, kshanas, months, and days and nights.

Bhishma said :—

2 "Blessings to you, the mind itself indicates the symptoms of one's future prosperity and future fall.

3 Regarding it is cited the old discourse between Shree and Shakra. Listen to it, O Yudhisthira.

4—5. The great and energetic ascetic Narada whose effulgence is as immeasurable as Brahma itself, with sins all dissipated, capable of seeing through the power of his penances both this and the other world at once, and the equal of the celestial Rishis living in the region of the Creator, roamed at his pleasure through the three worlds.

6 One day, rising up early in the morning, he wished to perform his ablutions and for that purpose went to the river Ganga as she issued out of the pass called Dhruva, and plunged into the stream

7 At that time the thousand eyed Indra also the holder of the thunder-bolt, and the destroyer of Shamvara and Paka, came to the very shore where Narada was.

8 The Rishi and the god, both of whom had perfectly controlled their minds, finished their ablutions, and having completed their silent recitations, sat together.

9 They spent the hour in reciting and listening to the excellent narratives told by the great celestial Rishis describing many good and high deeds Indeed, with rapt attention the two were engaged in such lively discourse on ancient history.

10. While sitting there they saw the rising Sun casting his thousand rays right before him Seeing the full orb, both of them stood up and lauded him

11 Just at that time they saw in the sky, in a direction opposite to that of the rising star of day, some luminous object, resplendent as burning fire which seemed to be a second star of day And they saw, O Bharata, that that luminous object was gradually approaching them both.

12 Riding upon Vishnu's vehicle adorned with Gadura and Surya himself, that object shone forth with matchless splendour, and seemed to light up the three worlds.

13 The object they beheld was none other than Shree herself, attended by many Apsaras gifted with splendid beauty Indeed, she looked like a large solar disc herself, effulgent like fire.

14 Decorated with ornaments that appeared like veritable stars, she wore a wreath resembling a garland of pearls Indra saw that goddess called Padma living in the midst of lotuses

15 Getting down from her foremost of cars, that peerless lady began to approach towards the lord of the three worlds and the celestial Rishi Narada.

16—17. Followed by Narada, Indra also proceeded towards that lady With joined hands, he offered himself up to her, and versed as he was with all things, he adored her with unsurpassed reverence and sincerity The adorations over, the king of gods, O king, addressed Shree thus,

Shakra said :—

18 'O you of sweet smiles, who, indeed, are you and for what I ave you come here? O you of fair brows, whence do you come and where will you go, O auspicious lady?'

Shree said :

19 'In the three worlds full of auspiciousness, all creatures, mobile and immobile, try with their whole hearts to gain a companionship with me.

20 I am that Padma, that Shree adorned with lotuses, who originated from the lotus that blooms at the touch of the rays of the Sun God, for the prosperity of all creatures.

21 I am called Lakshmi Bhuti, and Sree O killer of Vala! I am Faith I am Intelligence, I am Affluence, I am Victory, and I am Immutability.

22. I am Patience I am Success and I am Prosperity I am Swaha I am Swadha, I am Reverence, and I am Fate, and I am Memory.

23 I live at the van and on the standards of victorious and virtuous kings, as well as in their homes, cities, and kingdoms.

24 I always live, O killer of Vala, with those foremost of men, the heroes longing for victory and unretreating from battle.

25 I also live for ever with persons who are steadfastly attached to virtue, who are highly intelligent, who are devoted to Brahma who are truthful in speech, who are possessed of humility, and who are liberal

26 Formerly I lived with the Asuras on account of their being full of truth and merit Seeing, however, that the Asuras have assumed adverse natures, I have left them and wish to live in you.'

Shakra said :—

27. 'O you of fair face, for what conduct of the Asuras did you live with them?

CHAPTER CCXXIX.

(MOKSHADHARMA PARVA) — Continued.

Yudhisthira said:—

1 "By what nature, what course of duties, what knowledge, and what energy, does one succeed in attaining to Brahma which is immutable and is beyond the reach of nature"

Bhishma said:—

2. "One who practises the religion of renunciation, who eats sparingly, and who has his senses under complete control, can attain to Brahma which is immutable and which is above nature

3 Regarding it is cited the old discourse between Jaigishavya and Asita. O Bharata.

4 Once on a time Asita-Devala addressed Jaigishavya who was endued with great wisdom and fully acquainted with the truths of duty and morality.

Devala said:—

5 You are not pleased when lauded, you do not give way to anger when blamed or censured What, indeed is your wisdom? Whence have you got it? And what, indeed, is the refuge of that wisdom?

Bhishma said —

6 Thus accosted by Devala the pure Jaigishavya of austere penances said those words of great import, fraught with full faith and deep significance

Jaigishavya said:—

7 O foremost of Rishis I shall tell you of what is the highest end that which is the supreme goal that which is tranquility, as regarded by all pious persons

8 They, O Devala, who treat equally those who praise them and those who blame them, they who conceal their own vows and good acts, they who never indulge in vilifications, they who never say even what is good when it is calculated to injure (instead of producing any benefit) they who do not desire to retaliate injury are said to be wise men

10 They never grieve for what is yet to come They are concerned with only what is present and act as they should They never grieve for the past or even recollect it.

11. Endued with power and controlled minds they do at their pleasure, in the way in which it should be done, what they should do, O Devala, if solicited respectfully thereto.

12 Of mature knowledge, of great wisdom, with anger under complete control, and with their passions subjugated, they never commit an injury to any one in thought, word, or deed

13 Shorn of envy, they never injure others and gifted with self-control, they are never pained on seeing other people's prosperity.

14 Such men never indulge in exaggerated speeches, or laud others, or speak ill of them They are again never influenced by praise and censure showered on them.

15 They are tranquil regarding all their desires, and are engaged in the well-being of all creatures They never give way to anger or indulge in joy, or injure any creature

16 Loosening all the knots of their hearts, they pass on very happily They have no friends nor are they the friends of others

17 They have no enemies nor are they the enemies of other creatures Indeed men who can live in this way can pass their days in perpetual happiness

18. O foremost of twice born ones, they who acquire a knowledge of the rules of morality and righteousness, and who observe those rules in practice acquire joy while they who deviate from the path of righteousness are afflicted by anxieties and sorrow

19 I now follow the path of righteousness Decried by others why shall I be annoyed with them or lauded by others, why shall I be pleased?

20 Let men get whatsoever objects they please from whatsoever callings they pursue Praise and censure cannot secure my advancement or the reverse

21 He who has understood the truths of things, becomes pleased with even disregard as if it were nectar The wise man is indeed annoyed with regard as if it were poison

22 He who is freed from all shortcomings sleeps fearlessly both here and hereafter even if insulted by others On the other hand, he who insults him, meets with destruction.

23 The wise men who seek to attain to the highest end, succeed in obtaining it following such a conduct.

24 The man who has controlled all his senses is considered to have performed all the sacrifices Such a person attains to Brahma, which is eternal and which is above the reach of nature

25 The very gods, the Gandharvas, the Pishachas, and the Rakshasas, cannot attain to the end of one who has attained to the highest end."

Yudhishthira said —

1 "What man is there who is dear to all who pleases all persons, and who is gifted with every merit and every accomplishment?"

Bhishma said —

2 "About it I shall recite to you the words that Keshava, asked by Ugrasena, said to him on a former occasion

Ugrasena said —

3 All persons seem to be anxious to describe of the merits of Narada I think that celestial Rishi must really be endued with every sort of merit I ask you tell me this O Keshava

Vasudeva said —

4 O chief of the Kukuras listen to me as I describe shortly those good qualities of Narada which I know, O king! Narada is as well read in the scriptures as he is good and pious in his conduct

5 And yet, he is not proud of his conduct, which makes one's blood so hot It is for this that he is adored everywhere

6 Discontent, anger levity and fear, do not exist in Narada He is free from procrastination and endued with courage For this he is adored everywhere

7 Narada deserves the respectful adorations of all He never retracts his words through desire or cupidity For this he is adored everywhere

8 He is fully conversant with the knowledge of the soul bent on peace, endued with great energy, and a master of his senses He is free from guile and truthful in words For this he is adored with respect everywhere

9 He is distinguished by energy, fame intelligence, knowledge humility, birth by penances, and years For these he is everywhere adored with respect.

10 He is of good conduct He dresses and houses himself well He eats pure food He loves all He is pure in body and mind He is sweet speeched He is free from envy and malice For this he is adored everywhere with respect

11 He is forsooth, always employed in doing good to all people. No sin is in him He never rejoices at other people's misfortunes For this he is adored everywhere with respect

12 He always tries to conquer all earthly desires by listening to Vedic recitations and attending to the Puranas He is a great renouncer and he never disrespects any one For this he is adored everywhere with respect

13 He considers all equally, and, therefore, he has no one whom he loves and none whom he hates He always speaks what is pleasant to the hearer. For this he is adored everywhere with respect

14 He is endued with great learning in the scriptures His conversation is varied and charming His knowledge and wisdom are great. He is free from cupidity He is free also from deception He is large hearted He has conquered anger and cupidity For this he is adored everywhere with respect

15 He has never fallen out with any one for any subject of profit or pleasure. All faults have disappeared from him. For this he is adored everywhere with respect

16 His devotion (to Brahma) is firm. His soul is blameless He is well versed in the Shrutis He is free from cruelty. He is above the influence of delusion or faults For this he is adored everywhere with respect

17 He is unattached to all objects of attachment (for others) For all that he seems to be attached to all things He does not suffer long from the influence of any doubt For this he is everywhere adored with respect

18 He has no longing for objects of profit and pleasure He never speaks highly of his own self He is shorn of malice He is mild in speech Therefore he is everywhere adored with respect

19 He sees the hearts, different from one another, of all men without blaming any of them. He is well versed in all matters relating to the origin of things.

20 He never disregards or hates any kind of science He lives according to his own standard of morality. He never passes time idly. He has controlled his soul Therefore he is everywhere adored with respect.

21. He has worked hard in subjects worthy of hard application He has acquired knowledge and wisdom He is never satiated with yoga He is always attentive and ready for work He is ever careful For this he is everywhere adored with respect.

22 He does not feel shame for any deficiency of his He is very attentive He is always engaged by others for doing what is for their behoof. He never divulges the secrets of others For this he is everywhere adored with respect.

23 He is never puffed up with joy at the time of making even valuable acquisitions He is never pained at losses His understanding is firm and fixed. His mind is unattached to all things Therefore he is everywhere adored with respect.

24 Who, indeed, is there who will not love him who is thus endued with every merit and accomplishment, who is expert in all things, who is pure in body and mind who is perfectly auspicious, who is well-versed with the course of time and the opportuneness it affords for particular acts, and who is well acquainted with all agreeable things?'

CHAPTER CCXXXI.

(MOKSHADHARMA PARVA).—Continued.

Yudhisthira said —

1. "I wish, O Kuru hero, to know what the origin and what the end is of all creatures, what the nature of their meditation is and what their acts, what the divisions of time are, and what is the space of human existence in the respective cycles

2 I wish also to know fully the truth about the genesis and the conduct of the world, the coming of creatures into the world and their exit Indeed, whence their creation and destruction?

3 O best of virtuous persons if you wish to favor us, do tell us this about which I ask you.

4 Having heard before this the excellent discourse of Bhrigu to the twice-born sage Bharadwaja, which you did recite, my understanding, shorn of ignorance, has become greatly attached to yoga, and withdrawn from worldly objects rests upon heavenly purity. I ask you about the subject, therefore, once more. You should describe it to me fully."

Bhishma said '—

6 "Regarding it I shall recite to you an old narrative of what the divine Vyasa said to his son Shuka when the latter had asked the former.

7—8 Having studied the measureless Vedas with all their branches and the Upanishads, and desirous of leading a life of celibacy on account of his having acquired excellence of religious merit, Shuka put these very questions, about which his doubts had not been removed, to his father Dwaipayana who had removed (by study and contemplation) all doubts regarding true duties.

Shuka said —

9 You should tell me who the Creator is of all beings, as fixed by a knowledge of time, and what the duties are of a Brahmana!

Bhishma said '—

10 The father, having a knowledge of both the past and the future, conversant with all duties and gifted with omniscience, thus described the subject to his son, who had questioned him.

Vyasa said —

11. Only Brahma, who is without beginning and without end, unborn, effulgent, above decay, immutable, indestructible, inconceivable and transcending knowledge exists before the Creation

12—13. The Rishis, measuring time, have given particular names to particular portions Five and ten winks of the eye make what is called a Kashtha. Thirty Kashthas make what is called a Kala. Thirty Kalas, with the tenth part of a Kala, make a Muhurta Thirty Muhurtas make up one day and night. Thirty days and nights form a month, and twelve months form a year.

14 Persons well-read in mathematical science say that a year is made up of two solar motions, viz, the northern and the southern

15. The sun makes the day and the night for men The night is for the sleep of all living creatures, and the day is for work.

16 A month of human beings is equal to a day and night of the departed manes. That division consists in this the light half of the month is their day which is for work, and the dark fortnight is their night for sleep.

17 A year (of men) is equal to a day and night of the gods This division consists in this the half year for which the sun travels from the vernal to the autumnal equinox is the day of the gods, and the half year for which the sun moves from the latter to the former is their night

18 Calculating by the days and nights of human beings about which I have told you I shall speak of the day and night of Brahman and his years also

19 I shall, in their order, tell you the number of years that are for different purposes calculated differently, in the Krita the Treta, the Dwapara, and the Kali yugas

20 Four thousand celestial years is the duration of the first or Krita age The morning of that cycle consists of four hundred years and its evening is of four hundred years

21 Regarding the other cycles, the duration of each gradually decreases by a quarter in respect of both the principal period with the minor portion and the conjoining portion itself

22 These periods always keep up the never-ending and eternal worlds They who know Brahma, O child, regard this as Immutable Brahma.

23 In the Krita age all the duties exist in full along with Truth Men of that age never acquired knowledge or object through unrighteous or forbidden means 24 In the other cycles duty, as laid down in the Vedas, is seen to gradually decline by a quarter in each Sinfulness multiplies by theft untruth, and deception.

25 In the Krita age, all persons are free from disease and achieve their objects and all live for four hundred years In the Treta, the period of life decreases by a quarter.

26 We have heard that, in the succeeding yugas the words of the Vedas the periods of life, the blessings and the fruits of Vedic rites, all decrease gradually

27 The duties set down for the Krita yuga are of one kind. Those for the Treta are otherwise Those for the Dwapara are different And those for the Kali are otherwise This is in accordance with the decline which marks every succeeding cycle.

28 In the Krita Penance is the foremost In the Treta Knowledge is foremost In Dwapara, Sacrifice has been said to be the foremost. In the Kali yuga, only Gift is sanctioned

29 The learned say that these twelve thousand celestial years form what is called a cycle A thousand such cycles form a single day of Brahman

30 The same is the duration of Brahman's night With the beginning of Brahman's day the universe begins to come into being During the period of universal dissolution the Creator sleeps in Yoga meditation When the period of sleep expires, He awakes.

31 What is Brahman's day covers a thousand such cycles His night also covers a thousand similar cycles They who know this are said to know the day and the night

32 On the expiry of His night, Brahman waking up, modifies the indestructible intelligence by causing it to be overlaid with ignorance He then causes Consciousness to spring up whence originates Mind which is at one with the Manifest'"

CHAPTER CCXXXII.

(MOKSHADHARMA' PARVA) —
Continued.

Vyasa said —

1 "Brahma is the effulgent seed from which existing as it does by itself, has originated the entire universe consisting of two kinds of being, viz, the mobile and the immobile.

2 At the dawn of His day, waking up, He creates with the aid of Avidya this universe. Mahat or the principle of Greatness at first springs up That Mahat is speedily changed into Mind which is the soul of the Manifest

3—4 Overwhelming the Intelligence, which is effulgent, with Ignorance, Mind creates seven great entities Urged by the desire of creating, Mind, which is far-reaching which has many courses and which has desire and doubt for its leading signs, begins to create various kinds of objects by modifications of itself Ether first originates from it Know that its property is Sound

5 From Ether, by modification, originates the bearer of all scents viz, the pure, and powerful Wind It is said to possess the property of Touch.

6 From Wind also by modification, originates Light endued with effulgence. Beautiful and called also Shukram, it is thus created, possessing the attribute of Form.

7 From light, by modification, originates Water having taste for its attribute From Water originates Earth having Scent for its attribute These are said to represent primary creation

8 These, in succession, acquire the attributes of the immediately preceding ones from which they have originated Each has not only its own special attribute but each succeeding one has the attributes of all the previous ones

9 If anybody, perceiving Scent in Water, were from ignorance to say that it belongs to Water, he would make a mistake for Scent is the attribute of Earth though it may exist in Water and also Wind

10 These seven kinds of entities, possessing various kinds of energy, at first existed separately from one another They could not create objects without all of them acting in a body.

11 All these great entities coming together, and mixing with one another, form the constituent parts of the body which are called limbs.

12 On account of the combination of those limbs—the sum total invested with form and having sixteen constituent parts becomes what is called the body, (When the gross body is thus formed) the subtile principle of greatness with the unexhausted remnant of acts then enters that combination called the gross body.

13 The original Creator of all beings, then having by His Maya divided Himself, enters that subtile form for overlooking everything And because he is the original Creator of all beings he is called the lord of all beings.

14—15 It is he who creates all beings mobile and immobile After having thus assumed the form of Brahman, he creates the worlds of the gods, the Rishis, the Pitris, and men, the rivers, the seas and the oceans, the cardinal points, countries and provinces, hills and mountains, and large trees, human beings Kinnaras Rakshasas, birds, animals domestic and wild and snakes.

16—17. He creates both kinds of mobile and immobile, and those that are destructible and those that are industructible Of these created objects each gets those attributes which it had during the previous Creation, and each obtains repeatedly the same attributes at every subsequent Creation Having a formed character by either injuriousness or peacefulness, mildness or fierceness righteousness or unrighteousness, truthfulness, or untruthfulness, each creature, at every new creation, gets that particular attribute which it had got before For this the particular attribute attaches to it.

18 It is the Ordainer himself who attaches variety to the great entities to the objects of the senses and to size or bulk of existent matter and settles the relations of creatures with those various entities

19 Of men who had devoted themselves to the science of things there are some who say that, in the production of effects, Exertion is supreme. Some learned persons hold that Destiny is supreme, and some that it is Nature which is the agent.

20 Others hold that Acts flowing from Exertion and Destiny, produce effects, helped by Nature Instead of considering any of these as alone powerful for the production of effects, they say that it is the union of all three that produces all effects.

21 About this subject, some say that such is the case, some, that such is not the case, some, that both of these are not the case, and some that it is not that the reverse of both are not These, of course, are the contentions of those who depend on Acts, with reference to objects They however whose see the truth consider Brahma as the cause.

22 Penance is the greatest good for living creatures The roots of penance are tranquillity and self control By penance one acquires all things that he longs for in his mind

23 By penance one attains to that Being who creates the universe He who thus succeeds in attaining to that Being becomes the powerful lord of all beings.

24 It is by penance that the Rishis can read the Vedas without interruption In the beginning the Self create caused those excellent Vedic sounds that are embodiments of knowledge and that have neither beginning nor end From those sounds have sprung all sorts of actions

25 The names of the Rishis all things that have been created, the varieties of form seen in things, and the course of all actions, have all originated from the Vedas

26 Indeed in the beginning the Supreme Lord of all beings created all things from the words of the Vedas Truly, the names of the Rishis and all else that has been created are seen in the Vedas Upon the expiration of his night, the Increate Brahman creates, from models that existed before, all things which are, of course, well-made by Him.

27 In the Vedas has been described the subject of the Soul's Liberation, along with the ten means formed by study of the Vedas, adoption of the domestic mode of life penances, observance of all duties, common to all the modes of life, sacrifices performance of all acts leading to pure fame meditation which is of three kinds, and that kind of Liberation called success (Siddhi) attainable in this life

28 That incomprehensible Brahma which has been described in the words of the Vedas, and which has been described more clearly in the Upanishadas by those who have an insight into the Vedas can be realised by gradually following the practices referred to above.

29 This consciousness of duality, fraught again with that of pairs opposites is born only of acts in which he is engaged to a person who thinks he has a body That person, however, who has attained to Liberation, aided by his knowledge, drives off by force that consciousness of duality.

30 Two Brahmas should be known, viz, the Brahma represented by the Vedas and and that which is beyond the Vedas and is supreme One who is conversant with Brahma represented by sound succeeds in attaining to Brahma that is Supreme.

31 The destruction of animals is the sacrifice sanctioned for the Kshatriyas The growing of corn is the sacrifice sanctioned for the Vaishyas Serving the three other orders is the sacrifice sanctioned for the Shudras Penance is the sacrifice sanctioned for the Brahmanas.

32 In the Krita age the performance of sacrifices was not required Such performance became necessary in the Treta age In the Dwapara, sacrifices have begun to fall off In the Kali, the same is the case with them.

33 In the Krita age, worshipping only one Brahma, men regarded the Richs, the Samans, the Yajushes, and the rites and sacrifices that are performed from motives of advantage, as all different from the object of their worship and practised only Yoga by means of penances.

34 In the Treta age, many powerful men flourished who governed all mobile and immobile objects.

men. Afflicted by iniquity, they become extinct along with the rites and sacrifices laid down in them.

37 The righteousness which is seen in the Krita age is now seen in such Brahmanas as are of purified souls and as are devoted to penances and the study of the scriptures.

38 As regards the other cycles, it is seen that without at once giving up the duties and acts that are consistent with righteousness men, observing the practices of their respective orders, and conversant with the ordinances of the Vedas, are led, by the authority of the scriptures, and from motives of advantage and interest to perform sacrifices and vows and sojourns to sacred waters and places.

39 As in the rainy season a large variety of new objects of the immobile order are caused to come into being by the showers that fall from the clouds, so many new kinds of duty or religious observances are brought about in each new cycle.

40 As the same phenomena reappear with the reappearance of the seasons, so, at each new Creation of the same attributes appear in each new Brahman and Hara.

41 I have, before this, spoken to you of Time which is without beginning and without end, and which ordains this variety in the universe It is that Time which creates and destroys all creatures.

42 All the numberless creatures which exist subject to pairs of opposites and according to their respective natures, have Time for their refuge. It is Time that puts on these forms and it is Time which upholds them.

43 I have thus described to you, O son, the topics about which you had asked, viz, Creation, Time, Sacrifices and other rites, the Vedas, the real actor in the universe, action, and the results of action."

CHAPTER CCXXXIII.

(MOKSHADHARMA PARVA).—

Continued.

2. When the time for universal dissolution comes twelve Suns, and Agni with his seven flames, begin to burn Wrapt by those flames, the entire universe, begins to blaze forth in a huge fire

3 All things mobile and immobile that are on the Earth first disappear and merge into the substance of which this planet is formed

4 After all mobile and immobile objects have thus disappeared the Earth, shorn of trees and herbs, looks nude like a tortoise shell

5 Then water takes up the attribute of earth viz, scent When earth becomes shorn of its principal attribute, that element is about to be destroyed

6 Water then prevails Surging into big billows and roaring dreadfully only water fills this space and moves about or stands still

7 Then the attribute of water is taken by Heat, and losing its own attribute, water emerges in that element.

8 Dazzling flames of fire, ablaze all around, hide the Sun that is in the centre of ether. Indeed, then, ether itself, full of those flames, burns in a vast fire

9 Then Wind comes and takes the attribute, viz, form, of Heat or Light, which thereupon is extinguished, yielding to Wind, which, possessed of great power, begins to be awfully agitated.

10 Obtaining its own attribute, viz, sound the Wind begins to move upwards and downwards and transversely along all the ten points.

11. Then Space takes the attribute, viz, sound, of Wind, upon which the latter is extinguished and enters into a state of existence resembling that of unheard or unuttered sound.

12 Then Space is all that remains that element whose attribute, viz, sound, exists in all the other elements, shorn of the attributes of form and taste, and touch, and scent, and without shape of any kind, like sound in its unmanifest form of existence.

13. Then sound, which is the attribute of space, is swallowed up by Mind which is the essence of all manifest things Thus Mind which in itself is unmanifest withdraws all that is manifested by Mind. This withdrawal of manifest Mind into unmanifest Mind is called the destruction of the external universe

14. Then the Moon having made Mind withdraw its attribute into itself, swallows it up. When Mind, ceasing to exist, thus enters into the Moon, the other attribute of Creator are all that remain.

15 This Moon which is called also determination, is then, after a very long time, brought under Creator's sway the reason being that that determination has to perform a very difficult work, viz, the destruction of the faculties that are employed in the process of judgment When this has been done the condition reached is said to be of high knowledge

16 Then time swallows up this Knowledge, and as the Shruti says Time itself, in its turn is devoured by Mighty or Energy. Mighty or energy, however, is (again) devoured by Time, which last is then brought under her sway by Knowledge

17 Possessed of Knowledge, the Creator then swallows up non existence itself into His Soul That is Unmanifest and Supreme Brahma That is Eternal, and that is the Highest of the High

18 Thus all existent creatures are withdrawn into Brahma

19 Truly has this which should be conceived (with the aid of the scriptures) and which is a topic of Science, been thus said by Yogins endued with Supreme Souls, after actual experience

20 Even thus does Unmanifest Brahma repeatedly practise the processes of Creation and Destruction and even thus are Brahman's Day and Night each consisting of a thousand Yugas

Vyasa said:—

1 I have described to you fully that which you had asked me about the Creation of all beings Listen to me as I tell you now what the duties are of a Brahmana.

2 The rituals of all ceremonies for which sacrificial fees are sanctioned, beginning with birth rite and ending with Samavartana (return from preceptor's house) depend for their performance upon a preceptor well versed in the Vedas.

3 Having read all the Vedas and having showed submission towards his preceptor while living with him and having paid the preceptor's fee, the youth should return home with a perfect knowledge of all sacrifices.

the Brahmanas, acquired many regions of felicity.

30. Having given his own dear wife Mayadanti to the great Vashistha, King Mitrasaha, ascended to heaven with that wife of his.

31. The royal and highly illustrious sage Sahasrajit, having cast off his own dear life for the sake of a Brahmana, ascended to regions of great happiness.

32. Having given to Mudgala a golden palace furnished with every object of comfort and use, king Shatadyumna ascended to heaven.

33 The king of the Shalwas, named Dyutimat, endued with great prowess, gave to Richika his entire kingdom and ascended to heaven.

34 By giving away his slender-waisted daughter to Hiranyahasta, the royal sage Madirashwa, ascended to regions esteemed of the very gods.

35 By giving away his daughter Shanta to Rishyarshringa, the highly powerful royal sage Lomapada obtained the fruition of all his wishes.

36. By giving away a hundred thousand kine with calves, the highly energetic king Prasenajit ascended to excellent regions of happiness.

37. These and many others, endued with great and well-ordered souls, and having their senses under control, ascended, by means of gifts and penances, to heaven.

38. Their fame will last as long as the Earth herself will exist All of them have, by gifts and sacrifices and procreation of children proceeded to heaven.

CHAPTER CCXXXV.

Vyasa said.—

1. The three-fold knowledge which occurs in the Vedas and their branches should be required That knowledge is to be 'got from the Richs, the Samans, and the sciences called Varna and Akshara. There are, besides, the Yajushes and the Atharvans. The Divine Being lives in the six sorts of acts indicated in these.

2 They who are well-read in the injunctions of the Vedas, who have knowledge of the Soul, who are attached to the quality of Goodness, and who are highly blessed, succeed in understanding the origin and the end of all things.

3 A Brahmana should follow the duties laid down in the Vedas. He should do all his works like a good man of controlled soul. He should acquire his livelihood without injuring any creature

4 Having derived knowledge from the good and wise, he should govern his passions and desires Well-versed in the scriptures, he should follow those duties which have been laid down for him, and do all works in this world guided by the qualities of goodness Living even like a householder, the Brahmana should perform the six acts already spoken of.

5. With his heart full of faith, he should adore the deities in the five well-known sacrifices. Possessed of patience, ever vigilant, having self-control, conversant with duties, with a purified soul, divested of joy, pride, and anger, the Brahmana should never sink in langour.

6 Gifts, study of the Vedas, sacrifices, penances, modesty, guilelessness and self-control —these increase one's energy and dissipate one's sins

7. One gifted with intelligence should be abstemious in diet and should conquer his senses Indeed having subdued both lust and anger and having dissipated all his sins, he should try to attain Brahma.

8. He should adore the Fire and Brahmanas, and bow to the gods He should avoid all sorts of inauspicious talk, and all acts of unrighteous injury.

9 This preliminary course of conduct is first sanctioned for a Brahmana Subsequently, when knowledge comes, he should begin work, for success lies in works

10 The Brahmana who is gifted with intelligence succeeds in crossing over the river of life that is so difficult to cross and so furious and terrible, having the five senses for its waters, cupidity for its origin, and anger for its mire

11 He should never overlook the fact that Time stands behind him in a threatening mien —Time who is the great stupefier of all things, and who is armed with a very great and irresistible force issuing from the great Creator himself.

12 Formed by the current of Nature, the universe is being ceaselessly carried along.

13—16 The powerful river of Time, overspread with eddies formed by the years, having the months for its waves and the seasons for its current, the fortnights for its floating straw and grass, and the rise and fall of the eyelids for its froth, the days and the nights for its water, and desire and lust for its dreadful crocodiles, the Vedas and sacrifices for its rafts, and the righteousness of creatures for its islands and Profit and Pleasure for its springs, Truthfulness of Speech and Liberation for its shores benevolence for the trees floating along it, and the Yugas for the lakes along its course — the powerful river of Time —which has an origin as inconceivable as that of Brahma itself, is ceaselessly carrying away all beings created by the great Ordainer towards the abode of Yama.

17 Wise and patient persons always succeed in crossing over this dreadful river by engaging the rafts of knowledge and wisdom What, however, can insensate fools, destitute of similar rafts, do?

18. It is reasonable that only he that is wise should succeed in crossing this river and not the man of little understanding The former sees from a distance the merits and faults of everything

19 The man, however, of weak and little understanding, and whose soul is full of desire and cupidity is always stricken with doubt Hence the man shorn of wisdom never succeeds in crossing over that stream. He also who sits inactively, can never cross it over.

20 The man shorn of the raft of wisdom in consequence of his having to bear the heavy burden of great faults, sinks down One that is seized by the crocodile of desire even if endued with knowledge, can never make knowledge his raft

21 For these reasons the wise and intelligent man should try to float over the stream of Time He indeed, succeeds in keeping himself afloat who knows Brahma

22 One born in a noble family, abstaining from the three duties of teaching, officiating at others sacrifices, and accepting gifts, and doing only the three other acts, viz studying, sacrificing and giving should, for those reasons try to float over the river Such a man is sure to cross it over helped by the raft of wisdom.

23 One who is pure in conduct who is self-controlled and observant of good vows, whose soul is under restraint and who is endued with wisdom, certainly gains success in this and the other world.

24 The Brahmana living like a householder should conquer anger and envy, practise the virtues already named, and, adoring the gods in the five sacrifices, eat after having fed the gods, Pitris, and guests.

25 He should perform those duties which are observed by the good, he should, do all his acts like a self controlled person, and he should without injuring any creature, earn his livelihood by following a course which is not censurable.

26—27 One who is well read in the truths of the Vedas and the other branches of knowledge, whose conduct is like that of a person of well governed soul, who is gifted with a clear vision who follows the duties of his order, who does not by his acts make an intermixture of duties, who follows the observances laid down in the scriptures, who is full of faith, who is self-controlled who is endued with wisdom who is shorn of envy and malice, and who is well conversant with the differences between righteous and iniquity, succeeds in overcoming all his difficulties

28 That Brahmana who is gifted with fortitude who is always careful, who is self controlled who is conversant with righteousness, whose soul is under restraint, and who has gone over joy, pride, and anger, has never to languish in grief.

29 This is the course of conduct laid down in days of yore for a Brahmana He should try to acquire Knowledge, and do all the scriptural acts By living thus, he is sure to acquire success

30 One who is not gifted with clear vision, does wrong even when one wishes to do right By even exercising his judgment, such a person, does such acts of virtue as are wrong

31 Desiring to do what is right one does what is wrong Likewise desiring to do what is wrong, one does what is right Such a person is a fool Not knowing the two kinds of acts one has to go through repeated re births and deaths.

CHAPTER CCXXXVI.

Vyasa said —

1 If Liberation is sought for, then knowledge should be acquired For a person who is carried up and down along the stream of Time or life, Knowledge is the raft by which he can reach the shore.

2. Those wise men who have acquired fixed conclusions of the nature of the soul by the help of wisdom, are able to assist the ignorant in crossing the river of time or life with the raft of knowledge The ignorant, are unable to save either themselves or others.

3. He who has freed himself from desire and all other faults, and who has freed himself from all attachments, should attend to these twelve requirements of Yoga, viz., place, acts, affection, objects, means destruction, certainty, eyes, food, suppression, mind and survey.

4. He who wishes to acquire superior Knowledge, should, by the help of his understanding, restrain both speech and mind. He who wishes to have tranquility, should, by the help of his knowledge, govern his soul

5—6 Whether he becomes merciful or cruel, whether he becomes conversant with all the Vedas or ignorant of the Richs, whether he becomes pious and observant of sacrifices or the worst of sinners, whether he becomes eminent for power and wealth or sunk into misery, that person who directs his mind towards these, is sure to cross the ocean of life which is so difficult to cross over.

7. Without speaking of the results of the attainment of Brahma by Yoga, it may be said that he who engages himself to only enquire after the Soul rises above the necessity of observing the acts laid down in the Vedas.

8—11. The body with individual soul within it is an excellent car When sacrifices and religious rights are made its upastha, shame, its varutha, Upaya and Apaya, its kuvara, the vital air called Apana, its aksha, the vital air called Prana, its yuga, knowledge and the span of existence its points for tieng the horses, carefulness, its beautiful vandhura, the assumption of good conduct, its nemi, vision, touch, scent, and hearing, its four horses, wisdom, its nabhi, all the scriptures, its pratoda, certain knowledge of the scriptural sayings, its driver, the soul, its firmly-seated rider, faith, and self-control, its fore-runners, renunciation, its inseparable companion following behind and bent upon doing it good, purity the path along which it goes meditation, its goal, then may that car reach Brahma and shine there effulgently.

12 I shall now tell you the speedy means that should be followed by the person who would get ready his car in such a way for passing through this forest of the world in order to reach the goal formed by Brahma that is above decrepitude and destruction.

13. To fix the mind upon one thing at a time is called Dharana, following proper vows and restraints, the Yogin practises in all seven kinds of Dharana. There are, again, as many sorts of Dharanas originating out of these, upon subjects which are near or distant.

14 Through these the Yogin by and by, lords over Earth, Wind, Ether, Water, Fire, Consciousness, and Understanding. After this he gradually lords over the Unmanifest.

15 I shall now describe to you the conceptions in their order that are realised by particular individuals amongst those who practise Yoga according to the rules and ordinances sanctioned for them. I shall tell you also of the nature of the success of Yoga undertaken by him who looks within his own self.

16 The Yogin who casts off his gross body, following the instructions of his preceptor, sees his soul displaying the following forms on account of its subtility. To him, in the first stage, the sky appears to be filled with a subtile substance like fog.

17 Such becomes the form of the Soul which has been separated from the body. When this fog disappears, a second form is seen.

18 For then the Yogin sees within himself, in the sky of his heart, the form of Water. After the disappearance of water, the form of Fire appears.

19 When this disappears, the form that is seen that of Wind as effulgent as a well-tempered and highly polished weapon. Gradually the form shown by Wind becomes like that of the thinnest gossamer.

20 Then having gained whiteness, and the subtilety of air, the Brahman's soul attains the supreme whiteness and subtilety of Ether.

21. Listen to me, as I tell you the results of these various conditions when they take place. That Yogin who has been able to conquer the element of Earth, acquires by such mastery the power of Creation.

22—23 Like a second Prajapati possessed of a nature which knows no disturbances he can, from his own body, create all sorts of creatures. With only his foe, or with his hand or feet, that person can, alone, make the entire Earth tremble who has conquered the Wind. Even this is the attribute of the Wind as said in the Shruti. The Yogin who has conquered Ether, can exist brightly in Space on account of his having attained to uniformity with that element, and can also disappear at will.

24 By mastering over Water, one can drink up rivers lakes, and oceans By mastering over Fire, the Yogin becomes so effulgent that his form cannot be spied He becomes visible only when he puts out the fire within him When the Yogin succeeds in destroying the consciousness of Ego, these five elements come within his control

25 When the Understanding which is the soul of the five elements and of the consciousness of Ego is conquered the Yogin acquires Omnipotence, and Omniscience

26 For this, the Manifest is fused into the Unmanifest or Supreme Soul from which the world comes into being and becomes what is called Manifest.

27 Listen now to me fully as I explain the science of Unmanifest But first of all listen to me about all that is Manifest as explained in the Sankhya system of philosophy.

28 In both the Yoga and the Sankhya systems twenty five subjects of knowledge have been treated in nearly the same way Here me as I describe their chief characteristics

29 What is Manifest is possessed of those four attributes, viz, birth, growth decay and death

30. What does not possess these attributes is said to be Unmanifest Two Souls are mentioned in the Vedas and in their auxiliary sciences

31 The first is endued with the four attributes already mentioned, and has a longing for the four fold objects of life This soul is called Manifest, and it is born of the Unmanifest It is both Intelligent and not-Intelligent

32 I have thus told you of Sattwa (inert matter) and Kshetrajna (immaterial spirit). Both kinds of Soul, as said in the Vedas, become attached to objects of the senses

33—38 The doctrine of the Sankhyas is that one should stand aloof or dissociated from objects of the senses. That Yogin who is freed from attachment and pride who transcends all pairs of opposites such as pleasure and pain, heat and cold, etc, who never yields to anger or hate, who never speaks an untruth, who though, censured or struck still shows friendship for the slanderer or the striker, who never thinks of injuring others, who restrains these three, viz, speech, acts, and mind, and who treats all creatures equally, succeeds in approaching the presence of Brahman. That person who has no desire for earthly objects, who is not unwilling to take what comes, who is dependent on earthly objects so far as they are required for sustaining life, who is free from cupidity, who has driven off all sorrow, who has controlled his senses, who performs all necessary acts, who does not care for beauty and dress whose senses are all collected whose purposes are never left undone, who treats all creatures like friends, who considers equally a clod of earth and a lump of gold, who is equally disposed towards friend and enemy, who is endued with patience, who treats praise and blame equally, who is free from longing for all objects of desire, who practises Brahmacharyya, and who is firm and steady in all his vows and observances, who cherishes no malice or envy for any creature in the universe, is a Yogin who according to the Sankhya system succeeds in acquiring Liberation.

39 Hear now of the way and the means by which a person may acquire Liberation through Yoga That person who moves and acts after having transcended the power that follows the practice of Yoga succeeds in acquiring Liberation.

40 I have thus described to you those topics viz, Liberation according to the Sankhya system and that according to the Yoga system) which are dissimilar if the speaker be disposed to treat them as such. Thus can one get over all pairs of opposites. Thus can one attain to Brahma.

CHAPTER CCXXXVII.

Vyasa said:—

1 Carried up and down in life's ocean, he that is capable of meditation catches the raft of Knowledge, and for achieving his Liberation adheres to Knowledge itself.

Shuka said:—

2 What is that Knowledge? Is it that learning by which when error is gone, the truth reveals itself? Or, is it those duties consisting of acts to be done or achieved, by the help of which the object sought for, may be understood or attained? Or, is it those duties, called absention from acts by which an extinction of the Soul is to be sought? Do tell me what it is so that by its help the two, viz, birth and death, may be avoided

Vyasa said:—

3 That fool who, believing that all this exists by its own Nature without, in sooth, an eternal foundation, satisfies by such instruction the aspirations of disciples, defeating by his dialectical ingenuity the reasons the latter might urge to the contrary, succeeds not in acquiring any truth.

4 They again, who firmly believe that all Cause is due to the Nature of things, cannot acquire any truth by even listening to learned men or the Rishis.

5. Those little-witted men who stop (in their speculations), having adopted either of these doctrines, those men who regard Nature as the Cause never succeed in acquiring any benefit for themselves

6. This belief in Nature (as the producing and the sustaining Cause), originating as it does from a mind labouring under the influence of error, causes the destruction of the person who cherishes it. Hear of the truth regarding these two doctrines which hold (1) that things exist by their own Nature and (2) that they flow accordingly from others that are different from, and that precede, them.

7. Wise men take to agriculture and tillage, and the acquisition of crops and of vehicles, seats, carpets and houses.

8. They also look to the laying of pleasure gardens, the construction of spacious palaces and the preparation of medicines for all sorts of diseases.

9 It is wisdom (which consists in the application of means) which brings about the fruition of objects. It is wisdom which gains beneficial results. It is wisdom which enables kings to exercise and enjoy sovereignty although they are endued with attributes equal to those of persons over whom they rule.

10. It is by wisdom that the difference is made between the high and the low among beings. It is by wisdom that the superior and the inferior ones among created objects are made out. It is wisdom or knowledge which is the greatest refuge of all things.

11. All the sorts of created things have four kinds of birth They are viviparous oviparous, vegetables, and those born of filth.

12 Mobile creatures should be regarded superior to the immobile. It is reasonable that intelligence which differentiates (all non intelligent matter), should be considered superior to (non-intelligent) matter.

13 Mobile creatures, whose number is legion, are of two sorts, viz, those that are many legs and those that have two. The latter, however, are superior to the former.

14. Bipeds, again, are of two sorts, viz, those that live on land and those that are otherwise. Of these, the former are superior to the latter. The superior ones eat various sorts of cooked food.

15. Bipeds moving on land are of two sorts, viz, middling or intermediate, and those that are foremost. Of these, the middling or intermediate are considered as superior (to the former) for their observing the duties of caste.

16. The middling or intermediate ones are said to be of two sorts, viz, those who are conversant with duties, and those who are otherwise Of those, the former are superior for they can discriminate between what should be done and what should not.

17. Those conversant with duties are said to be of two sorts, viz, those who are acquainted with the Vedas and those who are otherwise Of those the former are superior, for the Vedas are said to live in them.

18—19 Those who are acquainted with the Vedas are said to be of two sorts, viz, those who lecture on the Vedas and those who are otherwise Of these the former, who are well-read in the Vedas, and are conversant with the duties and the rites laid down in them, and the fruits of those duties and rites, are superior for their declaring all those duties and rites. Indeed, all the Vedas, with the duties laid down in them, are said to emanate from them.

20 Preceptors of the Vedas are of two sorts, viz, those who are conversant with the Self and those that are otherwise. Of these the former are superior on account of their knowledge of Birth and Death.

21 Duties, again, are of two kinds, (viz, Pravritti and Nivritti). He who is conversant with duties is said to be omniscient or endued with universal knowledge. Such a man is a Renouncer. Such a man is firm in the fulfilment of his objects. Such a man is truthful, pure and endued with prowess.

22. The gods know him as a Brahmana who is devoted to knowledge of Brahma. Such a man is versed also in the Vedas and earnestly given to the study of the Self.

23 They who have true knowledge see their own self as existing both in and out. Such men, O child, are truly twice-born and such men are gods.

24. This world of beings depends upon these, and in them exist this whole universe. There is nothing equal to their greatness.

which is their ruler. Subject to pairs of opposites, innumerable sorts of creatures rest on Time, according to their own natures.

CHAPTER CCXXXIX.

(MOKSHADHARMA PARVA)—Continued.

Bhishma said:—

1 Thus addressed by his father, Shuka, highly praising these instructions of the great Rishi, began to ask the following question regarding the import of duties which brings on Liberation.

Shuka said —

2 By what means does a wise man well read in the Veads, observant of sacrifices, and shorn of malice attains to Brahma which is incapable of being apprehended by either direct evidence or inference, and incapable of being described by the Vedas.

3 Asked by me tell me by what means can Brahma be known. Is it by penance, by Brahmacharyya, by renunciation of everything, by intelligence by help of the Sankhya philosophy, or by Yoga?

4. What are the means and what sort of singleness of purpose may men acquire regarding both, viz, the mind and the senses? You should explain all this to me!

Vyasa said —

5. "No man achieves success by any other means save the acquisition of knowledge, the practice of penances the control of the senses, and renunciation of everything.

6 The great elements (five in number) represent the first creation of the Self create They have been very largely put in embodied creatures living in the world of life

7 The bodies of all embodied creatures are originated from earth Their humours originate from water. Their eyes originate from light Prana Apana, (and other vital breaths) depend on the wind And, lastly all unoccupied apertures within them originate from Space,

8 Vishnu is in the feet (of living creatures) Indra is in their arms Within the stomach lies Agni desirous of eating. The points of the horizon are in the ears, the organ of hearing Speech, which is the goddess of learning, is in the tongue.

9. The ears, skin, eyes, tongue, and nose forming the fifth, are the senses of knowledge These exist for apprehending their respective objects.

10 Sound, touch, form, taste, and scent for the fifth, are the objects of the (five) senses These should always be considered as distinct from the senses.

11. Like the charioteer driving his well trained horses along the paths he likes, the mind, moves the senses. The mind in its turn, is moved by the Understanding sitting in the heart.

12. The mind is the lord of all these senses employing them in their functions and guiding or controlling them. Likewise, the Understanding is the lord of the mind.

13 The senses, the objects of the senses, the attributes of the objects of Nature understanding, mind, the vital airs and individual soul dwell in the bodies of all embodied creatures.

14. The body within which the Understanding lives, has no real existence. The body, therefore, is not the seat of the Understanding Nature (Prakriti), endued with three qualities, is the refuge of the Understanding which exists only in the form of a sound The Soul also is not the refuge of the Understanding. It is Desire which creates the Understanding. Desire, however, never creates the three qualities.

15 The wise man, capable of controlling his senses, sees the seventeenth, viz, the Soul, as surrounded by six and ten qualities, in his own Understanding by the help of the mind.

16 The Soul cannot be seen with the help of the eye, or with that of all the senses Getting over all, the Soul can be seen by only the light of the mind's lamp.

17 Shorn of the properties of sound and touch and form, without taste and smell, indestructible and without a body and without senses, it is nevertheless seen within the body,

18 Unmanifest and supreme, it lives in all mortal frames, Guided by the preceptor and the Vedas, he who sees it hereafter becomes Brahma's self.

19 The wise see impartially a Brahmana gifted with knowledge and disciples, a cow, an elephant, a dog, and a Chandala.

20 Transcending all things, the Soul lives in all creatures, mobile and immobile. Indeed, all things are permeated by it.

21. When a living creature sees his own Soul in all things, and all things in his own Soul, he is said to attain to Brahma.

22 One occupies the Supreme Soul proportionate to what is occupied in one's own soul by Vedic sound He who can always realise the identity of all things with his own self, forsooth, acquires immortality.

23 Even the gods are stupefied in the path of that trackless man who forms the soul of all creatures, who is engaged in the well being of all creatures and who wishes to attain to the final refuge (of all things)

24 Indeed the road which is followed by men of knowledge is as invisible as that of birds in the sky or of fish in water.

25 Time, by its own power, cooks all entities within itself. No one, however knows That in which Time, again, is itself cooked

26 That does not take place above, or in the middle or below, or in transverse or in any other direction That is no tangible thing and cannot be found in any place

27. All these worlds exists within That. There is nothing in these worlds which exists out of That. Even if one goes on ceaselessly with the motion of arrow shot off the bow string, even if one goes on with the speed of the mind itself, one would not still get at the end of that which is the cause of all this There is nothing grosser than that.

29 His hands and feet are everywhere. His eyes, head, and face are everywhere His ears are everywhere in the universe He exists occupying all things

30 That is minuter than the minutest, and is the heart of all things Though existing, that is still imperceptible.

31. Indestructible and destructible — these are the dual forms of the (Supreme) Self. The existence it shows in all mobile and immobile entities is destructible, while the existence it shows in Chaitanya is celestial, immortal, and indestructible.

32 Though the master of all existent beings both mobile and immobile, though inactive and shorn of attributes, it enters nevertheless the well known house of nine doors and becomes engaged in action.

33 Wise men who can see the other shore hold that the Supreme Soul becomes endued with the attribute of action on account of motion pleasure and pain, variety of form, and the nine well known possessions

34 That indestructible Soul which is said to be endued with the attribute of action is nothing else than that indestructible Soul which is said to be inactive A learned person, by attaining to that indestructible essence, gives up for ever both life and birth.

CHAPTER CCXI.

Vyasa said:—

1 O excellent son accosted by you, I have told you truly what the answer to your question should be according to the doctrine of Knowledge as explained in the Sankhya system.

2—5 Listen now to me as I explain to you all that should be done according to the Yoga doctrine The unision of intellect and Mind and all the Senses and the all prevading Soul is said to be the highest kind of Knowledge That Knowledge should be gained by one who is of a tranquil mind, who has governed his senses, who is capable of seeing the Soul, who takes pleasure in (such) meditation, who is gifted with intelligence and purety in acts One should try to gain this Knowledge by abandoning those five obstacles of Yoga which are known to the wise, namely, desire, anger, cupidity, fear and sleep. Anger is conquered by tranquility of disposition Desire is defeated by giving up all purposes

6 By meditating with the help of the understanding upon topics deserving meditation one, gifted with patience succeeds in relinquishing sleep By steady endurance one should govern his organs of generation and the stomach One should protect his hands and feet by his eyes.

7 One should protect his eyes and ears by the help of his mind, and his mind and speech by his acts One should avoid fear by carefulness, and pride by attending the wise

8 Controlling procrastination, one should by these means subdue these obstacles of Yoga One should pay his adorations to fire and the Brahmanas and should bow his head to the gods

9 One should avoid all kinds of unholy conversation and malicious speech and words which pain other minds. Brahma is the effulgent seed It is again, the essence of that seed from which proceeds all this

10—11 Brahma became the eye, in the form of this mobile and immobile universe, of all elements that were born. Meditation, study, gift, truth, modesty simplicity, forgiveness, purity of body, purity of conduct, and subjugation of the senses, these increase one's energy which dissipates his sins.

12 By treating impartially all creatures and by living contentedly upon what is gained easily and without exertion one acquires the fruition of all his objects and succeeds in gaining knowledge.

13 Purged of all sins, gifted with energy, sparing in diet, with senses under complete control, one should, after having subdued his desire and anger, try to attain to Brahma, 14 Uniting firmly the senses and the mind with gaze fixed inwards one should, in the silent hours of evening or those before dawn, fix his mind upon the understanding.

15 If even one of the five senses of a human being be kept ungoverned all his wisdom escapes through it like water through a hole not made up at the bottom of a leathern bag

16 The mind in the first instance should be controlled by the Yogin like a fisherman trying at the commencement to make that one among the fish powerless from which he anticipates the greatest danger to his nets Having first governed the mind, the Yogin should then proceed to subdue his ears, then his tongue, and then his nose.

17 Having controlled these, he should fix them on the mind Then withdrawing the mind from all purposes, he should settle it on the understanding.

18—19 Indeed having governed the five senses the Yati should fix them on the mind. When these with the mind for the sixth become concentrated in the understanding, and thus centred remain steady and firm then Brahma becomes perceptible like a smokeless blazing fire or the effulgent Sun.

20. Indeed, one then beholds in himself his own soul like lightning in the firmament. Everything then appears in it and it appears in everything on account of its infinitude.

21. Those great Brahmanas, who are possessed of wisdom, who are endued with fortitude who are possessed of high knowledge and who are engaged in the well-being of all creatures, succeed in saying it.

22 Practising austere vows, the Yogin, who acts thus for six months seated by himself on a lonely spot, becomes at one with the Indestructible.

23—42 Acquiring by Yoga annihilation, extension, power to present different shapes in the same person or body, celestial scents, and sounds, and sights, the most agreeable sensations of taste and touch, pleasurable sensations of coolness and warmth, equality with the wind, power to understand the meaning of scriptures and every work of genius living with celestial damsels, the Yogin should not care for them and merge them all in the Understanding.

25 Restraining words and the senses one should practise Yoga after dusk and before dawn, seated on a mountain summit, or at the foot of a huge tree or with a tree before him.

26 Controlling all the senses within the heart, one should, with faculties concentred, think on the Eternal and Indestructible like a man of the world thinking of wealth and other valuable properties One should never, while practising Yoga, withdraw his mind from it.

27 One should with devotion pursue those means by which he may control the restive mind One should never suffer himself to fall away from it.

28 With the senses and the mind withdrawn from everything else, the Yogin should repair to empty caves of mountains, to temples consecrated to the gods and to empty houses or apartments, for living there

29 One should not mix with another in either speech, act or thought Disregarding all things and eating very sparingly the Yogin should regard equally objects acquired or lost.

30. He should treat equally one who praises and one who censures him He should not seek the good or the evil of one or the other.

31. He should not rejoice at an acquisition or be sorry at a failure or loss Treating all beings equally he should imitate the wind

32 Brahma, as represented by sound, appears very clearly unto one whose mind is thus turned to itself, who leads a pure life, and who sees all things equally, indeed unto one who is ever engaged in Yoga thus for even six months

33 Seeing all men stricken with anxiety the Yogin should regard a clod of earth, a piece of stone, and a lump of gold with an equal eye. Indeed, he should withdraw himself from that path, cherishing a hatred for it, and never allow himself to be stupified.

34 By following the path indicated above, even a person of an inferior caste, or a woman, will surely acquire the highest end.

35 He who has subdued his mind sees in his own self, by the help of his own understanding the Increate, Ancient, Undeteriorating, and Eternal Brahma —That which cannot be attained to except by controlled senses,—That which is subtiler than the most subtile, and grosser than the most gross, and which is Emancipation's self

Bhishma said —

36 'By ascertaining from the preceptors and by themselves reflecting with their minds upon these words of the great Rishi spoken so properly wise persons become at one with Brahma himself till, indeed the time when the universal dissolution sets in that swallows up all existent beings'

CHAPTER CCXLI.

Shuka said —

1 The injunctions of the Vedas are twofold They once lay down the command —Do all acts,—they again declare renounce acts —I ask—where do persons go by the help of Knowledge and where by the help of acts

2 I wish to hear this Do tell me this Indeed, these injunctions about knowledge and acts are dissimilar and even contradictory

Bhishma said —

3—4 Thus addressed the son of Parasara said to his son —I shall explain to you the two paths, viz, the destructible and the indestructible, resting respectively upon acts and knowledge Listen with rapt attention, O child, to me as I point out to you the place which is reached by one with the help of knowledge, and that other place which is reached with the help of acts. The difference between these two places is as great as the endless firmament.

5 The question which you have asked me has given me much pain as an atheistic talk gives to a religious man.

6. These are the two paths upon which the Vedas are settled the duties (acts) indicated by action and those based on renunciation described so beautifully

7 By acts a living creature is destroyed By knowledge, however, he becomes free Therefore, Yogins who see the other side of the ocean of life, never perform acts.

8 Through acts one is compelled to take rebirth after death with a body composed of the sixteen ingredients Through knowledge however, one becomes metamorphosed into that which is Eternal, Unmanifest and Immutable

9 Little witted persons speak highly of acts On account of this they have to assume bodies ceaselessly.

10 Those men, who have keen perceptions about duties and who have attained to that high understanding, never speak highly of acts even as persons, who depend for their drinking water upon the supply of streams never speak highly of wells and tanks.

11—14 The fruit of acts consists of pleasure and pain, of existence and non-existence By knowledge one attains to that where there is no occasion for grief, where one becomes freed from both birth and death, where one is not subject to decrepitude, where one gets over the state of conscious existence where is Brahma which is Supreme, Unmanifest, immutable, ever-existent, imperceptible, above the reach of pain immortal, and transcending destruction, where all become freed from the influence of all pairs of opposites as also of wish or purpose Reaching that stage, they regard everything equally, become universal friends and devoted to the well-being of all creatures There is a huge gulf O son between one given to knowledge and one given to acts.

15 Know that without suffering destruction, the man of knowledge exists for ever like the moon on the last day of the dark fortnight existing in a subtile form.

16. The great Rishi has described this more fully. Regarding the man given to acts his nature may be inferred from seeing the new moon which appears like a bent thread in the sky.

17. Know, O son, that the man of acts is born again with a body with eleven elements for its component parts which are the results of modification, and with a subtile from which represents a total of sixteen.

18 The god who resides in that (material) form, like a drop of water on a lotus leaf, should be known as Kshetrajna (Soul) which is Eternal and which gets over by Yoga both the mind and the understanding.

19 Goodness, darkness, and ignorance are the qualities of the Understanding. The understanding is the attribute of the individual soul living within the body The individual soul in its turn, emanates from the Supreme Soul.

20 The body with the soul is said to be the attribute of individual soul It is individual soul which acts and causes all bodies to live He who has created the seven worlds is said by those who are acquainted with what is Kshatra to be above individual soul.

CHAPTER CCXLII.

Shuka said:—

1. I have now understood that there are two kinds of creation, viz, one universal emanating from the (universal) Soul. The other consisting of the senses with their objects, originates from the power of the Understanding This last transcends the other and is considered to be the foremost.

2 I wish however, to once more hear of that path of righteousness which runs in this world, regulated by the virtue of Time and according to which all good men form their conduct

3 In the Vedas there are both kinds of saying, do acts and avoid acts How shall I succeed in determining which of the two is right? You should explain this clearly.

4 Having acquired through your instructions, a thorough knowledge of the course of conduct of human beings, having purified myself by the practice of only righteousness, and having cleansed my understanding, I shall, after renouncing my body, see the indestructible Soul.

Vyasa said:—

5 The course of conduct that was first laid down by Brahman himself was duly followed by the wise and pious persons of yore viz, the great Rishis of ancient times

6—8 The great Rishis conquer all the worlds by the practice of celebacy. Seeking all things which are good for himself, by fixing the mind on the understanding, practising severe austerities by living in forest and living on fruits and roots, by treading on sacred spots, by practising universal benevolence, and by begging alms at the proper time from the huts of hermits when these become smokeless and the sound of the husking rod is hushed a person attains to Brahma.

9 Abstaining from flattery and from bowing your head to others and avoiding both good and evil, live in the forest alone appeasing hunger by any means that presents itself before you

10 The sayings of the Vedas are, in the opinion of the ordinary persons, contradictory. Whether this is authoritative or that is so, when there is this conflict, how can they be considered to be spiritual.

11. I wish to hear this how can both be considered as authoritative. How indeed, can liberation be obtained without violating the ordinance regarding the obligatory character of acts.

Bhishma said —

12 Thus addressed the son of Gandhavati, viz, the Rishi, praising these words of His highly energetic son, replied to him as follows.

Vyasa said:

13 One who is a Brahmacharin, one who lives like a house-holder, one who is a hermit and one who lives like a mendicant, all reach the same high end by duly satisfying the duties of their respective modes of life

14 Or if one, and the same person, shorn of desire and aversion, follows (one after another) all these four modes of life according to the ordinances that have been laid down, he is certainly gratified (by such conduct) to understand Brahma.

15 The four modes of life form a ladder or flight of steps That flight attaches to Brahma By ascending that flight one reaches the region of Brahma.

16. For following the fourth mode of life the Brahmacharin, conversant with the distinctions of duty and shorn of malice, should live with the preceptor or his preceptor's son

17—18 While living in the preceptor's house, he should seek bed after the preceptor has gone to his and rise therefrom before the preceptor rises from his He should do all such acts again which a disciple as also a menial servant should do. Doing these he should humbly stand by his preceptor Skilled in every kind of work, he should act like a menial servant, doing every act for his preceptor.

19 Having performed all acts, he should study sitting at the feet of his preceptor, with anxious desire to learn He should always behave with simplicity, avoid evil speech, and take lessons only when his preceptor asks him for it.

20 Becoming pure in body and mind, and acquiring cleverness and other virtues he should now and then speak what is pleasant Controlling his senses he should look at his preceptor without curiosity.

21. He should never eat before his preceptor has eaten, never drink before his preceptor has drunk, never sit down before his preceptor has sat down, and never go to bed before his preceptor has gone

23 Reverentially saluting the preceptor, he should say to him —O illustrious one, teach me! I shall do this, O illustrious one! This I have already done, O twice born one I am ready to do whatever else your reverend self may be pleased to command

24. Having said all this and having duly offered himself (thus), he should perform whatever acts of his preceptor wait for doing and having completed them inform the preceptor once more that they have been done.

25 What scents or tastes the Brahmacharin may abstain from while actually leading a life of celebacy may be used by him after his return from the preceptor's house. This is according to the ordinance.

26 Whatever observances have been laid down in full for Brahmacharins should all be regularly practised by him He should be always at the beck and call of his preceptor

27. Having pleased his preceptor in this way to the best of his powers, the disciple should, from that mode of life, enter into the others and practise the duties of each.

28 Having (thus) spent a fourth part of his life in the study of the Vedas and observance of vows and fasts, and having given the preceptor his fee, the disciple should according to the ordinance bid adieu and return home for becoming a house-holder.

29 Then, having married according to the ordinances, and having carefully established the domestic fire, he should, observing all the vows and fasts become a house-holder and pass the second period of life.

CHAPTER CCXLIII.

Vyasa said:—

1. Performing meritorious vows, the house holder, for the second period of his life, should live in his house, having married according to the ordinance and having established a fire.

2. Four kinds of conduct have been enunciated by the learned for the domestic mode of life. The first consists of keeping grain in store sufficient to last for three years The second is of keeping a store to last for one year.

3 The third is of providing for the day without thinking for the morrow. The fourth consists of collecting grain like a pegion Of these each one is superior in merit to its predecessor as has been laid down by the scriptures

4 Observing the first kind of conduct a householder may practise all the six well known duties He who observes the second kind of conduct should perform three only of these duties, namely learning, giving and taking. He who follows the third kind of conduct should practise only two of the duties (viz, learning, and giving) The householder practising the fourth mode of life should observe only one duty (viz, reading the scriptures.

5 The duties of the householder are all considered as highly meritorious. The householder should never cook any food only for his own use, nor should he kill animals (for food) except in sacrifices

6 If a householder wishes to slay (for food) or to cut down a tree (for fuel), he should do both the acts according to the ritual laid down in the Yajur for that much is due to both animate and inanimate creation The householder should never sleep during the day, or in the first or the last part of the night.

7 He should never take two meals between morning and evening, and should never call his wife to bed except in her season In his house no Brahmana should be allowed to remain unfed or unadored.

8—9 He should always adore such guests who present sacrificial offerings, who are cleansed by Vedic learning, who observe excellent vows, who are high-born and conversant with the scriptures, who follow the duties of their own order, who are self-controlled, mindful of all religious acts, and devoted to penances. The scriptures hold that what is offered to the gods and the departed manes in sacrifices and religious rites, is meant for the service of guests like these.

10—11 In this mode of life, the scriptures hold that a portion of the food, should be given to every creature, to one, who for the sake of show, keeps his nails and beard, to one who from pride shows what his own (religious) practices are, to one who has unduly abandoned his sacred fire, and even to one who has injured his preceptor A house holder should give (food) to Brahmacharins and Sanyasins.

12—13. The house-holder, should every day eat Vighasa and ambrosia Mixed with clarified butter, the remains of the food which is offered in sacrifices make ambrosia That householder who eats after having fed his servants, is said to eat Vighasa The food, which remains after the servants have been fed is called Vighasa, and that which is left after the presentation of sacrificial offerings, is called amrita.

14 A householder should be content with his own married wife He should be self controlled. He should avoid malice and control his senses

15—16 He should never fall out with his sacrificial priest, ordinary, and preceptor, with his maternal uncle and guests and dependants, with the aged and the young, with those who suffer from diseases, with those who practise as physicians, with kinsmen, relatives, and friends, with his parents, with women who belong to his own paternal family, with his brother and son and wife, with his daughter, and with his servants.

17 By avoiding quarrels with these, the householder becomes purged of all sins By conquering such disputes, he succeeds in conquering all the blessed regions There is no doubt in this 18 The preceptor is able to take one to the regions of Brahman The father can take to the regions of Prajapati. The guest is powerful enough to lead to the region of Indra. The priest has the power to take to the regions of the celestials Female relatives on the father's side have power over the regions of the Apsaras, and blood relatives over the regions of the Vishwedevas.

19 Relation by marriage and collateral kinsmen have power over the several quarters of the horizon (viz, north, &c) and the mother and the maternal uncle have power over the Earth The old, the young, the afflicted, the worn out have power over the firmament.

20 The eldest brother is like a father (to all his younger brothers). The wife and the son are one's own body. One's menial servants are his shadow. The daughter is an object of great love.

21. Therefore a householder, gifted with learning, observant of duties and endued with endurance, should bear without excitement or anxiety every sort of annoyance and even censure from the last-named relatives.

22 No pious householder should do any act, out of consideration for money. There are three courses of duty attached to the domestic mode of a life. Of these every succeeding one is more meritorious than the preceding one.

23 The same rule of merit holds good regarding the four modes of life also viz, every succeeding one is superior to the one preceding it.

24 One seeking prosperity, should perform all those duties and rites that have been laid down in the scriptures regarding those modes.

25 That kingdom becomes prosperous where these highly deserving persons dwell viz those who live like householders according to the Kumbhadhanya method, they who live according to the Uncha method, and they who live according to the Kapoti method.

26 That man, who cheerfully lives like a householder, observing those duties, succeeds in sanctifying ten generations of his ancestors above and ten generations below

27 A householder, duly observing the duties of domestic life, acquires what gives in the end happiness, equal to what takes place in the regions attained by great kings andemperors Even such is the end of thosewho have controlled their senses.

28 Heaven has been ordained for all great householders That heaven is filled with charming cars for each Even that is the charming heaven described in the Vedas.

29 The regions of heaven form the high mead for all householders of controlled minds.

30 The Self born Brahma ordained that the domestic life, should secure heaven, and since it has been so ordained, a person, by gradually following the second mode of life, obtains happiness in heaven.

31 After this comes that high and superior mode of life, called the third, for those that are desirous of renouncing their bodies. Superior to that of householders is the life of hermits—who reduce their bodies into skeletons overlaid with dried skins. Listen as I describe to this subject to you further more."

CHAPTER CCXLIV.

(MOKSHADHARMA PARVA)—Continued.

Bhishma said:—

1. "You have been told what the duties of a householder are as ordained by the wise. Listen now, O Yudhisthira, to the next class of duties.

2. Gradually leading off the domestic mode, one should enter the third mode which is good. It is the mode which is followed by persons who living with their wives pain themselves by means of austerities. It is the mode followed by those who live in forest as hermits.

3. Blessed be you, O son, listen to the duties observed by those who follow this mode of life in which are set forth the practices of all men and all modes of life. Listen, indeed, to the duties of those who live in sacred spots and who have adopted this mode after proper consideration.

Vyasa said—

4. When the householder sees his body wrinkled and hair white on his head, and children of his children, he should then retire into the forest.

5. He should pass the third portion of his life as Vanaprastha. He should worship those sacred fires to which he had attended while a householder. Desirous of performing sacrifices, he should also worship the gods.

6. Observing vows and being sparing in diet, he should eat only once, during the sixth part of the day. He should be always careful. Adoring his fires, he should keep some kine serving them dutifully. He should perform all the rituals of a sacrifice.

7. He should live upon rice and wheat which grows indegenously, and upon other sorts of grains, growing wildly. He should eat the remnant after feeding guests. In the third mode of life, he should make offerings of clarified butter in the five celebrated Sacrifices.

8. Four courses of conduct have been laid down for the Vanaprastha mode of life. Some gather only what is necessary for the day. Some store up things for a month.

9. Some collect grain and other necessaries sufficient to last for twelve years. Hermits may act thus for adoring guests and performing sacrifices.

10. They should during the rains, expose themselves to rain and go to water during the autumn. In summer, they should sit in the midst of four fires with the sun burning overhead. Throughout the year, however, they should be sparing in diet.

11. They should sit and sleep on the naked earth. They stand on only their toes. They should be satisfied with the bare earth and with small mats of grass. They perform their ablutions morning, noon, and evening.

12. Some amongst them use only their teeth for cleaning grain. Others use only stones for the same. Some amongst them drink, only during the light fortnight, boiled very lightly, gruel of wheat (or other grain).

13. Others drink similar gruel only during the dark fortnight. Some eat what only comes of itself. Some practising rigid vows, live upon only roots, some upon only fruits, some upon only flowers, duly following the method followed by the Vaikhanashas.

14. These and various other observances are practised by those wise and pious men. The fourth mode of life is based upon the Upanishads.

15. The duties prescribed for it may be observed in all the modes of life equally. Differing from the others this mode comes after domestic and forest life.

16—18. In this very cycle, O son, many learned Brahmanas knowing the truths of all things, have been known to observe this mode. Agastya the seven Rishis Madhuchchhandas, Aghamarshana, Sankriti Sudivatandi who lived whithersoever he pleased and was content to take what came (without ever seeking for anything), Ahoviryya, Kavya, Tandya, the learned Medhatithi, the highly energetic Karmanirvaka, and Sunyapala who had worked hard (for acquiring Yoga power), were the authors of this course of duties, and themselves practising them, have all gone to heaven.

19—21. Many great Rishis, O son, who had the power to see immediately the fruits of their ascetic merit, those numberless ascetics who pass by the appellation of Vaikhanasas, many Rishis of very austere penances and endued with accurate knowledge about distinctions of duty, and many other Brahmanas too numerous to mention, adopted the forest mode of life The Vaikhanasas, the Valakhilyas, the Saikatas, all of whom were given to austere penances who were firm in virtue, who had controlled their senses, and who used to see the fruits of their penances immediately, adopted this mode of life and finally went to heaven.

22—23 Freed from fear and not counted with the stars and planets, these have become visible in the sky as luminaries When the fourth or last part of life is got at, and when one is weakened by decrepitude and possessed by disease one should leave off the forest mode of life Performing a sacrifice capable of being completed in a single day and in which the sacrificial fee should be everything he has, he should himself perform his own funeral rite Withdrawn from every other object, he should devote himself to his own self, taking pleasure in himself, and depending also on his own self He should put up all his sacrificial fires (thenceforth) upon his ownself, and sever all sorts of bonds and attachments.

25—26 He should always celebrate such sacrifices and rites as are completed in a single day When, however from performance of the (ordinary) sacrifices of sacrificers, the Sacrifice in Self begins, then for liberation he should sacrifice his own self in the three fires. Without finding fault with his food he should take five or six mouthfuls offering them duly to the five vital airs uttering Mantras of the Yajurveda

27. Practising austerities while living like a forest recluse, one should shave off his hair and bristles and pare off, his nails, and having purified himself by acts, pass into the fourth and the last holy mode of life.

28 That twice-born one who enters the fourth mode of life, giving pledges of assurance to all creatures, succeeds in acquiring many effulgent regions hereafter and ultimately attains to the Infinite.

29 Of excellent disposition and conduct, with sins all purged off the person who is conversant with his own self never wishes to perform any act for either this or the other world. Shorn of anger, error, anxiety and without friendship, such a person lives in this world like one having nothing to do with it.

31 One in the (observance of Sannyasa) should not be unwilling in satisfying the duties included in Yama and those also that walk behind them. Such a person should live energetically according to the ordinances laid down for his own mode, and leave off Vedic study and the sacred thread which marks his birth Given to righteousness and having his senses under complete control, such a person endued with knowledge of self, attains, forsooth, to the end for which he tries

31 After the third is the fourth mode of life It is very superior, and has numberless high virtues In merit it reigns supreme over the three other modes of life. It is said to occupy the very highest place. Listen to me as I describe the duties belonging to that mode which is very supreme and which is the high refuge of all

CHAPTER CCXLV.

Shuka said:—

1 While living satisfying duly the duties of the forest life how should one, who tries to attain to That which is the highest object of knowledge, set his soul on Yoga according to the best of his power?

Vyasa said:—

2 Having acquired purity by the practice of the first two modes of life viz, Brahmacharyaya and domesticity one should, thereafter, set his mind on Yoga in the third mode of life. Listen now with rapt attention to what should be done for attaining to the highest object of acquisition.

3 Having conquered all shortcomings of the mind or heart by easy means in the practice of the first three modes of life, one should pass into the best and the highest of all the modes, viz, Sannyasa or Renunciation.

4 Do you then pass your days, having acquired that purity. Listen also to me. One should, alone and without anybody to help him or bear him company, practise Yoga for achieving success.

5 One who practises Yoga without any one in his company, who sees everything as a repetition of his own self, and who never discards anything, never falls away from Liberation Without keeping the sacrificial fires and without a fixed dwelling, such a person should enter a village for only begging his food.

6. He should provide himself for the day without keeping any thing in store for the morrow. He should practise penances, his heart fixed on the Supreme. Eating self, the universe with all creatures including the very celestials, becomes pleased

29 They, who know the Sentiency which is endued with effulgence, which is covered with three sheaths, which has three qualities for its characteristics, to be Ishwara partaking of that which is highest, viz., the nature of the Supreme Soul, are respected of all the worlds. The very gods with all human beings applaud their merits.

30 He who succeeds in seeing in the Soul which lives in his own body all the Vedas, ether and the other objects of perception, the rituals of the scriptures, all those entities which are perceptible in sound only, and the superior nature of the Supreme Soul, adored of the very gods as the foremost of all beings.

31. He who sees in the Soul which lives within his body that foremost of beings which is not attached to the Earth, which is immeasurable in even the limitless sky, which is made of gold, which is begotten of the egg and lives within the egg, which is equipped with many feathers, and which has two wings like a bird, and which is rendered effulgent by many rays of light, is adored of the very gods as the foremost of all beings.

32 The very gods adore him in whose understanding is set the wheel of Time, which is constantly revolving, which knows no deterioration, which devours the span of existence of every creature, which has the six seasons for its naves, which is equipped with twelve radii consisting of the twelve months, which has excellent joints, and towards whose gaping mouth goes on this universe.

33. The Supreme Soul is the huge unconsciousness of dreamless sleep. That Unconsciousness forms the body of the universe. It pervades all created things Sentiency occupying a portion of that capacious unconsciousness, pleases the gods These last, being pleased, gratify the open mouth of that unconsciousness.

34. Endued with effulgence as also with the principle of eternity, Sentiency is without a beginning. It wins infinite regions of eternal happiness. He whom no creature fears, has never to fear any creature.

35. He who never does anything blameable and who never censures another, is said to be a truly twice born one Such a man succeeds in seeing the Supreme Soul He whose ignorance has been removed and whose sins have been washed away, never enjoys either here or hereafter the happiness that is enjoyed by others.

36 A person following the fourth mode of life wanders on the Earth like one not attached to anything. Such a person is shorn of anger and error. Such a person regards equally a clod of earth and a lump of gold. Such a man never keeps anything in store for his use Such a person has no friends and enemies. Such a person does not care praise or blame, and the agreeable and the disagreeable.

CHAPTER CCXLVI.

Vyasa said:—

1. The Sentiency is endued with all those entities which are modifications of Nature. These do not know the Soul but the Soul knows them all.

2 Like a good driver going on with the help of strong well-trained, and very good horses along the paths he chooses, the Soul acts with the help of these, called the senses, having the mind for their sixth.

3 The objects of the senses are superior to the senses themselves The mind is superior to those objects The understanding is superior to the mind Mahat or the principle of greatness is superior to the understanding.

4 Superior to Mahat is the Prakriti. Superior to the Prakriti is Brahma There is nothing superior to Brahma. That is the highest limit of goodness and the highest end.

5 The Supreme Soul is hidden in every creature It is not so manifest that ordinary men can see. Only Yogins with subtle vision see the Supreme Soul with the help of their keen and subtile understandings.

6—7. Merging the senses having the mind for their sixth and all the objects of the senses into the inner self by the help of the understanding, and meditating upon the three states of consciousness, viz., the object thought, the act of thinking and the thinker, and abstaining by contemplation from every kind of enjoyment, replenishing his mind with the knowledge that he is Brahma's self, laying aside at the same time all consciousness of power, and thereby making his Soul perfectly tranquil, the Yogin attains to immortality.

8 That person, however, who becomes the slave of all his senses and whose ideas of right and wrong have been confounded, already subject as he is to death actually meets with death by such surrender of self.

9 Destroying all desires, one should drown the gross understanding into one's subtile Understanding. Having thus drowned the gross into the subtile Understanding, one is sure to become a second Kalanjara mountain.

10. By purifying his heart, the Yogin gets over both righteousness and its opposite. By purifying his heart and by living in his own true nature, he acquires the highest happiness.

11. The sign of that purity of heart is that one who has acquired it experiences that state of unconsciousness which is similar to that of dreamless slumber. The Yogin who has acquired that state lives like the steady flame of a lamp which burns in a place where the atmosphere is perfectly still.

12 Being sparing in diet, and having purified his heart, that Yogin who applies his Soul to the Soul, sees the Soul in the Soul

13 This topic, O son, intended for your instruction, is the essence of all the Vedas The truths expounded in it cannot be understood by the help of inference alone or by that of mere study of the scriptures One must understand it himself by the help of faith.

14. By churning the riches contained in all religious works and in all topics based on truth, as also the ten thousand Richs, this ambrosia has been acquired.

15 As butter from curds and fire from wood so this has been raised for the sake of my son —this which forms the knowledge of all truly wise men.

16 This topic, O son, fraught with solid instruction, is intended for Brahmana who having studied the Vedas, have become house holders It should never be delivered to one who is not of tranquil soul, or one is not self controlled, or who one who has not practised penances.

17 It should not be delivered to one who is not conversant with the Vedas, or one who do not humbly wait upon his preceptor, or one who is not shorn of malice, or one who is not possessed of sincerity and candour, or one who is of reckless conduct.

18 It should never be delivered to one whose intellect has been consumed by disputation, or one who is vile or low. This topic containing the quintessence of duties, should be communicated to that person, however, who is possessed of fame or who deserves praise, or who is of tranquil soul, or possessed of ascetic merit, to a Brahmana who is such to one's son or dutiful disciple, but on no account should it be delivered to others.

20 If any person gives away the entire Earth with all her treasures, to one conversant with truth, the latter should still consider the gift of this knowledge as very much superior to that gift.

21. I shall now describe to you a subject which is a greater mystery than this, a subject connected with the Soul, which is above the ordinary understandings of human beings, which has been seen by the foremost of Rishis, what has been treated in the Upanishadas, and which forms the topic of your inquiry.

22 Tell me what, after this, is in your mind? Tell me in what you have still any doubt? Listen, for here I am O son, seated before you! Upon what, indeed, shall I once more discourse to you.

CHAPTER CCXLVII.

Shuka said —

1 O illustrious one, O foremost of Rishis once again describe to me fully the subject bearing on soul. Tell me what, in deed is spiritual topic and whence does it come?

Vyasa said —

2 That, O son, which is considered as spiritual with reference to human beings, I shall now mention to you, and listen to the explanation I give.

3 Earth, water, light, wind and entities are the great principles which form the component parts of all creatures, and though really one are yet considered different like the waves of the ocean.

4 Like a tortoise extending out its limbs and withdrawing them again, the great elements by living in innumerable small forms go through transformations

3 All this universe of mobile and immobile objects has for its component parts these five elements Everything, regarding creation and destruction, is referrible to this fivefold elements.

6 These five elements are in all existent things The Creator of all things, however, has made an unequal distribution of those elements for serving different ends

Shuka said :—

7 How can one understand that unequal distribution in the various objects of the universe? Which amongst them are the senses and which the attributes? How may this be understood?

Vyasa said :—

8 I shall explain this to you properly, one after another. Listen with rapt attention to the subject as I explain how what I have said actually takes place.

9 Sound, the sense of hearing, and all the cavities within the body,—these three originate—from ether. The vital airs, the action of the limbs, and touch are the attributes of the wind.

10 Form eyes and the digestive fire within the stomach, originate from light Taste, tongue, and all the humours,—these three originate from water.

11 Scent, nose, and the body,—these three,—form the attributes of earth. These then, as I have explained to you are the changes of the five (great) elements in connection with the senses.

12 Touch is said to be the attribute of the wind, taste of water, form of light Sound originate from ether, and scent is the property of earth.

13 Mind Understanding, and Nature,—these three, originate from their own previous states and acquiring a position higher than the attributes, do not get over those attributes

14 As the tortoise extends its limbs and withdraws them once again within itself, so the Understanding creates the senses and once again withdraws them into itself

15 The consciousness of ego which arises about what is above the soles of the feet and below the crown of the head is mainly due to the action of the Understanding.

16 It is the Understanding which is transformed into the (five) attributes It is the Understanding also which is transformed into the (five) senses with the mind for the sixth Where are the attributes when the Understanding is nowhere?

17. There are five senses in man. The mind is called the sixth The Understanding is called the seventh. The Soul is the eighth.

18 The eyes and the other senses are for only receiving impressions of form etc The mind exists for doubting The Understanding determines those doubts The Soul is said to only see every work without mingling with them.

19 The qualities of goodness, darkness and ignorance originate from their own counterparts These exist equally in all creatures These are called qualities and should be known by the actions they produce.

20 Regarding those actions, all such states of cheerfulness or joy, of tranquility and purity which one becomes conscious of in oneself, should be known as due to the quality of goodness.

21. All such states of sorrow in either the body or the mind, should be considered as due to the influence of the quality of darkness.

22 All such states of stupefaction whose cause cannot be determined (by either reason or inward light), should be known as due to the action of Ignorance.

23 Delight, cheerfulness, joy, equanimity, contentment of heart, due to any known cause or originating otherwise, are all effects of the quality of goodness.

24 Pride, false speech, cupidity, stupefaction, vindictiveness whether originating from any known cause or otherwise, are characteristics of the quality of darkness

25 Stupefaction of judgment, carelessness, sleep, lethargy, and indolence, from whatever cause these may originate, are to be regarded as the characteristics of the quality of Ignorance.

CHAPTER CCXLVIII.

Vyasa said :—

1 The mind creates innumerable ideas. The Understanding differentiates things, and ascertains their true nature The heart discriminates which is pleasant and which unpleasant. There are the three forces which produce acts.

2 The objects of the senses are superior to the senses The mind is superior to those objects The Understanding is superior to mind The Soul is considered as superior to Understanding.

3 Ordinarily the Understanding is a man's Soul When the Understanding, by itself, forms ideas (of objects) within itself, it is then called Mind

4 The senses being different from one another, the Understanding presents different aspects on account of its different modifications. When it hears, it becomes

CHAPTER CCXLIX.

Vyasa said:—

1. The objects by which one is encircled are created by the Understanding. Without being connected with them, the Soul stands aloof, lording over them. The Understanding creates all objects. The three principal qualities are continually being transformed. The Soul, gifted with power, lords over them all, without, however, mingling with them.

2. The objects created by the Understanding partake of its own nature. Like the threads created by the spider, the objects created by the Understanding partake of the nature of the Understanding.

3. Some hold that the qualities, when done away with by Yoga or knowledge, do not cease to exist. They hold this because when once gone, the marks only of their return are not perceived. Others hold that when destroyed by knowledge, they are at once destroyed never to return.

4. Meditating duly upon these two opinions, one should try his best according to the way one thinks proper. It is by this way that one should acquire eminence and take refuge in his own Soul alone.

5. The Soul is without beginning and without end. Understanding his Soul properly man should move and act, without yielding to anger, without indulging in joy, and always shorn of envy.

6. Cutting by this means the knot that is in his heart, created by the faculties of the Understanding, which is hard (to cut), but which can be destroyed by knowledge, one should live happily, without yielding to grief, and with his doubts removed.

7. Know that they who mix in worldly affairs, are as distressed in body and mind as persons ignorant of the art of swimming when they fall from the land into a vast and deep river.

8. Being conversant with the truth, the learned man, however, is never distressed, for he feels like one walking over firm land. Indeed he who perceives his Soul to be such, viz., as full of consciousness which has knowledge alone for its mark, is never distressed.

9. By thus knowing the origin and end of all creatures, and by thus apprehending their distinctions, a person succeeds in acquiring high felicity.

10. This knowledge is the possession of a Brahmana in particular by virtue of his birth. Knowledge of the Soul, and happiness like above, are each fully sufficient to lead to Liberation.

11. By gaining such knowledge one really becomes learned. What else is the mark of a person of knowledge? Having gained such knowledge, the wise men consider themselves successful and become liberated. Those things which produce fear to men shorn of knowledge do not do so to those who are gifted with knowledge. There is no end higher than the eternal end which is acquired by a learned person.

13. One sees with aversion all earthly objects of enjoyment which are, of course, full of shortcomings. Again seeing others pursue such objects with pleasure, another is filled with sorrow. But they who are conversant with both objects, viz., that which is fictitious and that which is not so, are never grieved and are truly happy.

14. What a man does without expectation of fruits dissipates his acts of a pristine life. The acts, however, of such a person both of this end and his pristine life cannot lead to Liberation. On the other hand, such destruction of former acts and such acts of this life cannot bring what is disagreeable (viz., hell,) even if the wise man engages in acts.

CHAPTER CCL.

Shuka said:—

1. May your reverend self describe what is the foremost of all duties, indeed, of that duty than which no higher one exists in this world.

Vyasa said:—

2. I shall now describe to you duties having a very ancient origin and laid down by the Rishis duties which are superior to all others. Listen to me with rapt attention.

3. The maddening senses should carefully be governed by the understanding like a father checking his own inexperienced children liable to fall into various evil habits.

4. To withdraw the mind and the senses from all unworthy objects and their due concentration (upon higher objects) is the highest penance. That is the highest of all duties. Indeed, that is said to be the highest duty.

Yogin who gets over both the gross and the subtile elements as also the intellectual principle and the Unmanifest.

22 Decrepitude and death cannot attack that Brahmana who has got beyond the sphere of acts, who has gone the destruction of the qualities themselves, and who is no longer attached to earthly objects

23 Indeed, when freed from everything, the Yogin, lives in a state transcending both attachment and hatred, he is said to be, even in this life, above his senses and all their objects

24 That Yogin, who having gone above Prakriti attains to the Highest Cause, becomes freed from the obligation of a re birth on account of his having attained to that which is the highest"

CHAPTER CCLII.

Vyasa said:—

1. A qualified preceptor should, first of all, describe the most capacious subject of spirituality, that has been explained in the previous chapter, to a disciple who wishes to enquire after Liberation after having transcended all pairs of opposites and performed the concerns of both profit and religion.

2 Ether, wind, light, water, and earth as the fifth, and existence and non-existence and time, exist in all living creatures having the five for their component ingredients.

3 Space is unoccupied interstice The organs of hearing consist of space. One knowing the science of elements endued with form should know that ether has sound for its attribute.

4. Wind is the essence of the feet. The vital airs are made of wind. Wind is the essence of the sense of touch, and touch is the attribute of wind

5 Heat, the digestive fire in the stomach, light that manifests all things, the heat of the body, and eye as the fifth, are all of light which has form of various colors for its attribute.

6 Solubility, and all kinds of liquid matter partake of water. Blood, marrow, and all else that is cool, have water for their essence. The tongue is the sense of taste, and taste is known as the attribute of water.

7. All solid substances partake of earth, as also bones, teeth, nails, beard, the hairs on the body, hair, nerves, sinews, and skin.

8 The nose is known as the organ of smell. The object of that sense, viz, scent, is known as the attribute of earth.

9 Each subsequent element partakes of the attribute or attributes of the preceding one in addition to its own The (three) supplementary entities exist in all living creatures. The Rishis thus described the five elements and the effects and qualities emanating from or belonging to them.

10 The mind is the ninth, and the understanding is the tenth. The Soul, which is infinite, is the eleventh. It is considered as the highest of all.

11. The mind has doubt for its essence. The understanding discriminates and produces certainty. The Soul becomes known as Jiva or individual soul when invested with body through the consequences of acts.

12. That man who regards all living creatures as unsullied though endued with all these entities having time for their essence, has never to perform acts moved on by error.

CHAPTER CCLIII.

Vyasa said:—

1. Those who are well-read in the scriptures see, with the help of acts laid down in the scriptures, the Soul which is encased in a subtile body and is highly subtile and which is dissociated from the gross body in which it lives.

2. As the rays of the Sun which move in dense masses through every part of the sky, cannot be seen by the naked eye though their existence can be perceived by reason, likewise, existent beings freed from gross bodies and moving in the universe are above the reach of human vision.

3 As the shining solar disc is seen reflected in the reflected water so the Yogin sees reflected within gross bodies the existent self.

4. All those souls again that are encased in subtile forms after being alienated from the gross bodies in which they lived, are perceptible to Yogins, who have controlled their senses and who are gifted with knowledge of the soul. Indeed, helped by their own souls, Yogins see those invisible beings.

5—6 Whether asleep or awake, during the day or in the night, and during the night or in the day, they who practise Yoga after renouncing all the creations of the understanding the passion engendered by acts and the power which Yoga begets, succeed in keeping their subtile form under complete control

7. The individual soul which lives in such Yogins, always endued with the seven subtile principles moves in all blissful regions, freed from decrepitude and death I say 'always,' and 'freed from death, as in common parlance for, in sooth, that subtile form is also terminable.

8 That man, however, who is under the influence of his mind and understanding, differentiates, even in his dreams, his own body from that of another and experiences both pleasure and pain.

9 Really, even in his dreams he enjoys happiness and suffers misery, and yielding to anger and cupidity, suffers all sorts of calamities

10 In his dreams he acquires great riches and feels highly satisfied performs meritorious acts, and sees as he does when he is awake.

11. It is wonderful to mark that individual soul which has to lie within the uterus and amid much internal heat, and which has to pass there full ten months is not digested and destroyed like food within the stomach.

12 Men possessed by the qualities of Darkness and Ignorance never succeed in seeing within the gross body the sentiency which is a portion of the Supreme Soul of transcendent effulgence and which lies within the heart of every creature

13 They who learn Yoga for the purpose of obtaining a knowledge of Self succeed in getting over the inanimate and gross body, the imperceptible subtile body and the casual body which is not destroyed on the occasion of even the universal destruction

14 Of the duties laid down for the various modes of life including the fourth mode these which I have described, which have Yoga for their foremost, and which indicate a complete stoppage of all operations of the Mind and the Understanding, have been laid down by Sandilya

15 Having comprehended the seven subtile principles, having comprehended also the Supreme Cause of the universe with the six attributes and lastly having understood that the universe is only a modification of nescience endued with the three qualities, one succeeds in seeing high Brahma.'

CHAPTER CCLIV.

Vyasa said:—

1 There is a wonderful tree in the heart of man called Desire It is born of the seed called Error Anger and Pride form its large trunk The desire for work is the hollow ground around its foot

2 Ignorance is the root of that tree, and carelessness is the water which nourishes it Envy forms its leaves The evil acts of pristine lives supply it with vigor

3 Loss of judgment and anxiety are its twigs, grief forms its huge branches, and fear is its sprout Thirst which seems agreeable, forms the creepers which twine round it on all sides.

4 Avaricious men, fettered in chains of iron, sitting around that fruit-producing tree, worship it, in expectation of its fruit

5 He who, subduing those chains cuts down that tree and seeks to renounce both sorrow and joy, succeeds in attaining to the end of both.

6 That foolish wight who nourishes this tree by enjoying the objects of the senses is destroyed by those very objects like a poisonous pill destroying the patient to whom it is given

7 However by the help of Yoga, a clever man forcibly cuts off with the sword of concentration, the far reaching root of this tree

8 One who understands that the end of all acts performed from the desire of fruit is re birth or chains that bind, succeeds in getting over all sorrow

9 The body is compared to a city. The understanding is its mistress The mind living within the body is the minister of that mistress whose chief duty is to decide

10 The senses are the citizens who are employed by the mind For maintaining those citizens the mind shows a strong inclination for various sorts of acts Two great faults are seen in those acts namely, Darkness and Ignorance

11 Upon the fruits of those acts depend those citizens along with the chiefs of the city The two faults live upon the fruits of those acts which are done by forbidden means.

12 Such being the case, the understanding which of itself is unconquerable, goes down to a state of equality with the mind Then again the senses, moved by the stained mind, lose their own firmness

13 Those objects again to acq ire which the understanding tries, produce grief and ultimately meet with destruction Those objects, after destruction, are remembered by the mind and accordingly they afflict the mind even after they are lost

14 The understanding is also afflicted, for the mind is said to be different from the understanding only when the mind is viewed regarding its chief function of getting impressions about whose certainty it is no judge In sooth however, the mind is identical with the understanding The quality of Darkness which is in the understanding then overwhelms the Soul itself that lies over that understanding sullied by Darkness like an image upon a mirror.

15 It is the mind that first becomes united with darkness Having united itself, it attacks the soul the understanding and the senses, and surrenders them to Rajas"

CHAPTER CCLV.

(MOKSHADHARMA PARVA) — Continued.

Bhishma said:—

1—2 "Do you, O son, O sinless one listen once more, with feelings of great pride, to the words given vent to by the Island born Rishi on the subject of the enumeration of the principles Like a blazing fire, the great Rishi said these words to his son who took after a fire wrapped in smoke Instructed by what he said, I also, O son, shall again explain to you that certain knowledge

3 The properties of earth are immobility, weight, hardness, productiveness, scent, density, capacity to absorb all sorts of scents, cohesion, habitableness, and that attribute of the mind which is called patience.

4 The properties of water are coolness taste, moisture, liq id ty, softness agreeableness, tongue, fluidity, capacity to be congealed, and power to melt all earthy products.

5 The properties of fire are irresistible energy, inflammability, heat, capacity to soften, light, sorrow, disease, speed, fury, and upward motion

6 The properties of the w nd are touch that is ne ther hot nor cool, power to help the organs of speech, indepen lence, strength, celerity, power to help all kinds of discharge, power to raise other objects, breaths inhaled and exhaled, life, and birth.

7. The properties of space are sound, extension, capacity of being enclosed, absence of refuge, power of being unmanifest, capacity for modification incapacity for resistance material cause for producing the sense of hearing, and the unoccupied parts of the human body

8 These are the fifty properties, as declared, which form the ess ences of the five elementary entities

9 Patience, reasoning, remembrance, forgetfulness or error, imagination, endurance, inclination towards good, inclination towards evil, and restlessness,—are the properties of the mind.

10 Destruction of both good and evil thoughts perseverance concentration, decision, and ascertainment of all things depending upon direct evidence form the five properties of the understanding"

Yudhisthira said:—

11 'How can the understanding be said to have five properties? How again can the five senses be described as properties Explain to me, O grandfather, all this abstruse topic'

Bhishma said:—

12 "The understanding is said to possess altogether sixty properties for the understanding includes the five elements All those properties exist in the Soul The Vedas say, O son, that the elements, their properties, are all created by Him who is above all decay. These entities, therefore, are not eternal 13 The theories contradicting the Revelation which have in the previous Verses, O son, been placed before you are all defective in the eye of reason Minding, however, in this world all that I have said to you about the Supreme Brahma, do you after acquiring the power which the knowledge of Brahma offers, seek to acquire tranquility of heart."

CHAPTER CCLVI.

(MOKSHADHARMA PARVA) — Continued.

Yudhisthira said —

1 "These k ngs who lie on the Earth's surface amid their respective armies these princes of great power, are now all deprived of life.

As she appeared to sink under their load into the water.

5 When after exercising my intelligence even for a long time I could not find out the means by which to bring about the destruction of this overgrown population, it was then that I was possessed by ire.

Sthanu said:—

6. Do not give way to anger, O lord of the celestials, about the destruction of living creatures! Be pleased! Let not these mobile and immobile beings be destroyed.

7—8 All tanks, all sorts of grass and herbs, all immobile beings, and all the four divisions of mobile creatures, are being consumed. The whole universe is about to be shorn of beings Be pleased, O divine lord! O you of pious soul this is the boon that I seek at your hands

9 If destroyed, these creatures would not return. Therefore, let this energy of yours be neutralised by your own energy.

10—11 Moved by pity for all created beings, find some means so that, O Grandfather, these living creatures may not be consumed! Oh, let not these living creatures die with even their descendants thus destroyed! You have appointed me to preside over the Consciousness of all living creatures, O Lord of all the lords of the universe.

12. All this mobile and immobile creatures, O lord of the universe, originated from you Pacifying you, O god of gods, I beg of you that living creatures may repeatedly come back into the world, undergoing repeated deaths!

13 Hearing these words of Sthanu, the divine Brahma of controlled speech and mind himself suppressed that energy of his within his own heart

14 Suppressing that fire that had been destroying the universe, the illustrious Brahma, worshipped of all, and endued with illimitable power, then arranged for both birth and death of all living creatures

15—16 After the Self create had withdrawn and suppressed that fire, there came out, from all the pores of his body, a lady dressed in robes of black and red, with black eyes, black palms, wearing a pair of charming earrings and bedecked with celestial ornaments.

17. Having originated from Brahman's body, the lady sat on his right. The two foremost of gods thereupon espied her.

18 Then, O king, the powerful Self-create, the prime Cause of all the worlds, saluted her and said—O Death, kill these creatures of the universe

19 Filled with ire and resolved to encompass the destruction of created beings, I have called you Do you, therefore, begin to destroy all creatures foolish or learned.

20. O lady, kill all created beings without any exception. At my command you will acquire great prosperity.

21 Thus addressed, the goddess Death, adorned with a garland of lotuses, began to think sorrowfully and shed profuse tears.

22 Without suffering her tears, however, to fall down, she held them, O king, in her joined hands She then solicited the Self born moved by the desire of doing good to mankind.

CHAPTER CCLVIII.

(MOKSHADHARMA PARVA)—

Continued.

Narada said —

1 The lady having large eyes, controlling her grief by self-exertion, addressed the Grandfather, with joined hands and bending low like a creeper.

2 And she said—How, O foremost of speakers, shall a lady like me who has sprung from you proceed to perform such a terrible feat—a feat, which is sure to terrorize all living creatures

3 I fear to do any thing that is iniquitous! Do you find out a holy work for me You see that I am frightened. Oh, look upon me mercifully.

4 I shall not be able to cut off living creatures—infants, youths, and elderly ones,—who have done me no injury! O lord of all creatures, I bow to you, be pleased with me.

5 I shall not be able to cut off dear sons, loved friends and brothers and mothers and fathers! If these perish their surviving relatives will surely curse me. Thinking of this I am filled with fear.

6 The tears of the sorrow-stricken survivors will burn me for good I am very much afraid of them. I seek your protection.

7. All sinful creatures will have to sink into hell. I seek to please you, O boon-giving god! I attend to me your favour, O powerful lord.

36 By doing this you will only observe righteousness instead of committing sin Do you therefore, mind the work in hand, and addressing Desire and Anger begin to kill all living creatures.

37. Thus addressed, that lady, Death, became afraid of Brahma's curse and answered him, saying,—Yes! Thenceforward she began to send Desire and Anger at the last hours of living creatures, and through their agency to kill them

38 Those tears that Death had shed are the diseases by which the bodies of men are possessed. At the destruction, therefore, of living creatures, one should not, understanding with the help of the intelligence, give way to grief.

39 As the senses of all creatures disappear when they are in dreamless slumber and return once more when they awake similarly, upon the dissolution of their bodies all human beings have to go into the other world and return thence to this, O foremost of kings.

40 The element called wind, which has terrible energy and mighty prowess and deafening roars, acts as the life in all living creatures When the bodies of living creatures are destroyed that wind passing from the old performs various functions in various new bodies Therefore the wind is called the lord of the senses and is superior to all other elements forming the gross body.

41. The gods, without any exception, have to take birth as mortal creatures on Earth. Likewise, all mortal creatures also, succeed in acquiring the dignity of gods. Therefore, O foremost of kings, do not grieve for your son Your son has gone to heaven, and is enjoying great happiness there

42. It was thus, O king, that Death was created by the Self-Create and it is in this way that she kills duly all living creatures when their time comes The tears she had shed became diseases, which when their last hours come, snatch away all beings gifted with life."

CHAPTER CCLIX.

(MOKSHADHARMA PARVA)—Continued.

Yudhisthira said:—

1—2. 'All men who live on this Earth, are filled with doubts regarding the nature of righteousness. Who is it is that is called Righteousness? Whence also does Righteousness come? Tell me this, O Grandfather! Is Righteousness for this world or for the next world? Or, is it for both here and hereafter? Tell me this, O grandfather?'

Bhishma said:—

3 "The practices of the good, the Smritis, and the Vedas are the three marks of righteousness Besides these, the learned have said that the object (of doing works) is the fourth mark.

4 The Rishis of old have said what acts are righteous and also classified them as superior or inferior in point of merit. The rules of righteousness have been sanctioned for the conduct of the affairs of the world.

5 In both the worlds, here and hereafter, righteousness begets happiness as its fruit A sinful person, unable to acquire merit by subtle ways, becomes sullied with sin only.

6 Some hold that sinful wights can never be purged of their sins. In times of difficulty a person by even speaking an untruth acquires the merit of speaking the truth So a person who performs a sinful act acquires by that very means the merit of having done a pious act. Conduct is the refuge of righteousness Helped by it you should know what righteousness is.

7. The very thief, stealing others' things, spends them in acts of seeming virtue. During anarchy, the thief takes great pleasure in approaching what belongs to others.

8. When others however, rob him of what he has gained by robbery, he then seeks a king. At even such a time, when he is highly indignant for his rights of property being violated, he secretly hankers after the riches of those who are contented with their own.

9 Fearlessly and without a doubt in his mind he goes to the king's palace, with a mind purged of every sin. Within even his own heart he does not see the mark of any evil act.

10. To speak the truth is meritorious. There is nothing superior to truth Everything is supported by truth, and everything depends upon truth.

11. Even the sinful and dreadful persons swearing to keep the truth amongst themselves, do away with all grounds of quarrel and in a body perform their (sinful) deeds, depending upon truth. If they behaved falsely towards one another, they would, forsooth, be destroyed.

12. One should not take other's properties That is an eternal duty. Powerful men consider it as one that has been introduced by the weak.

13 When, however, ill luck overtakes these men they then approve of this injunction. Again, they who surpass others in strength or power do not necessarily become happy.

14. Therefore, do not ever think of doing a wrong act. One behaving in this way has no fear of dishonest men or thieves, or the king Not having injured any one, such a man lives fearlessly and with a pure heart.

15 A thief fears every body, like a deer driven from the forest into the midst of an inhabited village He considers other people as sinful as himself.

16. A pure-hearted person is always filled with cheerfulness and has no fear from any where. Such a person never sees his own misconduct in other persons

17. Persons who do good to all creatures have said that charity is another high duty. The rich people think that this duty has been laid down by the poor.

18. When, however, those wealthy men become poor on account of some bad turn of fortune, they then appreciate the practice of charity. Men who are highly rich do not necessarily experience happiness.

19 A person should never do that to others which he does not like to be done to him by others, knowing how painful it is to himself.

20. What can a man seeking another man's wife say to another man? It is seen, however, that even such a man, when he sees his wife with another person, becomes unable to forgive the act

21. How can a person who wishes to himself take breath think of preventing another by a murderous act from doing the same? Whatever wishes one cherishes about his own self, one should certainly cherish regarding another.

22 With his surplus riches he should remove the wants of the poor. Therefore the Creator ordained the practice of multiplying one's wealth

23 One should walk along that road by proceeding along which he may hope to meet with the gods, or, at such times when wealth is acquired, the duties of sacrifice and gift are highly spoken of.

24 The sages have said that righteousness consists in the performance of objects by means of agreeable means See, O Yudhisthira, that this is the standard that has been upheld in pointing out the marks of virtue and sin.

25 In days of yore the Creator ordained virtue gifting it with the power of holding the world together. The excellent conduct of the good, is subjected to restraints for acquiring virtue which depends upon many delicate considerations.

26 The marks of virtue have now been described to you, O best of Kuru's race! Do not, therefore, at any time think of doing a wrong act"

CHAPTER CCLX.

(MOKSHADHARMA PARVA)—

Continued.

Yudhisthira said —

1 "You say, that virtue or duty depends upon delicate considerations, that it is marked out by the conduct of the good, that it is fraught with restraints, and that its characteristics are also contained in the Vedas It appears to me, however, that I have a certain inward light by virtue of which I can differentiate between right and wrong by inferences.

2. Numberless questions which I had wished to ask you have all been answered by you There is one question, however, that I shall just now put. It is not prompted, O king, by desire of mere discussion.

3. All these embodied creatures, it seems, take birth, exist, and renounce their bodies, of their own nature. Duty and its opposite, therefore, cannot be determined, O Bharata, by study of the scriptures alone

4 The duties of a rich person are of one sort Those of a person who has fallen into distress are of another sort. How can duty in the time of poverty be determined by reading the scriptures alone?

5. The acts of the good, as you have said, form virtue The good, however, are to be known by their acts The definition, therefore, has at the bottom a begging of the question, and the result is that what is meant by conduct of the good remains unsettled

6. It is seen that some ordinary man commits sin while apparently achieving virtue Some extraordinary person again may be seen who achieves virtue by committing acts which are seemingly sinful.

7—8. Then, again, the proof has been given by even those who are well conversant with the scriptures themselves, for we have heard that the ordinances of the Vedas disappear gradually in every successive cycle The duties in the Krita age are of one sort. Those in the Treta are of another sort, and those in the Dwapara are of a different sort The duties in the Kali age, again, are entirely of a different character It seems, therefore that duties have been sanctioned for the respective cycles according to the powers of human beings in the different ages

9 When, therefore, all the declarations in the Vedas do not suit equally all the ages the saying that the Vedas are true is only a popular parlance given vent to for popular satisfaction From the Shrutis have originated the Smritis whose range is very wide

10 If the Vedas be considered authoritative everywhere, then the Smritis also would be considered authoritative, for the latter are based on the former But when the Shrutis and the Smritis contradict each other, how can either be authoritative.

11. Then, again, it is seen, that when some wicked wights of great power cause certain portions of religious acts to be stopped these are destroyed for ever

12 Whether we know it or not, whether we are able to determine it or not, the course of duty is sharper than the edge of a razor and grosser than even a mountain

13 Virtue at first appears in the form of the romantic house of vapour seen in the distant sky When however it is examined by the learned it disappears

14 Like the small ponds at which cattle drink or the shallow canals along cultivated fields that dry up very soon the eternal practices laid down in the Smritis, falling into discontinuance, at last disappear for good.

15 Amongst good men, some are seen to become hypocrites by allowing themselves to be moved by desire Some become so, desiring by others Many others tread in the same path moved by various other motives of a similar nature

16 It cannot be gainsaid that such acts are righteous Fools, again, hold that virtue is an empty sound among those called good. They ridicule such persons and consider them as men bereft of reason.

17 Many great men, again, neglecting the duties of their own order, follow those of the Kshatriyas No such conduct, therefore, is to be seen, which is for universal benevolence.

18 By a certain action, one becomes really meritorious. The same actions prevent another from the acquisition of merit. Another, by performing those actions at his pleasure, it is seen remains unchanged.

19 Thus that action by which one reaps merit, obstructs another in the acquisition of merit One may thus see that all actions are not peculiar in motive and character

20 It seems therefore, that only that which the learned of old denominated righteousness is righteousness to this day and through that course of conduct the distinctions and limitations have become eternal"

CHAPTER CCLXI.

(MOKSHADHARMA PARVA) — Continued.

Bhishma said:—

1 Regarding it is cited the old conversation of Tuladhara with Jajali on the subject of virtue There was once a Brahmana named Jajali who lived in a certain forest, like a forest recluse.

2 Practising austere penances, he proceeded at a certain time towards the seashore and arrived there began to practise the most austere penances.

3 Observing many vows and restraints his food restricted by fast, his body clad in rags and skins bearing matted locks on his head his entire body smeared with filth and clay that intelligent Brahmana passed many years there, speechless.

4 Highly energetic that regenerate ascetic, O king while living within the waters travelled through all the worlds with the speed of the mind, desirous of seeing all things

5 Having seen the whole Earth bounded by the ocean and adorned with rivers and lakes and forests the ascetic one day, while sitting under the water, began to think thus —

6 In this world of mobile and immobile creatures there is none who can equal me! Who can travel with me among the stars and planets in the sky and live again within the waters!

7. Unseen by the Rakshasas while he said this to himself, the Pishachas said to him,—You should not say so!

8 There is a man named Tuladhara highly illustrious and doing the business of buying and selling. Even he, O best of twice born ones, is not worthy of saying such words as you say!

9 Thus addressed by those beings, Jajali of austere penances replied to them, saying—I shall see that famous Tuladhara who is endued with such wisdom!

10 When the Rishi said this, those superhuman beings raised him from the sea, and said to him,—O best of twice-born one, go along this road!

11. Thus addressed by those beings, Jajali went onwards with a depressed heart Arrived at Baranasi he met Tuladhara whom he addressed thus.

Yudhisthira said:—

12 "What, O sire, are those difficult feats which Jajali had performed before for which he had acquired such great success? You should describe them to me."

Bhishma said:—

13 "Jajali had practised penances of the severest austerities He used to perform ablutions morning and evening

14 Carefully serving his fires, he was given to the study of the Vedas Well conversant with the duties laid down for hermits, Jajali, seemed to shine with effulgence

15 He continued to live in the forest, performing penances But he never took himself for one who had acquired any merit by his acts During the rains he slept under the open sky In autumn he sat in water.

16 In summer he exposed himself to the sun and the wind Still he never took himself for one who had acquired any merit by such acts He used to sleep on various sorts of painful beds and also on the naked earth.

17. On one occasion that ascetic, while standing under the sky during the rainy season, received on his head repeated showers from the clouds.

18. He had to pass through the forests again and again Partly with exposure to the rains and partly with the filth they caught the locks of that pure Rishi became entangled and interwined with one another

19 At one time abstaining entirely from food and living upon air alone that great ascetic, stood in the forest like a wooden post Unmoved at heart, he stood there, without once moving an inch.

20 While he stood there unmoved like a wooden post, O Bharata a pair of Kulinga birds, O king, built their nest on his head.

21. Filled with pity, the great Rishis allowed those birds in building their nest among his matted locks with pieces of grass.

22 And as the ascetic stood there like a wooden post, the two birds lived on his head happily and confidingly.

23. The rainy season passed away and autumn set in. Actuated by desire, the couple approached each other according to the law of the Creator, and with perfect confidence laid their eggs, O king, on the head of that Rishi.

24. Of rigid vows and endued with energy, the ascetic knew it. Knowing even what the birds had done, Jajali did not move Bent strongly upon acquiring merit no act involving the slightest injury to others could meet with his approval.

25 Going away and returning every day from, and to his head, the birds happily and trustfully lived there, O powerful king

26 When in the course of time the eggs became mature and young ones came out, they began to grow up in that nest, for Jajali moved not in the least

27 Firmly observing his vows, the righteous Rishi continued to hold and protect those eggs by standing on that very spot perfectly motionless and immersed in Yoga meditation.

28 In course of time the young ones grew and became endued with wings The Muni knew that the young Kulingas had grown up so

29 That foremost of intelligent men, of austere vows one day saw those young ones and became filled with pleasure.

30 Seeing their young ones endued with wings, the parent birds became very happy and continued to live in the Rishi's head with them in perfect confidence.

31 The learned Jajali saw that when the young birds had wings they flew to the air every evening and came back to his head without having gone far. He still stood motionless there

32 Sometime after he saw that, left by their parents, they went out alone and came back again alone Jajali did not still move.

33 Some time after, the young birds going away in the morning spent the whole day out of his sight but returned in the evening for living in the nest

34 Sometime after, leaving their nest for five days at a time they returned on the sixth day. Jajali still did not move.

35. Subsequently, when they gained their full strength, they left him and did not return at all even after many days.

36. At last, at another time, leaving him, they did not come even after a month Then, O king, Jajali left that place.

37. When they had thus gone away for ever, Jajali wondered much, and thought that he had gained ascetic success. Then pride entered his heart.

38. Ever observing vows, the great ascetic, seeing the birds thus leave him after having been brought up on his head, thought highly of himself, and became filled with joy.

39. He then bathed in a river and poured libations on the sacred fire, and, worshipped the rising Sun.

40. Having thus made those chataka birds, grow on his head, Jajali that foremost of ascetics, began to strike his armpits and cry loudly through the sky,—I have acquired great merit.

41. Then an unseen voice arose in the sky and Jajali heard these words —You are not equal, O Jajali, to Tuladhara in righteousness.

42. Highly wise, that Tuladhara lives at Baranasi. Even he is not competent to say what you say, O twice born one!

43. Hearing these words, Jajali became possessed by anger and desirous of meeting with Tuladhara, O king, began to roam over the whole Earth observing the vow of silence and passing the night where he met with evening.

44. After a long time he reached the city of Baranasi, and saw Tuladhara engaged in selling miscellaneous articles

45 As soon as the shop-keeper Tuladhara saw the Brahmana arrived at his place, he cheerfully stood up and adored the guest with proper salutations.

Tuladhara said :—

46 Forsooth, O Brahmana I know that you have come to me. Listen, however, O foremost of twice-born ones, to what I say!

47. Living on a low land near the seashore you had practised very hard penances. But you had no consciousness of having acquired religious merit.

48. When you had at last acquired ascetic success, certain birds were born on your head. You took great care of the little creatures.

49 When at last those birds became winged and when they began to leave your head for going here and there in search of food, it was then that, for your having thus assisted at the birth of those Chatakas, you began to feel pride, O Brahmana, thinking you had acquired great merit.

50 Then, O foremost of twice-born ones, you heard in the sky a voice that spoke of me The words you had heard filled you with anger and for that you have come here! Tell me, what wish of yours shall I fulfil, O best of Brahmanas."

CHAPTER CCLXII.

(MOKSHADHARMA PARVA).—Continued.

Bhishma said :—

1. Thus accosted by the intelligent Tuladhara on that occasion, the highly intelligent Jajali, that foremost of ascetics, said these words to him —

Jajali said —

2. You sell all sorts of juices and scents, O son of a trader, as also (barks and leaves of) huge trees and herbs and their fruits and roots.

3. But how have you gained this stability of understanding? How have you gained this knowledge? O you of great intelligence, tell me all this fully.

Bhishma continued :—

4. Thus accosted by that highly famous Brahmana, Tuladhara of the Vaishya caste, well acquainted with the truths of morality and contented with knowledge, described to Jajali who had practised severe penances, the ways of morality.

Tuladhara said :—

5 O Jajali, I know, with all its mysteries, morality, which is eternal. It is nothing else but that ancient morality which every body knows, and which consists of universal friendliness, and beneficence to all creatures.

6 The highest form of morality consists in a living which is founded upon a total harmlessness towards all creatures or upon the smallness of such harm. I live according to that mode, O Jajali.

7—8 This my house hath been made with wood and grass cut by other people's hands Lacdye, the roots of Nymphœa lotus, filaments of the lotus, various sorts of good scents, and many kinds of liquids, O twice-born Rishi, with the exception of wines, I purchase from other people and sell without cheating

9 He, O Jajali, only knows morality or righteousness is, who is always the friend of all creatures and who is always engaged in the behoof of all creatures, in thought, word, and deed

10 I never beg of any one, I never fall out with any one, I never hate any one I never desire for anything I regard equally all things and all creatures. See, O Jajali, this is my vow

11 My scales are perfectly even, O Jajali, as regards all creatures

12 I neither praise nor blame the deeds of others considering this variety in the world O foremost of Brahmanas, as the variety seen in the sky.

13 Know, O Jajali, that I regard equally all creatures O highest of intelligent men, I perceive no difference between a clod of earth, a piece of stone, and a lump of gold

14 As the blind, the deaf and they who are bereft of reason, find consolation for the loss of their senses likewise, I find consolation by their example

15 As they who are possessed by decrepitude, they who are afflicted by disease, and they who are weakened and emaciated, do not like any sort of enjoyments, similarly, I feel no inclination for wealth or pleasure or enjoyments

16 Then only a person attains to Brahma when he fears nothing and is not feared himself, when he cherishes no desire and does not hate anything.

17 Then only a person attains to Brahma when he does not behave sinfully towards any creature in thought, word, or deed

18 There is no past, no future There is no morality or virtue. He who is not an object of fear with any creature acquires a state in which there is no fear.

19 On the other hand that person who for his harsh words and bad temper, is troublesome to all creatures like death itself, certainly attains to a state full of fear.

20 I follow the practices of great and benevolent men of advanced years who with their children and grand children live observing duly the ordinance laid down in the scriptures.

21. The eternal Vedic practices are entirely abandoned by one who allows himself to be stupefied by some mistakes that he may have marked in the conduct of those who are admittedly good and wise. One, however, who is gifted with learning, or one who has controlled his senses, or one who has strength of mind, acquires liberations by virtue of that very conduct

22 That wise man who, having controlled his senses, follows with a heart purged off all desire of injuring others, the conduct of the good, is sure, O Jajali, to acquire the merit of righteousness.

23 In this world, as in a river, a piece of wood that is being carried away by the current, is seen to come into contact (for some time) with another piece which is being likewise carried away. There on the current, other pieces of wood that had been collected together are seen to again separate from one another. Grass, sticks, and cowdung cakes are seen to be joined together This union is merely accidental and not brought about by any set design

25 He, whom no creature fears, is himself, O ascetic, never frightened by any creature.

26 He, on the other hand, O learned man whom every creature fears like a wolf, becomes himself filled with fear as aquatic animals when compelled to leap on the shore from fear of the roaring Vadava fire

27 This practice of universal harmlessness has thus originated One may follow it by every means in his power. He who has a following and he who has riches, may seek to adopt it It is sure to bring on prosperity and heaven.

28 On account of their power to remove the fears of others men having riches and followers are considered as foremost by the learned Those, who seek common place happiness, practise this duty of universal harmlessness for the sake of fame, while they, who are truly skilled, practise, the same for attaining to Brahma.

29 Whatever fruits one enjoys by penances by sacrifices by making charities, by speaking the truth and by seeking wisdom may all be acquired by practising the duty of harmlessness.

30. That person who declares to all creatures the assurance of harmlessness acquires the merit of all the sacrifices and at last acquires fearlessness for himself as his meed There is no duty superior to the duty of not injuring other creatures.

31. He whom O great ascetic, no creature fears in the least, does not himself fear any creatures.

32. He whom every body fears like a snake lying in ones bed-room, never acquires any merit in this world or in the next.

33 The very celestials in their search after it, become bewildered in the track of that person who rises above all states the person, viz, who himself is the soul of all creatures and who considers all creatures as identical with his own self

34 Of all gifts the promise of harmlessness to all creatures is the greatest. I tell you truly, believe me, O Jajali

35 One who performs acts at first acquires prosperity, but then he once more meets with adversity

36 Seeing the destruction of (the merits of) acts, the wise do not speak highly of them

37. There is no duty O Jajali, that is not done by some motive (of happiness) Duty, however, is very subtile Duties have been ordained in the Vedas for both Brahma and heaven.

38 The subject of duties is full of secrets and mysteries It is so subtile that one cannot understand it fully. Amongst various conflicting ordinances, some succeed in understanding duty by observing the acts of the good.

39—40 Why do you not destroy them who emasculate bulls and bore their noses and make them bear heavy loads and bind them and put them under various sorts of restraint and who eat the flesh of living creatures after killing them Men are seen to acquire men as slaves, and by beating, by binding, and by otherwise subjugating them, make them work day and night These people are not ignorant of the pain that is caused by beating and chains

42 All the gods live in every creature who have the five senses The Sun the Moon, the God of Wind Brahman, Vital Airs Kratu and Yama, (these live in living creatures)

43 There are men who maintain themselves by trading in living creatures When they acquire a living by such a sinful trade, what scruples have they in selling dead carcases? The goat is Agni The sheep is Varuna The horse is the Sun Earth is the god Virat

44 The cow and the calf are Soma The man who sells these can never acquire success. But what fault is there in selling oil, clarified butter, honey, or drugs, O twice born one?

45—46 There are many animals which grow up in ease and comfort in places free from gnats and biting insects Knowing that their mothers love them dearly, men persecute them in various ways, and lead them into mire full of biting insects Many beasts of burden are oppressed with heavy loads Others, again, are made to languish for the treatment not sanctioned by the scriptures

47 I think that such acts of injury done to animals are the same as fœticide. People consider the calling of agriculture as sinless That profession, however, is again fraught with cruelty

48 The iron plough wounds the soil and many creatures which live there Look, O Jajali, at those bullocks yoked to the plough

49 Kine are called in the Shrutis the Undestructible That man commits a great iniquity who kills a bull or a cow.

50 In ancient times many Rishis with controlled senses addressed Nahusha, saying,—You have, O king, killed a cow which is regarded in the scriptures like one's mother! You have also killed a bull, which is declared to be like the Creator himself.

51. You have committed a sin, O Nahusha, and we have been greatly pained at it!—For purifying Nahusha, however, they divided that sin, into a hundred and one parts and metamorphosing the pieces into diseases cast them among all creatures

52 Thus O Jajali, did those highly-blessed Rishis cast that sin on all living creatures and addressing Nahusha who had committed fœticide said,—We shall not be able to pour libations in your sacrifice! Thus said those great Rishis and Yatis conversant with truth, having learnt by their ascetic power that king Nahusha had not committed the sin intentionally.

54 These, O Jajali are some of the wicked and dreadful practices of this world. You do them because they are practised by all men from days of yore, and not because they are approved of your purified understanding

55 One should perform his duty guided by reasons, instead of blindly following the conduct of the world Listen now O Jajali, how I treat him who injures and him who praises me

56 I regard both of them equally I have none whom I like and none whom I dislike. The wise speak highly of such a course of conduct as consistent with duty or religion.

57 The Yatis also follow this course of conduct, which is consistent with reasons,

The righteous always observe it with eyes having purified vision.

CHAPTER CCLXIII.

Jajali said:—

1. This duty which you, O holder of scales, describe, shuts the door of heaven against all creatures and puts a stop to the very means of their livelihood.

2. From agriculture comes food. That food gives maintenance even to you With the help of animals, crops and herbs, human beings, O trader, can maintain themselves

3 From animals and food sacrifices originate Your doctrines are atheistical This world will come to an end if the means by which life is upheld have to be given up.

Tuladhara said —

4. I shall now describe the topic of the means of livelihood I am not, O Brahmana, an atheist. I do not speak against Sacrifices The man, however, is very rare who is truly an adept in Sacrifice.

5. I bow to that Sacrifice which is laid down for Brahmanas I bow also to them who are adepts in that Sacrifice Alas, having abandoned the Sacrifice that is ordained for them, the Brahmanas have begun to perform Sacrifices that are for Kshatriyas.

6. Many persons of faith, O twice-born one, who hanker after wealth, without having understood the true meaning of the sayings of the Shrutis, and proclaiming things that are in sooth false but that have the show of truth, have introduced many sorts of Sacrifices, saying —

7 This should be given away in this Sacrifice This other thing should be given away in this other Sacrifice The first of this is very praiseworthy —The result, however, of all this, O Jajali, is that theft and many evil acts originate

8. It should be known that only that sacrificial offering which was gained by fair means can please the deities There are abundant proofs in the scriptures that the adoration of the gods may be done with bows, with libations poured on the fire, with recitation or chaunting of the Vedas, and with plants and herbs.

9 Sinful men get wicked children from their religious acts. Covetous men beget covetous children, and contented men beget contented children.

10. If the sacrificer and the priest allow themselves to be guided by desire of fruit, their children take the stigma. If, however, they are not moved by the desire of fruit, their children become the same. From Sacrifices originate children like clear water from the sky.

11. The libations poured on the sacrificial fire get up to the Sun. From the Sun originates rain. From rain comes food. From food are born living creatures.

12. In days of yore men religiously given to Sacrifices used to attain therefrom the fruition of all their wishes. The Earth gave crops without cultivation. The blessings of the Rishis produced herbs and plants.

13 The men of ancient times never celebrated Sacrifices from desire of fruits and never considered themselves as bound to enjoy those fruits. Those who somehow or other celebrate Sacrifices, doubting their efficacy, are born in their next lives as dishonest, wily, and greedy men greatly covetous of wealth That man who by the help of false reasoning show all the authoritative scriptures as fraught with evil, is certain to go, for such a sinful deed, into the regions of the sinful. Such a man is surely possessed of a sinful soul, O foremost of Brahmanas, and always remains here, shorn of wisdom.

16 That man who consider those acts as bounden which have been laid down in the Vedas and directed to be performed every day, who is filled with fear if he fails to perform them any day, who considers all the essentials of Sacrifices as identical with Brahma, and who never considers himself as the actor, is truly a Brahmana.

17 If the acts of such a person remain incomplete or if their completion is hindered by all unclean animals, even then those acts are, as we have heard, of supreme efficacy. If however, those acts are performed from desire of fruit then expiation would become necessary.

18 They, who seek the acquisition of the highest object of life, who do not hanker after earthly riches who do not care for future provision, and who are shorn of envy, follow the course of truth and practise self control as their Sacrifice.

19 They who know the distinction between body and soul, who are given to Yoga, and who meditate on OM, always succeed in pleasing others.

20. The universal Brahma, which is the soul of all the gods, lives in him who is conversant with Brahma. When, therefore, such a man eats and is pleased, all the gods, O Jajali, become pleased and are contented.

21. As one who is satisfied with all sorts of taste feels no desire for any particular taste, similarly one who is pleased with knowledge has eternal gratification which to him is a source of perfect happiness.

22 Those wise men who are the refuge of righteousness and whose joy is in righteousness, are persons who have certain knowledge of what is duty and what is otherwise. One endued with such wisdom always considers all things in the universe as emanating from his own self.

23—24. Some who are gifted with knowledge, who try to reach the other shore (of this ocean of life), and who have faith, succeed in going to the region of Brahman, which yields great blessings, is highly sacred, and inhabited by pious men,—a region which is freed from sorrow, whence no body returns, and where there is no agitation or pain.

25. Such men do not hanker after heaven They do not worship Brahma in costly Sacrifices They trade the path of the virtuous The Sacrifices they celebrate are performed without injury to any creature

26 These men consider trees, herbs, fruits and roots as the only sacrificial offerings Greedy priests who seek riches, never officiate at the sacrifices of these (poor) men.

27. These regenerate men, although all their acts have been done, still perform sacrifices for doing good to all creatures making their own selves as sacrificial offerings

28. Therefore, greedy priests officiate at the Sacrifices of only those misguided persons who without trying to attain to liberation, seek for heaven Those, however, who are really good, always try, by performing their own duties, to cause others to go to heaven. Looking at both these kinds of conduct, O Jajali, I have come to regard all creatures impartially.

29 Gifted with wisdom, many leading Brahmanas celebrate Sacrifices By performing those Sacrifices, they walk, O great ascetic, along the path wended by the gods.

30 Of one class of Sacrificers there is return (from the region where they go) Of those, however, who are truly wise there is no return Although both classes of sacrificers, O Jajali, wend the path trodden by the gods, yet such is the difference between their ultimate ends.

31. On account of the success of the purposes such men form in their minds, bulls, without being forced thereto, willingly set their shoulders to the plough for ensuring the cultivation and to the yoke for dragging their cars, and kine pour forth milk from udders without being touched by human hands.

32 Creating sacrificial stakes by their will-force, they celebrate many kinds of Sacrifice with profuse presents. One who is of such a purified soul may kill a cow.

33 They, therefore who are otherwise, should celebrate Sacrifices with herbs and plants. Because Renunciation has such merit, there I have kept it in view in speaking to you.

34 The gods consider him a Brahmana who has cast off desire of fruit, who does not exert for worldly acts, who never bows down his head to any one, who never praises others, and who is gifted with strength though his acts have all been weakened.

35 What, O Jajali, will be the end of him who does not recite the Vedas to others, who does not celebrate Sacrifices, who does not make gifts to Brahmanas, and who follows a calling in which every sort of desire is indulged? By duly respecting, however, the duties which belong to Renunciation, one is sure to attain to Brahma.

Jajali said :—

36 We had never before, O son of a trader, heard of these subtle doctrines of ascetics who perform only mental Sacrifices These doctrines are very difficult to understand. It is, therefore, I ask you (about them) The sages of yore were not followers of these doctrines of Yoga. Hence the succeeding sages have not mentioned them.

37. If you hold that only men mentally bent like brutes fail to achieve sacrifices in the soul of the soul then, O son of a trader, by what ground could they succeed in performing [illegible] Tell me this, O [illegible] I have great faith in you.

Tuladhara said :—

38 Sometimes [illegible] by some persons [illegible] These men, it is observed performing any sacrifice [illegible] ing the faithful, however, only [illegible] ers, the cow, is fit for upholding all sacrifices by means of full libations of clarified butter, milk, and curds, the hair at end of her tail, her horns, and her hoofs.

39 In celebrating sacrifices, however, according to the mode I have mentioned, one may convert Faith into his married wife, for dedicating such offerings to the gods. By duly honoring such sacrifices, one is sure to attain to Brahma.

40. Excluding all animals, the rice-ball is a worthy offering in sacrifices All rivers are as sacred as the Saraswati, and all mountains are sacred.

41. O Jajali, the Soul is itself a sacred shrine. Do not roam about on the Earth for visiting sacred places! A person by following these duties, and by seeking to acquire merit according to his own ability, undoubtedly succeeds in getting blessed regions hereafter.

Bhishma continued:—

42. These are the duties, O Yudhishthira, which Tuladhara spoke highly of—duties which are consistent with reason and which are always followed by the good and the wise.

CHAPTER CCLXIV.

Tuladhara said —

1. See with your own eyes, O Jajali, who, amongst the good or otherwise have followed this path of duty which I have spoken of! You will understand properly how the truth stands.

2. See many birds are roving in the sky! Amongst them are those who were brought up on your head, as also many hawks and many others of different kinds

3 See, O Brahmana, those birds have got their wings and legs for entering their respective nests. Call them, O twice born one.

4. There, those birds, treated affectionately by you are showing their love for you who are their father! Forsooth, you are their father, O Jajali! Do you call your children!

5 Then those birds, summoned by Jajali, answered according to the dictates of that religion which preaches abstention from injury to any creature.

6. All acts that are done without injuring any creature come to use both here and hereafter. Those acts, however, that injure others, destroy faith, and faith being destroyed, brings ruin on the destroyer.

7. The sacrifice of those who regard equally both acquisition and non-acquisition, who are endued with faith, who are self controlled, who have tranquil minds, and who celebrate sacrifices from a sense of duty yield fruits

8 Faith in Brahma is the daughter of the Sun God, O twice born one She is the protectress and the giver of good birth. Faith is superior to the merit begotten by recitations and meditation.

9 An act vitiated by faulty speech is saved by Faith. An act sullied by defect of mind is saved by Faith. But neither speech nor mind can save an act which is sullied by want of Faith

10—11. Men who know the past recite in this connection the following verse sung by Brahman The gods regard as equal the offerings in sacrifices of a person who is pure but wanting in Faith, and of another who is impure but wanting in Faith, and of another who is impure but has Faith After mature consideration the gods have considered equal the food again, of a person conversant with the Vedas but miserly in conduct, and that of a usurer who is liberal in conduct.

12—13 The supreme Lord of all creatures, then told them that they had committed a mistake. The food of a liberal person is purified by Faith. The food, however, of the person who has Faith is lost for such want of Faith. The food of a liberal usurer can be accepted but not the food of a miser

14 Only one person in the world, viz, he who has no Faith, is unfit to make offerings to the gods The food of only such a man is unfit to be eaten This is the opinion of men who know duties.

15. Want of Faith is a great sin Faith is a purifier of sins Like a snake casting off its slough, the man of Faith succeeds in shaking off all his sins

16 The religion of abstention with Faith is superior to all sacred things Abstaining from all shortcomings of conduct, he who follows Faith, becomes purified.

17 What need has such a person of penances or of conduct or of endurance? Every man has Faith Faith, however, is of three sorts, viz, as partaking of the nature of the qualities of goodness, darkness, and ignorance, and according to the nature of Faith which one has, one is named.

18 Persons gifted with goodness and endued with insight into the true impor

of morality have thus described the subject of duties We have, on enquiry, got all this from the sage Dharmadarshana

19 O you of great wisdom, adopt Faith, for you will then acquire what is superior. He who believes (in the sayings of the Shrutis), and who acts according to their sense, is, indeed, of righteous soul O Jajali, he who follows his own path is surely a superior person.

Bhishma said:—

20—21. After a short time Tuladhara and Jajali, both of whom had been gifted with great wisdom, ascended to heaven and played there in great happiness, having reached their respective places won by their respective deeds. Tuladhara had spoken many truths of this sort.

22 That great person understood this religion perfectly. These eternal duties were accordingly declared by him.

23. O son of Kunti, having heard these words of Tuladhara of celebrated energy, the twice-born Jajali betook himself to tranquillity In this way many truths of deep sense were spoken by Tuladhara, illustrated by examples for instruction. What other truths do you wish to hear?

CHAPTER CCLXV.

(MOKSHADHARMA PARVA)—Continued.

Bhishma said:—

1. Regarding it is cited an old discourse of what was recited by king Vicharakhu through pity for all creatures.

2—3 Seeing the mangled body of a bull and hearing the highly painful groans of the kine in a cow killing sacrifice, and observing the cruel Brahmanas collected there for assisting at the ceremonies, that king said these words —Prosperity to all the kine in the world'—When the slaughter had begun, these words expressive of a blessing were uttered —

4. And the king further said,—Only those who transgress fixed limits, who are shorn of intelligence, who are atheists and sceptics, and who desire the acquisition of celebrity by sacrifices and religious rites, speak highly of the destruction of animals in sacrifices.

5 The pious Manu has spoken highly of harmlessness in all acts. Indeed, men kill animals in sacrifices, actuated only by the desire of fruit.

6. Hence, guided by authority one conversant (with the scriptures) should practise the true course of duty which is highly subtle Harmlessness to all creatures is the highest of all duties.

7. Living near an inhabited place and practising rigid vows, and disregarding the fruits of Vedic acts, one should give up the life of a house-holder, adopting that of Renunciation Only they who are mean are actuated by the desire of fruit.

8. Mentioning respectfully sacrifices and trees and sacrificial stakes, men do not eat tainted meat. This practice, however, is not worthy of praise.

9 Knaves have introduced wine, fish, honey, meat, alchohol, and preparations of rice and sesame seeds The use of these is not sanctioned in the Vedas.

10 The hankering after these originates from pride, error of judgment, and cupidity. The Brahmanas realise the presence of Vishnu in every sacrifice.

11—12. His adoration, it has been laid down, should be made with sweet Payasa. (The leaves and flowers of) such trees as have been mentioned in the Vedas, whatever act is considered as worthy and whatever else is held as pure by persons of pure hearts and purified natures and those eminent for knowledge and holiness, are well worthy of being offered to the Supreme God and not unworthy of His acceptance."

Yudhishthira said:—

13. "The body and all sorts of dangers and calamities continually fight with each other. How, therefore, will a person who is absolutely free from the desire of injuring and who on this account will not be able to act, succeed in maintaining his body?"

Bhishma said:—

14. 'One should, when able, acquire merit and act in such a way that his body may not languish and suffer pain, and that death may not come."

CHAPTER CCLXVI.

(MOKSHADHARMA PARVA).—Continued.

Yudhishthira said:—

1. "You, O grandfather, are our highest preceptor in the matter of all acts which it is difficult to perform. I ask, how should one judge of an act regarding one's obligation to do it or of abstaining from it? Is it to be judged quickly or with delay?"

Bhishma said —

2. "Regarding it is cited the old discourse of what took place regarding Chirakarin born in the race of Angirasa.

3 Twice blessed be the man who thinks long before he acts! One who thinks long before he acts is surely possessed of great intelligence Such a man never offends in an act

4 There was once a highly wise man by name Chirakarin, who was the son of Gautama Thinking for a long time upon every aspect of proposed acts, he used to do all he had to do.

5 He passed by the name of Chirakarin because he used to think long upon all matters to remain awake for a long time, to sleep for a long time, and to take a long time in performing such acts.

6. But still he passed for an idle man. He was also considered as a foolish person, by every person of a light understanding and shorn of foresight

7 On a certain occasion, seeing an act of great fault in his wife the father Gautama, passing over his other children, commanded in anger this Chirakarin, saying,— kill this woman!

8 Having said these words without much thought the learned Gautama, that foremost of persons engaged in the practice of Yoga, that highly blessed ascetic, left for the forest

9 Having after a long while assented to it saying —So be it —Chirakarin on account of his very nature, and owing to his habit of never performing any act without much thought began to think for a long while —

10 How shall I obey the order of my father, and yet how avoid killing my mother? How shall I avoid sinking, like a wicked man, into sin in this plight in which contradictory duties are dragging me into opposite directions?

11 Obedience to the orders of the father forms the highest merit The protection of the mother again is a clear duty The condition of a son is fraught with dependence How shall I avoid being affected by sin?

12 Who is there that can be happy after having killed a woman, especially his mother? Who again can acquire prosperity and fame by disobeying his own father.

13 Regard for the father's order is obligatory. The protection of my mother is equally a duty How shall I so act that both obligations may be satisfied?

14 The father puts his own self within the mother's womb and takes birth as the son, for continuing his practices, conduct, name and race.

15 I have been begotten as a son by both my mother and my father. Knowing as I do my own birth, why should I not have this knowledge?

16 The words spoken by the father while performing the initial rite consequent upon birth, and those that were spoken by him on the occasion of the subsidiary rite are sufficient (evidence) for settling the respect due to him and, indeed, confirm the respect actually paid to him.

17 On account of his bringing up the son and instructing him the father is the son's foremost of superiors and the highest religion. The very Vedas sanction it as certain that the son should consider what the father says as his highest duty.

18 The son is only a source of joy to his father The father is all in all to a son. The body and all else that the son has he has got from the father alone.

19 Hence, the commands of the father should be obeyed without ever questioning them in the least The very sins of one who obeys his father are cleansed

20 The father is the giver of all articles of enjoyment, of all articles of food, of instructions in the Vedas and of all other knowledge of the world The father is the performer of such rites as Garbhadhana (the ceremony for the attainment of puberty by the wife) and Simantonnayana (the ceremony performed by the husband in the fourth, sixth, or eighth, month of gestation.

21 The father is religion The father is heaven The father is the highest penance. The father being pleased all the gods are pleased

22 Whatever words are spoken by the father, become blessings that attach to the son The words of joy that the father utters purify the son of all his sins

23 The flower is seen to drop down from the stalk The fruit is seen to drop down from the tree But the father, in whatever difficulty he may be, moved by parental affection, never leaves the son.

24. These then are my thoughts upon the respect due from the son to the father. The father is not an ordinary object to the son. I shall now think upon the mother.

25 Of this the mother is the principal cause of those union of the five elements in me due to my birth as a human being, as the fire-sticks of fire

26 The mother is as the fire stick about the bodies of all men She is the medicine for all sorts of calamities The existence of the mother grants protection to one, the reverse deprives one of all protection

27 The man who, though shorn of prosperity, enters his house uttering the words—O, mother!—does not suffer from grief. Nor does decrepitude ever attack him.

28 A person whose mother exists, even if he has sons and grandsons and even if she is a hundred years old, looks like a child of two.

29 Able or disabled lean or robust, the son is always protected by the mother None else, according to the Scripture, is the son's protector.

30. When his mother leaves him then does the son become old, then does he become stricken with grief, then does the world look empty in his eyes

31. There is no shelter like the mother. There is no refuge like the mother. There is no defence like the mother There is no one dearer than the mother.

32 For having borne him in her womb the mother is the son's Dhatri For having been the principal cause of his birth, she is his Janani For having reared his young limbs, she is called Amva For giving birth to a child possessed of courage, she is called Virasu

33. For nursing and looking after the son she is called Shushru The mother is one's own body What rational man is there who would kill his mother to whose care only his own head did not lie on the street like a dry gourd?

34 When husband and wife unite themselves for procreation the desire for a son is cherished by both, but about its fruition more depends upon the mother than on the father.

35 The mother knows the family in which the son is born and the father who has begotten him From the time of conception the mother begins to show affection to her child and find joy in him On the other hand, the Scriptures hold that the issue belong to the father only.

36. If men, after taking wives and pledging themselves to acquire religious merit without being dissociated from them, seek union with other people's wives, they then cease to deserve respect.

37 The husband, because he maintains the wife, is called Bhartri, and he is called Pati, because he protects her When he fails to discharge these two functions, he ceases to both Bhartri and Pati

38 Then again woman can commit no fault It is man only who commits faults. By committing an act of adultery, the man only becomes sullied with sin

39 It has been said that the husband is the highest object with the wife and the highest god to her. My mother resigned her sacred person to one who came to her in the shape of her own husband

40 Women can commit no sin It is man who becomes sullied with sin Indeed, on account of the natural weakness of the sex as shown in every act, and their liability to solicitation, women cannot be considered as offenders.

41. Then again the sinfulness is evident of Indra himself who made the recollection of the request that had been made to him in days of yore by woman. There is no doubt that my mother is sinless.

42 She whom I have been ordered to kill is a woman. That woman is again my own mother. She occupies, therefore, a place of greater respect The very beasts which are irrational, know that the mother should not be killed

43 The father must be known to be a combination of all the gods together The mother, however, is a combination of all mortal creatures and all the gods.

44 On account of his habit of reflecting long before acting Gautama's son Chirakarin, by thinking thus passed a long time After many days, his father Gautama came back.

45 Gifted with great wisdom, Medhatithi of Gautama's race, practising penances, returned, convinced after having meditated for that long time, of the impropriety of the punishment he had ordered to be inflicted upon his wife.

46 Burning with grief and shedding profuse tears, for repentance had come to him on account of the wholesome effects of that calmness of temper which is caused by a knowledge of the scriptures, he said —

47. The lord of the three worlds, viz., Purandara, came to my asylum, in the guise of a Brahmana asking for hospitality.

48 He was received by me with becoming words and welcomed and presented in due form with water to wash his feet and the whole universe is appointed for sacrifice The Vedas have appointed Purusha for the same purpose.

23 This again has been sanctioned by men of ancient times What learned man is there who does not select, according to his own power, individuals from among living creatures for sacrifice?

34. The inferior animals, human beings, trees and herbs, all desire for the attainment of heaven There is no means, however, except sacrifice, by which they can acquire the fruition of that desire.

25—29 The deciduous herbs animals, trees, creepers, clarified butter, milk, curds neat and other selected things land, the points of the horizon, faith, and time which forms the twelfth, the Richs, the Yajushes, the Samans, and the sacrificer himself forming the sixteenth, and Fire which should be known as the householder,—these seventeen are said to be the limbs of Sacrifice Sacrifice, the Shruti says is the root of the world and its movement With clarified butter, milk, curds, dung, curds mixed with milk skin, the hair in her tail, horns, and hoofs the cow alone is able to supply all the necessaries of sacrifice For particular sacrifices are sanctioned particular ones. Ritwijas and presents together sustain Sacrifices By collecting these things together, people celebrate sacrifices

30 This Shruti, quite of a piece with the truth, is heard that all things have been created for the celebration of Sacrifice It was thus that all men of yore undertook the celebration of sacrifices

35 The syllable Om is the root from which the Vedas have originated He has no fear about next life in all the three worlds, who has uttered for him the syllables 'Om, Namas, Swaha, Sadha, and Vashat, and who has according to his means, celebrated sacrifices and other rites The Vedas and sages crowned with ascetic success, and the foremost of Rishis declare thus 37 He, indeed, is a Brahmana in whom are the Richs, the Yajushes the Samans, and the expletives necessary for completing the rythm of the Samans according to the rules laid down in Vedic grammars.

38 You know, O worshipful Brahmana, what are the fruits of Agnihotra, of the Soma-sacrifice, and of the other great sacrifices

39 I, therefore, hold that one should sacrifice and assist at other people's sacrifices, without any hesitation whatsoever. One who celebrates sacrifices leading to heaven (such as Yotishtoma, etc) acquires great rewards in the next world the form of heavenly bliss

40 This is certain viz, that they who do not celebrate sacrifices have neither this world nor the next. They who are really conversant with the sayings of the Vedas consider both kinds of declarations as equally authoritative.

CHAPTER CCLXIX

(MOKSHADHARMA PARVA)—

4 Getting over grief, and freed from the quality of darkness, their acquisitions are eternal When the high end of these men is within reach of attainment, what need has one for performing the duties of the domestic mode of life.

Syumarashmi said —

5 If, indeed, that be the highest object of acquisition, if that be truly the highest end then the importance of the domestic mode of life becomes clear, because without the domestic mode no other mode of life ever becomes possible.

6 Indeed as all living creatures live on account of their dependence on their respective mothers, similarly the three other modes of life exist on account of their dependence upon the domestic mode.

7. The householder who lives like a householder, celebrates sacrifices and practises penances. Whatever is done by anybody for acquiring happiness has for its root the domestic mode of life.

8. All living creatures consider the procreation of offspring as a root of great happiness. The procreation of children, however, becomes impossible in any other mode of life.

9 Every sort of grass and straw, all plants and herbs, and others of the same class growing on hills and mountains, have the domestic mode of life for their root. Upon these rests the life of living creatures And since nothing else is seen than life, domesticity may be regarded as the refuge of the entire universe.

10. Who then speaks the truth who says that domesticity cannot bring on the acquisition of Liberation? Only those who have no faith and wisdom and penetration, only those who have no reputation, who are idle and toil worn, who have misery in their lot on account of their pristine deeds, only those who are destitute of learning, see the profusion of tranquility in a life of mendicancy.

12. The eternal and unfailing (Vedic) distinctions are the causes that keep up the three worlds. That illustrious person of the highest caste who is conversant with the Vedas, is adored from the very date of his birth.

13 Besides the celebration of Garbhadhana, Vedic Mantras become necessary for enabling persons of the twice born classes to perform all their acts regarding both this and the other world.

14 In cremating his body in the attainment of a second body, in that of his drink and food after such attainment, in that of giving away kine and other animals for helping him to cross the river that divides this world from that of Yama, in that of sinking the funeral cakes in water, Vedic Mantras are necessary.

15. Then again the three classes of Pitris, viz, the Archishmats, the Vairajas, and the Kravyads, approve of the necessity of Mantras about the dead, and Mantras are regarded as powerful causes.

16 When the Vedas proclaim this so loudly and when again human beings are said to owe debts to the Pitris, the Rishis, and the gods, how can any one attain to Liberation.

17 This false doctrine (of incorporeal existence called Emancipation), seemingly consistent with truth, but subversive of the real meaning of the injunctions of the Vedas, has been introduced by learned men shorn of prosperity and eaten up by idleness

18 That Brahmana who celebrates sacrifices according to the injunctions of the Vedas, is never seduced by sin Through sacrifices, such a person acquires high regions of happiness along with the animals he has killed in those sacrifices, and himself, pleased by the acquisition of all his wishes succeeds in pleasing those animals by fulfilling their wishes.

19 By neglecting the Vedas, by guile, or by deception, one never succeeds in attaining to the Supreme. On the other hand, it is by practising Vedic rites that one succeeds in attaining to Brahma.

Kapila said —

20 There are the Darsha, the Paurnamasha, the Agnihotra, the Chaturmashya, and other rites which an intelligent man should perform Eternal merit consists in their performance

21. Those that have adopted the Sannyasa mode of life, who abstain from all acts who are endued with patience, who are cleansed, and who are conversant with Brahma, succeed by such knowledge of Brahma in satisfying the debts to the gods, (also the Pitris and the Rishis), described to be so very fond of libations poured in sacrifices.

22. The very gods become stupefied in finding out the path of that pathless person who forms himself the soul of all creatures and who regards all creatures impartially.

23 Through instructions delivered by the preceptor one knows that which lives within this body to be of a fourfold nature, having besides four doors and four mouths. In consequence of two arms the organ, of Sacrifice, the Shruti says, is the root of the world and its movement. With clarified butter, milk, curds, dung, curds mixed with milk, skin, the hair in her tail, horns, and hoofs, the cow alone is able to supply all the necessaries of sacrifice. 19 By neglecting the Vedas by guile, or by deception, one never succeeds in attaining to the Supreme On the other hand it is by practising Vedic rites that one succeeds in attaining to Brahma.

Kapila said —

20 There are the Darsha, the Paurnamasha the Agnihotra, the Chaturmashya, and other rites which an intelligent man should perform Eternal merit consists in their performance

21 Those that have adopted the Sannyasa mode of life, who abstain from all acts who are endued with patience, who are cleansed and who are conversant with Brahma, succeed by such knowledge of Brahma in satisfying the debts to the gods, (also the Pitris and the Rishis), described to be so fond of libations poured in sacrifices.

22. The very gods become stupefied in finding out the path of that pathless person who forms himself the soul of all creatures and who regards all creatures impartially.

23 Through instructions delivered by the preceptor one knows that which lives within this body to be of a four fold nature, having bestowed four doors and four mouths. In consequence of two arms the organ, of speech, the stomach, and the organ of pleasure, the very duties are said to have four doors. One should, therefore, do his best to keep those doors under control.

24. One should not gamble with dice. One should not appropriate others properties. One should not officiate at the sacrifice of a person of a mean birth. One should not, yielding to anger, smite another with hands or feet That intelligent man who acts thus is said to have his hands and feet well-governed.

25. One should not make loud abuse or censure. One should not speak useless words. One should forbear from knavery and from accusing others. One should observe the vow of truthfulness, be sparing of speech, and always careful By acting thus one will have his organ of speech well-governed.

26. One should not abstain entirely from food. One should not eat too much One should give up covetousness, and always seek company of the good. One should eat only so much as is necessary for keeping life By acting thus one succeeds in properly governing the door represented by his stomach.

27. One should not, O hero, out of lust take another wife when he has a wedded wife. One should never call a woman to bed except in her season. One should confine himself to her own married spouse without seeking union with other women By acting thus one is said to have his organ of pleasure properly governed.

28 That wise man is truly a regenerate person who has all his four doors, viz, the organ of pleasure, the stomach, the two arms (and two feet), and the organ of speech, properly governed.

29. Everything becomes useless of that person whose doors are not well governed. O what avail are the penances of such a man? Of what avail are his sacrifices? What can be gained by his body?

30. The gods consider him a Brahmana who has cast off his upper garment, who sleeps on the naked earth, who makes his arm a pillow, and whose heart is endued with tranquility.

31. That person who, given to contemplation, singly enjoys all the happiness that married couples enjoy, and who pays no attention to the joys and griefs of others, should be known as a Brahmana.

32. That man who properly understands all this as it really is and its various metamorphoses, and who knows what the end is of all created objects, is known by the gods as a Brahmana.

33. One who entertains no fear from any creature and from whom no creature has any fear, and who forms himself the soul of all creatures, should be known as a Brahmana.

34 Without having gained purity of heart which is the true end of all religious acts such as gifts and sacrifices, men of foolish understandings do not succeed in acquiring a knowledge of what is necessary in making one a Brahmana even when explained by preceptors Shorn of a knowledge of all this, these men desire fruits of a different sort, viz, heaven and its joys.

35—37 Unable to practise even a small part of that good conduct which has descended from remote times, which is eternal which is characterised by certainty, which enters as a thread in all our duties, and by following which men of knowledge belonging to all the modes of life convert their respective duties and penances into dreadful weapons for killing the ignorance and evils of worldliness, men of foolish understandings regard acts which yield visible fruits, which are fraught with the highest power, and that are dear less, as fruitless after all and as deviations not sanctioned by the scriptures. In sooth, however, that conduct, comprising practices the very opposite of those that are seen in times of distress is the very essence of carefulness and is never affected by lust and anger and other passions of a similar nature.

38 About sacrifices again, it is very difficult to determine all their particulars. If ascertained, it is very difficult to follow them in practice If practised, the fruits which they beget are terminable. Mark this well

Syumarashmi said:—

39 The Vedas sanction acts and disallow them. Whence then is their authority when their injunctions thus contradict each other? Renunciation of acts, again, yields great benefit. Both these ways have been laid down in the Vedas Do you describe to me this subject, O Brahmana.

Kapila said:—

40. Adopting the path of the good (viz, Yoga), do you in even this life realise its fruits by the direct evidence of your senses! What, however, are the palpable results of those other objects which you pursue?

Syumarashmi said:—

41. O Brahmana, I am Syumarashmi by name! I have come here for gaining knowledge. Desirous of doing good to

That which is against the Vedas is unscriptural. The Shruti says this

60 Many men, who believe only what directly appeals to their senses, see only this world They do not see what the scriptures declare to be faults They have, accordingly like ourselves to yield to grief Those objects of the senses which concern men like you are the same with which other living creatures are concerned

61—62 All the four castes of men and all the four modes of life however different their duties, seek the same single end You are gifted with unquestioned talents and abilities For determining that particular conduct which is well calculated to fulfill the desired end, you have by describing to me the Infinite (Brahma), filled my soul with tranquility As regards ourselves, on account of our inability to understand the Soul we are deprived of a correct understanding of the reality Our wisdom is concerned with low things, and we are covered with thick darkness

63—64 Only he who is given to Yoga, who has satisfied all his duties who is capable of roving everywhere depending only on his own body, who has brought his soul under perfect restraint who has gone above the requirements of the science of morality and who disregards the whole world can transgress the declarations of the Vedas regarding acts, and say that there is Liberation

65—66 For one, however, who lives in the midst of relatives, this course of conduct is highly difficult to follow Gift, study of the Vedas sacrifices begetting children, simplicity of conduct, when by doing even these no one attains to Liberation fie on Him who seeks to attain to it and on Liberation itself that is sought! It appears that the labour spent upon acquiring it is all fruitless

67 One is charged with atheism if he disregards the Vedas by not doing the acts they declare O illustrious one, I wish to hear forthwith about that which comes in the Vedas after the injunctions about acts.

68 Do tell me the truth, O Brahmana! I sit at your feet as a disciple Teach me kindly! I wish to know as much about Liberation as is known to you, O learned one!

CHAPTER CCLXX.

(MOKSHADHARMA PARVA) —

Continued.

Kapila said —

1 The Vedas are considered as an authority by all People never disobey them Brahma is of two kinds, viz, Brahma as represented by sound, and Brahma as Supreme

2 One conversant with Brahma of sound succeeds in attaining to Supreme Brahma. Beginning with the rites of Garbhadhana, that body which the father creates with the help of Vedic Mantras is purified (after birth) by Vedic Mantras.

3 When the body has been purified with purificatrry rites, the owner thereof is called a Brahmana and becomes a vessel fit for receiving knowledge of Brahma. Know that the meed of acts is purity of heart which only brings on Liberation I shall now speak to you of that.

4 Whether purity of heart has been acquired or not is what can be known to the person himself who has acquired it It can never be known with the help of either the Vedas or inference They who have no expectations who discard every sort of riches by not keeping anything for future use, who are not covetous, and who are free from every sort of affection and aversion, celebrate sacrifices believing only that their performance is a duty. To make gifts to deserving persons is the end of all riches

6—8 Never addicted at any time to sinful deeds, observant of rites sanctioned by the Vedas capable of fructifying all their wishes gifted with certain conclusions through pure knowledge never giving way to anger —never indulging in envy, free from pride and malice firm in Yoga, of unsullied birth unsullied conduct and unsullied learning given to the behoof of all creatures there were in days of yore many men living like householders and thoroughly devoted to their own duties, there were many kings also of the same accomplishment, devoted to Yoga, and many Brahmanas also of the same character.

9 They treated all creatures equally and were gifted with perfect sincerity. They had contentment, certainty of knowledge The rewards of their righteousness were apparent, and they were pure in conduct and heart. They were endued with faith in Brahma of both forms

10. At first making their hearts pure, they duly observed all vows. They observed the duties of righteousness on even occasions of distress and great difficulty, without deviating in any particular.

11. Uniting together they used to celebrate meritorious acts In this they found great happiness And inasmuch as they never transgressed, they had never to perform any expiatory rite.

12 Depending upon the true course of virtue, they became gifted with irresistible energy. They never followed their own understandings while acquiring merit but followed the injunctions of the scriptures alone for that end Accordingly they were never guilty of guile in performing acts of righteousness 13 On account of their observing unitedly the perfect ordinances of the scriptures without following the rites laid down in the alternative, they were never compelled to perform any expiation.

14 There is no expiation for men who follow the ordinances laid down in the scriptures The Shruti says that expiation exists for only men who are weak and unable to follow the absolute provisions of the sacred law.

15 Many Brahmanas of this kind in days of yore devoted to the celebration of sacrifices, of profound knowledge of the Vedas, endued with purity, good conduct and fame

16—22 They always adored Brahma in the sacrifices, and were free from desire Endued with learning they got over all the bonds of life The sacrifices of these men their Vedic knowledge, their acts performed according to the ordinances their study of the scriptures at the proper hours and the wishes they formed, freed as they were from lust and anger observant as they were of pious conduct and acts despite all difficulties, famous as they were for performing the duties of their own castes and mode of life, purified as their souls were on account of their very nature, characterised as they were by thorough sincerity, devoted as they were to tranquillity, and attentive as they were to their own practices were at one with Infinite Brahma This is the eternal Shruti we have heard The penances of men who were so noble of men whose conduct and acts were so difficult of observance and accomplishment, of men whose wishes were crowned with success on account of the strict satisfaction of their duties, became potent instruments for the destruction of all worldly desires The Brahmanas hold that that Good Conduct, which is wonderful, whose origin may be traced to very old times, which is eternal, and whose marks are unchangeable, which differs from the practices which even the good follow in times of distress and represents their acts in other situations which is at one with carefulness, over which lust, anger, and other evil passions have no control and on account of which there was no transgression in all mankind, subsequently became divided into four sub divisions, agreeing with the four modes of life by persons unable to follow its duties in minute detail and entirety

23 By properly following that course of Good Conduct after adoption of the Sannyasa mode of life the good attain to the highest end They also who become forest recluses, reach the same high end

24 They also who observe the domestic mode of life, attain to the highest end, and lastly, those who lead the Brahmacharyya mode attain to the same end. Those Brahmanas are seen to shine in the sky as luminaries shedding beneficent rays of light all around

25 Those countless Brahmanas have become stars and constellations set in their fixed roads By virtue of contentment they have all acquired Infinity as the Vedas say

26 If such men have to return to the world through the wombs of living creatures, they are never sullied by sins which have the unexhausted remnant of pristine deeds for their originating cause

27 Indeed, one who has lived like a Brahmacharin and served dutifully his preceptor, who has arrived at fixed conclusions, and who has devoted himself to Yoga thus is truly a Brahmana Who else is worthy of being called a Brahmana?

28—30 When acts alone settle who is a Brahmana and who is not, acts must be held to point out the happiness or misery of a person About those who have by conquering all evil passions acquired purity of heart, we have heard the eternal Shruti that, on account of the Infinity which they acquire and of the knowledge of Brahma (they acquire through the declarations of Shrutis) they see everything as Brahma. The duties followed by those pure learned men who are shorn of desire, and who have liberation only for their object, for acquisition of the knowledge of Brahma are equally sanctioned for all the four castes and all the four modes of life That knowledge is always gained by Brahmanas of pure hearts and controlled soul

31 One whose soul is for Renunciation based upon contentment, is considered as the refuge of true knowledge Renunciation, wherein exists the knowledge leading to Liberation, and which is highly necessary for a Brahmana, is eternal,

32. Renunciation is sometimes found mixed with the duties of other modes. But whether existing in that state or by itself, one practises it according to his power. Renunciation is the root of great benefit to every sort of person Only he who is weak, fails to pursue it That pure-hearted man who seeks to attain to Brahma becomes saved from the world.

Syumarashmi said:—

33—34 Of them who are given up to enjoyment, they who make gifts, they who celebrate sacrifices, they who are given to the study of the Vedas, and they who follow the life of Renunciation after having acquired and enjoyed riches and all its pleasures when they depart from this world, who is it who gets the foremost place in heaven? I ask you this, O Brahmana! Do you tell me truly.—

Kapila said:—

35. Those who live like householders are surely auspicious and gain every sort of excellence They are unable, however, to enjoy the happiness of Renunciation. Even you may see this.

Syumarashmi said:—

36 You depend upon knowledge as the means Those who live like householders, have placed their faith in acts It has, however, been said that the end of all modes of life is Liberation.

37. No difference, therefore, is seen between them about either their superiority or inferiority of power. O illustrious one, do you, then, clear out the mystery and enlighten me.

Kapila said:—

38—39 Acts only purify the body. Knowledge, however, is the highest end. When all defects of the heart are cured, and when the happiness of Brahma becomes established in knowledge, benevolence, forgiveness, tranquility, mercy, truthfulness, and open-mindedness, abstention from injury absence of pride, modesty, renunciation, and abstention from work are acquired.

40. These form the path of Brahma. By those one acquires the Highest A wise man when he acquires these qualities, understands that the cure of all defects of the heart is the result of acts.

41. That, indeed, is considered as the highest end which is acquired by Brahmanas gifted with wisdom, withdrawn from all acts, possessed of purity and the surety of knowledge.

42. One who acquires a knowledge of the Vedas, of that which is taught by the Vedas, and the details of acts, is said to be conversant with the Vedas. Any other man is only a bag of wind.

43 One who is master of the Vedas, knows everything, for everything is established on the Vedas. The present, past, and future all exist in the Vedas.

44 This is the one conclusion of all the scriptures viz, that this universe exists and does not exist. To the man of knowledge this is both existent and non-existent. To him this all is both the end and the middle.

45—46 This truth depends upon all the Vedas, viz, that when complete Renunciation takes place one acquires what is sufficient Then, again, the highest contentment follows and depends upon Liberation, which is absolute, which exists as the soul of all mortal and immortal things, which is well-known as such universal soul, which is the highest object of knowledge as being at one with all mobile and immobile objects, which is full, which is perfect happiness which is without duality, which is the foremost of all things, which is Brahma, which is Unmanifest and the cause also of the Unmanifest, and which is without any sort of decay.

47 Power to control the senses, forgiveness and abstention from work owing to the absence of desire,—these three are the cause of perfect happiness. With the help of these three qualities, men having understanding for their eyes, succeed in reaching that Brahma which is increate, which is the supreme cause of the universe, which is unchangeable, and which is beyond destruction I bow to that Brahma, which is at one with him that knows it."

CHAPTER CCLXXI.

(MOKSHADHARMA PARVA).—Continued.

Yudhisthira said:—

1. "The Vedas, O Bharata, describe Religion, Profit, and Pleasure. Tell me, however, O grand-father, the attainment of which is considered as superior."

Bhishma said:—

2. About it I shall recite to you the ancient discourse of the benefit which Kundadhara in days of yore had conferred upon one who was devoted to him.

3 Once on a time a Brahmana shorn of riches tried to win virtue, actuated by the desire of fruit. He continually thought of riches for employing it in the celebration of sacrifices For gaining his end he engaged in the practice of the austerest penances.

4. Determined to achieve his object, he began to adore the gods with great devotion But he failed to acquire riches by such adoration of the gods.

5 He thereupon began to think aside,—What is that god, hitherto not worshipped by men, who may be forthwith favorably disposed towards me?

6. While thinking thus with a cool mind, he saw stationed before him that retainer of the gods, viz, the Cloud called Kundadhara.

7. As soon as he saw that mighty-armed being, the Brahmana's feelings of devotion were excited and he said to himself —This one will surely give me prosperity! Indeed, his form indicates it.

8 He lives near the gods. He has not as yet been worshipped by other men He will surely give me profuse riches without any delay!

9 The Brahmana then, having determined thus, adored that Cloud with incense, perfumes and garlands of flowers of the most superior kind, and with various sorts of offerings.

10 Thus adored, the Cloud became very soon pleased with his worshipper, and uttered these words of benefit to that Brahmana —

11. The wise have laid down expiation for one guilty of Brahmanicide, or of drinking alcohol, or of stealing, or of neglecting all meritorious vows. There is no expiation, however, for one who is ungrateful.

12 Expectation has a child named Sin Anger, again, is considered to be a child of Envy. Cupidity is the child of Deceit. Ingratitude, however, is barren.

13. After this, that Brahmana, stretched on a bed of Kusha grass, and penetrated with the energy of Kundadhara, saw all living beings in a dream.

14 Indeed, on account of his absence of passion, penances, and devotion, that Brahmana of purified soul and standing aloof from all enjoyments saw in the night that effect of his devotion to Kundadhara.

15. Indeed, O Yudhishthira, he saw the great and highly effulgent Manibhadra stationed in the midst of the gods, engaged in giving his orders.

16 There the gods seemed to be engaged in granting kingdoms and riches to men, induced by their good deeds, and in taking them away when men deviated from goodness.

17. Then O foremost of Bharata's race, the highly effulgent Kundadhara, bending himself low, laid himself down on the ground before the gods in the presence of all the Yakshas.

18. At the command of the gods the Manibhadra said to the prostrate Kundadhara,—What does Kundadhara want?

19 Thereupon Kundadhara replied —If, indeed, the gods are gratified with me, there, that Brahmana respects me greatly. I pray for some favor being shown to him, something, that may bring him happiness.

20. Hearing this, Manibhadra, ordered by the gods, once more said to the highly intelligent Kundadhara.

21—22. Rise, Rise up, O Kundadhara! Your prayer has borne success! Be you happy! If this Brahmana seeks riches, let as much wealth be given to him, as he wishes At the command of the gods I shall give him immeasurable riches.

23 Then, thinking upon the fleeting and unreal character of the humanity, Kundadhara set his heart, O Yudhisthira, upon inclining the Brahmana to penances.

24 Indeed, Kundadhara said —I do not, O giver of riches, beg for wealth on behalf of this Brahmana. I desire the bestowed of another favor upon him.

25 I do not pray for this devotee of mine mountains of pearls and gems, or even the whole Earth with all her riches. I wish, however, that he should be virtuous.

26 Let his heart find pleasure in virtue! Let him have virtue for his support. Let virtue be the foremost of all his objects. This is the favor which I am inclined to give my support.

Manibhadra said:—

27. The fruits of virtue are always kingdom and happiness of various sorts. Let this one enjoy those fruits, always freed from all sorts of physical sufferings.

Bhishma said:—

28. Thus addressed, the highly illustrious Kundadhara, repeatedly prayed for virtue alone for that Brahmana. The gods were highly pleased at it.

Then Manibhadra said:—

29 The gods are all pleased with you as also with this Brahmana. This one shall become a virtuous man. He shall devote his mind to virtue.

30. The Cloud, Kundadhara, became pleased, O Yudhisthira, at thus having been successful in gaining his wish. The boon that he had got was one that could not be acquired by anybody else.

31 The Brahmana then saw scattered around him many fine fabrics of cloth Without caring for them at all, the Brahmana came to disrelish the world.

The Brahmana said :—

32 When this one does not attach any value to good deeds, who else will? I had better go to the forest for leading a life of righteousness.

Bhishma said :—

33 Cherishing a distaste for the world, and through the grace also of the gods, that foremost of Brahmanas entered the forest and began to practise the austerest of penances.

34 Living upon such fruits and roots as remained after serving the gods and guests, the mind of that twice born one, O king, was firmly set upon virtue.

35 By and bye the Brahmana, leaving off fruits and roots, began to use leaves of trees as his food. Then leaving off leaves, he took to water only as his subsistence 36 Thereafter he passed many years by living upon air only All this time, however, his strength did not decrease This seemed highly wonderful.

37. Devoted to virtue and engaged in the practice of the severest austerities, after a long time he gained spiritual vision

38 He then thought, saying to himself, —If, being pleased with anybody I give him riches my speech would never be untrue.

39 With a face lighted up by smiles he once more began to practise severer austerities.

40. And once more, having gained (higher) success, he thought that he could by his will force, then create the very highest objects If, pleased with any person whatsoever I give him even sovereignty, he will immediately become a king, for my words will never be falsified.

41. While he was thinking thus, Kundadhara, actuated by his friendship for the Brahmana and no less by the ascetic success which the Brahmana had gained, appeared before him, O Bharata.

42. Meeting with him the Brahmana offered him adorations according to the observances ordained. The Brahmana, however, felt some surprise, O king.

43. Then Kundadhara addressed the Brahmana, saying, you have now got an excellent and spiritual eye! See with this vision of yours the end which is attained by kings, and see all the worlds besides.

44. The Brahmana then, with his spiritual vision, saw from a distance thousands of kings sunk in hell.

Kundadhara said :—

45. After having adored me with devotion you had got sorrow for your share, what then would have been the good done to you by me, and what the value of my favour.

46 Look, look, for what end do men seek the gratification of carnal enjoyments! The door of heaven is closed to men.

Bhishma said :—

47 The Brahmana then saw many men living in this world, embracing lust, anger, avarice, fear, pride, sheep, procrastination, and activity.

Kundadhara said :—

48. All human beings are enchained with these. The gods are afraid of men. These vices, at the order of the gods, mar and disconcert on all sides.

49 No man can become virtuous unless allowed by the gods You have become competent to give away kingdoms and riches through your penances!

Bhishma said —

50 Thus addressed, the pious Brahmana, bending his head to that Cloud, laid himself low on the ground, and said,—You have, indeed, done me a great favour!

51. Unconscious of the great love shown by you towards me, I through the influence of desire and avarice, could not show good will towards you.

Then Kundadhara said :—

52 That foremost of twice born ones —I have forgiven you!—and having embraced him with his arms disappeared there and then.

53 The Brahmana then travelled through all the worlds, having acquired ascetic success through the favour of Kundadhara.

54. Through the power gained from virtue and penances, one acquires power to pass through the skies and to fructify all his wishes and purposes, and finally attain to the highest end.

55. The gods, Brahmanas, Yakshas, and all good men and Charanas always adore the virtuous but never the rich given up to the indulgence of their desires.

56 The gods are truly pleased with you since your mind is devoted to virtue. In riches there may be a very little happiness but in virtue the extent of happiness is very great"

CHAPTER CCLXXII.

Yudhishthira said:—

1. "Of all sorts of sacrifices, all of which, of course, are said to have but one object, tell me, O grandfather, what that sacrifice is which has been ordained for only the sake of virtue and not for the acquisition of either heaven or riches."

Bhishma said:—

2 'Regarding it I shall relate to you the history, formerly recited by Narada, of a Brahmana who for celebrating sacrifices, lived like a beggar.

Narada said.—

3 In one of the foremost of kingdoms that was known for virtue, there lived a Brahmana Devoted to penances and living like a wretched beggar, that Brahmana was earnestly engaged in worshipping Vishnu in sacrifices.

4 He had Shyamaka for his food, as also Suryaparni and Suvarchala and other kinds of potherbs that were bitter and distasteful For his penances, all these tasted sweet.

5 Not injuring any creature, and leading the life of a forest recluse, he acquired ascetic success With roots and fruits O scorcher of foes, he used to worship Vishnu in sacrifices that were intended to bestow heaven upon him.

6—7 The Brahmana, whose name was Satya, had a wife namely Pushkaradharini. She was pure-minded and had emaciated herself by practising many austere vows. She did not, however, approve of the conduct of her husband Summoned, however, to sit by him as his wife (in a sacrifice), she feared to incur his curse and, therefore, comported herself with his conduct. The garments that covered her body consisted of the plumes of peacocks

8—10 Although reluctant she still celebrated that sacrifice at the command of her husband who had become ill. In that forest, near to the Brahmana's hermitage, lived a neighbour of his, viz, the virtuous Parnada of Shukra's race, having assumed the form of a deer. He addressed that Brahmana, whose name was Satya, in open words and said to him —You would be acting very improperly, if this sacrifice of yours were accomplished being defective in Mantras and other particulars of ritual! I, therefore, ask you to kill and cut me into pieces for making libations therewith on your sacrificial fire! Do this and becoming blameless go to heaven!

11 Then the presiding goddess of the solar disc, viz, Savitri, came to that sacrifice in her incarnate form and insisted upon that Brahmana in doing what he was desired by that deer to do The Brahmana said to that goddess, however, who thus insisted,—I shall not kill this deer who lives with me in this same neighbourhood!

12 Thus addressed by the Brahmana, the goddess Savitri desisted and entered the sacrificial fire from desire of seeing the nether world, and wishing to avoid the sight of other short-comings in that sacrifice.

13. The deer then, with joined hands, again begged of Satya for that Satya, however, embraced him in friendship and sent him away,—Go!

14 At this, the deer seemed to leave that place But after he had gone eight steps he came back and said,—Verily, do you kill me! Truly do I say, killed by you I am sure to attain to a pious end'

15 I give you (spiritual) vision. Behold the celestial Apsaras and the handsome cars of the great Gandharvas'

16. Seeing (that spectacle) for a long time, with longing eyes, and seeing the deer and thinking that living in heaven can be acquired by only slaughter, he approved (of it).

17 It was Dharma himself who had become a deer that lived in that forest for many years Dharma provided for his salvation and advised him, saying,—This (destruction of living creatures) is not according to the ordinances about Sacrifice.

18 The penances, which had been of very great measure, of that Brahmana whose mind had cherished the desire of killing the deer, diminished greatly on account of that thought itself The injuring of living creatures, therefore, is no part in sacrifice

19 Then the illustrious Dharma himself addressed that Brahmana by acting as the priest, to perform a sacrifice The Brahmana, after this, on account of his penances, attained to the same state of mind with his wife.

20 Abstention from injury is the religion which is perfect about its rewards The religion of cruelty is only so far beneficial that it leads to heaven I have described to you the religion of Truth which, indeed, is the religion of those who utter Brahma"

CHAPTER CCLXXIII.

(MOKSHADHARMA PARVA) — Continued

Yudhisthira said —

1 "By what means does a man become sinful, by what does he acquire virtue by what does he acquire renunciation and by what does he acquire Liberation'

Bhishma said —

2 'You know all duties This question which you have put to me is only for confirmation of your conclusions Listen now fully to Liberation, and Renunciation, and Sin, and Virtue

3 Perceiving any one of the five objects desire runs after it at first Indeed obtaining them within the pale of the senses, O foremost of Bharata's family, desire or hatred originates

4 One then for the sake of that object tries and begins acts that require much labour One tries his best for enjoying again and again those forms and scents that appear very sweet

5 Gradually attachment hatred greed and errors of judgment originate

6 The mind of one possessed by greed and mistake and affected by attachment and hatred is never bent to virtue One then begins with hypocrisy to do deeds which are good he thinks sinfully, speaks sinfully, and acts sinfully.

10 When he clearly begins to commit sin, the good notice his wickedness "Those, however, who are sinfully disposed contract friendship with him

11. He cannot acquire happiness even here Whence then would he succeed in acquiring happiness hereafter? It is thus that one becomes sinful Listen now to me as I describe to you one who is righteous

12 Such a man, seeking, as he does, the well being of others, succeeds in acquiring good for himself By doing duties which are fraught with other people's well-being, he attains at last to a highly agreeable end

13—14 He who, helped by his wisdom, succeeds beforehand seeing the faults referred to above, who is skilled in determining what is happiness and what is sorrow and how each is engendered and who waits respectfully upon the good makes progress in acquiring virtue, both on account of his habit and such companionship of the good The mind of such a person finds pleasure in virtue, and he lives on, making virtue his stay

15 If he wishes to acquire riches, he wishes only such wealth as may be gained in righteous ways

16 In fact he waters the roots of only those objects in which he sees merit Thus does one become righteous and make friends with the good

17—18 On account of his acquisition of friends of riches, and of children, he sports happily both here and hereafter The mastery that a living being acquires over sound touch, taste, form, and scent, O Bharata, represents the fruit of virtue. Remember this Having acquired the fruit of virtue, O Yudhishthira, such a man does not yield to joy.

19—20 Without being satisfied with such fruits of virtue he follows Renuncia-

22. Gradually renouncing all sinful deeds he follows Renunciation, and becoming righteous souled succeeds at last in acquiring Liberation.

23 I have now told you, O Son, of that about which you had asked me, viz, the topics of Sin, Righteousness, Renunciation, and Liberation, O Bharata.

24 You should, therefore, O Yudhishthira, follow virtue under all circumstances Eternal is the success, O son of Kunti, of you who follow righteousness"

CHAPTER CCLXXIV.

(MOKSHADHARMA PARVA)—Continued.

Yudhishthira said:—

1 "You have said O grand father, that Liberation is to be acquired by means and not otherwise I wish to hear duly what those means are"

Bhishma said —

2 'O you of great wisdom this enquiry which you have made me and which is connected with a subtle topic, is really worthy of you, since you, O sinless one, always try to accomplish all your objects by the application of means

3 That state of mind which one feels when he makes an earthen jar for his use, disappears after the jar has been completed. Likewise, that cause which makes persons who regard virtue as the root of advancement and prosperity ceases to act with them who seek to acquire Liberation.

4 That path which leads to the Eastern Ocean is not the path by which one can go to the Western Ocean There is only one path which leads to Liberation Listen to me as I describe it to you in detail

5 One should, by practising forgiveness, root out anger and by renouncing all purposes, root out desire By practising the quality of goodness one should conquer sleep.

6—7 By carefulness one should keep off fear, and by contemplation of the Soul one should conquer vital airs One should remove by patience desire, hatred, and lust, and error, ignorance, and doubt, by study of truth By pursuit of knowledge one should avoid inquiry after uninteresting things

8. By frugal and easily digestible food one should dispell all disorders and diseases By contentment one should remove greed and stupefaction of judgment and all earthly concerns should be avoided by a knowledge of the truth.

9 By practising benevolence one should conquer sin, and by regard for all creatures one should gain virtue One should avoid expectation by thinking that it is connected with the future, and one should renounce riches by abandoning desire itself.

10. The intelligent man should cast off affection by thinking that everything is fickle He should control hunger by practising Yoga By practising benevolence one should keep off all ideas of ego, and remove all sorts of craving by adopting contentment

11. By exertion one should subdue procrastination, by certainty all kinds of doubt, by taciturnity loquaciousness, and by courage every sort of fear.

12 Speech and mind are to be controlled by the Understanding, and the Understanding, in its turn, by the eye of knowledge Knowledge, again, is to be controlled by the knowledge of the Soul, and finally the Soul is to be controlled by the Soul

13 This last is acquired by those who are of pure acts and endued with tranquility of soul, the means being the subjugation of those five obstacles of Yoga of which the learned speak

14—15 By renouncing desire, anger covetousness, fear and sleep, one should controlling speech, practise the observances favorable to Yoga, viz, contemplation, study, gift, truth, modesty, candour, forgiveness, purity of heart, purity of food, and the subjugation of the senses.

16 By these one's energy is increased sins are removed, wishes crowned with success, and knowledge gained.

17 When one becomes purged of sins and possessed of energy and abstemious in diet and the master of his senses, one then, having conquered both desire and anger, seeks to attain to Brahma.

18—19 The avoidance of ignorance, the absence of attachment, freedom from desire and anger, the power that is acquired by Yoga, the absence of pride and haughtiness, freedom from anxiety, absence of attachment to anything like home and family —these form the path of Liberation That path is delightful, stainless and pure Likewise, the control of speech of body, and of mind, when practised from the absence of desire, forms also the path of Liberation "

CHAPTER CCLXXV.

(MOKSHADHARMA PARVA).—Continued.

Bhishma said:—

1. "Regarding it is cited the old discourse that took place between Narada, and Asita-Devala

2 Once on a time Narada, seeing that foremost of intelligent men, viz, Devala of venerable years, seated at his ease, asked him about the origin and the destruction of all creatures.

Narada said:—

3 Whence, O Brahmana, has this universe, consisting of mobile and immobile objects, been created? When, again, the all embracing destruction sets in, into whom does it merge? Let your learned self describe this to me.

Asita said —

4 Those from which the Supreme Self, when the time comes, actuated by the desire of existence in various forms, creates all creatures, are said by persons conversant with objects to be the five essential principle.

5 Time moved by the Understanding, creates other objects from them He who says that there is anything else save these, says the untruth

6 Know, O Narada that these five are eternal indestructible, and without beginning and without end With Kala as their sixth these five essential ingredients are naturally possessed of great power.

7 Water, Ether, Earth, Air, and Fire,—these are those five principal elements Forsooth, there is nothing higher or superior to these

8 The existence of nothing else can be inferred by any one agreeably to the conclusions of the Shrutis or arguments drawn from reason If any one does hold the existence of anything else, then his assertion would in sooth, be useless Know that these six form all others That of which are all these is called non existent

9 These five, and Kala (or Jiva), the effects of past acts, and Ignorance,—these eight eternal essences are the causes of the birth and destruction of all creatures.

10 When creatures are destroyed it is into these that they merge, and when they are born, it is again from them that they do so Indeed, after destruction, a creature resolves itself into those five elements

11. His body is made of earth, his ear is made of ether, his eye has light for its cause, his life is of air, and his blood is of water.

12 The two eyes, the nose, the two ears the skin, and the tongue, are the senses These, the learned hold, exist for perception of their various objects

13 Seeing, hearing smelling, touching, and tasting are the actions of the senses. The five senses, are connected with five objects in five ways Know, by the inference of reason, their similitude of attributes.

14 Form, scent, taste touch, and sound, are the five properties that are perceived by the five senses in five different ways

15 These five properties, viz, form, scent, taste, touch, and sound, are not really perceived by the senses, but it is the Soul that apprehends them through the senses.

16 That which is called Faculty is superior to all the senses Superior to Faculty is Mind Superior to Mind is Understanding and superior to Understanding is Soul.

17 At first a living creature perceives various objects through the senses With Mind he reflects over them, and then with the help of Understanding, he arrives at certainty of knowledge Endued with Understanding one arrives at certainty of conclusions regarding objects perceived through the senses.

18 The five senses, Faculty, Mind, and Understanding —these are regarded as organs of knowledge by those conversant with the spiritual science

19 The hands the feet, the anus, the membrum virile, the mouth, form the five organs of actions.

20 The mouth is spoken of as an organ of action because it contains the instrument of speech, and that of eating The feet are organs of locomotion and the hands for doing various sorts of work.

21 The anus and the membrum virile are two organs which exist for evacuation. The first is for evacuation of stools the second for that of urine as also of the semen when one feels the influence of desire.

22. Besides these, there is a sixth organ of action It is called muscle. These then are the names of the six organs of action according to the books written on the subject I have now described to you the names of all the organs of knowledge and of action, and all the attributes of the five elements

23 When on account of the organs being fatigued, they cease to discharge their respective functions, the owner of those organs, their action being suspended is said to sleep

24 If when the action of these organs is stopped, the action of the mind, does not cease, but on the other hand the mind continues to act, that state of Consciousness is called Dream.

25 During wakefulness there are three states of the mind viz, that connected with Goodness, that with Darkness, and that with Ignorance. In dream also the mind is connected with the same three states Those very states, when they appear in dreams, connected with pleasurable actions, are spoken highly of.

26—27 Happiness, success, knowledge, and absence of attachment are the marks of the quality of Goodness Whatever states are experienced by living creatures as shown in acts, during their hours of wakefulness, reappear in memory during their hours of sleep when they dream The passage of our ideas as they exist during wakefulness into those of dreams, and that of ideas as they exist in dreams into those of wakefulness, become directly perceptible in that state of consciousness which is called dreamless sleep. That is eternal, and that is desirable.

28 There are five organs of knowledge, and five of action, with muscular power, mind, understanding, and faculty, and with also the three qualities of goodness, darkness and ignorance, the number, it has been said comes up to seventeen The eighteenth in the calculation is he who owns the body. Indeed, he who lives in this body is eternal

29 All those seventeen (with Avidya or nescience as eighteenth) living in the body, exist attached to him who owns the body. When the owner disappears from the body those eighteen cease to live together in the body.

30 Or, this body made up of the five principal elements only a combination The eighteen attributes, with him that owns the body, and counting stomachic heat numbering twentieth, form that which is known as the Combination of the Five.

31. There is a Being called Mahat (principle of greatness) which, with the help of the wind (called Prana), keeps up this combination containing the twenty things that have been named and in the matter of the destruction of that body the wind is only the instrument in the hands of that same Mahat.

32 Whatever creature is born is resolved once more into the five principal elements upon the exhaustion of his merits and demerits; and moved again by the merits and demerits acquired in that life enters into another body resulting from his deeds

33 His habitation always resulting from nescience, desire, and acts, he migrates from body to body, leaving off one after another repeatedly, urged on by Time, like a person leaving house after in succession.

34 The wise, gifted with certainty of knowledge, do not yield to grief upon seeing this Only the foolish, erroneously supposing relationships indulge in grief on seeing such changes of habitation.

35. This individual soul is no one's relation, there is none again that may be said to belong to him He is always alone, and he is himself the creator of his own body and his own happiness and misery.

36 This individual is never born, nor does he ever die Freed from the fetters of body, he succeeds sometimes in acquiring the highest end.

37. Deprived of body, because freed through the dissipation of acts from bodies that are the outcome of merits and demerits, individual at last attains to Brahma.

38 For the dissipation of both merits and demerits, Knowledge has been described as the cause in the Sankhya school. Upon the dissipation of merit and demerit, when individual soul attains to the status of Brahma, the learned behold the attainment of individual soul to the highest end."

CHAPTER CCLXXVI

(MOKSHADHARMA PARVA) — Continued.

Yudhisthira said:—

1. "Cruel and sinful as we are, alas we have killed brothers and fathers and grandsons and relatives and friends and sons.

2 How, O grandfather, shall we remove this thirst for riches Alas, through that thirst we have committed many sinful deeds"

Bhishma said —

3 "Regarding it is cited the old narrative of what was said by the king of the Videhas to the enquiring Mandavya.

The king of the Videhas said —

4 I have nothing, yet I live in great happiness If the whole of Mithila be reduced to ashes nothing of mine will be burnt down.

5 Tangible possessions of what value they may be, are a source of sorrow to men of knowledge, while properties of even little value attract the foolish

6. Whatever happiness is in this world, owing to the gratification of desire, and whatever celestial happiness exists of high value, do not form even a sixteenth part of the felicity that accrues from the disappearance of desire.

7. As the horns of a cow grow with the groweth of the cow itself, similarly the thirst for riches multiplies with increasing acquisitions of wealth

8 The object for which one feels an attachment, becomes a source of pain to him when it is lost.

9. One should not entertain desire Attachment to desire brings on sorrow When riches have been acquired, one should devote it to virtuous purposes. One should even then relinquish desire.

10. The man of knowledge always considers other creatures like unto himself. Having purified his soul and gained sucess, he casts off everything here

11. By shaking off both truth and falsehood, grief and joy, the agreeable and disagreeable, fearlessness and fear one acquires tranquility, and becomes free from anxiety.

12. That thirst which cannot be shaken off by men of foolish understanding, which does not decrease with the decline of the body, and which is considered as a dreadful disease, one who succeeds in shaking off is sure to find happiness.

13. The virtuous man by seeing his own conduct has become bright as the moon and free from every sort of evil, succeeds in happily acquiring great fame both here and hereafter.

14 Hearing these words of the king the Brahmana became filled with joy, and speaking highly of what he heard, Mandavya followed the path of Liberation."

4 Himself a master of the religion of Liberation, the son one day asked his father who was not conversant with that religion and who was engaged in following the Vedic precepts, this question.

The son said —

5 What should an intelligent man do, O father, knowing that the life of men runs speedily away? Tell me this truly and in due order, O father, so that, guided by your instructions I may undertake the acquisition of virtue.

The father said —

6. Having read the Vedas all the while following the duties of Brahmacharyya, O son, one should then desire for children for the sake of rescuing one's departed manes. Having established his fire then and performing the sacrifices that are ordained, one should then retire into the forest and then become a hermit.

The son said.—

7. When the world is thus attacked on all sides, and when such irresistible things are falling on all sides, how can you speak so calmly?

The sire said —

8. How is the world attacked?—By what is it besieged? What are those irresistible things that are falling on all sides? Do you frighten me with your words?—

7 You think, O king, that this portion is a fault That it is not true, regarding our present subject of discussion. You, however, know virtue, and have readiness. It is certain, therefore, that you will go to the end of your sorrow in time

8 Individual with body, O king, is not the author of his merits and demerits. On the other hand, he becomes covered with the Darkness that is begotten by his merits and demerits.

9—10 As the wind (having no colour of its own) assumes the color of the substances which it has seized and tinges the different points of the horizon, similarly Individual Soul, though himself colorless, assumes a color on account of its being enveloped by Darkness and variegated by the fruits of action, and passes from body to body.

11. When Individual Soul succeeds in removing by means of Knowledge the Darkness which covers him in consequence of Ignorance, then Immutable Brahma becomes manifest.

12 The Sages say that return to Immutable Brahma cannot be attained by Acts. Yourself, others in the world, and the gods too, should respect them who have acquired Liberation All the great Rishis never desist from culture of Brahma.

13 Regarding it is cited that discourse which was recited (by Sukra) in days of old I listen, O king, with rapt attention to the course of conduct that was followed

Vishnu, He is the two Ashwins, and he is Purandara

28 He is Mitra, He is Varuna He is Yama, He is Kuvera—the lord of riches Although the Ritwijas seem to see Him as separate He is however, known to them as one and the same Know that this entire universe is under the control of One divine Being.

29 The Veda that is in the soul, O king of Daityas, regards the unity of various creatures. When a living creature realizes this unity on account of true knowledge, he is then said to attain to Brahma.

30 The period of time during which one creation exists or owing which it ceases to exist is called a Kalpa Living creatures exist for a thousand millions of such Kalpas Immobile creatures also exist for an equal time The period for which a particular creation exists is measured by many thousands of lakes, O Daitya!

31 Conceive a lake that is one Yojana in width, one Krosha in depth, and five hundred Yojanas in length. Imagine many thousands of such lakes.

32 Try then to dry up those lakes by taking from them only once a day, as much water as may be taken up with the end of a single hair The number of days that would be neccessary to drying them up perfectly by this process forms the period that is required by the life of one creation from its beginning to the time of its destruction.

33 The highest Evidence says that creatures have six colors, viz, Dark, Tawny, Blue, Red, Yellow, and White. These colors are produced by mixtures in various degrees of three qualities of Rajas Tamas, and Sattwa Where Tamas prevents Sattwa falls below the mark, and Rajas remains the same the result is the color called Dark When Tamas prevails as before, but the relations between Sattwa and Rajas, are changed the result is the color called Tawny When Rajas prevents, Sattwa goes down, and Tamas remains the same, the result is the color called Blue. When Rajas prevents as before and the proportion change between Sattwa and Tamas, the result is the intermediate color called Red That color is more agreeable When Sattwa prevents Rajas falls down and Tamas keeps on the same the result is the color called Yellow It yields happiness When Sattwa prevails and the proportion is changed between Rajas and Tamas, the result is the color called White. It yields great happiness.

34. The White is the foremost color. It is sinless on account of its being free from attachment and aversion It is without grief, and free from the exertion necessary by desire for action. Hence, White, O king of Danavas, brings on Liberation O Daitya, having undergone thousands of births derived through the womb, Individual Soul attains to success

35 That success is the same end which the divine Indra declared after having studied many sacred scriptural books and which has for its essence the apprehension of the Soul The end again that creatures obtain depends on their color, and color, in its turn, depends upon the character of the Time that sets in, O Daitya

36 The stages of existence, O Daitya, through which individual soul must pass are not unlimited They are fourteen hundreds of thousands in number In consequence of them individual soul, ascends, stays, and falls down as the case may be.

37. The end that is acquired by an individual soul of dark color is very low, for he becomes addicted to acts leading to hell and then has to rot in hell The learned say that on account of his wickedness, the continuance of an individual is measured by many thousands of Kalpas.

38 Having passed many hundred thousands of years in that stage, Individual Soul then attains to the color called Tawny. In that condition he lives in perfect helplessness At last when his sins are spent his mind, shaking off all attachments, cherishes Renunciation

39 When Individual Soul becomes endued with the quality of goodness, he then dispels everything connected with Darkness by the help of his intelligence, and exerts (for acquiring what is for his good) As the outcome of this, Individual Soul attains to the color called Red. If the quality of goodness however, be not acquired Individual Soul then travels in a round of re births in the world of men, having attained to the color called Blue.

40 Having attained to that end, and having been afflicted for the duration of one creation by the fetters of his own acts Individual Soul then attains to the color called Yellow (or becomes a Deity) Existing in that condition for the period of a hundred creations, he then leaves it to return to it once more.

41—42 Having acquired the Yellow color, Individual Soul exists for thousands of Kalpas sporting as a Deity Without, however, being emancipated, he has to live in hell, enjoying or enduring the fruits of his acts of past Kalpas and passing through nine and ten thousand courses. Know that Individual Soul then becomes freed from the hell as represented by heaven. Similarly Individual Soul escapes other births.

43—44 Individual Soul sports for many long Kalpas in the world of Devas Falling thence, he once more becomes a man. He then lives in that condition for the period of a hundred and eight Kalpas. He then attains once more to the status of a Deity If while born as a man he falls through Kala, he then sinks into the Dark color and thus occupies the very lowest of all stages of existence I shall tell you, now, O foremost of Asuras, how Individual Soul succeeds in bringing about his Liberation.

45 Desirous of Liberation, Individual Soul relying upon seven hundred kinds of acts every one of which is permeated—by a predominence of the quality of goodness, gradually passes through Red and Yellow and at last attains to White, Arrived here, Individual Soul travels through several most adorable regions which have the Eight well-known regions of felicity beneath them, and all the while follows that pure and effulgent form existence which is Liberation.

46. Know that the Eight which are identical with the Sixty hundreds, are to those who are highly effulgent, only creations of the mind The highest object of acquisition with one who is of White color, is that condition which is above the three other states of consciousness, viz. Wakefulness and Dream and Dreamless sleep.

47. As regards that Yogin who cannot renounce the joy that Yoga-power begets, he has to live (in one and the same body) for one hundred Kalpas in auspiciousness and after that in four other regions Even that is the highest end of one belonging to the sixth color, and who is Unsuccessful though crowned with Success, and who has gone above all attachments and passions.

48. That Yogin, again, who deviates from Yoga practices lives in the celestial region for a hundred Kalpas with the unspent residue of his pristine deeds, and with the seven (viz, the five senses of knowledge and mind and understanding) purged of all stains on account of their predisposition towards the quality of goodness. After that period, such a person has to come to the world of men where he acquires great eminence.

49 Returning from the world of men, he departs for attaining to new forms of life that run higher and higher in the upwards scale. While engaged in this, he passes through seven regions for seven times, his power being always multiplied on account of his mental concentration and the re-awakening from it.

50. The Yogin who wishes for final Liberation suppresses by Yoga knowledge the seven, and continues to live in the world of life, shorn of attachments, and taking those seven for certain means of grief, he renounces them and attains afterwards to that state which is Indestructible and Infinite Some, say that that is the region of Mahadeva, some of Vishnu; some, of Brahman, some, of Cesha, some, of Nara; some, of the effulgent Intelligence, and some, of the All pervading.

51. When universal dissolution sets in, those persons who have succeeded in completely destroying by Knowledge their gross and subtle and casual bodies, always enter into Brahma. All their Senses also which have action for their essence and which are not at one with Brahma, merge into the same.

52 When the time of universal dissolution sets in, those Individual Souls who have acquired the position of Devas and who have an unspent residue of the fruits of acts to enjoy or endure, return to those stages of life in the subsequent Kalpa which had been theirs in the pristine one. This is owing to the likeness of every successive Kalpa to every previous one.

53. Those again whose acts, at the time of universal dissolution, have been exhausted by enjoyment or endurance of their fruits, descending from heaven, are born among men, in the subsequent Kalpa, for without Knowledge one cannot dissipate his acts in even a hundred Kalpas All superior Being again, gifted with similar powers and similar forms, revert to their respective destines at a new creation after a universal dissolution, ascending and descending precisely in the same way as during the creation that is dissolved.

54 As regards, again, the person who knows Brahma, as long as he continues to enjoy and endure the unspent residue of his deeds of pristine Kalpas, it is said that all creatures and the two pure sciences live in his body. When his Intelligence becomes purified by Yoga, and when he practises restraint, this perceptible universe appears to him as only his own fivefold senses.

55 Enquiring with a purified mind, individual soul attains to a high and pure end. Thence he attains to a spot which knows no destruction, and thence attains to eternal Brahma which is so difficult of acquisition.

56 Thus, O you of great power I have described to you the greatness of Narayana.

Vritra said.—

57 I see, these your words are perfectly consonant with the truth When this is so, I have no grief. Having heard your words, O you of great mental powers, I have become freed from sorrow and sin of every sort 58 O illustrious Rishi O holy one, I see this wheel of Time, endued with great energy, of the most effulgent and Infinite Vishnu, has been set in motion Eternal is that station from which all sorts of creation originate That Vishnu is the Supreme Soul He is the foremost of Beings. In Him this entire universe lives.

Bhishma continued —

59 Having said these words O son of Kunti, Vritra renounced his life breaths, uniting his soul (with the Supreme Soul), and attained to the highest station.

Yudhisthira said —

60. "Tell me, O grandfather whether this Janarddana (Krishna) is that illustrious and powerful Lord of whom Sanatkumara spoke to Vritra in days of yore"

Bhishma said —

61. "The Highest Deity, gifted with six attributes is at the Root Staying there, the Supreme Soul, with his own energy, creates all these various existent things.

62 Know that this Keshava who knows no decay is from His eighth part Gifted with the greatest Intelligence, it is this Keshava who creates the three worlds with an eighth portion

63. Coming immediately after Him who lies at the Bottom, this Keshava who is eternal, changes at the end of each Kalpa, He, however, who lies at the Root and who is gifted with great might and power lies in the waters when universal dissolution sets in Keshva is that Creator of pure Soul who passes through all the eternal worlds

64. Infinite and Eternal as He is, He fills all space and passes through the universe Freed as He is from all limitations such as the possession of attributes would imply, he allows himself to be invested with ignorance and awakened to Consciousness, Keshava of Supreme Soul creates all things. In Him rests this wonderful universe fully."

Yudhisthira said —

65 "O who are conversant with the highest object of knowledge! I think that Vritra beheld beforehand the excellent end that awaited him It is for this, O grandfather, that he was happy and did not succumb to grief.

66 He who is of White color, who has taken birth in a pure or stainless family, and who has attained to the rank of a Saddhya, does not, O sinless one, return. Such a person, O grandfather, is freed from both hell and all intermediate stations.

67 He, however, O king, who has acquired either the Yellow or the Red color, is seen sometimes to be overwhelmed by darkness and fall among the order of Intermediate creatures

68 As regards ourselves, we are greatly afflicted and attached to objects which produce sorrow Alas what will be our end? Will it be the Blue or the Dark which is the lowest of all colors."

Bhishma said.—

69 "Ye are Pandavas! you have been born in a stainless family You are of rigid vows Having sported happily in the celestial regions, you shall return to the world of men.

70 Living happily as long as the creation lasts all of you at the next new creation will be admitted among the gods, and enjoying all sorts of happiness you will at last be coloured among the Siddhyas! Let no fear be yours. Be you cheerful"

CHAPTER CCLXXXI.

(MOKSHADHARMA PARVA) — Continued.

Yudhishthira said.—

1 "How great was the love of virtue possessed by Vritra of incomparable energy, whose knowledge was incomparable and whose devotion to Vishnu was so great.

2. The position occupied by Vishnu of immeasurable energy is difficult, of being perceived How, O foremost of kings, could Vritra comprehend it?

3 You have described Vritra's acts I too have heard you in full faith. Because, on account of my seeing that one point is unintelligible that my curiosity has been roused for asking you again.

4. How, indeed, was Vritra, who was virtuous, devoted to Vishnu, gifted with knowledge of truth derivable from a just comprehension of the Upanishads and Vedanta, defeated by Indra, O foremost of men.

5. O king of the Bharatas, remove this my doubt! Indeed, tell me, O foremost of kings, how Vritra was defeated by Shakra.

6 O grandfather, O you of mighty arms, tell me fully how the battle took place. Great is my curiosity to hear it."

Bhishma said :—

7. "In days of yore, Indra, accompanied by the celestial army, proceeded on his car, and saw the Asura Vritra stationed before him like a mountain.

8. He was full five hundred Yojanas in height, O chastiser of enemies and three hundred Yojanas in circumference.

9. Seeing that form of Vritra, which was incapable of being defeated by the three worlds united together, the celestials became stricken with fear and full of anxiety.

10. Indeed, suddenly beholding that huge form of his enemy, O king, Indra was paralysed in the lower extremities.

11. Then, on the eve of that great battle between the gods and the demons, there arose loud peals from both sides, and drums and other musical instruments were beaten and blown.

12. Seeing Indra stationed before him, O you of Kuru's race, Vritra felt neither awe nor fear, nor was he disposed to collect all his energies for the battle.

13. Then the battle took place filling the three worlds with fear, between Indra the king of the gods and Vritra of great energy.

14—15 The entire sky was covered by the warriors of both sides with swords, axes, lances, darts, spears and heavy clubs and rocks of various sizes and bows of loud sound and various sorts of celestial weapons and fires and burning brands.

16—17 All the deities led by the Grandfather, and all the highly blessed Rishis, came to see the battle, on their best of cars; and the Siddhas, also, O foremost of Bharata's family, and the Gandharvas, with the Apsaras, on their own beautiful and foremost of cars, came there.

18. Then Vritra, that foremost of virtuous persons, speedily overwhelmed the sky and the king of gods with a thick shower of rocks.

19. Thereat, filled with ire the celestials dispelled with their showers of arrows that thick down-pour of rocks showered by Vritra in battle.

20. Then Vritra, O foremost of Kurus, endued with mighty strength and large powers of illusion, stupefied the king of illusion.

21. When the god of a hundred sacrifices, thus afflicted by Vritra, was possessed by stupefaction, the sage Vashishtha restored him to his senses by chanting Samans.

Vashishtha said :—

22. You are the foremost of the gods, O chief of the gods, O destroyer of Daityas and Asuras! The strength of the three worlds lies in you! Why, then, O Shakra, do you languish so!

23 See, there are Brahma and Vishnu, and Shiva, that lord of the universe, the illustrious and divine Soma, and all the great Rishis.

24 Do not, O Indra, yield to weakness, like an ordinary mortal! Firmly determined on battle, kill your enemies, O king of the gods.

25. There, that lord of all the worlds, viz, the Three eyed (Shiva), worshipped of all the worlds, is seeing you! Shake off this stupefaction, O king of the gods.

26 There, those twice-born Rishis, headed by Vrihaspati, are lauding you for your victory, in celestial hymns.

Bhishma said :—

27. While the highly energetic Vasava was thus being restored to senses by the great Vashishtha, his strength became greatly increased.

28 The illustrious punisher of Paka then, depending upon his intelligence, had recourse to high Yoga and with its help removed these illusions of Vritra.

29 Then Vrihaspati, the son of Angiras, and those greatest of Rishis endued with great prosperity, seeing the prowess of Vritra, went to Mahadeva, and moved by the desire of benefiting the three worlds, urged him to kill the great Asura.

30. The energy of that illustrious lord of the universe thereupon assumed the nature of a fierce fever and entered the body of Vritra the lord of Asuras.

31. The illustrious and divine Vishnu, worshipped of all the worlds, bent upon protecting the universe, entered the thunderbolt of Indra.

32—33 Then the highly intelligent Vrihaspati and Vashishtha of great energy and all the other foremost of Rishis, going to the God of hundred sacrifices, viz, the boon giving Vasava, the worshipped of all the worlds, said to him kill forthwith Vritra, O powerful one.

Maheshwara said —

34 There, O Shakra, stands the great Vritra, accompanied by a great army He is the soul of the universe, capable of going everywhere, gifted with great powers of illusion, and highly illustrious.

35 This foremost of Asuras is, therefore incapable of being defeated by even the three worlds in a body Helped by Yoga, do you kill him, O king of the celestials. Do not neglect him

36—37 O king of the celestials, Vritra had practised, for full sixty thousand years the severest penances for acquiring strength Brahma gave him the boons he had prayed for, viz, the greatness that belongs to Yogins, large powers of illusion, enough of might, and superabundant energy.

38. I give you my energy, O Vasava! The Danava has now lost his coolness Do you, therefore, kill him now with your thunderbolt.

Shakra said:—

39 Before your eyes, O foremost of gods I shall, through your favour kill with my thunderbold this invincible son of Diti

Bhishma said:—

40. When the great Asura or Daitya was possessed by that fever, the gods and the Rishis, filled with joy, sent up loud cheers.

41. At the same time drums, and conchs of loud blare, and kettle-drums and tabors in thousands began to beat and blow

42. Suddenly all the Asuras lost in a body their memory. At that moment their powers of illusion, also, disappeared.

43 Knowing the enemy to be thus possessed, the Rishis and gods lauded both Shakra and Ishana, and began to urge the former.

44. The form that Indra assumed on the eve of the battle, while seated on his car and while his praises were being lauded by the Rishis, became such that none could look at it without dread.

CHAPTER CCLXXXII.

(MOKSHADHRAMA PARVA) — Continued.

Bhishma said:—

1. Hear me, O king, I describe the symptoms that appeared on the body of Vritra when he was possessed by that fever.

2 The heroic Asura's mouth began to send out flames of fire He became greatly pale His body began to tremble all over. His breath became hard.

4 Vultures, Kankas, and cranes yelled fierce cries, as they moved over Vritra's head

5 Then, in that battle, Indra, worshipped of the gods, and armed with the thunderbolt, looked hard at the demon as the latter sat on his car

6 Possessed by that dreadful fever, the powerful Asura, O king, yawned and uttered inhuman cries

7 While the Asura was yawning, Indra discharged his thunderbolt at him Endued with great energy and resembling the fire that destroys the creation at the end of the cycle that thunderbolt overthrew in a moment Vritra of gigantic form

8 The gods on all sides cried aloud when they saw Vritra killed, O foremost of Bharata's race.

9 Having killed Vritra, Maghavat, that enemy of the Danavas, of great entered heaven with (t)hat thunderbolt pervaded by Vishnu.

10 Just then, O you of Kuru's family, the sin of Brahmanicide, fierce and dreadful and striking all the worlds with fear, came out of the person of the killed Vritra.

11—13 Of terrible teeth and dreadful countenance, hideous for ugliness, and dark and tawny, with hair dishevelled, and dreadful eyes, O Bharata, with a garland of skulls round her neck, and looking like Incantation incarnate, O foremost of Bharatas, bathed in blood, and clad in rags and barks of trees, O you of righteous soul, she came out of Vritra's body. Of such dreadful form and countenance, O king, she sought the holder of the thunderbolt.

14 A little while after, O you of Kuru's race, the killer of Vritra, for the behoof of the three worlds, was proceeding towards heaven.

15 Seeing Indra of great energy thus proceeding on his mission, she caught the king of the gods and from that moment stuck to him.

16 When the sin of Brahmanicide thus stuck to his body and filled him with terror, Indra entered the fibres of a lotus-stalk and lived there for many years.

17 But the sin of Brahmanicide followed him closely. Indeed O son of Kuru, seized by her, Indra became shorn of all his energies.

18 He tried much for driving her from him, but all those attempts proved useless.

19 Seized by her, O foremost of Bharata's race, the king of the gods at last presented himself before the Grandfather and adored him by bending low his head.

20. Knowing that Indra was possessed by the sin of Brahmanicide, Brahman began to think, O best of the Bharatas, (of the measures for freeing him).

21—22. The Grandfather at last, O you of great arms, addressed Brahmanicide in sweet words as if from the desire of pacifying her, and said —O amiable one, let the king of the gods, who is a favorite of mine, be freed from you Tell me, what shall I do for you? What wish of yours shall I satisfy?

Brahmanicido said —

23 When the Creator of the three worlds, when the illustrious god worshipped of the universe, has been pleased with me, I consider my wishes as already fulfilled. Let my residence be now fixed.

24 Desirous of preserving the worlds, this rule had been laid down by you It was you, O lord, who had introduced this important rule.

25 As you have been pleased with me O righteous Lord, O powerful Master of all the worlds, I shall surely leave Shakra! But grant me an abode to live in.

Bhishma said:—

26 The Grandfather replied to Brahmanicide, saying,—So be it"—Indeed, the Grandfather found out means for removing Brahmanicide from the body of Indra.

27—28. The Self sprung thought of the great Agni. The latter immediately appeared before Brahman and said —O illustrious and divine Lord, O destroyer one, I have appeared before you. You should say what I shall have to do.

Brahman said.—

29 I shall divide this sin of Brahmanicide into several parts For freeing Shakra from her, do you take a fourth portion of that sin.

Agni said:—

30 How shall I be saved from her, O Brahman? O powerful Lord, do you appoint the way. I wish to know the means fully, O worshipped of all the worlds.

Brahman said —

31—32 That portion of Brahmanicide which you will take upon yourself shall immediately enter into, and leaving you shall live in, that man who, overwhelmed by the quality of darkness, will abstain from offering you as an oblation, when he sees you in your blazing form seeds, herbs, and juices. O carrier of oblations, let the fever of your heart be dispelled.

Bhishma said —

33 Thus addressed by the Grandfather, the eater of oblations and sacrificial offerings accepted his order. A fourth of that sin then entered his body, O king.

34. The Grandfather then summoned the trees, the herbs, and all sorts of grass to him, and begged them to take upon themselves a fourth of that sin.

35—36 Addressed by him, the trees and herbs and grasses became as much moved as Agni had been at the command and they replied to the Grandfather, saying, How shall we, O Grandfather of all the worlds, be ourselves saved from this sin? You should not afflict us that have already been assailed by the fates.

37. O god, we have always to bear heat and cold and the showers driven by the winds, besides the cutting and tearing.

38. We are willing, O Lord of the three worlds, to take at your order this sin of Brahmanicide. May you point out the means of our rescue.

Brahman said:—

39 This sin that you shall take, shall assail the man who through stupefaction of judgment will cut or tear any of you on a full-moon day.

Bhisma said —

40. Thus addressed by the great Brahman, the trees, herbs and grasses worshipped the Creator and then went away without making there.

41—42 The Grandfather of all the worlds then sent for the Apsaras and pleasing them with sweet words, O Bharata, said—This foremost of ladies, viz, Bramanicide, has come out of Indra's body. Begged by me, do you take a fourth part of her into your own body.

The Apsaras said:—

43 O Lord of all the gods, at your command we are fully willing to take a portion of this sin But, O Grandfather, our compact is that you do think of the means by which we ourselves may be rescued from this.

Brahman said —

44 Let the fever of your hearts be removed. The portion of this sin that you will take upon yourselves shall leave you and immediately possess that man who will seek cohabitation with women in their menses.

Bhishma said:—

45 Thus addressed by the Grandfather, O foremost of Bharata's race the various clans of the Apsaras, with delighted hearts repaired to their respective places and began to sport in joy

46 The illustrious Creator of the three worlds, gifted with great ascetic merit, then thought of the Waters which immediately came to him.

47—48 Arrived before Brahman of great energy, the Waters bowed to him and said —We have come before you O chastiser of enemies, at your behest! O powerful Master of all the worlds, tell us what we are to do.

Brahman said —

49 This dreadful sin has possessed Indra on account of his having killed Vritra. Take you a fourth part of Brahmanicide.

The Waters said —

50 Let it be as you order O master of all the worlds You should, however, O powerful Lord of ours, concert the means by which we may be rescued from this.

51 You are the Lord of all the gods, and the supreme refuge of the universe Who else is there whom we may worship so that he may save us from distress.

Brahman said —

52—53 This one shall forthwith go to And henceforth I will in that man who stupefied by his understanding and regarding you lightly will throw into you phlegm and urine and excreta It is this, verily do I say to you, that your rescue shall be brought about

Bhishma said —

54 Then leaving the king of the deities, the sin of Brahmanicide, O Yudhishthira, proceeded to the abodes that were settled for her at the Grandfather's behest

55 It was thus, O king, that Indra had become attacked by that dreadful sin With the Grandfather's permission Indra then resolved to celebrate a Horse sacrifice.

56 We have heard, O king, that Indra having been thus possessed by the sin of Brahmanicide afterwards became cleansed of her through that Sacrifice

57. Regaining his prosperity and killing thousands of enemies that Vasava acquired great joy, O lord of Earth

58 From the blood of Vritra, O son of Pritha, were born high crested cocks. Therefore, those fowls are unclean (as food) for the twice born ones, and those ascetics that have undergone the rite of initiation.

59 Under all circumstances, O king, do you encompass what is agreeable to the twice born, for these, O king, are known as gods on Earth.

60 It was thus, O Kuru chief that the powerful Asura Vritra was killed by Shakra of great energy by the help of subtle intelligence and through the application of means.

61 You will, also, O son of Kunti unvanquished on Earth, become another Indra and the killer of all your enemies.

62 Those men who, on every Parva day, will recite this sacred narrative of Vritra in the midst of Brahmanas shall never be sullied by any sin

63 I have now recited to you one of the greatest and most wonderful feats of Indra about Vritra. What else do you wish to hear?"

CHAPTER CCLXXXIII.

(MOKSHADHARMA PARVA) — Continued.

Yudhishthira said:—

1 "O grandfather you are endued with great wisdom and thoroughly versed in every branch of learning. From this very narrative of the destruction of Vritra the wish has arisen in my mind to ask you a question.

2 You have said, O king, that Vritra was stupefied by Fever, and that then, O sinless one, he was killed by Vasava with the thunderbolt.

3 How did this Fever, O you of great wisdom, originate, O lord, I wish to hear fully of the origin of Fever."

Bhisma said —

4 "Listen, O king, to the origin known all over the world, of Fever! I shall describe fully this topic, fully explaining how Fever first came into existence, O Bharata.

5 In days of yore, O king, there was a summit, named Savitri, of the mountains of Meru. Adored of all the worlds, it was endued with great effulgence and adorned with every sort of jewels and gems.

6 That summit was immeasurable in extent and no one could go there On that mountain summit the divine Mahadeva used to sit shiningly as if on a bed stead adorned with gold.

7—11. Sitting by his side, the daughter of the king of mountains shone in brilliance. The great gods, the Vasus of immeasurable energy, the great Ashwins, those foremost of physicians, and king Vaishravana attended by many a Guhyaka, —that king of the Yakshas, endued with prosperity and power, and having his abode on the summit of Kailasa,—all waited upon the great Mahadeva. And the great sage Ushanas, and the foremost of Rishis headed by Sanatkumara, and the other celestial Rishis headed by Angiras, and the Gandharva Vishwavasu, and Narada and Parvata, and the various clans of Apsaras, all came there to wait upon the king of the universe

12 A pure and auspicious air carrying various sorts of perfumes, blew there The trees that stood there were adorned with the flowers of all seasons

13 A large number of Vidyadharas, Siddhas and ascetics, too, O Bharata, went there for waiting upon Mahadeva, that Lord of all creatures

14-15 Many ghosts also, of various forms and aspects, and many fearful Rakshasas and powerful Pishachas, of various forms, mad with joy, and armed with various sorts of uplifted weapons, forming the train of Mahadeva, were there, every one of whom looked like a blazing fire in energy.

16 The illustrious Nandi stood there obeying the great god, shining with his own energy and armed with a lance that resembled a flame of fire.

17. Ganga, also, that foremost of all Rivers and originating from all sacred waters in the universe, waited there in her embodied form, O son of Kuru, upon that illustrious gods.

18 Thus worshipped by the celestial Rishis and the gods, the illustrious Mahadeva of great energy lived on that summit of Meru

19 After sometime had gone away, the Prajapati Daksha began to celebrate a sacrifice according to ancient rites.

20 All the gods in a body headed by Sakra, resolved to repair to that sacrifice of Daksha.

21. We have heard that the great gods ordered by Mahadeva, mounted their celestial cars resembling the fire or the Sun in sheen, and proceeded to that spot whence the Ganges is said to issue.

22—23 Seeing the deities depart, the excellent daughter of the king of mountains, addressed her divine husband, viz, the Lord of all creatures, and said, O illustrious one, who are those gods headed by Shakra going? O you who know the truth, tell me truly, for a great doubt has possessed my mind.

Maheshwara said —

24 O highly blessed lady, the excellent Prajapati Daksha is worshipping the gods in a Horse Sacrifice! These dwellers of heaven are going there.

Uma said.—

25 Why, O Mahadeva do you not go to that Sacrifice? What objection is there of your going to that place?

Maheshwara said —

26 O highly blessed lady, the gods in days of yore made a compact by virtue of which no share was allotted to me of offerings in all Sacrifices.

27. According to that arrangement, O fair one, the gods do not give me, following the old custom, any share of the sacrificial offerings!

Uma said :—

28. O illustrious one, among all gods, you are the foremost in prowess In merit, in energy, in fame, and in prosperity you are second to none, and you are, indeed, superior to all.

29 On account however, of this disability regarding a share I am filled with great grief, O sinless one, and a tremour fills me from head to foot.

Bhishma said —

30 Having said these words to her nsort, the Lord of all creatures O onarch, the goddess Parvati remained ent, her heart burning the while in grief

31 Then understanding what was in er heart and what her thoughts were (for ıping off that disgrace) Mahadeva adressed Nandi, saying,—Wait here

32—34 Summoning all his Yoga powers ıat Lord of all lords of Yoga, that god f gods, that holder of Pinaka, possessed l great energy, quickly proceeded to the lace accompanied by all his dreadful ollowers and destroyed that Sacrifice Of l ese followers of his some yelled, and ome laughed terribly, and some O king, xtinguished the fires with blood, and ome having dreadful faces pulling up the acrificial stakes, began to whirl them Others began to devour those that were elebrating the Sacrifice

35 Then thus afflicted on every side, hat Sacrifice, assumed the form of a deer ınd tried to fly away through the firmanent

36 Learning that the Sacrifice was unning away in that form the powerful Mahadeva began to pursue him with bow and arrow

37 On account of the ire which then filled the heart of that foremost of all gods possessed of matchless energy, a dreadful drop of sweat appeared on his forehead

38 When that drop of sweat fell down on the Earth, there immediately appeared a blazing fire resembling the conflagration that appears at the end of the cycle

39 From that fire came out a dreadful be ıg O king of very short stature, having blood red eyes and a green beard

40 His body was covered all over with hair like a hawk s or an owl's and his hair stood erect Of dreadful form his complexion was dark and his dress blood red Like a fire burning a heap of dry grass or straw, that Being of high energy speedily consu ned the embodied form of Sacrifice

41 Having performed that feat, he then rushed towards the gods and the Rishis that had gathered there The gods filled with fear, fled on all sides.

42 The earth shook with that Being's tread, O king

43 Exclamation of 'Oh' and 'Alas' arose throughout the universe. Marking this, the powerful Grandfather, appearing before Mahadeva, addressed him thus.

Brahman said —

44 O powerful one, the deities will henceforth give you a share of the sacrificial offerings I O Lord of all the gods, let this anger of yours be withdrawn by you

45 O scorcher of enemies, there, those gods, and the Rishis, on account of your anger O Mahadeva, have become greatly ag tated

46 This Being, also, that has originated from your sweat, O foremost of gods, shall walk among creatures O righteous souled one, under the name of Fever.

47 O powerful one, if the energy of this Being remains intact then the entire Earth herself will not be able to bear him Let him, therefore be divided into many parts

48 When Brahman had said these words, and when his proper share was appointed of the sacrificial offerings Mahadeva replied to the Grandfather of great energy, saying,—So be it

49 Indeed, the holder of Pinaka, viz, Bhava, smiled and became filled with joy. And he accepted the share that the Grandfather settled the offerings in sacrifices

50 Knowing the constituents of everything, Mahadeva then divided Fever into many parts, for the peace of all creatures Listen, O son, as how he did this.

51—53 The heat in the heads of elephants, the bitumen of mountains the moss that floats on water, the slough of snakes the sores that appear in the hoofs of bulls, the barren tracts of Earth full of saline matter the dulness of vision of all animals the diseases in the throats of horses, the crests appearing on the heads of peacocks, the eye disease of the koel, each of these was named Fever by the great Mahadeva

54 This is what we have heard The liver disease also of sheep and the hiccup of parrots are also known as forms of Fever To this must be added the toil that tigers suffer, for that also O righteous king, is known as a form of Fever.

55 Besides these O Bharata, amongst men, Fever, enters all bodies at the time of birth, of death, and on other occasions.

56 This Fever is known to be the dreadful power of Maheshwara. He has authority over all creatures and should, therefore, be respected and adored by all

57 It was by him that Vritra, that foremost of virtuous persons, was possessed when he yawned It was then that Shakra discharged his thunderbolt at him

58 The thunderbolt entering the body of Vritra, O Bharata, divided him in two parts. Divided in two by the thunderbolt, the great Asura endued with great Yoga powers, went to the region of Vishnu of great energy.

59 It was on account of his devotion to Vishnu that he had succeeded in overwhelming the whole universe And it was owing to his devotion to Vishnu that he ascended, when killed, to the region of Vishnu.

60. Thus, O son, while describing the story of Vritra have I recited to you fully the narrative of Fever! What else shall I describe to you?

61 That man who will read this account of the origin of Fever with rapt attention and cheerful heart shall become free from disease and shall always have happiness for his lot Filled with joy he shall have all his wishes gratified.

CHAPTER CCLXXXIV.

Janamejaya said.—

1 How, O Brahmana, was the Horse-sacrifice of the Prajapati Daksha, the son of Prachetas destroyed during the time of Vaivaswata Manu?

2. Understanding that the goddess Uma had become filled with ire and grief, the powerful Mahadeva, who is the soul of all things, yielded to anger. How, again, through his grace, was Daksha enabled to gather again the divided limbs of that Sacrifice? I wish to know all this, Tell me all this, O Brahmana, truly as it took place.

Vaishampayana said —

3. In days of yore Daksha made arrangements for celebrating a Sacrifice on the breast of Himavat in that sacred region inhabited by Rishis and Siddhas where the Ganges comes out of the mountains.

4—5. Over-grown with trees and creepers of various sorts, that place abounded with Gandharvas and Apsaras Surrounded by numbers of Rishis, Daksha, that best of virtuous men, that progenitor of creatures, was attended by the denizens of the Earth, the sky, and the celestial region, with their hands joined together in respect

6—10 The gods, the Danavas, the Gandharvas, the Pisachas, the Nagas, the Rakshasas, the two Gandharvas named Haha and Huhu, Tumvuru and Narada, Vishwavasu, Vishwasena, the Gandharvas and the Apsaras, the Adityas, the Vasus, the Rudras, the Saddhyas, the Maruts, all came there with Indra for sharing in the Sacrifice. The drinkers of heat, the drinkers of Soma, the drinkers of smoke, the drinkers of sacrificial juice, the Rishis, and the departed manes, came there with the Brahmanas These, and many other living creatures belonging to the four orders, viz, viviporous and oviparous and filth born and vegetable, were invited to that Sacrifice The gods also, with their wives respectfully invited thereto, came on their celestial cars and seated thereon shone like burning fires.

11 Seeing them, the Rishi Dadhichi became filled with grief and anger and said —'This is neither a Sacrifice nor a meritorious rite of religion, since Rudra is not worshipped in it.

12 You are certainly exposing yourselves to death and chains! Alas, how unfavorable is the time! Stupefied by mistake you do not see that destruction awaits you! A terrible calamity will overtake you in course of this great Sacrifice! You are blind to it.

13—14 Having said these words, that great Yogin saw the future with eyes of contemplation He saw Mahadeva, and his divine consort, viz, that giver of excellent boons, with the great Narada sitting beside the goddess Conversant with Yoga, Dadhichi became highly pleased, having ascertained what was about to take place.

15—16 All the gods and others that had come there held the same opinion, regarding the omission to invite the Lord of all creatures Dadhichi alone, desirous of leaving that place then said —By adoring one who should not be adored and by refusing to adore him who should be adored, a man incurs the sin of homicide for ever.

17. I have never before spoken an untruth, and an untruth I shall never speak. Here in the midst of the gods and the Rishis I say the truth.

18 The Protector of all creatures, the Creator of the universe, the Lord of all, the powerful master, the taker of sacrificial offerings, will soon come to this Sacrifice and you all shall behold him.

Dhaksha said:—

19 We have many Rudras armed with lances and having matted locks on their heads. They are eleven in number,

I know them all, but I do not know who this Maheshwara is.

Dadhichi said :—

20 This seems to be the advice of all that are here, namely, that Maheshwara should not be invited As, however, I do not see any god that can be said to be superior to him, I am sure that this proposed Sacrifice of Daksha will surely be destroyed.

Daksha said :—

21. Here, in this golden vessel, intended for the Lord of all Sacrifices is the sacrificial offering sanctified by Mantras and according to the ordinance I wish to make this offering to Vishnu who is peerless He is powerful and the Master of all, and to Him should sacrifices be offered

Vaishampayana continued —

Meanwhile, the goddess Uma, sitting with her spouse, said these words.

Uma said —

22 What are those gifts, what those vows, and what those penances, that I should practise by means of which my illustrious consort may be able to get a half or a third share of the offerings in sacrifices.

23 To his wife who was moved with grief and who repeated these words the illustrious Mahadeva said with a delighted face You do not know me, O goddess! You do not know, O you of delicate limbs, and low belly, what words are proper to be said to the Lord of Sacrifices.

24 O lady having large eyes, I know that it is only the sinful who are shorn of contemplation, that do not understand me It is through your power of illusion that the gods headed by Indra and the three worlds all become stupefied.

25 It is to me that the chaunters offer their praises in Sacrifices. It is to me that the Saman singers sing their Rathantaras It is to me that Brahmanas knowing the Vedas celebrate their Sacrifices. And it is to me that the the Addharyus offer the shares of sacrificial offerings.

The goddess said —

26 Persons of even ordinary powers applaud themselves and brag before their wives There is no doubt in this.

The holy one said —

27 O Queen of all the gods, I do not certainly speak highly my own self See now, O lady of slender waist, what I do. Look at the Being that I will create. O you of the fairest complexion, for destroying this Sacrifice, O my beautiful wife!

28 Having said these words to his wife Uma, who was dearer to him than his own life, the powerful Mahadeva created from his mouth a dreadful Being whose very sight could make one's hair stand erect The blazing fires that came out from his body rendered him highly dreadful to look at. His arms were many and in each was a weapon that filled the beholder with awe.

29 That Being, thus created, stood before the great god, with joined palms and said,—What order shall I have to fulfill? Maheswara answered him, telling,—Go and destroy the Sacrifice of Daksha.

30 Thus commanded, that Being of leonine powers who had come out from the mouth of Mahadeva wished to destroy the Sacrifice of Daksha, without displaying all his energy and without the help of any one else, for removing the anger of Uma.

31. Urged by her anger, the wife of Maheshwara, herself assuming a dreadful form known by the name of Mahakali, proceeded in the company of that Being who had come out from Mahadeva's mouth, for beholding with her own eyes the act of destruction which was her own. That powerful Being, then started having gained the permission of Mahadeva and having bowed his head to him

32 In energy, strength, and form, he took after Maheshwara himself who had created him Indeed, he was the living embodiment of (Mahadeva's) anger.

33 Of great might, energy, courage and prowess, he passed by the name of Virabhadra—that dispeller of the goddess's anger He then created from the pores of his body a large number of spirits known by the name of Raumyas.

34 Those dreadful spirits endued with terrible energy and prowess and resembling Rudra himself, rushed with the force of thunder to that place where Daksha was making preparations for his sacrifice, moved by the desire of destroying it. Having dreadful and gigantic forms, they were hundreds and thousands in number.

35 They filled the sky with their confused cries and shrieks That noise filled the dwellers of heaven with fear.

36 The very mountains were riven and the Earth shook Whirlwinds began to blow. The Ocean rose in a surge.

37 The fires that were lighted refused to blaze up. The Sun became dimmed.

articles, collected in many long years, and with great care and exertion, prove useless! Let these articles be of use to me! Even this is the boon I pray for!" The illustrious Hara, the tearer of Bhaga's eyes, said to him — Let it be as you say!" These were the words of that illustrious progenitor of all creatures, that god of three eyes, that protector of virtue 68 Having gained that boon from Bhava Daksha knelt down to him and adored that god having the bull for his emblem by uttering His thousand and eight names"

CHAPTER CCLXXXV.

(MOKHADHARMA PARVA) —

Yudhisthira said:—

1. "You should, O sire, tell me those names by which Daksha, that progenitor of creatures, worshipped the great god, O sinless one, a respectful curiosity urges me to hear them"

Bhishma said:—

2 "[Hear, O Bharata, what the names, both secret and public, are of that god of gods, that god of extraordinary feats, that ascetic of secret vows."

Daksha said.—

3 I bow to you O lord of all the gods of gods to the destroyer of the forces of the Asuras! You are the paralyser of the strength of the king of gods himself! You are worshipped by both gods and Danavas

4. You are thousand eyed, you are fierce eyed, and you are three eyed! You are the friend of the king of the Yakshas, your hands and feet extend in all directions to all places Your eyes also and head mouth are on all sides.

5 Your ears too are everywhere in the universe and you are yourself everywhere, O Lord! You are shaft eared you are large-eared, and you are pot eared! You are the receptacle of the Ocean.

6. Your ears are like those of the elephant, or of the bull, or like extended palms Adoration to you You have a hundred stomachs, a hundred revolutions, and a hundred tongues. I bow to you

7. The utterers of the Gayatri sing your praises in uttering the Gayatri, and the worshippers of the Sun worship you in adoring the Sun. The Rahis consider you as Brahman, as Indra, and as the sky above.

8. O you of mighty form, the Ocean and the Sky are your two forms All the gods live in your form as kine dwell within the fold

9 In your body I see Soma, Agni, the king of the Waters, Aditya, Vishnu, Brahman, and Vrihaspati

43 Salutations to you who have eyes both white and tawny, as also dark and red Salutations to you who have conquered your vital airs, who are of the form of weapons, who rivet all things, and who are greatly lean.

44 Salutations to you who always describe Religion, Pleasure Profit, and Liberation Salutations to you who are a Sankhya, who are the foremost of Sankhyas and who are the promulgator of the Sankhya Yoga

45 Salutations to you who have a car and who are without a car. Salutations to you who have the junction of four roads for your car, to you who have the skin of a black deer for your upper garments and who have a snake for the sacred thread.

46 Salutations to you who are Ishana who are of body as hard as adamant, and who are of green locks. Salutations to you who have three eyes who are the husband of Ambika, who are manifest, and who are Unmanifest.

47 Salutations to you who are Desire are the Giver of all desires, who are the Killer of all desires, and who are the discriminator between the pleased and the not pleased Salutations to you who are all things, the Giver of all things, and the Destroyer of all things! Salutations to you who are the colors which appear in the evening sky

48 Salutations to you who are of great strength, who are of mighty arms, who are a mighty Being, and who are of great effulgence. Salutations to you who look like a huge mass of clouds, and who are the embodiment of eternity. Salutations to you who are of well developed body, who are of emaciated limbs, who bear, matted locks on your head, and who are clad in barks of trees and skins of animals.

49 Salutations to you who have matted locks as effulgent as the Sun or the Fire, and who have barks and skins for your raiment Salutations to you who are endued with the effulgence of a thousand Suns, and who are ever engaged in penances.

50 Salutations to you who are the excitement of Fever and who have matted locks drenched with the waters of the Ganges having hundreds of eddies Salutations to you who again and again revolve the Moon, the Yugas, and the clouds.

51 You are food, you are he who eats that food, you are the giver of food, you are the grower of food, and you are the maker of food Salutations to you who cook food and who eat cooked food, and who are both wind and fire.

52 O Lord of all the lords of the gods, you are the four orders of living creatures, viz, the viviparous, the oviparous, the filth-born, and vegetables

53 You are the Creator of the mobile and the immobile universe, and you are their Destroyer. O foremost of all persons conversant with Brahma, they who know Brahma consider you as Brahma.

54 The Brahmavadins say that you are the Supreme root of Mind, and the Refuge upon which Ether Air, and Light rest You are the Richs and the Samans, and the syllable Om.

55 O foremost of all gods, those Brahmavadins who sing the Samans always sing you when they utter the syllables Hayi-Hayi, Huva Hayi, and Huva Hoyi

56 You are made up of the Yajushes, of the Richs and of the offerings poured on the sacrificial fire. The hymns of the Vedas and the Upanishads worship you

57 You are the Brahmanas and the Kshatriyas, the Vaishyas, and the Shudras, and the other castes formed by intermixture You are the masses of clouds which appear in the sky, you are Lightning, and you are the roar of thunder.

58 You are the year, you are the seasons, you are the month, and you are the fortnight You are Yuga, you are the time represented by a twinkle of the eye you are Kashtha, you are the Constellations, you are the Planets, you are Kala

59 You are the tops of all trees, you are the highest summits of all mountains, You are the tiger among the lower animals, you are Garuda among birds, and you are Ananta among snakes.

60. You are the ocean of milk among all oceans, and you are the bow among instruments for hurling weapons. You are the thunder among weapons, and you are Truth among vows

61. You are Aversion and you are Desire; you are attachment and you are stupefaction (of judgment); you are Forgiveness and you are Unforgiveness. You are Exertion, and you are Patience; you are Cupidity; you are Lust and you are Anger you are Victory and you are Defeat.

62 You are armed with mace, and you are armed with arrow you are armed with the bow, and you carry the Khattanga and the Jharjhara in your hands. You are he who cuts down and pierces and smites. You are he who leads (all creatures) and he who gives them pain and grief

63 You are Righteousness marked by ten virtues, you are Wealth or Profit of every sort, and you are Pleasure! You are Ganga, you are the Oceans, you are the Rivers, you are the lakes, and you are the tanks.

64 You are the thin creepers, you are the thicker creepers you are all kinds of grass, and you are the deciduous herbs You are all the lower animals and you are the birds You are the origin of all objects and acts, and you are that season which yields fruits and flowers.

65. You are the beginning and you are the end of the Vedas, you are the Gayatri, and you are Om.

66 You are Green, you are Red, you are Blue you are Dark, you are of Bloody color, you are of the color of the Sun you are Tawny, you are Brown, and you are Dark blue.

67 You are colorless, you are of the best color, you are the maker of colors, and you are peerless You are of the name of Gold, and you are fond of Gold.

68 You are Indra, you are Yama you are the Giver of boons, you are the Lord of riches, and you are Agni You are the Eclipse, you are the Fire called Chitrabhanu, you are Rahu, and you are the Sun.

69. You are the fire upon which sacrificial butter is poured You are he who pours the butter. You are He in honor of whom the butter is poured, you are the butter itself that is poured, and you are the powerful Lord of all. You are those sections of the Brahmanas who are called Trisuparna; you are all the Vedas, and you are the sections called Shatarudriya in the Yajushes

70. You are the holiest of holies, and the auspicious of all auspicious things. You quicken the inanimate body You are the Chit that lives in the human body. Invested with qualities, you are liable to Destruction, You are individual soul, that is He who is never liable to destruction when uninvested with attributes. You are full yet you are liable to decay and death in the form of the body which is individual soul's encasement.

71. You are the breath of life, and you are quality of Goodness, you are Darkness, you are Ignorance, and you are not subject to mistake. You are the vital airs called Prana, Apana, Samana, Udana, and Vyana.

72 You are the opening of the eye and the shutting of the eye You are Sneezing and you are Yawning. You are of red eyes which are ever turned inwards You are of large mouth and large stomach.

73. The hairs of your body are like needles. Your beard is green. Your hair is turned upwards You are swifter than the swiftest. You are master of the principles of music both vocal and instrumental, and fond of both vocal and instrumental music.

74. You are a fish moving in the waters, and you are a fish caught in the net You are full, you are fond of sports, and you are of the form of all quarrels and disputes. You are Time, you are bad time, you are premature time, and you are overmature time.

75 You are the killing, you are the razor, and you are what is killed. You are the auxiliary and you are the adversary, and you are destroyer of both auxiliaries and adversaries You are the time when clouds appear, you are of large teeth, and you are Samvartaka and Valahaka.

76. You are manifest in a shining form. You are concealed for being invested with illusion. You are He who links creatures with the fruits of their acts You have a bell in your hand You sport with all mobile and immobile things. You are the cause of all causes You are Brahma, you are Sanaha; you are the holder of the rod, your head is bald, and you are he who has his words, deeds, and thoughts under restraint.

77 You are the four cycles, you are the four Vedas, you are he from whom the 121 O you of excellent vows, I shall grant you again some more boons. Take them from me Removing this cheerlessness that overspreads your face, hear me with rapt attention.

122. With the help of reasonable arguments, the gods and the Danavas have formed from the Vedas consisting of six branches and from the philosophers of Sankhya and Yoga a creed by virtue of which they have practised the austerest penances for many long years.

123 The religion, however, which I have formed is peerless, and productive of benefits on every side. Men in all modes of life can practise it. It brings on Liberation It may be acquired in many years or through merit by persons who have controlled their senses It is shrouded in mystery. Those who have no wisdom consider it as censurable

124. It is opposed to the duties sanctioned for the four orders of men and the four modes of life, and agrees with those duties in only a few particulars Those who are well-skilled in the science of conclusions can understand its fitness; and they who have gone above all the modes of life can adopt it.

125 In days of yore, O Daksha, this auspicious religion called Pashupata had been found out by me. The proper observance of that religion produces great benefits.

126 May you get those, O highly blessed one! Renounce this fever of your heart!— Having said these words Mahadeva, with his consort (Uma) and with all his attendants disappeared from the view of Daksha of great prowess

127. He who would recite this hymn that was first sung by Daksha or who would listen to it when sung by another, would never suffer from the smallest evil and would gain a long life

128 Indeed, as Shiva is the foremost of all the gods so is this hymn, consonant with the Shrutis, is the foremost of all hymns

129 Persons seeking fame, kingdom, happiness pleasure profit and riches, and learning, should listen with devout feelings to the recital of this hymn

130 One suffering from disease, one distressed by pain, one plunged into melancholy one assailed by thieves or by fear and one under the displeasure of the king about his charge, becomes freed from fear by reciting this hymn

131 By listening or reciting this hymn, one, even in this earthly body of his, acquires equality with the spirits who are the attendants of Maharleva. One gains energy and fame, and becomes purged of all sin

132 Neither Rakshasas, nor Pishachas, nor ghosts, nor Vinayakas make disturbances in the house where this hymn is recited.

133 That woman, again, who listens to this hymn with pious faith, observing the practices of Brahmacharyya, gains worship as a goddess in the family of her father and that of her husband.

134 All the acts of that person become always successful who listens or recites with rapt attention to the whole of this hymn.

135 On account of the recitation of this hymn all the wishes one cherishes in his mind and all the wishes he speaks out become successful.

136 That man gains all objects of enjoyment and pleasure and all things that are desired by him, who, practising self-control, makes, according to proper rites, offerings to Mahadeva, Guha, Uma, and Nandi, and thereafter utters forthwith their names, in proper order and with devotion.

137 Such a man after death, ascends to heaven, and is never born among the intermediate animals or birds "This was said by the powerful Vyasa the son of Parashara"

CHAPTER CCLXXXVI.

(MOKSHADHARMA PARVA)— Continued.

Yudhisthira said —

1 "Tell me, O grandfather what is the spiritual science of man and whence does it originate"

Bhishma said :—

2 "Helped by the spiritual science, one may know everything It is, again, superior to all things I shall, with the help of my intelligence, explain to you that spiritual science about which you aske me Listen, O son, to my explanation

3 Earth, Wind Ether, Water, and Light forming the fifth are the great elements These are the origin and the destruction of all creatures

4 The bodies of living creatures, O foremost of Bharata's race, are the result of the combination of the virtues of these five Those virtues repeatedly come into being and repeatedly merge into the Supreme Soul.

5. From those five primal elements are created all creatures, and into those five great elements all creatures resolve themselves, again and again, like the numberless waves of the Ocean rising from the Ocean and merging into that which causes them.

6 As a tortoise stretches forth its legs and withdraws them again into itself, so the numberless creatures originate from (and enter) these five great essences.

7. Verily, sound originates from ether, and all dense matter is the attribute of Earth Life springs from Wind. Taste is from Water. Form is the property of Light.

8 The entire mobile and immobile universe is thus the outcome of the combination of these five great essences. When Destruction sets in, the infinite variety of creatures resolve themselves into those five, and once more, when Creation begins, they originate from the same five.

9 The Creator puts in all creatures the same five great elements in proportions that He thinks fit.

10. Sound, the ears, and all cavities,—these three,—have ether for their cause. Taste, all watery or juicy substances, and the tongue, are the properties of Water.

11. Form, the eye, and the digestive fire in the stomach, are the properties of Light. Smell, the organ of smelling, and the body, are the properties of Earth.

12 Life, touch, and action are the properties of Wind I have thus explained to you, O king, all the properties of the five principal elements.

13 Having created these, the Supreme God, O Bharata, united with them the qualities of Goodness, Darkness, and Ignorance, Time, Consciousness of functions, and Mind forming the sixth.

14 What is called the Understanding lives in the interior of what you see above the soles of the feet and below the crown of the head.

15. In man there are five senses. The sixth (sense) is the Mind. The seventh is called the Understanding The Kshetrajna or Soul is the eighth.

16. The senses and the Actor should be determined by apprehension of their respective functions. The states called Sattwa, Rajas, and Tamas, depend upon the senses for their formation.

17. The senses exist for simply catching the impressions of their respective objects. Doubt is the function of the Mind The Understanding is for ascertainment. The Soul is said to be only an inactive witness.

18 Sattwa, Rajas, Tamas, Time, and Acts, O Bharata, these attributes govern the Understanding. The Understanding is the senses and the five attributes.

19 When the Understanding is not, the senses with the mind, and the five other attributes, cease to be That by which the Understanding sees is called the eye When she smells, she becomes the organ of smell, and when she tastes the various objects, she is called tongue.

20. When again she feels the touch of the various objects, she becomes the organ of touch. It is the Understanding that becomes modified variously and frequently. When the Understanding wishes for anything, she becomes Mind.

21. The five senses with the Mind, which separately form the foundations (of the Understanding), are the creations of the Understanding. They are called Indriyas or organs. When they become stained, the Understanding also becomes sullied.

22—23 The Understanding, living in individual Soul exists in three states Sometimes she rejoices, sometimes she grieves, and sometimes she exists in a state which is neither pleasure nor pain. Having for her essence these states, of Sattwa, Rajas, and Tamas), the Understanding passes through these three states.

24 As the lord of rivers, viz, the Ocean, always keeps within his bounds, so the Understanding, which exists united with the (three) states, exists in the Mind.

25—28 When the state of Rajas is awakened, the Understanding becomes changed into Rajas Delight, joy, gladness, happiness, and contentment, these when somehow excited, are the properties of Sattwa. Heart-burning grief, sorrow, discontentment, and unforgiveness, arising from particular causes, are the outcome of Rajas. Ignorance, attachment and mistake, carelessness, stupefaction, and terror, meanness, cheerlessness, sleep, and procrastination,—these, when engendered by particular causes, are the properties of Tamas.

29. Whatever state of body or mind, either joy or happiness, arises, should be considered as due to the state of Sattwa.

30. Whatever, again, is full of sorrow and is disagreeable to oneself, should be considered as originating from Rajas. Without undertaking any such act, one should turn his attention to it.

31. Whatever is full of error or stupefaction in either body or mind, and is inconceivable and mysterious, should be known as being outcome of Tamas

32 Thus have I explained to you that all things in this world live in the Understanding By knowing this one becomes wise What else can be the characteristics of wisdom?

33 Know now the difference between these two subtile things, viz. Understanding, and Soul One of these viz, the Understanding, creates qualities The other, i e, the Soul, does not create them

34 Although they are, by nature, distinct from each other, yet they always dwell in a state of union. A fish is different from the water in which it lives, but the fish and the water exist together.

35. The qualities cannot know the Soul. The Soul, however, knows them The ignorant regard the Soul as existing in a state of union with the qualities like qualities existing with their possessors. This, however, is not the case, for the Soul is only an idle spectator of everything.

36 The Understanding has no refuge That which is called life originates from the effects of the qualities coming together Others, acting as causes create the Understanding that lives in the body No one can apprehend the qualities in the true nature or form of existence.

37 The Understanding, as already said, creates the qualities The Soul simply sees them This union between the Understanding and the Soul is eternal.

38 The Understanding living within, perceives all things through the Senses which are by nature inanimate and unapprehending. In sooth, the senses are only like lamps.

39 This is their nature Knowing this, one should live cheerfully, without giving way to either grief or joy. Such a man is above the influence of pride.

40 Owing to her nature, the Understanding creates all these attributes as a spider weaves threads These qualities should be known as the threads the spider weaves

41. When destroyed, the qualities do not cease to exist, only, their existence becomes invisible When, however, a thing is beyond the range of the senses, its existence (or otherwise) is understood by inference This is the opinion of some persons Others hold that with destruction the qualities cease to be.

42 Solving this hard problem of the understanding and reflection, and removing all doubt, one should renounce sorrow and live happily

43 As men not knowing the bottom become distressed when they fall upon this Earth which is like a river filled with the waters of stupefaction, so is that man pained who falls away from that state in which there is a union with the Understanding

44 Learned men, however, conversant with spiritual science and armed with fortitude, are never afflicted, because they can go to the other end of those waters. Indeed, Knowledge is a good vessel.

45 Men of knowledge have not to meet those fears which terrify them that are shorn shorn of knowledge Regarding the righteous, none of them attains to an end which is superior to that of any other person amongst them In fact, the righteous display an equality about it.

46 Regarding the man of Knowledge, whatever acts have been done by him in pristine times out of Ignorance) and whatever sinful acts he does, he destroys both by Knowledge as his sole means Then, again, upon the attainment of Knowledge he ceases to commit these two evils, viz, blaming the wicked acts of others and doing any wicked acts himself under the influence of attachment."

CHAPTER CCLXXXVII.

(MOKHARDHAMA PARVA)—

Continued.

Yudhisthira said:—

1. "Living creatures always dread sorrow and death Tell me, O grandfather, how the occurrence of these two may be warded off."

Bhishma said.—

2 "Regarding it, O Bharata, is cited the old discourse between Narada and Samaraga.

Narada said —

3 You salute your elders by prostrating yourself on the ground till your chest touches the ground You appear to be engaged in crossing (the river of life) with your hands You appear to be always free from sorrow and greatly cheerful

4 I do not see that you have the least anxiety You are always content and happy, and you appear to play happily like a child.

Samanga said —

5 O giver of honors, I know the truth about the Past, the Present and the Future Hence I never become dispirited.

6 I know also what the commencement of acts is in this world, what, of their fruits and how different are those fruits. Hence I never give way to sorrow

7 You see, O Narada, the illiterate, the destitute, the prosperous, the blind, idiots and madmen, and ourselves also, all live.

8. These live by virtue of their pristine deeds. The very gods, who are freed from diseases, exist by virtue of their pristine deeds The strong and the weak, all, live by virtue of their pristine deeds It is proper, therefore, you should regard us with respect.

9 The masters of thousands live The masters of hundreds also live They who are overwhelmed with sorrow live. See, we too are living

10 When we, O Narada, do not yield to grief, what can the practice of the duties or the observance of acts do to us? And since all joys and sorrows do not terminate, they are, therefore, unable to agitate us at all

11. Indeed, the very root of wisdom, is the freedom of the senses from mistake It is the senses which produce error and grief One whose senses are subject to mistake can never be said to have acquired wisdom.

12 That pride which a man, subject to error, entertains, is only a form of the error to which he is subject As regards the man of error, neither this world nor the next is for him. It should be remembered that griefs do not last for ever and that happiness cannot be acquired always.

13 One like me would never adopt worldly life with all its changes and painful incidents Such a one would not care for objects of enjoyments, and would not think at all of the happiness which they yield, or, indeed, of the griefs that come on.

14. One capable of depending on his own self, would never hanker after the possessions of others, would not think of unfair gains, would not feel overjoyed at the acquisition of even immense riches, and would not give way to sorrow at the loss of riches.

15 Neither friends, nor riches, nor high birth, nor sacred learning, nor Mantras, nor energy can succeed in saving one from sorrow in the next world It is only by conduct that one can acquire happiness there.

16 The Understanding of the man who is not acquainted with Yoga can never be directed towards Liberation. One unacquainted with Yoga can never gain happiness Patience and the determination to shake off sorrow, these two mark the setting in of happiness.

17. Anything agreeable brings on pleasure Pleasure induces pride Pride, again, produces sorrow. For these reasons, I avoid all these.

18 Grief, Fear, Pride,—these that stupefy the heart,—and also Pleasure and Pain, I see as witness since my body is endued with life and moves about.

19 Knowing both riches and pleasure, and thirst and mistake, I wander over the Earth, freed from grief and every sort of anxiety of heart

20 Like one that has drunk nectar I have no fear, either in this world or in the next, of death, or sin, or cupidity, or anything of that sort.

21 I have gained this knowledge, O Brahmana, as the outcome of my severe and indestructible penances Therefore, O Narada, even when it comes to me, cannot affect me."

CHAPTER CCLXXXVIII.

(MOKSHADHAMA PARVA) —

Continued.

Yudhishthira said —

1. "Tell me, O Grandfather, what is for the behoof of one who is not acquainted with the truths of the scriptures, who is always in doubt, and who abstains from self-control and the other practices the object whereof the knowledge of the Soul."

Bhishma said :—

2 "Adoring the preceptor, always reverentially attending the aged, and listening to the scriptures,—these are said to be of supreme benefit.

3 Regarding it is cited the old discourse between Galava and the celestial Rishi Narada.

4. Once on a time Galava, desirous of securing what was for his behoof, addressed Narada freed from error and fatigue, well-read in scriptures, pleased with knowledge a thorough master of his senses, and with soul devoted to Yoga, and said —

5 I see, O Ascetic, those virtues by the possession of which a person is respected in the world, live permanently in you

6 You are freed from error and, therefore, you should remove the doubts that fill the minds of men like ourselves who are subject to error and who are unacquainted with truths of the world

7. We do not know our duties, for the injunctions of the scriptures create an inclination for Knowledge simultaneously with the inclination for acts You should describe these subject to us

8 O illustrious one, the different modes of life approve different courses of conduct —'This is beneficial,'— This is beneficial'—the scriptures exhort us often in this way

9 Seeing the followers of the four modes of life, who are thus exhorted by the scriptures and who fully approve of what the scriptures have sanctioned for them, thus travelling in various courses and beholding that ourselves also are equally content with our own scriptures we cannot understand what is truly wholesome

10 If the scriptures were all of one opinion, then what is truly beneficial would have become clear On account, however of the scriptures being multifarious, that which is truly beneficial is filled with mystery

11 For these reasons, that which is truly beneficial, appears to us full of confusion Do you, then, O illustrious one, describe to me the subject I have come to you (for this) Instruct me.

Narada said —

12 The modes of life four in number, O child! All of them serve the object for which they have been designed, and the duties they declare differ from one another Learning them first from competent preceptors, reflect upon them, O Galava.

13 See, the merits of those modes of life, as described, are varied in their form divergent in their matter, and contradictory in their observances

14 When seen with gross vision, all the Ashramas do not exhibit their true intent! Others, however, having subtle sight, see their highest end.

15—16. That which is truly and, without any doubt wholesome, viz., good offices to friends, and suppression of enemies, and the acquisition of the three fold objects of life, has been described by the wise to be supreme excellence Abstention, from sinful deeds, righteous disposition, good conduct towards the good and pious,—these, forsooth constitute excellence

17 Mildness towards all creatures, sincerity of conduct, and sweet words,—these, forsooth, constitute excellence

18 A just distribution of one's riches among the gods, the Pitris, and guests, and adherence to servants,—these, forsooth, constitute excellence.

19 Truthfulness of speech is excellent The knowledge of truth is however, very difficult of acquisition I hold that as truth which is highly beneficial to creatures.

20 The absence of pride the suppression of carelessness contentment, living by one's own self,—these form the supreme excellence

21 The study of the Vedas, and their branches according to the well-known rules, and all enquiries and pursuits leading to the acquisition of knowledge,—are, forsooth excellent

22 One wishing to acquire what is excellent should never enjoy to excess sound and form and taste and touch and scent and should not enjoy them for their sake alone

23 Walking in the night, sleep during the day indulgence in idleness, villany, pride, excessive indulgence and total abstention from enjoyment in objects of the senses, should be shunned by one desirous of acquiring what is excellent

24 One should not seek self elevation by putting down others Indeed one should, by his merits only, seek superiority over persons who are distinguished but never over those who are inferior.

25 Men having no real merit and filled with a sense of self admiration depreciate men of real merit, by mentioning their own virtues and riches

26 Puffed up with a sense of their own importance, these men, when none stops them, consider themselves to be superior to men of real distinction.

27 One having true wisdom and real merits wins great fame by abstaining from speaking ill of others and from indulging in self praise

28 Flowers shed their pure and sweet odour without speaking of their own excellence Likewise, the effulgent Sun scatters his shining rays in the sky in perfect silence

29 Similarly those men shine in the world with celebrity who by the help of their intelligence, renounce these and similar other faults and who do not blaze forth their own virtues

30 The fool can never shine in the world by speaking out his own praise The man, however, of real merit and learning acquires celebrity even if he be hidden in a pit.

31. Evil words, uttered with what strength of voice, die out Good words, uttered, however softly, shine forth in the world.

32. As the Sun shows his fiery form so the multitude of words of little sense, that fools filled with vanity give vent to show their hearts

33 For these reasons men try to acquire wisdom of various sorts It appears to me that of all acquisitions that of wisdom is the most precious

34 One should not speak until one is asked, nor should one speak when one is asked improperly Even if endued with intelligence and knowledge, one should still sit in silence like an idiot.

35 One should seek to live among honest men given to righteousness and liberality and the observance of the duties of their own order.

36 One desirous of acquiring what is excellent should never live in a place where people make a confusion of their respective duties

37. A person may be seen to live who abstains from all works and who is well-content with whatever little is gained without exertion By living amid the righteous, one succeeds in acquiring pure virtue, Similarly one by living amid the sinful, becomes sullied with sin.

38 As the touch of water or fire or the rays of the moon immediately carry the sensation of cold or heat, similarly the impressions of virtue and vice create happiness or misery.

39 Those who eat Vighasa eat without marking the flavours of the foods placed before them They, however, who eat carefully marking the flavours of the duties prepared for them, should be known as persons still fettered by the bonds of action

40. The pious man should leave that place where a Brahmana describes duties to disciples desirous of acquiring knowledge, as based on reasons, of the Soul, but who do not reverentially enquire after such knowledge.

41. Who, however, will leave that place where exists fully that conduct between disciples and preceptors which is consistent with what has been sanctioned by the scriptures?

42 What learned man who cares for his respect will live there where people talk about the faults of the learned even when such have no foundations to stand upon?

43 Who is there that will not leave that place like a garment whose end has caught fire, where covetous men tries to break down the limits of virtue?

44 One should remain and live in that place, among good men of pious disposition, where persons possessed of humility are engaged in fearlessly practising the duties of religion

45 One should not dwell there where men practise the duties of religion for the sake of wealth and other worldly purposes for the people of that place are all to be considered as sinful.

46 One should fly away quickly from that place as if from a room in which there is a snake, where the inhabitants, desirous of acquiring the means of life, are engaged in the practice of sinful deeds.

47 One desirous of what is wholesome, should, from the beginning, avoid that act for which one becomes stretched, as it were, on a bed of thorns and for which one becomes invested with the desires born of the pristine deeds

48 The pious man should leave that kingdom where the king and king's officers exercise equal authority and where people eat before feeding their relatives.

49 One should live in that country where Brahmanas having a knowledge of the scriptures are fed first, where they always practise religious duties, and where they are engaged in teaching disciples and officiating at the sacrifices of others.

50 One should unhesitatingly live in that country where the sounds Swaha, Swadha, and Vashat are duly and continuously uttered.

51. One should leave that kingdom, like poisoned meat, where one sees Brahmanas compelled to follow unholy practices, by want of the means of life.

52 With a contented heart and considering all his wishes as already gratified, a pious man should live in that country whose denizens gladly give away before even they are asked.

53. One should live and move about, among good men devoted to pious acts, in that country where the wicked are punished, and where respect and good done to those who are of controlled and purified souls.

54—55 One should unhesitatingly live in that country whose king is given to virtue and which the king rules virtuously, casting off desires and possessed of prosperity, and where severe punishment is inflicted on those who subject self-controlled men to the consequences of their anger, on those who treat wickedly the righteous, on those who commit acts of violence, and on the covetous.

56. Kings endued with such a disposition, secure the prosperity of those who live in their kingdoms when prosperity is on the point of leaving them.

57. I have thus told you, O son, in answer to your enquiry, what is beneficial or excellent. No one can describe, on account of its exceedingly high character, what is beneficial or excellent for the Soul

58 Many and high will the excellences be, through the performance of the duties laid down for him, of the man who for earning his livelihood during the time of his stay in this world acts in the way indicated above and who devotes his soul to the well being of all creatures"

CHAPTER CCXXXIX.

(MOKSHADHARMA PARVA).—Continued.

Yudhishthira said:—

1. "How, O grandfather, should a king like us act in this world, keeping in view the great object of acquisition? What attributes, again, should he always possess so that he may be liberated from attachments"

Bhishma said:—

2 "I shall in this connection recite to you the old narrative that was uttered by Arishtanemi to Sagara who had sought his advice

Sagara said.—

3. What is that good, O Brahmana, by doing which one may enjoy happiness here? How, indeed, may one avoid grief and agitation? I wish to know all this.

Bhishma said —

4. Thus addressed by Sagara, Arishtanemi of Tarkshya's race, conversant with all the scriptures, considering the enquiries as deserving fully of his instructions, said these words —

5. The happiness of Liberation is true happiness in the world. The ignorant man knows it not, attached, as he is, to children and animals and possessed of riches and corn.

6 The understanding that is attached to worldly objects and the longing mind baffle all skilful treatment. The ignorant man who is bound in the fetters of affection cannot acquire Liberation.

7. I shall now describe to you all the fetters which originate from the affections. Hear them with attention Indeed, they can be heard with profit by one who is endued with knowledge.

8 Having procreated children in due time and married them when they become young men, and having found them to be competent for earning their livelihood, do you free yourself from all attachments and rove about happily.

9 When you find your dear consort grown old in years and attached to the son she has given birth to, do you leave her in time keeping in view the highest object of acquisition.

10 Whether you get a son or not, having, during the first years of your life, duly enjoyed with your senses the objects thereof, liberate yourself from attachments and rove about in happiness.

11. Having satisfied the senses with their objects, you should suppress the desire of further indulging them Liberating yourself from attachments, you should rove in happiness, contenting yourself with what is got without exertion and previous calculation, and looking impartially towards all creatures and objects.

12. Thus, O son, have I told you briefly. Hear me now, for I shall tell you fully, the desirability of the acquisition of Liberation

13 Those persons who live in this world shorn of attachments and fear, succeed in acquiring happiness. Those persons, however, who are attached to worldly objects, forsooth, meet with destruction.

14 Worms and ants are engaged in the acquisition of food and are seen to die in the search. They who are shorn of attachments are happy, while they who are attached to worldly objects meet with destruction.

15 If you wish to acquire Liberation you should never place your thoughts on your relatives, thinking,—How shall these live without me?

16. A living creature takes birth by himself, and, grows by himself, and acquires happiness and misery, and death by himself.

17. In this world people enjoy and obtain food and cloth and other acquisitions acquired by either their parents or themselves. This is the result of the acts of pristine lives, for nothing can be had in this life which is not the result of the past.

18. All creatures live on the Earth, protected by their own acts, and acquiring their food as the result of what is ordained by Him who allots the fruits of acts.

19. A man is but a lump of clay, and always depends completely on their forces. A man, being thus so weak, what rational motive can one have for protecting and feeding his relatives?

20. When your relatives are carried away by Death in your very presence and despite your utmost efforts to save them, that circumstance alone should awaken you.

21. In the very life-time of your relatives and before own duty is completed of feeding and protecting them, you may yourself die and leave them.

22. After your relatives have been carried away from this world by death, you cannot know what becomes of them there,—that is, whether they are happy or miserable. This fact ought to awaken you.

23 When on account of the fruits of their own acts your relatives can maintain themselves in this world whether you live or die, thinking of this you should do what is for your own well-being.

24. When such is the case, who in the world is to be considered as whose? Do you, therefore, think of acquiring Liberation. Hear now what more I shall say to you.

25. That man of firm Soul is, forsooth, liberated who has conquered hunger and thirst and such other states of the body, as also anger and cupidity and error.

26. That man is always liberated who does not forget himself, through folly, by indulging in gambling and drinking and concubinage and the chase.

27. That man who is really affected by sorrow for being compelled to eat every day and every night for maintaining life, is said to be cognisant of the faults of life.

28 One who, as the outcome of careful reflection, considers his repeated births as due to sexual congress with women, is held to be freed from attachments.

29. That man is certainly Liberated who knows truly the nature of the birth, the destruction, and the acts of living creatures.

30. That man becomes certainly freed who seeks only a handful of corn, for the support of life, from amidst millions upon millions of carts loaded with grain, and who finds no difference between a shed of bamboo and reeds and a palace.

31. That man becomes certainly freed who seeks the world as afflicted by death, disease and famine.

32. Indeed, one who sees the world as such succeeds in becoming contented, while one who fails to see the world in such a light, meets with destruction. That man who is contented with only a little, is considered as freed.

33. That man who sees the world to consist of eaters and edibles, and who is never affected by pleasure and pain begotten by illusion, is considered as liberated.

34. That man who considers a soft bed on a fine bed-stead and the hard ground as equal, and who considers good shali rice and hard thick rice as equal, is liberated.

35 That man who considers linen and cloth made of grass as equal, and who considers cloth of silk and barks of trees as the same, and who sees no difference between clean sheep skin and unclean leather, is liberated.

36 That man who considers this world as the result of the combination of the five principal elements, and who acts in this world, keeping this notion foremost, is liberated.

37. That man who considers pleasure and pain in the same light and gain and loss as equal, and victory and defeat as the same to whom like and dislike are the same, and who is unmoved under fear and anxiety, is perfectly liberated.

38. That man who considers his body which has so many imperfections, to be only a mass of blood, urine and excreta, as also of disorders and diseases, is liberated.

39 That man becomes liberated who always recollects that this body, when possessed by decrepitude, becomes assailed by wrinkless and white hairs and leanness and paleness of complexion and a bending of the form.

40. That man who considers his body as subject to loss of power, weakness of sight, deafness, and loss of strength, is liberated.

41 That man who knows that the very Rishis, the gods, and the Asuras are beings that have to depart from their respective spheres to other regions, is liberated.

42. That man who knows that thousands of kings possessed of even great power have died, succeeds in becoming liberated

43 That man who knows that in this world the acquisition of objects is always hard, that pain is profuse, and that the maintenance of relatives is always painful becomes liberated

44 Seeing the abundant faults of children and of other men, who is there that would not worship Liberation?

45 That man who, enlightened by the scriptures and the experience of the world sees every human concern in this world to be unreal, becomes liberated

46 Remembering these words of mine do you act like one who has become liberated, whether it is a life of domesticity that you would lead or pursue Liberation without allowing your understanding to be confounded

47 Hearing these words of his with attention king Sagara, acquired those virtues which yield liberation and continued, with their help to rule his subjects."

CHAPTER CCXC.

(MOKSHADHARMA PARVA) — Continued

Yudhisthira said —

1 "This curiosity, O sire, is always living in my mind O grandfather of the Kurus I wish to hear everything about it from you!

2 Why was the celestial Rishi, the great Ushanas, called also Kavi, engaged in doing what was agreeable to the Asuras and disagreeable to the gods

3 Why was he engaged in diminishing the energy of the gods? Why the Danavas always fought with the foremost of the gods

4 Endued with the effulgence of an immortal, why did Ushanas obtain the name of Shukra? How also did he acquire such superior excellence? Tell me all about these things

5 Though highly energetic, why can he not go to the centre of the sky? I wish O grandfather, to learn everything about all these matters"

Bhishma said —

6 "Listen, O king, attentively to all this as it actually took place. O sinless one, I shall describe these matters to you as I have heard and understood them.

7 Of firm vows and respected by all, Ushanas, that descendant of Bhrigu's race, became engaged in doing what was disagreeable to the gods for some good cause

8 The royal Kuvera, the chief of the Yakshas and the Rakshas, is the lord of the wealth of Indra, that master of the universe

9 The great ascetic Ushanas, crowned with Yoga success entered the person of Kuvera, and depriving the lord of wealth of his liberty by means of Yoga, robbed him of all his riches

10 Seeing his riches taken away from him, the lord of wealth became highly displeased. Filled with anxiety, and his anger also being worked up he went to that foremost of gods, viz, Mahadeva.

11 Kuvera reported the matter to Shiva of great energy, that first of gods, fierce and amiable, and endued with various forms.

He said —

12 Ushanas, having spiritualised himself by Yoga, entered my body and depriving myself of liberty, has taken away all my riches Having by Yoga entered my body he has again left it

13 Hearing these words Maheshwara of Supreme Yoga powers became filled with ire His eyes, O king, became blood-red, and taking up his lance he waited

14 Having taken up that foremost of weapons the great god began to say,—Where is he? Where is he?—Meanwhile, Ushanas having learnt the purpose of Mahadeva from a distance, waited silently.

15 Having learnt the fact of the anger of the great Maheshwara of superior Yoga power, the powerful Ushanas began to think as to whether he should go to Maheshwara or fly away or remain where he was

16 Thinking, with the help of his severe penances, of the great Mahadeva, Ushanas of soul crowned with Yoga-success put himself on the point of Mahadeva's lance

17 Understanding that Ushanas, whose penances had been crowned with success and who had converted himself into the form of pure Knowledge, was staying at the point of His lance, the bow armed Rudra, bent that weapon with his hand.

18 When the fierce-armed and powerful Mahadeva of great energy had thus bent his lance that weapon came to be called from that time by the name of Pinaka.

19. The lord of Uma, seeing Bhargava thus brought upon the palm of his hand, opened his mouth. The chief of the gods then threw Bhargava into his mouth and swallowed him up.

20. The powerful and great Ushanas of Bhrigu's race, entering the stomach of Maheshwara, began to wander there."

Yudhisthira said:—

21. "How, O king, could Ushanas wander within the stomach of that foremost [god] of superior intelligence? What also did that great god do while the Brahmana was within his stomach."

Bhishma said:—

22. "Then Mahadeva of severe vows, entered the waters and remained there like an immovable wooden stake, O king, for millions of years.

23—24. His Yoga penances of the austerest type having been over, he rose from the great lake. Then that prime god of the gods, viz., the eternal Brahman, approached him, and enquired after the progress of his penances and well-being. The god having the bull for his emblem answered, saying,—My penances have been well practised.

25. Of inconceivable soul, endued with great intelligence, and ever devoted to the religion of truth, Shankara saw that Ushanas within his stomach had become greater on account of those penenances of his.

26. That foremost of Yogins, (viz, Ushanas), rich with that wealth of penances and the wealth (of Kuvera), shone brightly in the three worlds, gifted with great energy.

27. After this, Mahadeva armed with Pinaka, that soul of Yoga, once more began to practice Yoga-meditation, Ushanas, however, however, stricken with anxiety, began to roam within the stomach of the great god.

28. The great ascetic began to sing the praises of the god from where he was, desirous of finding an outlet for escape. But, having stopped all his outlets, Rudra, prevented him from coming out.

29. The great ascetic Ushanas, however, O chastiser of enemies, from within Mahadeva's stomach repeatedly addressed the god, saying,—Show me your kindness.

30. To him Mahadeva said,—Go out through my urethra!—He had closed up all other outlets of his body.

31. Closed on all sides and unable to find out the outlet pointed out, the ascetic began to roam hither and thither, burning all the while with Mahadeva's energy.

32. At last he found the outlet and came out through it. On account of this incident he passed by the name of Shukra, and it is for this he also became unable to attain the central point of the sky.

33. Seeing him come out of his stomach and shining brightly with energy, Bhava, filled with anger, stood with lance uplifted in his hand.

34. The goddess Uma then interposed and forbade the angry lord of all creatures, viz, her consort, to kill the Brahmana. And on account of Uma's having thus prevented her lord from fulfilling his purpose, the ascetic Ushanas became the son of the goddess.

The goddess said:—

35. This Brahmana no longer deserves to be killed by you. He has become my son. O god, one who comes out of your stomach does not deserve to be killed by you.

Bhisma said:—

36. Pacified by these words of his wife, Bhava smiled and said repeatedly these words, O king, viz,—Let this one go wherever he likes.

37. Bowing to the boon-giving Mahadeva and also to his wife the goddess Uma, the great ascetic Ushanas, gifted with superior intelligence, proceeded to the place he chose.

38. I have thus described to you, O chief of the Bharatas, the story of the great Bhargava about which you had asked me."

CHAPTER CCXCI.

(MOKSHADHARMA PARVA)—

Continued.

Yudhishthira said:—

1. "O you of great arms, tell me, after this, what is beneficial for us. O grandfather, I am never satiated with your words which seem to me like ambrosia.

2. What are those good acts, O best of men, by doing which a man succeeds in obtaining what is for his greatest good, both in this world, and in the next, O giver of boons."

Bhishma said:—

3 "Regarding it I shall describe to you what the celebrated king Janaka had enquired, in days of yore, of the great Parashara.

4 What is beneficial for all creatures both in this world and the next? Do you tell me what should be known by all about it.

5 Thus accosted Parashara, endued with great ascetic merit and conversant with the ordinances of every religion, said these words, desirous of favouring the king

Parashara said.—

6 Virtue acquired by acts is of supreme benefit both in this world and the next. The sages of old have said that there is nothing higher than virtue.

7. By accomplishing the sacred duties a man becomes honored in heaven The virtue, again, of embodied creatures, O best of kings consists in the ordinances on the subject of acts. All good men belonging to the several modes of life, fixing their faith on virtue, perform their respective duties.

8 Four modes of life, O child, have been laid down in this world Wherever men live the means of maintenance come to them of themselves.

9 Doing by different means virtuous or sinful acts living creatures, when dissolved into their five constituent elements, attain to various ends.

10 As vessels of white brass, when steeped in liquified gold or silver, get the hue of these metals so a living creature, who is entirely dependant upon the acts of his pristine lives, takes his color from the nature of those acts.

11. Nothing can originate without a seed No one can acquire happiness without having performed acts capable of bringing on happiness When one's body is dissolved, he succeeds in acquiring happiness only on account of the good acts of pristine lives.

12 The sceptic argues O child, saying,—I do not see that anything in this world is the result of destiny or the virtuous and sinful deeds of pristine lives Inference cannot settle the existence or operation of destiny The gods, the Gandharvas and the Danavas have become what they are on account of their own nature.

13. People never recollect in their next lives the acts done by them in pristine ones For explaining the acquisition of fruits in any particular life people seldom name the four sorts of acts alleged to have been performed in pristine lives.

14 The declarations having the Vedas for their authority have been made for guiding the conduct of men in this world, and for tranquillizing the minds of men. These, O child, cannot represent the saying of truly wise men.

15 This opinion is wrong. In sooth, one acquires the fruits of whatever among the four sorts of acts one does with the eye, the mind, the tongue, and muscles

16. As the fruit of his acts, O king, a person sometimes acquires happiness wholly, sometimes misery in the same way, and sometimes happiness and misery united together. Whether virtuous or sinful, acts are never destroyed.

17. Sometimes, O child, the happiness consequent on good acts remains concealed and covered in such a way that it does not shew itself in the case of the person who is sinking in life's ocean till his sorrows disappear.

18 After sorrow has been dissipated, one begins to enjoy (the fruits of) his good acts And know O king, that upon the exhaustion of the fruits of good deeds, those of sinful ones begin to throw themselves.

19 Self control, forgiveness, patience, energy, contentment truthfulness, modesty, abstention from injury, freedom from the evil practices called Vyasana, and cleverness —these yield happiness

20 No creature is perpetually subject to the fruits of his good or bad acts The wise man should always try to collect and concentrate his mind.

21 One never has to enjoy or endure the good and bad deeds of another Indeed, one enjoys and endures the fruits of only those acts that he does oneself.

22 The person who renounces both happiness and misery walks along a particular path Those men, however, O king, who allow themselves to be attached to all worldly objects, walk along an entirely different path.

23 A person should not himself do that act which, if done by another, will bring censure on him. Indeed, by doing an act that one censures in others, one meets with ridicule.

24—25 A Kshatriya shorn of courage, a Brahmana who takes every sort of food, a Vaishya shorn of exertion, a Shudra who is idle, a learned person without good conduct, one of high birth but shorn of righteous conduct, a Brahmana fallen away from truth, a woman who is unchaste and wicked, a Yogin endued with attachments, one that cooks food for his own self, an ignorant person employed in making a discourse, a kingdom without a king and a king who cherishes no love for his subjects and who is shorn of Yoga,—these all, O king, are deserving of pity.

CHAPTER CCXCII.

Parashara said.—

1. That man, who, having got this car, viz, his body endued with mind, goes on, restraining with the reins of knowledge the horses of the objects of the senses, should certainly be considered as an intelligent one.

2 The homage by a person whose mind depends on itself and who has renounced the means of livelihood, is worthy of high praise,—that homage, namely, O twice-born one, which is the result of instructions received from one who has succeeded in getting over acts, but not acquired from the mutual discussion of men in the same state of progress.

3 Having got the allotted period of life, O king, with such difficulty, one should not diminish it. On the other hand, man should always try, by righteous deeds, for his gradual advancement.

4. Among the six different colors that individual Soul attains at different periods of his existence, he who falls away from a superior color deserves blame and censure. Hence, one who has acquired the result of good deeds should act in such a way as to avoid all acts sullied by the quality of Darkness.

5 Man attains to a superior color by pious deeds Unable to acquire a superior color for such acquisition is highly difficult, a person, by doing sinful deeds only kills himself.

6 All sinful deeds that are perpetrated unconsciously or in ignorance are destroyed by penances. A sinful deed, however, that is committed knowingly, yields much sorrow.

7. Hence, one should never commit sinful deeds which have for their fruit only sorrow.

8. The intelligent man would never do a sinful act even if it produce the greatest advantage, just as a person who is pure would never touch a Chandala.

9 How miserable is the fruit I behold of sinful deeds Through sin the very vision of the sinner becomes perverse, and he mistakes his body and its unstable accompaniments for the Soul.

10. That foolish man who does not succeed in following Renunciation in this world becomes stricken with great grief when he goes to the next world

11 An uncolored cloth, when dirty, can be purified, but not a piece of cloth which is dyed with black, so, O king, listen to me with care, is it the case with sin.

12. That man who, having knowingly perpetrated a sin, acts righteously for expiating that sin, has to enjoy and endure the fruits of his good and bad deeds separately.

13 The Brahmavadins hold under the authority of what has been sanctioned in the Vedas, that all acts of injury committed in ignorance are made good by virtuous acts.

14 A sin, however, that is committed knowingly is never repaired by righteousness Thus the twice born Brahmavadins who are conversant with the scriptures of Brahman

15 But I hold that whatever acts are done, be they righteous or sinful, be they done knowingly or otherwise, they remain till their fruits are enjoyed or endured.

16 Whatever acts are done by the mind with full deliberation yield, according to their grossness or subtility, fruits which are gross or subtile.

17. Those acts, however, O you of righteous soul, which are fraught with great injury, if done in ignorance do, forsooth, produce consequences which lead to hell, with this difference that are disproportionate in point of gravity to the acts that produce them.

18 As to those acts of the gods or repeated ascetics, a pious man should never do their like or, informed of them, should never censure them.

19 That man, who, reflecting with his mind, O king, and ascertaining his own ability, performs pious deeds, forsooth, acquires what is for his well-being

20. Water poured into an unbaked pitcher gradually becomes less and less and finally disappears altogether. If kept, however, in a baked vessel, it remains without its quantity being decreased. Similarly, acts done without thought with the help of the understanding do not become wholesome, while acts done with judgment remain with unmitigated excellence and produce happiness as their result.

21—22. If into a vessel containing water other water be poured, the original water increases in quantity; so all acts done with judgment, be they just or otherwise, only increase one's stock of virtue.

23. A king should subjugate his enemies and all who seek to assert their superiority, and he should properly rule and protect his subjects. One should ignite his sacred fires and pour libations on them in various sacrifices, and retiring into the woods in either his middle or old age, should live there.

24. Gifted with self-control, and possessed of righteous conduct, one should regard all creatures as his ownself. One should again respect his superiors. By the practice of truth and of good conduct, O king, one is sure to acquire happiness.

CHAPTER CCXCIII.

(MOKSHADHRAMA PARVA).—Continued.

Parashara said —

1. Nobody in this world does good to another. Nobody makes gifts to others. All persons are seen to act for their own selves.

2. People are seen to abandon their very parents and their uterine brothers when these cease to love them. What need be said then of relatives of other grades.

3. Gifts to a distinguished person and acceptance of the gifts made by a distinguished person both produce equal merit. Of these two acts, however, the making of a gift is superior to the acceptance thereof.

4. That wealth which is gained by fair means and is multiplied by fair means, should be protected with care for the sake of acquiring virtue. This is an accepted truth.

5. One desirous of gaining virtue, should never gain riches by means involving injury to others. One should perform his acts according to his power, without zealously seeking riches.

6. By giving water, whether cold or heated by fire, with a devoted mind to a (thirsty) guest, according to the best of his might, one acquires the merit of the act of giving food to a hungry man.

7. The great Rantideva acquired success, in all the worlds by adoring the ascetics with offerings of only roots and fruits and leaves.

8. The royal son of Shivi also acquired the highest regions of happiness by having pleased the Sun-god along with his companion with offerings of the same sort.

9. All men, by being born, become indebted to gods, guests, servants, Pitris, and their own selves. Every one should, therefore, do his best for satisfying those debts.

10. One frees oneself from his debt to the great Rishis by studying the Vedas. One satisfies his debts to the gods by celebrating sacrifices. By performing the rites of the Shraddha one satisfies the debts to the Pitris. One satisfies the debt to his fellow men by doing good to them.

11. One satisfies the debts he owes to one's own self by listening to Vedic recitations and reflecting on their meaning, by eating the remnants of sacrifices, and by supporting his body. One should duly perform all the acts, from the beginning, that he owes to his servants.

12. Though shorn of wealth, men are seen to attain to success by great exertions. Ascetics by duly adoring the gods and by duly pouring libations of clarified butter on the sacred fire, have been seen to acquire ascetic success.

13. Richika's son became the son of Vishwamitra. By worshipping the gods who have shares in sacrificial offerings, with Richs, (he acquired success in after life).

14. Ushanas became Shukra by having pleased the god of gods. Indeed by singing the praises of the goddess (Una), he sports in the sky, in great effulgence.

15—17. Then, again, Asita and Devala, and Narada and Parvata, and Kakshivat, and Jamadagni's son Rama, and Tandya possessed of purified soul and Vashishtha, and Jamadagni, and Vishwamitra, and Atri, and Bharadwaja, and Harishmashru, and Kundadhara, and Shrutashravas,—these great Rishis, by worshipping Vishnu with concentrated minds with the help of Richs, and by penances, acquired success through the grace of that great god gifted with intelligence.

18. Many undeserving men, by worshipping that good god, won great distinction. One should not seek for advancement by committing any wicked or censurable deed.

19. That wealth which acquired by fair means is true wealth. Fie on that wealth however, which is acquired by unfair means. Virtue is eternal. It should never, in this world, be renounced from desire of riches.

20. That pious person who keeps his sacred fire and offers his daily adorations to the gods is considered as the foremost of righteous persons. All the Vedas, O foremost of kings, are established on the three sacred fires.

21. That Brahmana is said to possess the sacred fire whose acts exist in full. It is better to at once leave off the sacred fire than to keep it, abstaining from acts.

22. 'The sacred fire, the mother, the father who has begotten, and the preceptor, O foremost men, should all be duly attended and served with humility.

23. That man, who, renouncing all feelings of pride, humbly attends upon and serves them who are venerable for age, who is endued with learning and shorn of lust, who regains all creatures equally with an eye of love, who has no riches, who is righteous in his acts, and who is shorn of the desire of inflicting any kind of injury, that truly respectable man is adored in this world by the good and pious.

qualities. The life of human beings in this world is fickle and transitory.

7. 'That wise man who, in happiness as also in misery, acquires only what is good, is considered as a true observer of the scriptures.

8. That man who is gifted with intelligence would never do an act which is alienated from virtue, however great may the advantages be of that act. Indeed, such an act is not considered as truly wholesome.

9. That lawless king who, taking thousands of kine from their lawful owners, gives them away acquires no fruit save an empty sound. On the other hand, he commits the sin of theft.

10. The Self-create at first created the Being called Dhatri held in universal esteem. Dhatri created a son who was engaged in maintaining all the worlds.

11. Adoring that god, the Vaishya engages for the means of his support, in agriculture and the tending of cattle. The Kshatriyas should undertake the task of protecting all the other classes. The Brahmanas should only enjoy.

12. As regards the Shudras, they should take up the task of humbly and honestly the donor makes after seeking out the donee and respecting him properly. That gift is middling which the donor makes upon being prayed for it.

19 That gift, however, which is made contemptously and without any respect, is said to be very inferior. This is what the truthful sages say.

20 While sinking in this ocean of life, man should always try to cross that ocean by various means. Indeed, he should so exert himself that he might be released from the fetters of this world.

21. The Brahmana shines by self-control, the Kshatriya by victory, the Vaishya by riches, while the Shudra always shines in glory through clever serving.

CHAPTER CCXCV.

Parashara said —

1—2 In the Brahmana, wealth gained by acceptance of gifts, in the Kshatriya that acquired by victory in battle, in the Vaishya that acquired by performing the duties laid down for his order, and in the Shudra that acquired by serving the three other orders, however small it may be, is worthy of praise, and when spent for the acquisition of virtue yields great benefits The Shudra is said to be the constant servitor of the three other orders.

3. If the Brahmana, when hard-pressed for a living, performs the duties of either the Kshatriya or the Vaishya, he does not fall off from virtue. When, however, the Brahmana performs the duties of the lowest order, then does he certainly fall off.

4 When the Shudra is unable to secure his living by service of the three other orders, then it is lawful for him to follow trade, tending of cattle, and the practice of the mechanical arts.

5—6. Appearance on the stage and disguising oneself in various forms, exhibition of puppets, the sale of spirits and meat, and trading in iron and leather, should never be adopted for purposes of a living by one who had never before been engaged in those callings every one of which is regarded as censurable in the world We have heard that if one engaged in them can renounce them, he acquires great merit.

7. When one who has become successful in life acts sinfully on account of his mind being filled with pride, his acts under such circumstances can never pass for authority

8 It is heard in the Purans that formerly mankind were self controlled, that they valued virtue greatly, that the practices they followed for livelihood were all agreeable to propriety and the injunctions laid down in the scriptures, and that the only punishment that was necessary for chastising them when they did wrong was merely the deprecation of their deeds.

9 At the time of which we speak, O king, Virtue, and nothing else, was much praised among men Having achieved great progress in virtue, men in those days adored only all good qualities that they saw.

10. The Asuras, however, O child, could not bear that virtue which prevailed in the world. Multiplying the Asuras entered the bodies of men.

11. Then was pride generated in men which is so destructive of virtue. From pride originated arrogance, and from arrogance originated anger.

12. When men thus became overwhelmed with anger, modesty and shame disappeared from them, and then they were possessed by carelessness.

13. Afflicted by carelessness they could no longer see as before, and as the consequence thereof they began to assail one another and thereby gain riches without any compunction.

14 When men became such, the punishment of mere deprecation on transgressors could produce no effect. Men, showing no respect for either the gods or Brahmanas, began to indulge their senses to their fill.

15 At that time the gods repaired to that foremost of gods, viz., Shiva, possessed of patience, of multiform aspect, and endued with the foremost of qualities and sought his protection.

16 The gods gave him their conjoined energy, and thereupon the great god, with a single arrow killed on the Earth those three Asuras, viz., Desire, Anger, and Cupidity, who were staying in the sky, along with their very dwellers.

17 The dreadful king of those Asuras, endued with terrific prowess, who had struck the gods with terror, was also killed by Mahadeva armed with the lance.

18. When this king of the Asuras was killed men once more gained their proper natures, and once more began to study the Vedas and the other scriptures as in days of yore.

19 Then the seven ancient Rishis came forward and installed Vasava as the king of the gods and the ruler of heaven. And they took upon themselves the task of holding the rod of punishment over mankind.

20. After the seven Rishis came king Vipruthu and many other kings, all belonging to the Kshatriya order for separately ruling separate classes of human beings.

21. There were, in those ancient times, certain elderly men from whose minds all wicked feelings did not disappear.

22. Hence, on account of that wicked state of their minds and of those incidents connected with it, there appeared many kings of dreadful prowess who began to perform only such acts as were fit for Asuras.

23. Those human beings, who are very foolish follow those wicked acts, establish them as authorities, and practise them to this day.

24. Therefore, O king, I say, you, having reflected properly with the help of the scriptures, that one should avoid all acts that are fraught with injury or malice and try to acquire a knowledge of the Soul.

25. The man endued with wisdom would not seek riches for the performance of religious rites by unfair and immoral ways. Wealth acquired by such means can never yield benefits.

26 Do you, then, become a Kshatriya of this kind! Do you restrain your senses, be kind to your friends, and cherish, according to the duties of your order, your subjects, servants, and children.

27. Through the union of both prosperity and adversity, there arise friendships and enmities Thousands and thousands of existences are continually revolving, and in every mode of individual Soul's existence these must take place

28 Therefore, be attached to good qualities of every sort, but never to faults Such is the nature of good qualities that if the most foolish person, shorn of every virtue, hears himself praised for any good quality, he becomes filled with joy.

29 Virtue and sin exist, O king, only among men. These do not exist among other creatures.

30. One should, therefore, whether in need of food and other necessaries of life or above such need, be of virtuous disposition, acquire knowledge, always consider all creatures as his own self, and abstain totally from inflicting any kind of injury.

31. When one's mind becomes shorn of desire, and when all Darkness is removed from it, it is then that one acquires what is auspicious.

CHAPTER CCXCVI.

Parashara said:—

1. I have now described to you the ordained duties of a householder. I shall now describe to you the ordinances about penances. Hear me as I describe that subject.

2. It is generally seen, O king, that on account of sentiments fraught with Darkness and Ignorance, the sense of mine begotten by attachment, originates in the heart of the householder.

3. Becoming a householder, one acquires kine, fields, wealth of diverse sorts, wives children, and servants.

4. One who follows this mode of life continually casts his eye upon these objects. Under these circumstances, one's attachments and aversions multiply, and one ceases to consider unreal possessions as eternal and indestructible.

5 When a person becomes possessed by attachment and aversion, and gives way to the control of worldly objects, the desire of enjoyment then seizes him, originating from carelessness, O king.

6. Considering that person as blessed who has the largest share of enjoyments in this world, the man devoted to enjoyment does not, on account of his attachment thereto, see that there is any other happiness save what depends upon the gratification of the senses.

7 Overwhelmed with cupidity that originates from such attachment, he then tries to multiply the number of his relatives and attendants, and for pleasing these latter he tries to increase his wealth by every means in his power.

8. Filled with affection for children, such a person then commits, for the sake of acquiring riches, evil deeds, and yields to grief if his wealth be lost.

9 Having acquired honors and always guarding against the defeat of his plans, he follows such means as would satisfy his desire of enjoyment. At last he meets with destruction as the inevitable result of the conduct he follows.

10. It is well known, however, that true happiness is theirs who are endued with intelligence, who are Brahmavadins, who try to perform only auspicious and beneficial acts, and who abstain from all acts which are optional and originate from desire only.

11. From loss of all such objects in which are centred our affections, from loss of riches, O king, and from the oppression of physical diseases and mental anguish, a person falls into despair.

12 From this despair originates an awakening of the soul. From such an awakening proceeds study of the Scriptures. From contemplation of the meaning of the Scriptures, O king, one sees the value of penance.

13. A person endued with the knowledge of what is essential and what accidental, O king, is very rare,—a man who tries to practise penances, under the conviction that the happiness one enjoys from the possession of such agreeable objects as wives and children brings on ultimately misery.

14. Penances, O child, are for all. They are ordained for even the lowest order of men, Penances lead the self controlled man who has mastered all his senses to the way to heaven.

15. It was through penances that the powerful Lord of all creatures, O king, practising vows at particular intervals, created all existent objects.

16—17. The Aditya's, the Vasus, the Rudras, Agni, the Ashwins, the Maruts, the Vishwedevas, the Saddhyas, the Pitris, the Maruts, the Yakshas, the Rakshasas, the Gandharvas, the Siddhas and the other inhabitants of heaven, and indeed, all other celestials whatever, O child, have all become successful through their penances.

18 Those Brahmanas whom Brahman created at the beginning, succeeded through their penances in honoring not the Earth alone but the heaven also in which they moved about at pleasure.

19. In this world of men, they who are kings, and those others who are householders born in high families, have all become what they are on account of their penances.

20. The silken dresses they put on the excellent ornaments that decorate their persons, the animals and vehicles they ride, and the seats they use are all the outcome of their penances.

21. Thousands of many charming and beautiful damsels, that they enjoy, and their residence in palaces, are all on account of their penances.

22. The righteous enjoy various sorts of costly beds and sweet viands.

23. There is nothing in the three worlds, O scorcher of enemies, that penances cannot bring in Even those who are shorn of true knowledge acquire Renunciation their penances.

24. Whether in rich circumstances or miserable, a person should renounce cupidity, meditating on the scriptures, with the help of his mind and understanding, O best of kings.

25 Discontent produces misery. Cupidity brings on stupefaction of the senses. The senses being stupefied, one's wisdom is lost like knowledge not kept up by continued application.

26 When one's wisdom is lost, he cannot discriminate what is proper from what is improper. Hence, when one's happiness is destroyed he should practise the austerest of penances.

27. What is agreeable is called happiness What is disagreeable is called misery. Happiness is the outcome of penances practised. When they are not practised, the outcome is misery. See the fruits of practising and abstaining from penances.

28. By practising pure penances, people always enjoy auspicious consequences of every sort, enjoy all good things, and acquire great fame.

29. He, however, who, by abandoning (pure penances), undertakes penances from desire of fruit, suffers from many disagreeable consequences, and disgrace and sorrow of all sorts, as the fruits thereof, all of which originate from worldly possessions.

30. Despite the desirability of practising virtue, penances, and gifts, the desire for doing all sorts of forbidden acts originates in his mind. By thus perpetrating various sorts of sinful deeds, he goes to hell.

31. That person, O best of men, who, in both happinesss and misery, does deviate from the duties ordained for him, is said to have the scriptures for his eye.

32. It is said that the pleasure one gets from the gratification of his senses of touch, tongue, sight, smell, and hearing, O king; lasts only so long as an arrow shot off the bow takes in falling down upon the Earth.

33. Upon the termination of that pleasure, which is fickle, one suffers the most acute pain It is only the senseless that do not speak highly of happiness of Liberation which is peerless.

34. Seeing the misery consequent upon the gratification of the senses, the wise cultivate the virtues of tranquility and self-control for the purpose of acquiring Liberation. On account of their righteous conduct, riches and pleasure can never succeed in afflicting them.

35 Householders may, without any compunction, enjoy riches and other possessions which are acquired without Exertion About the duties of their order, I think, they should satisfy them with the help of Exertion.

36 The practice of those who are honored, who are born in high families, and who have their eyes always turned towards the meaning of the Scriptures, is incapable of being followed by those who are sinful and who have uncontrolled minds.

37 All acts that are done by man under the influence of pride, meet with destruction Therefore, there is no other act, for the respectable and the truly righteous, in this world to do than penance.

38 As regards, those householders, however, who are addicted to acts, they should, with their whole hearts, perform acts. Following the duties of their order, O king, they should with diligence and assiduity celebrate sacrifices and other religious rites.

39. Indeed, as all rivers, male and female, go in the end to the Ocean, so men belonging to all the other orders have the householder for their refuge.

CHAPTER CCXCVII.

Janaka said:—

1. Whence, O great Rishi, does this difference of color arise among men of the different orders? I wish to know this. Tell me this, O foremost of speakers.

2. The Shrutis say that the offspring one begets is his own self Originally sprung from Brahman, all the inhabitants of the Earth should have been Brahmanas Sprung from Brahmanas, why have men begun to perform works distinguished from those of Brahmanas?

Parashara said:—

3—4 It is as you say, O king! The offspring begotten by one is none else than the begetter himself. Because men have deviated from penance, this distribution into classes of different colors has taken place When the soil and the seed is good, the offspring produced becomes meritorious. If, however, the soil and seed are inferior, the offspring that will be born will be inferior.

5 Persons well read in the scriptures know that when the Lord of all creatures began to create the worlds, some creatures originated from his mouth, some from his arms, some from his thighs, and some from his feet.

6. Those who came out of his mouth, O child, were called Brahmanas. Those who originated from his arms were called Kshatriyas. Those, O king, sprang from his thighs were the rich class called the Vaishyas. And, lastly, those who were born of his feet were the serving class, viz, the Shudras.

7. Only these four orders of men, O king, were thus created. They who belong to classes besides these are said to have originated from an intermixture of these.

8—9 The Kshatriyas called Atirathas, Amvashthas, Ugras, Vaidehas, Shwapakas, Pukkasas, Stenas, Nishadas, Sutas, Magadhas, Ayogas, Karanas, Vratyas, and Chandalas, O monarch, have all originated from the four original castes by intermixture with one another.

Janaka said:—

10 When all have originated from Brahman alone, how did human beings become divergent of race? O best of ascetics, numberless diversity of races is seen in this world.

11. How could men devoted to penances acquire the dignity of Brahmanas, though of indiscriminate origin? Indeed, those born in pure wombs and those in impure, all became Brahmanas.

Parashara said:—

12. O king, the status of great persons who succeeded in purifying their souls by penances could not be regarded as affected by their low births.

13 Great Rishis, O monarch, by begetting children in indiscriminate wombs, gave them the dignity of Rishis by means of their power of asceticism.

14—16 My grandfather Vashishtha, Rishyashringa, Kashyapa, Veda, Tandya, Kripa, Kakshivat, Kamatha, and others, and Yavakrita, O king, and Drona, that foremost of speakers, and Ayu, and Matanga and Datta, and Drupada, and Matsya,—all these, O king of the Videhas, gained their respective positions through penance as the means.

17. Originally only four families arose, O king, viz, Angiras, Kashyapa, Vashishtha and Bhrigu

18 On account of acts and behaviour, O king, many other families came into existence in time The names of those families have originated from the penances of those who have founded them. Good people use them.

Janaka said —

19 Tell me, O holy one, the especial duties of the several castes Tell me also what their common duties are. You know everything.

Parashara said —

20 Taking gifts, officiating at the sacrifices of others, and the teaching of pupils, O king, are the especial duties of the Brahmanas The protection of the other castes is the special duty of the Kshatriya.

21. Agriculture, cattle-tending, and trade are the duties of the Vaishyas. While service of the (three) twice-born classes is the duty, O king, of the Shudras.

22 I have now told you what the especial duties are of the four castes O king. Hear, now, O child as I tell you what the common duties are of all the four castes.

23—24 Compassion, abstention from injury, carefulness, giving to others what is due to them, Shraddhas in honor of departed manes, hospitality to guests, truthfulness, subjugation of anger, contentedness with one's own married wives purity, freedom from malice, knowledge of Self, and Renunciation —these duties, O king are common to all the castes

25. Brahmanas, Kshatriyas, and Vaishyas,—these are the three twice born orders They have all an equal right to the performance of these duties, O foremost of men.

26 These three castes following the duties other than those sanctioned for them, suffer indignity, O king, as they go up and acquire great merit by taking for their model some righteous individual of their respective classes who duly satisfies his own duties.

27. The Shudra never falls down, nor is he worthy of any of the rites of regeneration. The course of duties originating from the Vedas is not his He is not interdicted, however, from practising the thirteen duties which are common to all the castes.

28 O king of the Videhas, Brahmanas learned in the Vedas, O king regard a (virtuous) Shudra as equal to Brahman himself I, however, O king regard such a Shudra as the effulgent Vishnu of the universe, the foremost one in all the worlds.

29 Persons of the lowest caste, desiring to root out the evil passions may follow the conduct of the good, and, while so acting, they may acquire great merit by performing all rites that lead to advancement, omitting the Mantras which are to be uttered by the other castes while performing the self same ceremonies

30 Wherever persons of the lowest caste follow the conduct of the good, they succeed in acquiring happiness on account of which they are able to pass their time in happiness both in this world and the next.

Janaka said —

31. O great ascetic, is man sullied by his deeds or is he stained by the order or class in which he is born? A doubt has arisen in my mind. You should expound this to me

Parashara said —

32 Forsooth, O king, both, viz, acts and birth, are sources of demerit Listen now to their difference

33 That man who, though sullied by birth, does not commit sin, abstains from sin notwithstanding birth and acts

34 If, however, a person of superior birth perpetrates censurable deeds, such acts pollute him Hence, of the two, viz, acts and birth, acts pollute man.

Janaka said:—

35 What are those righteous acts in this world, O best of all twice-born ones, the accomplishment of which does not inflict any injury upon other creatures?

Parashara said —

36 Hear from me, O king, about what you ask viz, those acts free from injury which alway rescue man.

37—38 Those who, keeping aside their domestic fires, have freed themselves from all worldly attachments become freed from all anxieties Gradually getting up step by step, in the path of Yoga, they at last see the stage of highest happiness Gifted with faith and humility, always practising self control, possessed of keen intelligence, and abstaining from all acts, they acquire eternal happiness.

29 All classes of men, O king, by daily doing virtuous acts, by speaking the truth, and by abstaining from sin in this world, go up to heaven. There is no doubt in this.

CHAPTER CCXCVIII.

(MOKSHADHARMA PARVA).

Continued.

Parashara said :—

1. The father, the friends, the preceptors, and the wishes of the preceptors of men who are shorn of devotion are unable to give to those men the merits derivable from devotion. Only they who are firmly devoted to such elders, who speak what is agreeable to them, who seek their well being, and who are submissive to them in conduct, can acquire the merit of devotion.

2. The father is the highest of gods with his children. It is said that the father is superior to the mother. The acquirement of Knowledge is considered as the highest acquisition. They who have subjugated the objects of the senses, acquire what is highest.

3. That Kshatriya prince, who going to the battle-field, receives wounds amid fiery arrows shooting in all directions and burns therewith, certainly goes to regions which are unattainable by the very gods and, arrived there, enjoys the happiness of heaven in perfect contentment.

4. A Kshatriya should not, O king, strike one who is fatigued, or one who is terrified, or one who has been disarmed, or one who is weeping, or one who is reluctant to fight, or one who is unequipt with mail and cars and horse and infantry, or one who has ceased to exert in the fight, or one who is ill, or one who cries for quarter, or one who is of tender years, or one who is old.

5. A Kshatriya should, in battle, fight one of his order, who is equipt with mail and cars and horse and infantry, who is ready for battle, and who is a compeer.

6. Death at the hands of one who is equal or of a superior is praiseworthy, but not that at the hands of one that is low, or of one who is a coward, or of one who is a wretch. This is well known.

7. Death at the hands of one who is sinful, or of one who is of low birth and wicked conduct, O king, is infamous and leads to hell.

8. One whose lease of life has run out, cannot be saved by any body. Likewise, one whose lease of life has not run out can never be killed by any one.

9 One should prevent his affectionate elders from doing to him such acts as are done by menials, as also all such acts as can injure others. One should never wish to extend his own life by taking the lives of others.

10 When they sacrifice their lives, it is laudable for all householders observing the duties of men living in sacred places to give up their lives on the banks of sacred rivers.

11. When one's lease of life is over, his body dissolved into the five elements. Sometimes this occurs suddenly and sometimes it is brought about by (natural) causes.

12. He who, having obtained a body, destroys it himself, becomes invested with another body of a similar nature. Though set on the path of Liberation, he yet becomes a traveller and acquires another body like a person going from one room into another.

13 About such a man's attainment of a second body the only cause is his accidental death. There is no second cause. That new body which embodied creatures obtain, comes into existence and becomes attached to Rudras and Pishachas.

14—15 Learned men, conversant with spiritual science say that the body is a compound of arteries and sinews and bones and much repulsive and impure matter and a compound of essences, and the senses and objects of the senses born of desire, all having an outer cover of skin close to them. Shorn of beauty and other accomplishments, this compound, through force of the desires of a pristine life, assumes a human form.

16. Left off by the owner, the body becomes inanimate and motionless. Indeed, when the principal ingredients return to their respective natures, the body is mixed up with the dust.

17. Caused by its union with deeds, this body reappears under circumstances determined by its deeds. Indeed, O king of the Videhas, under whatever circumstances this body is dissolved, its next birth, determined by these circumstances, is seen to enjoy and endure the fruits of all its pristine deeds.

18. Individual Soul after dissolution of the body it inhabited, does not, O king, take birth in a different boy at once.

19 It roves through the sky for sometime like a spacious cloud. Getting a new receptacle, O king, it then takes birth again.

20. The soul is above the mind. The mind is above the senses. Mobile creatures, again, are foremost of all created objects.

21. Amongst mobile creatures the two legged ones are superior. Amongst two legged creatures, those that are twice-born are superior.

22. Amongst those that are twice born they who are endued with wisdom are superior. Amongst them who are endued with wisdom they that have succeeded in acquiring a knowledge of the soul are superior. Amongst those who are endued with a knowledge of the soul, those who are endued with humility are superior.

23 Death follows birth in all men This is settled Creatures, influenced by the qualities of Goodness, Darkness and Ignorance, pursue acts which have an end

24—25. That man is considered as righteous who meets with dissolution when the Sun is in the northern declension, and at a time and under a constellation both of which are sacred and auspicious, He is righteous who, having purified himself of all sins and performed all his acts according to the best of his might and having abstained from giving pain to any man, meets with death when it comes.

26 The death that one meets with by taking poison, by hanging, by burning, at the hands of robbers and at the teeth of animals, is said to be an infamous one.

27. Those men who are righteous never meet with such or similar deaths even if they be afflicted with mental and physical diseases of the most painful sort.

28—29 The lives of the pious, O king, piercing through the Sun ascend into the regions of Brahman The lives of those who are both righteous and sinful rove in the middle regions The lives of those who are sinful sink into the lowest depths There is one only enemy (of man) and not another. That enemy is at one with Ignorance, O king Overwhelmed by it, one is led to prepetrate frightful and exceedingly cruel deeds

30 That enemy for resisting which one should display his energy waiting upon the aged according to the duties laid down in the Shruti —that enemy which cannot be overcome except by steady endeavours — meets with destruction, O king only when it is crushed by the arrows of wisdom.

31 The man desirous of acquiring merit should at first study the Vedas and practise penances, becoming a Brahmachárin He should next, becoming a householder, perform the usual Sacrifices. Establishing his race, he should then enter the forest, controlling his senses, and desirous of acquiring Liberation.

32. One should never emaciate himself by abstaining from every enjoyment Of all births, that of a human being is preferable even if one has to become a Chandala.

33. Indeed, O king, that order of birth (viz, humanity) is the foremost, since by becoming a human being one succeeds in rescuing his self by meritorious acts.

34 Men always perform righteous acts, O lord, guided by the authority of the Shrutis, so that they may not deviate from the status of humanity.

35 That man who having been born as a man that is so difficult of attainment, indulges in malice, disregards righteousness and gives way to desire, is certainly betrayed by his desires.

36—37. That man who regards all creatures impartially guided by affection, considering them worthy of being cherished with loving aid, who disregards all sorts of wealth, who offers them consolation, gives them food, addresses them in sweet words, and who rejoices in their happiness and grieves in their sorrows, has never to suffer misery in the next world.

38 Repairing to the Saraswati, the Naimisha forest, the Pushkara lake, and the other sacred spots on Earth one should make gifts, practise renunciation, render his aspect amiable, O king, and purify his body with baths and penances

39 Those men who meet with death within their houses should have their bodies cremated Their bodies should be taken to the crematorium on cars and there they should be burnt according to the rites of purification that have been laid down in the scriptures

40 Religious rites, beneficial ceremonies, the performance of sacrifices, oblation at the sacrifices of others, gifts, the doing of other meritorious deeds the performance according to the best of his power, of all that has been ordained in the case of his deceased ancestors,—all these one does for benefiting his own self.

41 The Vedas with their six branches, and the other scriptures, O king have been created for the behoof of him who is of pure deeds.

Bhishma continued:—

42 All this was said by that great sage to the king of the Videhas, O king, in days of yore for his well being.

CHAPTER CCXCIX.

Daksha said:—

1. Once again Janaka, the king of Mithila, asked the great Parashara gifted with certain knowledge regarding all duties.

Janaka said:—

2. What yields good? What is the best path (for living creatures)? What is that which being done is never destroyed? What is that spot going where one has not to return? Tell me all this, O you of great intelligence.

Parashara said —

3 Dissociation is the root of what is the root of what is good. Knowledge is the greatest path. Penances practised are never destroyed Gifts also, made to worthy persons, are not lost.

4 When one, snapping the fetters of sin, begins to take pleasure in virtue, and when one makes that highest of all gifts, viz, the promise of all harmlessness to all creatures, then does one acquire success.

5 He who gives away thousands of kine and hundreds of horses, and who promises harmlessness to all creatures receives in return the promise of harmlessness from all.

6 One may live in the midst of all sorts of riches and enjoyment, yet, if blessed with intelligence, one does not live in them, while he who is shorn of intelligence lives wholly in objects of enjoyment which are even unsubstantial.

7. Sin cannot attach to a wise man as water cannot drench the leaves of the lotus Sin sticks more firmly to him who is without attachment as lac and wood stick firmly to each other.

8 Sin, which cannot be dissipated except by endurance of its fruits, never leaves the doer The doer, when the time comes, has to suffer the consequences thereof.

9 They, however, who are of purified souls and who realise the existence of Brahma, are never afflicted by the fruits of their deeds.

10. Careless in about one's senses of knowledge and of action, one who is not conscious of his wicked deeds, and whose heart is attached to both good and bad, becomes afflicted with great fear.

11. One who at all times becomes entirely freed from attachments and who completely subdues the passion of anger, is never sullied by sin even if he lives in the enjoyment of worldly objects.

12 As a dyke set across a river, if not washed away, makes the waters thereof to swell up, so the man who, without being attached to objects of pleasure, creaes the dyke of virtue whose materials consist of the limitations set down in the scriptures, has never to wane away. On the other hand, his merits and penances increase.

13 As the pure gem absorbs and attracts to itself, according to the natural law, the rays of the Sun, so, O foremost of kings does Yoga proceed by help of rapt attention

14 As sesame seeds, for being always with sweet-scented flowers, become in respect of quality very sweet, so the quality of Goodness arises in men proportionate to the extent of their association with persons of purified souls.

15 When one becomes desirous of living in heaven, he abandons his wives and riches and rank and vehicles and various sorts of good deeds Indeed, when one gets such a bent of mind, his understanding is said to be dissociated from the objects of the senses.

16 That man who, with understanding attached to the objects of the senses, becomes blind to what is for his real well-being, is dragged by his heart which runs after all earthly objects, like a fish by the bait of meat.

17. Like the body that is made up of different limbs and organs, all mortal creatures exist depending upon one another. They are weak like the pith of the bannana plant They sink in the world's ocean like a boat.

18 There is no fixed time for the acquisition of virtue Death waits for no man When man is constantly running towards the jaws of Death, the doing of pious deeds is proper at all times.

19 Like a blind man who, with attention, can move about in his own house, the wise man, with mind fixed on Yoga, can proceed along the road.

20 It has been said that death originates from birth Birth is subject to the control of death One unacquainted with the course of the duties of Liberation revolves like a wheel between birth and death, unable to free himself from that fate.

21. One who walks along the road recommanded by the understanding acquires happiness both in this world and the next. Many of them are fraught with misery;

while the Few yield happiness Fruits represented by Nescience form the Many. Renunciation yields the soul's happiness

22. As the lotus stalk quickly leaves the mire attached to it, so the Soul can quickly renounce the mind.

23 It is the mind that at first inclines the Soul to Yoga The latter then merges the former into itself. When the Soul gains success in Yoga, it then sees itself uninvested with qualities.

24 Engaged amid the objects of the senses, one who considers such engagement to be his employment falls away from his true employment on account of such devotion to those objects.

25 The soul of the wise man acquires, through its pious deeds, a state of great happiness in heaven, while that of the man who is not endued with wisdom sinks very low or is born among intermediate creatures.

26. As a liquid substance, if kept in a baked earthen pot, does not escape therefrom but remains undiminished similarly, one's body with which one has practised penances enjoys (without rejecting) all objects of pleasure.

27. Verily, that man who enjoys earthly objects can never be liberated That man, however, who renounces such objects, succeeds in enjoying great happiness hereafter.

28. Like one suffering from blindness and, therefore, incapable of seeing his way, the sensualist, with soul confined in an opaque case, seems to be surrounded by a mist and cannot see (the true object).

29 As merchants, going across the sea, make profits according to their capital so creatures, in this world of men, attain to ends poportionate to their respective deeds

30 Like a snake devouring air, Death walks in this world made up of days and nights in the form of Decrepitude and devours all creatures.

31. A creature, when born, enjoys or suffers the fruits of deeds done by him in his pristine lives There is nothing agreeable or disagreeable which one enjoys or suffers without its being the result of the deeds one has done in his previous lives.

32. Whether lying or proceeding, whether sitting idly or engaged in his business, in whatever state a man may be, his pristine deeds good or bad, always approach him.

33 One who has gone to the other end of the ocean, wishes not to cross the sea for returning to the bank whence he had sailed.

34 As the fisherman, when he wishes, raises with the help of his chord his boat sunk in the wafers, similarly the mind by the help of Yoga contemplation, raises individual Soul sunk in the world's ocean and unliberated from consciousness of body.

35 As all rivers running towards the ocean, join it, so the mind, when engaged in Yoga, becomes united with primal Nature.

36 Men whose minds become fettered by various bonds of affection, and who are sunk in ignorance, meet with destruction like houses of sand in water.

37 That embodied creature who considers his body as only a house and purity as its sacred water, and who walks along the road of the understanding, acquires happiness both in this world and the next.

38 The Many yield misery, while the Few yield happiness The Many are the fruits represented by the Nescience Renunciation produces the soul s benefit.

39 One's friends who originate from his determination, and one's kinsmen whose attachment is due to selfish reasons, one's wives and sons and servants only devour his riches.

40 Neither the mother, nor the father, can confer the slightest benefit upon him in the next world Gifts form the diet upon which he can live Indeed, one is compelled to enjoy the fruits of his own deeds

41 The mother, the son, the father, the brother, the wife and friends, are like lines drawn with gold by the side of gold itself.

42 All acts, good and bad, done in pristine lives, visit the doer. Knowing that everything enjoys or suffers at present is the outcome of his pristine deeds, the soul makes the understanding move on different directions.

43 Depending on earnest endeavour and equipped with proper aids, he who undertakes to accomplish his tasks never meets with failure

44. As the rays of light never abandon the Sun, so prosperity never leaves him who has firm faith.

45 That act which a man of pure soul does with faith and earnestness, with the help of proper means, without pride, and with intelligence, becomes never lost.

46 A creature obtains from the very time of his residence in the mother's womb all his own acts good, and bad that were acquired by him in his pristine lives. Death, which is irresistible, helped by Time which encompasses the destruction of life, takes all creatures to their end like wind scattering the dust of sawed timber.

47. Through acts good and bad done by himself in his pristine lives, man acquires gold and animals, and wives, and children, and honor of birth, and costly possessions, and his entire affluence.

Bhishma continued:—

48. Thus addressed agreeably to the truth by the sage, Janaka, that foremost of pious men, O king, heard everything the Rishi said and acquired great happiness from it.

CHAPTER CCC.

(MOKSHADHARMA PARVA)—Continued.

Yudhisthira said:—

1. O grandfather, learned men praise truth, self-control, forgiveness and wisdom What is your opinion about these virtues?

Bhishma said:—

2. Regarding it I shall recite to you an old narrative, O Yudhisthira, of the discourse between the Sadhyas and a Swan.

3. Once on a time the uncreate and eternal Lord of all creatures, assuming the form of a golden Swan, passed through the three worlds till in course of his ramblings he came upon the Sadhyas.

The Saddhyas said:—

4. O lord, we are the gods called Sadhyas. We like to question you. Indeed, we would ask you about the religion of Liberation. You are well acquainted with it.

5. We have heard, O bird, that you are endued with great learning, and eloquent and wise of speech O bird, what do you think is the highest of all objects? O great one, in what does your mind find pleasure?

6 Do you, therefore, O foremost of birds, instruct us as to what that one act is which you consider as the foremost of all acts, and by doing which, O king of birds, one may soon be freed from all fetters.

The Swan said:—

7. O nectar-drinking ones, I have heard that one should follow these, viz, penances, self control, truth, and subjugation of the mind. Losing all the knots of the heart, one should also bring under his control both what is pleasant and what is unpleasant.

8 One should not cut the vitals of others One should not utter cruel words. One should never receive scriptural lectures from a mean person. One should never utter such words as pain others, as make others miserable, and as lead to hell.

9 Wordy arrows fall from the lips. Pierced therewith one burns always. Those arrows do not cut any other part than the very vitals of the person aimed. Hence he who is a learned man, should never aim them at others.

10 If a person deeply cuts a wise man with wordy arrows, the wise man should remain silent. The man who, though sought to be angered, rejoices without giving way to anger, takes away from the provoker all his merits.

11. That man of virtuous soul, who, full of joy and shorn of malice, control his burning ire which, if indulged, would lead him to speak ill of others and verily become his enemy, takes away the merits of others.

12 As for myself, I never answer when another speaks ill of me. If attacked, I always forgive the assault The righteous hold that forgiveness, truth, sincerity and compassion are the foremost (of all vitues).

13 Truth is the essence of the Vedas. The essence of Truth is self-control. The essence of self-control is Liberation. This is the teaching of all the scriptures.

14 I know that person as a Brahmana and Muni who governs the rising impulse of speech, the impulse of anger appearing in the mind, the impulse of thirst, and the impulses of the stomach and the organ of pleasure.

15 One who does not give way to anger is superior to one who does. One who practises renunciation is superior to one who does not. One who possesses the virtues of manhood is superior to one who has them not. One who has knowledge is superior to one who has not got it.

16 Assailed with harsh words, one should not assail in return. Indeed, one who, under such circumstances, renounces anger, succeeds in burning the assailer and taking away all his merits.

17. That person who when attacked with harsh words, does not utter a harsh word in reply, who when lauded does not say what is pleasant to him who praises who is gifted with such fortitude as not to strike in return when struck and not to even wish evil to the striker, finds his company always sought after by the gods.

18. A sinful man should be forgiven as if he were righteous by one who is insulted, struck, and calumniated By acting in this way one gains success.

19 Though all my objects have been fulfilled, yet I always wait respectfully on the righteous I have no thirst My anger has been suppressed Seduced by covetousness I do not deviate from the path of virtue I do not also approach any one with prayers for riches.

20 If cursed I do not curse in return I know that self control is the door of immortality I disclose to you a great mystery There is no position that is superior to that of humanity.

21. Freed from sin like the Moon from misty clouds the wise man, shining in resplendence, acquires success by patiently waiting for his time.

22. A person of controlled soul, who becomes the object of worship with all by becoming the foremost of the pillars of the universe, and to whom only agreeable words are addressed by all, acquires the companionship of the gods.

23 Revilers never speak of the merits of a person as readily as they speak of his demerits.

24. That person whose speech and mind are properly controlled and always devoted to the Supreme, gets the fruits of the Vedas, Penances, and Renunciation.

25. The wise man should never revile (in return) those who have no merit, by speaking out their dispraise and by insults He should not extol others and should never injure themselves.

26. The wise and learned man considers revilement as nectar Reviled, he sleeps without anxiety The reviler, on the other hand, meets with destruction.

27. The sacrifices that one celebrates angrily, the gifts one makes in angrily, the penances one practices angrily, and the offerings and libations one makes to the sacred fire angrily, are such that their merits are robbed by Yama The toil of an angry man becomes entirely futile.

28 Ye foremost of immortals, that person is said to be conversant with virtue whose four doors viz the organ of generation, the stomach, the two arms, and speech, are well governed.

29 That person who, always practising truth and self control and sincerity and mercy and patience and renunciation becomes devoted to the study of the Vedas, does not covet others' possessions, and pursues what is good with a singleness of purpose, succeeds in going to heaven.

30 Like a calf sucking all the four teets of its dam s udders, one should devote himself to the practice of all these virtues. I do not know whether anything exists more sacred than Truth.

31. Having walked among both human beings and the gods, I say that Truth is the only means for reaching heaven even as a ship is the only means for crossing deep.

32 A person becomes like those with whom he lives, and like those whom he respects, and like to what he wishes to be.

33 If a person waits respectfully on him who is good, or him who is otherwise, if he waits respectfully on a sage endued with ascetic merit or on a thief, passes under his control and gets his color like a piece of cloth catching the dye in which it is washed.

34 The gods always talk with those who are good and wise. They, therefore, never entertertain the desire for even seeing the enjoyments in which men take pleasure. The person who knows that all objects of enjoyment are subject to changes has few rivals and is superior to the very Moon and the Wind.

35 When the Purusha that lives in one's heart is pure, and walks in the path of the righteous, the gods take a pleasure in him

36 The gods shun from a distance those who are always devoted to the gratification of their senses of pleasure and the stomach, who are given to thieving, and who always indulge in harsh words, even if they expiate their offences by performing the proper rites

37 The gods are never gratified with one of mean soul, with one who observes no restraint in the matter of food, and with one who is of sinful deeds On the other hand, the gods associate with those men who observe the vow of truth, who are grateful, and who are engaged in the practice of virtue.

38 Silence is better than speech To speak the truth is better than silence To speak, again, truth what is connected with virtue is better than to speak the truth. To speak what, besides being true and righteous is agreeable, is better than to speak truth connected with virtue.

The Saddhyas said :—

39. By what is this world covered? hy does one fail to shine? For what use do people renounce their friends? hy do people fail to go to heaven.

ıe Swan said :—

40. The world is covered by Ignorance. :n fail to shine on account of malice. ople renounce friends, actuated by covet- sness Men fail to attain to heaven on :ount of attachment.

ıe Saddhayas said —

41. Who alone among the Brahmanas always happy? Who alone amongst :m can practise the vow of silence though ing in the midst of many? Who alone ıongst them, though weak, is still con- ered as strong? And who alone ıongst them does not quarrel.

ıe Swan said :—

42. He alone amongst the Brahmanas o is endued with wisdom is always happy : alone amongst the Brahmanas who is lued with wisdom, succeeds in practising : vow of silence though living in the dst of many. He alone amongst the ahmanas who is endued with wisdom, ugh actually weak, is considered as ong. He alone amongst them who has dom succeeds in avoiding quarrel.

ıe Saddhyas said —

43 Wherein lies the divinity of the ahmanas? In what their purity? In at their impurity? And in what their tus of humanity?

ıe Swan said —

44 The divinity of the Brahmanas con- sin the study of the Vedas. Their purity is heir vows and observances. In obliquy is ir impurity. In death is their humanity.

ishma said —

45 Thus have I recited to you the cellent discourse between the Saddhyas d the Swan). The body is the origin acts, and existence or individual Soul is th" and the Yoga systems of philosophy. O foremost one of Kuru's race, you know everything is known, O you who are conversant with all duties."

Bhishma said :—

42. "The followers of Sankhya praise the Sankhya system and the Yogins praise the Yoga system For fixing the superiority of their respective systems, each calls his own system to be better.

43 Wise men devoted to Yoga point out proper and very good reasons, O crusher of enemies, for showing that one who does not believe in the existence of God cannot acquire Liberation.

44—45. Those twice-born ones, again, who are believers in the Sankhya doctrines forward good reasons for showing that a person by acquiring true knowledge of all objects, becomes dissociated from all earthly objects, and, after death, it is plain, becomes liberated and that it cannot be otherwise. Men of great wisdom have thus expounded the Sankhya philosophy of Liberation.

46 When reasons are thus equally placed on both sides, those are assigned on that side which one is otherwise inclined to follow as one's own, should be accepted. Indeed those words that are said on that side should be considered as wholesome. Good men may be found on both sides. Persons like you may adopt either opinion.

47. The evidences of Yoga are addressed to the direct perception of the senses; those of Sankhya are based on the scriptures. Both systems of philosophy are approved by me, O Yudhisthira.

48 I agree with both those systems of science, O king, so do the good and wise. If practised duly according to the instructions laid down, both would, O king, make a person acquire the highest end.

49 In both systems purity is equally recommended as also mercy towards all creatures, O sinless one. In both, again, the observance of vows has been equally sanctioned. Only the scriptures which point out their paths are different.

carelessness, affection, lust and anger one acquires Liberation.

12. As large fishes, breaking through the net pass into their own element, similarly, Yogins, become purged of all sins and acquire the happiness of Liberation.

13 As powerful animals breaking through the nets in which hunters catch them, enjoy the happiness of freedom, so Yogins freed from all fetters attain to the pure path that leads to Liberation.

14. Truly, O king, breaking through the fetters born of cupidity, Yogins, gifted with strength acquire the sinless and auspicious and high path of Liberation.

15 Feeble animals, O king, entangled in nets, are, forsooth, destroyed. Such is the case with persons shorn of Yoga power.

16 As weak fishes, O son of Kunti, fallen into the net, become entangled in it, so, O king, men shorn of Yoga power meet with destruction.

17—18. As birds, O chastiser of enemies, when entangled in the fine nets of fowlers, meet with their destruction, but if they are strong effect their escape, similarly, it is the case with Yogins, O chastiser of enemies, fettered by the bonds of action, they that are weak meet with destruction, while they who are strong break through them.

19 A small and weak fire, O king, is put out when large logs of timber are placed upon it. So the Yogin who is weak, O king, encounters ruin.

20 The same fire, however, O king, when it becomes strong, would burn with the help of the wind the entire Earth.

21. Similarly, the Yogin when grown in strength, burning with energy, and endued with power is capable of scorching the entire Universe like the Sun that rises at the time of the universal dissolution.

22. As a weak man, O king, is carried away by a current, so is a weak Yogin helplessly carried away by objects of the senses.

23. An elephant withstands a powerful current. Similarly, a Yogin, having acquired Yoga-power withstands all objects of the senses.

24. Independent of all things, Yogins, gifted with Yoga-power and other bodily powers, enter into the very lords of creation, the Rishis, the gods, and the great Beings in the universe.

25 Neither Yama, nor the Destroyer, nor Death, himself of terrible power, when irate, ever succeeds in lording over the Yogin, O king, who is gifted with immeasurable energy.

26. The Yogin, acquiring Yoga-power, can create thousands of bodies and with them walks over the Earth.

27. Some amongst them enjoy objects of the senses and again practise the austerest penances, and once again, like the Sun withdraw themselves from such penances.

28. The Yogin, who is gifted with strength and whom fetters bind not, certainly succeeds in acquiring Liberation.

29 I have now described to you, O king, on all these powers of Yoga I shall once more tell you what the subtle powers of Yoga are with their marks.

30. Hear, O chief of Bharata's race, the subtle marks of the meditation and the concentration of the Soul

31. As a bowman who is careful and attentive succeeds in striking the aim so the Yogin with absorbed soul, forsooth, acquires Liberation.

32—33. As a man, fixing his mind on a vessel full of some liquid carefully ascends a flight of steps, so the Yogin, fixed and absorbed in his soul, purifies it and makes it as effulgent as the Sun.

34—35 As a boat, O son of Kunti, who is tossed on the bosom of the sea is very soon taken by a careful boatman to the other shore, so the man of knowledge, by fixing his soul in concentration, acquires Liberation, which is so difficult to acquire, after renouncing his body, O king.

36—37 As a careful charioteer, O king, having yoked good horses takes the car-warrior to where he likes, even so the Yogin, O king, careful in concentration, soon attains to the highest spot like an arrow shot off the bow reaching the object aimed at.

38. The Yogin who stays immovably after having entered his self into the soul, dissipates his sins and gets at that indestructible spot which is the possession of those who are pious.

39—41. That Yogin who, carefully practises high vows, properly unites, O king, his sentiency with the self Soul in the navel, the throat, the head, the heart, the chest, the sides, the eye, the ear, and the nose, burns all his mountain-like acts good and bad, and having recourse to excellent Yoga, acquires Liberation."

Yudhisthira said:—

42. "You should tell me, O grandfather, what the kinds of diet are by taking which,

carelessness, affection, lust and anger one acquires Liberation.

12. As large fishes, breaking through the net pass into their own element, similarly, Yogins, become purged of all sins and acquire the happiness of Liberation.

22 As a weak man O king, is carried away by a current, so is a weak Yogin helplessly carried away by objects of the senses.

23 An elephant withstands a powerful current Similarly, a Yogin, having acquired Yoga-power withstands all objects of the senses.

24 Independent of all things, Yogins, gifted with Yoga power and other lordly powers, enter into the very lords of creation, the Rishis, the gods, and the great Beings in the universe.

25 Neither Yama, nor the Destroyer, nor Death, himself of terrible power, when irate, ever succeeds in lording over the Yogin, O king, who is gifted with immeasurable energy.

Yudhisthira said:—

42. 'You should tell me, O grandfather, what the kinds of diet are by taking which, those principles to me in full. You know whatever knowledge exists in the three worlds."

Bhishma said —

3. Hear now what the subtle principles are of the followers of the Sankhya doctrine all of whom have a clear knowledge of the soul. Those principles have been laid down by all the great and powerful Yatis having Kapila for their first.

4. In that doctrine, O king no errors are seen. Its merits are manifold. In fact, there is no fault in it.

5—17. Comprehending with the help of knowledge that all objects exist with faults, with which human beings, Pishachas, Rakshasas, Yakshas, snakes, Gandharvas, and Pitris and those who are wandering in the intermediate orders of being, and great birds, and the Maruts and royal sages and regenerate sages and Asuras and Vishwedevas and the celestial Rishis and Yogins invested with supreme power and the Prajapatis and Brahman himself are engaged, and understanding truly what the highest limit of a man's life in this world, and perceiving also the great truth O foremost of orator, about what is called happiness here, and having a perfect knowledge of what the miseries are that befall when the hour comes all those who are concerned with (transitory) objects, and knowing full well the miseries of those who have fallen into the intermediate orders of being and of those who have sunk into hell, perceiving all the merits and all the shortcomings of heaven, O Bharata, and all the demerits of the declarations of the Vedas and all the excellence thereof recognising the faults and merits of the Yoga and the Sankhya systems of philosophy, realizing also that the quality of Goodness has ten properties, that of Darkness has nine, and that of Ignorance has eight, that the Understanding has seven properties, the Mind has six and Ether has five and once more conceiving that the Understanding has four properties and Ignorance has three, and Darkness has two and Goodness has one, and truly undertaking the path that is followed by all objects when destruction befalls them and what the course is of self knowledge, the Sankhyas, endued with knowledge and experience and exalted by their perceptions of causes, and acquiring thorough auspiciousness, attain to the happiness of Liberation like the rays of the Sun, or the Wind, taking refuge in Ether

18—19 Vision is attached to form, the sense of scent to smells the ear to sound, the tongue to juices and the skin to touch The Wind has for its refuge Ether. Stupefaction has Darkness for its refuge. Cupidity has the objects of the senses for its refuge.

20 Vishnu is attached to (the organs of) motion. Indra is attached to (the organs of) strength The god of fire is attached to fire is attached to the stomach Earth is attached to the Waters. The Waters have fire for their refuge.

21. Heat attaches itself to the Wind; and the Wind has Ether for its refuge, and Space has the principle of greatness for its refuge, and the principle of greatness has the Understanding for its basis.

22 The Understanding has its refuge in Darkness, Darkness has Ignorance for its refuge, Rajas is founded upon the quality of goodness and quality of Goodness is attached to the Soul.

23 The Soul has the glorious and powerful goodness Narayana for its refuge. That glorious god has Liberation for his refuge Liberation is independent of all refuge.

24—52 Knowing that this body, that is endued with sixteen possessions, is the result of the quality of goodness, understanding fully the nature of the physical organs and the consciousness that lives within it recognising the one existent Being that lives in the body, viz, the Soul, which stands aloof from every physical concern which is affected by no sin, realising the nature of that second object, viz, the acts of persons attached to the objects of the senses, understanding also the nature of the senses and the sensual objects which have their refuge in the Soul, appreciating the difficulty of Liberation and the scriptures describing it, knowing fully the nature of the vital airs called Prana, Apana, Samana, Vyana and Udana, as also the two other breaths, viz, the one going downward and the other going upward, indeed knowing those seven vital airs ordained to perform seven different functions, ascertaining the nature of the Patriarchs and the Rishis and the numberless high paths, of virtue or righteousness, and the seven Rishis and the innumerable royal Rishis O scorcher of enemies, and the great celestial Rishis and, the other twice-born Rishis effulgent like the Sun, seeing all these losing their power in course of many long ages, O king, hearing of the destruction of even of all the powerful beings in the universe, understanding also the inauspicious end that is got, O king, by creatures of sinful deeds and the miseries endured by those that fall into the river Vaitarani in the kingdom of Yama, and the inauspicious wanderings of creatures through various wombs, and the nature of their residence in the filthy uterus in the midst of blood and water and phlegm and urine and fæces, all of bad smell, and then in bodies that originate from the union of blood and the vital seed, of marrow and sinews, full of hundreds of nerves and arteries and forming an impure palace of nine doors, understanding also what is for his own well being, what those various combinations are which produce good, seeing the abominable conduct of creatures whose natures are characterised by Darkness, Goodness or Ignorance, O chief of Bharata's race,—conduct that is censured, in view of its incapacity to acquire Liberation by the followers of the Sankhya doctrine who understand fully the Soul, seeing the swallowing up of the Moon and the Sun by Rahu the falling of stars from their fixed positions and the diversions of constellations from their orbits knowing the separation of all united objects, and the diabolical conduct of creatures in devouring one another, seeing the absence of all intelligence in the infancy of human beings and the deterioration and destruction of the body, marking the little attachment creatures have to the quality of Goodness on account of their being overwhelmed by anger and stupefaction, seeing also only one among thousands of human beings determined to struggle after the acquisition of Liberation understanding the difficulty of acquiring Liberation according to what is mentioned in the scriptures, marking the hankering that creatures shew for all unattained objects and their comparative indifference to all objects that have been acquired, marking the wickedness that proceeds from all objects of the senses, O king and the repulsive bodies, O son of Kunti, of dead persons, and the residence, always fraught with sorrow, of human beings, O Bharata, in houses, knowing the end of those terrible and degraded men who become guilty of killing Brahmanas, and of those wicked Brahmanas who are given to the drinking of alcohol, and the equally sad end of those who visit the wives of their preceptors, and of those men, O Yudhishthira who do not properly respect their mothers as also of those who have no reverence and worship to offer to the gods, understanding also, with the help of that knowledge, the end that befalls all perpetrators of wicked deeds, and the various ends that befall those who have taken birth among the intermediate orders, ascertaining the various declarations of the Vedas, the courses of seasons, the fading of years, of months, of fortnights, and of days, seeing directly the waxing and the waning of the Moon, seeing the rising and the ebbing of the seas, and the decrease of wealth and its increase once more, and the separation of united objects, the lapse of cycles, the destruction of mountains, the drying up of rivers, the deterioration of the several orders and the end also of that deterioration taking place repeatedly, seeing the birth, decrepitude, death, and sorrows of creatures knowing truly the faults relating to the body and the sorrows which human beings suffer from and the changes to which the bodies of creatures are subject, and understanding all the faults which attach to their own souls, and also all the inauspicious faults that attach to their own bodies"

Yudhishthira said:—

53 "O you of immeasurable energy, what are those faults which you see in one's body? You should explain this doubt to me fully and truly."

Bhishma said —

54 "Listen, O killer of enemies, the Sankhyas or followers of Kapila, who are conversant with all paths and gifted with wisdom, say that there are in all five faults, O powerful one, in the human body.

55 They are Desire, Anger, Fear, Sleep, and Breath.

56 These faults are seen in the bodies of all embodied creatures They who are gifted with wisdom cut the root of anger with the help of Forgiveness. Desire is cut off by renouncing all purposes

57 By cultivation of the quality of Goodness (Sattwa) sleep is conquered and Fear is conquered by cultivating carefulness. Breath is conquered by restriction of diet, O king.

58—64 Truly understanding qualities by the help of hundreds of qualities and faults by hundreds of faults, and various causes by hundreds of causes, determining that the world is like the froth of water, covered by hundreds of illusions flowing from Vishnu, like a painted palace, and as unsubstantial as a reed, seeing it to be like a dark pit, or as unreal as bubbles of water, for the years that compose its age are as fleeting as bubbles, seeing it exposed to immediate destruction, bereft of happiness, having certain ruin for its end and from which it can never escape, sunk in Darkness and Ignorance and utterly helpless like an elephant sunk in mire —noting all this—this the Sankhyas, O king, gifted with great wisdom renouncing all affection arising from one's relations towards one's children, by the help, O king, of that extensive and all embracing knowledge which their system advocates, and cutting off quickly, with the weapon of knowledge and the bludgeon of penances, O Bharata, all inauspicious smells begotten of Darkness and all scents of a like nature originating from Ignorance and all auspicious scents arising from Goodness and all pleasures of the touch born of the same three qualities and attaching to the body, indeed, O Bharata, aided by the Yoga of knowledge, these Yatis crowned with success — cross the Ocean of life That dreadful Ocean has sorrow for its waters. Anxiety and grief form its deep lakes. Disease and death are its huge alligators The great fears that strike the heart at every step are its huge snakes.

65—72. The deeds begotten by Ignorance are its tortoises. Those begotten by Darkness are its fishes. Wisdom forms the raft for crossing it. The affections cherished for objects of the senses are its mire. Decrepitude forms its region of grief and trouble. Knowledge, O chastiser of enemies, is its island. Acts form its great depth Truth is its shores. Pious observances form the verdant weeds floating on its bosom Envy forms its rapid its rapid and powerful current. The various sentiments of the heart form its mines. The various sorts of gratification are its valuable gems. Grief and fever are its winds. Misery and thirst are its powerful eddies. Painful and fatal diseases are its huge elephants The assemblage of bones form its flights of steps, and phlegm is its froth. Gifts are the pearl-banks The lakes of blood the corals Loud laughter forms its roars. Various sciences are its impassability Tears are its brine Renunciation of company forms the high refuge Children and wives are its unnumbered leeches Friends and kinsmen are the cities and towns on its shores Abstention from injury, and Truth, form its boundary line Death is its storm-wave The knowledge of Vedanta is the island Acts of mercy towards all creatures form its life buoys, and Liberation is the costly article offered to those going on its waters in search of merchandise Like its prototype with its equine head sending out flames of fire, this ocean too has its fiery dread. Having got over the liability, that is so difficult to get over, of living within the gross body the Sankhyas enter into pure ether.

73 The Sun God then bears, with his rays, those pious men who practise the Sankhya doctrines Like the fibres of the lotus stalk carrying water to the flower into which they all converge the Sun God, drinking all things from the universe, conveys them to those good and wise men.

74—76. Their attachments all dissipated, possessed of energy, endued with wealth of penances, and crowned with success, these Yatis, O Bharata, are carried by that wind, which is subtile, cooling, fragrant, and sweet to the touch, O Bharata! In fact, that wind which is the best of the seven winds, and which blows in regions of great happiness, conveys them, O son of Kunti, to that which is the highest end in ether. Then ether into which they are carried, O king, conveys them to the highest end of Darkness.

77. Darkness then carries them to the highest end of Goodness Goodness then bears them, O you of pure soul, to the Supreme and powerful Narayana.

78—79 The powerful and pure souled Narayana at last, through himself, carries them to the Supreme Soul Having reached the Supreme Soul, those pure persons, who have become the body of Brahman, attain to immortality, and they have never afterwards to come back from that position, O king! That is the highest end, O son of Pritha, which is acquired by those great men who have got over the influence of all pairs of opposites."

Yudhishthira said —

80. "O pure one, have those persons of firm vows, after they have acquired that excellent position which is fraught with power and happiness, any recollection of their lives including birth and death?

81. You should tell me properly what the truth is in this respect O you of Kuru's race, I do not think it proper to ask any one else but you.

82—83 Following the scriptures relating to Liberation I find this great fault in the subject. If having attained to that high state, the Yatis continue to live in consciousness,' it would appear, O king, that the religion of work is superior If again, consciousness disappears from the liberated state and one who has become liberated only resembles a person sunk in dreamless slumber, then nothing can be more improper than to say that there is really no consciousness in Liberation."

Bhishma said —

84 "However difficult it may be to answer it, the question which you have asked, O son, is proper. Verily, the question is of such a nature that even the highly learned men become stupefied in answering it, O chief of Bharata's race.

85 For all that, hear what the truth is as explained by me. The great followers

110. Tranquillity of soul, high power, all subtile knowledge of which the scriptures speak, penances of subtile force, and all sorts of happiness, O king, have all been duly ordained in the Sankhya system.

111 Failing to acquire, O son of Pritha, that complete knowledge which is recommended by their system, the Sankhyas attain to the dignity of gods and pass many years in happiness Ruling over the celestials as they will, they fall, upon the expiration of the fixed period, among learned Brahmanas and Yatis.

112. Renouncing this body, those twice-born ones that follow the Sankhya system enter into the superior state of Brahma like the gods entering into the sky by devoting themselves wholly to that worshipful system which is theirs and which is adored by all wise men.

113. Those twice-born ones who are given to the acquisition of that knowledge which is recommended in the Sankhya system, even if they fail to acquire eminence, are never seen to fall among intermediate creatures, or to sink into the state of sinful men.

114. That great person who is fully conversant with the vast, high, ancient, ocean like, and immeasurable Sankhya system who is pure and liberal and agreeable, becomes, O king, equal to Narayana.

115. I have now told you, O god among men, the truth about the Sankhya system It is the embodiment of Narayana, of the universe as it exists from antiquity When the time of Creation comes, He causes the Creation to come into being, and when the time comes for destruction. He swallows up everything Having withdrawn everything into his own body he goes to slumber,—that inner Soul of the universe."

CHAPTER CCCXXXIII.

(MOKSHADHARMA PARVA)—Continued.

Yudhisthira said —

1. "What is that which is called Undecaying and by acquiring which no one has to return? What, again, is that which is called Decaying, and by acquiring which one has to return once more?

2. O destroyer of enemies, I ask you the distinction that exists, O you of mighty arms, between the Decaying and the Undecaying ones for understanding them both truly, O delighter of the Kurus.

3 Brahmanas conversant with the Vedas, speak of you as an Ocean of knowledge. Highly blessed Rishis and Yatis of great souls do the same.

4. You have very few days to live. When the Sun turns from his southern solstice for entering into the northern, you will attain to your high end.

5 When you will leave us, from whom shall we hear of all that is wholesome for us? You are the lamp of Kuru's race. Indeed, you are always shining with the light of knowledge.

6 O perpetuater of Kru's race, I wish, therefore, to hear all this from you Listening to your discourses which are always sweet like nectar, my curiosity, without being satiated, is always increasing."

Bhishma said:—

7. "I shall, regarding it, relate to you the old discourse that took place between Vashishtha and king Karala of Janaka's race.

8. Once on a time when that foremost of Rishis, viz, Vashishtha, effulgent like the Sun, was seated at his ease, king Janaka asked him about that highest knowledge which is for our supreme behoof.

9—11. A perfect adept in that department of knowledge which is about the Soul and gifted with sure conclusions about all branches of that science, as Mairtravaruni, that foremost of Rishis, was seated, the king, approaching him with joined hands, asked him in humble words, well said and sweet and shorn of all controversial spirit, this question,—O holy one, I wish to hear of Supreme and Eternal Brahma by attaining to which men of wisdom have not to return.

12. I wish also to know that which is called Destructible and That into which this universe goes when destroyed Indeed, what is That which is said to be indestructible, auspicious, wholesome and free from all sorts of evil.

Vashishtha said —

13 Hear, O king, as to how this universe is destroyed, and of That which was never destroyed and which will never be destroyed at any time.

14 Twelve thousand years make a cycle. Four such cycles, taken a thousand times, make a Kalpa which measures one day of Brahman.

15—17. Brahman's night also, O king, is of the same measure. When Brahman himself is destroyed, Shambhu of formless soul and to whom the Yoga attributes of

41. Uniting with Nature which has the attributes of birth and death, he also assumes the attributes of birth and death And on account of such union he becomes an object of perception and though in reality shorn of all attributes yet he comes to be invested therewith.

42 It is in this way that the Soul, becoming united with Nature and invested with Ignorance, undergoes changes and becomes conscious of Self.

43 Uniting with the qualities of Goodness, Darkness and Ignorance, he becomes at one with various creatures belonging to various orders of Being, on account of his forgetfulness and his waiting upon Ignorance.

44 On account of his birth and death originating from the fact of his living in union with Nature, he thinks himself to be no other than what he apparently is Knowing himself as this or that, he follows the qualities of Goodness, Darkness and Ignorance.

45. Under the influence of Ignorance, he comes by various kinds of conditions which are affected by Ignorance. Under the influences of Darkness and Goodness he attains likewise to conditions which are affected by Darkness and Goodness.

46 There are three colors in all, viz, White, Red, and Dark. All those colors belong to Nature

47 Through Ignorance one goes to hell Through Darkness one attains to the status of humanity Through Goodness people ascend to the regions of the gods and partake of great happiness.

48. By sticking to sin continuously one sinks into the intermediate order of beings By acting both virtuously and sinfully one comes by the status of humanity By acting only righteously, one attains to the status of the gods

49 In this way the twenty fifth, viz, (the Indestructible), the wise say, by union with the Unmanifest, becomes changed into (destructible). By means of knowledge, however, the Indestructible appears in His true nature.

CHAPTER CCCIV.

Vashishtha said :—

1. Thus on account of his forgetfulness the Soul follows Ignorance and acquires thousands of bodies one after another.

2. He attains to thousands of births among the intermediate orders and sometimes among the very gods on account his union with qualities.

3. From the status of humanity he goes to heaven and from heaven he returns to humanity, and from humanity he sinks into hell for many long years.

4 As the worm that make the cocoon does itself completely on all sides by means of the threads it weaves itself, so the Soul, though in reality above all qualities, invests himself on all sides with qualities

5—7. Though above both happiness and misery, it is thus that he subjects himself to happiness and misery. It is thus also that, though above all diseases, the Soul considers himself to be afflicted by headache, opthalmia, toothache, affections of the throat, abdominal dropsy, burning thirst, enlargement of glands, cholera, vitiligo, leprosy, burns, asthma, phthisis, epilepsy, and various other diseases from which embodied creatures suffer.

8 Considering himself, through error, as born among thousands of creatures in the intermediate orders of being and sometimes among the gods, he suffers misery and enjoys the fruits of his good deeds.

9—15. Invested with Ignorance he considers himself as dressed sometimes in white cloth and sometimes in full dress of four pieces, or as lying on floors or with hands and feet contracted like those of frogs or as seated upright in the position of meditation, or as clad in rags or as lying or sitting under the canopy of heaven or within palaces built of bricks and stone or on rugged stones or on ashes or bare stones or on the naked earth or on beds or on battle fields or in water or in mire or on wooden planks or on various sorts of beds; or, moved by desire of fruit, he considers himself as clad in a piece of cloth made of grass or as totally naked or as dressed in silk or in skin of the black antelope or in cloth made of flax or in sheep skin or in tiger-skin or in lion skin or in hemp fabric or in barks of birch or in cloths made of the produce of prickly plants, or in vestures made of threads woven by worms or of tattered rags or in various other sorts of cloth too numerous to mention The soul considers himself also as wearing various sorts of ornaments and gems, or as eating various sorts of food.

16—20. He considers himself as sometimes eating at intervals of one night, or once at the same hour every day, or as at the fourth, the sixth, and the eighth hour every day, or as once in six or seven or eight nights, or as once in ten or twelv days, or as once, in a month, or as eating only roots, or fruits, or as living upon air or water alone, or on cakes of sesame husk, or curds or cowdung, or the urine of the cow or potherbs or flowers or moss or raw food, or as living on fallen leaves of trees or fruits that have dropped down and lie scattered on the ground, or various other sorts of food, moved by the desire of acquiring ascetic success.

21—25 The Soul considers himself as following the observance of Chandrayana according to the rites laid down in the scriptures, or various other vows and observances, and the courses of duty laid down for the four modes of life, and even prohibitions of duty, and the duties of other subsidiary modes of life set down the four principal ones, and even various kinds of practices that distinguish the wicked and sinful. The Soul considers himself as enjoying lonely places and the charming shades of mountains and the cool vicinity of springs and fountains, and solitary river banks and secluded forests, and sacred pilgrimages, and lakes and waters remote from the busy haunts of men, and lonely mountain caves giving the accomodation that houses and palaces afford The Soul consider himself as reciting of different kinds of secret Mantras or as observing different vows and rules and various sorts of penances, and sacrifices of many sorts, and rites of diverse sorts.

26. The Soul considers himself as following sometimes the ways of traders and merchants and the practices of Brahmanas, Kshatriyas, Vaishyas and Shudras, and gifts of various sorts to those who are poor or blind or helpless.

27. On account of his being invested with Ignorance, the Soul adopts the different qualities of Goodness Darkness and Ignorance, and Righteousness and riches and pleasure.

28—29. Under the influence of Nature, the Soul undergoing changes himself, observes and follows and practises all these and considers himself as such. Indeed, the Soul considers himself as employed in the utterance of the sacred Mantras Swaha, Swadha and Vashat, and in saluting those he considers as his elders, in officiating in the sacrifices of others, in teaching pupils, making gifts and accepting them, in celebrating sacrifices and studying the scriptures, and doing all other acts and rites of this sort.

30. The Soul considers himself as connected with birth and death and quarrels and destruction. All these, the learned say, form the path of acts good and bad.

31—34 It is the goddess Nature who causes birth and death When the time comes for Universal Dissolution, all existent objects and qualities are withdrawn by the Supreme Soul which then exists alone like the Sun withdrawing at evening all his rays, and when the time comes for Creation He once more creates and spreads them out like the Sun shedding his rays when morning comes. Thus the Soul, for the sake of sport, repeatedly considers himself invested with all these conditions, which are his own forms and qualities infinite in number, and agreeable to himself It is thus that the Soul, though really above the three qualities, becomes attached to the path of acts and creates by modification Nature invested with the conditions of birth and death and at once with all acts and conditions which are characterised by the three qualities of Goodness, Darkness, and Ignorance Arrived at the path of action, the Soul considers particular acts as possessing particular characteristics and productive of particular ends

35 O king, the whole of this universe has been blinded by Nature and all things have been variously overwhelmed (through Nature by the qualities of Darkness and Ignorance.

36 It is on account of the Soul being invested by Nature that these pairs of opposites, productive of happiness and woe, again and again come It is on account of this Ignorance that Individual Soul considers these sorrows to be his and imagines them as following him.

37—38 Indeed, O king, through that Ignorance it is that Individual Soul imagines he should anyhow cross those sorrows, and that he should, going into the regions of the gods, enjoy the happiness that awaits all his good deeds. It is through Ignorance that he thinks he should enjoy and suffer these delights and these miseries here in this world.

39 Through Ignorance Individual Soul thinks,—I should secure my happiness By continually doing good deeds, I may enjoy happiness in this life till its close and I shall be happy in all my future lives.

40. Through, again the evil deeds I do in this life I may suffer unending misery. The status of humanity is full of great misery, for from it one sinks into hell.

41—43 From hell, it will take many long years before I can return to the status of humanity. From humanity I shall attain to the status of the gods. From that superior status I shall have to return to humanity and thence to sink into hell once more.—One who always considers this combination of the principal elements and the senses, with the reflection of consciousness in it, to be thus invested with the characteristics of the Soul, has again and again to walk among gods and human beings and to sink into hell. Being always invested with the idea of mineness, Individual Soul has to go through a round of such births.

44—47 Millions upon millions of births have to be gone through by Individual Soul in the successive forms he assumes, all of which are liable to death. He who does acts in this way, which are all full of good and bad fruits, has in the three worlds to assume successive forms and to enjoy and suffer fruits corresponding therewith. It is Nature that causes good and bad acts, and it is Nature that enjoys and suffers the fruits thereof in the three worlds. Indeed, Nature follows the course of acts. The status of the intermediate beings, of humanity, and of the gods, all originate from Nature. Nature has been said to be shorn of all qualities. Her existence is proved by her acts.

48—51 Similarly, Soul, though without attributes himself has his existence proved by the acts which the body does when it receives his reflection. Although the Soul is not subject to changes of any kind, and is the active principle that sets Nature in motion, yet entering a body which is united with the senses of knowledge and action, he considers all the acts of those senses as his own. The five senses of knowledge beginning with the ear, and those of action beginning with speech, uniting with the qualities of Goodness and Darkness and Ignorance become engaged in numerous objects. Individual Soul imagines that it is he who does the deeds of his life and that the senses of knowledge and action belong to him, although in reality he has no senses. Indeed, though having no body, he imagines that he has a body. Though shorn of qualities he considers himself as endued therewith, and though above Time, imagines himself to be under Time's control.

52 Though having no understanding, he still considers himself as endued with it, and though above the four and twenty topics, considers himself as one included among them. Though deathless, he still considers himself as subject to death, and though motionless regards himself as having motion.

53 Though not possessed of a material body, he still considers himself as possessed of one; and though unborn, he still regards himself as having birth. Though above penances, he still considers as engaged in penances, and though he has no end he still considers himself as liable to attain to ends.

54. Though not gifted with motion and birth, he still considers himself as endued with both, and though above fear, still considers himself as subject to fear. Though Indestructible, he still considers himself Destructible. Invested with Ignorance, the Soul thus thinks of himself.

CHAPTER CCCV.

Vashishtha said —

1. It is thus, on account of his Ignorance and his association with others who are invested with Ignorance, that Individual Soul passes through millions and millions of births every one of which has dissolution in the end.

2. On account of his transformation into Intelligence invested with Ignorance, Individual Soul goes to millions of abodes, every one of which is liable to end in destruction, among intermediate beings and men and the gods.

3—4 On account of Ignorance, Individual Soul like the Moon, has to wax and wane thousands and thousands of times. This is truly the nature of Individual Soul when invested with Ignorance. Know that the Moon has in reality full sixteen portions. Only fifteen of these are subject to increase and decrease. The sixteenth remains constant. After the manner of the Moon, Individual Soul too has full sixteen portions. Only fifteen of these, appear and disappear. The sixteenth is subject to no change.

5 Invested with Ignorance, Individual Soul repeatedly and continually takes birth in the fifteen portions, named above. With the eternal and immutable portion of Individual Soul the principal elements become united and this union takes place repeatedly.

6 That sixteenth portion is subtile. It should be known as Soma. It is never upheld by the senses. On the other hand, the senses are upheld by it.

7. Since those sixteen portions are the cause of the birth of creatures, creatures can never, O king, take birth without their help. They are called Nature. The destruction of Jiva's liability to be united with Nature is called Liberation.

8—10 The Principle of Greatness, which is the twenty-fifth, if it regards that body of sixteen portions called the Unmanifest, has to assume it repeatedly. On account of not knowing That which is stainless and pure, and for its devotion to what is the outcome of a combination of both Pure and Impure, the Soul, which is, in reality, pure, becomes, O king, Impure Indeed, on account of its devotion to Ignorance, Individual soul though characterised by Knowledge, becomes repeatedly associated with Ignorance.

11. Though, O king, free from error of every sort, yet on account of its devotion to the three qualities of Nature, it becomes endued with those attributes.

CHAPTER CCCVI.

Janaka said:—

1. O holy one, it has been said that the relation between male and female is like that which exists between the Indestructible and the Destructible.

2. Without a male, a female can never conceive Without a female, a male also can never create a form.

3 On account of their union with each other, and each depending upon the qualities of the other, forms are seen to spring up. This is the case with all orders of being.

4. Through each other's union for purposes of (sexual) intercourse, and through each depending upon the qualities of the other, forms (of living creatures) flow in seasons. I shall tell you the indications thereof

5 Hear what the qualities are which belong to the father and what those are which belong to the mother. Bones, sinews, and marrow, O twice-born one, we know, originate from the father.

6 Skin, flesh, and blood, we hear, originate from the mother. Even this, O foremost of twice-born ones, is what may be read of in the Veda and other scriptures

7 Whatever is read as said in the Vedas and in other scriptures is considered as authority. The authority, again, of the Vedas and other scriptures, is eternal.

8—9 If Nature and Soul be always united together in this way by each opposing and each depending on the other's qualities, I see, O holy one, that Liberation cannot exist. You, O holy one, are gifted with spiritual vision so that you see all things as if they are present before your eyes. If, therefore, there be any direct evidence of the existence of Liberation, do speak of it to me.

10. We are desirous of acquiring Liberation. Indeed, we wish to acquire That which is auspicious, bodiless, not subject to decrepitude, eternal, beyond the perception of the senses, and having nothing superior to it.

Vashishtha said:—

11. What you say about the characteristics of the Vedas and the other scriptures is even so You understand those marks in the way in which they should be understood.

12. You only understand aright the texts of the Vedas and the other scriptures. You are not, O king, truly conversant with the real meaning of those texts.

13 That person who remembers merely the texts of the Vedas and the other scriptures without understanding the true sense or meaning of those texts, remembering them fruitlessly.

14 Indeed, one who remembers a work without understanding their meaning, is said to carry an useless load He, however, who understands the true meaning of a treatise, is said to have studied that work to purpose.

15 Asked about the meaning of a text, one should communicate that meaning which he has understood by a careful study.

16. That person of dull intelligence who refuses to explain the meanings of texts in the midst of an assemblage of the learned, that person of foolish understanding, never succeeds in explaining the meaning aright.

17. An ignorant wight, going to explain the true meaning of treatises, incurs ridicule Even those endued with a knowledge of the Soul have to incur ridicule on such occasions

18. Listen now to me, O king, as to how the subject of Liberation has been explained among the great persons conversant with the Sankhya and the Yoga Systems of Philosophy.

19 That which the Yogins behold is exactly what the Sankhyas strive after to attain He who sees the Sankhya and the Yoga Systems to be one and the same is said to be gifted with intelligence.

20. Skin, flesh, blood, fat, bile, marrow, and sinews, and these senses, which you were speaking to me, exist.

21. Objects originate from objects, the senses from the senses. From body one acquires a body, as a seed is obtained from seed.

22 When the Supreme Being is without senses, without seed, without matter, without body, He must be divested of all qualities; and on account of His being so, how, indeed, can He have qualities of any kind?

23 Ether and other qualities originate from the qualities of Goodness, Darkness, and Ignorance, and disappear in the end in them Thus the qualities arise from Nature and disappear in Nature.

24 Skin, flesh, blood, fat, bile, marrow bones, and sinews,—these eight, that are made of Nature, know, O king, may sometimes be produced by the vital seed alone (of the male).

25 The Individual Soul and the universe are said to both partake of Nature characterised by the three qualities of Goodness, Darkness, and Ignorance The Supreme Soul is different from both the Individual Soul and the universe.

26. As the seasons, though having no forms, are nevertheless inferred from the appearance of particular fruits and flowers, similarly, Nature, though formless, is inferred from the Principles of Greatness and the rest that originate from it.

27. Thus, from the existence of Consciousness in the body, the Supreme Soul, shorn of all qualities whatever and perfectly stainless, is inferred.

28. Without beginning and destruction, without end, the seer of all things, and auspicious, that Soul, only on account of its Oneness with the body and other qualities, comes to be taken as invested with qualities.

29 Those persons who are truly conversant with qualities know that only objects endued with qualities can have attributes but that That which is above all qualities can have none.

30 When the Individual Soul conquers all qualities born of Nature and which it assumes under mistake, only then does it see the Supreme Soul.

31—33 Only the highest Rishis conversant with the Sankhya and the Yoga Systems know that Supreme Soul which Sankhyas and Yogins and believers in all other Systems say is beyond the Understanding, which is considered as Knower and endued with the highest wisdom on account of its renouncing all consciousness of identification with Nature, which is above the attribute of Ignorance or Error, which is Unmanifest, which is beyond all attributes, which is called the Supreme, which is dissociated from all attributes which ordains all things, which is Eternal and Immutable, which overrules Nature and all her attributes, and which, getting over twenty four topics of enquiry, forms the twenty-fifth.

34. When men of knowledge, who stand in fear of birth, of the several states of living consciousness, and of death, succeed in knowing the Unmanifest, they succeed in understanding the Supreme Soul at the same time.

35. An intelligent man considers the unity of the Individual Soul with the Supreme Soul as consistent with the scriptures and as perfectly correct, while the man shorn of intelligence considers the two as different from each other. This forms the distinction between the man of intelligence and the man that is shorn of it

36 The characteristics of both the Destructible and Indestructible have now been said to you The indestructible is Oneness or Unity, while multiplicy or variety is said to be the Destructible.

37. When one begins to study and understand properly the twenty-five topics of enquiry, one then understands that the Oneness of the Soul is consistent with the scriptures and its multiplicity is what is opposed to them.

38 These are the several characteristics of what is included in the list of topics or principles created and what is above that list. The wise have said that the list of topics numbers only twenty-five.

39 That which is above the topics is beyond that number and forms the twenty-sixth. The study or comprehension of created things according to their aggregates (of five) is the study and comprehension of topics. Above these is That which is eternal

CHAPTER CCCVII.

Janaka said —

1. You have, O foremost of Rishis, said that Unity is the attribute of that which is Indestructible and variety or multiplicity is the attribute of what is known as Destructible I have not, however, clearly understood the nature of these two. Doubts are still in my mind.

2 Ignorant men consider the Soul as endued with multiplicity. They, however, who are endued with knowledge and wisdom consider the Soul to be one and the same I, however, have a very dull understanding. I am, therefore, unable to understand how all this can take place.

3. I have almost forgotten the causes also that you have attributed to the unity and the multiplicity of the Indestructible and the Destructible on account of the restlessness of my understanding.

4—5 I, therefore, wish to hear you once more discourse to me on those subjects of unity and multiplicity, on him who is gifted with knowledge, on what is shorn of knowledge, on Individual Soul, Knowledge, Ignorance, Indestructible, Destructible, and on the Sankhya and the Yoga systems, in detail and separately and agreeably to the truth.

Vashishtha said.—

6 I shall tell you what you ask. Listen, however, to me, O king, as I explain to you the practices of Yoga separately.

7. Contemplation, which forms an obligatory practice with Yogins, is their highest power. Those conversant with Yoga say that that Contemplation is of two sorts.

8 One is the concentration of the mind, and the other is called Pranayama (suppression of vital airs) Pranayama is said to be real, while concentration of mind is unsubstantial it.

9 Excepting the three times when a man passes urine and stools and eats, one should devote his entire time to contemplation.

10—11. Withdrawing the senses from their objects by the help of the mind, one gifted with intelligence, having made oneself pure, should, according to the twenty-two modes of transmitting the Prana breath unite the Individual Soul with That which is above the four and twentieth topic which is regarded by the wise as living in every part of the body and as above decay and destruction.

12 It is by means of those twenty two modes that the Soul may always be known It is certain that this practice of Yoga is his whose mind is never possessed by evil passions. It is not any other person's.

13—14. Freed from all attachments, abstemious in diet, and controlling all the senses, one should fix his mind on the Soul, during the first and the last part of the night, after having, O king of Mithila, stopped the functions of all the senses, quieted the mind by the understanding, and assumed a posture as motionless as that of stone.

15. When men of knowledge, conversant with the rules of Yoga, become as fixed as a stake of wood, and as immovable as a mountain, then they are said to be in Yoga.

16—17. When one does not hear, and smell, and taste, and see, when one does not feel any touch, when one's mind is perfectly free from every purpose, when one is not conscious of any thing, when one cherishes no thought, when one becomes like a piece of wood, then is he called by the wise to be in perfect Yoga.

18 At such a time one shines like a lamp that burns in a place where blows no wind, at such a time one becomes freed even from his subtile form, and perfectly at one with Brahma When one acquires such progress, he has no longer to ascend or to fall among intermediate beings

19 When persons like ourselves say that there has been a complete identification of the Knower the Known, and Knowledge, then is the Yogin said to see the Supreme Self.

20 While in Yoga the Supreme Soul shows itself in the Yogin's heart like a burning fire, or like the bright Sun or like the lightning's spark in the firmament.

21—22 That Supreme Soul which is Unborn and which is the essence of nectar, which is seen by great Brahmanas gifted with intelligence and wisdom and conversant with the Vedas, is subtler than what is subtile and greater than what is great. That Soul, though living in all creatures, is not seen by them.

23 The Creator of the worlds, He is seen only by a person gifted with wealth of intelligence when helped by the lamp of the mind He lives on the other shore of thick Darkness and is above the Ishwara

24 Persons conversant with the Vedas and endued with omniscience call Him the the remover of Darkness stainless above Darkness, and with and without attributes.

25. This is what is called the Yoga of Yogins. What else is the mark of Yoga? By such practices do Yogins succeed in seeing the Supreme Soul that is above destruction and decay.

26. This much that I have told you in detail is about the Science of Yoga I shall now describe to you that Sankhya philosophy by which the Supreme Soul is seen through the gradual destruction of evil karmas.

27. The Sankhyas, whose System is built on Nature, say that Nature, which is Unmanifest is the foremost From Nature they say, O king, the second principle called Greatness is produced

28 We have heard that from Greatness originates the third principle called Consciousness The Sankhyas blessed with sight of the Soul say that from Consciousness originate the five subtile essences of sound, form, touch, taste, and scent.

29 All these eight they call by the name of Nature. The changes of these eight are sixteen in number. They are the five gross essences of ether, light, earth, water, and wind, and the ten senses of action and of knowledge including the mind

30 Wise men devoted to the Sankhya path and conversant with all its ordinances and dispensations consider these twenty four topics as including the whole range of Sankhya enquiry

31 What is produced becomes merged in the producing cause Created by the Supreme Soul one after another, these principles are destroyed in a reverse order

32 At every new Creation the qualities start into being in the lateral order, and (when Destruction comes) they merge in a reverse order like the waves of the ocean disappearing in the ocean from which they originate

33 O best of kings, this is the manner in which the Creation and the Destruction of Nature takes place The Supreme Being is all that remains when Universal destruction takes place, and it is He who assumes various forms when Creation begins.

34 This is even so, O king as ascertained by men of knowledge It is Nature that causes the Over-presiding Soul to thus assume diversity and revert back to unity. Nature also herself has the same marks.

35 One fully conversant with the nature of the topics of enquiry knows that Nature also assumes the same sort of diversity and unity, for when Destruction comes she reverts into unity and when Creation takes place she assumes diversity of form

36 The Soul makes Nature, which contains the principles of production or growth assume various forms Nature is called Kshetra (or soil) Above the twenty four topics or principles is the Soul which is Great It presides over that Nature or Kshetra

37 Hence, O great king, the foremost Yatis say that the Soul is the Presider Indeed, we have heard that on account of the Soul's presiding over all Kshetras He is called the Presider.

38 And because He knows that Unmanifest Kshetra, He is therefore, also called Kshetrajna And because also the Soul enters into Unmanifest Kshetra (viz the body), therefore is He called Purusha.

39 Kshetra is something quite different from Kshetrajna Kshetra is Unmanifest The Soul, which is above the twenty four principles, is called the Knower

40 Knowledge and the objects knowr are different from each other. Knowledge, again has been said to be Unmanifest while the object of knowlege is the Soul which is above the twenty-four principles.

41. The Unmanifest is called Kshetra, understanding, and also the supreme Lord while Purusha, which is the twenty fifth principle has nothing superior to it and is not a principle

42 Thus much O king is an account of the Sankhya philosophy The Sankhyas call Nature the cause of the universe and merging all the grosser principles into the Intelligence behold the Supreme Soul

43 Rightly studying the twenty four topics along with Nature, and determining their true nature, the Sankhyas succeed in seeing That which is the twenty four topics or principles.

44 Individual Soul in reality is that very Soul which is above Nature and the four and twenty topics When he succeeds in knowing that Supreme Soul by dissociating himself from Nature he then becomes at one with the Supreme Soul

45 I have now told you everything about the Sankhya System truly Those who are conversant with this philosophy acquire tranquility

46 Indeed as men whose understandings are subject to error directly perceive all objects of the senses so men freed from error have directly known Brahma

47 They who acquire that state have never to return to this world after the dissolution of their bodies, while as regards those who are said to be liberated in this life, power, concentration, and immutability become theirs on account of their having attained to the nature of the Indestructible

48 They who see this universe as many are said to see incorrectly These men are blind to Brahma O chastiser of enemies, such persons have again and again to return to the world and assume bodies

21. When Individual Soul ceases to exist in a state of union with Nature, then does he become at one with Brahma. When, however, he exists united with Nature, he then, O king, seems to be different from Brahma.

22 Indeed, when Individual Soul shows no affection for Nature and her principles, he then succeeds in seeing the Supreme and having once seen Him wishes not to lose that happiness.

23 When the Knowledge of truth comes to him, Individual Soul begins to lament thus —Alas, how foolishly have I acted by falling through ignorance into this frame composed of Nature like a fish entangled in a net.

24. Alas, through Ignorance, I have migrated from body to body like a fish from water to water thinking that water alone is the element in which it can dwell.

25. Indeed, like a fish that does not know anything else than water to be its element, I also have never known anything else than children and wives to be my own!

26. Fie on me that, through ignorance, am repeatedly passing from body to body in forgetfulness.

27 The Supreme Soul alone is my friend. I can make friendship with Him. Whatever be my nature and whoever I may be, I am capable to be like Him and can become at one with Him.

28. I see my similarity with Him. I am, indeed, like Him. He is pure. It is clear that I am of the same nature.

29. Through Ignorance and stupefaction, I have become associated with Inanimate Nature Though really shorn of attachments, I have passed this long time in a state of attachment with Nature.

30 Alas, by her was I so long controlled without having been able to know it. Various are the forms,—high, middling, and low,—that Nature assumes Oh, how shall I like in those forms?

31. How shall I live conjointly with her? On account of my ignorance I repair to her companionship. I shall now be fixed.

32 I shall no longer keep her company. For having passed so long a time with her, I should think that I was so long imposed on by her, for myself being really freed from change, how could I keep company with one who is subject to change.

33. She cannot be held responsible for this. The responsibility is mine, since turning away from the Supreme Soul I become of my own accord attached to her.

34. On account of that attachment, myself, though without form in reality, had to live in various forms Indeed, though without form by nature I become endued with forms on account of my notion of Egoism, and thereby insulted and distressed.

35—37 On account of my idea of mineness concerning the results of Nature, I am forced to take birth in various orders of Being Alas, though really shorn of Egoism, yet on account of affecting it, what various evil acts have been perpetrated by me in those orders in which I was born while I remained in them with a soul that had lost all knowledge! I have nothing to do with him who, with essence made up of consciousness, divides herself into many pieces and who tries to unite me with them It is only now that I have been awakened and have understood that I am by nature without egoism and without that consciousness which creates the forms of Nature that invest me all around.

38 Renouncing Egoism which I always have regarding her and whose essence is made up of consciousness, and leaving Nature herself, I shall take refuge in Him, who is auspicious.

39. I shall be united with Him, and not with Nature which is inanimate. If I unite with Him, it will do me good I have no similarity of nature with Nature.

40. The twenty-fifth (viz, Individual Soul), when he thus succeeds in understanding the Supreme, becomes able to cast off the Destructible and at one with the Indestructible and which is the essence of all that is auspicious.

41. Shorn of qualities in his true nature and in reality Unmanifest, Individual Soul becomes invested with what is Manifest and assumes qualities When he succeeds in seeing what is without qualities and which is the origin of the Unmanifest, he becomes, O king of Mithila, at one with the same.

42. I have now told you the charateristics of the Indestructible and the Destructible, according to the best of my knowledge and according to what has been explained in the scriptures.

43 I shall now tell you, according to what I have heard, as to how Knowledge that is subtile, pure and certain, originates. Do you listen to me.

44. I have already described to you, what the Sankhya and the Yoga Systems are as expounded in their respective scriptures. Verily, the science that has been explained in Sankhya treatises is at one with what has been laid down in the Yoga scriptures.

45 The knowledge, O king, which the Sankhyas preach, is capable of awakening every one In the Sankhya scriptures, that Knowledge has been explained very clearly for the behoof of disciples.

46. The learned say that this Sankhya System is very extensive. Yogins have respect for that System as also for the Vedas.

47. In the Sankhya System no topic or principle above the twenty fifth is admitted That which the Sankhyas consider as their highest principle has been duly described (by me).

48 In the Yoga philosophy, it is said that Brahma, which is the essence of knowledge without the second, becomes the Individual Soul only when invested with Ignorance. In the Yoga Scriptures, therefore, both Brahma and Individual Soul are spoken of.

CHAPTER CCCIX.

Vashishtha said —

1. Listen now to me as I describe to you the Buddha (Enlightened or the Supreme Self) and Abuddha (Individual Soul) which is the dispensation of the qualities. Assuming many forms the Supreme Soul, becoming Individual Soul, regards all those forms as real.

2. On account of such transformations Individual Soul fails to understand the Supreme Soul, for he has the three qualities and creates and withdraws into himself what he creates.

3. Ceaselessly for his sport, O king, does Individual Soul undergo changes and because he is capable of understanding the called action of the Unmanifest, therefore he is the Comprehender.

4. The Unmanifest or Nature can at no time comprehend Brahma which is really without qualities even when it shows itself with qualities. Hence is Nature called Unintelligent.

5 There is a declaration of the Shrutis that if ever Nature does succeed in knowing the twenty fifth, she then becomes at one with the Individual Soul who is united with her On account of this Individual Soul or Purusha, who is not manifest and which in his real nature is not subject to changes, comes to be called as the Unawakened or Ignorant.

6—7. Indeed, because the twenty-fifth can comprehend the Unmanifest, he is, therefore, called Comprehender He cannot, however readily, comprehend the twenty sixth, which is pure, which is Knowledge without duality, which is immeasurable, and which is eternal. The twenty-sixth, however, can know both the Individual Soul and Nature, numbering the twenty fifth and the twenty-fourth respectively.

8. O you of great effulgence, only wise men know that Brahma which is Unmanifest, which is in its real nature to all that is seen and unseen, and which, O son, is the one independent essence in the universe.

9. When Individual Soul considers himself different from what he truly is it is only then that he fails to know the Supreme Soul and himself and Nature with which he is united.

10. When Individual Soul succeeds in understanding Nature then he is said to be restored to his true nature and then does he attain to that high understanding which is pure and stainless.

11 When Individual Soul succeeds, O foremost of kings, in attaining to that excellent understanding he then attains to that Pure Knowledge which is called the twenty-sixth (or Brahma) He then casts off the Unmanifest or Nature which has the attributes of Creation and Destruction

12. When Individual Soul knows Nature which is unintelligent and subject to the action of the three qualities of Goodness, Darkness and Ignorance, he then becomes shorn of qualities himself. On account of his thus understanding the Unmanifest, he succeeds in acquiring the nature of the Supreme Soul.

13 The learned say that when he is freed from the qualities and united in nature with the Supreme Soul, then does Individual Soul become at one with that Soul. The Supreme Soul, is called the Real as well as Not Real, and is above decay and destruction.

14. O giver of honors, the Soul, though it has the body for its resting place, yet it cannot be said to have acquired the nature of those principles The wise say that there are five and twenty principles in all

15. Indeed, O son, the Soul is not to be considered as possessed of any of the principles Endued with Intelligence, it is above the principles. It renounces quickly even that principle which is the mark of Knowledge.

16 When Individual Soul comes to regard himself as the twenty sixth which is divested of decay and destruction, it is then that, forsooth, he succeeds by his own force in attaining to similarity with the twenty sixth.

17 Though awakened by the twenty-sixth which is Pure Intelligence, Individual Soul still becomes subject to Ignorance. Thus is the cause of Jiva's multifariousness as explained in the Shrutis and the Sankhya scriptures.

18 When Individual Soul, who is endued with consciousness, loses all Consciousness of a distinct or individual Self, then does he, losing his multifariousness resume His Oneness

19 O king of Mithila, when Individual Soul, who is found to be in union with happiness and misery and who is seldom free from the consciousness of Self, becomes identified with the Supreme Soul which transcends understanding, then does he become freed from virtue and vice.

20 Indeed, when Individual Soul attaining to the twenty-sixth which is Unborn and Powerful and which is shorn of all attachments, succeeds in comprehending it thoroughly, he himself becomes possessed of power and entirely renounces the Unmanifest or Nature.

21—22 For understanding the twenty-sixth, the twenty four principles seem to Individual Soul to be unreal I have thus told you, O sinless one, according to the indications of the Shrutis the nature of the Unintelligent, and of Individual Soul, as also of that which is Pure Knowledge agreeably to the truth. Guided by the scriptures, variety and oneness are thus to be understood

23. The difference between the gnat and the Udumvara or that between the fish and water illustrates the difference between the Individual Soul and the Supreme Soul

24 The Multiplicity and Oneness of these two are to be understood thus This is called Liberation, viz this comprehension of oneself as something distinct from Unintelligent or Unmanifest Nature

25 The twenty fifth, which lives in the bodies of living creatures, should be liberated making him know the Unmanifest or the Supreme Soul which is above the understanding

26 Indeed, that twenty-fifth is capable of acquiring Liberation in this way only and not through any other means Though insooth different from the body in which he lives for the time being, he partakes of the nature of that body on account of his union with it.

27. Uniting with what is Pure, he becomes Pure Uniting with the Intelligent, he becomes Intelligent By uniting, O foremost of men, with one that is Liberate, he becomes Liberated

28 By uniting with one who is shorn of all attachments, he becomes freed from all attachments. By uniting with one striving after Liberation, he himself partaking of the nature of his companion, strives after Liberation.

29 By uniting with one of pure acts, he becomes pure and of pure acts and endued with blazing effulgence By uniting with one of pure soul, he becomes of pure soul himself.

30 By uniting with the One independent Soul, he becomes One and Independent. Uniting with One that is dependent on One's Own Self he attains to the same nature and acquires Independence.

31 O monarch I have duly told you all this that is perfectly true Candidly have I described to you this subject, viz, the Eternal, Pure and Prime Brahma.

32 You may communicate this high knowledge, capable of awakening the soul, to that person, O king who though not a master of the the Vedas is, nevertheless, humble and has a keen desire for acquiring the knowledge of Brahma.

33 It should never be given to one who speaks falsehood, or one who is cunning or roguish, or one who has no strength of mind, or one who is of crooked understanding, or one who is jealous of men of knowledge, or one who pains others Listen to me as I say who they are to whom this knowledge may safely be given.

34—35 It should be given to one who has faith, or one who has merit, or one who does not speak ill of others, or one who is given to penances from the purest of motives, or one who is endued with knowledge and wisdom, or one who performs sacrifices and other rites laid down in the Vedas, or one who has a forgiving nature, or one who feels compassion on and does good to all creatures, or one who is fond of living in privacy and solitude, or one who is fond of performing all acts laid down in the scriptures, or one who does not like to quarrel, or one who is endued with great learning, or one having wisdom, or one possessed of forgiveness and self-control and tranquility of soul.

36 This high knowledge of Brahma should never be given to one who has not such qualifications It has been said that by giving this knowledge to one who is not considered a worthy recipient, no advantage or good fruit can arise.

37. This great knowledge should never be given, even if he gives in exchange the whole Earth full of gems and riches of every sort, to one that is not observant of any vows and restraints Forsooth however, O king, this knowledge should be imparted to one who has conquered his senses.

38 O Karala, do not entertain any fear since you have heard all this regarding high Brahma from the to-day! I have described to you duly the high and holy Brahma that is without beginning and middle, and that is capable of removing all kinds of sorrow.

39 Seeing Brahma whose sight is capable of doing away with both birth and death, O king, which is full of auspiciousness, which removes all fear, and which yields the highest benefit, and having acquired this essence of all knowledge renounce all error and stupefaction to day

40—41 I had acquired this knowledge from the eternal Hiranyagarbha himself, O king, who communicated it to me for my having carefully pleased that great Being of very superior Soul. Asked by you to-day, I have, O king, communicated the knowledge of eternal Brahma to you just as I had myself gained it from my teacher. Indeed, this great knowledge which is the refuge of all persons conversant with Liberation has been given to you exactly as I had it from Brahman himself"

Bhishma said:—

42. "I have thus told you of high Brahma just as the great Rishi had said, by attaining to which the Twenty fifth (Individual Soul) has never to return.

43 On account of his not knowing truly the Supreme Soul which is not subject to decay and death, Individual Soul is obliged to frequently return to the world When, however, Individual Soul succeeds in acquiring that high knowledge, he has no longer to return.

44 Having heard it, O king, from the celestial Rishi, I have, O son, given to you that great knowledge which yields the highest good.

45 This knowledge was acquired from Hiranyagarbha by the great Rishi Vashishtha From that foremost of Rishis, viz, Vashishtha, it was acquired by Narada.

46. From Narada I have acquired that knowledge which is truly at one with the eternal Brahma Having heard this discourse of great import, couched in excellent words, do not, O foremost of the Kurus, give way any longer to grief.

47. That man who knows the Destructible and the Indestructible, becomes freed from fear. He, indeed, O king, is compelled to entertain fear who is shorn of this knowledge.

48 On account of Ignorance, the man of foolish soul hath repeatedly to return to this world Indeed after death he has to be born in thousands and thousands of orders of Being, every one of which meets with Death in the end.

49 Now in the world of the gods, now among men, and now among intermediate orders of Being, he has to appear again and again If in course of time he succeeds in crossing that Ocean of Ignorance in which he is sunk, he then succeeds in avoiding completely re-birth and attaining to oneness with the Supreme Soul.

50 The Ocean of Ignorance is dreadful It is bottomless and called the Unmanifest O Bharata day after day, creatures are seen to fall and sink in that Ocean.

51 Since you O king, have been freed from that eternal and limitless Ocean of Ignorance, you have, therefore, become freed from Darkness and also Ignorance."

CHAPTER CCCX.

(MOKSHADHARMA PARVA)—Continued.

Bhishma said:—

1. 'Once on a time a king of Janaka's family while roaming in the uninhabited forests in pursuit of deer, saw a superior Brahmana or Rishi of Bhrigu's race.

2 Bowing with his head to the Rishi who was seated at his ease, king Vasuman sat near him and with his permission put to him this question —

3 O holy one what yields the highest benefit both in this world and in the next, to man who has an unsuitable body and who is the slave of his desires?

4. Duly respected by the king, and thus questioned, that great Rishi endued with ascetic merit, then said these words to him these words to him which were highly beneficial.

The Rishi said:—

5 If you seek, both here and hereafter what is agreeable to your mind, do you then, with controlled senses, abstain from doing what is disagreeable to all creatures

6 Virtue is beneficial to them that are good. Virtue is the refuge of the good From virtue have originated the three worlds with their mobile and immobile creatures.

7 O you, who are eagerly desirous of enjoying all agreeable objects, how is it that you are not yet satiated with objects of desire? You see the honey, O you of little understanding, but are blind to the fall

8 As one desirous of acquiring the fruits of knowledge, should busy himself with the acquisition of knowledge, so one desirous of acquiring the fruits of Virtue should be busy with the acquisition of Virtue.

9 If a wicked man, from desire of virtue, tries to do a pure and stainless act, the fulfilment of his desire becomes impossible If, on the other hand, a good man, moved by the desire of acquiring virtue, tries to do an act that is even difficult, its accomplishment becomes easy for him

10 If, while living in the forest, one acts in such a way as to enjoy all the pleasures of living amongst men in towns, one comes to be regarded not as a forest recluse but as an inhabitant of towns Likewise, if one while living in towns, acts in such a way as to enjoy the happiness of a forest life one is regarded not as a inhabitant of towns but as a forest recluse

11 Ascertaining the merits of the religion of Karma and that of Abstention therefrom, do you with concentrated senses, be devoted to the practices of virtue in thought, word, and deed.

12 Judging of the propriety of time and place, purified by the observance of vows and other purifying rites, and solicited do you without malice, make large gifts to the good

13 Acquiring riches by fare means one should give it away to worthy persons One should make gifts renouncing anger, and having made gifts one should never yield to sorrow nor proclaim those gifts with his own mouth

14 The Brahmana who is full of mercy who is pure, who has his senses under control, who is truthful in speech, who is full of candour, and whose birth is pure has been considered as a person deserving of gifts

15 A person is said to be pure in birth when he is born of a mother who has only one husband and who is of the same caste with him Indeed, such a Brahmana, knowing the three Vedas, viz, Rich, Yajush, and Saman, endued with learning, only observant of the six duties, has been considered as deserving of gifts.

16 Virtue becomes sin, and sin becomes virtue, according to the nature of the doer, of time, and of place.

17. Sin is renounced like the filth on one's body,—a little with a little exertion, and a greater quantity when the exertion is greater.

18 A person, after clearing his bowels, should take clarified butter, which acts most beneficially on his system Likewise, when one has freed himself of all faults and busies himself with the acquisition of virtue, that Virtue in the next world, brings on the highest happiness

19 Good and evil thoughts are in the minds of all creatures Withdrawing the mind from evil thoughts it should always be bent towards good thoughts

20 One should always respect the practices of his own caste Do you try, therefore, to act in such a way that you may have faith in the practices of your own caste

21 O you who are endued with an impatient soul, follow the practice of patience O you of a foolish understanding try to be possessed of intelligence Shorn of tranquility, try to be tranquil and shorn of wisdom as you are, try to act wisely

22 He who is in the company of the righteous, succeeds, by his own energy in acquiring the means of doing what is beneficial for him both here and hereafter. Verily, the root of that benefit is unflinching firmness

23 The royal sage Mahabhisha for want of this firmness, fell from heaven. Yayati, also, though his merits had become exhausted succeeded in regaining regions of happiness through his firmness

24 You are sure to acquire great intelligence, as also what is for your highest good by seeing virtuous and learned persons endued with ascetic merit.

Bhishma continued —

25 "Hearing these words of the sage, king Vasuman, having a good disposition, withdrawing his mind from the pursuits of desire set it upon the acquisition of virtue

CHAPTER CCCXI.

Yudhishthira said:—

1—2. "You should, O grandfather, describe to me what is freed from duty and its reverse, what is freed from every doubt, what is above birth and death, as also virtue and sin, what is auspiciousness, what is eternal fearlessness, what is Eternal and Indestructible, and Immutable, what is always Pure, and what is ever free from exertion."

Bhishma said:—

3 "O Bharata, referring to this matter I shall recite to you the old discourse between Yajnavalkya and Janaka. Once on a time the famous king Daivarati of Janaka's race, fully understanding the meaning of all questions, put this question to Yajnavalkya, that foremost of Rishis.

Janaka said:—

5. O regenerate Rishi, how many kinds of senses are there? How many kinds also are there of Nature? What is the Unmanifest and highest Brahma? What is higher than Brahmana? What is Birth and what Death? What are the limits of Age? You should, O foremost of Brahmanas, describe all these subjects to me who seek your favour.

6 I am ignorant while you are an Ocean of knowledge Hence, I ask you Verily, I wish to hear you describe all these subject.

Yajnavalkya said:—

8. Hear, O king, what I say in answer to these questions of yours. I shall give you the high knowledge which Yogins prize, and especially that which is possessed by the Sankhyas

9 Nothing is unknown to you Still you ask me One, however, who is questioned, should answer This is the eternal practice.

10. Eight principles have been called by the name of Nature while sixteen have been called changes Of Manifest, there are seven These are the views of those persons who are conversant with the spiritual science.

11—13 The Unmanifest, Greatness, Consciousness and the five subtile elements of Earth, Wind, Ether, Water, and Light,—these eight are known by the name of Nature. Listen now to the enumeration of those called changes. They are the ear, the skin, the eye, the tongue and the nose, and sound, touch, form, taste, and scent, as also speech, the two arms, the two feet, the lower duct (within the body), and the organ of pleasure.

14. The ten commencing with sound, and originating from the five great principles, are called Vishesha. The five senses of knowledge are called Savishesha, O king of Mithila.

15 Persons conversant with the spiritual science consider the Mind as the sixteenth. This is agreeable to your own views as also to those of other learned men well acquainted with the truths about principles.

16 From the Unmanifest, O king, originates the Greatness. The learned say this to be the first creation relating to Nature.

17 From Greatness, O king of men, originates Consciousness This has been designated the second creation having the Understanding for its essence.

18 From Consciousness has originated the Mind which is the essence of sound and the others that are the qualities of ether and the rest. This is the third creation, relating to Consciousness

19 From Mind have originated the great elements, O king! This is the fourth creation called mental.

20 Persons conversant with the principal elements hold that Sound and Touch and Form and Taste and Scent are the fifth creation, relating to the Great elements.

21 The creation of the Ear, the Skin, the Eye, the Tongue, and the Scent, forms the sixth and is considered as having for its essence multiplicity of thought.

22. The senses that come after the Ear and the others then originate, O king. This is called seventh creation and relates to the senses of Knowledge.

23 Then, O king, come the vital airs that rises upwards and those that go downwards. This is the eighth creation and is called Arjjava (straight).

24 Then come those vital airs which move transversely in the lower parts of the body and also that called Apana passing downwards. This, the ninth creation, is also called Arjjava, O king.

25 These nine kinds of creation, and these principles, O king, which are twenty-four in number, are described to you according to what has been laid down in the scriptures.

26. After this, O king, listen to me as I tell you the durations of time as said by the learned regarding these principles or attributes.

CHAPTER CCCXII.

Yajnavalkya said:—

1. Listen to me, O foremost of men, as I tell you what the duration of time is about the Supreme Purusha. Ten thousand Kalpas are said to form a single day of his.

2. The duration of his night is equal. When his night passes, he awakes, O king, and first creates herbs and plants which form the sustenance of all embodied creatures.

3. He then creates Brahman who originates from a golden egg. That Brahman is the form of all created things, as we have heard.

4. Having lived for one whole year within that egg the great ascetic Brahman, called also Prajapati came out of it and created the whole Earth, and the Heaven above.

5. The Lord then, it is seen in the Vedas, O king, placed the sky between Heaven and Earth.

6. Seven thousand and five hundred Kalpas form the day of Brahman.

7. Persons conservant with spiritual science hold that his night also is of an equal duration. Brahman, called Great then creates Consciousness called element and endued with excellent essence.

8. Before creating any physical bodies out of the ingredients called the chief elements, Mahan or Brahma, endued with penances created four others called his sons. They are the fathers of the original fathers, O best of kings, as we have heard.

9. We have also heard, O king, that the senses (of knowledge) along with the four inner faculties, have originated from the Puris, and that the entire universe of mobile and immobile Beings has been filled with those Great elements.

10. The powerful Consciousness created the five elements. These are Earth, Wind, Ether, Water, and Light as the fifth.

11. This Consciousness from whom originates the third creation, has five thousand Kalpas for his night, and his day is of equal duration.

12. Sound, Touch, Form, Taste, and Scent—these five are called Vishesha. They inhere into the five great elements.

13—14. All creatures, O king, continually permeated by these five, seek one another's companionship, become subservient to one another, and challenging one another, get over one another; and actuated by those immutable and seductive principles, creatures kill one another and rove in this world, entering into numerous intermediate orders of Being.

15. Three-thousands of Kalpas form their day. Their night also is the same.

16. The Mind roves over all things, O king, guided by the Senses. The Senses do not perceive anything. It is the Mind that perceives through them.

17. The Eye sees forms when helped by the Mind but never by itself. When the Mind is distracted, the Eye cannot see fully even the object before it.

18. It is commonly said that the Senses perceive. This is not true, for it is the Mind that perceives through the Senses.

19. When the activity of the Mind, is stopped, the activity of the Senses is also stopped. One should thus consider the Senses to be under the control of the Mind.

20. Indeed, the Mind is said to be the Lord of all the Senses. O you of great fame, these are all the twenty elements in the Universe.

CHAPTER CCCXIII.

Yajnavalkya said:—

1. I have, one after another, told you the order of the creation, with their total number, of the various principles, as also the extent of the duration of each. Hear now I tell you of their destruction.

2. Listen to me how Brahman, who is eternal and undeteriorating, and who is without beginning and without end, repeatedly creates and destroys all created objects.

3. When his day expires and night comes, he seeks sleep. At such a time the unmanifest and holy one moves the Being called Maharudra, who is conscious of his great powers.

5 He then consumes with his energy, O king, without any loss of time, the four sorts of created beings, viz, viviparous, oviparous, filth-born, and vegetable.

6 Within the twinkling of the eye all mobile and immobile creatures being thus destroyed, the Earth becomes on all sides, bare as a tortoise shell.

7. Having burnt everything on the face of the Earth, Rudra of incomparable might, then quickly fills the bare Earth with Water, possessed of great force.

8. He then creates the cycle fire which dries up that Water. The Water disappearing, the great element of Fire continues to blaze dreadfully.

9—10. Then comes the powerful Wind of immeasurable force, in his eight forms, who devours speedily that blazing fire of transcendant force, possessed of seven flames, and at one with the heat that exists in every creature Having devoured that fire, the Wind passes in every direction, upwards, downwards and transversely.

11. Then Space of immeasurable existent devours that Wind of transcendant power. Then mind cheerfully devours that immeasurable Space.

12. Then that Lord of all creatures, viz, Consciousness, who is the Soul of everything, devours the Mind. Consciousness in his turn, is devoured by the Great Soul who is conversant with the Past, the Present, and the Future.

13 The incomparable Universe is then devoured by Shambhu, that Lord of all things in whom exist the lordly powers of Anima Laghima, Prapti etc, and who is considered as the Supreme and pure Effulgence that is Immutable.

14. His hands and feet extend over every part; his eyes and head and face are everywhere, his ears reach every place, and he exists possessing all things.

15 He is the heart of all creatures, He measures a digit of the thumb That Infinite and Supreme Soul, that Lord of all, thus devours the Universe.

16 After this, what remains is the Undeteriorating and the Immutable One who is without shortcoming of any sort, who is the Creator of the Past, the Present and the Future, and who is perfectly faultless.

17 I have thus, O king, duly told you of Destruction I shall now describe to you the subjects of Adhyatma (Spiritual), Adhibhuta (Elemental) and Adhidaivata (Accidental).

CHAPTER CCCXIV.

Yajnavalkya said:—

1. Brahmanas well read in the subjects of enquiry speak of the two feet as Spiritual, the act of walking as Elemental and Vishnu as Accidental.

2. The lower duct is Spiritual; its function of throwing out the excreta is Elemental, and Mitra (Surya) is the Accidental.

3 The organ of generation is called Spiritual Its agreeable function is called Elemental and Prajapati is its Accidental.

4 The hands are Spiritual, their function as represented by acts is Elemental; and Indra is the Accidental of those limbs.

5. The organs of speech are Spiritual; the words uttered by them are Elemental; and Agni is their Accidental.

6 The eye is Spiritual; vision or form is its Elemental, and Surya is the Accidental of that organ.

7. The ear is Spiritual, sound is Elemental; and the points of the compass are its Accidental.

8 The tongue is Spiritual, taste is its Elemental, and Water is its Accidental.

9 The sense of scent is Spiritual, odor is its Elemental, and Earth is its Accidental

10 The skin is Spiritual, touch is its Elemental; and Wind is its Accidental.

11 Mind has been called Spiritual that with which the Mind is employed is Elemental, and the Moon is its Accidental.

12 Consciousness is Spiritual, conviction in one's oneness with Nature is its Elemental, and Mahat or Buddhi is its Accidental.

13 Buddhi is Spiritual, that which is to be understood is its Elemental, and Soul is its Accidental.

14 I have thus truly expounded to you, O king, with its details taken individually, the power of the Supreme in the beginning, the middle, and the end, O you, who are fully conversant with the nature of the original principles.

15 Nature, cheerfully and of her own accord, as if for sport, O king, produces, by undergoing changes herself, thousands and thousands of combinations of her original qualities.

16 As men can light thousands of lamps from but a single lamp, similarly Nature, by change, multiplies into thousands of existent objects the (three) qualities of Purrsha.

17—20 Patience, joy, prosperity, satisfaction, brightness of all faculties, happiness, purity, health, contentment, faith, liberality, mercy, forgiveness, firmness, benevolence, equanimity, truth, satisfaction of obligations, mildness, modesty, calmness, external purity, simplicity, observance of obligatory rites, dispassionateness fearlessness of heart, disregard for good and evil as also for pristine deeds,—appropriation of objects only when acquired by gift, the absence of cupidity, regard for the interests of others, mercy for all creatures,—these have been said to be the characteristics of the quality of Goodness.

21—24. The characteristics of the quality of Darkness are pride of personal beauty, assertion of supremacy, war, disinclination to give, absence of mercy, enjoyment and enduring of happiness and misery, pleasure in speaking ill of others, habit of quarrelling, pride, discourtesy, anxiety, hostilities, sorrow, appropriation of others' properties, shamelessness crookedness, disunion, roughness, lust anger, pride, assertion of superiority, malice and calumny These originate from the quality of Darkness I shall now tell you of qualities which originate Ignorance.

25 They are stupefaction of judgment, obscuration of every faculty, darkness, blind darkness. Darkness means death, and blind darkness means anger.

26—28. Besides these, the other marks of Ignorance are greediness for food, ceaseless appetite for both food and drink, taking pleasure in scents and dresses and sports and beds and seats and sleep during the day and calumny and all sorts of acts proceeding from carelessness, taking pleasure, in dancing and instrumental and vocal music, and aversion for every sort of religion. These, indeed, are the characteristics of Ignorance.

CHAPTER CCCXV.

Yajnavalkya said.—

1. These three O foremost of men, are the qualities of Nature These belong to all things of the universe.

2. The Unmanifest Purusha endued with the six Yoga qualities transforms himself by himself into hundreds and thousands and millions and millions of forms.

3 Those that are conversant with the spiritual science say that to the quality of Sattwa is assigned a high, to Rajas a middling, and to Tamas, a low place in the universe.

4 By the help of unmixed virtue one acquires a high end Through virtue mixed with sin one acquires the status of humanity While through unmixed sin one is visited by a vile end

5 Listen now to me, O king, as I speak to you of the intermixture of the three qualities of Sattwa, Rajas and Tamas.

6. Sometimes Rajas is seen mixed with Sattwa Tamas also exists with Rajas. With Tamas may also be seen Sattwa. Also Sattwa and Rajas and Tamas may be seen existing together and in equal parts. They then form the Nature.

7. When the Purusha becomes endued with only Sattwa he acquires the regions of the gods Endued with both Sattwa and Rajas, he is born as a man.

8 Endued with Rajas and Tamas, he is born the intermediate order of Being. Endued with all three, viz, Sattwa and Rajas and Tamas, he becomes a man.

9 Those great persons who are above both virtue and sin, attain, it is said, to that place which is eternal, immutable, undecaying, and immortal.

10 Men of knowledge go by very superior births and their place is faultless and undecaying, transcending the perception of the senses free from ignorance, above birth and death, and full of light that removes all sorts of darkness.

11. You had asked me about the nature of the Supreme living in the Unmanifest, Purusha? I shall tell you Hear me, O king. Even when living in Nature, He is said to live in His own nature without partaking of the nature of Prakriti.

12 Nature, O king, is inanimate and unintelligent When presided over by Purusha (Soul) then only can she create and destroy.

Janaka said:—

13 Both Nature and Soul, O you of great intelligence, are without beginning and without end. Both of them are without end. Both of them are without form. Both of them are undeteriorating.

14 Both of them, again, cannot be comprehended How then, O foremost of Rishis, can it be said that one of them is inanimate and unintelligent? How, is the tober said to be animate and intelligent? And why is the latter called Kshetrajna (Soul).

15 You O foremost of Brahmanas, are a master of the entire religion of Liberation I wish to hear fully of the religion of Liberation

16—17. Do you describe to me then the existence and Oneness of Soul, of his separateness from Nature, of the gods which attach to the body, of the place to which embodied creatures go when they die, and that place to which they may ultimately, in course of time, be able to go.

18. Tell me, also, of the Knowledge expounded in the Sankhya system, and of the Yoga system separately You also speak of the predicaments of death O best of men! All these subjects are well known to you even as an emblic myrobalan in your hand.

CHAPTER CCCXVI.

Yajnavalkya said.—

1. That which is without qualities, O son, can never be explained by assigning qualities to it Listen, however, to me as I explain to you what is endued with qualities and what is devoid of them

2. Great Munis conversant with the truth about principles say that when Soul seizes qualities like a crystal catching the reflection of a red flower, he is said to be possessed of qualities; but when freed from qualities like the crystal freed from reflection, he is seen in his real nature, which is as above all qualities.

3 Unmanifest Nature is by her nature endued with qualities She cannot transcend them. Shorn of intelligence by nature she becomes attached to qualities.

4. Unmanifest Nature cannot know anything, while Purusha, by his nature, is endued with knowledge—There is nothing higher than myself, the Soul is always conscious of it.

5. Therefore the unmanifest Nature, although by nature inanimate and unintelligent, still becomes animate and intelligent on account of her union with the Soul who is Eternal and Indestructible instead of remaining in her own nature owing to her destructibility.

6 When Soul, through ignorance, repeatedly becomes associated with qualities, he fails to understand his own real nature and therefore he fails to acquire Liberation.

7. On account of the Soul's Supremacy over the principles that originate from Nature he is said to partake of the nature of those principles On account also of his agency in the matter of creation, he is said to possess the quality of creation.

8 On account of his agency in the matter of Yoga, he is said to possess the quality of Yoga For his Supremacy over those particular principles known by the name of Nature he is said to possess the character of Nature.

9 For his agency in the matter of creating the seeds, he is said to partake of the nature of those seeds And because he causes the several principles or qualities to come into being, he is, therefore, said to be subject to decay and destruction.

10. On account, again, of his being the witness of everything, and on account, also, of there being nothing else than he, as also for his consciousness of oneness with Nature, Yatis endued with ascetic success, conversant with the spiritual science, and freed from fever of every sort, consider him as existing by himself without a second, immutable, unmanifest, unstable, and manifest

11 This is what we have heard Those Sankhyas however that depend upon Knowledge only and the practice of mercy for all creatures, say that it is Nature which is One but souls are many.

12 As a matter of fact, Soul is different from Nature which though unstable, still appears as stable As a blade of reed is different from its outer cover, so is Soul different from Nature.

13 Indeed, the worm that lies within the Udumvara should be known as different from the Udumvara. Though existing with the Udumvara, the worm is not to be considered as forming a part of the Udumvara.

14 The fish is separate from the water in which it lives, and the water is separate from the fish that lives in it. Though the fish and water exist together, yet it is never drenched by water.

15. The fire that lies in an earthen saucepan is separate from the earthen saucepan, and the saucepan is separate from the fire it contains. Although the fire exists in and with the saucepan, yet it is not to be considered as constituting any part of it.

16 The lotus-leaf that lies afloat on a piece of water is separate from the piece of water on which it floats Because it exists with water it does not form a portion of the water.

17. The eternal existence of those objects in and with those mentioned, is never correctly understood by ordinary mortals.

18. They who see Nature and Soul in any other light are said to possess an incorrect vision It is certain that they have repeatedly to sink into dreadful hell.

19 I have thus told you the philosophy of the Sankhyas, that excellent science by which all things have been correctly determined Ascertaining the nature of Soul and Nature in this way, the Sankhyas acquire Liberation.

20 I have also told you of the systems of those others who are conversant with the great principles of the universe I shall now describe to you the science of the Yogins.

CHAPTER CCCXVII.

(MOKHARDHAMA PARVA)—Continued

Yajnavalkya said —

1. I have already spoken to you of the science of the Sankhyas Hear now as I truly describe the science of the Yogins as heard and seen by me, O best of kings.

2. There is no Knowledge like that of the Sankhyas. There is no power like that of Yoga These two prescribe the same practices, and both are considered as capable of leading to Liberation.

3 Those men who are not blest with intelligence consider the Sankhya and the Yoga systems to be different from each other. We, however, O king, regard them as one and the same, according to the conclusion to which we have arrived

4 What the Yogins have in view is the very same which the Sankhyas also have in view He who sees both the Sankhya and the Yoga systems to be one and the same is to be considered as truly conversant with the principles that ordain the universe.

5 Know, O king, that the vital airs and the senses are the chief instruments for practising Yoga. By only regulating those vital airs and the senses, Yogins go everywhere at their will.

6 When the gross body is destroyed, Yogins, gifted with subtile bodies possessed of the eight Yoga powers wander over the universe, enjoying all sorts of happiness, O sinless one

7 The wise have, in the scriptures, spoken of Yoga as giving eight sorts of power They have spoken of Yoga as gifted with eight limbs

8 Indeed, O king, they have not spoken of any other sort of Yoga It has been said that the practices of Yogins, excellent as these are of two sorts Those two sorts, according to the characteristics described in the scriptures, are practices endued with attributes and those freed from attributes

9 The concentration of the mind together with the regulation of the vital airs, O king, is one sort The concentration of the mind along with subjugation of the senses is of another sort The first kind of Yoga is said to be that possessed of qualities, the second kind is said to be that freed from qualities.

10 Then again, Regulation of the Vital air is Yoga with qualities In Yoga without qualities, the mind freed from its functions, should be fixed Only the regulation of the vital air which is said to be endued with qualities should, in the first instance, be practised, for, O king of Mithila if the vital air be exhaled without mentally thinking upon a definite image, the wind in the neophyte's system will increase to his great injury.

11. In the first period of the night, twelve ways of suppressing the vital air are recommended After sleep in the last period of the night, other twelve ways of doing the same have been laid down.

12 Forsooth, one endued with tranquility, of controlled senses living in retirement rejoicing in one's own self, and fully conversant with the meaning of the scriptures, should fix his Soul.

13—14 Removing the five faults of the five senses, viz, (withdrawing them from their objects of) sound, form, touch, taste, and scent, and removing those conditions called Pratibha and Apavanga, O king, of the Mithilas all the senses should be fixed upon the mind.

15 The mind should then be fixed on Consciousness O king, Consciousness should next be fixed on Intelligence, and Buddhi should then be fixed on Nature.

16—17 Thus merging these one after another, Yogins meditate on the Supreme Soul which is One, which is freed from Darkness, which is Immutable and Infinite and Pure and without defect, and without blemish, who is Eternal Soul, who is unchangeable, who is Indivisible, who is without decay and death, who is everlasting who is above decrease and which is Immutable Brahma, 18 Listen now, O king, to the marks of one that is in Yoga. All the marks of cheerful contentment that are his who is sleeping in contentment are seen in the person, that is in Samadhi.

19 The person in contemplation, the wise hold looks like the fixed and upward flame of a lamp that is full of oil and that burns in a spot where there is no air.

20. He is like a rock which is incapable of being moved in the least by even a heavy downpour from the clouds.

21. He is incapable of being moved by the sound of conchs and drums, or by songs, or the sound of hundreds of musical instruments beat or blown together. Even this is the characteristic of one in contemplation.

22—24 As a man of cool courage and determination, while going up a flight of steps with a vessel full of oil in his hands, does not spill even a drop of the liquid if terrified and threatened by persons armed with weapons, so the Yogin, when his mind has been concentrated and when he sees the Supreme Soul in contemplation does not, on account of the entire stoppage of the functions of his senses at such a time, move in the slightest degree. Even these should be known to be the marks the Yogin while he is in contemplation.

25 While in contemplation, the Yogin sees Brahma which is Supreme and Immutable, and which is situated like a burning Effulgence in the midst of thick Darkness.

26. It is by this means that he acquires, after many years, Liberation after renouncing this inanimate body. Even this is what the eternal Shruti says.

27. This is called the Yoga of the Yogins. What else is it? Knowing it, they who are gifted with wisdom consider themselves as crowned with success.

CHAPTER CCCXVIII.

Jajnavalkya said:—

1. Listen now to me, with attention, O king, as to what the places are to which those who die have to go. If the Individual Soul escapes through the feet, it is said that the man goes to the region of Vishnu,

2 If through the calves, it has been heard by us that the man goes to the regions of the Vasus If through the knees, he acquires the companionship of those gods who are called Sadhyas

3 If through the lower duct, the man acquires the regions of Mitra. If through the posteriors, the man returns to the Earth, and if through the thighs to the region of Patriarch

4. If through the flanks, the man acquires the regions of the Maruts, and if through the nostrils, to the region of the Moon. If through the arms the man goes to the region of Indra, and if through the chest, to that of Rudra.

5. If through the neck, the man goes to the excellent region of that foremost of ascetics known as Nara If through the mouth, the man acquires the region of the Vishwedevas, and if through the ears, to the region of the gods presiding over the several points of the horizon.

6 If through the nose, the man acquires the region of the Wind god, and if through the eyes, to the region of Agni. If through the brows, the man goes to the region of the Ashwins, and if through the forehead, to that of the departed manes.

7 If through the crown of the head, the man goes to the region of the powerful Brahman, that foremost of the gods. I have thus told you O king of Mithila, the several places to which men go according to the manner in which their individual souls escape from their bodies

8 I shall now tell you the presaging marks, as laid down by the wise, of those who have but one year to live.

9 One who having previously seen the fixed star called Arundhati, cannot see it, or that other star called Dhruva, or one that sees the full Moon or the flame of a burning lamp to be broken towards the south, has but one year to live.

10 Those men, O king, who can no longer behold their own images reflected in the eyes of others, have but one year to live.

11 One who being gifted with lustre loses it, or being endued with wisdom loses it,—indeed, one whose inward and outward nature is thus metamorphosed,—has but six months more to live.

12 He who regards the gods [illegible] out with the Brahmanas or [illegible] naturally of a dark color [illegible] blue, has but six months more to live.

13 One who sees the lunar disc full of holes like a spider's web, or one who sees the solar disc to have similar holes, has but one week more to live.

14 One who, when smelling sweet scents in places of worship, perceives them to be as offensive as the smell of dead bodies, has but one week more to live.

15 The depression of the nose or of the ears, the discolor of the teeth or of the eye, the loss of all consciousness, and the loss also of all animal magnetism are symptoms indicating death that very day.

16 If, without any ostensible cause tears suddenly flow from one's left eye, and if vapours be seen to issue from his head, it is a sure mark that the man will die before that day is over.

17 Knowing all these presaging symptoms, the man of purified soul should day and night unite his soul with the Supreme Soul.

18—19 Thus should he go on till the day comes for his death If, however, instead of wishing to die he wishes to live in this world, he renounces all enjoyments, —O king, and lives on in abstinence He thus conquers death by uniting his Soul with the Supreme Soul

19 Indeed, the man who is gifted with knowledge of the Soul O king, follows the practises recommended by the Sankhyas and conquers death by uniting his Soul with Supreme Soul.

20. At last, he acquires what is entirely indestructible, which is without birth, which is auspicious, and immutable, and eternal, and stable, and which is incapable of being acquired by men of impure souls.

CHAPTER CCCXIX.

Yajnavalkya said —

1 You have asked me, O king, of that Supreme Brahma which lives in the Unmanifest. Your question relates to a deep mystery. Listen to me with rapt attention, O king

2 Having behaved humbly according to the ordinances laid down by the Rishis I obtained the Yajushes, O king, from the Sun god.

3—4. With the hardest penances I formerly adored the heat giving god O sinless one, pleased with me, the powerful Sun, addressed me, saying,—O regenerate Rishi pray for the boon you covet, however difficult it may be of acquisition I shall, with cheerful mind, grant it to you It is very difficult to make me grant grace.

5 Bowing to him with my head, I addressed that foremost of heat giving luminaries thus —I have no knowledge of the Yajushes I wish to know them forthwith.

6 The holy one, thus solicited, told me,—I shall grant you the Yajushes. Made up of the essence of speech, the goddess of learning Saraswati will enter into your person.

7 The god then ordered me to open my mouth I did as I was commanded. The goddess Saraswati then entered into my body, O sinless one.

8 At this, I began to burn Unable to suffer the pain I plunged into a river. Not understanding what the great Sun had done for me for my well being, I became even angry with him.

9 While I was burning with the energy of the goddess the holy Sun told me —Do you suffer this burning sensation for only a little time That will soon come to an end and you will be cool

10 Indeed I became cool. Beholding me restored to ease, the Maker of light said to me,—The whole Vedas, with its appendix, together with the Upanishads, will appear in you by inward light, O twice-born one.

11. You will also edit the entire Satapathas O foremost of twice born ones. After that, your understanding will turn to the path of Liberation.

12. You will also acquire that end which is desirable and which is coveted by both Sankhyas and Yogins Having said so, the divine Sun proceeded to the setting hills

13. Hearing his last words, and after he had departed from where I was, I came home in joy and then remembered the goddess Saraswati.

14 Thought of by me, the auspicious Sarawati appeared immediately before my eyes, adorned with all the vowels and the consonants and having placed the syllable Om in the van.

15 I then, according to the ordinance, offered to the goddess the usual Arghya, and dedicated another to the Sun, that foremost of all heat-giving gods Doing this duty I took my seat, devoted to both those gods.

16 Thereupon the entire Satapatha Brahmanas, with all their mysteries and with all their abstracts as also their appendices, appeared of themselves before my minds eye, at which I became filled with great joy.

17. I then taught them to a hundred competent disciples and thereby did what was disagreeable to my great maternal uncle (Vaisham,payana) with the disciples round him.

18 Then, shining in the midst of my disciples like the Sun himself with his rays, I took the management of the Sacrifice, of your noble father, O king.

19. In that Sacrifice, a quarrel arose between me and my maternal uncle as to who should be allowed to take the sacrificial fee that was paid for the recitation of the Vedas. In the very presence of Devala, I took half of that fee.

20. Your father and Sumanta and Paila and Jaimini and other ascetics all agreed to that arrangement.

21. I had thus got from the Sun the five times ten Yajushes, O king. I then studied the Puranas with Romaharshan.

22—23 Keeping before me those Mantras and the goddess Saraswati, I then, O king, helped by the inspiration of the Sun, set myself to compile the excellent Satapatha Brahmanas, and succeeded in performing the task never before undertaken by any one else. That path which I had wished to take, has been taken by me and I have also taught it to my disciples.

24. Indeed I gave to my disciples the whole of those Vedas with their abstracts Pure in mind and body, all those disciples have, on account of my instructions, become filled with joy.

25. Having established this knowledge consisting of fifty branches which I had acquired from the Sun, I now meditate on the great object of that knowledge (viz., Brahma).

26—28. The Gandharva Vishwavasu, a master of the Vedanta Shastra, desirous, O king, of ascertaining what is good for the Brahmanas in this knowledge and what truth is in it, and what is the excellent object of this knowledge, once catechised me. He put to me altogether twenty four questions, O king, regarding the Vedas. Finally, he put to me a question, numbered twenty-fifth which relates to ratiocination. Those questions are as follows:—What is universe and what is not-universe? What is Ashwa and what Ashwa? What is Mitra? What is Varuna?

29 What is Knowledge? What is the Object of knowledge? What is Unintelligent? What is Intelligent? Who is Ka? Who is endued with the principle of change? Who is not endued with the same? What is he that devours the Sun and what is the Sun? What is Vidya and what is Avidya?

30. What is Vedya and what Avedya? What is Immobile and what Mobile? What is without beginning, what is Indestructible, and what is Destructible? These were the transcendental questions put to me by that foremost of Gandharvas.

31. After king Vishwavasu, that foremost of Gandharvas, had asked me these questions one after another, I answered them duly.

32. At first, however, I told him,—Wait for a short time, till I reflect on your questions!—the Gandharva agreed to it, and sat in silence.

33. I then thought once again of the goddess Saraswati in my mind. The replies then to those questions naturally originated in my mind like butter from curds.

34. Keeping in view the high science of inferential ratiocination, I churned with my mind, O monarch, the Upanishads and the supplementary works relating to the Vedas.

35 I then expounded to him the fourth science (that deals with Liberation, O foremost of kings, and on which I have already discoursed to thee, and which is based upon the twenty-fifth, viz., Individual Soul

36. Having said all this, O king, to king Vishwavasu, I then addressed him, saying,—Listen now to the answers that I give to your several questions.

37 I now deal with the question which, O Gandharva, you ask, viz.,—what is Universe and what is Not-universe?—The Universe is Unmanifest and original Nature endued with the principles of birth and death which are terrible.

38—39 It is, besides, possessed of the three qualities on account of its producing principles all of which are fraught with those attributes. That which is Not universe is Purusha shorn of all attributes. By Ashwa and Ashwa are meant the female and the male. Similarly, Mitra is Soul, and Varuna is Nature.

40. Knowledge, again, is said to be Nature, while the object to be known is called Soul. The Ignorant and the Knowing or Intelligent are both Soul without attributes.

41. You have asked what is Kah, who is endued with change, and who is unendued therewith I answer, Kah is Soul. That which is endued with change is Nature. He who is not endued therewith is Soul

42 Likewise that which is called the unknowable is Nature; and that which is called Knowable is Soul.

43 You have asked me about the Mobile and the Immobile. Hear my answer That which is mobile is Nature, which, undergoing changes, forms the cause of Creation and Destruction The Immobile is Soul for without himself undergoing changes he assists at Creation and Destruction

44—45 What is Knowable is Nature; while what is Unknowable is Soul Both Nature and Soul are said to be unintelligent, stable, indestructible, unborn and eternal according to the decision of the philosophers who know the spiritual science.

46 On account of the indestructibility of Nature in the matter of Creation, Prakriti, which is unborn, is considered as not subject to decay or destruction Soul, again, is indestructible and unchangeable.

47. The qualities of Nature are destructible, but not Nature herself. The learned, therefore, call Nature indestructible By undergoing changes Nature works as the cause of Creation. The results appear and disappear, but not original Nature. Hence also is Nature called indestructible. Thus have I told you the conclusions of the fourth Science based on the principles of inference and having Liberation for its end

48. Having acquired, by the science of inference and by serving preceptors, the Richs, the Samans, and the Yajushes all the obligatory rites should be observed and all the Vedas read with reverence, O Vishwavasu.

49—50 O foremost of Gandharvas, they who study the Vedas with all their branches but who do not know the Supreme Soul from which all things originate and into which all things merge when destruction sets in and which is the one object whose knowledge the Vedas seek to preach,—indeed, they who have no acquaintance with what the Vedas seek to establish,—study the Vedas uselessly and carry their burthen of such study in vain.

51 If a person seeking butter churns the milk of the she-ass, without finding what he seeks he simply finds a substance of foul smell like ordure

52 So lastly if one, having read the Vedas, fails to know what is Nature and what is Soul one only proves his own foolishness of understanding and carries a useless load.

53 One should, with devoted attention, think on both Nature and Soul, so that he may avoid repeated birth and death.

54 Thinking upon the incident of one's repeated births and deaths and avoiding the religion of acts which merely yield destructible results, one should follow the eternal religion of Yoga.

55 O Kashyapa, if one continuously reflects on the nature of the Individual Soul and its connection with the Supreme Soul, he then succeeds in divesting him of all attributes and in seeing the Supreme Soul.

56 The Eternal and Unmanifest Supreme Soul is considered by men of foolish understandings as distinct from the Individual Soul. They are really wise who see both these as truly one and the same.

57 Frightened at repeated births and deaths, the Sankhyas and Yogins consider the Individual Soul and the Supreme Soul to be one and the same.

Vishwavasu then said:—

58 You have, O foremost of Brahmanas, said that Individual Soul is indestructible and truly undistinguished from the Supreme Soul This, however, is difficult to understand. You should once more explain this subject to me.

59—63 I have heard discourses on this subject from Jaigishavya, Asita, Devala, the regenerate sage Parashara, the intelligent Varshaganya, Bhrigu, Panchashikha, Kapila, Shuka, Gautama, Arshtisena, the great Garga, Narada, Asuri, the intelligent Paulastya, Sanatkumara, the great Shukra, and my father Kashyapa. Subsequently I heard this from Rudra and the intelligent Vishwarupa several of the gods, the Pitris, and the Daityas I have gained all that they say, for they generally describe that eternal object of all knowledge.

64 I wish, however, to hear what you say on those subjects with the help of your intelligence You are the foremost of all persons, and a learned lecturer on the scriptures, and gifted with great intelligence.

65 There is nothing which you do not know. You are an ocean of the Shrutis, as described, O Brahmana, in the world of both the gods and the departed manes.

66 The great Rishis living in the region of Brahma say that Aditya himself, the Eternal lord of all luminaries, is your preceptor

67 O Yajnavalkya, you have acquired the entire science, O Brahmana, of the Sankhyas, as also the scriptures of the Yogins in particular.

67. Forsooth, you are enlightened, fully conversant with the mobile and immobile universe. I wish to hear you describe that knowledge, which is compared to clarified butter having solid grains.

Yajnavalkya said —

69. You are, O foremost of Gandharvas, capable of comprehending every knowledge. As, however, you ask me, do you hear me then explain to you according as I myself have obtained it from my preceptor.

70. Nature, which is unintelligent, is apprehended by Individual Soul however, cannot be apprehended by Nature, O Gandharva.

71. In consequence of Individual Soul being reflected in Nature, the latter is called Pradhana by Sankhyas and Yogins conversant with the original principles as laid down in the Shrutis.

72 O sinless one, the other, seeing, sees the Nature and the Soul, not seeing, it sees the Supreme Soul.

73. The Souls thinks that there is nothing higher than itself In sooth, however, though seeing it does not see the Supreme Self which sees it.

74 The wise should never think that the Nature is at one with the Soul which has a real and independent existence The fish live in water. It goes there impelled by its own nature.

75—76. As the fish, though living in the water, is to be considered as separate from it, similarly is the Soul to be apprehended, i e, though the Soul exists in a state of contact with the Nature, it is, however, in its real nature, separate from, and independent of Nature. When overwhelmed with the consciousness of Self and when unable to understand its identity with the Supreme Soul, on account of the illusion that covers it, of its co existence with Nature, and of its own manner of thinking, the Individual Soul always sinks down, but when freed from such consciousness it goes upwards.

77. When the Individual Soul succeeds in apprehending that it is one, and Nature with which it lives is another, then only does it, O twice born one, succeed in seeing the Supreme Soul and attaining to the condition of Oneness with Him.

78 The Supreme is one O king, and the Individual Soul is another. On account of the Supreme overlying the Individual Soul, the wise consider both to be one and the same.

79—82. For these reasons, Yogins and followers of the Sankhya system of philosophy, terrified by birth and death, blessed with sight of the Supreme Soul, pure in body and mind, and devoted to the Supreme Soul, do not welcome the Individual Soul as indestructible. When one sees the Supreme Soul and losing all consciousness of individuality becomes at one with the Supreme, he then becomes omniscient, and possessed of such omniscience he becomes freed from the obligation of re birth. I have thus described to you truly, O sinless one, about Nature which is unintelligent, and Individual Soul which is gifted with intelligence, and the Supreme Soul which is gifted with omniscience, according to the marks laid down in the Shrutis. That man who does not see any difference between the knower and the known, and between knowledge and the known, is both Kevala and not Kevala, is the original cause of the universe, is both Individual Soul and the Supreme Soul.

Vishwavasu said:—

83 O powerful one, you have duly and adequately expounded what is the origin of all the gods and which produces Liberation. You have said what is true and excellent. May you enjoy inexhaustible blessings, and may your mind be ever united with intelligence.

Yajnavalkya said:—

84 Having said those words, the king of Gandharvas proceeded towards heaven, shining in resplendence of beauty. Before leaving me, the great deity honored me by going round my body, and I found him, highly pleased.

85. He inculcated the science he had learnt from me to those celestials that live in the regions of Brahman and other gods, unto those who live on Earth, to also the dwellers of the nether regions, and to them who had adopted the path of Liberation, O king.

86 The Sankhyas are devoted to the practices of their system. The Yogins are devoted to the practices of their system. There are others who are desirous of acquiring Liberation To these latter this science yields palpable fruits.

87. O foremost of kings, Liberation originates from Knowledge Without Knowledge it can never be acquired The wise have said it, O king. Hence, one should try his best for acquiring true Knowledge in all its particulars, by which one may succeed in freeing oneself from birth and death

88 Acquiring knowledge from a Brahmana or a Kshatriya or Vaishya or even a Shudra who is of low birth, one having faith should always show respect for such nowledge Birth and death cannot attack ne who has faith.

89 All orders of men are Brahmanas All originate from Brahman All men itter Brahma Helped by an understanding that is derived from and directed to Brahma, I preach this science treating of Nature and Soul. Indeed, this whole universe is Brahma.

90. From the mouth of Brahman originated the Brahmanas from his arms arose the Kshatriyas, from his navel, the Vaishyas, and from his feet, the Shudras All the orders should not be considered as differing from one another.

91 Actuated by Ignorance, all men meet with death and go, O king, by birth which is the cause of acts. Shorn of Knowledge all orders of men, dragged by terrible Ignorance, fall into varied orders of being on account of the principles that originate from Nature.

92. Therefore, all should, by every means, try to acquire Knowledge I have told you that every person is entitled to took for its acquisition One who is endued with knowledge is a Brahmana Others, are possessed of knowledge Hence, this science of Liberation is always open to them all. The Wise, O king, have said this.

93 The questions you had put to me, have all been answered by me according to the truth Do you therefore, renounce all grief Go you to the other end of this enquiry Your questions were good Blessings on your head for ever.

Bhishma said :—

94 Thus instructed by the intelligent Yajnavalkya the king of Mithila became filled with joy

95—96 The king honored that foremost of ascetics by going round his body. Dismissed by the king, he left his court King Janaka having acquired the knowledge of the religion of Liberation, took his seat, and touching a million of kine and a quantity of gold, of gems and jewells gave them away to a number of Brahmanas

97. Installing his son in the sovereignty of the Videhas, the old king began to lead the life of a Yati.

98 Taking no notice of all ordinary duties, the king began to study the science of the Sankhyas and the Yogins in full

99—100 Considering himself to the Infinite, he began to reflect on only the Eternal and Independent One He renounced all ordinary duties, Virtue and Vice, Truth and Falsehood, Birth and Death and all other things relating to the principles produced by Nature

101 Both Sankhyas and Yogins, according to the teachings of their sciences, consider this universe as the outcome of the action of the Manifest and the Unmanifest

102 The learned say that Brahma is freed from good and evil, is self dependent the highest of the high, Eternal, and Pure Do you, therefore, O king, become Pure

103—104 The giver, the receiver of the gift, the gift itself, and that what is ordered to be given away are all to be deemed as the unmanifest Soul The Soul is the Soul's possession Who, therefore, can be a stranger to one? Do you think always in this way Never think otherwise.

105 He who does not know what is Nature possessed of qualities and what is Soul transcending qualities, only he, not possessed as he is of knowledge, repairs to sacred waters and celebrates sacrifices

106 Not by study of the Vedas not by penances, not by sacrifices, O son of Kuru, can one acquire the status of Brahma. Only when one succeeds in apprehending the Supreme or Unmanifest, he is respected

107 They who wait upon Mahat acquires the regions of Mahat They who wait upon Consciousness, go to the spot that belongs to Consciousness They who wait upon what is higher, acquire higher places

108 Those persons, learned in the scriptures, who succeed in apprehending Eternal Brahma which is higher than Unmanifest Nature, can acquire that which is above birth and death which is free from qualities, and which is both existent and non-existent.

109 I got all this knowledge from Janaka The latter had got it from Yajnavalkya Knowledge is very superior. Sacrifices cannot compare with it With the help of Knowledge one succeeds in crossing the world's ocean which is beset with difficulties and dangers One can never cross that ocean by means of sacrifices.

110. Birth and death, and other obstacles, O king, men of knowledge say, one cannot get over by ordinary exertion. Men acquire heaven through sacrifices, penances, vows, and observances. But they have again to drop down therefrom on the Earth.

111. Do you, therefore, worship with reverence that which is Supreme, most pure, blessed, stainless, and sacred, and which is above all states. By apprehending Soul, O king, and by celebrating the Sacrifice which consists in the acquisition of Knowledge, you will really be wise.

112 In former time, Yanavalkya did that good to king Janaka which comes from a study of the Upanishads. The Eternal and Immutable Supreme was the subject which the great Rishi had described to the king of Mithila It enabled him to attain to that Brahma which is auspicious and immortal, and which is above all sorts of sorrow."

CHAPTER CCCXX.

(MOKSHADHARMA PARVA) —

Continued.

Yudhishthira said —

1. "Having acquired great power and great riches, and having obtained a long period of life how may one succeed in shunning death?

2 By which of these means, viz, penances, or the performance of the various acts, or by knowledge of the Shrutis, or the application of medicines, can one succeed in avoiding decrepitude and death."

Bhishma said.—

3 "Regarding it is cited the old narrative of Panchashikha who was a Bhikshu in his practices and Janaka.

4 Once on a time, Janaka, the king of the Videhas, questioned the great Rishi Panchashikha, who was the foremost of all persons conversant with the Vedas and who had all his doubts removed about the object and meaning of all duties.

The King said:—

5 By what conduct, O holy one, may one get over Decrepitude and Death? Is it by penances, or by the understanding, or by religious practices, or by study and knowledge of the scriptures.

6 Thus addressed by the king of the Videhas the learned Panchashikha, conversant with all invisible things, answered, saying, Nothing can prevent two (viz, decrepitude and death), nor is it true that these cannot be prevented under any circumstances.

7. Neither days, nor nights, nor months, cease to go on. Only that man who, though transitory, follows the eternal path succeeds in avoiding birth and death.

8. Destruction overtakes all creatures. All creatures seem to be ceaselessly borne along the endless current of time Those that are borne along the endless current of time which is without a vessel and which is infested by those two powerful alligators, viz, decrepitude and death, sink down without any body coming to their help

9 As one is swept along that current, one does not find any friend for help and one does not feel any interest for any one else.

10 One meets with wives and other friends only on his road One had never before enjoyed this sort of companionship with any one for any length of time

11. Creatures, as they are carried along the current of time, become again and again are drawn towards one another like clouds, moved by the wind meeting one another with loud noise.

12 Like wolves, decrepitude and death are devourers of all creatures Indeed, they devour the strong and the weak, the short and the tall

13 Among creatures, therefore, which are all so fickle only the Soul exists eternally. Why should he, then, rejoice when creatures are born and why should he grieve when they die.

14 Whence have I come? Who am I? Where shall I go? Whose am I? Before what do I rest? What shall I be? Why then do you grieve for what?

15 Who else than you will see heaven or hell? Hence, without throwing aside the scriptures, one should make gifts and celebrate sacrifices.

CHAPTER CCCXXI

(MOKSHADHARMA PARVA) —

Continued.

Yudhisthira said:—

1. "Without giving up the domestic mode of life, O royal sage of Kuru's race, who ever acquired Liberation which is the annihilation of the Understanding? Do tell me this.

of Sanyasa, "why then should not the mitigation of sorrow be seen in the umbrella and the sceptre which I use

50. Liberation does not exist in poverty, nor is bondage to be seen in riches One acquires Liberation through Knowledge only, whether one is poor or rich.

51. For these reasons, know that I am living in a state of freedom, though outwardly engaged in the enjoyment of religion, wealth, and pleasure, in the form of kingdom and wives, which form a field of bondage.

52. I have cut off the fetters formed by kingdom and riches, and the bondage of attachments, with the sword of Renunciation whetted on the stone of the scriptures describing Liberation.

53. As regards myself then, I tell you that I have become freed in this way. O mendicant lady, I entertain an affection for you. But that should not prevent me from telling you that your conduct does not tally with the practices of the mode of life, which you have adopted.

54 Your formation of the body is highly delicate. You have beauty You have an exceedingly shapely form You are young You have all these, and you have also subjugation of the senses. I doubt it verily

55. You have stopped up my body for ascertaining as to whether I am really liberated or not. This act of yours does not tally with that mode of life whose emblems you carry.

56 The triple stick is unfit for a Yogin who has desire. As regards yourself, you do not adhere to your stick As regards those who are freed, they should protect themselves from fall.

57 Listen now to me as to what your transgression has been on account of your contact with me and your having entered into my gross body with the help of your understanding.

61. I do not know whether you belong to my own family or do not belong to it. As regards yourself also, you do not know who I am. If you are of my own gotra, you have by entering into my body, produced another evil,—viz. of unnatural union.

62. If, again, your husband be alive and living in an distant place, your union with me has produced the fourth evil of sinfulness, for you are not one whom I may lawfully marry.

63 ; Do you commit all these sinful deeds, actuated by the motive of performing a particular object? Do you do these from ignorance or from perverted intelligence.

64. If, again, on account of your evil nature you have thus become thoroughly independent or unrestrained in your conduct, I tell you that if you have any knowledge of the scriptures, you will understand that everything you have done has been productive of evil.

65 A third fault touches you on account of these acts of yours, a fault that is destructive of peace of mind By trying to show your superiority, the indication of a wicked woman is seen in you

66 Desirous of asserting your victory as you are, it is not myself alone whom you wish to defeat, for it is plain that you wish to win a victory over even the whole of my court.

67. By looking thus towards all these meritorious Brahmanas, it is clear that you wish to humiliate them all and glorify yourself.

68. Stupefied by your pride of Yoga-power that has been born of your jealousy, you have caused a union of your understanding with mine and thereby have really mingled together nectar with poison.

desire of accomplishing some object of your own or whether you have come for accomplishing the object of some other king.

72. One should never appear deceitfully before a king, nor before a Brahmana, nor before his wife when that wife is possessed of every wifely virtue. Those who appear in deceitful guise before these three very soon meet with destruction.

73. The power of kings consists in their sovereignty. The power of Brahmanas well versed in the Vedas is in the Vedas. Women hold a high power on account of their beauty and youth and blessedness.

74 These are powerful in the possession of these powers. He, therefore, who seeks to accomplish his own object should always approach these three with sincerity and open mindedness Insincerity and deceit cannot yield success.

75 You should, therefore, inform me of the order to which you belong by birth, of your learning and conduct and disposition and nature, as also of the object with which you have come here.

Bhishma said :—

76. Though chastised by the king in these unpleasant, improper, and ill-applied words, the lady Sulabha was not at all abashed.

77. After the king had said these words, the beautiful Sulabha then gave vent to the following words in reply which were more handsome than her person.

Sulabha said :—

78. O king, speech should always be free from the nine verbal faults and the nine faults of judgment. It should also, while setting forth the meaning with clearness, be possessed of the eighteen well-known merits.

79. Ambiguity, determination of the faults and merits of premises and conclusions, weighing the respective strength or weakness of those faults and merits, establishment of the conclusion, and the element of persuasiveness or otherwise that belongs to the conclusion thus arrived at,—these five characteristics belonging to the sense—form the authoritativeness of what is said.

80 Listen now to the characteristics of these requirements beginning with ambiguity, one after another, as I explain them according to the combinations.

81. When knowledge rests on difference of the objects to be known being different from one another, and when the understanding rests upon many points one after another, the combination of words is said to be sullied by ambiguity.

82 By ascertainment called Sankhya, is meant the determination, by elimination, of faults or merits, adopting tentative meanings

83. Krama,* or weighing the relative strength or weakness of the faults or merits, consists in settling the propriety of the priority or subsequence of the words used in a sentence. This is the meaning of the word Krama as held by persons who can explain sentences or texts.

84 Conclusion is the final determination after this examination of what has been said on the subjects of religion, pleasure, profit, and Liberation, in respect of what it particularly is that has been said in the text.

85. The sorrow begotten by wish or hatred multiplies itself greatly. The conduct, O king, that one follows in such a matter is called Prayojanam.

86. Take it for granted, O king, at my word, that these marks of Ambiguity and the others, when occurring together, make a complete and intelligible sentence.

87—89. The words I shall utter will have sense, be free from ambiguity, logical, free from tautology, smooth, certain, free from bombast, agreeable, or sweet, truthful, not inconsistent with the three-fold objects of life, refined not elliptical or imperfect, shorn of harshness or difficulty of comprehension, characterised by due order, not far-fetched in sense, corrected with one another as cause and effect, and each having a specific object.

90. I shall not tell you anything, actuated by desire or anger or fear or cupidity or abjectness or deceipt or shame or mercy or pride.

91. When the speaker, the hearer, and the words said, perfectly agree with one another in course of a speech, then does the sense or meaning come out very clearly.

92. When about what is to be said, the speaker does not care for the understanding of the hearer by uttering words whose meaning is understood by himself, then, however good those words may be, they cannot be comprehended by the hearer.

93 That speaker, again, who, without caring for his own meaning, uses words that are of excellent sound and sense, creates only erroneous impressions in the mind of the hearer. Such words in such matters are certainly faulty.

94. That speaker, however, who uses words that are, while expressing his own meaning, intelligible to the hearer as well, is a true speaker. No other man deserves the name.

95. You should, therefore, O king, hear with rapt attention these words of mine, fraught with meaning and endued with wealth of sound.

96 You have asked me who I am, whose I am, whence I am coming, etc. Listen now to me, O king, with full mind, as I answer these questions of yours.

97. As lac and wood, as grains of dust and drops of water, exist mixed up when brought together, so are the existences of all creatures.

98. Sound, touch, taste, form, and scent, these, and the senses, though different in their essences, exist yet in a state of unison like lac and wood.

99. It is again well known that nobody asks any of these, saying, who are you? Each of them also has no knowledge either of itself or of the others.

100. The eye cannot see itself. The ear cannot hear itself The eye, again, cannot satisfy the functions of any of the other senses, or can any of the senses satisfy the functions of any sense except its own.

101. If all of them even combine together, even then they cannot know their own selves as dust and water mingled together cannot know each other though existing together. In order to perform their respective functions, they await the contact of external objects.

102. The eye, form, and light, form the three requisites of the action called Seeing. The same holds good about the action of the other senses and the ideas which is their result.

103. Then, again, between the functions of the senses and the ideas which are their result, the mind is an entity quite separate from the senses and is considered to have an action of its own. With its aid one distinguishes what is existent from what is non-existent for arriving at certainty.

104. With the five senses of knowledge and five senses of action, the mind makes a total of eleven. The twelfth is the Understanding. When doubt originates about what is to be known, the Understanding comes forward and sets at rest all doubts.

105. After the twelfth, Sattwa is another principle numbering the thirteenth With its aid creatures are distinguished as possessing more of it or less of it in their constitutions.

106. After this, Consciousness (of self) is an other principle It helps one to apprehence self as distinguished from what is not self.

107. Desire is the fifteenth principle, O king. The whole universe.

108 The sixteenth principle is Avidya or nescience To it are attached the seventeenth and the eighteenth principles called Nature and Manifestation.

109 Happiness and sorrow, decrepitude and death, gain and loss, the agreeable and the disagreeable,—these form the nineteenth principle and are called pairs of opposites.

110. Beyond the nineteenth principle is another, viz, Time, called the twentieth. Know that the births and deaths of all creatures are owing to the action of this twentieth principle.

111—12 These twenty exist together. Besides these, the five Great primary elements, and existence and non-existence, bring up the number to twenty-seven. Beyond these there are three others, named Vidi, Shukra, and Vala, that make the number thirty.

112. That in which these thirteen principles occur is said to be body.

113. Some persons regard unmanifest Nature to be the source or cause of these thirty principles. The Kanadas of gross vision consider the Manifest to be their cause.

114—115. Whether the Unmanifest or the Manifest be their cause, or whether the two be considered as their cause, or, fourthly, whether the four together be the cause, they that are conversant with spiritual science behold Nature as the cause of all creatures.

116. That Nature which is Unmanifest, becomes manifest in the form of these principles Myself, yourself, O king, and all others that are gifted with body, are the result of that Nature.

117 Embryonic conditions are due to the mixture of the vital seed and blood On account of insemination the result which first appears is called by the name of 'Kalala'

118 From 'Kalala' originates bubble. From 'Vudvuda' originates what is called 'Peshi' From 'Peshi' that stage originates in which the various limbs are seen. From this last stage appear nails and hair.

119 When the ninth month is gone, O king of Mithila, the creature takes its birth so that, its sex being known, it is called a boy or girl.

120. When the creature comes out of the womb, the form it presents is such that its nails and fingers seem to be of the color of burnished copper. The next stage is called infancy, when the form that was seen at the time of birth becomes metamorphosed.

121 From infancy youth is reached, and from youth, old age. As the creature advances from one stage into another, the form shown in the previous stage becomes changed.

122. The constituent elements of the body, which serve various functions in the general economy, undergo change every moment in every creature. Those changes, however, are so minute that they cannot be marked 123 The birth of particles, and their death, in each successive stage, cannot be marked, O king, even as one cannot mark the changes in the flame of a burning lamp.

124—125. When such is the state of the bodies of all creatures—i e, when what is called the body is changing continually like the rapid motion of a house of good mettle,—who then has come whence or not whence or whose is it or whose is it not, or whence does it not arise? What connection does there exist between creatures and their own bodies?

126 As fire is generated from the contact of flint with iron, or from two sticks of wood when rubbed against each other, so are creatures created from the combination of the (thirty) principles already named

127 Indeed, as you yourself see your own body in your body and as you yourself see your soul in your own soul, why is it that you do not see your own body and your own soul in the bodies and souls of others.

128 If it is true that you see an identity with yourself and others, why then did you ask me who I am and whose?

129 If it is true that you have, O king, been freed from the knowledge of duality which says—this is mine and this other is not mine—then what use is there with such questions as Who are you, whose are you, and whence do you come?

130. What marks of Liberation can be said to take place in that king who acts as others act towards enemies and allies and neutrals and in victory and truce and war?

131. What marks of Liberation are in him who do not know the true nature of the three-fold objects of life as shown in seven ways in all acts and who, on that account, is attached to that three-fold objects?

132 What marks of Liberation exist in him who cannot look impartially on the agreeable, on the weak, and the strong? Unworthy as you are of it, your pretence to Liberation should be suppressed by your counsellers.

133 This your attempt to acquire Liberation is like the use of medicine by a patient who indulges in all sorts of forbidden food and practices.

134 O chastiser of enemies, thinking of wives and other sources of attachment, one should see these in his own soul. What else can be considered as the indication of Liberation.

135. Listen now to me as I speak fully of these and certain other minute sources of attachment belonging to the four well-known acts to which you are still fettered though you profess yourself to have adopted the religion of Liberation.

136 That man who has to rule the entire world must, indeed, be a single king without a second. He is obliged to live in only a single palace.

137. In that palace he has again only one sleeping room In that room he has, again, only one bed on which at night he is to lie down.

138 Half that bed again he is obliged to give to his Queen This may serve as an example of how little the king's share is of all he is said to possess.

139 This is the case with his objects of enjoyment, with the food he eats and with the dresses he puts on He is thus attached to a very limited share of all things. He is, again, attached to the duties of rewarding and punishing.

140 The king always depends on others. He enjoys a very small share of all he is supposed to possess, and to that small share he is compelled to be attached In the matter also of peace and war, the king is not independent?

141 In the matter of women, of sports and other sorts of enjoyment, the king's inclinations are greatly limited In the matter of taking advice and in the assembly of his councillors what independence can the king be said to have?

142 When, indeed he passes orders on other men, he is said to be perfectly independent. But the moment after in the several matters of his orders his independence is limited by the very men whom he has ordered.

143. If the king wishes to sleep, he cannot satisfy his desire, resisted by those who have something to do with him. He must sleep when allowed, and while sleeping he is compelled to wake up for attending to those who have urgent business with him.

144. Bathe, touch, drink, eat, pour libations on the fire, celebrate sacrifices, speak, hear,—these are the words which kings have to hear from others and hearing them have to serve those that utter them.

145 Men come in numbers to the king and pray to him for gifts. Being, however, the protector of the general treasury, he cannot make gifts even to the most worthy.

146 If he makes gifts, the treasury becomes exhausted. If he does not, disappointed solicitors regard him inimically. He becomes vexed and as the outcome of this, misanthropy possesses his mind.

147 If many wise and heroic and rich men live together, the king's mind begins to be filled with distrust. Even when there is no cause of fear, the king fears those who always wait upon and adore him.

148 Those I have mentioned, O king, also find fault with him. See, how the king's fears may originate from even them.

149 Then again all men are kings in their own houses. All men, again, in their own houses are householders Like kings, O Janaka, all men in their own houses punish and reward.

150. Like kings others also have sons and wives and their own selves and treasuries and friends and stores In these respects the king does not differ from other men.

151 The country is ruined,—the city is burnt by fire,—the foremost of elephants is dead, at all this the king grieves like others, little thinking that these impressions are all owing to ignorance and mistake.

152 The king is seldom freed from mental sorrows caused by desire and aversion and fear. He is generally afflicted also by headaches and various other diseases.

153 The king is afflicted by all pairs of opposites. He is alarmed at everything. Indeed, beset with enemies and obstacles as kingdom is, the king, while he enjoys it, passes sleepless nights.

154. Sovereignty, therefore, is blessed with a small share of happiness. The misery with which it is full is very great. It is as unreal as burning flames fed by straw or the bubbles of froth seen on the surface of water.

155. Who is there that would like to obtain sovereignty, or having acquired sovereignty can hope to acquire tranquility? You know this kingdom and this palace as yours.

156—157. You think also this army, this treasury, and these counsellers as yours. Whose, however, in sooth are they, and whose are they not? Allies, ministers, capital, provinces, punishment, treasury, and the king,—these seven which form the limbs of a kingdom exist, depending upon one another, like three sticks standing with one another's help. The merits of each are shown by the merits of the others. Which of them can be said to be superior to the rest?

158. Some particular ones are regarded as superior to the rest when some important purpose is served through their agency. Superiority, for the time being, is said to belong to that one whose efficacy is thus seen.

159 The seven limbs already mentioned, O best of kings, and the three others, forming ten, supporting one another, are said to enjoy the kingdom like the king himself.

160. That king who is gifted with great energy and who is firmly attached to Kshatriya duties, should be satisfied with only a tenth part of the produce of the subject's field.

160 Other kings are seen to be satisfied with less than a tenth part of such produce.

161. There is no one who possessed the kingly office without some one else possessing it in the world, and there is no kingdom without a king. If there be no kingdom, there can be no virtue and if there be no virtue, whence can Liberation arise.

162. Merit of the most sacred and the highest order is associated with kings and kingdoms. By ruling a kingdom well, a king acquires the merit of a Horse sacrifice with the whole Earth given away as sacrificial gift.

163. O king of Mithila, I can mention hundreds and thousands of faults like these that belong to kings and kingdoms.

164. Then, again, when I have no real connection with even my body, how then can I be said to have any connection with the bodies of others? You cannot charge me with having tried to engender an intermixture of castes.

165 Have you heard the religion of Liberation in in all its bearings from the lips of Panchashikha, together with its means, its methods, its practices, and its conclusion?

166 If you have prevailed over all your bonds and freed yourself from all attachments, may I ask you, O king, why you preserve your connections still with this umbrella and those other appendages of royalty.

167. I think that you have not listened to the scriptures, or, you have listened to them without any advantage, or, perhaps, you have listened to some other books looking like the scriptures.

168. It appears that you are endued with only worldly knowledge, and that like an ordinary man of the world, you are bound by the fetters of touch and wives and mansions and the like.

169 If it be true that you have been freed from all fetters, what harm have I done you by entering your body with only my Intellect?

170 The practice with Yatis is to live in uninhabited or deserted abodes. What harm then have I done to whom by entering your understanding which is indeed shorn of true knowledge?

171. I have not touched you, O king, with my hands, or arms, or feet or thighs, O sinless One, or with any other part of the body.

172 You are born in a great family You have modesty. You have foresight Whether the act has been good or bad, my entrance into your person has been a private one, concerning us two only Was it not unfair for you to proclaim that private act before all your ministers

173 All these Brahmanas deserve respect They are foremost of preceptors. You also are worthy of their respect, being their king. Doing them respect, you are entitled to receive reverence from them.

174 Thinking on all this, it was not proper for you to proclaim before these foremost of men the fact of this union between two persons of opposite sexes, if indeed, you are really acquainted with the rules of propriety about speech

175 O king of Mithila, I am living in you without touching you at all even like a drop of water on a lotus leaf that rests on it without drenching it in the least.

175 If, despite this, you still feel my touch, how can it be believed that through the instructions of the mendicant Panchashikha, your knowledge has become disassociated from the sensual objects.

176. You have, it is evident, deviated from the domestic mode of life, but you have not yet acquired Liberation that is so difficult to acquire. You live between the two, pretending that you have reached the goal of Liberation.

178. The contact of one that is liberated with another that has been so, or of Soul with Nature, cannot lead to an intermingling which you fear.

197 Only those who consider the Soul to be at one with the body, and who think the several orders and modes of life to be really different from one another, commit the mistake of supposing an intermingling to be possible. My body is different from yours. But my soul is not different from your soul. When I am able to realise this, I have not the least doubt that my understanding is really not living in yours, though I have entered into you by Yoga.

180 A pot is carried in the hand. In the pot there is milk On the milk is a fly. Though the hand and pot, the pot and milk, and the milk and the fly, exist together, yet they are all different from each other.

181. The pot does not assume the nature of the milk Nor does the milk partake the nature of the fly. The condition of each is independent of itself, and can never be changed by the condition of that other with which it may for the time being exist.

182 Similarly, color and practices, though they may exist together with and in a person that is liberated, do not really belong to him. How then can an intermingly of orders be possible on account of this union of myself with you

183 Then, again, I am not superior to you in color. Nor am I a Vaishya, nor a Shudra. I am, O king, of the same caste with you, born of a pure family.

184 There was a royal sage named Pradhana. It is clear that you have heard of him. I am born in his family, and my name is Sulabha

185 In the sacrifices performed by my ancestors, the foremost of the gods, viz, Indra, used to come, accompanied by Drona, Shatashringa, and Chakradwara.

186 Born in such a family, it was found that no fitting husband could be found for me. Instructed then in the religion of Liberation, I wander over the Earth alone, practising asceticism

187. I am not a hypocrite with regard to the life of Renunciation I follow, I am not a thief that appropriates others' properties. I am not a confuser of the practices of the different castes I am firm in the practices of the mode of life I follow.

188 I am firm and steady in my vows I never utter any word without thinking of its fitness I did not come to you, without having thought properly, O king!

189 Having heard that your understanding has been purified by the religion of Liberation, I came here from desire of some good Indeed it was for enquiring of you about Liberation that I had come

190 I do not say so for glorifying myself and humiliating my opponents But I say it, out of sincerity only What I say is that he who is liberated never vaunts that intellectual superiority which one shows by logical discussions for the sake of victory He, on the other hand, is really liberated who devotes himself to Brahma, that sole seat of peace

191. As a person of the mendicant order lives for only one night in an empty house, similarly, I shall live for this one night in your body.

192. You have honored me with both words and other offers that are due from a host to a guest Having slept this one night in your body, O king of Mithila, which is as it were my own chamber now, to-morrow I shall go

Bhishma said —

193 Hearing these words fraught with excellent sense and with reason, king Janaka could not reply thereto.

CHAPTER CCCXXII.

Yudhisthhira said —

1 How was Shuka the son of Vyasa in days of yore, won over to Renunciation? I wish to hear you recite the story. My curiosity about it is irrepressible.

2. You should, O you of Kuru's race, describe to me on the conclusions about the Unmanifest, the Manifest, and of the Truth (or Brahma) that is in, but unattached to, them, as also of the acts of the self create Narayana, as they are known to you

Bhishma said —

3 Seeing his son Shuka living fearlessly as ordinary men do in practices that are regarded innocent by them Vyasa taught him the entire Vedas and then discoursed to him one day in the following manner,

Vyasa said —

1 O son, becoming the master of your senses, do you conquer extreme cold and extreme heat, hunger and thirst, and the wind also and having controlled them, do you practise virtue

5 Do you duly observe truth and sincerity, and freedom from anger and malice, and self control and penances, and the duties of benevolence and mercy

6 Rest you on truth, firmly devoted to virtue, renouncing all sorts of insincerity and deceit. Do you support your life on the remnants of food after feeding gods and guests

7. Your body is as fickle as the froth on the surface of water The Individual Soul is sitting unattached in it as a bird on a tree The companionship of all agreeable objects is transitory Why then, O son, do you sleep in such forgetfulness?

8 Your enemies are careful and awake and ever ready (to assail you) and always watchful of their opportunity Why are you so foolish as not to know this?

9 As the days are going one after another, the period of your life is being decreased Indeed, when your life is being continually shortened, why do you not run to preceptors?

10 Only they who have no faith, set their hearts on worldly things that have the only effect of increasing flesh and blood. They do not care for the next world

11. Those men who are stupefied by erroneous understandings show a hatred for virtue The man who follows those misguided persons that have taken to devious and wrong paths is afflicted equally with them

12 They, however, who are contented, devoted to the scriptures, gifted with high souls, and possessed of great might, follow the path of virtue Do you wait upon them with respect and seek instruction from them

13 Do you act according to the instructions received from those wise men whose eyes are set upon virtue With understanding purified by such instructions and made superior, do you then control your heart which is ever ready to deviate from the right course.

14 They who always think about the present, who fearlessly consider the to-morrow as something quite remote,—they who do not observe any restrictions about food —are really senseless wights who fail to understand that this world is only a field of probation.

15 Going to the flight of steps formed by Virtue, do you ascend those steps one after another. At present you are like a worm which weaves its cocoon round itself and thereby coses up all means of escape.

16. Do you shun unhesitatingly, the athiest who transgresses all restraints, who is situated like a house by the side of a dreadful and encroaching current, and who seems to stand like a bamboo with its head erect in pride.

17. Do you with the raft of Yoga cross the ocean of the world those whose five senses constitute its waters, having Desire and Anger and Death for its fierce monsters, and birth for its votex.

18 Do you cross, with the raft of Virtue, the world that is affected by Death and afflicted by Decrepitude, and upon which the thunder-bolts formed by days and nights are falling incessantly.

19 When Death is seeking you at every moment, it is certain that Death may get you for his victim at any time. Whence will you get your rescue.

20 Like the she-wolf snatching away a lamb, Death snatches away one who is still engaged in acquiring wealth and still unsatisfied in the enjoyment of pleasures.

21. When you are destined to enter into the dark, do you hold up the blazing lamp of righteous understanding and whose flame has been sufficiently kept.

22 Getting by various forms one after another in the world of men, a creature acquires the status of Brahmanhood with great difficulty. You have acquired that status Do you then, O son, try to maintain it.

23 A Brahmana has not been born for the gratification of senses. On the other hand, his body, for being subjected to mortification and penances in this world so that he may enjoy peerless happiness in the next world.

24. The status of Brahmanhood is acquired by long-continued and austere penances. Having gained that status one should never waste his time in the gratification of his senses Always engaged in penances and self control and desirous of what is for your well being, do you live and act, devoted to peace and tranquility

25 The life, of every man, is like a horse. The nature of that horse unmanifest. The elements form its body. Its nature is highly subtile. Kshanas, and Trutis, and Nimeshas are the hair on its body. The twilights form its shoulder-joints. The lighted and the dark fortnights form its two equally powerful eyes. Months are its other limbs. That horse is running incessantly.

26. If your eyes be not blind, seeing then that horse continually moving forward in its invisible course, do you set your heart on virtue, after hearing what your preceptors have to say about the next world.

27. They who deviate from virtue and who act carelessly, who always show malice towards others and take to evil ways, are obliged to take bodies in the regions of Yama and suffer various afflictions on account of their various sinful deeds.

28. That king who is given to virtue and who protects and punishes the good and the wicked with discrimination, acquires the regions of the men of righteous deeds. By doing various good acts, he acquires such happiness as is faultless and as is incapable of being attained to by going through even thousands of births.

29 Dreadful dogs, crows of iron beaks, flocks of ravens and vultures and other birds, and blood-sucking worms, attacks the man who disobeys the commands of his parents and preceptors when he goes to hell after death.

30. That sinful wretch who, on account of his carelessness, transgresses the ten boundaries that have been fixed by the Self-create himself, is obliged to pass his time in great misery in the wild deserts situated in the dominions of Death.

31. That man who is sullied with cupidity, who is fond of falsehood, who always takes pleasure in deception and cheating, and who does injuries to others by practising hypocrisy and deception, has to go to deep hell and suffer great misery and afflictions for his acts of iniquity.

32. Such a man is compelled to bathe in the broad river called Vaitarani whose waters are scalding, to enter into a forest of trees whose leaves are as sharp as swords, and then to lie down on a bed of axes He has thus to pass his days in dreadful hell in great misery.

33 You see only the regions of Brahman and other gods, but you cannot see what is the highest Alas, you are ever blind also to what brings Death on its train?

34 Follow the path of Liberation. Why do you delay? A frightful terror, destructive of your happiness, is before you. Do you take prompt measures for acquiring Liberation.

35 Soon after death you are sure to be taken before Yama at his behest. For acquiring happiness in the next world try to acquire virtue by the practice of difficult and austere vows.

36 The powerful Yama does not care for the sufferings of others, very soon takes the lives of all persons, that is, of yourself and your friends. There is none capable of resisting him.

37. Very soon the wind of Yama will blow before you Very soon will you be taken alone to that fearful presence Do you then achieve what will be for your behoof there.

38 Where now is that Death-wind which will blow before you very soon? Very soon will the points of the horizon, when that time arrives, begin to whirl before your eyes.

39 O son, soon will your Vedas disappear from you as you go helplessly into that dread presence. Do you, therefore, think of Yoga abstraction which is endued with great excellence.

40. Do you try to attain that one only treasure so that you may not have to grieve at the recollection of your pristine deeds good and bad all of which are marked by mistake

41 Decrepitude very soon weakens your body and robs you of your strength and limbs and beauty. Do you, therefore, seek that one only treasure

42 Very soon the Destroyer, having Disease as his charioteer, will with a strong hand, for taking your life pierce and break your body. Do you, therefore, practise austere penances.

43 Very soon will those terrible wolves that live within your body, attack from all sides. Do you try, therefore, to achieve acts of righteousness

44. Very soon will you, all alone, see a thick darkness, and very soon will you see golden trees on the top of the hill. Do you, therefore, hurry to achieve acts of righteousness.

45 Very soon will those evil companions and enemies of yours, (viz., the senses), dressed as friends swerve you from correct vision Do you, then, O son try to achieve that which is of the highest good.

46. Do you acquire that wealth which has no fear from either kings or thieves, and which one has not to renounce even at Death

47. Acquired by one's own deeds, that wealth has never to be distributed among partners. Each enjoys that wealth which each has acquired for himself

48. O son, give that to others by which they may be able to live in the next world. Do you also try to acquire that wealth which is indestructible and durable.

49 Do not think that you should first enjoy all sorts of pleasures and then try to acquire Liberation, for before you are satiated with enjoyment you may meet with Death Do you, in view of this, hasten to do acts of goodness.

50 Neither mother, nor son, nor relatives, nor dear friends even when begged with honors, accompany the man that dies One alone has to go to the regions of Yama

51. Only those deeds, good and bad, that one did before death follow the man who goes to the other world.

52 The gold and gems that one has acquired by good and bad means do not do any good to a man after death

53 There is no witness, of men who have gone to the next world, better than the soul, of all acts done and undone in life.

54. The Yogins when they enter the sky of their hearts, see by Yoga intelligence that the destruction of the body sets in when Individual Soul enters into the witness Chaitanya

55. Even here the god of Fire the Sun, and the Wind,—these three live in the body These, seeing as they do all the practices of one's life, become his witnesses.

56 Days and Nights,—the former marked by the virtue of showing all things and the latter marked by the virtue of concealing all things,—are running continually and touching all things Do you, therefore, satisfy the duties of your own order.

57. The road in the other world is full of many foes and of many repulsive and terrible insects and worms. Do you take care of your own acts, for only acts will accompany you along that road

58 There one has not to share his deeds with others, but every one enjoys or suffers the fruits of those acts which every one has himself performed.

59 As Apsaras and great Rishis acquires fruits of great happiness, similarly men of righteous deeds, as the fruits of their respective righteous deeds, acquire in the other world cars of transcendent brightness that go everywhere at the will of the riders.

60. Men of pure deeds and pure souls and pure birth acquire in the next world fruits commensurate with their own righteous deeds in this life.

61. By walking along the high road formed by the duties of domesticity, men acquire happy ends by acquiring the region of Prajapati or Vrihaspati or of him of a hundred sacrifices.

62. I can give you thousands and thousands of instructions Know, however, that the powerful cleanser keeps all foolish persons in the Dark.

63. You have passed twenty-four years. You are now full twenty-five years of age. Your years are passing away. Begin now to husband virtue.

64. The Destroyer that lives within error and carelessness will very soon deprive your senses of their respective powers. Do you, before that takes place, hasten to discharge your duties, relying on your body alone.

65 When it is your duty to go along that road in which your self only shall be in front and yourself only in the rear, what need then have you with either your body or your wife and children?

66 When men have to go alone and without companions to the region of Yama, it is clear that in view of such a situation of terror, you should try to acquire that one only treasure.

67 The powerful Yama, not caring for the sufferings of others snatches away the friends and relatives of one's race by the very roots. There is no one who can resist him. Do you, therefore, seek to acquire virtue.

68 I impart to you these lessons, O son that are all at one with the scriptures I follow Do you observe them by acting according to their sense.

69. He who maintains his body by performing the duties laid down for his own order, and who makes gifts for acquiring whatever fruits may attach to such acts, becomes freed from the consequences begotten by ignorance and error.

70. The knowledge which a man of pious deeds acquires from Vedic sayings leads to omniscience That omniscience is at one with the science of the highest object of human aquisition. Instructions, given to the grateful, become beneficial.

71. The pleasure that one takes in living amidst the dwellings of men is truly a fast-binding cord. Snapping that cord, men of righteous deeds go to regions of great happiness. Wicked men, however, cannot break that fetter.

72. What use have you of riches, O son, or of relatives, or of children, since you have to die? Do you engage in seeking for your soul which is hidden in a cave. Where have all your grandfathers gone?

73 Do that to-day which you would keep for to morrow. Do that in the forenoon which you would keep for the afternoon. Death does not wait for any one, to see whether one has or has not done his task.

74. Following the body after one's death, one's relatives and kinsmen and friends return placing it on the funeral pyre. Do you unhesitatingly shun those men who are sceptics, who are destitute of mercy, and who are given to wicked ways, and do you try to seek, without listlessness or apathy, that which is for your greatest good.

76 When, therefore, the world is thus assailed by Death, do you, with your whole heart, achieve virtue, helped all the while by unswerving patience.

77. That man who is well conversant with the means of acquiring Liberation and who duly satisfies the duties of his order, certainly acquires great happiness in the next world.

78 There is no destruction for you who do not recognise death in the attainment of a different body and who do not deviate from the path of the pious He who increases the stock of virtue is truly wise He, on the other hand, who deviates from virtue is said to be a fool.

79 One who is engaged in the accomplishment of good deeds, attains to heaven and other rewards as the fruits of those acts, but he who is addicted to wicked deeds has to sink in hell.

80. Having acquired the status of humanity, so difficult of getting, that is the stepping stone to heaven, one should fix his soul on Brahma so that he may not fall away once more

81. That man whose understanding, directed to the path of heaven, does not deviate thereform, is considered by the wise as truly a man of virtue and when he dies his friends should indulge in grief.

82 That man whose understanding is not firm and which is directed to Brahma and who has attained to heaven, becomes freed from a great fear.

83 They who are born in asylums of ascetics and who die there, do not acquire much merit by abstaining all their life from enjoyments and the indulgence of desire.

84 He, however, who though possessed of objects of enjoyment renounces them and practices penances, succeeds in acquiring everything The fruits of the penances of such a man are, I think, much greater.

85. Every one had and will have in this world mothers and fathers and sons and wives, by hundreds and thousands. Who, however, were they and whose are we?

86 I am quite alone I have no one whom I may call mine. Nor do I belong to any one else, I do not see that person whose I am, nor do I see him whom I may call mine.

87. They have nothing to do with you. You have nothing to do with them. All creatures take birth according to their pristine deeds You also shall have to go hence determined by your own deeds.

88. It is seen in this world that the friends and followers of persons in affluence behave towards them with devotion. The friends and followers, however, of the poor fall away during even the life time of the poor.

89 Man commits numerous evil deeds for the sake of his wife From those evil deeds he suffers much distress both in this world and in the next.

90. The wise man sees the world of life devastated by the deeds performed by every living being Do you therefore, O son, act according to all the instructions I have delivered to you.

91. Seeing this world to be only a field of action, the man endued with true vision, should, from desire of happiness in the next world, do acts that are good.

92. Exerting his irresistible power, Time cooks all creatures, with the help of his ladle formed by months and seasons, the sun for his fire, and days and nights for his fuel, they being the witnesses of the fruits of every act done by every creature.

93 For what object is that wealth which is not given away and which is not enjoyed? For what purpose is that strength which is not used in resisting or subjugating one's enemies? For what purpose is that knowledge of the scriptures which does not move one to deeds of virtue? And for what purpose is that soul which does not control the senses and abstain from evil deeds?

Bhishma said:—

93 Having heard these wholesome words spoken by the Island-born (Vyasa), Shuka, leaving his father proceeded to seek a preceptor who could teach him the religion of liberation.

CHAPTER CCCXXIII.

(MOKSHADHARMA PARVA)—Continued.

Yudhisthira said —

1. "If there is any efficacy in gifts, in sacrifices, in penances well done, and in dutiful services done to preceptors and other reverend elders, do you, O grandfather, speak of the same to me."

Bhishma said —

2. "An understanding associated with evil, makes the mind fall into sin In this state one stains his deeds, and then falls into great distress.

3 Those who are of sinful deeds, have to take birth as persons of very poor circumstances They pass from famine to famine, from pain to pain, from fear to fear. They are more dead than those who are dead.

4. Possessed of affluence, persons having faith, who are self-controlled, and who are devoted to righteous deeds go from joy to joy, from heaven to heaven, from happiness to happiness.

5 The unbelievers have to pass, with groping hands, through regions full of beasts of prey and elephants and pathless tracts full of snakes and robbers and other causes of fear. What more need be said of these?

6 They, on the other hand, who have reverence for gods and guests, who are liberal, who have respect for good men, and who makes gifts in sacrifices, have for theirs the path that belongs to men of purified and subdued souls

7 Those who are not pious should not be counted among men even as grains without kennel are not counted among grains and as cockroaches are not counted among birds.

8 The acts that one does, follow him even when he runs fast Whatever acts one does, lie down with the doer when the doer lays himself down.

9 Indeed, the sins one commits, sit when the doer sits, and run when he runs The sin acts when the doer acts, and, in deed, follow the doer like his shadow.

10. Whatever the acts one does by whatever means and under whatever circumstances, are sure to be enjoyed and suffered by the doer in his next life.

11. From every side Time is always dragging all creatures, following the rule about the distance to which they are thrown and which is commensurate with their deeds

12. As flowers and fruits, without being compelled, never allow their proper time to pass away without making their appearance, so the acts one has done in past life appear at the proper time

13 Honor and dishonor, profit and loss destruction and growth, are seen to set in No one can resist them None of them is everlasting, for it must disappear in the end.

14 The sorrows one suffers is the outcome of his deeds The happiness one enjoys originates from his deeds From the time when one lies within the mother's womb one begins to enjoy and suffer his pristine deeds

15 Whatever acts good and bad one does in childhood, youth, or old-age, one enjoys and suffer their consequences in his next life in similar ages.

16 As the calf recognises its dam even when the latter may stand among thousands of her kind, similarly the acts done by one in his past life come to him in his next life although he may live among thousands of his species.

17 As a piece of dirty cloth is whitened by being washed in water, similarly the righteous, purified by continuous exposure to the fire of fasts and penances, at last acquire eternal happiness.

18 O you of great intelligence the desires and purposes of those whose sins have been purged off by long continued penances well-performed, become fruitful

19 The path of the righteous cannot be discerned even as that of birds in the sky or that of fishes in the water.

20. There is no need of speaking ill of others, nor of reciting the instances of their failure On the other hand, one should always do what is delightful, sweet, and beneficial to his own self.'

CHAPTER CCCXXIV.

(MOKSHADHARMA PARVA)—Continued.

Yudhishthira said:—

1. "Tell me, O grandfather, how the great Shuka of austere penances took birth as the son of Vyasa, and how did he succeed in acquiring the highest success?

2 Upon what woman did Vyasa having asceticism for his wealth, beget that son of his? We do not know who was Shuka's mother, nor do we know anything of the birth of that great ascetic.

3 How was it that, when he was a mere boy his mind became bent to the knowledge of the subtile? Indeed, in this world no second person can be seen in whom such marks could be seen at so early an age

4 I wish to hear all this in full, O you of great intelligence I am never satiated with hearing your excellent and nectar-like words.

5, Tell me, O grandfather, in their due order, of the greatness, and the knowledge of Shuka and of his union with the (Supreme) Soul!"

Bhishma said:—

6 "The Rishis did not make merit depend upon years of decrepitude or riches or friends They said that he amongst them was great who studied the Vedas.

7. All this that you have asked has penances for its root That penance, again, O son of Pandu, originates from the subjugation of the senses.

8 Forsooth, one incurs fault by letting loose his senses It is only by controlling them that one succeeds in acquiring success.

9 The merit of a thousand Horse-sacrifices or a hundred Vajapeyas is not equal to even a sixteenth part of the merit of Yoga.

10. I shall, now, recite to you the circumstances of Shuka's birth, the fruits he acquired of his penances, and the foremost end he achieved. These are the topics which persons of uncleansed souls cannot understand.

11. Once on a time on the summit of Meru adorned with Karnikara flowers, Mahadeva sported, in company of his followers, the terrible spirits.

12 The daughter of the king of mountains, viz, the goddess Parvati, was also there. There near that summit, the Island-born (Vyasa) practised extraordinary austerities

13 O best of the Kurus, given to the practices of Yoga the great ascetic, withdrawn himself by Yoga into his own Soul, and engaged in concentration, practised many austerities for the sake of a son.

14 The prayer he offered to the great God was,—O powerful one, let me have a son that will have the might of Fire and Earth and Water and Wind and Ether.

15 Engaged in the austerest of penances the Island born Rishi begged of that great God, who cannot be approached by persons of impure souls, by his Yoga.

16 The powerful Vyasa remained there for a hundred years, living on air alone, engaged in worshipping many formed Mahadeva, the lord of Uma.

17—18. There were all the twice-born Rishis and royal sages and the Regents of the world and the Sadhyas along with the Vasus, and the Adityas, the Rudras, and the Sun and the Moon, and the Maruts, and the Oceans, and the Rivers, and the Ashwins, the Deities, the Gandharvas, and Narada, and Parvata, and the Gandharva Vishwavasu, and the Siddhas, and the Apsaras.

19. There Mahadeva, called also Rudra, sat, adorned with an excellent garland of of Karnikara flowers, and effulgent like the Moon with his rays.

20 In those delightful and celestial forests populous with gods and heavenly Rishis the great Rishi remained, engaged in high Yoga-contemplation, for getting a son.

21. His strength suffered no decrease, nor did he feel any pain Thereat the three worlds were much surprised.

22. While the Rishi, gifted with immeasurable energy, sat in Yoga, his matted locks, on account of his energy, were seen to blaze like flames of fire.

23 I heard of this from the illustrious Markandeya He used always to recite to me the acts of the gods.

24. It is for this that the matted locks of the great Vyasa, thus enblazed by his energy on that occasion, seem to this day to be gifted with the hue of fire

25. Pleased with such penances and such devotion, O Bharata, of the Rishi, the great God resolved to grant him his wish.

26. Smiling with pleasure the three-eyed god addressed him and said—O Island-born one, you will have a son after your heart.

27. Endued with greatness, he shall be as pure as Fire, as Wind, as Earth, as Water, and as Space.

28 He will be conscious of his being Brahma's self; his understanding and soul shall be devoted to Brahma, and he shall completely depend upon Brahma so as to be at one with it.

CHAPTER CCCXXV.

(MOKSHADHRAMA PARVA).—Continued.

Bhishma said:—

1. 'Having got this high boon from the great God, the son of Satyavati, was one day engaged in rubbing his sticks for making a fire.

2 While thus engaged, the illustrious Rishi, O king, saw the Apsara Ghritachi, who, on account of her energy, was then possessed of great beauty.

3. Seeing the Apsara in those woods, the illustrious Rishi Vyasa, O Yudhisthira, became suddenly possessed by desire.

4. The Apsara, seeing the Rishi's heart smitten with desire, changed herself into a she-parrot and came to that spot.

5 Although he saw the Apsara disguised in another form the desire that had arisen in the Rishi's heart spread itself over every part of his body.

6 Inviting all his patience, the ascetic tried to suppress that desire With all his efforts, however, Vyasa could not control his agitated mind On account of the inevitability of what was to take place the Rishi's heart was drawn by Ghritachi's beauty.

7 He tried his best for making a fire for suppressing his emotion, but despite all his efforts his vital seed came out.

8 That best of twice born ones, however, O king, continued to rub his stick without feeling any scruples for what had taken place From the seed that fell, was born a son to him called Shuka.

9 On account of this incident about his birth, he came to be called by the name of Shuka Indeed, it was thus that that great ascetic, that foremost of Rishis and highest of Yogins, was born from the two sticks.

10 As in a sacrifice a blazing fire spreads its effulgence all around when libations of clarified butter are poured upon it, similarly did Shuka take his birth, blazing with effulgence on account of his own energy.

11. Assuming the excellent form and hue of his father, Shuka, O son of Kuru, of purified Soul, shone like a smokeless fire.

12 O king, coming to the breast of Meru, in her own embodied form, the foremost of rivers viz, Ganga, bathed Shuka with her waters.

13 There fell from the sky, O son of Kuru, an ascetic's stick and a dark deer skin for the use, O king, of the great Shuka.

14. The Gandharvas sang repeatedly and the various clans of Apsaras danced, and celestial kettledrums of loud sound began to beat.

15. The Gandharva Vishwavasu, and Tumvuru, and Narada, and those other Gandharvas called by the names of Haha, and Huhu, eulogised the birth of Shuka

16. There the regents of the world headed by Indra, as also the go ls and the celestial and the regenerate Rishis.

17. The Wind-god poured there showers of celestial flowers.

18. The entire universe, mobile and immobile, became filled with joy.

19 The great and the highly effulgent Mahadeva, accompanied by the Goddess, and moved by affection, came there and soon after the birth of the Muni's son invested him with the sacred thread.

20. Shakra, the king of the gods, gave him, from affection, a celestial pitcher of of excellent form, and some celestial dresses.

21. Thousands of Swans and Shatapatras and cranes, and many parrots and Chasas, O Bharata, wheeled over his head.

22. Highly effulgent and intelligent Sh uka, having obtained his birth from the two sticks, continued to live there, practising many vows and fasts.

23. As soon as Shuka was born, the Vedas, with all their mysteries and all their abstracts, came for living in him, O king, even as they live in his father.

24. For all that, Shuka, selected Vrihaspati, who was a master of all the Vedas together with their branches and commentaries, for his preceptor, remembering the universal practice.

25—26. Having read all the Vedas together with all their mysteries and abstracts, as also all the histories and the science of polity, O powerful king, the great ascetic returned home, after giving his preceptor the tuition-fee. Adopting the vow of celibacy, he then began to practise the austerest penances, concentrating all his attention thereon.

27. Even in his childhood, he became an object of reverence with the gods and Rishis for his knowledge and penances.

28 The mind of the great ascetic, O king, found pleasure in the three modes of life, keeping in view, as he did, the Religion of Liberation."

CHAPTER CCCXXVI.

(MOKHARDHARMA PARVA)—Continued.

Bhishma said:—

1—2 "Thinking of Liberation, Shuka approached his father, and possessed as he was of humility and desirous of acquiring his highest good, he saluted his great preceptor and said,—You are well-versed in the Religion of Liberation. Do you, O illustrious one, describe it to me, so that I may enjoy supreme tranquility of mind, O powerful one.

3. Hearing these words of his son, the great Rishi said to him,—Do you study, O son, the Religion of Liberation and all the various duties of life.

4 At the command of his father, Shuka, that foremost of all righteous men, mastered all the books on Yoga, O Bharata, as also the Science of Kapila.

5—6 When Vyasa saw his son to be endued with the resplendence of the Vedas, and the energy of Brahma, and fully conversant with the Religion of Liberation, he addressed him, saying,—Go you to Janaka the king of Mithila. The king of Mithila will tell you everything for your Liberation.

7. Bearing the command of his father, O king, Shuka, proceeded to Mithila for enquiring of its king about the truth of duties and the Refuge of Liberation.

8 Before he started, his father further told him,—Do you go there by that path which ordinary human beings follow. Do not have recourse to your Yoga-power for proceeding through the skies.—At this Shuka was not at all surprised.

9 He was further told that he should proceed there with simplicity and not from desire of pleasure—Along your way do not seek for friends and wives, since friends and wives are causes of attachment to the world.

10 Although the king of Mithila is one in whose sacrifices we officiate, still you should not indulge in any feeling of superiority while living with him. You should live under his direction and in obedience to him. He will remove your doubts.

11. That king is well versed in all duties and well acquainted with the Scriptures on Liberation. He is one for whom I officiate in sacrifices You should, unhesitatingly, do what he orders

12. Thus instructed, the pious Shuka proceeded to Mithila on foot although he was able to go through the skies over the whole Earth with her seas.

13—14. Crossing many hills and mountains, many rivers, many waters and lakes, and many woods and forests full of beasts of prey and other animals, crossing the two insular continents of Meru and Hari successively and next the continent of Himavat, he came at last to the continent known by the name of Bharata

15 Having seen many countries inhabited by Chins and Huns, the great ascetic at last reached Aryavarta.

16 In obedience to the commands of his father and bearing them constantly in his mind, he gradually passed along his way on the Earth like a bird passing through the air.

17. Passing through many charming towns and populous cities, he saw various kinds of wealth without waiting to observe them.

18 On his way he passed through many charming gardens and planes and many sacred waters.

19 Before much time had passed he reached the country of the Videhas that was protected by the virtuous and great Janaka.

20 There he saw many populous villages, and many kinds of food and drink and viands and houses of cowherds swelling with men and many herds of cattle

21 He saw many fields abounding with paddy and barley and other grain, and many lakes and waters inhabited by swans and cranes and adorned with beautiful lotuses.

22 Passing through the Videha country full of rich people, he arrived at the delightful gardens of Mithila rich with many sorts of trees.

23 Abounding with elephants and horses and cars, and peopled by men and women he passed through them without caring to see the things that were presented to his eye.

24. Bearing that caution in his mind and continually thinking of it, Shuka of cheerful soul and taking delight in internal survey only, reached Mithila at last

25. Arrived at the gate, he sent word through the guards Gifted with tranquility of mind, devoted to contemplation and Yoga, he entered the city, having obtained permission.

26 Proceeding along the principal street abounding with rich men, he reached the king's palace and entered it without any hesitation.

27 The gate-keepers prevented him with harsh words. Thereat, Shuka, without any anger, stopped and waited.

28 Neither the sun nor the long distance he had walked had tired him in the least. Neither hunger, nor thirst, nor the exertion he had made, had weakened him. The heat of the Sun had not scorched or pained or distressed him in any way.

29 Among those porters there was one who felt mercy for him, seeing him staying there like the midday Sun in his effulgence.

30 Adoring him in due form and saluting him properly, with joined hands he conducted him to the first chamber of the palace.

31. Seated there, Shuka, O son, began to think of Liberation only. Gifted with equality he considered impartially a shaded spot and one exposed to the Sun's rays.

32. Soon after, the king's minister, coming to that place with joined hands, conducted him to the second chamber of the palace.

33 That chamber led to a spacious garden which formed a part of the inner apartments of the palace It looked like a second Chaitraratha Beautiful pools of water were here and there at regular intervals Delightful trees, all of which were in their flowering season, were in that garden

34 Bevies of damsels, of celestial beauty were in attendance The minister led Cuka from the second chamber to that charming spot Commanding those ladies to give the ascetic a seat, the minister left him there.

35 Those well dressed damsels were of beautiful features, possessed of excellent hips, young in years clad in red dresses of fine texture and decked with many ornaments of burnished gold.

36 They were well skilled in sweet conversation and maddening revelry, and consummate mistresses of the arts of dancing and singing Always opening their lips with smiles, they were like the very Apsaras in beauty.

37 Well-skilled in all the acts of dalliance capable of reading the thoughts of men upon whom they wait, endued with every accomplishment, fifty damsels, of a very high order and of easy virtue, surrounded the ascetic.

38 Presenting him with water for washing his feet, and adoring him respectfully with the offer of usual articles, they pleased him with excellent viands agreeable to the season.

39 After he had eaten, those damsels then, one after another, singly conducted him through the grounds, showing him every object of interest, O Bharata.

40. Sporting and laughing and singing, those ladies conversant with the thoughts of all men, entertained that ascetic of noble soul.

41. The pure-souled ascetic born in the fire-sticks, performing all his duties unhesitatingly, having all his senses under complete control, and a thorough master of his anger, was neither pleased nor angered at all this

42. Then those foremost of beautiful women offered him an excellent seat.

43 Washing his feet and other limbs, Shuka said his evening prayers, sat on that excellent seat, and began to think of the object for which he had come there.

44. In the first part of the night, he gave himself to Yoga. The powerful ascetic, passed the middle part of the night in sleep.

45. Very soon waking up from his sleep, he performed the necessary rites of cleansing his body, and though surrounded by those beautiful ladies, he once again devoted himself to Yoga.

46. It was in this way, O Bharata, that the son of the Island born Krishna passed the latter part of that day and the whole of that night in the mansion of king Janaka."

CHAPTER CCCXXVII

(MOKSHADHARMA PARVA)—Continued.

Bhishma said —

1. "The next morning, king Janaka, O Bharata, accompanied by his minister and the whole household, came to Shuka, preceded by his priest.

2 Bringing with him rich seats and various sorts of jewels and gems, and bearing the ingredients of the Arghya on his own head, the king approached the son of his reverend preceptor.

3—4 The king, taking with his own hands, from the hands of his priest, that seat adorned with many gems covered with an excellent sheet, beautiful in all its parts and dearly costly, presented it with great respect to his preceptor's son Shuka.

5 After the son of Krishna had taken his seat on it, the king adored him according to prescribed rites At first offering him water to wash his feet, he then presented him the Arghya and kine.

6—7 The ascetic accepted that worship offered with due rites and Mantras. That foremost of twice-born ones, having thus accepted the worship offered by the king, and taking the kine also that were presented to him, then saluted the king, gifted with great energy, he next enquired after the king's welfare and prosperity.

8 Indeed, O king, Shuka asked about the welfare of the king's followers and officers also Receiving Shuka's permission, Janaka sat down with all his followers.

9 Having a high soul and possessed of high birth, the king with joined hands, sat down on the bare ground and enquired after the well-being and unabated prosperity of Vyasa's son.

10. The king then asked his guest the object of his visit.

Shuka said :—

11. Blessed be you, my father told me that his client, the king of the Videhas, known all over the world by the name of Janaka, is well-versed in the Religion of Liberation.

12 He ordered me to come to him forthwith, if I had any doubts to be solved in the Religion of either Action or Renunciation. He gave me to understand that the king of Mithila would remove all my doubts

13 I have, therefore, come here at the command of my father, for the purpose of receiving instruction from you You should, O foremost of all righteous persons, instruct me!

14 What are the duties of a Brahmana, and what is the essence of those duties that have Liberation for their object. How, also, is Liberation to be acquired Is it to be acquired by the help of Knowledge or by that of Penances?

Janaka said :—

15 Hear what the Duties are of a Brahmana from the time of his birth. After his investiture O son, with the sacred thread he should give his attention to the study of the Vedas.

16 By practising penances and dutifully serving his preceptor, and observing the duties of Brahmacharyya, O powerful one, he should satisfy the debt he owes to the gods, and the Pitris, and renounce all malice.

17. Having read the Vedas with close attention, and controlled his senses, and having given his preceptor the tuition fee, he should, with the order of his preceptor, return home.

18 Coming back home, he should follow the domestic mode of life and marry a wife, confine himself to her, and live freeing himself from every sort of malice, and having established his domestic fire.

19 Living as a householder, he should procreate sons and grandsons After that, he should retire to the forest, and continue to adore the same fires and entertain guests with cordial hospitality

20. Living virtuously in the forest, he should, at last, establish his fire in his soul and freed from all pairs of opposites, and renouncing all attachments, he should pass his days in the anchorite-mode of life which is otherwise called the mode of Brahma.

Shuka said:—

21. If one acquires an understanding cleansed by study of the scriptures and true conceptions of all things, and if the heart succeeds in freeing itself permanently from the effects of all pairs of opposites is it still necessary for such a person to follow one after another, the three modes of life called Brahmacharyya, Garahastya, and Vanaprastha.

22. This is what I ask you You should tell me Indeed, O king, do tell me this according to the true meaning of the Vedas.

Janaka said —

23 It is impossible to acquire Liberation without the help of an understanding purified by the study of the scriptures and without that true conception of all things which is known by the name of Vijnana, again, without that cleansed understanding, one cannot get a Preceptor.

24. The Preceptor is the helmsman, and Knowledge is the Boat. After having got that Boat, one becomes successful Indeed, having crossed the Ocean, one may renounce both.

25. For preventing the destruction of all the worlds, and for preventing the destruction of deeds, the duties belonging to the four modes of life were practised by the wise of old

26 By renouncing acts, good and bad, according to this order of acts, one succeeds, in course of many births, in acquiring Liberation.

27 That man who, through penances, practised in many births, succeeds in acquiring purified mind and understanding, and soul, certainly becomes able to acquire Liberation in even the very first mode,

28 When, having acquired a cleansed understanding, Liberation becomes his, and on account thereof he becomes possessed of knowledge of all visible things, what desirable object is there to attain by following the three other modes of life?

29 One should always renounce faults produced by the qualities of Rajas and Tamas Following the path of Sattwa, one should see Self by Self

30 Seeing one's Self in all creatures and all creatures in one's Self, one should live like aquatic animals living in water without being drenched by it

31. He who succeeds in getting over all pairs of opposites and resisting their influence, succeeds in renouncing all attachments and acquires infinite happiness in the next world going there like a bird soaring into the sky from below.

32 Regarding it, there is a saying sung of old by king Yayati, and remembered, O sire, by all persons conversant with the Scriptures dealing with Liberation.

33 The effulgent ray exists in one's Soul and not anywhere else It exists equally in all creatures One can see it himself if his heart be given to Yoga.

34 When a person lives in such a way that another is not filled with fear on seeing him, and when a person is not himself filled with fear on seeing others, when a person ceases to cherish desire and malice, he is then said to attain to Brahma.

35 When a person ceases to cherish a sinful attitude towards all creatures in thought, word, and deed, he is then said to attain to Brahma.

36 By controlling the mind and the soul, by renouncing malice that stupefies the mind, and by throwing off desire and stupefaction, one is said to attain to Brahma

37 When a person assumes an equality of attitude about all objects of hearing and vision, as also about all living creatures, and gets over all pairs of opposites, he is then said to attain to Brahma.

38—39 When a person regards impartially praise and dispraise, gold and iron, happiness and misery, heat and cold, good and evil, the agreeable and the disagreeable, life and death, he is then said to attain to Brahma.

40. One following the duties of the mendicant order should restrain his senses and the mind like a tortoise withdrawing its outstretched limbs.

41. As a house covered with darkness, is capable of being seen with the help of a lighted lamp, similarly can the soul be seen with the help of the lamp of the understanding.

42. O foremost of intelligent persons, I see that all this knowledge that I am imparting to you, lives in you Whatever else should be known by one desirous of learning the Religion of Liberation, is already known to you

43 O regenerate Rishi, I am convinced that through the mercy of your preceptor and through the instructions you have received, you have already transcended all objects of the senses.

44. O great ascetic, through the grace of your father, I have acquired omniscience, and hence I have succeeded in knowing you.

45. Your knowledge is much greater than what you think it to be. Your perceptions, also that result from intuition, are much greater than what you think them to be. Your power also is much greater than you are conscious of.

46. Whether in consequence of your tender age, or of the doubts you have not been able to remove, or of the fear that is due to the unattainment of Liberation, you are not conscious of that Knowledge due to Intuition, although it has originated in your mind.

47. After one's doubts have been removed by persons like us, one succeeds in opening the knots of one's heart, and, then, by a righteous endeavour, one acquires, and becomes conscious of, that Knowledge.

48. As regards yourself, you are one that has already acquired knowledge. Your intelligence is steady and tranquil. You are free from covetousness. For all that, O Brahmana, one never succeeds, without endeavour in attaining to Brahma, which is the highest object of acquisition.

49 You see no difference between happiness and misery You are not covetous You have no desire for dancing and song. You have no attachments.

50 You have no attachment to friends. You have no fear in things which fill with fear. O blessed one, I see that you consider equally a lump of gold and a clod of Earth.

51 Myself and other persons endued with wisdom, see you established in the highest and indestructible path of peace.

52. O Brahmana, you discharge the duties of Brahmana and enjoy the fruit which should be his, and which is at one with the essence of the object represented by Liberation. What else have you to enquire of me?"

CHAPTER CCCXXVIII.

(MOKSHADHARMA PARVA).—Continued.

Bhishma said.—

1. "Having heard these words of king Janaka, Shuka of purified soul and settled conclusions began to stay in his Soul by his Soul, having of course seen Self by Self.

2 His object being fulfilled he became happy and tranquil, and without further questioning Janaka, he proceeded northwards to the mountains of Himavat with the speed of the wind and like the wind.

3—4 Those mountains were full of various clans of Apsaras and echoed with many soft sounds Filled with thousands of Kinnaras and Bhringarajas, it was adorned, besides, with many Madgus and Khanjaritas and many Jivajivakas of variegated color.

5 And there were many peacocks also of gorgeous hues, uttering their shrill but melodious cries.

6 Many bevies of swans also, and many flights of gladdened coils, too, adorned the place The king of birds, viz, Garuda, lived on that summit constantly.

7 The four Regents of the world, the gods, and various classes of Rishis, used always to come there from desire of doing good to the world.

8 It was there that the great Vishnu had practised the severest penances for the object of getting a son

9—11. It was there that the commander-in chief of the gods named Kumara, in his younger days, disregarding the three worlds with all the inhabitants, threw down his dart piercing the Earth therewith. Throwing down his dart, Skanda, addressing the universe, said,—If there be any person who is superior to me in might, or who holds Brahmanas to be dearer, or who can equal me in devotion to the Brahmanas and the Vedas, or who is endued with energy like me, let him draw up this dart or at least shake it!—Hearing this challenge, the three worlds became stricken with anxiety, and all creatures asked one another, saying,—who will raise this dart?

12. Vishnu saw all the gods and Asuras and Rakshasas to be greatly troubled in mind.

13 He thought of what should be done under the circumstances. Without being able to bear that challenge regarding the hurling of the dart, he directed his eyes towards Skanda, the son of the Fire-god.

14 The pure Vishnu caught hold of the burning dart with his left hand, and began to shake it.

15 When the dart was being thus shaken by the highly powerful Vishnu the whole Earth with her mountains, forests, and seas, shook with the dart.

16 Although Vishnu was fully capable to raise the dart, still he contented himself with only shaking it In this, the powerful lord only kept the honor of Skanda intact.

17 Having shaken it himself, the divine Vishnu, addressing Prahlada, said, —see the might of Kumara! None else in the universe can raise this dart.

18. Unable to bear this, Prahlada determined to raise the dart. He caught it, but was unable to shake it at all.

19. Uttering a loud cry, he dropped down on the hill-top in a swoon. Indeed, the son of Hiranyakashipu dropped down on the Earth.

20. Going towards the northern side of those grand mountains, Mahadeva, having the bull for his emblem, had practised the austerest penances.

21. The asylum where Mahadeva had practised those austerities is encompassed on all sides with a burning fire. Unapproachable by persons of impure souls, that mountain is known by the name of Aditya.

22. There is a fiery girdle all around it, for ten Yojanas in width and it is incapable of being approached by Yakshas and Rakshasas and Danavas.

23 The illustrious God of Fire, endued with mighty energy, lives there in embodied form, engaged in removing all obstacles from the side of Mahadeva of great wisdom who remained there for a thousand celestial years, standing on one foot.

24. Living on the side of that foremost of mountains, Mahadeva of great vows scorched the gods greatly.

25 At the foot of those mountains, in a retired spot, Parashara's son of great ascetic merit, viz, Vyasa, taught the Vedas to his disciples.

26 Those disciples were the highly blessed Sumanta, Vaishampayana, Jaimini of great wisdom, and Paila of great ascetic merit.

27. Shuka went to that charming asylum where his father, the great ascetic Vyasa, was living surrounded by his disciples.

28 Seated in his asylum, Vyasa saw his son approach like a burning fire of scattered flames, or resembling the Sun himself in effulgence.

29 As Shuka approached, he did not seem to touch the trees or the rocks of the mountain. Perfectly dissociated from all objects of the senses, and engaged in Yoga, the great ascetic came, resembling in speed an arrow shot off a bow.

30 Born on the fire sticks, Shuka approaching his father, touched his feet. With due formalities he then accosted the disciples of his father.

31. With great cheerfulness he then described in full to his father all the particulars of his conversation with king Janaka.

32 After the arrival of his powerful son, Vyasa, the son of Parashara, continued to live there on the Himavat engaged in teaching his disciples, and his son.

33 One day as he was seated, his disciples, all well-read in the Vedas, having their senses under control, and gifted with tranquil souls, sat themselves around him.

34 All of them had perfectly mastered the Vedas with their branches. All of them were observant of penances. With joined hands they addressed their preceptor in the following words.

The disciples said.—

35. We have, through your favour, been endued with great energy. Our fame, also, has spread There is one favour that we pray you to grant us.

36 Hearing these words of theirs, the twice-born Rishi answered them, saying — Ye sons, tell me what that boon is which you want me grant you.

37—38. Hearing this answer of their preceptor, the disciples became filled with joy. Bending their heads once more low to their preceptor, and joining their hands, all of them simultaneously, said, O king, these excellent words —If our preceptor has been gratified with us, then, O best of sages, we are sure to be successful.

39 We all solicit you, O great Rishi, to grant us a boon. Do you show us favour. Let no sixth disciple succeed in acquiring fame.

40. We are four. Our preceptor's son forms the fifth Let the Vedas shine in only its five! This is the boon that we pray for.

41—42. Hearing these words of his disciples, Vyasa, the son of Parashara, endued with great intelligence, well conversant with the meanings of the Vedas, endued with a pious soul, and always engaged in thinking of objects that grant benefits on a person in the next world, said to his disciples these righteous words, fraught with great benefit —The Vedas should always be given to him, who is a Brahmana, or to him who is desirous of listening to Vedic instructions, by him who eagerly wishes to acquire a residence in the region of Brahman.

43. Do ye multiply. Let the Vedas spread. The Vedas should never be given to one who has not formally become a disciple. Nor should they be given to one who does not observe good vows Nor should they be given for living in one who is of one impure soul.

44 These should be known as the proper accomplishments of persons who can be accepted as disciples No science should be given to one without a proper examination of one's character.

45. As pure gold is tested by heat, cutting, and rubbing, similarly disciples should be tested by their birth and accomplishments.

46 Ye should never give disciples tasks to which they should not be set, or tasks which are full of dangers One's knowledge is always proportionate to his understanding and diligence in study.

47. Let all disciples master all difficulties, and let all of them be crowned with success Ye are competent to expound the scriptures to persons of all the castes. Only ye should, while delivering instructions address a Brahmana, first of all.

48. These are the rules about the study of the Vedas. This again is considered as a high task The Vedas were created by the Self create for the purpose of pleasing the gods therewith.

49 That man who, through stupefaction of intellect, speaks ill of a Brahmana well-read in the Vedas, is certain to meet with humiliation on account of such evil-speaking.

50. He who, disregarding all rules of virtue, seeks knowledge, and he who, disregarding the rules of virtue, communicates knowledge, both of them fall off and instead of that love which should exist between preceptor and disciple, such questioning and such communication are sure to create distrust and suspicion.

51. I have now told you everything about the way in which the Vedas should be studied and taught. Ye should treat your disciples thus, remembering these instructions."

CHAPTER CCCXXIX.

(MOKSHADHARMA PARVA).—Continued.

Bhishma said:—

1. "Hearing these words of their preceptor, Vyasa's disciples filled with great energy, became filled with joy and embraced one another.

2 Addressing one another, they said,—We will remember and act according to what has been said by our illustrious preceptor in view of our future well-being.

3—4 Having said this to one another with gladdened hearts, the disciples of Vyasa, who were consummate masters of words, once more addressed their preceptor and said,—If it pleases you, O powerful one, we wish to get down from this mountain to the Earth, O great ascetic, for the object of sub-dividing the Vedas.

5—6 Hearing these words of his disciples, the powerful son of Parashara replied them in these wholesome words which were fraught, besides, with virtue and profit,—You may go to the Earth or to the regions of the gods as ye like. You should always be careful, for the Vedas are such that they are always liable to be misunderstood.

7. Permitted by their preceptor of truthful speech, the disciples left him after going round him and bowing their heads to him

8 Descending upon the Earth they celebrated the Agnishtoma and other sacrifices, and they began to officiate at the sacrifices of Brahmanas and Kshatriyas and Vaishyas.

9 Happily spending their days in the domestic mode of life, they were treated by the Brahmanas with great reverence.

Possessed of great fame and prosperity, they were engaged in teaching and officiating in sacrifices.

10. After his disciples had departed, Vyasa remained in his hermitage, with only his son in his company. Passing his days in anxious thoughtfulness, the great Rishi, endued with wisdom, kept silent, sitting in a retired corner of the asylum.

11. At that time Narada of great ascetic merit came there for seeing Vyasa, and addressing him, said these words of sweet sound

Narada said:—

12. O twice-born Rishi of Vashistha's family, why are Vedic sounds silent now? Why are you sitting silent and alone, engaged in meditation like one engrossed in thought?

13 Alas, destitute of Vedic sound, this mountain has lost its beauty, as the Moon shorn of splendour when possessed by Rahu or covered with dust.

Vyasa, the best of all persons knowing duties and firmly devoted to Vedic recitation, became filled with joy and answered Narada, saying,—So be it.

23. With his son Shuka, he began to recite the Vedas in a loud sweet voice, observing all the rules of orthoepy and, as it were, filling the three worlds with that sound.

24. One day as father and son, who knew well the ordinances of duties, were engaged in reciting the Vedas, a violent wind arose as if moved by the gales that blow on the bosom of the ocean.

25. Understanding from this incident that the hour was not suited to sacred recitation, Vyasa immediately ordered his son to stop the recitation. Shuka, thus forbidden by his father, became filled with curiosity.

26 He asked his father saying,—O twice-born one, whence is this Wind? You should tell me everything about the conduct of the Wind.

2. Seeing the celestial Rishi Narada arrived at his asylum, Shuka adored him by offering him the Arghya according to the rites laid down in the Vedas.

3 Pleased with the honors conferred upon him, Narada addressed Shuka, saying.—Tell me, O foremost of pious men, how, O dear child, may I accomplished what is for your highest good

4. Hearing these words of Narada, Shuka said to him, O Bharata, these words —You should instruct me about what may be beneficial to me!

Narada said :—

5. In days of yore the illustrious Sanatkumara had said these words to certain Rishis of purified souls who had gone to him for enquiring after the truth

6 There is no eye like that of knowledge There is no penance like the practice of truth. There is no sorrow like attachment There is no happiness like renunciation.

7 Abstention from sinful deeds, steady practice of virtue, good conduct, the due observance of all religious duties,—these form the highest good

8 Having acquired the status of humanity which is mixed with sorrow, he who becomes attached to it, becomes stupefied such a man never succeeds in freeing himself from sorrow Attachment is a mark of sorrow.

9 The understanding of a person who is attached to earthly object becomes more and more entangled in the net of stupefaction The man who becomes entangled in the net of stupefaction comes by sorrow both in this world and in the next

10 One should, by every means in his power control both desire and anger if one tries to acquire what is for his good Those two originate for only destroying his good

11 One should always protect his penances from anger and his prosperity from pride. One should always protect his knowledge from honor and dishonor, and his soul from error.

12 Mercy is the highest virtue Forgiveness is the highest power The knowledge of self is the highest knowledge. There is nothing higher than truth.

13 It is always meet to speak the truth. It is better again to speak what is wholesome than to speak what is true I hold that that is truth which is filled with the greatest benefit to all creatures

14. That man is said to be truly learned and truly endued with wisdom who renounces every act, who never indulges in hope, who is perfectly dissociated from all worldly surroundings, and who has renounced everything that belongs to the world.

15—16 That person who, without being attached thereto, enjoys all objects of sense with the help of senses which are completely under his control, who is endued with a tranquil soul, who is never moved by joy or sorrow, who is engaged in Yoga-meditation, who lives with the gods presiding over his senses and dissociated also from them, and who, though gifted with a body, never considers himself as identifiable with it, becomes liberated and very soon acquires what is his highest good.

17 One who never sees others, never touches others, never talks with others, soon, O ascetic, acquires what is for his highest good.

18 One should not injure any creature. On the other hand, one should treat with friendliness to all Having acquired the status of humanity, one should never treat inimically to any one.

19 A perfect disregard for all (worldly) things, perfect contentment, abandonment of hope of every sort, and patience,—these form the highest good of one who has governed his senses and acquired a knowledge of self.

20. Renouncing all attachments O child, do you master all your senses and thereby acquire happiness both in this world and in the next.

21. They who are free from cupidity have never to suffer any sorrow One should, therefore, renounce all cupidity from one's soul By renouncing cupidity, O amiable and blessed one, you will be able to liberate yourself from sorrow and pain.

22 One who wishes to conquer that which is unconquerable should live giving himself up to penances, to self-control, to taciturnity, to a subjugation of the soul Such a person should live in the midst of attachments without being attached thereto.

23 That Brahmana who lives in the midst of attachments without being attached to them and who always lives in seclusion, very soon acquired the highest happiness.

24 That man who lives alone in happiness in the midst of creatures who are seen to find pleasure in leading lives of sexual union, should be known to be a person whose thirst has been satisfied by knowledge. It is well known that that man whose thirst has been satisfied by knowledge has never to grieve.

25 One acquires the status of the god by means of good deeds, the status of humanity by means of acts which are good and bad, while by acts which are purely wicked, one helplessly falls down among the lower animals.

26 Always attacked by sorrow and decrepitude and death, a living creature is being cooked in this world Do you not know it?

27 You generally consider that to be beneficial which is really injurious, that to be certain which is really uncertain, and that to be desirable and good which is undesirable and not good Alas, why do you not form a correct apprehension of these?

28 Like a silkworm that covers itself in its own cocoon you are continually covering yourself in a cocoon made of your own numberless deeds born of stupefaction and mistake Alas, why do you not form a correct apprehension of your situation?

29 No need of attaching yourself to earthly objects Attachment to earthly objects produces evil The silk-worm that forms a cocoon round itself is at last destroyed by its own deed

30. Those persons who become attached to sons and wives and relatives meet with destruction in the end, as wild elephants sunk in the mire of a lake are by and by weakened till overtaken by Death

31. See, all creatures that allow themselves to be dragged by the net of affection become subject to great grief as fishes on land, dragged thereto by means of large nets

32 Relatives, sons wives the body itself, and all properties amassed with care, are unsubstantial and of no use in the next world. Only acts, good and bad, that one does, follow him to the other world.

33 When it is certain that you shall have to go helplessly to the other world leaving behind all these things alas, why do you then allow yourself to be attached to such worthless unsubstantial things, without attending to what forms your real and durable wealth?

34. The path which you shall have to pass through is without resting places of any sort. There is no support along that way which one may catch for maintaining oneself The country through which it passes is unknown and undiscovered It is, again, covered with thick darkness Alas, how will you go along that way without being supplied with the necessary expenses?

35 When you shall go along that road, nobody will follow you Only your deeds, good and bad, will follow you when you shall leave this world for the next.

36 One seeks the real object by means of learning, acts, purity and great knowledge When that foremost of objects is acquired, one becomes liberated.

37. The desire that one feels for living in the midst of human dwellings is like a binding fetter They that are of good deeds succeed in snapping that fetter and freeing themselves Only men of wicked deeds do not succeed in breaking them.

38—39 The river of life is dreadful. Personal beauty or form forms its banks. The mind is the speed of its current. Touch forms its island. Taste forms its current Scent is its mire. Sound is its waters That particular part of it which leads towards heaven is beset with great difficulties Body is the boat by which one must cross that river. Forgiveness is the oar by which it is to be moved. Truth is the ballast that keeps that boat steady. The practice of virtue is the rope that is to be put to the mast for dragging that boat along difficult waters Charity or gift forms the wind that moves the sails of that boat. Gifted with swift speed, it is with that boat that one must cross the river of life.

40 Renounce both virtue and vice, and truth and falsehood Having renounced truth and falsehood do you cast off that by which these are to be shaken off.

41. By casting off all purpose, do you renounce virtue, do you cast off sin also by renouncing all desire With the help of the understanding, do you renounce truth and falsehood, and, at last, do you renounce the understanding itself by knowledge of the highest subject.

42—43 Do you renounce this body having bones for its pillars, sinews for its binding strings and cords, flesh and blood for its outer plaster, the skin for its outer case, full of urine and fæces and, therefore, sending forth a bad smell, exposed to the attacks of decrepitude and sorrow; forming the seat of disease and weakened by pain; predominated by the quality of Darkness, not permanent or durable, and which serves as the habitation of the indwelling creature.

44 This entire universe of matter, and that which is called Mahat or Buddhi, are formed of great elements. That which is called Mahat is due to the action of the Supreme.

45. The five senses, the three qualities of Tamas, Sattwa, and Rajas,—these make up seventeen.

46 These seventeen, which are known by the name of the Unmanifest, with all those that are called Manifest, viz, the five objects of the five senses, with Consciousness and the Understanding, constitute the well-known twenty-four.

47. When endued with those twenty-four possessions, one comes to be called by the name of Jiva or Individual Soul.

48 He who knows the three fold objects as also happiness and sorrow and life and death, truly and in all their details, is said to know growth and decay. All objects of knowledge, should be known by and by.

49 All objects that are perceived by the senses are called Manifest. Whatever objects are above the senses and are apprehended by means only of their marks are said to be Unmanifest.

50. By controlling the senses, one acquires great gratification, like a thirsty and parched traveller at a sweet shower of rain. Having restrained the senses one sees one's soul spread out for embracing all objects, and all objects in one's soul

51. Having its roots in knowledge, the power is never lost of the man who (thus) sees the Supreme in his soul,—of the man, who always sees all creatures in all conditions.

52. He who, by the help of knowledge, gets over all sorts of pain begotten of mistake stupefaction, never catches any evil by coming into contact with all creatures.

53—55. Such a man his understanding being fully shown, never finds fault with the course of conduct that prevails in the world. One conversant with Liberation says that the Supreme Soul is without beginning and without end, that it takes birth as all creatures, that it resides in the Individual Soul; that it is inactive, and without form Only that man who meets with grief on account of his own misdeeds, kills numerous creatures for the purpose of preventing that grief. On account of such sacrifices, the performers have to go through re-births and have necessarily to perform numberless deeds on all side.

56. Such a man, blinded by mistake, and considering that to be happiness which is really a source of grief, is continually rendered unhappy like a sick person who eats bad food

57. Such a man is pressed and grinded by his deeds like any substance that is churned. Fettered by his deeds he obtains re-birth, the order of his life being determined by the character of his deeds

58. Suffering many kinds of torture, he passes through a repeated round of re-births like a wheel that turns ceaselessly. You have, however, snapped asunder all your fetters. You abstain from all deeds.

59 Possessed of omniscience and the master of all things, may you be successful, and do you become freed from all existent objects Through subjugation of their senses and the power of their penances, many persons, having destroyed the fetters of action, acquired great success and uninterrupted happiness.

CHAPTER CCCXXXI.

Narada said:—

1 By listening to such sacred scriptures, as bring about tranquility, as remove grief, and as yield happiness, one acquires (a pure) understanding, and, having acquired it, obtains to great happiness.

2 A thousand causes of sorrow, a hundred causes of fear, from day to day, attack one who is shorn of understanding but not one who is endued with wisdom and learning.

3 Do you, therefore, listen to some old narratives as I recount them to you, for the object of removing your sorrow If one can subjugate his understanding, he is sure to acquire happiness

4 By accession of what is undesirable and dissociation from what is agreeable, only men of little intelligence yield to mental sorrow.

5 When things are passed, one should not grieve, thinking of their merits He who thinks of such past things with affection can never liberate himself.

6. One should always try to find out the faults of those things to which one becomes attached. One should always consider such things to be fraught with much evil. By doing so, one should soon free him therefrom.

7. The man who grieves for what is past, cannot acquire either riches or religious merit or fame What exists no longer cannot be acquired. When such things go away, they do not return

8 Creatures sometimes acquire and sometimes lose earthly objects. No man in this world can be grieved by all the events that befall him.

9 Dead or lost, he who grieves for what is gone only gets sorrow for sorrow. Instead of one sorrow, he gets two.

10 Those men who, seeing the course of life and death in the world with the help of their intelligence, do not shed tears, are said to see properly. Such persons have never to shed tears.

11. When any such calamity comes, which creates either their physical or mental grief, as is incapable of being prevented by even his best endeavours, one should cease to think on it with sorrow.

12 Not to think of it is the penacea for sorrow. By thinking of it, one can never remove it, on the other hand, by thinking upon sorrow, one only increases it

13 Mental sorrow should be destroyed by wisdom, while physical sorrow should be removed by medicines This is the power of knowledge. One should not, in such matters, act like men of little understandings.

14 Youth, beauty, life, hoarded riches, health, association with those that are loved, these all are fickle. One endued with wisdom should never covet them.

15 One should not lament individually for a sorrowful incident that concerns an entire community. Instead of indulgence in grief when it comes, one should try to avert it and apply a remedy as soon as he finds the opportunity for doing it.

16 There is no doubt that in this life misery is much greater than that of happiness. There is no doubt in this that all men show attachment for objects of the senses and that death is considered as disaggreeable.

17. That man who renounces both joy and sorrow, is said to attain to Brahma. When such a man dies, men of wisdom never indulge in any grief for him.

18 There is pain in spending wealth there is pain in protecting it There is pain in acquiring it. Hence, when one's wealth is lost, he should not grieve for it

19 Men of little understandings, in their efforts to acquire different grades of wealth, lose their contentment and at last die broken-hearted Wise men, however, are always contented

20 All combinations are sure to end in dissolution All things that are high are destined to fall down and become low. Union is sure to end in disunion, and life is certain to end in death.

21. Thirst can never be satiated. Contentment is the greatest happiness Hence, wise men regard contentment as the most valuable wealth.

22. One's lease of life is running continually. It stops not in its course for even a single moment. When one's body itself is not durable what other thing is there which one should consider as durable?

23 Those persons who, meditating on the nature of all creatures and, concluding that it is beyond the grasp of the mind, direct their attention to the highest path, and, starting, acquire a fair progress in it, have not to indulge in sorrow.

24. Like a tiger seizing and running away with its prey, Death seizes and runs away with the man, who is engaged in such occupation and which is still not satiated with objects of desire and enjoyment

25 One should always try to liberate himself from sorrow. One should try to remove sorrow by beginning his work with cheerfulness, that is without indulging in sorrow, having freed himself from a particular sorrow, one should act in such a way as to keep sorrow at a distance by abstaining from all shortcomings of conduct.

26 The rich and the poor alike find nothing in sound and touch and form and scent and taste, after the immediate enjoyment thereof.

27 Before union, creatures never suffer sorrow Hence, one who has not deviated from his original nature, never grieves when that union comes to an end.

28 One should control his sexual appetite and the stomach with the help of patience One should protect his hands and feet with the help of the eye. One's eyes and ears and the other senses should be protected by the mind One's mind and speech should be governed with the help of wisdom

29 Renouncing love and affection for persons that are known as well as for those that are unknown, one should act with humility Such a person is said to be endued with wisdom, and such a one surely finds happiness.

30. That man who is pleased with his own Soul, who is given to Yoga, who depends upon nothing out of self, who is without cupidity, and who acts without the help of anything but his self, succeeds in acquiring happiness.

CHAPTER CCCXXXII.

Narada said.—

1. When the changes of happiness and sorrow appear or disappear, they cannot be prevented by either wisdom or policy or exertion.

2 Without suffering himself to deviate from his true nature, one should try his best for protecting his own Self He who makes such care and exertion, has never to perish. Considering Self as something dear, one should always try to rescue himself from decrepitude death, and disease

3 Mental and physical ailments afflict the body, like keen-pointed arrows discharged from the bow by a strong bowman.

4. The body of a person who is tortured by thirst, who is moved by agony, who is perfectly helpless, and that is desirous of prolonging his life, is dragged towards destruction.

5 Days and nights are continually running, carrying away in their current the periods of life of all human beings Like currents of rivers, these flow ceaselessly without ever returning.

6 The continued succession of the lighted and the dark fortnights is destroyed all mortal creatures without stopping for even a moment in this work.

7 Rising and setting day after day, the Sun, who is himself undecaying is perpetually cooking the joys and sorrows of all men.

8. The nights are continually going away, taking with them the good and bad incidents that befall man, that depend on destiny, and that are unexpected by him.

9. If the fruits of man's deeds were not dependent on other circumstances, then one would acquire whatever object he would long for 10 Even men of controlled senses, of cleverness, and of intelligence if destitute of acts, never succeed in acquiring any fruits.

11. Others, though shorn of intelligence and accomplishments of any sort, and who are really the lowest of men are seen, even when they do not wish for success, to be crowned with the fruition of all their desires.

12 Some one else, who is always ready to injure all creatures, and who is engaged in imposing on all the world, is seen to languish in happiness.

13. Some one who sits idly, acquires great prosperity, while another, by working earnestly, is seen to miss desirable fruits almost within his reach.

14 Do you ascribe it as one of the faults of man? The seminal fluid, originating in one's nature from sight of one person, goes to another person.

15 When given to the womb, it sometimes produces an embryo and sometimes fails When sexual intercourse fails, it resembles a mango tree that puts forth a great many flowers without, however, producing a single fruit.

16 As regards some men who are desirous of having offspring and who, for the fruition of their object, work earnestly, they fail to procreate an embryo in the womb.

17. Some person, again, who fears the birth of an embryo as one fears a snake of deadly poison, finds, a long lived son born to him and who seems to be his own self return to the stages through which he has passed

18 Many persons with strong desire for children and cheerless on that account, after sacrificing to many gods and practising severe austerities, at last beget children, duly borne for ten long months, that prove to be veritable wretches of their race.

19 Others, who have been obtained by virtue of such blessed rites and observances, at once acquires riches and grain and various other sources of enjoyment acquired and accumulated by their forefathers.

20 In an act of sexual intercourse, when two persons of opposite sexes come into contact with one another, the embryo takes birth in the womb, like a calamity attacking the mother.

21 Very soon after the suspension of the vital airs, other physical forms possess that embodied creature whose gross body has been destroyed but whose deeds have all been performed with that gross body, made of flesh and phlegm.

22 Upon the destruction of the body, another body which is as much destructible as the one which is destroyed, is kept ready for the burnt and destroyed creature even as one boat goes to another for transferring to itself the passengers of the other.

23 By sexual intercourse, a drop of the seminal fluid that is inanimate, is cast into the womb I ask you through whose or what care is the embryo kept alive?

24. That part of the body into which the food that is eaten goes and where it is digested, is the place where the embryo lives, but it is not digested there.

25. In the womb, amid urine and fæces, one's sojourn is governed by Nature The born creature is not free in the matter of residence therein or escape therefrom. In fact, in these respects, he is perfectly helpless.

26 Some embryos fall from the womb Some come out alive While as regards some they are destroyed in the womb, after being quickened with life, on account of some other bodies being ready for them.

27. That man who, in an act of sexual intercourse, injects the seminal fluid, obtains from it a son or daughter. The offspring thus obtained, when the time comes, takes part in a similar act of sexual intercourse.

28. When the lease of a person's life ends, the five primal elements of his body attain to the seventh and the ninth stages and they cease to be. The person, however, suffers no change.

29 Forsooth, when persons are attacked by diseases as little animals assailed by hunters, they then lose the power of rising up and moving about.

30. If when men are attacked by diseases, they wish to spend even immense riches, physicians with their best efforts fail to lessen their sufferings

31. Even physicians, who are well-skilled and expert in their science and well-equipt with excellent medicines, are themselves attacked by disease like animals assailed by hunters

32 Even if men drink many astringents and various sorts of medicated ghee, they are seen to be broken by decrepitude like trees by stong elephants.

33 When animals and birds and beasts of prey and poor men are attacked by diseases, who treats them with medicines? Indeed, these are not seen to be ill.

34. Like larger animals attacking smaller ones, diseases are seen to attack even dreadful kings of fierce energy and invincible prowess.

35 All men, deprived of the power of even uttering cries of pain, and overwhelmed by error and grief, are seen to be carried away along the dreadful current into which they have been thrown.

36. Embodied creatures, even when trying to conquer nature, are unable to conquer it with the help of wealth, of sovereign power, or of the austerest penances.

37 If all attempts men make were successful then men would never die, would never be subject to decrepitude, would never meet with any disagreeable thing, and lastly would have all their wishes fructified.

38. All men desire to acquire gradual superiority of position. To satisfy this wish they try their very best. The result, however, does not agree with their wish.

39 Even men who are perfectly careful, who are honest, and brave and endued with prowess, are seen to worship men intoxicated with the pride of wealth and with even alcoholic stimulants.

40. Some men are seen whose calamities vanish before even these are seen by them. Others there are who are seen to possess no riches but who are free from misery of every sort.

41. A great disparity is seen about the fruits that wait upon conjunctions of acts. Some are seen to carry vehicles on their shoulders, while some are seen to ride on them.

42. All men are desirous of riches and prosperity. A few only have cars dragged in their processions Some there are who cannot get a single wife when their first married ones are dead, while others have hundreds of wives

43 Misery and happiness are the two things which exist side by side. Men have either misery or happiness. See this is a subject of wonder! Do not, however, allow yourself to be stupefied by error at such a sight.

44 Renounce both virtue and sin! Renounce also truth and falsehood! Having renounced both truth and falsehood, do you then cast off that with whose help you shall cast off the former.

45 O best of Rishis, I have now told you what is a great mystery! With the help of such instructions, the gods succeeded in leaving the Earth for becoming the dwellers of heaven.

46 Hearing these words of Narada, Shuka, gifted with great intelligence and possessed of tranquillity of mind, reflected upon the drift of the instructions he received, but could not determine any thing.

47. He understood that one suffers great misery on account of children and wives; that one has to work hard for the acquisition of science and Vedic lore. He, therefore, asked himself, saying,—What is that situation which is eternal and which is free from all sorts of misery but in which there is great prosperity?

48 Thinking for a moment upon the course ordained for him, Shuka, who was well acquainted with the beginning and the end of all duties, determined to attain to the highest end which is full of happiness.

49 He questioned himself, saying,—How shall I, cutting off all attachments and becoming perfectly free, acquire that excellent end? How, indeed, shall I acquire that excellent situation whence there is no return into the ocean of various sorts of birth.

50 I wish to come by that condition of existence whence there is no return! Renouncing all kinds of attachments, arrived at certainty by mental retrospection, I shall acquire that end

51. I shall acquire that situation in which your Soul will have tranquillity, and when I shall be able to live for good without being subject to decrepitude or change.

52. It is, however, certain that that high end cannot be acquired without the help of Yoga. One who has acquired the state of perfect knowledge and enlightenment never comes by low attachments through deeds.

53 I shall, therefore, have recourse to Yoga, and renouncing this body which is my present residence, I shall change myself into a wind and enter that mass of effulgence which is represented by the sun.

54. When Individual Soul enters that mass of effulgence, he no longer suffers like Shoma who, with the gods upon the exhaustion of merit, drops down on the Earth and having once more acquired sufficient merit returns to heaven

55. The Moon is always seen to decrease and once more increase. Seeing this decrease and increase that go on repeatedly, I do not wish to have a form of existence in which there are such changes.

56 The Sun warms all the worlds by means of his rays. His disc never suffers any diminution Remaining unchanged, he drinks energy from all things. Hence, I wish to go into the Sun of blazing effulgence.

57 There I shall live, invincible by all, and in my inner soul freed from all fear, having renounced this body of mine in the solar region

58—59 I shall enter with the great [illegible] is the unbearable energy of the Sun. I declare [to all creatures], these trees, these elephants, these mountains, the Earth herself, the several cardinal points, the sky, the gods, the Danavas, the Gandharvas, the Pishachas, Uragas, and the Rakshasas, that I shall enter all creatures in the world.

60. Let all the gods with the Rishis, witness my Yoga power to-day.—Having said these words, Shuka, informed the illustrious Narada of his intention.

61 Obtaining Narada's permission, Shuka then went to where his father was. Arrived before him, the great Muni, viz., the great and Island-born Krishna, Shuka circumambulated him, and addressed him the usual enquiries.

62 Hearing of Shuka's intention, the great Rishi became highly pleased Addressing him the great Rishi said,—O son, O dear son, do you stay here to day so that I may see you for some time for gratifying my eyes.

63 Suka, however, paid no heed to that request Freed from affection and all doubt, he began to think only of Liberation, and set his heart on the journey.

64 "Leaving his father, that foremost of Rishis then went to the spacious breast, of Kailasa which was inhabited by numbers of ascetics crowned with success."

CHAPTER CCCXXXIII.

(MOKSHADHARMA PARVA)—Continued.

Bhishma said:—

1 "Having got upon the summit of the mountain, O Bharata, the son of Vyasa sat down upon a level place free from blades of grass and secluded

2 According to the direction of the scriptures and to the ordinances laid down, that ascetic, who knew the successive processes of Yoga, held his soul first in one place and then in another, beginning from his feet and proceeding through all the limbs.

3. Then when the Sun, had not risen long, Shuka sat, with his face turned towards the East, and hands and feet drawn in an humble posture.

4. In that spot where the intelligent son of Vyasa sat prepared to practise Yoga, there were no flocks of birds, no sound, and no sight that was repulsive or fearful.

5 He then saw his own Soul freed from all attachments. Seeing that highest of all things, he laughed in joy.

6 He once more set himself to Yoga for acquiring the path of Liberation. Becoming the great master of Yoga he got over the element of ether.

7 He then went round the celestial Rishi Narada, and informed him of the fact of his having begun to practise the highest Yoga.

Shuka said:—

8. I have succeeded in seeing the path (of Emancipation). I have addressed myself to it Blessed be you, O you having penances for your wealth I shall through your favour, O you of great splendour, acquire an end that is highly desirable.

Bhishma said,—

9 Having received the order of Narada, Shuka the son of the Island born Vyasa saluted the celestial Rishi and once more set himself to Yoga and entered the element of ether.

10. Ascending then from the breast of the Kailasa mountain, he soared into the sky. Capable of passing through the sky, the blessed Shuka of fixed conclusion, then made himself at one with the element of Wind.

11. As that foremost of twice-born ones, effulgent like Garuda, was passing through the skies with the speed of the wind or thought, all creatures directed their eyes towards him.

12. Gifted with the splendour of fire or the Sun, Shuka then considered the three worlds as one Brahma, and went along that lengthy path.

13 Indeed, all creatures, mobile and immobile, cast their eyes upon him as he went with rapt attention, and a tranquil and fearless soul.

14. All creatures, according to the ordinance and according to their power, adored him with respect. The celestials poured showers of celestial flowers upon him.

15. Seeing him, all the tribes of Apsaras and Gandharvas became filled with wonder. The Rishis also, that were crowned with success, became equally surprised.

16. And they asked themselves,—Who is this one who has acquired success by his penances? With looks withdrawn from his own body but turned upwards, he is delighting us all with his glances.

17. Of highly righteous soul and celebrated throughout the three worlds, Shuka went silently, his face turned towards the East and look directed towards the Sun. As he went, along he seemed to fill the entire sky with an all-pervading noise.

18. Seeing him coming in that way, all the tribes of the Apsaras, struck with fear O king, became filled with surprise.

19 Headed by Panchachuda and others, they looked at Shuka with eyes expanded by surprize And they asked one another, saying,—What god is this one who has acquired such a high end? Forsooth, he comes here, freed from all attachments and desire.

20 Shuka then went to the Malaya mountains where Urvashi and Purvachitti used to always live.

21—22 Both of them, seeing the energy of the son of the great twice born Rishi, became filled with wonder And they said, —Wonderful is this concentration of attention of a twice born youth who was accustomed to the recitation and study of the Vedas! Soon will he pass through the entire sky like the Moon It was by dutiful service and humble ministrations towards his father that he gained this excellent understanding.

23 He is firmly devoted his father, endued with austere penances, and is very much loved by his father. Alas, why has he been dismissed by his inattentive father to go along a way whence no one returns

24—25. Hearing these words of Urvashi, and attending to their meaning, Shuka, that foremost of all persons conversant with duties, looked on all sides, and once more saw the entire sky, the whole Earth with her mountains and waters and forests, and also all the lakes and rivers.

26 All the gods also, of both sexes, joining their hands, paid respect to the son of the Island born Rishi and looked at him with wonder and reverence.

27—28. Shuka, addressing all of them, that foremost of all pious men, said these words,—If my father follow me and repeatedly call after me by my name, do all of you in a body return him an answer for me Moved by the affection all of you have for me, do you satisfy this request of mine!

29—30 Hearing these words of Shuka, all the points of the horizon, all the forests, all the seas, all the rivers, and all the mountains answered him from all sides, saying,—We accept your command, O twice-born one! It shall be as you say! It is thus that we answer the words spoken by the Rishi."

CHAPTER CCCXXXIV.

(MOKSHADHARMA PARVA)—Continued.

Bhishma said:—

1. 'Having spoken in this way, the twice born Rishi of austere penances, viz, Shuka, lived on his success, renouncing the four sorts of faults.

2 Renouncing also the eight kinds of Tamas, he dismissed the five kinds of Rajas Gifted with great intelligence, he then renounced the attribute of Sattwa All this seemed extremely wonderful

3. He then lived in that eternal station which is shorn of attributes freed from every indication, that is, in Brahma, shunning like a smokeless fire.

4. Meteors began to shoot The points of the horizon seemed to be ablaze The Earth trembled All these phenomena seemed extremely wonderful

5 The trees began to throw off their branches and the mountains their summits Loud peals were heard that seemed to rive the Himavat mountains.

6 The Sun seemed at that moment to be shorn of effulgence Fire refused to burn forth The lakes and rivers and seas were all moved

7. Vasava poured showers of rain of excellent taste and smell. A pure breeze began to blow, carrying excellent perfumes

8 Shuka, as he went through the sky, saw two beautiful summits one belonging to Himavat and another to Meru There were side by side with each other One of them was made of gold and was, therefore yellow, the other was white, being made of silver.

9 Each of them, O Bharata was a hundred Yojanas in height and of the same breadth. Indeed as Shuka went towards the north, he beheld those two beautiful summits

10 With a fearless heart he dashed against those two summits that were close to each other. Unable to bear the force, the summits were suddenly rent in two parts.

11—12. The spectacle, O monarch, was extremely wonderful to look at. Shuka pierced through those summits, for they were unable to stop his onward course. At this a loud noise was made in heaven by the dwellers thereof.

13 The Gandharvas and the Rishis also and others who lived in that mountain sent up loud cheers at the sight of the mountain being rent in two and Shuka passing through it. Indeed, O Bharata, a loud noise was heard everywhere at that moment, saying,—Excellent, Excellent.

14. He was worshipped by the Gandharvas and the Rishis, by Yakhas and Rakshasas, and by all tribes of the Vidyadharas

15 The entire sky became covered with celestial flowers showered from heaven at that moment when Shuka thus cut through that impenetrable barrier, O king.

16 The pious Shuka then saw from a high region the extremely beautiful celestial river Mandakini, running below through a region adorned by many flowering groves and forests

17 In these waters many beautiful Apsaras were playing Seeing Shuka who was bodiless, those naked aerial beings felt no shame.

18 Learning that Shuka had undertaken his great journey, his father Vyasa, filled with affection, followed him behind along the same aerial path

19 Meanwhile Shuka, passing through that region of the sky which is above the region of the wind, showed his Yoga-power and identified himself with Brahma.

20 Following the subtile path of high Yoga, Vyasa of austere penances reached within the twinkling of the eye that place whence Shuka first started.

21 Proceeding along the same way, Vyasa saw the mountain summit rent in two parts and through which Shuka has passed Meeting the Island born ascetic, the Rishis began to describe to him the achievements of his son

22 Vyasa however, began to lament, loudly naming his son and causing the three worlds to resound with the noise he made.

23 Meanwhile, the pious Shuka, who had entered all things, had become the soul of all things, and had acquired omnipresence, answered his fathers by uttering the monosyllable Bho in the form of an echo.

24 Thereat, the entire universe of mobile and immobile creatures, uttering the monosyllable Bho, echoed the answer of Shuka.

25 Thereforward, when sounds are made in mountain caves or on mountain-breasts, the latter, as if in answer to Shuka, still echo them

26 Having renounced all the attributes of sound, etc, and showing his Yoga-power in the manner of his disappearance, Shuka in this way acquired the highest station.

27. Seeing that glory and power of his son of immeasurable energy, Vyasa sat down on the breast of the mountain and began to think of his son sorrowfully.

28. Seeing the Rishi seated there, the Apsaras who were sporting on the banks of the celestial river Mandakini, became all moved with shame and dispirited.

29 Some of them, to hide their nakedness, plunged into the river, and some entered the groves hard by, and some quickly took up their clothes, at seeing the Rishi.

30 Seeing these movements, the Rishi understood that his son had been liberated from all attachments, but that he himself was not freed therefrom. At this he became filled with both joy and shame.

31. As Vyasa was seated there, the auspicious god Shiva, armed with trident, surrounded on all sides by many gods and Gandharvas and worshipped of all the great Rishis, came there

32 Consoling the Island born Rishi who was burning with grief on account of his son, Mahadeva said these words to him —

33 You had formerly solicited from me a son endued with the energy of Fire, of Water, of Wind, and of Ether.

34 Procreated by your penances, the son that was born to you was of that very sort. Proceeding from my favour, he was pure and full of Brahma-energy.

35 He has acquired the highest end,— an end that is, which none can acquire who has not completely mastered his senses, nor by even any of the gods, why then, O twice-born Rishi, do you grieve for that son?

36 As long as the hills will last, as long as the ocean will last, so long will the fame of your son continue.

37. Through my favour, O great Rishi, you will see in this world a shadowy form resembling your son, moving by the side and never leaving you for a single moment!

38. Thus favoured by the illustrious Rudra himself, O Bharata, the Rishi saw a shadow of his son by his side He came back from that place, filled with joy at this.

39 I have now told you, O chief of Bharata's race, everything regarding the birth and life of Shuka about which you had asked me.

40. The celestial Rishi Narada and the great Yogin Vyasa had again and again told all this to me in days of yore when the subject was suggested in course of conversation

41. That person devoted to tranquillity who hears this sacred history directly connected with the subject of Liberation is sure to acquire the highest end."

CHAPTER CCCXXXV.

(MOKSHADHARMA PARVA)—Continued.

Yudhishthira said.—

1. "If a man be a house-holder or Brahmacharin, a hermit or a mendicant, and if her wishes to acquire success, what god should he worship?

2. Whence can he surely acquire heaven and whence that which is of the highest benefit? According to what ordinances should he perform the Homa in honor of the gods and the departed manes?

3 What is the end to which one goes when he becomes Liberated? What is the the essence of Liberation? What should one do, so that he, having attained to heaven, would not have to drop down thence?

4. Who is the God of the gods? And who is the Pitri of the Pitris? Who is He who is superior to him who is the God of the gods and the Pitri of the Pitris? Tell me all this, O Grandfather!'

Bhishma said —

5 "O you who are well acquainted with the art of questioning, this question which you have put to me, O pure one, is one which is enveloped in deep mystery One cannot answer it with the help of logic even if one were to try for a hundred years

6 Without the favour of Narayana, O king, or an acquisition of high knowledge, this question of yours cannot be answered. Though this subject is filled with deep mystery, I shall yet, O destroyer of enemies, explain it to you?

7. Regarding it is cited the old discourse between Narada and the Rishi Narayana.

8—9 I heard it from my father that in the golden age, O king, during the epoch of the Self create Manu, the eternal Narayana, the Soul of the universe, was born as the son of Dharma in a quadruple form, viz., as Nara, Narayana, Hari, and the Self create Krishna.

10. Amongst them all, Narayana and Nara practised severest austerities by going to the Himalyan retreat known by the name of Vadari, and riding on their golden cars.

11. Each of those cars had eight wheels, and was made up of the five primal elements, and supremely beautiful Those original regents of the world who had taken birth as the sons of Dharma, became extremely emaciated in body on account of the austerities they practised Indeed, for those austerities and for their energy, the very gods were unable to look at them.

12. Only that god to whom they were kind could see them.

13 Forsooth, with his heart given to them, and moved by a longing desire to see them, Narada dropped down on Gandhamadana from a summit of the high mountains of Meru and walked over all the world.

14. Endued with great speed, he at last went to that spot whereon was situate the retreat of Vadari Moved by curiosity he entered that retreat at the hour of Nara's and Narayana's performing their daily rites.

15 He said to himself,—This is truly the retreat of that Being in whom are placed all the worlds including the gods, the Asuras, the Gandharvas, the Kinnaras, and the great snakes

16 There was only one form of this great Being before. That form took birth in four forms for the multiplication of the race of Dharma which have been reared by that god.

17 How wonderful it is that Dharma has thus been honored by these four great gods, viz, Nara, Narayana, Krishna and Hari.

18 In this spot Krishna and Hari lived formerly. The other two, however, viz, Nara and Narayana, are now living here performing penances for the object of increasing their merit.

19. These two are the highest refuge of the universe. What can be the nature of the daily rites these two perform? They are the fathers of all creatures, and the illustrious gods of all beings Gifted with great intelligence, what is that god whom these two adores? Who are those Pitris whom these two Pitris of all beings worship

20 Thinking of this mentally, and filled with devotion towards Narayana, Narada suddenly appeared before those two gods.

21. After those two gods had finished their adorations to their deities and the Rishis, they looked at the celestial Rishi arrived at their asylum. The latter was honored with those eternal rites that are laid down in their scriptures.

22. Seeing that extraordinary conduct of the two original gods in themselves adoring other deities and Pitris, the illustrious Rishi Narada took his seat there, well pleased with the honors he had received.

23. With a cheerful soul he looked at Narayana, and bowing to Mahadeva he said these words.

Narada said:—

24. In the Vedas and the Puranas in the auxiliary and sub-auxiliary treaties, you are sung with respect! You are unborn and eternal! You are the Creator! You are the mother of the universe! You are the embodiment of Immortality and you are the foremost of all things The Past and the Future, indeed, the entire universe has been placed on you.

25 The four modes of life, O lord, of which the domestic is the first, continually sacrifice to you who are of diverse forms.

26. You are the father and the mother and the eternal preceptor of the universe. We know not who is that god or that Pitri to whom you are sacrificing to day.

The Holy one said:—

27 This topic is one regarding which nothing should be said It is an ancient ministery Your devotion to me is very great Hence, O twice-born one, I shall describe it to you according to the truth.

28—29 That which is minute, which is inconceivable, unmanifest, immobile, durable dissociated from the senses and the objects of the senses, as well as the (five) elements,—that is called the in-dwelling Soul of all existent creatures That is known by the name of Kshetrejna. Transcending the three qualities of Sattwa, Rajas, and Tamas, that is regarded as Purusha in the scriptures.

30 From Him has originated the unmanifest, O foremost of twice born ones, endued with the three qualities of Sattwa, Rajas, and Tamas. Though really unmanifest, she is called indestructible Nature and lives in all manifest forms.

31. Know that from her we two have originated. That all-pervading Soul, which is made of all existent and non-existent things, is worshipped by us. Even He is what we adore in all those rites that we perform in honor of the gods and the departed manes.

31. There is no higher god, or Pitri than He, O twice-born one! He should be known as our Soul. It is Him that we adore.

33. This course of duties followed by men has, O twice-born one, been laid down by Him. It is His ordinance that we should duly perform all the rites laid down regarding the gods and the departed manes.

34—36. Brahman, Sthanu, Maru, Daksha, Bhrigu, Dharma, Yama, Marichi, Angiras, Atri, Pulastya, Pulaha, Kratu, Vashishtha, Parameshthi, Vivaswat, Shoma, Karddama, Kroda, Avak, and Krita,—these twenty-one persons called Patriarchs, were first born. All of them obeyed the eternal law of the Supreme God.

37. Observing all the rites, in full, that were laid down in honor of the gods and the departed manes, all those foremost of twice-born ones acquired all those objects which they sought.

38. The bodiless dwellers of Heaven itself bow to that Supreme God and through His favour they acquire those fruits and that end which He ordains for them

39. This is the injunction of the scriptures that those persons who are freed from these seventeen attributes, who have renounced all facts, and who are divested of the fifteen elements which form the gross body, are said to be Liberated.

40. The ultimate end of the Liberated is called by the name of Kshetrajna. He is considered as both possessed of, and freed from, all the attributes.

41. He can be apprehended by Knowledge alone. We two have originated from Him. Knowing him in that way, we worship that eternal Soul of all things.

42. The Vedas and all the modes of life, though marked by diversities of opinion, all adore Him with devotion It is He who, inclined to show favour, confers on them high ends fraught with happiness.

43. Those persons in this world who, filled with His spirit, become fully and conclusively devoted to Him, acquire much higher end, for they succeed in entering Him and becoming merged in his Self.

44. I have now, O Narada, described to you what is highly mysterious, moved by the love I bear for you four devotion to me. Indeed, on account of that devotion which you profess towards me, you have succeeded in listening to this my discourse."

CHAPTER CCCXXXVI.

(MOKSHADHRAMA PARVA).—Continued.

Bhishma said —

1. "Addressed by Narayana, that foremost of beings, in these words, Narada, the foremost of men, then said these words to Narayana for the behoof of the world.

Narada said —

2. Let that object be fulfilled for which you, O Self-born Being, have taken birth in four forms in the house of Dharma! I shall now go for seeing your original nature.

3. I always adore my elders. I have never given out the secrets of others. O lord of the universe, I have studied the Vedas carefully. I have practised austere penances. I have never spoken a falsehood.

4. As laid down in the scriptures, I have always protected the four that should be protected I always treat impartially friends and enemies Wholly and surely given to Him, that first of gods, viz., the Supreme Soul, I incessantly worship Him.

5—6 Having purified my soul by these specially meritorious acts, why shall I not succeed in seeing that Infinite Lord of the universe?—Hearing these words of Parameshthi's son, Narayana, that protector of the scriptures, said to him, saying,—Go, O Narada!—Before sending him away, however, the great god adored the celestial Rishi with those rites and ceremonies which have been laid down in the scriptures by himself Narada also duly honored the ancient Rishi Narayana After such honors had been exchanged, the son of Parameshthi left that spot.

7. Endued with high Yoga-power, Narada suddenly soared into the sky and reached the summit of the mountains of Meru. Proceeding to a secluded spot on that summit, the great ascetic took rest for a short time

8. He then cast his eyes towards the north-western direction and saw an exceedingly wonderful spectacle Towards the north in the ocean of Milk, there is a large island named the White Island.

9. The learned say that its distance from the mountains of Meru is greater than thirty-two thousand Yojanas The inhabitants of that realm have no senses. They live without food. Their eyes are winkless. They always send forth excellent perfumes.

10 Their complexions are white, They are purged off of all sins They blast the eyes of those sinners that look at them Their bones and bodies are as hard as adamant. They consider honor and dishonor equally They all look as if they are of divine origin All of them are endued with auspicious marks and great strength

11. Their heads seem to be like umbrellas Their voices are deep like that of the clouds Each of them have four testes The soles of their feet have hundreds of lines They had sixty white teeth, and eight small ones They had many tongues With those tongues they seemed to lick the very Sun whose face is turned towards all sides.

12 Indeed, they seemed to be capable of devouring that great god from whom has originated the entire universe, the Vedas, the duties and the ascetics possessing the quality of tranquility."

Yudhisthira said —

13 "O grand father, you have said that those beings have no senses that they do not eat anything for maintaining their lives, that their eyes are winkless and that they always emit excellent perfumes I ask, how were they born? What also is the superior end which they acquire?

14 O chief of Bharata's race, are the characteristics of those men that become liberated the same as those by which the inhabitants of the White Island are distinguished?

the God of gods, and after his worship was over, to adore the Grandfather of the universe

20 After adoring the departed manes, he adored the Brahmanas. He then divided the offerings among those who depended on him With the remnant after serving those, the king satisfied his own hunger. Given to truth, the king abstained from doing any injury to any creature.

21. With his entire soul, the king was devoted to that God of gods, viz, Janardana who is without beginning and middle and end, who is the Creator of the universe, and who is without decay of any sort.

22 Seeing the devotion to Narayana of that destroyer of foes the divine king of the gods himself shared with him his own seat and bed

23 His kingdom and riches and wives and animals were all considered by him as obtained from Narayana. He, therefore, offered all his belongings to that great god.

24 Adopting the Sattwata ritual, king Uparichara, with concentrated soul, used to perform all his sacrificial acts and observances, both optional and obligatory.

25 Many foremost Brahmanas, well conversant with the Pancharatra—ritual, used to eat before all others the food offered to the god Narayana in the palace of that illustrious king.

and the Future, and are devoted to the Religion of Truth.

32 This is good,—This is Brahma—This is highly beneficial—reflecting thus in their minds, those Rishis created the worlds, and the science of morality and duty that governs those worlds.

33 In that work the authors discoursed on Religion and Profit and Pleasure, and subsequently on Liberation also The various restrictions and limitations were also laid down in it for the Earth as also for Heaven.

34. They wrote that work after having adored with penances the powerful and illustrious Narayana called also Hari, for a thousand divine years, in company with many other Rishis.

35 Pleased with their penances and adoration, Narayana ordered the goddess of speech, viz, Saraswati, to enter into the bodies of those Rishis The goddess, for the behoof of the worlds, did what she was ordered.

36 On account of the entrance of the goddess of speech into their bodies, those Rishis, well conversant with penances, succeeded in composing that foremost of works in respect of words, sense and reason.

37 Having composed that work sanctified with the syllable OM, the Rishis first of all read it to Narayana, who heard them from kindness

38–39 The illustrious and bodiless Narayana became highly pleased with what he heard That foremost of all Beings then addressed those Rishis in an incorporeal voice and said,—Excellent is this work that you have composed containing a hundred thousand verses. The duties and observances of all the worlds will originate from this your work.

40. Perfectly following the four Vedas, viz, the Yajushes, the Richs, the Samans, and the Atharvans of Angiras, this work of yours will be an authority in all the worlds with regard to both Work and Renunciation.

you have composed shall be regarded by all persons, as a work of the highest authority. This is my order. Guided by this treatise, the Self create Manu himself will declare to the world its duties and observances.

45 When Ushanas and Vrihaspati will be born, they also will promulgate their respective work on morality and religion, guided by and quoting from this your work.

46–47. After the publication of his work by the Self-born Manu and of that by Ushanas, and after the publication of the work also by Vrihaspati, this science composed by you will be acquired by king Vasu. Indeed, ye foremost of twice born ones that king will acquire this knowledge of this work from Vrihaspati.

48. Filled with all good thoughts, that king will become deeply devoted to me. Guided by this work, he will perform all his religious deeds and observance.

49 Verily, this work composed by you will be the foremost of all works on morality and religion Excellent as it is, this work is full of instructions for acquiring both Riches and Religious merit, and is full of mysteries

50 For the publication of this treatise, you will be progenitors of an extensive family! King Uparichara also will become endued with greatness and prosperity.

51 Upon the death, however, of that king, this eternal work will disappear from the world I tell you all this.

52. Having said these words to all those Rishis, the invisible Narayana left them and went to some place that was not known to them

53 Then those progenitors of the world, those Rishis who conferred their thoughts on the worldly ends, duly promulgated that work which is the eternal origin of all duties and observances.

CHAPTER CCCXXXVII.

(MOKHARDHARMA] PARVA).—Continued.

Bhishma said :—

1. "Then, upon the expiration of the great cycle, when the celestial priest Vrihaspati was born in the family of Angiras, all the gods became very happy.

2. The words Vrihat, Brahma, and Mahat all carry the same significance The celestial priest, O king, came to be called Vrihaspati because he was gifted with all these accomplishments.

3 King Uparichara, otherwise called Vasu, became a disciple of Vrihaspati and soon became the greatest of his disciples. Admitted as such, he began to study from his preceptor that science which was composed by the seven Rishis who were known by the name of Chitrashikhandins.

4 With soul purified by sacrifices and other religious rites, he governed the Earth like Indra ruling the Heaven

5 The illustrious king celebrated a great Horse sacrifice in which his preceptor Vrihaspati became the priest offering libation.

6—9 The sons of prajapati themselves, viz, Ekata, Dwita, and Trita became the priests watching the proceedings. There were others also who became Sadasyas in that sacrifice, viz, Dhanusha, Raivya, Arvavasu, Paravasu, the Rishi Medhatithi, the great Rishi Tandya, the blessed Rishi Shanti, Vedashiras the foremost of Rishis, viz, Kapila who was the father of Shalihotra, the first Kalpa, Titiri the elder brother of Vaishampayana, Kanwa, and Devahotra, forming in all sixteen.

10. In that great sacrifice, O king, all the necessary articles were collected No animals were killed in it. The king had ordained it so.

11. He was full of mercy. Of pure and liberal mind, he had renounced all desire, and was well-conversant with all rites. The necessary articles of that sacrifice were the productions of the forest.

12. The ancient God of gods (viz., Hari), became highly pleased with the king on account of that sacrifice. Incapable of being seen by any one else, the great God appeared before his worshipper.

13. Accepting by taking its scent, the share offered to Him he himself took up the Purodasha (clarified butter with cakes of powdered barley). The great God took up the offerings without being seen by any one.

14 At this, Vrihaspati became angry. Taking up the ladle he hurled it violently at the sky, and began to shed tears in anger.

15 Addressing king Uparichara he said,—Here, I place this as Narayana's share of the sacrificial offerings! Forsooth, he shall take it before my eyes."

Yudhishthira said :—

16 "In the great sacrifice of Uparichara, all the gods appeared in their respective forms for partaking of the sacrificial offerings and were seen by all. Why is it that the powerful Hari only acted otherwise by invisibly taking his share?

Bhishma said :—

17. "When Vrihaspati yielded to anger, the great king Vasu and all his Sadasyas sought to pacify the great Rishi.

18. With cool heads, all of them said to Vrihaspati,—You should not yield to anger. In this golden age, this anger to which you have yielded should not be the characteristic of any one.

19 The great god for whom the share of the sacrificial offerings was designed by you, is himself free from anger! He is incapable of being seen either by ourselves or by you, O Vrihaspati.

20 Only he can see Him to whom He becomes gracious!—Then the Rishis Ekata, Dwita, and Trita, who were all coversant with the science of morality and duties compiled by the seven Rishis, addressed that assembly and began the following narration.

21. We are the sons of Brahman, begotten by his will. Once on a time we went to the north for the acquisition of our highest good

22. Having practised penances for thousands of years and acquired a great ascetic merit, we again stood on only one foot like fixed rods of wood.

23. The country where we practised these austerest of penances, lies to the north of the mountains of Meru and on the shores of the ocean of milk.

24. The object we had in mind was how to see the divine Narayana in his own form Upon the termination of our penances and after we had performed the final ablutions, we heard an incorporeal voice, O powerful Vrihaspati, deep like that of the clouds and exceedingly melodious and filling the heart with joy.

The voice said :—

25. Ye Brahmanas, you have performed well these penances with cheerful souls! Devoted to Narayana, you try to know how you may succeed in seeing that god of great power.

26 On the northern shores of the ocean of milk there is an island called White Island. The men that dwell in that island have complexions as white as the rays of the Moon and that are devoted to Narayana.

27. Worshippers of that foremost of all Beings, they are devoted to Him with their whole minds. They all enter that eternal and illustrious god of a thousand rays.

28 They are shorn of senses They do not live on any sort of food. Their eyes are winkless Their bodies always emit a sweet smell. Indeed, the inhabitants of White Island believe and adore only one God Go there, ye ascetics, for there I have revealed myself.

29 All of us, hearing these invisible words, proceeded by the way said to the country described.

30 Eagerly desirous of seeing Him and our hearts full of Him we reached that large island called White Island Arrived there, we could see nothing. Indeed our vision was blinded by the energy of the great god and accordingly we could not see Him.

31. At this, the idea, due to the grace of the great God Himself, sprung in our minds that one who had not practised sufficient penances could not soon see Narayana.

32 Under the influence of this idea we once more began to practise some severe austerities, suited to the time and place, for a hundred years Upon the termination of our vows, we saw a number of men of auspicious marks.

33 All of them were white and looked like the Moon and were endued with every sort of blessedness Their hands were always joined in prayer. The faces of some were turned towards the North and of some to the East. They were engaged in silently meditating on Brahma.

34. The recitation performed by those great persons was a mental Yapa On account of their hearts, having been entirely fixed upon Him, Hari became highly gratified with them.

35. The effulgence that came out of the persons of those men resembled, O foremost of ascetics, the splendours which the sun assumes when the time comes for the dissolution of the universe.

36. Indeed, we thought that that Island was the seat of all Energy All the denizens were perfectly equal in energy. There was no superiority or inferiority there among them.

37. We then suddenly saw once more a light arise that seemed to be the concentrated effulgence of a thousand Suns, O Vrihaspati.

38 The denizens in a body, ran towards that light, with hands joined in reverential attitude, full of joy, and uttering the one word Salutation.

39. We then heard a very loud noise uttered by all of them together. It appeared that those men were engaged in offering a sacrifice to the great God

40 As regards ourselves, we were sudddenly deprived of our senses by his Energy. Shorn of vision and strength and all the senses, we could not behold or feel anything.

41. We only heard a loud sound uttered by the collected denizens It said,—Victory to you, O you having eyes like lotus petals! Salutation to you, O Creator of the universe

42 Salutation to you O Hrishikesha, O foremost of Beings, O First born! This was the sound we heard, uttered distinctly and in accordance with the rules of orthoepy.

43 Meanwhile, a fragrant and pure breeze blew, carrying perfumes of celestial flowers, and of certain herbs and plants that were necessary on the occasion.

44 Those men, gifted with great devotion, having hearts full of reverence, conversant with the ordinances laid down in the Pancharatra, were then adoring the great god with mind, word, and deed

45 Forsooth, Hari appeared in that place whence the sound we heard originate Asregards ourselves, stupefied by His illusion, we could not behold Him

46 After the breeze had ceased and the sacrifice had been over, our hearts became stricken with anxiety. O foremost one of Angiras's race

47. As we stood among those thousands of men all of whom were of pure birth, no one honored us with a glance or a nod.

48. Those ascetics, all of whom were cheerful and filled with devotion and who were all practising the Brahma frame of mind, showed no feeling for us.

49 We had been greatly tired. Our penances had emaciated us At that time, a bodiless Being addressed us from the sky and said to us these words —

50. These white men, who are divested of all external senses, are competent to see (Narayana). Only those foremost of twice-born persons whom these white men honored with their looks, can see the great God.

52. Go hence, ye Munis, to the place from where you have come! That great Deity is incapable of being ever seen by one who has no devotion.

53. Incapable of being seen on account of his dazzling effulgence, that illustrious Deity can be seen only by those persons who succeed, in course of long time, in devoting themselves wholly and solely to Him. O foremost of twice born ones, you have a great duty to perform.

54. After the expiration of this the golden age, when the Treta age comes in course of the Vivaswat cycle, a great calamity will befall the worlds. You Munis, you shall then have to help the gods.

55. Having heard this wonderful words that were sweet as nectar, we soon returned to the place we desired, through the favour of that great Deity.

56. When with the help of even such austere penances and of offerings devoutly given in sacrifices, we could not see the great Deity, how, indeed, can you expect

61. Ever devoted to Narayana, and ever reciting sacred Mantras having Narayana for their god, he once more ascended to heaven through Narayana's favour.

62 Getting up from the bowels of the Earth, king Vasu, on account of the very highest end that he attained, proceeded to a spot which is even higher than the region of Brahman himself."

CHAPTER CCCXXXVIII.

(MOKSHADHARMA PARVA) — Continued.

Yudhishthira said:—

1. "When the great king Vasu was so wholly devoted to Narayana, why then did he drop down from heaven and why again had he to sink beneath the surface of Earth?"

Bhishma said:—

2. "Regarding it is cited an old discourse, O Bharata, between the Rishis and the gods.

3 Once on a time, addressing many foremost of Brahmanas the gods said to them that sacrifices should be performed by offering up Ajas as victims The word Aja means the goat and no other animal.

9 Having thus spoken each other, the gods and the Rishis quickly approached king Vasu and asked him, saying,—O king, with what should one celebrate sacrifices?

10. Should one sacrifice with the goat or with herbs and plants? Do you remove this doubt of ours! We select you as our judge in this matter.

11. Thus accosted by them, Vasu joined his hands in humility and said to them,—Tell me truly, ye foremost of Brahmanas, what opinion is held by you individually in this matter?

The Rishis said:—

12. The opinion held by us, O king, is that sacrifices should be celebrated with grain! The gods, however, hold that sacrifices should be celebrated with animals Do you judge between us and tell us which of these opinions is correct.

Bhishma said —

13 Learning the opinion of the gods, Vasu, moved by partiality for them, said that sacrifices should be celebrated with animals.

14—15. At this answer, all the Rishis effulgent like the Sun, became very angry Addressing Vasu who was seated on his car and who had supported the deities, they said to him,—Since you have unfairly sided with the gods, do you fall down from heaven! From this day, O king, you shall lose the power of passing through the sky! Through your curse, you shall sink deep below the surface of the Earth.

16. After the Rishis had said these words, king Uparichara immediately dropped down, O king, and went down a hole in the Earth. At the command, however, of Narayana, Vasu's memory did not leave him.

great Lord of both the gods and the Asuras, pleased with you, will save you from the curse that has been imprecated upon you.

21. It is proper, however, that the great Brahmanas should be honored. Verily, O best of kings, their penances should bear fruits.

22. Indeed, you have already fallen down from the sky on the Earth! We wish, however, O best of kings, to show you a favor.

23. As long as you, O sinless one, will live in this hole, so long you will receive (due sustenance).

24. You will get those streaks of clarified butter which Brahmanas with concentrated minds pour in sacrifices along with sacred Mantras, and which are called by the name of Vasudhara! Indeed, weakness or distress shall not affect you.

25 While living, O king of kings, in the hole of the Earth, neither hunger nor thirst shall assail you for you will drink those streaks of clarified butter called Vasudhara. Your energy also shall continue unabated. By virtue of this our boon that we grant you, the God of gods, viz., Narayana, will be pleased with you, and He will take you hence to the region of Brahman.

26 Having granted these boons to the king, the dwellers of heaven, as also all those Rishis having penances for wealth, returned each to his respective place.

27 Then Vasu, O Bharata, began to worship the Creator of the universe and to recite silently those sacred Mantras that had come out of Narayana's mouth in days of yore of righteous soul and rigid vows! Through the anger of the Brahmanas, he has dropped into a pit of the Earth.

32. The Brahmanas have been sufficiently honored. Do you go to that king now.

33. At my behest, O Garuda, go to that foremost of kings, viz, Uparichara, who is now living in a hole of the Earth and incapable of any longer passing through the sky, and bring him up forthwith into the sky.

34 Hearing these words of Vishnu Garuda, spreading his wings and going with the speed of the wind, entered that pit in the Earth in which king Vasu was residing.

35 All on a sudden taking the king up the son of Vinata soared into the sky and there released the king from his beaks.

36 At that moment, king Uparichara once more acquired his divine form and re-entered the region of Brahman.

37. It was in this way, O son of Kunti, that that great king first dropped down through the curse of the Brahmanas for a faulty speech, and once more got up to heaven at the behest of the great God (Vishnu).

38. Only the powerful Lord Hari, that foremost of all Beings, was devoutly adored by him It was for this devout worship that the king succeeded very soon in freeing himself from the curse imprecated upon him by the Brahmanas and in regaining the blessed regions of Brahman.

Bhishma said:—

39 I have thus told you everything regarding the origin of the spiritual sons of Brahman. Listen to me with rapt attention, for I shall now describe to you how the celestial Rishi Narada had proceeded in days of yore to White Island."

CHAPTER CCCXXXIX.

(MOKSHADHARMA PARVA).—Continued.

Bhishma said —

1. "Arrived at the spacious kingdom called White Island, the illustrious Rishi saw those same white men effulgent like the sun.

2. Adored by them, the Rishi worshipped them in return by bending his head and respecting them in his mind Desirous of seeing Narayana, he began to live there, attentively engaged in the silent recitation of Mantras sacred to him, and practising the most difficult vows.

3 With rapt mind, the twice-born Rishi, with arms upraised, stood in Yoga, and then sang the following hymn to the Lord of the universe, Him, viz, who is at once the soul of attributes and divested of all attributes.

Narada said:—

4 "Salutation to you, O God of gods, O you that are freed from all acts! You are he who is divested of all attributes, who is the Witness of all the worlds, who is called Soul, who is the foremost of all Beings, who is Infinite, who is called Purusha, who is the great Purusha, who is the foremost of all Purushas, who is the soul of the three attributes who is called the Foremost, who is Amrita (nectar), who is called Immortal, who is called Ananta (Sesha), who is Space, who is without beginning, who is both Manifest and Unmanifest as existent and not existent things, who is said to have his home in Truth, who is the first of gods (Narayana), who is the giver of riches, who is at one with Daksha and other Lords of the Creation, who is the Ashwatha and other big trees, who is the four-headed Brahman, who is the Lord of all created Beings, who is the Lord of Speech, who is the Lord of the universe, who is the all-pervading Soul, who is the Sun, who is the breath called Prana, who is the King of the waters, who is at one with the King, who is at one with the Regents of the quarters, who is the refuge of the universe when it is dissolved in the final destruction, who is unrevealed, who is the giver of the Vedas to Brahman, who is at one with the sacrifices and Vedic studies acquired by Brahmanas with the help of their bodies, who is at one with the four principal orders of the gods, who is every one of those four orders who is endued with effulgence, who is endued with great effulgence who is he to whom the seven largest offerings in sacrifices are presented with the Gayatri and other sacred Mantras, who is Yama, who is Chitragupta and the other attendants of Yama, who is called the wife of Yama, who is that order of the gods called Tushita, who is that other order called Maha-Tushita who is the Death, who is desire and all diseases that have been created for helping the advent of Death, who is health and freedom from disease, who is subject to desire and passions, who is free from desire and passions, who is Infinite as shown in species and forms, who is he who is punished, who is he who is the punisher, who is all the lesser sacrifices, who is all the larger sacrifices, who is all the priests, who is the origin of all sacrifices, who is fire, who is the very heart of all sacrifices, who is he that is sung in sacrifices, who takes those shares of the sacrificial offerings which are presented to him, who is the embodiment of the five sacrifices, who is the maker of the five divisions of time, who is incapable of being understood except by those scriptures which are called Pancharatra, who never shrinks from anything, who is undefeated, who is only Mind, who is known only by name, who is the Lord of Brahman himself, who has finished all the vows and observances mentioned in the Vedas, who is the swan, who is the great swan, who is the foremost of swans, who is the foremost of all sacrifices, who is Sankhya-yoga, who is the embodiment of the Sankhya philosophy, who lives in all Individual Souls, who lives in every heart, who lives in every sense, who floats on the ocean-water, who lives in the Vedas, who lies on the lotus, who is the Lord of the universe, and whose troops go on all sides for protecting his worshippers! You take birth as all creatures! You are the origin of the rectness of judgment or reasoning. You are the beginning of the cycles, you are the middle of the cycles, and you are their end! You are Akhandala. You are the two Rishis Prachina-garbha and Kaushika! You are Purusthuta, you are Puruhuta, you are the designer of the universe. You have the universe for your form. Infinite are your motions. Your bodies are infinite! You are without end and without beginning, and without middle. Your middle is unmanifest. Your end is unmanifest. You have vows for your residence. You live in the ocean. You have your home in Fame, in Penances, in Self-control, in Prosperity, in Knowledge, in grand feats, and in Everything belonging to the universe! You are Vasudeva. You are the grantor of every wish. You are the monkey that carried Rama on his shoulders. You are the great Horse-sacrifice. You partake of offerings made in great sacrifices! You are the grantor of boons, of happiness, of wealth. You are devoted to Hari! You are Restraint of the senses. You are vows and observances. You are mortifications, you are severe mortifications, you are very severe mortifications. You are he who practises vows and reli-

CHAPTER CCCXL.

(MOKSHADHARMA PARVA)—Continued.

Bhishma said :—

1. "Thus sung with names that were not known to others, the Divine Narayana having the universe for his form appeared before the ascetic Narada.

2. His form was somewhat purer than the moon and differed from the moon in some particulars. He somewhat resembled a burning fire in complexion. The powerful Lord was somewhat of the form of Vishnu.

3. He looked in some respects like the feathers of the parrot, and in some a collection of pure crystal. He resembled in some respects a hill of antimony and in some a mass of pure gold.

4. His complexion somewhat resembled the coral when first formed, and was somewhat white. That complexion resembled in some respects the color of gold and in some that of the lapis lazulus.

5. It resembled in some respects the color of the blue lapis lazulus and in some that of sapphire. It resembled in some respects the color of the peacock's neck, and in some that of a string of pearls.

6. Bearing these various sorts of hues on his body the eternal Deity appeared before Narada. He had a thousand eyes and was endued with great beauty. He had a hundred heads and a hundred feet.

7. He had a thousand stomachs and a thousand arms. He seemed to be still inconceivable to the mind. With one of his mouths he uttered the syllable Om and then the Gayatri following Om.

8. With mind under complete mastery, the great God, called by the names of Hari and Narayana, by his other mouths, many in number, uttered many Mantras from the four Vedas which are known by the name of Aranyaka.

9. The Lord of all the gods, the great God who is worshipped in sacrifices, held in his hands a sacrificial altar, a Kamandalu, a few white gems, a pair of shoes, a bundle of Kusha blades, a deer-skin, a tooth-stick, and a little burning fire.

10. With a cheerful heart, that foremost of twice-born ones, viz., Narada, controlling speech, bowed to the great God and worshipped Him.

11. The first of all the gods, who is free from decay, said the following words to him whose head was still bent low in veneration :

The Holy One said :—

12. "The great Rishis, Ekata, Dwita, and Trita, came to this country from desire of seeing me.

13. Their wishes, however, were not fulfilled. Excepting those who are devoted to with wholly and solely, no else can see me. As regards you, you are verily the foremost of all persons devoted to me with all their souls.

14. These are my bodies, the best ones that I assume. These were born, O twice born one, in the house of Dharma. Do you worship them always, and do you perform those rites that are laid down in the ordinances in connexion with that worship.

15. O Brahmana, do you ask of me the boons you wish! I am pleased with you to day, and I appear to you now in my universal form as freed from decay and deterioration!

Narada said —

16. Since, O holy one, I have to-day succeeded in seeing you, I think that I have acquired forthwith the fruits of my penances, O God, of my self restraint, and of all the vows and observances that I have practised.

17. This, indeed, is the highest boon you have granted me for you have appeared before me to day, O Eternal Lord! You, O holy one have the universe for your eye! You are the Lion. Your form is identifiable with everything! Possessed of power you, O Lord, are vast and infinite.

Bhishma said —

18. Having thus appeared before Narada the son of Parameshthi, the great God addressed that ascetic and said,—Go hence, O Narada, and do not delay!

19. These worshippers of mine, having moon-like complexions, are divested of all senses and do not live upon any kind of food. They are, again, all Liberated! With minds wholly concentrated upon me, people should think of me. Such worshippers will never meet with any obstacles.

20. These men have all acquired ascetic success and are highly blessed. In days of yore they became entirely devoted to me. They have been freed from the qualities of Darkness and Ignorance. Forsooth, they are competent to enter me and become merged into my Self.

21—25. He who cannot be seen with the eye, touched with the sense of touch, smelt with the sense of scent, and who is beyond the sense of taste, He whom the three qualities of goodness, Darkness, and Ignorance do not touch, who permeates all things and is the one Witness of the universe, and who is described as the Soul of the entire universe, and who is described as the Soul of the entire universe, He who is not destroyed upon the destruction of the bodies of all created things, who is unborn and unchangeable and eternal, who is freed from all qualities, who is indivisible and entire, He who is above the twenty-four topics of enquiry and is considered the Twenty-fifth, who is called by the name of Purusha, who is inactive, and who is said to be apprehended by Knowledge alone, He into whom the foremost of twice born ones enter and become liberated He is the eternal Supreme Soul and is known by the name of Vasudeva.

26. See, O Narada, the greatness and power of that God! He is never affected by good or bad deeds.

27. Swattwa, Rajas, and Tamas, are said to be the three (original) qualities. These live and act in the bodies of all creatures.

28. The Indidividual Soul, called Kshetrajna, enjoys and suffers the action of these three qualities. He, however, is above them and they cannot touch Him. Freed from these qualities, He is again their enjoyer and sufferer. Having created them Himself, He is above them all.

29. O celestial Rishi, the Earth, which is the refuge of the universe, disappears into water. Water disappears into Fire and Fire into Wind.

30. Wind disappears into Ether, and Ether into Mind. Mind is a great creature, and it disappears into Unmanifest Nature.

31. Unmanifest Nature, O Brahmana, disappears into inactive Purusha (Soul). There is nothing higher than Purusha (Soul) which is Eternal.

32. There is nothing among mobile and immobile things in the universe which is Immutable, except Vasudeva, the eternal Purusha.

33—34 Endued with great power, Vasudeva is the Soul of all creatures. Earth, Wind, Ether, Water, and Fire forming the fifth, are primal elements of great power. Mingling together they form the body. Possessed of subtile prowess and invisible to all eyes, O Brahmana, the powerful Vasudeva then enters that combination of the five principal elements called body Such entrance is called his birth, and taking birth He makes the body move about and act.

35. Without a combination of the five principal elements, no body can ever be formed.

36 Without, again, the entrance of Individual Soul into the body, the mind living within it cannot cause it move and act. He that enters the body is possessed of great power and is called Individual. He is known also by other names, viz, Shesha, and Sankarshana.

37. He who takes his rise, from that Sankarshana, by his own acts, Sanatkumara, and in whom all creatures merge when the universal dissolution sets in, is the Mind of all creatures and is called by the name of Praddyumna.

38. From Him originates He who is the Creator, and who is both Cause and Effect. From this last, everything, viz, the mobile and immobile universe, originates. This one is called Aniruddha. He is otherwise called Ishana and He is manifest in all deeds.

39 That illustrious one, viz, Vasudeva, who is called Kshetrajna, (Soul) and who is freed from qualities, should, O king of kings, be known as the powerful Sankarshana, when He takes birth as (Individual Soul).

40 From Sankarshana originates Praddyumna who is called "Mind-begotten." From Praddyumna is He who is Aniruddha. He is Consciouness, He is Ishwara (Supreme Lord).

41 It is from me that the entire mobile and immobile universe originates. It is from me, O Narada, that the indestructible and the destructible, the existent and the nonexistent, originates.

42. They who are devoted to me enter into me and become liberated. I am known as Purusha. Without acts, I am the Twenty-fifth.

43 Getting over qualities, I am entire and indivisible. I am above all pairs of opposite and shorn of all attachments. Thus, O Narada, you will fail to understand. You see me as having a form. If I wish, I can dissolve this form in a moment. I am the Supreme Lord and the Preceptor of the universe.

44. What you see of me, O Narada, is merely an illusion of mine. I now appear to be possessed of the attributes of all created things. You are not competent to know me.

45. I have shown to you duly my fourfold form. I am, O Narada, the Doer, I am Cause, and I am Effect.

46 I am the sum-total of all living creatures All living creatures have their refuge in me, Do not think that you have seen the Individual Soul.

47 I pervade all things, O Brahmana, and am the inner Soul of all creatures. When the bodies of all creatures, however, are destroyed, I am not destroyed

48 Those highly blessed men who, having acquired ascetic success, become entirely devoted to me, become freed from the qualities of both Darkness and Ignorance and succeed, therefore, in entering me, O great ascetic

49 He called Hiranyagarbha, who is the beginning of the world, who has four faces, who cannot be understood with the help of the Nirukta, who is otherwise called Brahman, who is an eternal god is engaged in looking after many of my works

50 The god Rudra born of my anger, originated from my forehead See, the eleven Rudras are increasing on the right side of my person.

51—52 The twelve Adityas are on the left side of my person See the eight Vasus, those foremost of gods, are in my front and see, Nasatya and Dasra, those two celestial physicians are in my rear See also in my body all the Prajapatis and see the seven Rishis also

53 See also the Vedas, all the Sacrifices numbering by hundreds, the Amrita (nectar) and all the (medicinal) herbs and plants, and Penances and vows and observances of various sorts

54 See also in me the eight attributes of power viz, those particularly called the Lordly powers, living all together in my body in their united and embodied form See also Sree and Lakshmi, and Kirti, and the Earth with her hump

55 See the goddess Saraswati, that mother of the Vedas living in me! See, O Narada, Dhruva that foremost of luminaries ranging in the sky

56 See also all the Oceans those receptacles of water and lakes and rivers See also, O best of men, the four foremost ones amongst the Pitris in their embodied forms See also, living in me, the three qualities (of Sattwa, Rajas, and Tamas) which are formless

57 The acts done in honor of the departed manes are superior to those done in honor of the gods I am the Pitri of the both the gods and the Pitris, and am existing from the beginning.

58 Becoming the Equine-head I pass through the Western and the Northern ocean and drink sacrificial libations duly poured with Mantras and solid sacrificial food offered with respect and devotion.

59 In ancient times I created Brahman who himself worshipped me in sacrifices. Pleased with him on that account I granted him many excellent boons.

60 I said to him that in the beginning of the cycle he would be born to me as my son, and the sovereignty of all the worlds would he enjoy, and various names will be given to diverse objects on account of the Ahankara, i e, egoism, coming into existence.

61 I also told him that none would ever violate the limits and boundaries he would lay down, and, further that he would be the giver of boons to persons who would solicit him for the same

62 I further assured him that he would be an object of worship with all the gods and Asuras, all the Rishis and Pitris, and the various creatures forming the creation

63 I also gave him to understand that I would always appear for performing the business of the gods and that for that I would allow myself to be commanded by him even as a son by his father

64 Granting these and other highly agreeable boons to Brahman of great energy on account of my being propitiated with him I adopted the course dictated by Renunciation.

65 The highest Renunciation is the annihilation of all duties and acts Hence, by adopting Renunciation one should act in complete happiness

66 Learned preceptors, with settled conclusions deduced from the truths of the Sankhya philosophy, have spoken of me as Kapila endued with the power of knowledge living within the effulgence of the Sun, and concentrated in Yoga

67 In the Vedas I have been repeatedly hymned as the illustrious Hiranyagarbha In the Yoga Shastras, O Brahmana I have been spoken of as one who finds pleasure in Yoga.

68 I am eternal Assuming a form that is manifest I live at present, in the sky At the end of a thousand cycles, I shall once more withdraw the universe into myself.

69 Having withdrawn all creatures, mobile and immobile, into myself I shall exist all alone with Knowledge only as my companion.

70 After the lapse of ages I shall again create the u[illegible] the help of that Knowledge. My fourth form creates the indestructible Shesha.

71. That Shesha is called by the name of Sankarshana. Sankarshana creates Praddyumna. From Praddyumna I take birth myself as Aniruddha. I create (myself) repeatedly.

72. From Aniruddha originates Brahman. The latter is born from Aniruddha's navel. From Brahman originate all mobile and immobile creatures.

73 Know that Creation originates in this way repeatedly at the beginning of every cycle Creation and destruction succeed each other like sunrise and sunset in this world.

74—75. Then, again, as Time, gifted with great energy, forcibly brings back the Sun after his disappearance, similarly I shall, assuming the form of a boar and displaying my strength, bring back the Earth with her belt of seas to her own position for the behoof of all creatures when she becomes submerged in water I shall then kill the son of Diti named Hiranyagarbha, elated with pride of strength.

76 Assuming the form then of a Man-lion, I shall, for doing good to the gods, kill Hiranyakasipu, the son of Diti, who will be a great destroyer of sacrifices.

77. Virochana will have a powerful son named Vali The entire universe consisting of gods, Asuras, and Rakshasas will not be able to kill that great Asura He will hurl Shakra from the sovereignty of the universe.

78. When after defeating the Lord of Shachi, that Asura will possess the sovereignty of the three worlds, I shall take birth in Aditi's womb, by Kashyapa, as the twelfth Aditya.

79. I shall restore it to Indra of immeasurable splendour, and replace the gods, O Narada, in their respective stations.

80. As regards Vali, that foremost of Danavas, who is to be unslayable by all the gods, I shall cause him to live in the nether regions.

81. In the Treta age I shall take birth as Rama in the race of Bhrigu, and root out the Kshatriyas who will become proud of their strength and riches.

82. Towards the end of Treta and the beginning of Dwapara, I shall take birth as Rama the son of Dasharatha in Ikshaku's race.

83 At that time, the two Rishis, viz., the two sons of Prajapati, called by the names of Ekata and Dwita, will on account of the injury done by them to their brother Trita, have to take birth as monkeys, losing the beauty of the human form.

84 Those monkeys that shall take birth in the race of Ekata and Dwita, shall become endued with great power and mighty energy and will equal Shakra himself in power. All those monkeys, O twice born one, will become my allies for performing the work of the gods.

85 I shall then kill the dreadful king of the Rakshasas, that wretch of Pulastya's race viz, the fierce Ravana that thorn of all the worlds, together with all his children and followers.

86 At the junction the Dwapara and the Kali ages I shall again appear in the world taking birth in the city of Mathura for the purpose of killing Kansa.

87. There, after killing numberless Danavas that will be as thorns in the side of the gods, I shall take up my residence in Kushasthali at the city of Dwaraka

88 While living in that city I shall kill the Asura Naraka the chief of the Earth,—him that is, who will do an injury to Aditi, as also some other Danavas of the names of Muru and Pitha.

89 Killing also another foremost of Danavas, viz, the kill of Pragjyotisha, I shall transplant that delightful city furnished with various kinds of wealth into Dwaraka.

90 I shall then defeat the two gods adored of all the deities viz, Maheshwara and Mahasena, who will become fond of the Danava Vana and do him various good offices and who will try their best for that worshipper of theirs.

91 Defeating next the son of the Danava Vali viz, Vana, who will be possessed a thousand arms, I shall next destroy all the inhabitants of the Danava city called Saubha.

92. I shall next, O foremost of Brahmanas, bring about the death of Kalayavana, a Danava who will be endued with great power on account of his being equipt with the energy of Gargya.

93 A proud Asura will appear as a king at Girivraja, of the name of Jarasandha, who will fall out with all the other kings of the world. His death will be brought about by me through some one else guided by my intelligence.

94—95 I shall next kill Shishupala in the sacrifice of king Yudhishthira the son of Dharma, into which sacrifice all the kings of the world will bring tribute. In some of these works, only Arjuna, the son of Vasava, will become my assistant.

96—98 I shall place Yudhishthira with all his brothers in his ancestral kingdom. People will call me and Arjuna as Narayana and Nara, when, endued with power, we two, putting forth our strength, shall kill a large number of Kshatriyas, for doing good to the world. Having lightened the load of the Earth according to our pleasure, I shall merge all the principal Sattwatas, as also Dwaraka, my favourite city, into my own self, recollecting my all embracing Knowledge

99. Having four forms, I shall, in this way, perform many feats of great prowess, and attain at last to those regions of happiness created by me and honored by all the Brahmanas.

100 Appearing in the forms of a swan, a tortoise, a fish, O foremost of twice-born ones, I shall then appear as a boar, then as a man lion, then as a dwarf, then as Rama of Bhrigu's race, then as Rama the son of Dasharatha, then as Krishna the scion of the Sattwata race, and lastly as Kalki.

101. When the Vedas disappeared from the world, I brought them back. The Vedas, were re-created by me in the Krita age.

102. They have once more disappeared or may only be partially heard here and there in the Puranas. Many of my best incarnations also in the world have become facts of the past.

103—104 Having secured the good of the worlds in those forms in which I appeared, they have re-entered into my own Nature. Brahman (the Creator) himself never saw me in this form of mine, which you, O Narada, have seen to-day on account of your entire devotion to me I have now said to you who are devoted to me wholly, everything, O Brahmana. I have described to you my ancient appearances and future ones also, O best of men, together with all their mysteries.

Bhishma said.—

105. "The holy and illustrious god, of universal and immutable form, having said these words to Narada, disappeared there and then.

106. Having won the high favor that he had solicited, Narada also, gifted with great energy, then proceeded in all haste to the retreat called Vadari, for seeing Nara and Narayana.

107—108. This great Upanishad quite of a piece with the four Vedas, and the Sankhya-Yoga, and called by him by the name of the Pancharatra Scriptures, and recited by Narayana himself with his own mouth, was repeated by Narada before a large audience in the residence of Brahman (his sire) in exactly the same way in which Narayana had recited it and in which he had heard it from his own lips."

Yudhishthira said:—

109 "Was not Brahman, the Creator of all things, acquainted with this wonderful discourse of the glory of Narayana gifted with intelligence that he heard it from the lips of Narada?

110 Is the illustrious Grandfather of all the worlds any way different from or inferior to the great Narayana? How then is it that he was unacquainted with the power of Narayana of great energy?"

Bhishma continued:—

111. "Hundreds and thousands of great cycles hundreds and thousands of Creations and Dissolutions, O king of kings, have been over and become events of the past.

112 In the beginning of every Creation, Brahman, endued with great power and who creates all things, is remembered (by Narayana). Brahman knows well, O king, that Narayana, that foremost of all gods is very much superior to him.

113—115. He knows that Narayana is the Supreme Soul, that He is the Supreme Lord that He is the Creator of Brahman himself. Narada recited this very ancient narrative which is perfectly consistent with the Vedas, to that assembly of Rishis crowned with ascetic success that came to the abode of Brahman. The gods Surya, having heard that narrative from those Rishis crowned with ascetic success, repeated it to the sixty-six thousands of Rishis, O king, of purified souls, that follow in his train.

116 And the Sun, the deity that imparts heat to all the worlds, repeated that narrative to those Beings also, of purified souls, that have been created (by Brahman) for always travelling in the van of the Sun.

117. The great Rishis who follow in the Sun's train, O son, repeated that excellent narrative to the deities assembled on the breast of Meru.

118 That best of ascetics, viz., the regenerate Asita then, having heard the narrative from the gods, repeated it to the Pitris, O king of kings.

119 I heard it from my father Shantanu, O son, who recited it to me formerly. Myself having heard it from my father, I have repeated it to you, O Bharata.

120 Gods and ascetics, they who have heard this excellent old narrative which is a Purana, all worship the Supreme Soul.

121. This discourse, belonging to the Rishis and thus handed down from one to another, should not, O king, be communicated by you to any one who is not a worshipper of Vasudeva.

122 This narrative, O king, is really the cream of the hundreds of other discourses that you have heard from me.

123 In days of yore, O king, the gods and the Asuras, in a body, churned the Ocean and raised the Ambrosia Similarly the Brahmanas, in a body in days of yore, churned all the scriptures and raised this narrative, which resembles nectar.

124—125 He who frequently reads this narrative, and he who frequently listens to it with rapt attention, in a secluded spot, and filled with devotion, succeeds being possessed of lunar complexion, in living in the spacious insular continent known by the name of White Island Forsooth, such a man succeeds in entering into Narayana of a thousand rays.

126 By listening to this narrative from the beginning, a sick person becomes freed from his disease. The man who simply desires to read or listen to this discourse, gets the fruition of all his wishes By reading or listening to it The devoted worshipper acquires the high end reserved for devoted worshippers.

127. You also, O king, should always adore and worship that foremost of all Beings. He is the father and the mother of all creatures, and He is an object of reverence to the entire universe.

128. Let the illustrious and Eternal God of the Brahmanas, viz, Janarddana of great intelligence, be pleased with you, O Yudhisthira of mighty arms.

Narayana, that great Mantra which is worthy of being recited silently.

132 Passing through the sky to the Ocean of milk, which is always the abode of nectar, and adoring the great Rishis, he returned to his own hermitage.

Bhishma continued:—

133. I have now recounted to you the discourse that was recited by Narada, That narrative has come down from person to person from very ancient times I heard it from my father who formerly recounted it to me.

Suta said:—

134 I have now told you all that Vaishampayana recounted to Janamejaya, Having listened to Vaishampayana's narration, king Janamejaya duly satisfied all his duties according to the scriptural ordinances.

135 You have all practised very severe penances and observed many high and excellent vows Living in this sacred forest of Naimisha, you are foremost of all persons conversant with the Vedas

136 Ye foremost of twice born ones, you all have come to this great sacrifice of Shaunaka Do you all worship that Eternal and Supreme Lord of the universe in excellent sacrifices, properly pouring libations of clarified butter to the fire with the help of Mantras and dedicating the same to Narayana As for myself, I heard this excellent discourse which has come down from generation to generation, from my father who recited it to me formerly.

some with an opposite disposition, for they follow the ordinances of the Religion of Renunciation.

4. Do you, O Suta, remove this doubt of ours This doubt seems to be eternal and is filled with great mystery. You have heard all discourses on Narayana, which are consistent with the (other) scriptures.

Sauti said:—

5. O excellent Saunaka, I shall recount to you what Vaishampayana, the disciple of the intelligent Vyasa, said when questioned on these very topics by king Janamejaya.

6. Having heard the discourse on the glory of Narayana who is the Soul of all embodied creatures, Janamejaya, gifted with great intelligence and wisdom, asked Vaishampayana about these very topics.

7. The whole world of Being, with Brahman, the gods, the Asuras, and human beings are seen to be deeply attached to acts which yield prosperity.

8 Liberation has, O twice-born one, been described by you to be the highest happiness and to consist of the cessation of existence. They who being shorn of both merit and demerit, become liberated, succeed, we hear, in entering the great God of a thousand rays.

9 It seems to be, O Brahmana, that the eternal religion of Liberation is highly difficult of observance. Turning away from it, all the gods have become enjoyers of the libations of clarified butter poured with Mantras on sacrificial fires and other offerings presented to them by similar means.

10—11. Then, again, Brahman, and Rudra, the powerful Sakra the killer of Vala, the Sun, the Lord of the stars, the Wind-god, the god of fire, the god of the Waters, Infinite Space, the Universe too and the rest of the dwellers of heaven,—these, it seems, do not know the way of securing an annihilation of conscious existence that is encompassed by one's own efforts.

12. Hence, perhaps, they have not followed the path which is certain, indestructible, and immutable. Hence, perhaps turning away from that path, they have adopted the Religion of Action which leads to conscious existence that is measured by time.

13. This, indeed, is one great defeat of those who are wedded to acts, for all their rewards are for the time being. This doubt, O twice-born one, exists in my heart like a dagger! Tear it out by recounting to me some discourses of old on this subject. Great is my curiosity to listen to you.

14. Why, O twice-born one, have the gods been said to be takers of their respective shares of sacrificial offerings presented to them with the help of Mantras in sacrifices of various kinds? Why, again, are the dwellers of heaven worshipped in sacrifices?

15. And, O best of twice-born ones to whom do they, who partake of offerings in sacrifices performed to their honor, themselves make offerings when they perform great sacrifices?

16 The question you have put to me, O king, relates to a deed mystery. No man can quickly answer it who has not practised penances, and who is not acquainted with the Puranas.

17. I shall, however, answer you by reciting to you what my preceptor the Island-born Krishna, otherwise called Vyasa, the great Rishi who has divided the Vedas, had said to us on a former occasion when questioned by us.

18. Sumanta, and Jaimini, and Paila of firm vows and myself as the fourth, and Shuka as the fifth, were disciples of the illustrious Vyasa.

19 We, five in all, endued with self-control and purity of observances, had completely mastered anger and controlled our senses. Our preceptor used to teach us the Vedas having the Mahabharata for their fifth.

20—21. Once on a time, on the breast of that foremost of mountains, viz, the delightful Meru, inhabited by Siddhas and Charanas while we were engaged in reading the Vedas, this very doubt sprang in our minds, that has been given vent to by you to-day. We, therefore, asked our preceptor about it. It heard the answer that our preceptor made. I shall now recount that answer to you, O Bharata.

22. Hearing the words that were addressed to him by his disciples, that remover of all sorts of darkness represented by ignorance, viz, the blessed Vyasa the son of Parashara, said these words —

23 I have practised the austerest of penances. Ye best of men, I am fully conversant with the Past, the Present, and the Future.

24. On account of those penances of mine and of the control under which I kept my senses, while I lived on the shores of the ocean of milk, Narayana became pleased with me. As the result of the great God's gratification, this omniscience about the Past, the Present, and Future, hat was desired by me, sprang in my mind.

25. Listen now to me as I describe to you, in due order, this great doubt that has perplexed your minds. I have, with the eye of knowledge, seen, all that took place in the beginning of the æon.

26 He whom both the Sankhyas and the Yogins call by the name of the Supreme Soul, comes to be regarded as the foremost Purusha on account of his own deeds From Him originate Prakriti that is called the unmanifest or Pradhana by the learned.

27. From the powerful Unmanifest sprang, for the creation of all the worlds, he that is called Aniruddha That Aniruddha is known among all creatures by the name of the Great Soul.

28 It is that Aniruddha who, becoming manifest, created the Grandfather Brahman. Aniruddha is known by another name, viz, consciousness, and is gifted with every sort of energy, 29 Earth, Wind, Ether, Water, and Fire numbering the fifth—these are the five Great Creatures that have originated from Consciousness.

30 Having created the Great Creatures he then created their qualities. Combining the Great Creatures, he then created various embodied Beings. Hear me as I describe them to you.

31. Marichi, Angiras, Atri, Pulastya, Pulaha, Kratu, the great Vashistha, and the Self create Manu—these should be known as the eight elements. Upon these depend all the worlds.

32. Then the Grandfather of all the worlds, viz, Brahman, created, for the success of all creatures, the Vedas with all their branches as also the Sacrifices with their limbs From these eight elements have originated this vast universe.

33 Then originated Rudra from the principle of anger. Taking birth, he created ten others like him. These eleven Rudras are called by name of Vikara-Purushas

34. The Rudras, the Prakritis, and the several celestial Rishis, having come into existence approached Brahman, with the object of upholding the universe and its work.

35. Addressing the Grandfather, they said,—We have been created, O holy one, by you, O you of great power. Tell us, O Grandfather, which of us should be vested with what jurisdiction.

36 What jurisdictions have been created by you for supervising what particular affairs? Which of us should, gifted with what sort of consciousness, shall take charge of which of these?

37. Do you ordain also to each of us the measure of strength that we are to have for satisfying the duties of our respective jurisdictions—Thus addressed by them, the great god replied to them in the following way.

Brahman said:—

38. You have done well, ye gods, in speaking to me of this matter. Blessed be you all! I was thinking of this very subject that has drawn your attention.

39 How should the three worlds be maintained and kept agoing? How should your strength and mine be taken advantage of for the accomplishment of that object.

40. Let all of us, leaving this place, go that unmanifest and foremost of Beings who is the witness of the world, for seeking his protection. He will tell us what is for our behoof.

41 After this, those gods and Rishis, with Brahman, went to the northern shores of the ocean of milk, desirous of doing good to the three worlds.

42 Arrived there, they began to practise those austere penances that are said by Brahman in the Vedas Those austerest of penances are known by the name of Mahaniyama.

43 They stood there with mind fixed, immovable as stakes of wood, and with eyes upturned and arms raised upwards

44 For a thousand divine years they were engaged in those severe penances. At the conclusion of that time they heard these sweet words in harmony with the Vedas and their branches.

The Blessed and Holy One said —

45 Ye gods and Rishis having asceticism for wealth with Brahman in your company, honoring you all with welcome, I say to you these words.

46. I know what is in your hearts! Verily, your thoughts are for the behoof of the three worlds. I shall multiply your energy and strength, investing the same with disposition for work.

47. Ye gods, well have you practised these penances from desire of worshipping me. Ye foremost of Beings, enjoy now the excellent fruits of those austerities which you have practised.

48. Thus Brahman is the Lord of all the worlds. Gifted with power, he is the Grandfather of all creatures. You also are foremost of gods. Do you all, with concentrated minds, celebrate sacrifices for my glory.

49 In those sacrifices which you will perform, do ye always give me a part of the sacrificial offerings. I shall then, ye lords of creation, assign to each of you your respective spheres and ordain what will be for your behoof.

Vaishampayana said:

50 Hearing these words of that God of gods, all those gods and great Rishis and Brahman became filled with such delight that the hair on their bodies stood erect.

51. They immediately made arrangements for a sacrifice in honor of Vishnu according to the Vedic ordinances In that sacrifice, Brahman himself assigned a portion of the offerings to Vishnu.

52. Similarly the gods and the celestial Rishis also, dedicated similar portions each o the great God The portions, thus offered with great respect to Vishnu, were about both the quantity and the quality of the articles used, according to the ordinances laid down for the Krita age.

53 The gods and the Rishis and Brahman, in that sacrifice, worshipped the great God as one having the complexion of the Sun, as the foremost of Beings, situate beyond the reach of Ignorance, vast, pervading all things, the Supreme Lord of all, the giver of boons, and endued with power.

54 Thus worshipped by them the boon-giving and great God, invisible and bodiless, addressed those assembled celestials from heaven and said to them —

55 I have received the offerings dedicated by you in this sacrifice I am pleased with all of you I shall confer rewards on you that will, however, be fraught with ends from where there will be return

56 This shall be your distinctive characteristic, ye gods, from this day, on account of my favours and kindness for you. Celebrating sacrifices in every cycle, with large presents, you will become enjoyers of fruits born of Action.

57. Ye gods, those men also that will celebrate sacrifices according to the Vedic ordinances, will give to all of you, shares of their sacrificial offerings.

58. In the Veda sutras I make him the receiver of a share like that which he has himself offered one in this sacrifice.

59 Created to superintend the affairs of your respective jurisdictions, do you uphold the worlds according to your strength as dependent on the shares you receive in those sacrifices.

60. Indeed, receiving strength from those rites and observances that will be in vogue in the several worlds, originating from the fruits of action, do ye continue to uphold the affairs those worlds.

61. Strengthened by the sacrifices that will be celebrated by men, ye will strengthen me. These are the thoughts that I cherish for you all.

62. It is for this that I have created the Vedas and sacrifices and plants and herbs. Duly served with these by human beings on Earth, the gods will be pleased.

63 Ye foremost of gods, till the end of this æon, I have ordained your creation, making your constitutions depend upon the result of the religion of Action. Ye foremost of Beings, do ye then, about your respective jurisdictions, engage yourselves in seeking the welfare of the three worlds.

64. Marichi, Angiras, Atri, Pulastya, Pulaha, Kratu, and Vasishtha,—these seven Rishis have been created by the fiat of the will.

65 These will become the foremost of all persons versed in the Vedas In fact, they will become the preceptors of the Vedas. They will follow the Religion of Action, for they have been intended to devote themselves to the act of procreating children.

66 This is the eternal path of creatures engaged in acts and observances. The powerful Lord who is charged with the creation of all the worlds is called Aniruddha.

67—68 Sana, Sanatsujata, Sanaka, Sanandana, Sanatkumara, Kapila, and Sanatana —these seven Rishis are known as the spiritual sons of Brahman. Their knowledge comes to them of itself. These seven follow the Religion of Renunciation.

69. They are the foremost of all persons conversant with Yoga. They have a profound knowledge of the Sankhya philosophy They are teachers of the scriptures on duty and it is they who introduce the duties of the Religion of Renunciation and cause them flow in the worlds

70. From Nature has sprung Consciousness and the three great qualities. Transcending Nature is called Soul.

71—72 That Soul is myself. The path of those who follow acts is fraught with return. One cannot, by that path, reach the place whence there is no return. Different creatures have been created with different objects. Some are intended for the Path of Action and some for that of Renunciation. One enjoys the reward, according to the path that he follows. This Brahman is the lord of all the worlds. Endued with power, it is he who creates the universe.

73. He is your mother and father, and he is your grandfather. At my behest, he will grant boons to all creatures.

74 His son Rudra, who has originated from his brow at his behest, will, gifted with power, uphold all created beings.

75. Go ye to your respective jurisdictions, and seek, according to the ordinances, the welfare of the world! Let all the scriptural acts flow in all the worlds. Let there be no delay in this.

76 Ye foremost of gods, do ye ordain the acts of all creatures and the ends that they are come by. Do ye also set the limits of the lives of all creatures.

77. This present cycle that is going on is the foremost of all epochs and should be known by the name of Krita. In this cycle living creatures should not be killed in the sacrifices that may be celebrated It should be as I ordain and let it not be otherwise.

78. In this age, ye celestials, virtue will flourish in full After this age will come the cycle called Treta. The Vedas, in that cycle, will lose one quarter. Only three of them will exist.

79 In the sacrifices that will be celebrated in that age, animals, after dedication with the help of sacred Mantras, will be killed. As regards virtue, again, it will lose one quarter, only three quarters thereof will remain.

80 On the termination of the Treta, will come the mixed Yuga known by the name of Dwapara. In that cycle, virtue will lose two quarters and only two quarters thereof will remain.

81. Upon the termination of Dwapara, the cycle that will set in will be called Kali, and it will come with Kali walking in the van. Virtue will lose full three quarters. Only a quarter thereof will exist in all places.

82. When the great God said these words, the gods and the celestial Rishis addressed him and said,—If only a fourth part of virtue is to exist in that age in every place, tell us, O Holy One, where shall we then go and what shall we do?

The Blessed and Holy One said:—

83. Ye foremost of gods, ye should, in that age, go to such places where the Vedas and Sacrifices and Penances and Truth and Self-Control, accompanied by duties fraught with mercy for all creatures, will still continue. Sin will never be able to affect you at all.

Vyasa said:—

84. Thus commanded by the great God, the gods with all the Rishis bowed their heads to him and then proceeded to the places they desired.

85. After the celestials had left that place, only Brahman remained there, desirous of seeing the great Deity then living in the form of Aniruddha.

86. The foremost of gods then appeared before Brahman having assumed a form that had a huge equine head. Carrying a pitcher and the triple stick, he appeared before Brahman, reciting the Vedas with all their branches.

87—88. Seeing the great Deity of immeasurable energy in that form with an equine head, the powerful Brahman, the Creator of all the worlds, moved by the desire of doing good to his Creation, adored that boon-giving Lord with his head down and stood before him with hands joined in respect The great Deity embraced Brahman and then told him these words.

The Holy One said:—

89 Do you, O Brahman, duly think of the courses of acts which creatures should follow You are the great ordainer of all created Beings You are the Master and the Lord of the universe. Placing this burthen on you I shall soon be free from anxiety.

90 At such times however, when it will be difficult for you to accomplish the work of the gods, I shall then appear in incarnate forms perceiving the gravity of the emergencies.

91 With these words, that grand form with the equine head vanished then and there. Having received his behest, Brahman too proceeded speedily to his own region.

92. It is for this O Blessed One, that the eternal lotus-navelled Deity became the acceptor of the first share offered in sacrifices and hence it is that He is called the eternal upholder of all Sacrifices.

93 He himself adopted the Religion of Renunciation, the end after which those creatures seek who are desirous of eternal fruits. He laid down at the same time the Religion of Action for others, with the view of giving variety to the universe.

94. He is the beginning, He is the middle, and He is the end of all created Beings. He is their Creator and He is the actor and He is the act. Having withdrawn the universe into Himself at the end of the cycle, He enters into sleep, and awakening at the beginning of another cycle, He once more creates the universe.

95. Do you all bow to that Illustrious One who is gifted with a high soul and who is above the three qualities, who is Unborn, whose form is the universe, and who is the abode or refuge of all the dwellers of heaven.

96. Do you bow to Him who is the Supreme Lord of all creatures who is the Lord of the Rudras, who is the Lord of the Adityas, and of the Vasus as well.

97. Do you bow to Him who is the Lord of the Ashwins, and the Lord of the Maruts, who is the Lord of all Sacrifices laid down in the Vedas, and the Lord of the Vedangas.

98. Bow Him who always lives in the Ocean, and who is called Hari, and whose hair is like the blades of the Munja grass Bow to Him who is Peace and Tranquillity, and who gives the Religion of Liberation to all creatures.

99. Bow to Him who is the Lord of Penances, of all kinds of energy, and of Fame, who is ever the Lord of Speech and the Lord of all the Rivers also.

100 Bow to Him who is called Kapardddin, who is the Great Boar, who is the Unicorn, and who is endued with great intelligence, who is the Sun, who assumed the well-known form with the equine head, and who is always shown in a fourfold form.

101. Bow to Him who is unrevealed, who is capable of being apprehended by knowledge only, who is both indestructible and destructible The supreme Deity, who is immutable, permeates all things.

102 He is the Supreme Lord who can be known with the help of the eye of Knowledge alone. It was thus that, helped by the eye of Knowledge, I saw, in days of yore, that foremost of gods.

103 Asked by you, I have told you everything in full, ye disciples, and do you act according to my words and dutifully serve the Supreme Lord called Hari. Do you sing His praises in Vedic words and adore and worship Him also according to due rites.

Vaishampayana said :—

104. It was thus that the compiler of the Vedas, gifted with great intelligence, discoursed to us, accosted by us on that occasion His son, the highly pious Shuka, and all his disciples listened to him while he delivered that discourse.

105. Our preceptor, with ourselves, O king, then worshipped the great Deity with Richs extracted from the four Vedas.

106. I have thus told you everything about what you had asked me. It was thus, O king, that our Island-born preceptor discoursed to us.

107—108. He, who, having uttered the words—'I bow to the holy Lord,'—frequently listens, with rapt attention, to this discourse or reads or recites it to others, becomes gifted with intelligence and health, and possessed of beauty and strength. If ill, he becomes freed from that illness, if fettered, freed from his bonds. The man who has desires gets (by this) the fruition of all his desires, and easily acquires a long life also.

109 A Brahmana, by doing this, becomes conversant with all the Vedas, and a Kshatriya becomes crowned with success. A Vaishya, by doing it, makes great profits, and a Shudra enjoys great happiness.

110 A sonless man obtains a son. A maiden gets a desirable husband. A woman who has conceived, gives birth to a son.

111. A barren woman conceives and gets many sons and grandsons He who recites this discourse on the way succeeds in passing happily and without any obstacles along his way In fact, one acquires whatever objects he cherishes, if one reads or recites this narrative.

112. Hearing these words of the great Rishi, fraught with certainty of conclusion, and containing a recital of the attributes of that great one who is the foremost of all beings, hearing this narrative of the great assembly of Rishis and other dwellers of heaven,—men who are devoted to the Supreme Deity derive great happiness.

CHAPTER CCCXLII.

Janamejaya said :—

1—2. O Holy One, you should tell me the meanings of those various names uttering which the great Rishi Vyasa with his disciples sang the praises of the illustrious killer of Madhu. I wish to hear those names of Hari, that Supreme Lord of all creatures Indeed, by hearing of those names, I shall be sanctified and cleansed like the bright autumnal moon.

Vaishampayana said:—

3. Listen, O king, to what the meanings are of the various names, due to attributes and acts of Hari as the powerful Hari himself of cheerful soul explained them to Phalguna.

4 That killer of hostile heroes, viz, Phalguna, had at one time asked Keshava, enquiring after the meanings of the some of the names by which the great Keshava is worshipped.

Arjuna said:—

5 O Holy One, O Supreme ordainer of the Past and the Future, O Creator of all Beings, O Immutable one, O Refuge of all the worlds, O Lord of the universe, O Remover of the fears of all persons.

6—7. I wish to hear from you in detail, O Keshava, the meanings of all those names of yours, O God which have been mentioned by the great Rishis in the Vedas and the Puranas on account of various acts of yours! None else than you, O Lord, is capable to explain the meanings of those names.

The Holy One said:—

8—9 In the Rigveda, in the Yajurveda, in the Atharvans and the Samans, in the Puranas and the Upanishads, as also in the works on Astrology, O Arjuna, in the Sankhya treatises, in the Yoga Scriptures and in the treatises also on the Science of Life, many are the names that have been consists of eighteen qualities. That attribute is Supreme Nature having for her soul the Sky and Earth and succeeding by her creative forces in keeping up the universe.

14 That Nature is at one with the fruit of all acts. She is also the pure Chit. She is immortal, and invincible, and is called the Soul of the universe. From her proceed all the changes of both Creation and Destruction.

15. Divested of sex, She or He is the penances that people practise. He is both the sacrifice that is performed and the sacrificer who celebrates the sacrifice. He is the ancient and the infinite Purusha. He is otherwise called Aniruddha and is the source of the Creation and the Destruction of the universe.

16. When Brahmana's night was passed, through the grace of that Being of great energy, a lotus made its appearance first, O you having eyes like lotus petals.

17—18. Within that lotus was born Brahman, originating from Aniruddha's grace Towards the evening of Brahman's day, Aniruddha became filled with anger, and as a consequence of this, there originated from his forehead a son called Rudra gifted with the power of destroying everything. These two, viz, Brahman and Rudra, are the foremost of all the gods, having originated respectively from the Cheerfulness and the Anger (of Aniruddha).

24. If I do not worship the auspicious and boon-giving Ishana, nobody would then worship my own self.

25. The ordinances I set are followed by all the worlds. Those ordinances should always be worshipped, and it is, therefore, that I worship them.

26. He who knows Rudra knows myself, and he who knows myself knows Rudra He who follows Rudra follows me. Rudra is Narayana. Both are one, and one is shown in two different forms.

27. Rudra and Narayana, forming one person, pervade all displayed things and cause them to act No one else than Rudra is capable to grant me a boon, O son of Pandu.

28 Having settled this in my mind, I worshipped in days of yore the ancient and powerful Rudra, for getting the boon of a son. In worshipping Rudra thus, I worshipped my own self.

29 Vishnu never bows his head to any god except his own self. It is therefore that I worship Rudra.

30 All the gods, including Brahman and Indra and the gods and the great Rishis, worship Narayana, that foremost of gods, otherwise called by the name of Hari.

31. Vishnu is the foremost of all Beings past, present, or future, and as such should always be worshipped with respect.

32. Do you bow your head to Vishnu. Do you bow your head to Him who gives protection to all. Do you bow, O son of Kunti, to that great boon-giving god, that foremost of gods, who eats the offerings made to him in sacrifices.

33. I have heard that there are four kinds of worshippers. Among them all, they that are devoted to me wholly and do not worship any other god, are the foremost. I am the end they seek, and though engaged in deeds, they never seek the fruits thereof.

34. The three remaining classes of my worshippers are those who seek the fruits of their acts. They acquire regions of great happiness, but then they have to drop down therefrom upon the exhaustion of their merits. Those amongst my worshippers, therefore, who are fully awakened obtain what is foremost.

35. Those who are awakened and whose conduct shows such enlightenment, may be engaged in worshipping Brahman or Mahadeva or the other gods who live in heaven, but they succeed at least in getting to myself.

36. I have thus told you, O Partha, what the destinctions are between my worshippers.

37. Yourself, O son of Kunti, and myself are known as Nara and Narayana. Both of us have taken human bodies only for the purpose of lightening the load of the Earth.

38. I know the different sorts of Yoga that rest on the Soul I know who I am and whence I am, O Bharata. I know the Religion of Renunciation, and all that contributes to the prosperity of creatures.

39. Eternal as I am, I am the one sole Refuge of all men. The waters have been called by the name of Nara, for they originated from Him called Nara. And since the waters, in former times, were my refuge, I am, therefore, called by the name of Narayana.

40 Taking the form of the Sun I cover the universe, with my rays And because I am the home of all creatures, therefore, am I called by the name of Vasudeva.

41. I am the end of all creatures and their father, O Bharata. I pervade the entire sky and the Earth, O Partha, and my splendour transcends every other splendour.

42. I am He, O Bharata, whom all creatures wish to attain to at the end. And because I overwhelm all the universe, I am called by the name of Vishnu.

43 Desirous of acquiring success through control of their senses, people seek to obtain to me who am heaven and Earth and the sky between the two. For this am I called Damodara.

44. The word Prishni includes food, the Vedas, water, and nectar. These four are always in my stomach Hence am I called Prishnigarbha.

45. The Rishis have said that once on a time when the Rishi Trita was thrown into a well by Ekata and Dwita, the distressed Trita invoked me, saying,—O Prishnigarbha, do you save the fallen Trita.

46 That foremost of Rishis, viz, Trita, the spiritual son of Brahman having called on me thus, was saved from the pit.

47. The rays that come out of the Sun who gives heat to the world, from the blazing fire, and from the Moon, form my hair. Hence do foremost of learned Brahmanas call me by the name of Keshava.

48 The great Utathya having impregnated his wife disappeared from her side through an illusion of the gods. The younger brother Vrihaspati then appeared before that great one's wife.

49—51. To that foremost of Rishis who had gone there for holding sexual intercourse, the child in the womb of Utathya's wife, O son of Kunti, whose body had already been formed of the five principal elements, said,—O giver of boons, I have already entered into this womb You should not attack my mother!—Hearing these words of the unborn child, Vrihaspati became filled with anger and imprecated a curse on him, saying,—Since you obstruct me thus when I have come here from desire of the pleasures of sexual union, therefore shall you, through my curse, be visited by blindness

52. Through this curse of that foremost of Rishis, the child of Utathya was born blind and remained so for a long time It was therefore that that Rishi, in days of yore, passed by the name of Dirghatamas

53 He, however, acquired the four Vedas with their eternal limbs and subsidiary parts. After that he frequently invoked me by this secret name of mine Indeed, according to the ordinance as laid down he repeatedly called me by the name of Keshava.

54—55 Through the merit he acquired by uttering this name repeatedly, he became cured of his blindness and then passed by the name of Gotama This name of mine, therefore, O Arjuna, is productive of boons to them who utter it among all the gods and the great Rishis The god of fire and Shoma blending together, become transfused into one and the same substance It is therefore that the entire universe of mobile and immobile creatures is said to be pervaded by those two gods.

56. In the Puranas, Agni and Shoma are spoken of at possessing natures that had one and the same result The gods also are said to have Agni for their mouth It is on account of these two beings gifted with natures leading to the same result that they are said to be deserving of each other and upholders of the universe."

CHAPTER CCCXLIII.

(MOKHADHARMA PARVA).—Continued.

Arjuna said:—

1. How did Agni and Shoma, in days of yore, attain to uniformity with regard to their original nature? This doubt has arisen in my mind. Do you remove it, O slayer of Madhu.

The Holy One said:—

2. I shall recite to you, O son of Pandu, an ancient story of events arising from my own energy Do you listen to it with concentrated mind

3 When four thousand divine cycles elapse, the dissolution of the universe sets in. The Manifest disappear into the Unmanifest All creatures, mobile and immobile, meet with destruction.

4 Fire, Earth, Wind, all disappear. Darkness covers the universe which becomes one endless expanse of water.

5. When that infinite expanse of water only exists like Brahma without a second, it is neither day nor night. Neither aught nor naught exists, neither manifest nor unmanifest.

6 When such is the state of the universe, the foremost of Beings, viz, the Eternal and Immutable Hari originates from Ignorance, that combination of the qualities belonging to Narayana, that is indestructible and immortal, that is without senses, that is inconceivable and unborn, that is Truth's self fraught with mercy, that is endued with the form of existence which the rays of the gem called Chintamani have that causes various kinds of inclinations to flow in diverse directions, that is divested of the principles of hostility and decay, and mortality and decay, that is formless and all pervading, and that is endued with the principle of universal Creation and of Eternity without beginning, middle, or end. There is authority for this assertion

7 The Shruti declares,—Day was not. Night was not Aught was not. Naught was not In the beginning there was only Ignorance

8 She was of the form of the universe, and she is the night of Narayana of universal form. This is the meaning of the word of Tamas

9 From that Purusha thus born of Tamas and having Brahma for his parent, came into existence the Being called Brahman Brahman, wishing to create creatures caused Agni and Shoma to originate from his own eyes. Afterwards when creatures were to be created, the created persons came out in their due order as Brahmanas and Kshatriyas. He who came into being as Shoma was none else than Brahma, and they that were born as Brahmanas were all Shoma in sooth. He who came into Being as Agni was none else than Kshatra. The Brahmanas became gifted with greater energy than the Kshatras. If you enquire about the reason thereof, the answer is that this superiority of the Brahmanas to the Kshatriyas is an attribute which is manifest to the whole world. It occurred as follows. The Brahmanas represent the eldest creation amongst men. None were created before who were superior to the Brahmanas. He who offers food into the mouth of a Brahmana is considered as pouring libations into a burning fire. I say that having arranged things thus, the creation of creatures was accomplished by Brahman. Having established all created Beings in their respective positions, he keeps us the three worlds. There is a similar declaration in the Mantras of the Shrutis.

10. You, O Agni, are the Hotri in sacrifices, and the benefactor of the universe. You are the benefactor of the gods, of men and of all the worlds.

11. There is other authority also for this—You are, O Agni, the Hotri of the universe and of sacrifices. You are the instrument through which the gods and men do good to the universe.

12. Agni is truly the Hotri and the performer of sacrifices. Agni is again the Brahma of the sacrifice.

13 No libations can be poured into the sacrificial fire without uttering Mantras, there can be no penances without a person to perform them, the worship of the gods and men and the Rishis is done by the libations poured with Mantras. Hence, O Agni, you have been considered as the Hotri in sacrifices. You are, again, all the other Mantras that have been declared with regard to the Homa rites of men. The duty of the Brahmanas is to officiate for others in the sacrifices they perform. The two other castes viz, Kshatras and Vaishyas, that are included within the twice-born class, have not the same duty, laid down for them. Hence, Brahmanas are like Agni, who uphold sacrifices. The sacrifices strengthen the gods Thus, strengthened the gods fructify the Earth. But the result that may be gained by the foremost of sacrifices may as well be done through the mouth of the Brahmanas.

14. That learned man who offers food into the mouth of a Brahmana is said to pour libations into the sacred fire for pleasing the gods

15. In this way the Brahmanas have come to be considered as Agni. They who are endued with learning worship Agni Agni is, again, Vishnu. Entering all creatures, he upholds their vital airs.

16. Regarding it there is a Verse sung by Sanatkumara. Brahman, in creating the universe, first created the Brahmanas, The Brahmanas become immortal by studying the Vedas, and go to heaven by virtue of such study. The intelligence, speech, acts and observances, faith, and the penances of the Brahmanas keep up both the Earth and the heaven like slings of strings upholding bovine nectar.

17. There is no duty higher than Truth. There is no one more worthy of respect than the mother. There is none more efficient than the Brahmana for conferring happiness both in this world and the next.

18. The inhabitants of those kingdoms where Brahmanas have no certain means of maintenance become very wretched. There the oxen do not carry the people or draw the plough, nor do cars of any kind bear them. There milk kept in jars is never churned for producing butter. On the other hand, the dwellers become shorn of every prosperity, and follow the ways of robbers.

19—57. In the Vedas, the Puranas, the histories, and other authoritative writings, it is said that the Brahmanas, who are the souls of all creatures, who are the creators of all things, and who are at one with all existent objects, originated from the mouth of Narayana. Indeed, it is said that the Brahmanas first issued of that great boon-giving god's mouth when he had controlled his speech as a penance The Brahmanas are distinguished above the gods and Asuras, since they were created by myself in my indescribable form as Brahma as I have created the gods and the Asuras and the great Rishis and placed them in their respective situations and have to punish them occasionally. On account of his amorous assault on Ahalya, Indra was cursed by Gautama her husband, through which Indra got a green beard on his face. Through that curse of Kaushika, Indra lost also, his own testicles which loss was afterwards compensated by the substitution of the testicles of a ram. When in the sacrifice of king Sarjjati, the great Rishi Chyavana wanted to make the twin Ashwins sharers of the sacrificial offerings, Indra objected Upon Chyavana's insisting, Indra tried to hurl his thunderbolt at him The Rishi paralysed Indra's arms. Enraged at the destruction of his sacrifice by Rudra, the great Rishi Daksha once more began to practise severe austerities, and attaining to high power caused something like a third eye to appear on the forehead of Rudra. When Rudra became ready for the destruction of the triple city belonging to the Asuras, the preceptor of the Asuras, viz, Ushanas, provoked beyond patience, tore a matted lock from his own head and hurled it at Rudra. From that matted lock of Ushanas originated many serpents. Those serpents began to bite Rudra, at which his throat became blue. During a period, long gone by, at the time of the Self-born Manu, it is said that Narayana had seized Rudra by the throat and hence did Rudra's throat become blue. On the occasion of churning the Ocean for ambrosia Vrihaspati of Angiras's family sat on the shores of the Ocean for performing the rite of Puruscharana. When he took up a little water for the purpose of the initial rinsing, the water seemeed to him to be very muddy. At this Vrihaspati became angry and cursed the Ocean, saying,—Since you continue to be so dirty without caring for the fact of my having come to touch you, since you have not become clear and transparent, therefore from this day you shall be tainted with fishes and sharks and tortoises and other aquatic animals! From that time, the waters of the ocean have become filled with various sorts of sea-animals and monsters. Vishwarupa, the son of Tashtri formerly became the priest of the gods. He was, on his mother's side, connected with the Asuras, for his mother was the daughter of an Asura. While publicly offering to the gods their shares of sacrificial offerings, he privately offered shares thereof to the Asuras. The Asuras, headed by their king Hiranyakashipu, then went to their sister, the mother of Vishwarupa, and begged a boon from her, saying,—Your son Vishwarupa by Tashtri, otherwise called Trishiras, is now the priest of the gods. While he gives to the gods their shares of sacrificial offerings publicly, he gives us our shares of the same privately On account of this, the gods are being advanced and we are being weakened You should, therefore, influence him that he may take up our cause!—Thus addressed by them, the mother of Vishwarupa went to her son who was then living in the Nandana forest (of Indra) and said to him,—How is it, O son, that you are engaged in advancing the interests of your enemies and weakening that of your maternal uncles? You should not act in this way. Thus begged by his mother, Vishwarupa thought that he should not disobey her words, and as the result of that thought he went over to the side of Hiranyakashipu, after having paid proper respects to his mother. Upon the arrival of Trishiras, king Hiranyakashipu dismissed his old Priest, viz, Vashishtha the son of Brahman, and appointed Trishiras to that office. Enraged at this, Vashishtha cursed Hiranyakashipu, saying,—Since you dismiss me and appoint another person as your Priest, this Sacrifice of yours shall not be completed, and some Being, the like of whom has not existed before, will kill you! On account of this curse, Hiranyakashipu was killed by Vishnu in the form of a man-lion. Vishwarupa, having taken up the side of his maternal relations, began to practise severe austerities for advancing them. Moved by the desire of making him swerve from his vows, Indra sent to him many handsome Apsaras. Seeing those celestial nymphs of transcendent beauty, the heart of Vishwarupa became moved. Within a very short time he became greatly attached to them, the celestial nymphs said to him one day,—We shall not tarry here any longer. In fact, we shall return to that place whence we came! The son of Tashtri replied,—Where will you go? Stay with me. I shall do you good! Hearing him say so, the Apsaras rejoined,—We are celestial nymphs called Apsaras. We chose in days of old the illustrious and boon-giving Indra of great power!—Vishwarupa then said to them,—This very day I shall so ordain that all the gods with Indra at their head shall cease to be!—Saying this, Trishiras began to recite mentally certain sacred Mantras of great efficacy By virtue of those Mantras he began to increase in energy With one of his mouths he began to drink all the Soma that Brahmanas devoted Sacrifices poured on their sacred fires with due rites. With a second mouth he began to eat all the food. With his third mouth he began to drink up the energy of all the gods headed by Indra. Seeing him swelling with energy in every part of his body that was strengthened by the Soma he was drinking, all the gods then, with Indra in their company, went to the Grandfather Brahman. Arrived at his presence, they addressed him and said —All the Soma that is duly offered in the sacrifices celebrated everywhere is being drunk by Vishwarupa. We no longer get our shares. The Asuras are being advanced, while we are being weakened! You should, therefore, ordain what is for our behoof! After the gods ceased, the Grandfather replied,—The great Rishi Dadhichi of Bhrigu's race is now engaged in practising severe austerities. Go, ye gods, to him and solicit a boon from him. Do ye so arrange that he may renounce his body! With his bones let a new weapon be made called the Thunder-bolt!—Thus instructed by the Grandfather, the gods proceeded to that place where the holy Rishi Dadhichi was practising austerities. The gods, headed by Indra, addressed the sage, saying,—O Holy One, your austerities, we trust, are being well performed and uninterrupted!—The sage Dadhichi said,—Welcome to all of you! Tell me what I should do for you! I shall certainly do what you will say!—They then told him,—You should renounce your body for benefiting all the worlds!—Thus prayed, the sage Dadhichi, who was a great Yogin and who considered happiness and misery equally, without being at all dispirited, concentrated his Soul by his Yoga-power and renounced his body. When his Soul left its temporary tenement of clay, Dhatri, taking his bones created a dreadful weapon called the Thunder-bolt. With the Thunder bolt thus created of the bones of a Brahmana, which was impenetrable by other weapons and irresistible and permeated by the energy of Vishnu, Indra struck Vishwarupa the son of Tashtri. Having killed the son of Tashtri thus, Indra cut off the head from the body From the lifeless body, however, of Vishwarupa, when it was pressed, the energy that was still living in it gave birth to a powerful Asura named Vritra Vitra became the enemy of Indra, but Indra killed him also with the Thunder-bolt On account of the sin being thus doubled of Brahmanicide, Indra became stricken with a great fear and as the consequence thereof he had to relinquish the sovereignty of heaven He entered a cool lotus-stalk that grew in the Manasa lake. On account of the Yoga power of lightness, he became very minute and entered the fibres of that lotus stalk. When the king of the three worlds, the husband of Shachi had thus disappeared from sight through fear of the sin of Brahmanicide, the universe became kingless The qualities of Darkness and Ignorance attacked the gods The Mantras uttered by the great Rishis lost all efficacy. Rakshasas appeared on all sides The Vedas were about to disappear The denizens of all the worlds, having no king, lost their strength and began to fall an easy prey to Rakshasas and other evil Beings. Then the gods and the Rishis in a body, made Nahusha the son of Ayush, the king of the three worlds and duly crowned him as such Nahusha had on his forehead full five hundred luminaries of great effulgence, which had the virtue of defeating every creature of energy Thus equipt Nahusha continued to govern heaven The three worlds were restored to their normal state The inhabitants of the universe once more became happy and cheerful Nahusha then said,—Everything that Indra used to enjoy is before me. Only, his wife Shachi is not by!—Having said this, Nahusha proceeded to where Shachi was and addressing her, said—O blessed lady I have become the king of the gods! Do you accept me!—Shachi replied, saying—You are by nature, of a pious conduct You belong, again, to the race of Shoma You should not attack another person's wife!—Nahusha, thus addressed by her, said,—I now occupy the position of Indra, I deserve to enjoy the dominions and all the precious possessions of Indra. There is no sin in wishing to enjoy you You were Indra's and, therefore, should be mine!—Shachi then said to him,—I am observing a vow that has not yet been finished. After performing the final ablutions I shall come to you within a few days! Taking this promise from Indra's wife, Nahusha left her. Meanwhile Shachi, stricken with pain and grief, anxious to find her lord and assailed by her fear of Nahusha, went to Vrihaspati. At the first sight Vrihaspati took her to be stricken with anxiety. He immediately took to Yoga meditation and learnt that she was intent upon doing what was necessary for restoring her husband to his true position. Vrihaspati then addressed her, saying,—Equipt with penances and the merit that will be yours on account of this vow that you are observing do you invoke the boon-giving goddess Upashruti! Invoked by you, she will appear and show you where your husband is living!—While observing that very austere vow, she invoked with the help of proper Mantras the boon-giving goddess Upashruti Invoked by Shachi, the goddess appeared before her and said,—I am here at your command! Invoked by you, I have come! What wish of yours shall I satisfy—Bowing to her with the head down, Shachi—O blessed lady, you should show me where my husband is! You are Truth! You are Rita!—Thus addressed, the goddess Upashruti took her to the lake Manasa Arrived there, she pointed out to Shachi her lord Indra living within the fibres of a lotus-stalk Seeing his wife pale and emaciated, Indra became highly anxious And the king of heaven said to himself—Alas great is the sorrow that has befallen me! I have fallen off from the position that is mine! This my wife, stricken with grief on my account, finds out my lost self and comes to me here!—Having thought thus, Indra addressed his dear wife and said—In what condition are you now?—She answered him,—Nahusha asks me to become his wife I have obtained leave from him, having fixed the time when I am to go to him!—Indra then said to her,—Go and say to Nahusha that he should come to you on a car never used before, viz, one to which some Rishis should be yoked, and arriving at yours in that state he should marry you! Indra has many beautiful and charming vehicles. All these have borne you Nahusha, however, should come on such a vehicle that Indra himself had never used! Thus advised by her husband, Shachi left that place with a joyous heart. Indra also once more entered the fibres of that lotus stalk. Seeing the queen of Indra ittern to heaven, Nahusha addressed her saying —The time you had fixed is over!— Shachi said to him, as directed by Indra. Yoking a number of great Rishis to the car he rode, Nahusha started from this place for coming to where Shachi was living. The foremost of Rishis, viz, Agastya born within a jar, of the semen of Maitravaruna, saw those foremost of Rishis insulted by Nahusha in that way. Nahusha struck Him with his foot. Agastya said to him,—Wretch, as you are doing a highly improper act, do you fall down on the Earth! Be changed into a snake and do you continue to live in that form as long as the Earth and her hills continue!—As soon as these words were uttered by the great Rishi, Nahusha dropped down from that vehicle. The three worlds once more became kingless The gods and the Rishis then in a body proceeded to where Vishnu was and appealed to him for encompassing the restoration of Indra. Approaching him they said,—O holy one, you should rescue Indra who is overwhelmed by the sin of Brahmanicide!—The boon-giving Vishnu replied to them, saying,—Let Shakra perform a Horse-sacrifice in honor of Vishnu He will then be restored to his pristine position!—The gods and Rishis began to search for Indra, but when they could not find him they went to Shachi and said to her,—O blessed lady, go to Indra and bring him here!—Requested by them Shachi once more went to the lake Manasa, rising from the lake, Indra came to Vrihaspati The celestial priest Vrihaspati then made arrangements for a great Horse sacrifice, substituting a black antelope for a good horse every way fit to be offered up in sacrifice. Causing Indra, the lord of the Maruts, to ride upon that very house Vrihaspati led him to his own place The lord of heaven was then worshipped with hymns by all the gods and the Rishis He continued to rule in heaven purged off of the sin of Brahmanicide which was divided into four parts and ordained to live in woman, fire, trees, and kine It was thus that Indra, strengthened by the energy of a Brahmana, succeeded in killing his enemy It was thus that Indra once more regained his position.

In days of yore, while the great Rishi Bharadwaja was saying his prayers by the side of the divine Ganga, one of the three feet of Vishnu, when he assumed his three footed form, reached that place. Seeing that strange spectacle Bharadwaja attacked Vishnu with a handful of water, upon which Vishnu's bosom received a '(mystic mark). Cursed by that foremost of Rishis, viz, Bhrigu, Agni was obliged to become a devourer of all things.

58. Once on a time, Aditi, the mother of the gods, cooked some food for her sons. She thought that, eating that food and strengthened by it, the gods would succeed in killing the Asuras. After the food had been cooked, Vudha, having finished the observance of an austere vow, came before Aditi and said her,—Give me alms! Though thus solicited Aditi gave him none, thinking that no one should eat of the food she had cooked before her sons, the gods, had first taken it Enraged at the conduct of Aditi who thus refused to give him alms, Vudha who was Brahma's self through the austere vow he had finished, cursed her, saying that as Aditi had refused him alms she would have a pain in her womb when Vivaswat, in his second birth in the womb of Aditi, would be born in the form of an egg. Aditi reminded Vivaswat at that time of the curse of Vudha, and it is, therefore, that Vivaswat, the god who is worshipped in Shraddhas, coming out of the womb of Aditi, passed by the name of Martanda.

59 The Prajapati Daksha begat sixty daughters Amongst them, thirteen were bestowed by him upon Kashyapa, ten upon Dharma, ten upon Manu; and twenty-seven upon Shoma. Although all the twenty-seven who were called Nakshatras and conferred upon Shoma were equal in beauty and accomplishments, yet Shoma became more attached to one, viz, Rohini, than the rest Filled with jealousy, the rest of his wives, leaving him, went to their father and informed him of this conduct of their husband, saying,—O holy one, although all of us are equal in beauty, yet our husband Shoma is wholly attached to our sister Rohini!—Enraged at this representation of his daughters, the celestial Rishi Daksha cursed Shoma, saying that thenceforth the disease phthisis should attack his son in law and live in him. Through this curse of Daksha, phthisis attacked the powerful Shoma and entered into his person Attacked by phthisis thus Shoma came to Daksha The latter addressed him saying,—I have cursed you because of your unequal conduct towards your wives The Rishi then said to Shoma —You are being reduced by the disease phthisis that has attacked you. There is a sacred water called Hiranyasarah in the Western ocean Going to that sacred water, do you bathe there!—Advised by the Rishi, Shoma went there. Arrived at Hiranyasarah, Shoma bathed in that sacred water. Performing his ablutions, he purged himself off of the sin. And because that sacred water was illumined (abhasita) by Shoma, therefore was it from that day called by the name of Prabhasa. On account, however, of the curse imprecated upon him in days of yore by Daksha, Shoma, to this day, begins to decrease from the night of the full moon till his total disappearance on the night of the new moon whence he once more begins to increase till the night of full moon The brightness also of the lunar disc from that time got a stain, for the body of Shoma, since then, has come to show certain black spots In fact, the splendid disc of the moon has, from that day, come to show the mark of a hare.

60. Once on a time, a Rishi name Sthulashiras was practising very severe austerities on the northern breasts of the mountains of Meru While engaged in those austerities, a pure breeze, full of all sorts of delicious perfumes began to blow there and fan his body. Scorched as his body was by the very severe austerities he was practising, and living as he did upon air alone to the exclusion of every sort of food he became highly pleased at that delicious breeze which blew around him While he was thus pleased with the delicious breeze that fanned him, the trees around him, showed their flowers for making a display and extorting his praise. Displeased at this conduct of the trees which was the outcome of jealousy, the Rishi cursed them, saying—Henceforth, ye shall not be able to put forth your flowers at all times

61 In days of yore, for doing good to the world, Narayana was born as the great Rishi Vadavamukha While practising severe austerities on the breast of Meru, he called the Ocean to his presence The Ocean, however, disobeyed his command. Engaged at this, the Rishi, with the heat of his body, solidified the waters of the Ocean and made them as saltish in taste as the human sweat The Rishi further said, your waters will henceforth be not drinkable Only when the Equine head, roving within you will drink your waters, they will be as sweet as honey!—It is for this curse that the waters of the Ocean to this day are saltish and are drunk by no one else than the Equine head.

62. The daughter, named Uma, of the Himavat mountains, was sought by Rudra in marriage (After Himavat) had promised the hand of Uma to Mahadeva the great Rishi Bhrigu, approaching Himavat, said to him—Give thy daughter of yours to me in marriage!—Himavat replied to him—Rudra is the bridegroom already selected by me for my daughter!—Enraged at this reply, Bhrigu said—Since you refuse my suit for the hand of your daughter and insult me thus, you will no longer contain jewels and gems!—To this day, on account of the Rishi's words, the mountains of Himavat have not any jewels and gems. Such is the glory of the Brahmanas

63. It is through the favour of the Brahmanas that the Kshatriyas are able to possess the eternal and undecaying Earth as their wife and enjoy her. The power of the Brahmanas, again, is made up of Agni and Shoma The universe is kept up by that power and, therefore, is upheld by Agni and Shoma united together.

64 It is said that the Sun and the Moon are the eyes of Narayana. The rays of the Sun form my eyes Each of them, viz, the Sun and the Moon, give strength and heat to the universe respectively.

65 And because of the Sun and the Moon thus warming and strengthening the universe, they are considered as the Harsha (joy) of the universe It is on account of these acts of Agni and Shoma that keeps up the universe that I pass by the name of Hrishikesha, O son of Pandu! Indeed, I am the boon giving Ishana the Creator of the universe.

66 Through potency of the Mantras with which libations of clarified butter are poured on the sacred fire, I take and appropriate the share of the offerings made in sacrifices My complexion also is of that foremost of gems called Hari It is for these reasons that I pass by the name of Hari.

67 I am the substantial residence of all creatures and am considered by persons well versed in the scriptures to be at one with Truth or Nectar. I am, therefore, called by learned Brahmanas by the name of Ritadhama.

68 When in days of old the Earth became submerged in the waters and was not seen, I discovered her and raised her from the Ocean. Therefore the gods worshipped me by the name of Govinda.

69 Shipivishta is a name. The word Shipi means a person who has no hair on his body. He who pervades all things in the form of Shipi passes by the name of Shipivishta.

70 The Rishi Yashka, with quiet soul, in many a sacrifice invoked me by the name Shipivishta It is, therefore, that I came to bear this secret name.

71. Having adored me by the name of Shipivishta, the highly intelligent Yashka, succeeded in restoring the Niruktas which were lost on the Earth and sunk into the nether regions.

72 I was never born. I never take birth Nor shall I ever be born I am the Soul of all creatures Hence I pass by the name of Aja (unborn)

73 I have never uttered anything mean or obscene. The divine Saraswati who is Truth, who is the daughter of Brahman and is named Rita, represents my speech and always lives in my tongue.

74 The existent and the non existent have been merged by me in my Soul The Rishis living in Pushkara which is considered as the residence of Brahmana called me by the name of Truth.

75—76 I have never swerved from the quality of Goodness and know that the quality of Goodness has emanated from me In this birth also of mine O Dhananjaya, my ancient quality of Goodness has not left me so that in even this life, establishing myself on Goodness I began to perform acts without ever wishing for their fruits Purged off of all sins as I am by virtue of the quality of Goodness which is my nature, I can be seen by the help of that knowledge only which flows from adoption of the quality of Goodness I am reckoned also among those who follow that quality. For these reasons am I known by the name of Sattwata.

77 I till the Earth, taking the form of a large plough share of black iron And because my complexion is dark therefore, am I called by the name of Krishna

78 I have united the Earth with Water, Ether with Mind, and Wind with Fire Therefore am I called Vaikuntha

79 The cessation of separate conscious existences by identification with Supreme Brahma is the highest stage for a living agent to acquire. And since I have never swered from that condition, I am, therefore, called by the name of Achyuta

80 The Earth and the sky are known to extend on all sides And because I uphold them both, therefore, am I called by the name of Adhokshaja

81. Persons well versed in the Vedas and engaged in interpreting the words used in those scriptures worship me in sacrifices by calling upon me by the same name.

82 In days of yore, the great Rishis, while practising severe austerities, said,—No one else in the universe, save the powerful Narayana, is capable of being called by the name of Adhokshaja.

83 Clarified butter which keeps up the lives of all creatures in the universe forms my effulgence It is, therefore, that Brahmanas well-versed in the Vedas and possessed of concentrated souls call me by the name of Ghritarchis

84—85 There are three well known ingredients of the body They have their origin in action, and are called Bile, Phlegm, and Wind The body is called a union of these three All living creatures are kept up by these three, and when these three become weakened, living creatures also become weakened It is, therefore, that all persons well versed in the scriptures of the science of Life call me by the name of Tridhatu

86 The holy Dharma is known among all creature by the name of Vrisha, O Bharata! Hence it is that I am called the excellent Vrisha in the Vedic lexicon called Nighantuka

87 The word 'Kapi' signifies the foremost of boars, and Dharma is otherwise known by the name of Vrisha It is, therefore, that that lord of all creature, viz, Kashyapa the common father of the gods and the Asuras, called me by the name Vrishakapi.

88 The gods and the Asuras have never been able to know my beginning, my middle, or my end. It is, therefore, that I am sung as Anadi, Amadhya, Ananta I am the Supreme Lord, gifted with power, and I am the eternal witness of the universe.

89 I always hear words that are pure and holy, O Dhananjaya and never catch anything that is sinful Hence am I called by the name of Shuchishravas

90 Putting on, in days of yore the form of a boar with a single tusk, O increaser of the joys of others, I raised the submerged Earth from the bottom of the ocean. Therefore am I called by the name of Ekashringa

91 While I put on the form of a powerful boar for this purpose I had three humps on my back Indeed, on account of this peculiarity of my form at that time that I have come to be called by the name of Trikakud (three-humped)

92 Those who are well-versed in the science of Kapila call the Supreme Soul by the name Virincha That Virincha is otherwise called the great Prajapati (or Brahman) Verily, I am at one with Him called Virincha on account of my imparting animation to all living creatures, for I am the Creator of the universe.

93 The preceptors of Sankhya philosophy, who have settled conclusions, call me the eternal Kapila living in the midst of the solar disc with but Knowledge for my companion.

94 On Earth I am known to be at one with Him who has been sung in the Vedic hymns as the effulgent Hiranyagarbha and who is always adored by Yogins.

95 I am considered as the embodied form of the Rich Veda consisting of twenty-one thousand verses Persons well-versed in the Vedas also call me the embodiment of the Samans of a thousand branches Thus do learned Brahmanas who are my devoted worshippers and who are few in number sing me in the Aranyakas.

96 In the Adhyaryus I am sung as the Yajur-Veda of fifty six and fifteen and thirty branches

97 Learned Brahmanas well versed in the Atharvans consider me as identical with the Atharvans consisting of five Kalpas and all the Kritvas.

98 All the sub divisions of the different Vedas with their branches and all the verses that compose these branches, and all the vowels that occur in those verses, and all the rules of pronunciation, know, O Dhananjaya, are my work

99 O Partha, He who rises and who gives various gods, is none else than myself I am He who is the repository of the science of syllables and pronunciation that is treated of in the supplemental parts of the Vedas.

100—102 Following the path pointed out by Vamadeva the great Rishi Panchala, through my favour obtained from that eternal Being the rules of the division of syllables and words. Indeed, Galava, born in the Vabhravya race, having acquired high ascetic success and obtained a boon from Narayana compiled the rules about the division of syllables and words and those about emphasis and accent in utterance, and appeared as the first scholar who became conversant with those two subjects Repeatedly thinking of the sorrow of birth and death, Kundarika and king Brahmadatta attained to that prosperity which is acquired by persons devoted to Yoga, in course of seven births, through my favour.

103 In days of yore, O Partha I was, for some reason, born as the son of Dharma, O Kuru chief, and owing to such birth of mine I was celebrated under the name of Dharmaja

104 I took birth in two forms, viz, as Nara and Narayana. Riding on the car that helps the performance of scriptural and other duties, I practised, in those two forms, eternal austerities on the breast of Gandhamadana.

105 At that time the great sacrifice of Daksha took place Daksha, however, in that sacrifice of his, refused to dedicate a share to Rudra, O Bharata, of the sacrificial offerings.

106 Moved by the sage Dadhichi, Rudra destroyed that sacrifice He hurled a flaming dart.

107 That dart having consumed all the articles of Daksha's sacrifice, came with great force towards us at the retreat of Vadari

108 With great violence that dart then dropped upon the chest of Narayana, Attacked by the violence of that dart, the hair on the head of Narayana became green In fact, on account of this change in the color of my hair I came to be called by the name of Munjakesha

109 Driven off by an exclamation of Hun which Narayana uttered, this dart, losing its power, returned to Shankara's hands.

110 At this, Rudra became greatly enraged and as the outcome thereof he rushed towards the Rishis Nara and Narayana gifted with the power of severe austerities

111 Narayana then seized the rushing Rudra with his hand by the throat Caught by Narayana, the lord of the universe, Rudra's throat changed colo and became dark From that time forth Rudra came to be called by the name o Shitikantha.

112 In the meantime Nara, for destroying Rudra took up a blade of gras and inspired it with Mantras The blade of grass thus inspired, was converted into a powerful battle axe

113 Nara suddenly hurled that battle-axe at Rudra but it broke into pieces I or that weapon thus breaking into pieces I came to be called by the name of Khandaparashu

Arjuna said :—

114 In that battle capable of encompassing the destruction of the three worlds, who acquired the victory, O Janarddana, do you tell me this.

The Blessed and Holy One said :—

115 When Rudra and Narayana thus fought all the universe became suddenly stricken with anxiety.

116 The god of fire ceased to accept libations of even the purest clarified butter duly poured in sacrifices with the help of Vedic Mantras The Vedas no longer shone by inward light in the minds of the Rishis of purified souls.

117. The quality of Darkness and Ignorance possessed the gods. The Earth shook. The vault of the sky seemed to divide in two parts.

118. All the luminaries became deprived of their effulgence. The Creator, Brahman, himself dropped from his seat. The Ocean himself became dry. The mountains of Himavat became riven.

119—120. When such dreadful portents appeared everywhere, O son of Pandu, Brahman, attended by all the gods and the great Rishis, soon come to the place where the battle was going on. The four-headed Brahman, capable of being understood with the help of only the Niruktas, joined his hands and addressing Rudra, said —

121. Let good happen to the three worlds. Throw down your weapons, O lord of the universe, for doing good to the world.

122—123. That which is indestructible, immutable, supreme, the origin of the universe, uniform, and the supreme actor, that which is above all pairs of opposites, and inactive, has, chosing to be shown, been pleased to assume this one blessed form This Nara and Narayana have taken birth in the race of Dharma.

124 The foremost of all gods, these two are observers of the highest vows and gifted with the severest penances. Through some reason best known to Him I myself have originated from the quality of His Grace.

125—127. Eternal as you are, for you have ever existed since all the past creations, you too have originated from His anger. With myself then, these gods, and all the great Rishis, do you worship this displayed form of Brahma and let peace be to all the worlds forthwith!—Thus addressed by Brahman Rudra immediately renounced the fire of his anger and began to please the illustrious and powerful Narayana. Indeed, he soon placed himself at the disposal of the worshipful, boon-giving, and powerful Narayana.

128 That boon-giving god who has his anger and the senses under control, became soon pleased and reconciled with Rudra.

129 Well-worshipped by the Rishis, by Brahman, and by all the gods the great God, the Lord of the universe, otherwise called by the name of Hara, then addressed the illustrious Ishana and said these words —

130 He who knows you knows me He who follows you follows me! There is no difference between you and me. Do you never think otherwise.

131. The mark made by your lance on my chest will from this day put on the form of a beautiful whirl, and the mark of my hand on your throat will also assume a beautiful shape on account of which you shall, from this day forth, be called by the name of Shreekantha.

The Blessed and Holy One said :—

132—133 Having mutually caused such marks on each other's body, the two Rishis Nara and Narayana thus made friends with Rudra and sending away the gods, once more began to practise penances with a tranquil souls I have thus told you, O son of Pritha, how in that battle which occurred in days of yore between Rudra and Narayana, the latter got the victory.

134. I have told you the many secret names by which Narayana is called, and what the meanings, O Bharata, are of those names, which, as I have told you the Rishis have bestowed upon the great God.

135 In this way, O son of Kunti, assuming various forms do I rove at will, through the Earth, the region of Brahman himself, and that other high and eternal region of happiness called Goloka.

136 Protected by me in the great battle, you have acquired a great victory.

137 That Being whom, at the time of all your battles, you saw stalking in your van know, O son of Kunti, is no other than Rudra, that god of gods, otherwise called by the name of Kapardin.

138 He is otherwise known by the name of Ivala and should be known as one that has originated from my anger The enemies whom you have killed were all, in the first instance, killed by him.

139 Do you bend your head to that God of gods, that lord of Uma, gifted with immeasurable power. With concentrated soul do you bend your head to that illustrious Lord of the universe that indestructible god, otherwise called by the name of Hari.

140 He is none else than that god who, I have repeatedly said to you, has originated from my anger. You have before this, I ward, O Dhananjaya, of the power and energy which live in Him.

CHAPTER CCCXLIV.

Saunaka said —

1 O Sauti, excellent is this discourse which you have recounted Verily, these ascetics, having heard it, have all been filled with surprise.

2. It is said, O Sauti, that a discourse that has Narayana for its subject is more fruitful of merit than sojourns to all the sacred retreats and ablutions performed in all the sacred waters on the Earth

3. Having listened to this discourse of yours | that has Narayana for its theme, that is sacred and capable of purifying one of every sin, all of us have certainly become holy.

4. Worshipped of all the worlds, that illustrious and foremost of gods is incapable of being seen by the gods with Brahman numbering among them and all the Rishis.

5. That Narada was able to see of Narayana, otherwise called Hari, was owing, O son of Suta, to the especial favour of that divine and powerful Lord.

6 When, however, the celestial Rishi Narada had succeeded in seeing the Supreme Lord of the universe as residing in the form of Aniruddha, why did he again proceed so speedily (to the retreat of Vadari) for seeing those two foremost of gods, viz, Nara and Narayana? Do you, O Sauti, tell us the reason of Narada's conduct.

Sauti said.—

7—8 During the continuance of his Sacrifice, Janamejaya, the royal son of Parikshit, taking advantage of an interval in the sacrificial rites, and when all the learned Brahmanas were resting, O Shaunaka, that king of kings, addressed the grand-father of his grand father, viz, the Island born Rishi Krishna, otherwise called Vyasa, that ocean of Vedic learning, that foremost of ascetics gifted with power, and said these words.

Janamejaya said:—

9 After the celestial Rishi Narada had come back from White-Island, reflecting, as he came, on the words spoken to him by the holy Narayana, what, indeed, did that great ascetic next do?

10 Arrived at the retreat known by the name of Vadari on the breast of the Himavat mountains, and seeing the two Rishis Nara and Narayana who were practising severe austerities at that place, how long did Narada live there and what were the subjects of conversation between him and the two Rishis?

11. This discourse on Narayana, that is really an ocean of knowledge, has been raised by your intelligent self by churning that vast history called Bharata which consists of a hundred thousand Verses.

12—13 As butter is raised from curds, sandal wood from the mountains of Malaya, the Aranyakas from the Vedas, and ambrosia from all the medicinal herbs, similarly, O ocean of austerities, has this discourse that is like ambrosia and that has Narayana for its object, been raised by you, O Brahmana, from various histories and Puranas existing in the world.

14 Narayana is the Supreme Lord. Illustrious and gifted with great power, He is the soul of all creatures. Indeed, O foremost of twice-born ones, the energy of Narayana is irresistible, 15 At the end of the æon, all the gods having Brahman for their foremost, all Rishis with the Gandharvas, and all things mobile and immobile, enter into Narayana.

16—21. I think, therefore, that there is nothing holier on earth or in heaven and nothing higher than Narayana. A sojourn to all the sacred places on Earth, and ablutions performed in all the sacred waters, do not produce so much merit as a discourse that has Narayana for its subject. Having listened to this discourse from the beginning—this discourse on Hari, the lord of the universe, which dissipates all sins, we feel that we have been purged off of all our sins, and sanctified entirely. Nothing wonderful was done by my ancestor Dhananjaya whose was the victory in the great battle on Kurukshetra, for it should be remembered that he had Vasudeva for his friend. I think that that person could have nothing unattainable in the three-worlds, who had for his friend Vishnu himself, that great Lord of the universe! Highly fortunate and commendable were those ancestors of mine, since they had Janarddana himself for superintending their temporal and spiritual prosperity. Worshipped of all the worlds, the holy Narayana is capable of being seen with the help of austerities alone.

22 They, however, succeeded in seeing Narayana adorned with the beautiful mystic mark. More fortunate than my ancestors was the celestial was the Rishi Narada the son of Pramesthi.

23. Indeed, I think that Narada, who is above all destruction, was gifted with great energy, for going to White-Island

He had succeeded in seeing the person of Hari.

24 Indeed, it is clear that the sight he had got of the Supreme Lord was owing to only the favour of that Being. Fortunate was Narada inasmuch as he had succeeded in seeing Narayana as existing in the form of Aniruddha.

25. Having seen Narayana in that form, why did Narada hasten once more to the hermitage of Vadari for seeing Nara and Narayana! What was the reason, O ascetic, of this step taken by Narada?

26—28. How long also did Narada the son of Prameshthi, after his return from White Island and arrival at Vadari and meeting with the two Rishis Nara and Narayana, reside there, and what conversation had he with them? What did those two great and foremost of Rishis say to him? You should tell me all this.

Vaishampayana said —

29. Salutations to the holy Vyasa of incomparable energy. Through his favor, I shall recite this narrative having Narayana for its theme.

30—31. Arrived at White Island Narada saw the immutable Hari Leaving that place, he speedily went, O king, to the mountains of Meru, remembering those weighty words which the Supreme Lord had said to him. Arrived at Meru he became filled with wonder at the thought, O king, of what he had done.

32. And he said to himself,—'How wonderful is it! The journey I have done is a long one! Having gone to such a distance, I have returned safe and sound!' From the mountains of Meru he then went towards Gandhamadana.

33 Passing through the skies he speedily got down upon that extensive retreat known by the name of Vadari There he saw those ancient gods, viz, those two foremost of Rishis (called Nara and Narayana), performing penances, observing high vows, and depending upon their own selves.

34. Both of those adorable persons bore on their chests the mystic marks called Shreevatsa, and both had matted locks on their heads. And on account of the effulgence with which they illumined the world they seemed to surpass the very Sun in energy.

85. The palms of each bore the mark called the swan's foot The soles of their feet bore the mark of the discus. Their chests were very broad, their arms extended to their knees.

36 Each of them had four shoulder joints. Each of them had sixty teeth and four arms The voice of each was as deep as the roaring of the clouds. Their faces were highly beautiful, their foreheads broad, their brows fair, their cheeks well-formed, and their noses acquiline.

37 The heads of those two gods were large and round, resembling open umbrellas. Endued with these marks, they were certainly very superior persons in appearance.

38—39 Seeing them Nara became filled with joy. He saluted them with respect and was saluted by them in return They received the celestial Rishi, saying 'Welcome,' and made the ordinary enquiries. Seeing those two foremost of Beings, Narada began to think within himself,—'These two foremost of Rishis that are respected by all creatures seem to be very like, in appearance, to those persons, worshipped of all beings, whom I have seen in White Island.

40. Thinking thus, he went round them both and then sat down on the excellent seat made of Kusha grass that had been offered to him.

41. After this, those two Rishis that were the abode of penances, of famous deeds, and of energy,—those ascetics that were gifted with tranquility of heart and self-control, performed their morning rites.

42 They then, without anxious hearts, adored Narada with water to wash his feet and the usual articles of the Arghya. Having performed their morning rites and the observances necessary for receiving their guest, they sat down on two seats made of wood.

43 When those two Rishis sat, that place began to shine with peculiar beauty even as the sacrificial altar shines with beauty on account of the sacred fires when libations of clarified butter are poured upon them.

44. Then seeing Narada refreshed from fatigue and seated at his ease and well-pleased with the rites of hospitality he had received, Narayana said these words.

Nara and Narayana said:—

45 Have you seen in White Island the Supreme Soul, who is eternal and divine, and who is the high source whence we have originated.

Narada said:—

46. I have seen that beautiful Being who is immutable and who has universe for his form! In Him live all the worlds, and all the gods with the Rishis

47—48 Even now I see that Being in seeing you two who are eternal Those marks and indications that characterise Hari himself of unmanifest form, characterise you two who are endued with manifest forms Verily, I see both of you by the side of that great God

49 Dismissed by the Supreme Soul, I have come here to-day.

50 In energy, fame and beauty, who else in the three worlds can equal Him than you two who have been born in the race of Dharma

51. He has told me the entire list of duties referring to Soul He has also told me of all those incarnations which he will, in the future, have in this world

52. The inhabitants, of White Island whom I have seen, are all shorn of the five senses that the ordinary persons have All of them are of awakened souls, endued as they are with true knowledge They are, again, entirely devoted to the foremost of Beings, viz., the Supreme Lord of the universe, They always engaged in adoring that great God, and the latter always sports with them

53 The holy and Supreme Soul is always fond of those who are devoted to him He is fond also of the twice born ones Always fond of those who are devoted to Him He sports with those worshippers of His

54 Enjoying the universe, pervading everything, the illustrious Madhava is ever affectionate towards his worshippers He is the Actor, he is the Cause, and He is the Effect He is gifted with omnipotence and immeasurable, effulgence

55. He is the Cause whence all things proceed He is the embodiment of all the scriptural injunction He is the embodiment of all themes He is endued with great fame

56 Uniting Himself with penances, He has lighted Himself with a splendour which is said to represent an energy that is higher than (what is in) White Island Of soul purified by penances, He has ordained Peace and Tranquility in the three worlds

57 With such an auspicious understanding he observes a very superior vow which is the embodiment of holiness The Sun warms not and Shoma does not adorn the region where he lives practising austerest penances. There the wind blows not

58 Having made an altar measuring eight fingers' breadth, the illustrious Creator of the universe is practising penances there, standing on one foot, with arms upraised, and with face directed towards the East.

59—61. Reciting the Vedas with their branches, he is practising the severest austerities Whatever libations of clarified butter or meat are poured on the sacrificial fire according to the ordinances of Brahman, by the Rishis, by Pashupati himself, by the rest of the principal gods, by the Daityas, the Danavas, and the Rakshasas, all reach the feet of that great god

62 Whatever rites and religious acts are performed by persons whose souls are entirely given to him, are all received by that great God on his head

63 No one is dearer to him in the three worlds than those persons who are enlightened and possessed of great souls. Dearer even than those persons is one who is entirely devoted to him

64 Dismissed by him who is the Supreme Soul I am coming here Thus is what the illustrious and holy Hari has himself said to me I shall henceforth live with you two, devoted to Narayana in the form of Aniruddha.

CHAPTER CCCXLV.

Nara and Narayana said —

1 You deserve very high encomiums, and highly favored have you been since you have seen the powerful Narayana himself None else, not even Brahman himself who has sprung from the primal lotus, has been able to see him.

2. That foremost of Purushas, gifted with power and holiness, is of unmanifest origin and incapable of being seen These words that we say to you are very true, O Narada!

3 There exists no one in the universe who is dearer to him than one that worships him with devotion It is, therefore, O best of twice born ones, that he showed himself to you'

4 No one can go to that realm where the Supreme Soul resides practising penances, except we two, O foremost of twice-born ones

5 On account of that place being adorned by Him, its splendour resembles the effulgence of a thousand Suns collected together.

6 From that illustrious Being, O Brahmana, from Him who is the origin of the Creator of the universe, O foremost of all persons gifted with forgiveness, originates the attribute of forgiveness which attaches to the Earth.

7. It is from that illustrious Being whose attributes are for the good of all beings, that Rasa (Taste) has flown The attribute of Rasa belongs to the waters which are, again, liquid.

8 It is from Him that Heat or Light has flown, having the attribute of Form or vision for its soul. It belongs to the Sun on account of which the Sun becomes able to shine and give heat.

9. It is from that illustrious and foremost of Beings that Touch also has originated It belongs to the Wind, on account of which the Wind moves about in the world producing the sensation of Touch

10 It is from that powerful Lord of the entire universe that Sound has arisen It belongs to Ether, which, therefore, exists uncovered and unconfined

11 It is from that illustrious Being that Mind, which pervades all Beings, has originated It belongs to the Moon on account of which the Moon has come to be invested with the attribute of showing all the things

12 That spot where the divine Narayana that eater of the libations and other offerings made in sacrifices lives with Knowledge alone for his companion has in the Vedas, been called by the name of the productive cause of all things known as Sat.

13 The path that is theirs, O foremost of twice-born ones that, are stainless and that are freed from both virtue and sin, is fraught with auspiciousness and happiness

14 The Sun, who is the remover of the darkness of all the worlds, is said to be the door. Entering the Sun the bodies of such persons become consumed by his fire They then become invisible for after that they cannot be beheld by any one at any time.

15 Reduced into invisible atoms, they then enter into Narayana. Passing out from him also, they enter into the form of Aniruddha.

16—18 Losing all physical attributes altogether and changed into mind alone, they then enter into Pradyumna. Passing out of Pradyumna, those foremost of twice-born ones, including both those who are conversant with Sankhya philosophy and those who are devoted to the Supreme God, then enter Sankarshana who is otherwise called Individual Soul After this divested of the three primal qualities of Goodness, Darkness, and Ignorance those foremost of twice-born ones speedily enter the Supreme Soul otherwise called Kshetrajna and which itself is above the three primal qualities. Know that Vasudeva is He called Kshetrajna Verily should you know that, that Vasudeva is the residence or original refuge of all things in the universe.

19 Only they whose minds are concentrated, who observe all sorts of restraint, whose senses are restrained, and who are devoted with their whole souls, succeed in entering Vasudeva

20 We two, O foremost of twice born ones, have taken birth in the house of Dharma Living in this charming and spacious hermitage, we are practising the austerest penances

21 We are thus employed, O twice-born one, moved by the desire of benefiting those manifestations of the Supreme God, dear to all the celestials, that will appear in the three worlds.

22 In accordance, one after another, with such ordinances as are extraordinary and as apply to us two only, O best of twice born ones, we are duly observing all excellent and high vows fraught with the austerest penances

23 You, O celestial Rishi having penances for your wealth were seen by us in White Island when you were there Having met with Narayana, you have formed a particular resolution.

24 In the three worlds consisting of mobile and immobile Beings, there is nothing that we do not know Of good or evil that will occur or has occurred or is occurring, that God of gods, O great ascetic, has informed you

25 Having heard these words of Nara and Narayana both of whom were practising the austerest penances, the celestial Rishi Narada joined his hands in respect and became entirely devoted to Narayana.

26—27. He passed his time in mental recitation, with due observances, numberless sacred Mantras that are approved by Narayana. Adoring the Supreme Deity Narayana, and worshipping those two ancient Rishis also that had taken birth in the house of Dharma, the illustrious Rishi Narada, gifted with great energy, continued to live, thus engaged, in that retreat, called Vadari, on the breast of Himavat, belonging to Nara and Narayana, for a thousand divine years.

CHAPTER CCCXLVI.

Vaishampayana said:—

1. On one occasion, while living in the hermitage of Nara and Narayana, Narada the son of Prameshthi, having duly performed the rites and observances in honor of the gods, began to perform thereafter the rites in honor of the departed manes.

2—3 Beholding him thus prepared, the eldest son of Dharma, viz, the powerful Narayana, addressed him, saying,—Whom are you adoring, O foremost of twice-born ones, by these rites and the observances in connection with the gods and the departed manes O foremost of all persons gifted with intelligence, tell me this, agreeably to the scriptures What is this that you are doing? What also are the fruits desired by you of those rites which you are performing.

Narada said —

4 You said to me formerly that rites and observances in honor of the gods should be performed You said that the rites in honor of the gods form the highest sacrifice and are equivalent to the worship of the Eternal and Supreme Soul.

5. Thus instructed, I always sacrifice in honor of the eternal and immutable Vishnu through these rites that I perform in adoring the gods It is from that Supreme Deity that Brahman, the Grandfather of all the worlds, sprang in days of yore.

6 That Brahman, otherwise called Prameshthi, filled with cheerfulness, caused my father (Daksha) to come into being I was the son of Brahman, created before all others, by his will

7. O righteous and illustrious one, I am performing these rites in honor of the departed manes for the sake of Narayana and according to those ordinances that have been ordained by himself The illustrious Narayana is the father, mother, and grandfather.

8 In all sacrifices performed in honor of the departed manes, it is that Lord of the universe who is worshipped. On one occasion, the gods, who were father, taught their children the Shrutis.

9 Having lost their knowledge of the Shrutis, the father had to acquire it again from those sons to whom they had communicated it. On account of this incident, the sons, who had thus to communicate the Mantras to their father, acquired the status of fathers.

10 Forsooth, what the gods did on that occasion is well known to you two. Sons and fathers had thus to adore each other.

11. Having first spread some blades of Kusha grass the gods and the departed manes placed three funeral cakes thereon and thus adored each other I wish to know, however, the reason why the departed manes in days of yore acquired the name of Pindas.

Nara and Narayana said —

12 The Earth, in days of yore, with her belt of seas, disappeared from the view. Govinda, taking the form of a gigantic boar, raised her up.

13. Having replaced the Earth in her former position, that foremost of Purushas, his body smeared with water and mud, began to do what was necessary for the world and its inhabitants.

14—15 When the Sun reached the meridian and the hour, therefore, came for saying the morning prayers, the powerful Lord, suddenly shaking off three balls of mud from his tusk, placed them upon the Earth, O Narada, having previously spread thereon certain blades of grass. The powerful Vishnu dedicated those balls of mud to his own self, according to the rites laid down in the eternal ordinance.

16—17. Regarding the three balls of mud that the powerful Lord had shaken off from his tusks as funeral cakes, he then, with sesame seeds that arose from the heat of his own body, himself performed the rite of dedication, sitting with face turned towards the East. That foremost of gods then, moved by the desire of establishing rules of conduct for the inhabitants of the three worlds, said these words.

Vrishakapi said —

18 I am the Creator of the worlds I am determined to create those that are to be called departed manes —Saying these words, he began to think of those high ordinances that should regulate the rites to be performed in honor of the departed manes.

19. While thus doing, he beheld that the three balls of mud, shaken off his tusk, had fallen towards the South He then said to himself,—These balls shaken off my tusk have fallen on the Earth towards the south of her surface! Led by this, I declare that these should be known henceforth by the name of departed manes.

20 Let these three that are of no particular shape, and that are only round, come to be considered as Pitris in the world! Thus do I create the eternal Pitris.

21. I am the father, the grandfather and the great grandfather and I should be considered as living in these three Pindas.

22. There is no one that is superior to me Who is there whom I myself may adore with rites? Who, again, is my father in the universe? I myself am my grand-father

23—24 I am, indeed, the Grand father and the father, I am the one cause! Having said these words, that God of gods, viz He called Vrishakapi, offered those funeral cakes, O learned Brahmana on the breast of the Varaha mountains, with elaborate rites By those rites He adored His own self, and having finished the adoration, disappeared there and then.

25 Hence the Pitris are called Pinda This is the root of the designation According to the words given vent to by Vrishakapi at that time the Pitris receive the worship offered by all.

26—27 They who celebrate sacrifices in honor of and adore the departed manes, the gods, the preceptor or other reverend senior, guests arrived at the house kine superior Brahmanas the goddess Earth and their mothers, in thought, word, and deed, are said to adore and sacrifice to Vishnu himself Entering the bodies of all existent creatures, the illustrious Lord is the Soul of all things

28 Unaffected by happiness or misery His attitude towards all is equal Gifted with greatness, and of great soul, Narayana has been said to be the soul of all things in the universe.

CHAPTER CCCXLVII.

Vaishampayana said:

1. Having heard these words of Nara and Narayana, the Rishi Narada became filled with devotion towards the Supreme Being. Indeed, with his whole soul he gave himself up to Narayana.

2. Having lived for a full thousand years in the Hermitage of Nara and Narayana, having seen the immutable Hari and heard the excellent discourse having Narayana for its theme, the celestial Rishi went to his own hermitage on the breast of Himavat

3 Those foremost of ascetics, viz, Nara and Narayana, however, continued to live in their charming hermitage of Vadari, practising the severest austerities.

4. You are born in the race of the Pandavas You are of immeasurable energy. O perpetuater of the race of the Pandavas having listened to this discourse on Narayana from the beginning, you have, in sooth been purged off of all your sins and your soul has been sanctified.

5 Neither this world nor the next world is for him, O best of kings, who hates instead of loving and respecting the immutable Hari

6. The ancestors of that person who hates Narayana, who is the foremost of gods, and is otherwise called Hari, sink into hell for good.

7 O foremost of men, Vishnu is the soul of all beings How, then can Vishnu be hated, for in hating him one would hate his own self.

8 He who is our preceptor, viz, the Rishi Vyasa, the son of Gandhavati, has himself recited this narrative to us about the glory of Narayana, that glory which is the highest and which is immutable I heard it from him and have recited it to you exactly as I heard it, O sinless one.

9 This religion with its mysteries and its abstract of details was won by Narada, O king, from that Lord of the universe, viz, Narayana himself.

10 Even such are the particulars of this great religion I have before this, O foremost of kings, explained it to you in the Hari Gita, with a brief reference to its ordinances

11 Know that the Island-born Krishna, otherwise called Vyasa, is Narayana on Earth Who else than he, O foremost of kings, could compile such a work as the Mahabharata? Who else than that powerful Rishi could describe the diverse kinds of duties and religion for the observance and adoption of men.

12 You are bent upon celebrating a great sacrifice Let that sacrifice of yours be celebrated! Having listened to the various kinds of duties and religions, let your Horse sacrifice go on.

Sauti said —

13. Having heard this great discourse, that best of kings began all those rites that are laid down in the ordinance, for the completion of his great sacrifice.

14 Accosted by you, O Shaunaka, I have duly recounted to you and all these Rishis who inhabit the Naimisha forest, that great discourse having Narayana for its theme

15. Formerly Narada had recounted it to my preceptor before many Rishis and the sons of Pandu and in the presence of Krishna and Bhishma also.

16 The Supreme god Narayana is the Lord of all the foremost of Rishis, and of the three worlds. He is the upholder of Earth herself of huge proportions He is the receptacle of the Shruti's and of the quality of humility He is the great receptacle of all those ordinances that should be practised for acquiring tranquility of heart, as also of all those who go by the name of Yama He is always accompanied by the foremost of twice-born ones. Let that great god be your refuge.

17. Hari ever does what is agreeable and beneficial to the dwellers of heaven He is always the killer of such Asuras He is the receptacle of penances He is endued with great fame. He is the killer of the Daityas known by the name of Madhu and Kaitabha He is the ordainer of the ends that are gained by persons acquainted with and observant of scriptural and other duties He removes the fears of all persons He takes the foremost of those offerings which are offered in sacrifices He is your refuge and protection.

18 He is endued with attributes. He is freed from attributes He is endued with four fold form He shares the merits originating from the dedication of tanks and the observance of similar religious rites. Undefeated and gifted with great power, it is He who always ordains the end, approachable by the Soul alone, of Rishis of pious deeds.

19 He is the witness of the worlds He is unborn He is the one ancient Purusha. Endued with clear complexion, He is the Supreme Lord, and He is the refuge of all Do all of you bow your heads to Him since He who originated from the waters (viz, Narayana himself) bends his head to Him.

20. He is the origin of the universe. He is that Being who is called Eternal He is Minute. He is the refuge upon whom all things depend He is the one Being who is immutable. The Sankhyas and Yogins, of controlled souls hold him who is eternal in their understanding.

CHAPTER CCCXLVIII.

Janamejaya said:—

1. I heard from you the glory of the divine and Supreme Soul I have heard also of the birth of Supreme God in the house of Dharma, in the form of Nara and Narayana.

2 I have also heard from you the origin of the Pinda (funeral cake) from the mighty Boar. I have heard from you about those gods and Rishis that were ordained for the religion of Action and of those that were ordained for the Religion of Renunciation.

3—4 You have also, O twice-born one, described to us other topics You have said also to us of that huge form, with the Enquine head, of Vishnu that eater of the libations and other offerings made in sacrifices —the form, viz, that appeared in the great ocean on the North-East That form was seen by the illustrious Brahman, otherwise known by the name of Parameshthi.

5 What, however, were the real features, and what the energy, the like of which among all great objects had never appeared before, of that form which Hari, the upholder of the universe, showed at that time.

6 What did Brahman do, O ascetic, after having beheld that foremost of gods, him whose like had never been witnessed before, him who was of incomparable energy, him who had the Equine head, and him who was Sacredness itself?

7. O twice born one, this doubt has occurred to us with respect to this ancient subject of knowledge. O you of foremost intelligence, why did the Supreme Deity put on that form and show himself in it to Brahman?

8 You have, forsooth, sanctified us by describing to us these various sacred topics

Sauti said:—

9 I shall recount to you that ancient history, which is quite of a piece with the Vedas, and which the illustrious Vaishampayana recited to the son of Parikshit on the occasion of the great Snake sacrifice.

10 Having heard the account of the great form of Vishnu, that had a horse-head, the royal son of Parikshit too had entertained the same doubt and put the same questions to Vaishampayana.

Janamejaya said :—

11 Tell me, O best of men, why did Hari appear in that powerful form, having a horse-head and which Brahman, the Creator, saw on the shores of the great northern Ocean on the occasion referred to by yourself?

Vaishampayana said :—

12, All existent objects, O king, in this world, are the outcome of a combination of the five principal elements, a combination due to the intelligence of the Supreme Lord.

13. The powerful Narayana, endued with infinity, is the Supreme Lord and Creator of the universe. He is the inner Soul of all things, and the giver of boons Shorn of qualities, he is again possessed of them.

14 Listen now, O best of kings, to me as I recount to you, how the Destruction of all things is encompassed At first, the element of Earth becomes merged in Water and nothing then is seen except one vast expanse of Water on all sides

15 Water then merges into Fire, and Fire into Wind Wind then merges into Ether, and Ether, in its turn, merges into Mind.

16. Mind merges into the Manifest. The Manifest merges into the Unmanifest (or Nature) The Unmanifest (or Nature) merges into Purusha (Soul) and Purusha merges into the Supreme Soul (or Brahma)

17. Then Darkness covers the universe and nothing can be seen From that primal Darkness originates Brahma Darkness is primeval and immortal.

18. Brahma that originates from primeval Darkness develops into the idea of the universe, and assumes the form of Purusha Such Purusha is called Aniruddha Shorn of sex, it is called otherwise by the name of Pradhana.

19 That is also known by the name of Manifest, or the combination of the three qualities, O best of kings! He exists with Knowledge alone for his companion That illustrious and powerful Being is otherwise called by the name of Vishwaksena or Hari.

20. Entering into Yoga-sleep, he lays himself down on the waters He then thinks of the Creation of the Universe of various phenomena and qualities.

21. While engaged in thinking of Creation, he recollects his own great qualities. From this originates the four-faced Brahman representing the Consciousness of Aniruddha.

22. The illustrious Brahman, otherwise called Hiranyagarbha, is the Grand-father of all the worlds. Having eyes like lotus petals, he takes birth within the Lotus that originates from (the navel of) Aniruddha.

23. Seated on that Lotus, the illustrious, powerful, and eternal Brahman of wonderful form saw that the waters were on all sides.

24—25 Following the quality of Goodness, Brahman, otherwise called Parameshthi, then began to create the universe In the primeval Lotus that was effulgent like the Sun, two drops of water had been thrown by Narayana that were fraught with great merit The illustrious Narayana, without beginning and without end, and above destruction, cast his eyes on those two drops of water. 644

26. One of those two drops of water, every beautiful and bright, looked like a drop of honey From that drop originates, at the behest of Narayana, a Daitya of the name of Madhu made up of the quality of Ignorance The other drop of water within the Lotus was very hard. From it originated the Daitya Kaitabha made up of the quality of Darkness.

27 Endued thus with the qualities of Ignorance and Darkness, the two Daityas possessed of might and armed with maces, immediately after their birth, began to rove within that huge primeval Lotus.

28 They saw within it Brahman of incomparable effulgence, engaged in creating the four Vedas, each gifted with the most charming form.

29 Those two foremost of Asuras, having bodies, seeing the four Vedas, suddenly seized them in the very presence of their Creator.

30 Having seized the eternal Vedas, the two powerful Danavas, quickly dived into the ocean of waters which they saw and proceeded to its bottom.

31. Seeing the Vedas forcibly taken away from him, Brahman became stricken with grief. Robbed of the Vedas thus, Brahman then addressed the Supreme Lord in these words.

Brahman said :—

32. The Vedas form my great eyes! The Vedas are my great strength! The Vedas are my great refuge! The Vedas are my high Brahma.

33. All the Vedas, however, have been by force taken away from me by the two Danavas! Deprived of the Vedas, the worlds I have created have become covered with darkness

34. Without the Vedas, how shall I succeed in starting my Creation? Alas, great is the grief I suffer for the loss of the Vedas.

35 My heart is aching, It has become the seat of a great sorrow Who is there who will save me from this ocean of grief in which I am sunk for the loss I have suffered? Who is there who will bring me the Vedas I have lost? Who is there who will take mercy on me?

36. While Brahman was saying these words, O best of kings, the resolution suddenly arose in his mind O foremost of intelligent persons, for singing the praises of Hari in these words. The powerful Brahman then, with hands joined in reverence, and seizing the feet of his progenitor, sang this highest of hymns in honor of Narayana.

Brahman said:—

37 I bow to you, O heart of Brahman! I bow to you who has been born before me! You are the origin of the universe! You are the foremost of all abodes You, O powerful one, are the ocean of Yoga with all its branches

38. You are the Creator of both what is Manifest and what is Unmanifest! You travel the path of great auspiciousness! You are the consumer of the universe. You are the inner self of all creatures. You are without any origin.

39—40 You are the refuge of the universe. You are self create, for you have no origin As for myself, I have originated from your Cheerfulness. From you have I derived my birth My first birth from you, which is considered sacred by all twice-born ones, was due to your will My second birth in days of yore was from your eyes.

41 Through your favour, my third birth was from your speech My fourth birth, O powerful Lord, was from your ears.

42 My fifth birth, excellent in all ways, was from your nose, O Lord My sixth birth was, through you, from an egg.

43 This is my seventh birth. It has taken place, O Lord, within this Lotus At each Creation I take birth from you as your son, O you who are shorn of the three qualities.

44. Indeed, O lotus-eyed one, I take birth as your eldest son, made up of the foremost of three qualities, Sattwa. You are endued with that nature which is Supreme. You originate from yourself.

45 I have been created by you The Vedas are my eyes Hence, I am above time Those Vedas, which form my eyes, have been taken away from me. I have, therefore, become blind Do you awake from this Yoga sleep Give me back my eyes. I am dear to you and you are dear to me.

46 Thus landed by Brahman, the illustrious Purusha, with face turned towards every side, then renounced his sheep, resolved to recover the Vedas Applying his Yoga power, he put on a second form.

47. His body, having an excellent nose, became as bright as the Moon He assumed an equine head of great lustre, that head which was the abode of the Vedas.

48 The sky, with all its luminaries and constellations, became the crown of his head His locks of hair were long and flowing, and had the sheen of the solar rays.

49. The regions above and below became his two ears The Earth became his forehead The two rivers Ganga and Saraswati became his two lips The two oceans became his two eye-brows.

50. The Sun and the Moon became his two eyes The twilight became his nose. The syllable Om became his memory and intelligence. The lightning became his tongue.

51. The Soma-drinking departed manes became, it is said, his teeth The two regions of happiness viz, Goloka and Brahmaloka, became his upper and lower lips. The dreadful night after universal destruction, and that is above the three qualities, became his neck.

52 Having put on this form endued with the equine head and having various things for its various limbs, the Lord of the universe disappeared then and there, and went to the nether regions.

53 Having reached those regions he began Yoga. Adopting a voice governed by the rules of the science called Shiksha, he began to chant Vedic Mantras.

54. His pronunciation was distinct and reverberated through the air, and was sweet the sound of his voice filled the nether region from end to end Gifted with the properties of all the elements, it yielded great benefits.

55 The two Asuras, making a compact with the Vedas about the time when they would return to take them up again, threw them down in the nether region, and ran towards the spot whence those sounds seemed to come 56 Meanwhile, O king, the Supreme Lord with the equine head, otherwise called Hari, who was himself in the nether region, took up all the Vedas.

57 Returning to where Brahman was living, he gave the Vedas to him Having restored the Vedas to Brahman, the Supreme Lord once more returned to his own nature The Supreme Lord also established his form with the horse-head in the North-Eastern region of the great ocean Having established him who was the abode of the Vedas, he once more became the horse-headed form that he was 59 The two Danavas Madhu and Kaitabha, not finding the person from whom those sounds came, speedily returned there They cast their eyes around but saw that the spot on which they had thrown the Vedas was vacent.

60. Proceeding quickly those two foremost of powerful Beings, rose from the nether region

61. Returning to where the primeval Lotus was that had given them birth, they saw the powerful Being, the original Creator, living in the form of Aniruddha of fair complexion and endued with a moon-like splendour.

62. Of immeasurable prowess, he was under Yoga-sleep, his body stretched on the waters and occupying a space as vast as itself.

63 Highly effulgent and endued with the pure quality of Goodness, the body of the Supreme Lord lay on the excellent hood of a snake that seemed to throw out flames of fire for the resplendence attaching to it.

64—65 Seeing the Lord thus lying, the two foremost of Danavas roared out a loud laugh Having the qualities of Darkness and Ignorance, they said—'This is that Being of white complexion He is now lying asleep. Forsooth, this one has brought the Vedas away from the nether region.

66 Whose is he? Who is he? Why is he thus asleep on the hood of a snake?' Saying these words, the two Danavas awakened Hari from his Yoga sleep.

67. The foremost of Beings, (viz., Narayana), thus awakened, understood that the two Danavas intended to fight with him. Seeing the two foremost of Asuras prepared to battle with him, he also wished to satisfy that desire of theirs.

68 Thereupon an encounter took place between those two and Narayana The Asuras Madhu and Kaitabha were embodiments of the qualities of Darkness and Ignorance Narayana killed them both for pleasing Brahman. He thence passed by the name of Madhusudana (slayer of Madhu).

69 Having brought about the destruction of the two Asuras and restored the Vedas to Brahman, the Supreme Being removed the sorrow of Brahman.

70 Helped then by Hari and assisted by the Vedas, Brahman created all the worlds with their mobile and immobile creatures

71 After this, Hari, giving to the Grandfather intelligence of the foremost order regarding the Creation, disappeared there and then for going to the place he had come from 72 It was thus that Narayana, having assumed the form equipped with the horse-head, killed the two Danavas Madhu and Kaitabha. Once more, however, he assumed the same form for making the Religion of Action to prevent the universe.

73 Thus did the blessed Hari assume in days of yore that grand form having the horse head. This, of all his forms, endued with power, is celebrated as the most ancient 74 That person who frequently listens or mentally recites this history of the assumption by Narayana of the form with the horse-head, will never forget his Vedic or other learning.

75 Having worshipped with the austerest penances the illustrious god with the horse head the Rishi Panchala acquired the science of Krama by going along the path pointed out by the god (Rudra).

76 I have thus recounted to you O king, the old story of Hayasiras agreeable to the Vedas, about which you had asked me.

77 Whatever forms the Supreme Deity wishes to assume with a view to the governing of the affairs of the universe, he assumes immediately by his own inherent powers

78 The Supreme God, endued with every prosperity is the receptacle of the Vedas He is the receptacle of Penances also. The powerful Hari is Yoga He is the embodiment of the Sankhya philosophy. He is that foremost Brahma of which we hear.

79 Truth has Narayana for its refuge. Rita has Narayana for its soul. The Religion of Renunciation in which there is no return, has Narayana for its high region.

80. The other Religion which has Action for its root, has equally Narayana for its soul. The foremost of all the qualities that belong to the element of Earth is scent Scent has Narayana for its soul.

81. The properties of Water, O king, are called the Tastes. These Tastes have Narayana for their soul. The foremost property of Fire is form. Form also has Narayana for its soul.

82. Touch, which is the property of Wind, is also said to have Narayana for its soul. Sound, which is a property of Air, has, like the others, Narayana for its soul.

83. Mind also, which is the property of Nature, has Narayana for its soul Time which is measured by the motion of the celestial luminaries has similarly Narayana for its soul.

84. The presiding gods of Fame, of Beauty, and of Prosperity, have the same Supreme Deity for their soul Both the Sankhya philosophy and Yoga have Narayana for their soul.

85 The Supreme Being is the cause of all this, as Soul He is, again, the cause of everything, as Nature.

86. He is the basis on which all things depend He is the doer or agent, and He is the cause of that variety in the universe. He is the various kinds of power which act in the universe Fifthly, he is that all-controlling unseen power of which people speak.

87. Those engaged in investigating the several subjects of enquiry with the help of such reasons as are of wide application, consider Hari to be at one with the five reasons referred to above and as the final refuge of all things.

88—89 Indeed, the powerful Narayana, endued with the highest Yoga power, is the one subject of (enquiry) Keshava perfectly knows the thoughts of men including Brahman and the great Rishis, of those that are Sankhyas and Yogins, of those that are Yatis, and of those, generally, that are conversant with the Soul, but none of these can know what his thoughts are.

90—91 Whatever acts are performed in honor of the gods or the departed manes, whatever gifts are made, whatever penances are performed, have Vishnu for their refuge,—Vishnu who is established upon his own supreme ordinances He is named Vasudeva because of his being the abode of all creatures.

92. He is immutable. He is Supreme, He is the foremost of Rishis. He is endued with the highest power. He is said to be above the three qualities As Time assumes marks when it manifests itself in the form of successive seasons, so He, though really shorn of qualities, assumes qualities (for manifesting Himself).

93 Even the high-souled do not succeed in understanding his motions. Only those foremost of Rishis who have knowledge for their Souls, succeed in seeing in their hearts that Purusha who is above all qualities.

CHAPTER CCCXLIX.

Janamejaya said:—

1. The illustrious Hari becomes favorite to them who are whole-mindedly devoted to him He accepts also all adoration that is offered to Him according to the ordinance

2 Of those persons who have freed themselves from desire, and that are shorn of both merit and demerit, you have spoken of the Knowledge they attain, as handed down from preceptor to preceptor, as the end they acquire.

3. Such persons always acquire that end which is the fourth, viz, the essence of the foremost of Purushas or Vasudeva,—through the three others Those persons, however, who are devoted to Narayana with their whole minds at once acquire the highest end.

4 Forsooth, the Religion of Devotion is superior (to that of Knowledge) and is very dear to Narayana These, without passing through the three successive stages at once attain to the immutable Hari.

5—6. The end that is attained by Brahmanas, who, practising due observances, study the Vedas with the Upanishads according to the rules laid down for such study, and by those who follow the Religion of Yatis, is inferior, I think, to that attained by persons devoted whole mindedly to Hari. Who first promulgated this Religion of Devotion? Was it some god or some Rishi who declared it.

7. What are the practices of those who are said to be devoted with their whole minds? When did those practices begin? I have doubts on those subjects. Do you dispell them Great is my curiosity to hear you explain the several points.

Vaishampayana said —

8—9 "When the diverse detachments of the Pandava and the Kuru armies were drawn up in battle array and when Arjuna became dispirited, the holy one himself explained the question of what is the end and what is not the end attained by persons of different characters. I have before this recited to you the words of the holy one. It is difficult to understand the religion preached by the holy one on that occasion. Men of impure souls cannot apprehend it at all.

10 Having created this religion in days of yore, viz., in the golden age, in perfect accordance with the Samans, it is borne, O king, by the Supreme Lord, viz., Narayana, himself.

11. This very subject was ushered by the highly blessed Partha to Narada in the midst of the Rishis and in the presence of Krishna and Bhishma.

12. My preceptor, viz., the Island-born Krishna heard what Narada said. Receiving it from the celestial Rishis, O best of kings, my preceptor gave it to me in exactly the same way in which he had got it from the celestial Rishi. I shall now recount it to you, O king, in the same way as it has been received from Narada Listen, therefore, to me.

13—14. In that cycle when the Creator Brahman, O king, took his birth in the mind of Narayana and came out from the latter's mouth, Narayana himself, performed, O Bharata, his divine and ancestral rites in accordance with this religion Those Rishis who live upon the froth of water then got it from Narayana.

15. From the froth eating Rishis, this religion was gained by the Rishis, named Vaikhanasas. From the Vaikhanasas Shoma got it. Afterwards, it disappeared from the universe.

16. After the second birth of Brahman, viz., when he originated from the eyes of Narayana, O king, the Grandfather (that is, Brahman) then received this religion from Shoma.

17—18. Having received it thus, Brahman gave this religion, which has Narayana for its soul, to Rudra. In the golden age of that ancient Kalpa, Rudra, devoted to Yoga, O king, communicated it to all those Rishis called Vaikhilyas Through the illusion of Narayana, it once more disappeared from the universe.

19 In the third birth of Brahman which was from the speech of Narayana, this religion once more sprang up, O king, from Narayana himself.

20. Then a Rishi named Suparna acquired it from that foremost of Beings.

21. The Rishi Suparna used to recite this excellent religion, three times during the day. Therefore it passed by the name of Trisauparna in the world.

22—23 This religion has been referred to in the Rigveda. The duties it enjoins are extremely difficult of observance. From the Rishi Suparna, this eternal religion was acquired, O foremost of men, by the wind god, that sustainer of the lives of all creatures in the universe. The god of wind communicated it to such Rishis as live upon the remnants of sacrificial offerings after feeding guests and others.

24. From those Rishis this excellent religion was acquired by the great Ocean. It once more disappeared from the universe and became merged into Narayana.

25. In the next birth of the great Brahman when he originated from the ear of Narayana, listen, O king, to what took place in that æon.

26 The illustrious Narayana, otherwise called Hari, when he was bent upon Creation, thought of a Being who would be powerful enough to create the universe.

27. While thinking of this a Being originated from his ears capable to create the universe. The Lord of all called him by the name of Brahman.

28 Addressing Brahman, the Supreme Narayana said,—Do you, O son, create all kinds of creatures from your mouth and feet. O you of excellent vows, I shall do what will be good for you, for I shall impart to you both energy and strength sufficient to make you competent for this work.

29 Do you receive also from me this excellent religion known by the name of Sattwata Helped by that religion do you create the golden age and ordain it duly.

30—32. Thus addressed, Brahman bowed his head to the illustrious Harimedhas and received from him that foremost of all religions with all its mysteries and abstract of details, together with the Aranyakas,—the religion which originated from the mouth of Narayana Narayana then instructed Brahman of incomparable energy in that religion, and addressing him, said —You are the creator of the duties that are to be observed in the respective cycles!—Having said this to Brahman Narayana disappeared and went to that place which is beyond the reach of Ignorance, where the unmanifest resides, and which is known by the name of acts without desire of fruits.

and Sankarshana. A fourth section adore him as having four forms, viz, Aniruddha, Pradyumna, Shankarshana, and Vasudeva.

58. Hari is Himself the Kshetrajna (Soul) He is without parts He is the Individual Soul in all creatures, getting over the five primal elements.

59 He is the Mind, O king, that directs and governs the five senses Gifted with the highest intelligence, He is the Ordainer of the universe, and the Creator thereof.

60. He is both active and inactive. He is both Cause and Effect. He is the one immutable Soul, who sports as He likes, O king.

61. Thus have I recounted to you the Religion of Devotion, O best of kings, which cannot be comprehended by persons of impure souls but which I acquired through the favour of my preceptor.

62—63 Persons are very rare, O king, who are devoted whole-mindedly to Narayana. If, O son of Kuru's race, the world had been full of such persons, who are full of universal mercy, who are possessed of the knowledge of the soul, and who are always busy with doing good to others, then the Krita age would have begun and all men would have undertaken works without desire of fruit.

64—65 It was even thus, O king, that that foremost of twice born ones, viz, the illustrious Vyasa, my preceptor, well-versed in all duties, described to king Yudhishthira the just this religion of Devotion, in the presence of many Rishis and in the hearing of Krishna and Bhishma He had got it from the celestial Rishi Narada having penances for wealth.

66 Those persons who are whole-mindedly devoted to Narayana succeed in attaining to Narayana in the end, that greatest of gods, identical with Brahma, pure in complexion, effulgent like the moon, and immutable

Janamejaya said —

67 I see that those twice-born ones whose souls have been awakened practise various kinds of duties Why is it that other Brahmanas do not practise those duties but observe other kinds of vows and rites?

Vaishampayna said:—

68. Three kinds of disposition, O king, have been created about all embodied creatures, viz, that which appertains to the quality of Goodness, that which appertains to the quality of Darkness and lastly that which appertains to the quality of Ignorance, O Bharata.

69. As regards embodied creatures, O perpetuator of Kuru's race, that person is the foremost who follows the quality of Goodness, for, O foremost of men, it is certain that he will acquire Liberation

70 It is with the help of this very quality of Goodness that one endued therewith succeeds in understanding the person who is conversant with Brahma As regards Liberation, it is entirely dependent upon Narayana Hence it is that Liberation is considered as made up of the quality of Goodness

71. By thinking of the foremost of Beings, the man who is devoted whole-mindedly to Narayana, gains great wisdom

72. Those persons who are possessed of wisdom, who follow the practices of Yatis and the Religion of Liberation — those persons whose thirst has been satisfied —always find that Hari favors them with the fruition of their desire.

73 That man subject to birth (and death) upon whom Hari casts a kind eye should be known as gifted with the quality of Goodness and devoted to the acquisition of Liberation.

74 The religion followed by a person who is devoted whole-mindedly to Narayana is considered as similar or equal in merit to the system of the Sankhyas.

75 By following that religion one acquires the highest end by attaining to Liberation which has Narayana for its soul That person upon whom Narayana looks with mercy succeeds in becoming awakened

76 No one O king, can become awakened through his own wishes That nature which partakes of both Darkness and Ignorance is said to be mixed.

77 Hari never casts a kind eye upon the person subject to birth who has such a mixed nature and who has, on that account the principle of Action in him.

78 Only Brahman, the Grandfather of the worlds cares for the person who is subject to birth and death because of his mind being overwhelmed with the two inferior qualities of Darkness and Ignorance.

79 Forsooth, the gods and the Rishis are endued with the qualities of Goodness, O best of kings! But then they who are divested of that quality in its subtle form are always considered to be of mutable nature.

Janamejaya said —

80. How can one who is subject to change succeed in attaining to that foremost Beings? Do tell me all this, which is, no doubt, known to you! Do you describe to me also of Renunciation in due order.

Vaishampayana said:—

81. When it becomes able to abstain entirely from acts, the twenty fifth, i e, the Individual Soul, succeeds in attaining to the foremost of Beings which is highly subtile, which is invested with the quality of Goodness, and which is fraught with the essences symbolised by the three letters of the alphabet (viz, A U. and M)

82. The Sankhya system, the Aranyaka-Veda, and the Pancharatra scriptures, are all identical and form parts of one whole This is the religion of those who are devoted whole mindedly to Narayana,—the religion that has Narayana for its Soul.

83 As waves of the ocean, rising from the ocean, rush away from it only to return to it in the long run so various sorts of knowledge, originating from Narayana, return to Narayana in the end.

84 I have thus explained to you, O son of Kuru's race, what the religion of Goodness is. If you be qualified for it, O Bharata, do you practise that religion duly.

85 Thus did the highly-blessed Narada explain to my preceptor,—the Island born Krishna—the eternal and immutable course called Ekanta, followed by the Whites as also by Yatis.

86. Pleased with Dharma's son Yudhisthira, Vyasa imparted this religion to king Yudhisthira the just who was endued with great intelligence Derived from my preceptor I have also communicated it to you

87. O best of kings, this religion is, for these reasons, highly difficult of practice. Others, hearing it, become as much stupefied as you have allowed yourself to be.

88. It is Krishna who is the protector of the universe and its begetter. It is He who is the destroyer and the cause, O king.

CHAPTER CCCL.

(MOKSHADHARMA PARVA)—
Continued.

Janamejaya said:—

1. The Sankhya System, the Pancharatra Scriptures and the Aranyaka-Vedas, —these different systems of knowledge or religion,—O twice born Rishi, are current in the world.

2 Do all these systems preach the same course of duties, or are the courses of duties preached by them, O ascetic, different from one another? Accosted by me, do you describe to me on Renunciation in due order!

Vaishampayana said —

3 I bow to that great Rishi who is the remover of Darkness, and whom Satyavati bore to Parashara in the midst of an island, who is endued with great knowledge and great liberality of soul.

4 The learned say that he is the origin of the Grandfather Brahman, that he is the sixth form of Narayana, that he is the foremost of Rishis, that he is endued with the power of Yoga, that as the only son of his parents he is an incarnate part of Narayana, and that, born under extraordinary circumstances on an Island, he is the undecaying receptacle of the Vedas.

5 In the Krita age, Narayana of great power and mighty energy, created him as his son. Verily, the great Vyasa is unborn and ancient and is the undecaying receptacle of the Vedas.

Janamejaya said:—

6. O best of twice born ones, it was you who said before this that the Rishi Vashishtha had a son named Shaktri and that Shaktri had a son named Parashara, and that Parashara begot a son named the Island-born Krishna gifted with great ascetic merit.

7. You tell me again that Vyasa is the son of Narayana I ask was it in some former birth that Vyasa of great energy had originated from Narayana? O you of great intelligence, do tell me of that birth of Vyasa from Narayana!

Vaishampayana said —

8 Desirous of understanding the meaning of the Shrutis, my preceptor, that sea of penances, who is greatly devoted to the observance of all scriptural duties and the acquisiton of knowledge, lived for sometime in a particular region of the Himavat mountains.

9—10. Gifted with great intelligence, he became fatigued with his penances on account of the great strain on his energies made by the composition of the Mahabharata. At that time, Sumanta and Jaimini and Paila of firm vows and myself as the fourth, and Shuka his own son, were his disciples All of us, O king, seeing the fatigue our of preceptor, waited dutifully upon him, engaged in doing all that was necessary for removing that fatigue of his.

11. Surrounded by these disciples of his, Vyasa shone on the breast of the Himavat mountains like the Lord of all the goblins, viz, Mahadeva, in the midst of those ghostly attendants of his.

12. Having recapitulated the Vedas with all their branches as also the meanings of all the Verses in the Mahabharata, one day, with rapt attention, all of us approached our preceptor who, having mastered his senses, was at time engaged in thought.

13 Availing ourselves of an interval in the conversation, we asked that foremost of twice-born ones to explain to us the meanings of the Vedas and of the Verses in the Mahabharata and describe to us the events as well of his own birth from Narayana.

14 Conversant as he was with all subjects of enquiry, he at first described to us the interpretations of the Shrutis and the Mahabharata, and then began to narrate to us the following events regarding his birth from Narayana.

Vyasa said:—

15 Listen, ye disciples to this foremost of narratives, to this best of histories that concerns the birth of a Rishi Belonging to the Krita age, this discourse has become known to me through my penances, ye twice-born ones.

16—17. On the occasion of the seventh creation, viz, that which was due to the primeval Lotus Narayana, gifted with the austerest penances, getting over both good and evil, and possessed of peerless splendour, at first created Brahman, from his navel After Brahman had come into being, Narayana addressed him saying,—

18. You have originated from my navel Gifted with power of creation, do you begin to create diverse kinds of creatures, rational and irrational

19—26 Thus addressed by his Creator, Brahman, with mind stricken with anxiety, felt the difficulty of his task and became reluctant to do what he was ordered to do Bowing his head to the boon giving and illustrious Hari, the Lord of the universe, Brahman said these words to him,—I bow to you, O Lord of the gods, but I ask what power have I to create various creatures? I have no wisdom Do you ordain what should be ordained in view of this.

21. Thus addressed by Brahman, the Lord of the universe viz, Narayana, disappeared there and then from Brahman's view. The foremost of all being gifted with intelligence, viz, the Supreme Lord, then thought of Intelligence.

22. Possessed of form that resembled the form of Hari himself, Intelligence immediately appeared before the powerful Hari. Himself above all Yoga, Narayana then with Yoga, applied the goddess of Intelligence properly.

23. The illustrious and powerful and immutable Hari, addressing the goddess of Intelligence who was gifted with activity and goodness and all the power of Yoga, said to her these words —

24. For the accomplishment of the work of creating all the worlds do you enter into Brahman!—Ordered thus by the Supreme Lord, Intelligence immediately entered Brahman.

25 When Hari saw that Brahman had become united with Intelligence, He once more addressed him, saying,—Do you now create various creatures.

26—27. Replying to Narayana by uttering the word—Yes,—Brahman reverently accepted the order of his progenitor. Narayana then disappeared from Brahman's view, and in a moment repaired to his own place known by the name of Light or Effulgence Coming back to His own disposition, Hari resolved Himself into His one universal nature.

28—29. After the work of Creation, however, had been done by Brahman, another thought arose in the mind of Narayana Indeed, He thought thus — Brahman otherwise called Parameshthi, has created all these creatures, consisting of Daityas and Danavas and Gandharvas and Rakshasas The helpless Earth has become loaded with the weight of creatures.

30 Many among the Daityas and Danavas and Rakshas on Earth will become gifted with great strength. Possessed of penances, they will at various times succeed in acquiring many excellent boons.

31 Elated with pride and power on account of those boons that they will succeed in acquiring, they will oppress and afflict the gods and the Rishis endued with ascetic power.

32. It is, therefore, proper that I should now and then lighten the burden of the Earth, by assuming various forms one after another as occasion would require.

33 I shall perform this task by punishing the wicked and supporting the righteous The Earth, which is the embodiment of Truth, will succeed in bearing her burden of creatures.

34. Assuming the form of a powerful shake I myself have to uphold the Earth in empty space. Supported by me thus, she will support the entire universe of creatures mobile and immobile. Incarnated on the Earth, therefore, in different forms, I shall have to save her at such times from danger.

35 Having thought thus, the illustrious killer of Madhu created various forms in his mind in which to appear from time to time for performing the proposed task.

36. Assuming the form of a Boar, of a Man lion, of a Dwarf, and of human beings, I shall suppress or kill such enemies of the gods as will become wicked and ungovernable.

37. After this the Prime Creator of the universe once more uttered the syllable Bhu, causing the atmosphere to resound with it From this syllable of speech arose a Rishi named Saraswat.

38, The son, thus born of the Speech of Narayana, also passed by the name of Apantara tamas. Endued with great power, he was fully conversant with the past, the present, and the future Firm in the observance of vows, he was truthful in speech

39 To that Rishi who, after birth, had bowed his head to Narayana, the latter, who was the original Creator of all the gods and possessed of immutable nature, said those words —You should bestow your attention on the distribution of the Vedas, O foremost of all persons gifted with intelligence

40 Do you, therefore, O ascetic, do what I command you!—In obedience to this command of the Supreme Lord from whose Speech the Rishi Apantaratamas came into being the latter in that Kalpa which is named from the Self born Manu, distributed and arranged the Vedas

41 For that act of the Rishi, the illustrious Hari became pleased with him, as also for his well performed penances, his vows and observances, and his control of the senses or passions

42 Addressing him Narayana said — At each cycle of Manu, O son, you will act thus about the Vedas You shall on account of this act of yours, be immutable, O twice born one, and incapable of being excelled by any one

43 When the Kali age will set in, certain princes of Bharata's line, named Kauravas, will take their birth from you They will be celebrated over the Earth as great princes ruling over powerful kingdoms.

44 Born of you, dissensions will break out among them for their destruction at one another's hands during your absence, O foremost of twice-born ones

45 In that age also, gifted with austere penances you will divide the Vedas into various classes Indeed in that dark age, your complexion will become dark.

46 You will made various kinds of duties to flow and various kinds of knowledge also. Although gifted with austere penances yet you shall never be able to free yourself from desire and attachment to the world.

47. Your son, however, will be freed from every attachment like the Supreme Soul, through the favour of Madhava. It will not be otherwise.

48—49, He whom learned Brahmanas call the mind begotten son of the Grandfather, viz, Vashishtha gifted with great intelligence and like an ocean of penances, and whose splendour excells that of the Sun himself, will be the progenitor of a family in which a great Rishi of the name of Parashara, endued with mighty energy and prowess, will take his birth That foremost of persons, that ocean of Vedas, that habitation of penances, will become your father

50 You shall take your birth as the son of a maiden living in the house of her father, through an act of sexual union with the great Rishi Parashara .

51—52 You will entertain no doubts about the meanings of things past, present, and future Gifted with penances and instructed by me you will see the incidents of thousands and thousands of ages long past away You will see through thousands and thousands of ages also in the future

53 You shall in that birth, see me, O ascetic,—me who am without birth and death,—incarnated on Earth armed with the discus All this will happen to you, O ascetic through the merit that you will acquire for your continued devotion to me. These words of mine will never be otherwise.

54 You shall be one of the foremost of creatures Great shall be your fame The Sun's son Shani (Saturn) will in a future cycle take birth as the great Manu of that period.

55 During that period, O son, you shall, as regards merits, be superior to even the Manus of the several periods Forsooth, you will be so through my favour

56 Whatever exists in the world is the result of my exertion The thoughts of others may not tally with their deeds As regards myself, however, I always ordain what I think, without the least obstacle.

57—58 Having said these words to the Rishi Apantaratamas, otherwise called by the name of Saraswat, the Supreme Lord sent him away, saying to him,—Go!—I am he that was born as Apantaratamas through the behest of Hari Once more have I taken birth as the celebrated Krishna Dwaipayana, a delighter of the race of Vashishtha.

59. I have thus told you, my dear disciples, the circumstances of my own pristine birth which was due to the favour of Narayana in so much that I was a very part of Narayana himself.

60 Ye foremost of intelligent persons, I practised, in days of yore, the austerest penances, with the help of the highest abstraction of the mind.

61. Ye sons, actuated by my great love for yourselves who are devoted to me with reverence, I have told you everything about what you wished to know from me, viz, my first birth in days gone by and that other birth subsequent to it.

Vaishampayana said:—

62. I have thus described to you, O king, the circumstances about the former birth of our revered preceptor, viz, Vyasa of unsullied mind, as asked by you! List to me once again!

63 There are various kinds of religion, O royal sage, who go by various names such as Sankhya, Yoga, the Pancharatra, Vedas, and Pashupata.

64. The promulgator of the Sankhya religion is said to be said to be the great Rishi Kapila. The primeval Hiranyagarbha, and none else, is the promulgator of the Yoga system.

65 The Rishi Apantaratamas is said to be the preceptor of the Vedas, some call that Rishi by the name of Prachina garbha.

66. The religion known by the name of Pashupata was promulgated by the Lord of Uma, that lord of all creatures, viz, the cheerful Shiva, otherwise known by the name of Shreekantha, the son of Brahman.

67. The illustrious Narayana is himself the promulgator of the religion contained in the Pancharatra Scriptures. In all these religions, O foremost of kings, it is seen that the powerful Narayana is the one sole object of exposition. According to the scriptures of these religions and the extent of knowledge they contain, Narayana is the one sole object of adoration they preach. Those persons whose minds, O king, are blinded by darkness, cannot understand that Narayana is the Supreme Soul pervading the entire universe.

69 Those wise persons who are the authors of the scriptures say that Narayana, who is a Rishi, is the one object of respectful adoration in the universe, I say that there is no other being like Him.

70. The Supreme God, called by the name of Hari, lives in the hearts of those who have succeeded in removing all doubts. Madhava never lives in the hearts of those who are under the sway of doubt and who would dispute away everything with the help of false logic.

71. They who are conversant with the Pancharatra Scriptures, who are duly observant of the duties laid down therein, and who are whole mindedly devoted to Narayana, succeed in entering into Narayana.

72 The Sankhya and the Yoga Systems are eternal All the Vedas, again, O king, are eternal. The Rishis, in all these systems of religion, have said that this universe existing from ancient times is Narayana's self.

73. You should know that whatever acts, good or bad, laid down in the Vedas and occurring in heaven and Earth, the sky between, and the waters, are all made by that ancient Rishi Narayana.

CHAPTER CCCLI.

(MOKHADHARMA PARVA).—

Continued.

Janamejaya said —

1 O twice born one, are there many souls or is there only one? Who, in the universe, is the foremost of Souls? What, again is said to be the source of all things?

Vaishampayana said:—

2 In the Sankhya and the Yoga Systems many are the Souls spoken of. O preceptor of Kurus race, those who follow these systems do not wish to assert that there is but one Purusha in the universe.

3—4. Similarly in scriptures in which the many Souls are said to have one origin in the Supreme Soul, it may be said that this entire universe is at one with that one Soul of superior attributes. I shall explain this now, after bowing to my preceptor Vyasa, that foremost of Rishis, who is conversant with the soul, endued with penances, self controlled, and worthy of respectful adoration.

5. This speculation on Purusha, O king, occurs in all the Vedas. It is well-known to be at one with Rita and Truth. The foremost of Rishis, viz., Vyasa, has thought upon it.

6. Having occupied themselves with reflection on what is called the spiritual science, various Rishis, O king, having Kapila for their first, have declared their opinions on this subject both generally and particularly.

7. Through the favour of Vyasa of great energy, I shall explain to you what Vyasa has said in brief on this question of the Oneness of Soul.

8. Regarding it is cited the old discourse between Brahman, O king, and the Three-eyed Mahadeva.

9. In the midst of the Ocean of milk, there is a very huge mountain of great effulgence like that of gold, known, O king, by the name of Vaijayanta.

10. Going there all alone, from his own abode of great splendour and happiness, the illustrious god Brahman used very often to pass his time, engaged in thinking on the course of spiritual science.

11. While the four-headed Brahman of great intelligence, was seated there, his son Mahadeva, who had originated from his forehead, met him one day in course of his travel through the universe.

12. In days of yore, the Three-eyed Shiva endued with power and high Yoga, while proceeding along the sky, saw Brahman seated on that mountain and, therefore, dropped down quickly on its top.

13. With a cheerful heart he appeared before his progenitor and adored his feet. Seeing Mahadeva prostrated at his feet, Brahman took him up with his left hand.

14. Having thus raised Mahadeva up, Brahman, that powerful and one Lord of all creatures, then addressed his son, whom he met after a long time in these words.

Vedic studies. It is all right, again, with the universe.

18. I saw your illustrious self a long while ago in your own home of happiness and effulgence! I am coming thence to this mountain that is now the habitation of your feet.

19. My mind is filled up with great curiosity for your thus coming into such a secluded spot from your usual region of happiness and splendour. There must be great reason, O Grandfather, for such an act.

20—21. Your own foremost of abodes is free from the pains of hunger and thirst, and inhabited by both gods and Asuras, by Rishis of great splendour, as also by Gandharvas and Apsaras. Leaving such a spot of happiness, you live alone in this foremost of mountains. The cause of this cannot but be weighty.

Brahman said:—

22. This foremost of mountains, called Vaijayanta, is always my abode. Here, with concentrated mind, I meditate on the one Universal Soul of infinite proportions.

Rudra said:—

23. Self create you are. Many are the Souls that have been created by you. Others again, O Brahman, are being created by you. The Infinite Soul, however, of whom you speak, is one and single.

24. Who is that foremost of Souls, O Brahman, that is being meditated by you? Great is my curiosity about it. Do you kindly remove the doubt that has possessed my mind!

Brahman said:—

25. O son, many are those Souls of whom you speak. The one Soul, however, of whom I am thinking, transcends all Souls and is invisible.

CHAPTER CCCLII.

Brahman said :—

1. Listen, O son, as to how that Soul is indicated. He is eternal and immutable. He is undecaying and immeasurable. He pervades all things.

2. O best of all creatures, that soul cannot be seen by you or me, others Those who are endued with the understanding and the senses but shorn of self-control and tranquillity of soul cannot see him. The Supreme Soul is said to be one that can be seen with the help of knowledge alone.

3. Though shorn of body, He lives in every body. Though living, again, in bodies He is never touched by the acts done by those bodies.

4. He is my inner soul. He is your inner soul He is the omniscient Witness living within all embodied creatures and engaged in marking their acts.* No one can grasp or comprehend him at any time.

5 The universe is the crown of his head. The universe is his arms The universe is his feet. The universe is his eyes. The universe is his nose Alone and single, he passed through all bodies, unrestrained by any limitations on his will and as best as it likes him.

6. Keshetra is another name for body And because he knows all bodies as also all good and bad acts, therefore, he, who is the soul of Yoga, is called by the name of Kshetrajna.

7—9 No one succeeds in perceiving how he enters into embodied creatures and how he goes out of them According to the Sankhya mode, as also with the help of Yoga and the due observance of the ordinances prescribed by it, I am engaged in thinking of the cause of that Soul but, alas, I am unable to comprehend that cause, excellent as it is. I shall, however, according to the extent of my knowledge describe to you that eternal Soul and his Oneness and supreme greatness The learned speak of him as the one Soul That one eternal Being deserves the appellation of the great Supreme Purusha.

10. Fire is an element, but it may be seen to burn up in a thousand places under thousand different circumstances. The Sun is one and single, but his rays extend over the wide universe. Penances are of various kinds, but they have one common origin whence they have originated. The Wind is one, but it blows in various forms in the world. The great Ocean is the one parent of all the waters in the world seen under various circumstances. Shorn of qualities, that one Soul is the universe shown in infinitude. Originating from him, the infinite universe enters into that one Soul again who is above all qualities, when the time for its destruction comes.

11. By renouncing the consciousness of body and the senses, by renouncing all acts good and bad by renouncing both truth and falsehood, one succeeds in divesting oneself of qualities.

12. The person who realises that inconceivable Soul and comprehends his subtle existence in the four-fold form of Aniruddha, Pradyumna, Sankarshana, and Vasudeva, and who, on account of such comprehension, acquires perfect tranquillity of heart, succeeds in entering into, and identifying himself with, that one auspicious Soul.

13 Some persons endued with learning speak of Him as the Supreme Soul. Others hold Him as the One Soul. A third class of learned men describe Him as the Soul.

14. The truth is that He who is the Supreme Soul is always shorn of qualities. He is Narayana. He is the Universal Soul, and He is the One Purusha. He is never affected by the fruits of deeds as the leaf of the lotus is never drenched by the water one may throw upon it.

15 The acting Soul is different. That Soul is sometimes engaged in acts and when it succeeds in renouncing acts acquires Liberation or identity with the Supreme Soul

16. The acting Soul is endued with the seventeen possessions. Thus is it said that there are innumerable kinds of Souls in due order.

17 In sooth, however, there is but one Soul He is the abode of all the ordinances in the universe He is the highest object of knowledge He is at once the knower and the object to be known. He is at once the thinker and the object of thought. He is the eater and the food that is eaten. He is the smeller and the scent that is smelled. He is at once he that touches and the object that is touched.

18. He is the agent that sees and the object that is seen. He is the hearer and the object that is heard. He is the conceiver and the object conceived. He is possessed of qualities and is free from them. He is that, O son, which is named Pradhana (Nature), enduring, eternal, and immutable.

19. He it is who creates the prime ordinance about Dhatri himself. Learned Brahmanas call Him by the name of Aniruddha Whatever acts, of excellent merits and blessings, originate in the world from the Vedas, have been caused by Him.

20 All the gods, and all the Rishis, gifted with tranquil souls, occupying their places on the altar, dedicate to Him the first share of their sacrificial offerings.

21. I, that am Brahman, the primeval Master of all creatures, have come into being from Him, and you have sprung from me From me has originated the universe with all its mobile and immobile creatures, and all the Vedas, O son, with their mysteries

22 Divided into four parts, (viz, Aniruddha, Pradyumna, Sankarshana, and Vasudeva). He sports as He pleases That illustrious and divine Lord is such, awakened by His own knowledge.

23 I have thus answered you, O son, according to your questions, and according to the way in which the matter is explained in the Sankhya System and the Yoga Philosopy."

CHAPTER CCCLIII.

Santi said:—

1. "After Vaishampayana had explained to king Janamejaya in this way the glory of Narayana, he began to describe another subject by reciting the question of Yudhishthira and the answer that Bhishma gave in the presence of all the Pandavas and the Rishis as also of Krishna himself. Indeed, Vaishampayana began by saying what follows."

Yudhisthira said —

"You have, O grandfather, described to us the duties belonging to the Religion of Liberation. You should now tell us what the foremost duties are of persons belonging to the several modes of life"

Bhishma said —

2 "The duties ordained with regard to every mode of life are capable, if well performed, of leading to heaven and the high rut of Truth Duties have many doors and none of the practices enjoined by them fails to produce the desired effect.

3 Whoever adopts a class of duties with steady and firm faith, praises the duties adopted by him to the exclusion of the rest, O chief of Bharata's race.

4 This particular subject, however, which you wish me to describe was in days of yore the subject of conversation between the celestial Rishi Narada and the king of the gods, viz, Indra.

5. The great Rishi Narada, O king, adored of all the world, has been crowned with success He wanders through all the worlds unimpeded, like the all pervading wind itself.

6. Once upon a time he went to the abode of Indra. Duly honored by the king of the gods, he sat close to his host.

7 Seeing him seated at his ease and free from exhaustion, the husband of Shachi addressed him, saying,—O great Rishi, is there any thing wonderful that has been seen by you, O sinless one?

8 O twice-born Rishi, crowned with ascetic success, you walk about moved by curiosity, through the universe of mobile and immobile objects, seeing all things.

9 O celestial Rishi, there is nothing in the universe which you do not know. Do you tell me, therefore, of any wonderful event which you may have seen, or heard of, or felt.

10 Thus questioned, Narada, that foremost of speakers, O king, then began to recite to the king of the gods the extensive history that follows

11. Listen now to me as I recount that story which Narada told before Indra. I shall describe it in the same way in which the celestial Rishi had described it, and for the same purpose that he had in view."

CHAPTER CCCLIV.

(MOKSHADHARMA PARVA).— Continued.

Bhishma said —

1. "In a beautiful town called by the name of Mahapadma which was situate on the southern side of the river Ganga, there lived, O best of men, a Brahmana of concentrated Soul

2. Born in the family of Atri he was amiable by nature All his doubts had been removed and he was well conversant with the path he was to follow. Ever practising the duties of religion, he had a complete hold over his passion Always contented, he was the perfect master of his senses.

3 Given to penances and the study of the Vedas, he was respected by all good men He acquired riches by fair means and his conduct in all things tallied with the mode of life he led and the order to which he belonged.

4. The family to which he belonged was large and famous He had many kinsmen and relatives, and many children and wives His conduct was always respectable and faultless.

5. Observing that he had many children, the Brahmana began to perform religious acts on a large scale. His religious observances, O king, were according to the customs of his own family.

6 The Brahmana thought that there were three kinds of duties laid down for observances There were, first, the duties ordained in the Vedas about the order in which he was born and the mode of life he was leading. There were, secondly, the duties sanctioned in the scriptures, viz., those especially called the Dharmashastras. And, thirdly, there were those duties that eminent and revered men of ancient times have followed, though not laid down either in the Vedas or the Scriptures.

7. Which of these duties should I follow? Which of them, again, followed by me, are likely to produce my benefit? Which, indeed, should be my refuge?—Thoughts like these always troubled him. He could not solve his doubts.

8 While troubled with such thoughts a Brahmana of concentrated soul and observant of a very superior religion, came to his house as a guest.

9 The house-holder duly respected his guest according to those ordinances of worship that are laid down in the scriptures Seeing his guest refreshed and seated at ease, the host addressed him in the following words.

CHAPTER CCCLV.

The Brahmana said:—

1. O sinless One, I have become greatly attached to you on account of the sweetness of your conversation. You have become my friend. Listen to me, for I wish to say something to you

2. O foremost of Brahmanas, making over the duties of a house-holder to my son, I wish to satisfy the last great duties of man. What, O twice-born one, should be my path?

3 Relying upon the soul, I wish to acquire existence in the One Soul Alas, fettered by the bonds of attachment, I have not the heart to actually perform that task.

4. And since the best portion of my life has passed away as a house-holder, I wish to devote the remaining part of my life in acquiring the means of defraying the expenses of my journey in respect of the time to come.

5 The desire has originated in my mind of crossing the ocean of the world. Alas, whence shall I get the vessel of religion?

6—7. Hearing that the very gods are persecuted and made to suffer the fruits of their deeds, and seeing the rows of Yama's standards and flags floating over the heads of all creatures, my heart fails to derive pleasure from the various objects of pleasure with which it comes into contact. Seeing also that the Yatis depend for their maintenance upon alms obtained in course of their rounds of mendicancy, I have no respect for the religion of the Yatis as well. O my reverend guest, do you, helped by that religion which is founded upon the basis of intelligence and reason, make me observe a particular course of duties and observances.

Bhishma said:—

8. Gifted with great wisdom, the guest hearing this speech of his host which was consistent with virtue, said these sweet words in a melodious voice.

The Guest said.—

9 I also am confounded about this subject The same thought occupies my mind. I am unable to arrive at certainty of conclusion. Heaven has many doors.

10 There are some that speak highly of Liberation. Some twice-born persons praise the fruits acquired by the performance of sacrifices. Some there are who take refuge in the forest mode of life. Some, again, follow the domestic mode of life.

11. Some depend upon the merits attainable by an observance of the royal duties Some depend upon the fruits of that culture which consists in the control of the soul. Some think that the merits originating from a dutiful obedience to preceptors and teachers are efficacious. Some follow control of speech.

12. Some by waiting dutifully upon their mothers and fathers, have gone to heaven.

Some have ascended to heaven by practising the duty of mercy, and some by practising Truth

13 Some rush to battle, and sacrificing their lives have attained to heaven Some again acquiring success by practising the vow called Unccha, are following the path of heaven

14 Some have given themselves up to the study of the Vedas Endued with auspiciousness and wedded to such study, these men, gifted with intelligence, and tranquil souls, and having their senses under complete control, attain to Heaven

15 Others, marked by simplicity and truth have been killed by wicked men Gifted with pure souls, such men of truth and simplicity, have become respected inhabitants of heaven

16. In this world, it is seen, that men go to heaven through a thousand doors of duty all standing wide open My understanding has been troubled by your question, like a cloud before the wind

(MOKHARDHARMA PARVA) — Continued.

The Guest said —

1 For all that, O Brahmana I shall try to instruct you duly Listen to me as I recount to you what I have heard from my preceptor

2 In that place whence in course of a former creation, the wheel of virtue was set in motion in that forest which is known by the name of Naimisha, and which is situate on the banks of the Gomati, there is a city called Nagapura

3 There, in that region all the gods, assembled together had in days of yore celebrated a grand sacrifice There the foremost of earthly kings, Mandhatri, defeated Indra, the king of the gods.

4 A powerful Naga, of righteous soul, lives in the city that stands in that region That great Naga is known by the name of Padmanabha or Padma

5. Walking in the three fold path (of acts knowledge and adoration) he pleases all creatures in thought, word, and deed

6 Thinking upon all things with great care, he protects the virtuous and punishes the wicked by following the four fold policy of conciliation, creating dissensions making gifts or giving bribes, and using force

7 Going there, you should put to him the questions you wish He will show you truly what the highest religion is.

8 That Naga is always fond of guests Gifted with great intelligence, he is well conversant with the Scriptures. He possesses all desirable virtues the like of which are not to be seen in any other person.

9 By nature he does those duties which are performed with or in water He is given to the study of the Vedas He is endued with penances and self-control. He has great riches

10 He celebrates sacrifices, makes gifts, abstains from doing injury, and practises forgiveness His conduct is in every way good Truthful in speech and shorn of malice, his conduct is good and his senses are under proper control

11 He eats after feeding all his guests and attendants He is kind of speech. He has knowledge of what is good and what is simple and right and what is censurable He takes an account of what he does and what he leaves undone He never acts with hostility towards any one. He is always engaged in doing what is good to all creatures He belongs to a family which is as pure and stainless as the water of a lake in the midst of the Ganges.

CHAPTER CCCLVII

(MOKSHADHARMA PARVA) — Continued

The Host replied —

1 I have heard these words of yours, that are so consoling, with as much satisfaction as is experienced by a person heavily loaded when that load is taken off his head or shoulders

2—4 The pleasure which a traveller who has made a long journey on foot feels when he lies down on a bed, that which a person feels when he finds a seat after having stood for a long time for want of room or that which is felt by a thirsty person when he finds a glass of cool water, or that which is felt by a hungry man when he finds good food set before him or that which a guest feels when a dish of desirable food is placed before him at the proper time, or that which is felt by an old man when after long coveting he gets a son or that which is felt by one when meeting with a dear friend or relative about whom he had become highly anxious resembles that with which I have been filled on account of these words given vent to by you

5. Like a person with upturned look I have heard what has fallen from your lips and am thinking upon their meaning With these wise words of yours, you have truly instructed me!

6. Yes, I shall do what you have ordered me to do You may go tomorrow early in the morning, passing the night happily with me and removing your fatigue by such rest.

7. See, the rays of the divine Sun have been partially dimmed and the god of day is going in his downward course!

Bhishma continued:—

8 Hospitably treated by that Brahmana, the learned guest, O destroyer of enemie, passed that night in the company of his host.

9 Indeed, both of them passed the night happily, conversing cheerfully with each other on the subject of the duties of the fourth mode of life, viz., Sannyasa So engrossing was their conversation that the night passed away as if it were day.

10 When morning came, the guest was adored with due rites by the Brahmana, who was bent upon doing what was considered by him to be benefical for himself.

11. Having dismissed his guest, the virtuous Brahmana, determined to achieve his purpose, took leave of his kinsmen and relatives, and started in due time for the abode of that foremost of Nagas, with heart firmly directed towards it.

CHAPTER CCCLVIII.

(MOKSHADHARMA PARVA)— Continued.

Bhishma said:—

1. Proceeding by many charming forests and lakes and sacred waters, the Brahmana at last arrived at the asylum of a certain ascetic.

2. Going there, he enquired of him, in proper words, about the Naga of whom he had heard from his guest, and instructed by him he pursued his journey.

3. With a clear idea of the object of his journey, the Brahman then reached the house of the Naga. Entering it duly, he announced his arrival in proper words, saying,—Ho! who is there! I am a Brahmana come here as a guest!

4. Hearing these words, the chaste wife of the Naga, endued with great beauty and devoted to the observance of all duties, showed herself

5 Always attentive to the duties of hospitality, she adored the guest with due rites, and welcoming him, said,—What can I do for you?

The Brahmana said:—

6 O lady, I am sufficiently honored by you with the sweet words you have said unto me. The fatigue of my journey has also been removed. I wish, O blessed lady, to see your excellent husband.

7 This is my great object. This is the one object of my desire It is for this reason that I have come to day to the house of the Naga your husband.

The Wife of the Naga said:—

8 Reverend Sir, my husband has gone to drag the car of the Sun for a month. O learned Brahmana, he will return in fifteen days, and will, forsooth, appear before you

9 I have thus told you the reason of my husband's absence from home. Be that, as it may, what else is there that I can do for you? Tell me this.

The Brahmana said:—

10. O chaste lady, I have come here with the object of seeing your husband. O reverend dame, I shall live in the adjacent forest, waiting for his return.

11 When your husband returns, do kindly tell him that I have arrived at this palace actuated by the desire of seeing him. You should also inform me of his return when that event takes place.

12 O blessed lady, I shall, till then, live on the banks of the Gomati, waiting for his return and living restricted diet.

13 Having said this repeatedly to the wife of the Naga, that foremost of Brahmanas went to the banks of the Gomati for living there till the time of Naga's return.

CHAPTER CCCLIX.

(MOKSHADHARMA PARVA).— Continued.

Bhishma said:—

1. These Nagas of that city became greatly distressed when they saw that that Brahmana, devoted to the practice of penances, continued to live in the forest, entirely abstaining from food, in expectation of the arrival of the Naga king.

2 All the kinsmen and relatives of the great Naga, including his brothers and children and wife, assembling together went to the spot where the Brahmana was living

3 Arrived on the banks of the Gomati, they saw that twice born one seated in a solitary place, abstaining from food of every sort, observant all the while of excellent vows and engaged in silently reciting certain Mantras

4 Approaching the Brahmana and offering him due adorations, the kinsmen and relatives of the great Naga said to him these candid words

5 O Brahmana having asceticism, for your riches, that is the sixth day of your arrival here, but you speak no word about your food, O twice born one you are devoted to virtue

6 You have come to us. We too are here in attendance upon you It is absolutely necessary that we should do the duties of hospitality by you We are all relations of the Naga king with whom you have business

7 Roots or fruit, leaves, or water, or rice or meat, O best of Brahmanas, you should take for food

8 For your living in this forest under such circumstances of total abstention from food, the whole community of Nagas young and old is being aggrieved, since this your fast implies negligence on our part to discharge the duties of hospitality

9 We have none amongst us who has has been guilty of Brahmanicide None of us has been guilty of Brahmanicide None of us has ever lost a son immediately after birth No one has ever lost a son immediately after birth No one has been born in our race who has eaten before serving the gods or guests or relatives arrived at his house.

The Brahmana said —

10 On account of these solicitations of you all, I may be considered to have broken my fast Eight days remain when the king of the Nagas will return

11 If on the expiry of the eighth night hence, the king of the Nagas do not come back, I shall then break this fast by eating Indeed, this vow of abstaining from all food that I am observing is on account of my respect for the Naga king.

12 You should not grieve for what I am doing, Do you all return to whence you came This my vow is on his account You should not do anything on account of which this my vow may be broken.

13 The assembled Nagas, thus addressed by the Brahmana, were sent away by him, whereupon, O foremost of men, they returned to their respective quarters

CHAPTER CCCLX.

(MOKSHADHARMA PARVA) — Continued.

Bhishma said —

1. Upon the expiry of full fifteen days, the Naga king (Padmanabha), having finished his task of dragging the car of the Sun and obtained the latter's permission, returned to his own house.

2—3 Seeing him return, his wife approached him quickly for washing his feet and dutifully satisfying other tasks of a similar nature Having performed these tasks, she sat by his side The Naga then refreshed from fatigue, addressed his dutiful and chaste wife, saying,—I hope, my dear wife, that during my absence you have not neglected to adore the gods and guests according to the instructions I gave you, and according to the ordinances laid down in the scriptures

4 I hope, without yielding to that impure understanding which is natural to persons of your sex, you have, during my absence from home, been firm in the observance of the duties of hospitality I trust that you have not gone beyond the barriers of duty and virtue

5 The duty of disciples is to wait respectfully upon their preceptor for doing his bidding, that of Brahmanas is to study the Vedas and bear them in memory, that of servants is to obey the commands of their masters, that of the king is to protect his people by supporting the good and punishing the wicked.

6 It is said that the duties of a Kshatriya are the protection of all creatures from wrong and oppression

7 The duty of the Shudra is to serve with humility persons of the twice born orders, viz, Brahmanas and Kshatriyas and Vaishyas The religion of the householder, O king of the Nagas, consists in doing good to all creatures

8 Frugality of fare and observance of vows in due order, form merit (for persons of all classes) on account of the connection that exists between the senses and the duties of religion.

9 Who am I? Whence have I come? What are others to me and what am I to others?—these are the thoughts to which the mind should ever be given by him who leads that course of life which leads to Liberation.

10. Chastity and obedience to the husband form the highest duty of the wife Through your instructions, O king of the Nagas, I have learnt this well.

11. I, therefore, that am well versed in my duty, and that have you for my husband —you who are devoted to virtue,—O, why shall I, falling off from the path of duty, tread along the path of disobedience and sin?

12. During your absence from home, the adorations to the gods have not suffered in any respect. I have also, without the slightest negligence, performed the duties of hospitality towards persons arrived as guests in your house.

13. Fifteen days ago a Brahmana has come here. He has not given out his object to me. He wishes to see you.

14. Living on the banks of the Gomati, he is anxiously expecting your return. Of rigid vows, that Brahmana is sitting there, engaged in the recitation of Brahma.

15 O king of the Nagas, I have made a promise to him that I would send you to him as soon as you would return to your house.

16 Hearing these words of men, O best of Nagas, you should go there O you who hear with your eyes, you should grant to that twice born person the object that has brought him there."

CHAPTER CCCLXI.

(MOKSHADHARMA PARVA)—Continued.

The Naga said —

1. O you of sweet smiles, for whom have you taken that Brahmana? Is he really a human being or is he some god that has come here in the disguise of a Brahmana?

2 O you of great fame, who is there among men who would be desirous of seeing me or that would be competent for the purpose? Can a human being, desiring to see me leave such a command with you about sending me to him for paying him a visit at the place where he is living?

3. Amongst the gods and Asuras and celestial Rishis, O amiable lady, the Nagas are endued with great energy Having great speed, they are endued again with excellent fragrance.

4. They deserve to be adored. They are capable of granting boons Indeed, we too deserve to the followed by others I tell you, O lady, that we cannot be seen by human beings

The Wife of the Naga King said :—

5 Judging by his simplicity and candour I know that that Brahmana is not any god who lives on air. O you of great anger, I also know this, viz, that he respects you with all his heart.

6. He seeks the accomplishment of some object that depends upon your help. As the bird called Chataka, which is fond of rain, waits in earnest expectation of a shower, so is that Brahmana waiting in expectation of a meeting with you.

7. Let no calamity befall him on account of his inability to obtain a sight of you No person born like you in a respectable family can be considered to remain respectable by neglecting a guest arrived at his house.

8 Renouncing that anger which is natural to you you should go and see that Brahmana. You should not allow yourself to be consumed by disappointing that Brahmana.

9 The king or the prince, by refusing to wipe the tears of persons who come to him from hopes of relief, commits the sin of fœticide By abstaining from speech one acquires wisdom.

10 By practising gifts one acquires great fame By observing truthfulness of speech, one acquires the gift of eloquence and comes to be respected in heaven

11 By giving away land one acquires that high end which is ordained for Rishis leading the sacred mode of life By acquiring riches through fair means, one succeeds in acquiring many desirable fruits.

12 By doing in full what is good for oneself, one can avoid going to hell This is what the righteous say.

The Naga said —

13. I had no arrogance On account, however, of my birth, my pride was considerable. Of anger which is born of desire, O blessed lady, I have none. It has all been consumed by the fire of your excellent instructions.

14 I do not see, O blessed lady, any darkness that is thicker than anger On account, however, of the Nagas having excess of anger, they have become objects of reproach with all persons.

15. By yielding to the influence of anger, the ten-headed Ravana of great prowess, became the rival Shakra and was for that reason killed by Rama in battle.

16 Hearing that the Rishi Rama of Bhrigu's race had entered the inner apartments of their palace for bringing away the calf of the Homa cow of his father, the sons of Karttaviryya, yielding to anger, took such entry as an insult to their royal house, and as the result thereof, they met with destruction at the hands of Rama.

17 Indeed, Karttaviryya of great strength, resembling the thousand eyed Indra himself, on account of his having yielded to anger, was killed in battle by Rama of Jamadagni's race.

18 Verily, O amiable lady, at your words I have controlled my anger, that enemy of penances, that destroyer of all that is beneficial for myself.

19 I praise my own self greatly since, O large eyed one, I am fortunate enough to have you as my wife,—you who are possessed of every virtue and who have inexhaustible merits.

20 I shall now proceed to that spot where the Brahmana is living. I shall certainly address that Brahmana in proper words, and he shall certainly go hence, his wishes bing done.

CHAPTER CCCLXII.

(MOKSHADHARMA PARVA).—

Continued.

Bhishma said:—

1. Having said these words to his dear wife, the king of the Nagas proceeded to that place where the Brahmana was sitting in exposition of an interview with him As he went, he thought of the Brahmana and wondered as to what the business could be that had brought him to the Naga city.

2. Arrived before him, O king of men, that foremost of Nagas, devoted by his nature to virtue, addressed his guest in sweet words, saying —O Brahmana, do not give way to anger I address you in peace! Do not be angry! For whom have you come here? What is your object?

4. Coming to you, I ask you in love, O twice-born one! Whom do you worship in this retired spot on the banks of the Gomati?

The Brahmana said:—

5. Know that my name is Dharmaranya, and that I have come here for seeing the Naga Padmanabha, O foremost of all twice-born persons! With him I have some business!

6 I have heard that he is not at home and that, therefore, I am not now near his present habitation. Like a Chataka waiting in expectation of the clouds, I am waiting for him whom I consider as dear to me!

7. For removing all evil from him and bringing about what is good to him, I am engaged in reciting the Vedas till he comes and am in Yoga and passing my time happily!

The Naga said.—

8. Indeed, your conduct is highly good. Pious you are and devoted to the well-being of all pious persons. O highly blessed Brahmana, every praise is due to you? You see the Naga with eyes of affection.

9 I am that Naga, O learned Rishi, whom you seek! Do you order me, as you wish, in respect of what is agreeable to you and what I should do for you!

10. Having heard from my wife that you are here, I have to come this spot, O twice-born one, for seeing you!

11. When you have come here, you are certain to return hence with your object fulfilled You should, O foremost of twice-born persons, employ me to any task with all confidence!

12. All of us have certainly been purchased by you with your merits, since you disregarding what is for your own good, has employed your time in seeking the well-being of ourselves!

The Brahmana said:—

13. O highly blessed Naga, I have come here, actuated by the desire of seeing you! I have come here, ignorant as I am with all things, for asking you about something, O snake!

14 Relying on the Soul, I wish to attain to the Supreme Soul which is the end of the Individual Soul I am neither attached to, nor dissociated from, the world.

15 You shine with the effulgence of your own merits covered by fame,—with an effulgence that is as sweet as that of the moon.

16 O you who subsist on air only, do you first answer a question that I wish to put to you! Afterwards I shall inform you of the object with which I have come here.

CHAPTER CCCLXIII.
(MOKSHADHARMA PARVA)—
Continued.

The Brahmana said —

1. You go for dragging the one-wheeled car of Vivaswat according to your turn. You should describe to me anything wonderful that you may have seen in those regions through which you pass.

The Naga said —

2. The divine Sun is the refuge or home of numberless wonders All the creatures that inhabit the three worlds have sprung from the Sun.

3 Numberless Munis, crowned with ascetic success, together with all the gods, live in the rays of the Sun, like birds perching on the branches of trees

4. What, again, can be more wonderful than this that the powerful Wind, emanating from the Sun, takes refuge in his rays and thence yawns over the universe?

5. What can be more wonderful than this, O twice-born Rishi, that the Sun, dividing the Wind into many parts from desire of doing good to all creatures, creates rain that falls in the rainy season?

6. What can be more wonderful than this that the Supreme Soul, from within the solar disc, himself bathed in burning effulgence, looks upon the universe?

7. What can be more wonderful than this that the Sun has a black ray which changes itself into clouds charged with rain and pours showers of rain when the season comes?

8 What can be more wonderful than this that drinking up for eight months the rain he pours down, he pours it down again in the rainy season?

9 In certain rays of the Sun, the Soul of the universe is said to live From Him is the seed of all things, and it is He that supports the Earth with all her mobile and immobile creatures.

10. What can be more wonderful, O Brahmana, than this that the foremost of Purushas, eternal and mighty-armed, endued with great effulgence, eternal, and without beginning and without end, lives in the Sun?

11. Listen, however, to one thing I shall tell you now. It is the wonder of wonders I have seen it in the clear sky, on account of my nearness to the Sun.

12. In former times, one day at the hour of noon, while the Sun was shining in all his glory and giving heat to everything, we saw a Being coming towards the Sun who seemed to shine with effulgence that was equal to that of the Sun himself.

13 Making all the worlds shine up with his glory and filling them with his energy, he came, as I have already told you towards the Sun, rending the sky, as it were, for passing through it.

14 The rays that came out of his body seemed to resemble the blazing effulgence of libations of clarified butter poured into the sacrificial fire On account of his energy and splendour he could not be looked at His form seemed to be indescribable. Indeed, he appeared to us to be like a second Sun.

15 As soon as he came near the Sun extended his two hands For honouring the Sun in return, he also extended his right-hand

16 The latter then, piercing through the sky, entered into the Sun's disc. Mingling then with the Sun's energy he seemed to be changed into the Sun's self

17 When the two energies thus met together, we were so confounded that we could not any longer make out which was which. Indeed, we could not make out who was the Sun whom we bore on his car, and who was the Being that we had seen coming through the sky

18 Filled with confusion, we then addressed the Sun, saying —O illustrious one, who is this Being who has mixed himself with you and has been changed into your second self.

CHAPTER CCCLXIV.
(MOKSHADHARMA PARVA)—
Continued.

Surya said :—

1 This Being is not the god of the fire; he is not an Asura Nor is he a Naga. He is a Brahmana who has attained to heaven on account of his having been crowned with success in the observance of the vow called Uncha.

2 This person had lived upon fruit and roots and upon the fallen leaves of trees He had sometimes lived upon water and sometimes upon air alone, passing his days with concentrated soul

3 The god Mahadeva had been propitiated by him with constant recitation of the Samhitas He had tried to perform those deeds which lead to heaven Through the merits of those acts he has now attained to heaven.

4. Without riches and without desire of any kind he had observed the vow called Uncha with regard to his food This learned Brahmana, ye Nagas, had been devoted to the good of all creatures.

5 Neither gods, nor Gandharvas, nor Asuras, nor Nagas, can be considered as superior to those creatures who attain to this excellent end of coming into the solar disc Even such, O twice born one, was the wonderful incident that I saw on that occasion

6 That Brahmana, who was crowned with success by the observance of the Unccha vow and who thus obtained an end that persons crowned with ascetic success gain, to this day, O twice born one, goes round the Earth, staying in the disc of the Sun

CHAPTER CCCLXV.

(MOKSHADHARMA PARVA) — Continued.

The Brahmana said —

1 Forsooth, this is highly wonderful, O Naga I have been highly pleased by listening to you. By these words of yours that are fraught with subtile meaning you have shown me the way I am to follow

2 Blessed be you I wish to depart hence, O best of Nagas You should remember me now and then and enquire after me by sending your servants.

The Naga said :—

3 The object that brought you here is still in your mind, for you have not as yet given it out to me Where then will you go? Tell me, O twice born one, what should be done by me and what that object is which brought you here

4 After the fulfilment of your business, whatever it is, expressed or unexpressed in speech, you may depart O foremost of twice born persons, saluting me and dismissed by me cheerfully, O you of excellent vows

5 You have conceived a friendship for me O twice born Rishi you should not depart from this place after having only seen me, yourself sitting under the shade of this tree.

6 You have become dear to me and I have become dear to you All the persons in this city are yours What objection then O sinless one you have to pass some time in my house?

The Naga said —

7 It is even so O you of great wisdom, O Naga who have acquired a knowledge of the Soul It is very true that the gods are not superior to you in any respect.

8 He that is yourself is verily myself, as he that is myself is truly yourself. Myself yourself and all other creatures, shall all have to enter into the Supreme Soul

9 A doubt had entered my mind, O king of Nagas, in the matter of the best means for acquiring virtue or merit That doubt has been removed by your discourse, for I have learnt the value of the Unccha vow.

10 I shall hence follow that vow which is so very efficacious in producing beneficial consequences That, O blessed one, has become my certain conclusion now, based on good reasons I take your leave Blessings to you. My object has been done, O Naga.

CHAPTER CCCLXVI.

(MOKSHADHARMA PARVA) — Continued.

Bhishma said —

1 Having saluted that foremost of Nagas in this way, the Brahmana, firmly resolved to follow the Unccha mode of life went O king to Chyavana of Bhrigu's race from desire of being formally instructed and initiated in that vow.

2 Chyavana performed the initiating rites of the Brahmana and formally initiated him into the Unccha mode of life. The son of Bhrigu, O king recited this history to king Janaka in his palace King Janaka, in his turn described it to the celestial Rishi Narada of high soul.

3—4 The celestial Rishi Narada too, of pure acts going on one occasion to the house of Indra the king of the gods gave to Indra this history upon being asked by him.

5 The king of the gods, having acquired it thus from Narada recited this blessed history to an assembly of all the foremost Brahmanas O king

6 On the occasion, again of my dreadful fight with Rama of Bhrigu's race the celestial Vasus, O king, had recited this history to me

7 Asked by you, O foremost of pious men, I have recited this history that is excellent and sacred and endued with great merit

8 You had asked me about that which forms the highest duty, O king This history is my answer to your query A brave man he was O king who followed the practice of the Unccha vow in this way, without desiring for any fruit

9 Firmly resolved that Brahmana, instructed by the king of Nagas in this way about his duty, followed the practice of restraint and self control, and living upon such food as was allowed by the Unccha vow, proceeded to another forest

ANUSHASANA PARVA.

CHAPTER I.

(ANUSHASANIKA PARVA).

Having saluted Narayana and Nara the best of male beings as also Saraswati, the goddess of learning let us cry success.

Yudhishthira said:—

1. O grandfather, peace of mind has been described to be subtle and of various forms. I have heard all your discourses, but have not still been able to acquire tranquillity of mind.

2. Various means of quieting the mind have been described by you, O sire, but how can peace of mind be acquired from only a knowledge of the different sorts of tranquillity, when I myself have been the means of bringing all this about?

3 Seeing your body covered with arrows and bad sores, I cannot get, O hero, any peace of mind, thinking of the evils I have done.

4 Seeing your body, O bravest of the brave, covered with blood, like a hill covered with water from its springs, I am perishing with grief as the lotus in the rainy season.

5 What can be more painful than this, that, for me, you, O grandfather have been reduced to this condition by my people fighting against their enemies on the battle-field.

6. Other princes also, with their sons and kinsmen, have been killed on my account Alas, what can be more painful than this?

7. Tell us, O prince, what will befall us and the sons of Dhritarashtra, who, impelled by fate and anger, have done this hateful act.

8 O king, I think the son of Dhritarashtra is fortunate because he does not see you in this condition.

9 But I, who am the cause of your death as well as of that of our friends, am denied all peace of mind by seeing you on the naked earth in this miserable plight.

10. The wicked Duryodhana, the most infamous of his family, has, with all his soldiers and his brothers, died in battle, performing Kshatriya duties.

11. That wicked man does not see you lying on the ground! Verily, for this reason, I would prefer death to life.

12—13. O hero who never forsook virtue, had I with my brothers met with death before this at the hands of our enemies on the battle-field, I would not have seen you in this pitiful condition, so pierced with arrows! Sulely, O prince, the Maker had created us to commit evil deeds.

14. O king, if you wish to do me good, do you then instruct me in such a way that I may be purged of this sin in even another world.

Bhishma said —

15 'Why, O fortunate one, do you regard your soul, which is dependent, to be the cause of your deeds? Its inaction is subtle and imperceptible to the senses.

16—19 Regarding it is cited the old story of the conversation between Mrityu and Gautami with Kala and the Fowler and the serpent. There was, O son of Kunti, an old lady named Gautami, who was endued with great patience and peace of mind. One day she found her son dead on account of having been bitten by a serpent.

20. An angry fowler, named Arjunaka, bound the serpent with a string and brought it before Gautami. He then said to her.—This wretched serpent has been the cause of your son's death. O blessed lady! Tell me quickly how this wretch is to be killed! Shall I throw it into the fire or shall I cut it into pieces? This infamous killer of a child should not live longer!

Gautami replied '—

21. Do you, O Arjunaka of little understanding, set free this serpent! It should not be killed by you. Who is so foolish as not to care for the inevitable destiny that awaits him and make himself heavy for sinking into sin?

22. Those who have made themselves light by performing virtuous deeds, manage to cross the sea of the world as a ship crosses the ocean. But those who have loaded themselves with sin sink into the bottom, as an arrow thrown into the water.

23. By killing this serpent, this my boy will not revive, and by letting it live, no harm will be caused to you. Who would go to the endless regions of Death by killing this living creature?

The fowler said:—

24. I know, O lady who know the difference between right and wrong that great persons are pained at the miseries of all creatures. But these words which you have uttered carry instruction for only a self-contained person. Therefore, I must kill this serpent.

25. Those who value peace of mind attribute everything to the course of Time as the cause but practical men soon pacify their grief. People, through perpetual error, fear loss of beatitude. Therefore, O lady, remove your grief by having this serpent killed (by me).

Gautami replied:—

26. People like us are never pained. Good men have their souls always bent on virtue. The death of the boy was predestined therefore I cannot approve of the destruction of this serpent.

27. Brahmanas do not cherish resentment, because resentment leads to pain. Do you, O goodman forgive and set free this serpent out of mercy.

The fowler replied:—

28. Let us acquire great and inexhaustible merit in the next world by destroying (this creature), as a man gains great merit, and confers it on his victim as well by sacrifice upon the altar! Merit is won by killing an enemy: by killing this despicable creature, you will acquire great and true merit in the next world.

Gautami replied —

What good is there in torturing and destroying an enemy, and what good is acquired by not setting free an enemy in our power? Therefore O you of kind face, why should we not forgive this serpent and try to acquire merit by setting it free.

The fowler replied:—

30. A great number (of creatures) should be safeguarded against this one, instead of this single creature being protected. Virtuous men quit the vicious: do you, therefore, destroy the wicked creature.

Gautami replied:—

31. By killing this serpent, my son, O fowler, will not regain his life, nor do I see that any other end will be attained by its death: therefore, do you, O fowler, set this living serpent free.

The fowler said:—

32. By destroying Vritra, Indra got the best portion (of sacrificial offerings), and by destroying a sacrifice Mahadeva secured his share of sacrificial offerings: do you, therefore, kill this serpent forthwith without any misgivings whatsoever.

Bhishma said:—

33. Although repeatedly urged on by the fowler for the destruction of the serpent, the great Gautami did not bend her mind to that sinful deed.

34. Painfully fettered with the cord, sighing a little and keeping up its composure with great difficulty, the serpent then uttered these words slowly, in a human voice.

The serpent said —

35. O foolish Arjunaka, what is my fault? I have no will of my own, and am not independent! Death sent me on this work.

36. By his order have I bitten this child, and not out of any anger or option on my part. Therefore if there be any sin in this, O fowler, the sin is his.

The fowler said —

37. If you have committed this evil, urged thereto by another, the sin is your also as you are an instrument in the act.

38. As in the making of an earthen pot the potter's wheel and rod and other things are all considered as causes, so are you, O serpent. He who is guilty should be killed by me. You, O serpent, are guilty: indeed you confess it.

The serpent said —

39. As all these, viz., the porter's wheel, rod, and other things, are not independent causes, so I am not an independent cause! Therefore, this is no fault of mine, you should admit it.

41. If you hold otherwise, then these are to be considered as causes working with one another. For thus working with one other, a doubt springs up about their relation as cause and effect.

42. Such being the case, it is no fault of mine, nor should I be killed on this account, nor am I guilty of any sin! Or, if you think that there is sin, the sin lies in the aggregate of causes.

The fowler said —

43. If you are neither the principal cause nor the agent in this matter you are still the cause of the death. Therefore, I think you should be killed.

44 If, O serpent, you think that when an evil deed is done the doer is not implicated therein, then there can be no cause in this matter but having done this, you should surely be killed. What more do you think?

The serpent said —

45. Whether any prime cause exists or not, no effect is done without an (intermediate) act. Therefore causation being of no importance in either case, my act as the cause should be considered in full.

46 If, O fowler, you consider me truly, to be the cause then the sin of this act of killing a living being rests on the shoulders of another who led me to do this.

The fowler said :—

47. You don't deserve life, O foolish one, why do you then exchange so many words, O wretched serpent? You should be killed by me. You have done a heinous crime by killing this infant.

The serpent said —

48 O fowler, as the priests officiating at a sacrifice do not gain the merit of the act by offering oblations of clarified butter to the fire, so should I be considered in this matter.

Bhishma continued —

49 The serpent directed by Death having said this, Death himself appeared there and addressing the serpent said —

Mrityu said :—

50. Guided by Kala, I, O serpent, sent you on this mission, and neither are you nor am I the cause of this child's death.

51. As the clouds are driven hither and thither by the wind, I am, O serpent, moved by Kala.

52. All influences of Sattwa, or Rajas, or Tamas, originate from Kala as they work in all creatures.

53 All creatures, mobile and immobile, in heaven, or earth, are pervaded by the influence of Kala. The whole universe, O serpent, is permeated by this same influence of Kala.

54. All acts in this world and all abstentions, as also all their changes, are owing to be influenced by Kala.

55 The Sun, Soma, Vishnu, Water, Wind, the god of a hundred sacrifices, Fire, Sky, Earth, Mitra and Parjanaya, Aditi, and the Vasus, Rivers and Oceans, all existent and non-existent objects, are created and destroyed by Kala.

56—57. Knowing this, why do you, O serpent, consider me blameable? If I am to be blamed for this, you are also blameable.

The serpent said :—

58. I do not, O Mrityu, blame you, nor do I set you free from all blame. I only say that I am directed and influenced by you.

59. If Kala is to be blamed, or, it is not for me to find the fault. We have no right to do so.

60 As it is my duty to absolve myself from this blame, so it is my duty to see that Mrityu is not blamed.

Bhishma continued —

61 Then the serpent, addressing Arjunaka said, 'You have heard what Mrityu has said. Therefore, it is not proper for you to torment me, who am innocent, by fettering me with this rope.

The fowler said —

62 I have heard, you, O serpent, as well as the words of Mrityu, but these, O serpent, do not set you free from all blame.

63. Mrityu and you are the causes of this child's death. I regard both of you to be the cause and I do not call that to be the cause which is not truly so.

64. Accursed be the wicked and vengeful Death that causes misery to the good! I shall also kill you who are sinful and engaged in sinful deeds.

Mrityu said —

66 We both are not free, but are dependent on Kala, and are ordained to do our appointed work. You will not blame us if you do consider this matter thoroughly.

The fowler said :

66 If you both, O serpent and Mrityu, depend on Kala, I am curious to know how pleasure and anger are caused.

Mrityu said :—

67—68. Everything is done under the influence of Kala. I have said it before, O fowler, that Kala is the cause of all and therefore we both, acting under the influence of Kala, do our appointed work and, therefore, O fowler, we two should not be blamed by you.

Bhishma said :—

69 "Then Kala arrived there where ethics were being discussed, and spoke thus to the serpent and Mrityu and the fowler Arjunaka assembled together.

Kala said :—

70. 'Neither Mrityu, nor this serpent, nor I, O fowler, am guilty of the death of any creature We are merely the immediate causes of the event O Arjunaka, the Karma of this child was the exciting cause of our action in this matter.

71. There was no other cause by which this child met its death. It was killed by the result of its own Karma

72. It has met with death as the result of its pristine Karma. Its Karma has been the root of its destruction We all are subject to our respective Karma

73. Karma is a help to salvation as sons are and Karma also expresses virtue and vice in man We impell one another even acts urge one another.

74 As men make from a lump of clay whatever they wish to make, so do men come by various results out of Karma.

75 As light and shadow are connected with each other, so are men related to Karma. through their own deeds.

76. Therefore, neither are you, nor am I, nor Mrityu, nor the serpent, nor this old Brahmana lady, is the cause of this child s death.

77. He himself is the cause here. Upon Kala, O king, explaining the matter thus, Gautami, convinced in her mind that men suffer according to their actions, spoke thus to Arjunaka.

Gautami said —

78 Neither Kala, nor Mrityu, nor the serpent, is the cause here This child has met with death as the result of its own Karma.

79 I too have so acted that my son has died Let now Kala and Mrityu retire from there, and do you too, O Arjunaka, set this serpent free.

Bhishma continued :—

80. Then Kala and Mrityu and the serpent returned to their respective places, and Gautami became consoled in mind as also the fowler.

81. Having heard all this O king, do you forego all grief, and acquire peace of mind! Men attain to heaven or hell as the result of their own Karma.

82. This evil has neither been of your own creation, nor of Duryodhana's! That these king's of Earth have all been killed, is the work of Kala.

Vaishampayana said —

83 Having heard all this, the powerful and pious Yudhisthira became consoled in mind, and again enquired as follows

---

CHAPTER II.

(ANUSHASANIKA PARVA) — Continued.

Yudhisthira said —

1. O grandfather, O wisest of men O you who are learned in all the scriptures, I have heard this great story, O foremost of intelligent men!

2 I am desirous of again listening to the recital of some history full of religious instruction, and you should satisfy me

3 O king, tell me if any householder has ever succeeded in conquering Death by the practice of virtue! Do you recite this to me in full.

Bhishma said :—

4 This ancient history is narrated describing the subject of the conquest, by a householder, of Death, by the practice of virtue.

5 The Prajapati Manu had a son, O king, named Ikshwaku. That king, illustrious as the Sun, begat a hundred sons.

6. His tenth son, O Bharata was named Dashashwa, and this virtuous prince of infallible prowess became the king of Mahismati.

7 Dashashwa's son, O king, was a pious prince whose mind was continually devoted to the practice of truth and charity and devotion.

8. He was known by the name of Madirashwa and ruled the Earth as her master He was continually given to the study of the Vedas as also of the science of arms.

9 Madirashwa's son was the king named Dyutimat who was ended with great good fortune and power and strength and energy

10. Dyutimat's son was the highly devout and pious king who was celebrated in all the worlds by the name of Suvira. His soul was intent on religion and he possessed riches like another Indra the king of the gods.

11. Suvira too had a son who was invincible in battle, and who was the best of all warriors and known by the name of Sudurjaya.

12 And Durjaya too, endued with a body like that of Indra, had a son who was radiant with the effulgence of fire. He was the great king named Duryodhana who was one of the foremost of royal sages.

13 Indra used to pour rain profusely in the kingdom of this king, who never fled from the battlefield and was gifted with valour like unto Indra himself.

14 The cities and the kingdom of this king were filled with wealth and gems and cattle and various sorts of grain.

15 There was no miser in his kingdom nor any person afflicted with distress or suffering from poverty Nor was there in his kingdom any person who was weak in body or afflicted with disease.

16. This king was very intelligent, mild in speech, without envy, a master of his passions, of a righteous soul, full of mercy, gifted with prowess, and not given to boasting.

17. He celebrated sacrifices, and was self-controlled and intelligent, devoted to Brahmanas and Truth. He never humiliated others, and was charitable, and well-read in the Vedas and the Vedanta.

18. Auspicious and sacred and of cool waters, the celestial stream Narmada, in her own nature, O Bharata, courted him, 19 He begot upon that river, a lotus eyed daughter, named Sudarshana, who was, O king, gifted with great beauty.

20. No woman, O Yudhisthira, had been born before, who was so very beautiful as that excellent lady the daughter of Duryodhana.

21. The god Agni himself courted the beautiful princess Sudarshana, and assuming the shape of a Brahmana, O king, sought her hand from the king.

22. The king was reluctant to give his daughter in marriage to the Brahmana who was poor and not of equal rank with himself.

23 Thereupon Agni disappeared from his great sacrifice. The king, grieved at heart, then addressed the Brahmanas, saying,—

24. What sin have I, ye excellent Brahmanas, or you, have committed, that Agni should disappear from this sacrifice, as good done to wicked men vanishes from their estimation.

25 Indeed, we have committed a great iniquity for which Agni has thus disappeared! Either you have committed the sin, or I. Do you fully enquire into the matter.

26. Then hearing the king's words, O foremost prince of Bharata's race, the Brahmanas, controlling speech, sought with concentrated faculties the help of the god of fire.

27. The divine carrier of oblations, effulgent as the autumnal Sun, appeared before them, covering his self in glorious refulgence.

28. The great Agni then addressed those excellent Brahmanas, saying,—I seek the daughter of Duryodhana for my own self.

29. At this, all those Brahmanas were struck with surprise and rising on the morrow, they told the king what had been said by the fire-god.

30 Hearing the words of those Brahmavadins, the wise king was delighted at heart, and said,—Be it so!—The king sought a boon of the illustrious fire-god as the marriage dower.—Do you, O Agni, be pleased to remain always with us here!

31—32 Be it so!—said the divine Agni to that king For this reason Agni has always been present in the kingdom of Mahishmati to this day, and was seen by Sahadeva in his conquering expedition to the south.

33—36 Then the king gave his daughter, dressed in new raiments and decked with jewels, to the great god, and Agni too accepted, according to Vedic rites, the princess Sudarshana as his bride, as he accepts libations of clarified butter at sacrifices Agni was well pleased with her look her beauty, grace, character, and nobility of birth, and thought of begetting offspring upon her. And she soon gave birth to a son by Agni, of the name of Sudarshana.

37. Sudarshana, also, was, as beautiful as the full moon, and even in his childhood he acquired a knowledge of the supreme and eternal Brahma.

38. There was also a king named Oghavat, who was the grandfather of Nriga. He had a daughter named Oghavati, and a son too, of the name of Ogharatha born to him.

39 King Oghavat gave his daughter Oghavati, beautiful as a goddess, to the learned Sudarshana, for wife.

40. Sudarshana, O king, leading the domestic mode of life with Oghavati, used to live in Kurukshetra with her.

41. This intelligent prince of fiery energy took the vow, O lord, of conquering Death by leading the life of a householder.

42. The son of Agni, O king, said to Oghavati,—Do you never act against (the wishes of) those who seek our hospitality.

43 You should ungrudgingly welcome the guests, even if you have to offer your own body.

44 O beautiful one, I always remember this vow, since for house-holders, there is no higher virtue than hospitality to guests.

45 Do you always remember without ever doubting it, if my words be any authority with you.

46. O sinless and blessed one, if you have any faith in me, do you never disregard a guest, whether I be at your side or at a distance from you.

47. Oghavati placing her clasped hands on her forehead, replied, saying,—I shall leave nothing undone of what you order me.

48. Then, O king desiring to over-reach Sudarshana, Mrityu began to watch him for finding out his short comings.

49. Once on a time, when the son of Agni went out fetch fuel from the forest; a graceful Brahmana sought the hospitality of Oghavati with these words

50 O beautiful lady, if you have any faith in the virtue of hospitality as laid down for householders, then I would request you to extend the rites of hospitality to me to day.

51. Thus addressed by that Brahmana, O king, the illustrious princess welcomed him according to the rites laid down in the Vedas.

52 Having offered him a seat, and water to wash his feet, she enquired, saying —What is your business? What can I offer you?

53 The Brahmana said to her,—My business is with your body, O blessed one! Do you act accordingly without any hesitation whatever.

54. If the duties prescribed for householders be acceptable to you, do you, O princess, satisfy me by offering up your body to me.

55 Though tempted by the princess with offers of various other things, the Brahmana, however, did not seek any thing else than the offer of her own person.

56 Finding him determined, that lady, recollecting the directions given to her by her husband, but filled with shame, said to that excellent Brahmana,—Be it so.

57. Recollecting the words of her husband who was desirous of acquiring the virtue of house-holders, she cheerfully approached the twice-born Rishi.

58 Meanwhile, the son of Agni, having collected fuel, returned to his home. Mrityu, with his dreadful and inexorable nature, was always by his side, as one attends upon his devoted friend.

59 When the son of Pavaka returned to his own asylum, he called out for Oghavati by name, and repeatedly exclaimed,—Where are you gone?

60. But the chaste lady, devoted to her husband, being then in the arms of that Brahmana, gave no reply to her husband.

61. Indeed, considering herself sullied, that chaste woman became speechless, overcome with shame.

62. Sudarshana, addressing her again, exclaimed,—Where can my chaste wife be? Where has she gone? Nothing can be so very important to me than this.

63 Why does not that simple and truthful lady, devoted to her husband, alas reply as she used to do before with swee smiles.

64—66 Then that Brahmana, who was within the hut thus replied to Sudarshana,—Know, O son of fire, that a Brahmana guest has arrived, and though tempted by your wife with various other offers of welcome, I have, O best of Brahmanas, desired only her body and this fair lady is engaged in welcoming me with due rites! You can do whatever you think proper on this occasion.

67. Armed with the iron-club, death pursued the Rishi at that moment, desirous of bringing about the destruction of one who would, he thought, deviate from his promise.

68—69 Sudarshana was struck with wonder, but renouncing all, jealousy and anger by look, word, deed, or thought, said, —Do you enjoy yourself, O Brahmana! It is a great pleasure to me! A householder acquires the highest merit by honouring a guest.

70 The learned say that to the householder, there is no higher merit than what comes from a guest leaving his house after having been duly honoured by him

71. My life, my wife and all my earthly belongings, are all dedicated to the use of my guests! This is the vow that I have taken.

72. As I have truly made this statement, by that truth, O Brahmana, I shall acquire the knowledge of Self.

73—74 O foremost of the virtuous, the five elements, viz, fire, air, earth, water, and sky, and the mind, the intellect and the Soul, and time and space and the ten organs of sense, are all in the bodies of men, and always witness the good and evil deeds of men.

75 This truth I have spoken to day, and let the gods bless me for it or destroy me if I have spoken an untruth.

76 At this O Bharata, there arose from all sides, in repeated echoes, a voice, crying,—This is true, this is not false.

77—78. Then that Brahmana came out of the hovel, and like the wind rising and covering both Earth and sky, and making the three worlds echo with Vedic recitations, and calling that virtuous man by name, and congratulating him, said —

79 O sinless one, I am Dharma! All glory to you! I came here O truth-loving one, to try you, and I am well pleased with you by knowing you to be virtuous

80 You have controlled and conquered Death who always has pursued you, seeking your shortcomings.

81. O best of men, no one in the three worlds has the power to insult, even with looks this chaste lady devoted to her husband, far less to touch her body.

82. She has been saved from contamination by your virtue and by her own chastity. There can be nothing against what this proud lady will say.

83. This Brahmavadin, gifted with austere penances, shall, for the salvation of the world, be changed into a powerful river.

84 And you will acquire all the worlds in this your body, and because the science of Yoga is within her control this highly blessed lady will follow you with only half her body, and with the other half will she be celebrated as the river Oghavati.

85 And you will acquire with her all the worlds that are acquired by penances.

86 You will acquire even in this material body those eternal and everlasting worlds from which none return.

87 You have conquered Death, and acquired the highest happiness and by your own power (of mind), attaining to the speed of thought, you have transcended the five elements

88 By thus following the duties of a house holder, you have conquered your passions, desires, and anger. and this princess, O best of virtuous men, has, by serving you, conquered affliction, desire, illuson, enmity and lassitude of mind.

Bhishma said —

89 Then, riding in a fine chariot drawn by a thousand white steeds, the glorious Vasava approached that Brahmana

90 Death and Soul, all the worlds, all the elements, intellect, mind, time, and ether as also desire and anger, were all conquered

91 Therefore, O best of men, do you remember that a to householder there is no greater god than the guest.

22 The learned say that the blessings of an honoured guest are more fruitful than the merit of a hundred sacrifices.

92 Whenever a deserving guest seeks the hospitality of a house holder and is not respected by him, he takes away all the virtues of the latter giving him his sins.

94 I have now recited to you my son, this excellent story as to how Death was conquered in days of yore by a householder.

95 The recital of this excellent story gives glory, fame and longevity The man who seeks worldly prosperity should consider it as powerful in removing all evil.

96 And, O Bharata, the learned man who daily recites this story of the life of Sudarshana acquires blessed regions.

CHAPTER III.

(ANUSHASANIKA PARVA) — Continued.

Yudhishthira said:—

1. If, O prince, it is so very difficult for the other three castes to acquire Brahmanahood, how then did the great Vishwamitra, O king, though a Kshatriya, acquire the status of a Brahmana? I desire to know this, O sire! Therefore, do you truly describe this matter to me.

3 O sire by virtue of his austerities that powerful man destroyed in a moment the hundred sons of the great Vasishtha.

4. While under the influence of ire he created numberless evil spirits and Rakshasas of great vigour and resembling the great destroyer Kala himself.

5 The great and learned family of Kushika, containing hundreds of twice born sages in it and highly spoken of by the Brahmanas, was founded in this world of men by him.

6 Having been sought to be killed as an animal in the great sacrifice of Amvarisha, Shunashepha of austere penances, the son of Richika acquired his deliverance through Vishwamitra.

7. Having pleased the gods at a sacrifice Harishchandra became a son of the wise Vishwamitra.

8 For not having honoured their eldest brother Devarat, the other fifty brothers of his were imprecated, and all of them became Chandalas.

9 When abandoned by his friends, and hanging with his head downwards in the lower regions, Trisanku, the son of Ikshaku was translated to heaven at the pleasure of Vishwamitra.

10. Vishwamitra had a large river, named Kaushiki, that was frequented by celestial Rishis. This sacred and auspicious river was frequented by the celestials and twice-born Rishis.

11. For disturbing his devotions, the famous celestial nymph Rambha, having fine bracelets, was cursed and changed into a rock.

12. From fear of Vishwamitra the glorious Vasishtha, in days of yore, binding himself with creepers, threw himself down into a river and again rose released from his fetters.

13 On account of this, that large and sacred river became thenceforth famous by the name of Vipasha.

14—15 He prayed to the glorious and powerful Indra who was pleased with him and freed him from a curse Remaining on the northern side of the sky, he sheds his lustre from a position in the midst of the seven twice born Rishis, and Dhruva the son of Uttanpada.

16 These and many others are his feats. O descendant of Kuru, my curiosity has been kindled in this respect, because they were performed by a Kshatriya.

17. Therefore, O foremost one of Bharata's race do you relate this matter to me truly! How without renouncing his body and taking another body of flesh could he become a Brahmana?

18 Do you, O sire, truly describe this matter to me as you have described to me the story of Matanga.

19 Matanga was born as a Chandala, and could not acquire Brahmanahood, but how could this man acquire the status of a Brahmana?

CHAPTER IV.

(ANUSHASANA PARVA)—Continued.

Bhishma said :—

1. "Listen truly in full, O son of Pritha, how, in days of yore, Vishwamitra acquired the status of a Brahmana, as also of a Brahmana Rishi!

2 There was, O foremost of Bharata's descendants, in the family of Bharata, a king named Ajamida, who celebrated many sacrifices and was the best of all virtuous men.

3 His son was the great king named Jahnu Ganga was the daughter of this great prince.

4 The far-famed and equally virtuous Sindhudwipa was the son of this prince. From Sindhudwipa sprang the great royal sage Valakashwa.

5 His son was named Vallabha who was like a second Dharma incarnate. His son was Kushika who was illustrious like the thousand-eyed Indra.

6. Kushika's son was the illustrious king Gadhi who, being childless and wishing to have a son born to him, went to the forest,

7. While living there, a daughter was born to him. She was called Satyavati, and she was peerless in beauty on Earth

8 The illustrious son of Chyavana, known by the name of Richika, of the family of Bhrigu gifted with austere penances, sought the hand of this lady.

9 Thinking him to be poor, Gadhi the destroyer of his enemies, did not bestow her in marriage upon the great Richika.

10 But when the latter, thus dismissed, was going away, the excellent king addressing him, said,—If you can give me a marriage dower you will have my daughter as your wife!

Richika said :—

11—12. What dower, O king, shall I offer you for the hand of your daughter? Tell me truly, without any hesitation whatsoever!—Gadhi said,—O descendant of Bhrigu, give me a thousand horses quick-coursing as the wind, and possessing the color of moon beams, and each having one ear black.

Bhishma said —

13—14 Then that powerful son of Chyavana who was the foremost of Bhrigu's family, besought the god Varuna, the son of Aditi, who was the lord of all the waters. O best of gods, I pray to you to give me a thousand horses, all fleet like the wind and having complexion as effulgent as the moon's, but each having one ear black

15-16 The god Varuna the son of Aditi, said to that scion of Bhrigu's race,—Be it so! Whenever you will seek, the horses shall come As soon as Richika thought of them, there came from the waters of Ganga a thousand high-born horses, as effulgent as the moon

17 Not far from Kanyakubja, the sacred bank of Ganga is still famous among men as Ashwatirtha on account of the appearance of those horses.

18 Then Richika, that best of ascetics, pleased in mind, gave those thousand excellent horses to Gadhi as the marriage gift.

19 King Gadhi, stricken with wonder and fearing to be cursed, gave his daughter, adorned with jewels, to that son of Bhrigu.

20. That foremost of twice-born Rishis accepted her hand in marriage according to due rites. The princes too was well-pleased at seeing herself the wife of that Brahmana.

21. That foremost of twice-born Rishis, O Bharata was well pleased with her conduct and expressed a desire to grant her a boon

22 The princess, O excellent king, communicated this to her mother The mother said to the daughter that stood before her with down cast eyes,—You should, O my daughter, secure a favour for me also from your husband That sage of austere penances is competent to grant a boon to me—the boon, viz, of the birth of a son to me.

24 Then, O king, returning speedily to her husband Richika, the princess described to him all that had been wished for by her mother.

Richika said :—

25 By my favour, O blessed one, she will soon give birth to a son gifted with every virtue! May your request be fulfilled!

26 Of you too shall be born a powerful and glorious son who, gifted with virtue, shall perpetuate my race. Truly do I say this to you

27 When you two shall bathe in your season, she shall embrace a pepul tree, and you, O excellent lady, shall embrace a fig tree, and by so doing you shall have the fruition of your desires.

28 O sweetly-smiling lady, both she and you shall have to partake of these two sacrificial offerings (charu) consecrated with hymns, and then you shall get sons

29 Thereat, Satyavati, pleased at heart, told her mother all that had been said by Richika as also of the two balls of charu.

30. Then the mother, addressing her daughter Satyavati, said —O daughter, as I deserve greater respect from you than your husband, do you obey my words.

31 Do you give me the charu, duly consecrated with hymns which your husband has given you, and yourself take the one that has been intended for me.

32 O sweetly-smiling one of pure character, if you have any reverence for my word let us change the trees respectively intended for us.

33. Every one wishes to possess an excellent and pure son. The illustrious Richika too must have acted from the same motive in this matter as will appear in the long run.

34 Therefore, O beautiful girl, my heart is bent upon your charu and tree, and you too should also try to secure an excellent brother for yourself.

35 The mother and the daughter Satyavati having acted thus, they both, O Yudhishthira, became big with child.

36 Finding his wife quick with child, that great Rishi, the descendant of Bhrigu, became pleased at heart, and addressing her, said —

37 O excellent lady, you have not done well in exchanging the charu as will soon be seen It is also clear that you have changed the trees

38 I had put the entire accumulated energy of Brahma in your charu and Kshatriya energy in the charu of your mother.

39 I had so settled that you would give birth to a Brahmana whose virtues would be famous throughout the three worlds, and that she would give birth to an excellent Kshatriya.

40—41 But now, O excellent lady, as you have changed the order (of the charu so), your mother give birth to an excellent Brahmana and you too, O excellent lady, will give birth to a Kshatriya of dreadful deeds You have not done well, O lady, by doing thus out of affection for your mother.

42. Hearing this O king, the excellent lady Satyavati, filled with sorrow, dropped upon the ground like a beautiful creeper cut in two parts.

43—44 Regaining her senses and bowing to her lord with head (bent), the daughter of Gadhi said to her husband that foremost one of Bhrigu's race,—O twice-born Rishi, O you who are foremost amongst those versed in Brahma, have mercy on me, your wife, who is thus appeasing you and so order that a Kshatriya son may not be born to me.

45. Let my grandson be such a one as will be famous for his dreadful feats if it be your desire, but not my son, O Brahmana! Do you grant me this favour.

46 Be it so,—said that Rishi of austere penances to his wife and then, O king, she gave birth to a blessed son named Jamadagni.

47 The famous wife of Gadhi too gave birth to the twice-born Rishi Vishwamitra versed in the knowledge of Brahma, by favour of that Rishi.

48 The highly pious Vishwamitra, though a Kshatriya, gained the dignity of a Brahmana and became the founder of a race of Brahmanas.

49 His sons became great progenitors of many races of Brahmanas who were given to austere penances, learned in the Vedas, and founders of many clans.

50—53 The worshipful Madhuchchhanda and the powerful Devrat, Akshina, Shakunta, Vabhru, Kalapatha, the celebrated Yajnavalkya, Sthuna of great vows, Uluka, Mudgala, and the sage Saindhavayana the illustrious Valakajangha and the great Rishi Galava, Ruchi, the celebrated Vajra, as also Salankayana, Haradhya and Narada, the one known as Kurchamukha, and Vahuli Mushala as also Vakshogriva.

54—61. Anghrika, Naikadrik, Sthalayupa, Sthita, Suchi, Chakraka, Marutantavya, Vatagha, Ashwalayana, and Shyamayana, Gargya, and Javali, as also Sushruta, Karishi Sangkrityа and Para Paurava, and Tanti, the great sage Kapila, Tarakayana Upagahana Asurayani, Margama, Hiranyaksha, Janghari, Bhavravayani, and Suti Bibhuti, Suta, Surakrit, Arani, Nachika, Champeya, Ujjayana, Navatanti, Vakanakha Sayana, Yati, Ambhoruha, Amatsyashta, Shirishin, Gardhavi Urjjayoni, Udapekshin, and the great Rishi Naradin—these ascetics were all sons of Vishwamitra and were versed in the knowledge of Brahma. O king Yudhishthira, the greatly austere and pious Vishwamitra, although a Kshatriya, became a Brahmana for Richika having placed the energy of supreme Brahma (in the charu), O foremost prince of Bharata's family! I have now described to you, in full, the story of the birth of Vishwamitra who was gifted with the energy of the sun, the moon, and the fire god

62. O best of kings, if you have any doubt about any other subject, please let me know it, so that I may remove it."

CHAPTER V.

(ANUSHASANIKA PARVA)—
Continued.

Yudhishthira said:—

1. "O you who know the truths of religion, I wish to hear of the merits of religion, I wish to hear of the merits of mercy, and of the marks of devout men! Do you, O sire, describe them to me."

Bhishma said —

2 'Regarding it, this ancient legend, the story of Vasava and the great Shuka, is cited as an illustration.

3 In the dominion of the king of Kashi, a fowler, having poisoned arrows with him, went out of his village on a hunting expedition in search of antelopes.

4 Desirous of getting meat, when in a big forest in pursuit of the chase, he saw a drove of antelopes near at hand, and shot his arrow at one of them.

5 The arrow of that fowler of irresistible arms, shot for the destruction of the antelope, missing its aim, pierced a powerful forest-tree

6 The tree, pierced with that arrow covered with dreadful poison withered away, shedding its leaves and fruits

7. The tree having thus withered, a parrot which had lived in a hollow of its trunk all his life, did not leave his nest out of affection for that lordly tree.

8 Motionless starving, silent and sorrowful, that grateful and virtuous parrot also withered away with the tree

9 The conqueror of Paka (Indra) was filled with wonder upon seeing that great and generous bird thus uninfluenced by misery or happiness and possessing extraordinary resolution

10 Then Sakra thought—How could this bird come to possess such humane and generous feelings which cannot be seen in one of the lower animal creation?

11 There is nothing wonderful in the matter, for all creatures are seen to show kindly and generous feelings towards others.

12. Assuming then the shape of a Brahmana, Shakra went on the Earth and addressing the bird, said —

13 O Cuka, O best of birds, the grand daughter of Daksha has become blessed (by having you as her offspring)! I ask you, why do you not leave this withered tree?

14 Thus accosted, the Shuka bowed to him and thus replied:—Welcome to you O king of the gods, I have recognised you by the merit of my austere penances.

15 Well done, well done!—said the thousand eyed god Then the latter lauded him in his mind, saying,—O, how wonderful is the knowledge which he possesses

16 Although the destroyer of Vala knew that parrot to be of a greatly virtuous character and meritorious in action, he still enquired of him about the reason of his love for the tree

17—18 This tree is withered and it is without leaves and fruits and is unfit to be the refuge of birds Why do you then cling to it? This forest too is vast and in this wilderness there are numberless other good trees whose hollows are covered with leaves and which you can choose freely and to your heart's content.

19 O patient one, displaying proper discrimination in your wisdom do you leave this old tree that is dead and useless and shorn of all its leaves and no longer capable of any good.

Bhishma said:—

20—21. Hearing these words of Shakra, the virtuous Shuka, heaved a deep sigh, and sorrowfully replied to him, saying,—O husband of Sachi, and chief of the gods the ordinances of the gods should always be obeyed Do you hear of the reason of the thing about which you have asked me.

22 Here, within this tree, was I born and here in this tree have all the good traits of my character been developed, and here in this tree was I protected in my infancy from the attacks of my enemies

23 O sinless one, why are you in your kindness, interfering with the principle of my conduct in life? I am merciful and devoutly intent on virtue, and firm in conduct

24 Kindliness of feeling is the highest test of virtue amongst the good, and this same merciful and humane feeling is the source of eternal happiness to the virtuous

25 All the gods ask you to remove their doubts in religion and for this reason, O lord, you have been elected their king

26—27 You should not, O thousand-eyed one, advise me now to leave this tree for good When it was capable of good, it supported my life How can I leave it now? Pleased with these well meant words of the parrot, the virtuous destroyer of Paka, thus said to him —I am pleased with your humane and merciful disposition.

28 Do you ask a boon of me—At this, the merciful parrot craved this boon of him, saying,—Let this tree revive.

29 Knowing the great attachment of the parrot to that tree and great high character, Indra, well pleased, caused the tree to be quickly sprinkled over with nectar.

30—31. Then that tree became revived and grand through the penances of the parrot, and the latter, too O great king, at the end of his life acquired the companionship of Shakra by virtue of that act of mercy.

32 Thus, O king by communion and companionship with the pious, people acquire all the objects of their desire even as the tree did through its companionship with the parrot."

CHAPTER VI

(ANUSHASANIKA PARVA).—Continued.

Yudhisthira said:—

1. "Of Exertion and Destiny, tell me O learned sire who are versed in all the scriptures, which is the more potent?

Bhishma said :—

2. This ancient story of the conversation of Vasishtha and Brahman. O Yudhisthira, explain this matter.

3 In days of yore the worshipful Vasishtha enquired of Brahman as to which among these two, viz, the Karma of a creature acquired in this life or that acquired in pristine lives (and called Destiny), is the more powerful in shaping his life.

4. Then, O king, the great god Brahman, who had originated from the primeval lotus, answered him in these sweet and well-reasoned pregnant words.

Brahmana said —

5. Nothing springs into existence without seed. Without seed, fruits do not grow. From seeds originate other seeds. Hence are fruits known to be sprung from seeds.

6. According to the good or bad seed that the husbandman sows in his field, he reaps good or bad fruits.

7. As unsown with seed, the soil, though tilled, becomes fruitless, so, without personal Exertion, Destiny is of no use.

8. One's own deeds are like the soil, and Destiny is compared to the seed. The harvest grows from the union of the soil and seed.

9—10. It is seen every day in the world that the doer reaps the fruit of his good and evil acts, that happiness results from good deeds, and pain is the outcome of evil ones, that acts, when done, always fructify, and that, if not done, no fruit arises.

11. A man of (good) acts gains merits with good fortune, while an idler loses his estate, and reaps evil like the infusion of alkaline matter injected into a wound.

12 By firm application, one acquires beauty, fortune, and all sorts of riches Everything can be obtained by Exertion but nothing can be gained through Destiny only, by a man who lacks personal Exertion

13. One attains to heaven, and all the objects of enjoyment, as also the fulfillment of his heart s desires, by well-applied personal Exertion.

14. All the luminaries in the sky, all the gods, the Nagas, and the Rakshasas, as also the Sun and the Moon and the Winds, have acquired their high status by evolution from man's status, by dint of their own action.

15 Riches, friends, prosperity coming down from generation to generation, as also the sweets of life, are difficult of attainment by those who want Exertion.

16. The Brahmana acquires prosperity by holy living, the Kshatriya by prowess, the Vaishya by manly exertion, and the Shudra by service.

17. The stingy, the impotent, or the idler do not acquire riches and other objects of enjoyment. Nor are these ever acquired by the man who is not active or manly or devoted to the exercise of religious austerities.

18 Even he, the worshipful Vishnu, who created the three worlds with the Daityas and all the gods, even He is engaged in austere penances in the heart of the deep.

19 If one's Karma bore no fruit, then all actions would become fruitless, and depending on Destiny men would become idlers.

20. He who, without following the human modes of action, follows Destiny only, acts in vain, like the woman who has an impotent husband.

21. The apprehension of good or evil in this world is not so great if Destiny be unfavorable as his apprehension of the same in the other world if Exertion be wanting while here.

22 Man's powers, if properly applied only follow his Destiny, but Destiny alone cannot produce any good where Exertion is wanting.

23 When it is seen that even in the celestial regions, the position of the gods themselves is unstable, how would the gods maintain their own position or that of others without proper Karma.

24 The gods do not always approve of the good actions of others in this world, for, fearing their own defeat, they try to thwart the acts of others.

25 There is a constant rivalry between the gods and the Rishis, and if they all have to go through their Karma, still it can never be said that there is no such thing as Destiny, for it is the latter that introduces all Karma.

26 How does Karma originate, if Destiny is the principal motive power of human action? By this means, many virtues are accumulated in the celestial regions.

27. One's own self is his friend and his enemy too, as also the witness of one's good and evil deeds.

28 Good and evil appear through Karma. Good and evil acts do not produce sufficient results.

29 Virtue is the refuge of the gods, and by virtue everything is acquired. Destiny thwarts not the man who has acquired virtue and righteousness.

30. In days of yore, Yayati, falling from his high position in heaven, descended on the Earth but was again restored to the celestial regions by the good deeds of his pious grandsons.

31 The royal sage Pururavas, well known as the descendant of Ila, attained to heaven through the intercession of the Brahmanas.

32. Saudasa, the king of Koshala, though dignified by the performance of Ashwamedha and other sacrifices, came by the status of a man-eating Rakshasa, through the course of a great Rishi.

33 Ashwatthaman and Rama, though both warriors and sons of Ascetics, failed to acquire heaven by virtue of their own actions in this world.

34. Vasu, though he celebrated a hundred sacrifices, like a second Vasava, was sent to the nethermost regions, for making a single false statement.

35. Vali, the son of Virochana, virtuous bound by his promise, was sent to the regions under the Earth, by the prowess of Vishnu.

35. Was not Janamejaya, who followed the foot-prints of Shakra, for slaying a Brahmana woman, checked and put down by the gods?

27. Was not the twice-born Rishi Vaishampayana too, who killed a Brahmana in ignorance, and was polluted by the slaughter of a child, put down by the gods?

38. In days of yore the royal sage Nriga became changed into a lizard. He had made gifts of kine into the Brahmanas at his great sacrifice, but this did not help him.

39. The royal sage Dhundhumara was possessed by decrepitude even while engaged in celebrating his sacrifices, and foregoing all the merits thereof he fell asleep at Girivraja.

40. The Pandavas too regained their lost kingdom, of which they had been deprived by the powerful sons of Dhritarashtra, not through the influence of the Fates, but by recourse of their own heroism.

41. Do the ascetics of rigid vows, and given to the practice of austere penances, denounce their curses by the help of any supernatural power or only in the exercise of their own power attained by individual acts?

42. If possessed by the wicked, all the good which is gained with difficulty in this world, is soon lost to them. Destiny does not help the man that is full of spiritual ignorance and avarice.

43 Even as small fire, when fanned by the wind, becomes highly powerful, so does Destiny, when helped by individual Exertion, becomes greatly potent.

44 As by the diminution of oil in the lamp its light is put out, so does the influence of Destiny, by the abatement of one's acts.

45. Having obtained riches, and woman and all the enjoyments of this world, the man who is not hard working is unable to enjoy them long, but the great man, diligent in Exertion, can find riches buried deep in the Earth and watched over by the Fates.

46 The good man who is prodigal is sought by the gods for his good conduct, the celestial world being better than the world of men, but the house of the miser though full of riches is looked upon by the gods as the house of the dead

47. The man who does not exert himself is never contented in this world, nor can Destiny change the course of a man who has gone wrong. There is no power inherent in Destiny. As the pupil follows the preceptor, so does one's action, guided by Destiny, follows his own personal exertion Where one's own Exertion is displayed, there only Destiny shows its hand.

48 O best of ascetics, I have thus described all the merits of personal Exertion, having always known in their true significance.

49 By the influence of Destiny, and by showing personal Exertion, do men attain to heaven The combined help of Destiny and Exertion, becomes fruitful."

CHAPTER VII.

(ANUSHASANIKA PARVA).—Continued.

Yudhisthira said:—

1. "O best of Bharata's family and the foremost of great men, I wish to know what the fruits are of good deeds! Do you enlighten me."

Bhishma said:—

2 "I shall tell you what you have asked. Do you O Yudhisthira, listen to this which forms the secret knowledge of the Rishis.

3. Listen to me as I explain what the long coveted ends are which befall men after death The fruits of whatever actions are performed by creatures in whatever bodies or forms of existence, are reaped by the doers while endued with similar bodies In whatever states creatures perform good or evil acts, they reap the fruits thereof in similar states of succeeding lives No act done with the help of the five organs of sensual perception is ever lost.

4—7. The five sensual organs and the immortal soul which is the sixth, are its witnesses One should devote his eye (to the service of others) one should devote his heart (to the same), one should utter sweet words, one should also follow and worship (one's guest) This is the sacrifice with five gifts He who offers good food to the unknown, and tired traveller, fatigued by a long journey, acquires great merit.

8. Those who use the sacrificial platform as their only bed, obtain palatial mansions and beds (in subsequent births) He who wears only rags and barks of trees for dress, gets good apparel and ornaments

9 One possessed of penances and having his soul on Yoga, gets vehicles and riding animals The king who lies down by the side of the sacrificial fire, acquires vigor and valour.

10 The man who casts off the enjoyment of all delicacies, acquires prosperity and he who abstains from animal food, obtains children and cattle.

11. He who lies down with his head downwards, or who lives in water, or who lives secluded and alone in the practice of Brahmacharya, acquires all the desired ends

12 He who gives shelter to a guest and welcomes him with water to wash his feet as also with food light and bed, acquires the merits of the sacrifice with the five gifts

13 He who on the battle-field, lays himself down as a warrior on a warrior's bed goes to those eternal regions where all the objects of desire are fulfilled.

14 A man O king, acquires riches who makes charitable gifts One gets obedience to one's command by the vow of silence all the enjoyments of life by practice of austerities, long life by Brahmacharya, and beauty, prosperity and immunity from disease by abstaining from injury to others

15 Those who live on fruits and roots only, acquire Sovereignty, those who live on only leaves of trees acquire Residence in heaven

16 A man, O king, is said to acquire happiness, by abstention from food. By eating herbs alone, one gets cows By living on grass, one acquires the celestial regions

17. By avoiding all intercourse with his wife and making ablutions three times a day and by inhaling the air only for purposes of maintenance one acquires the merit of a sacrifice Heaven is gained by the practice of truth, and nobility of birth by sacrifices.

18 The Brahmana of pure practices who lives on water only, and performs the Agnihotra continually, and recites the Gayatri, acquires a kingdom By abstaining from food or by restricting it, one acquires residence in heaven

19 O king, by avoiding all but the prescribed diet while celebrating sacrifices, and by making pilgrimage for twelve years, one acquires a place better than the abodes reserved for heroes

20 By reading all the Vedas one is immediately freed from misery, and by practising virtue in thought, one acquires the heavenly regions

21. That man who shakes off the longing for happiness and material comforts—a thirst that is difficult of conquest by the foolish and which does not abate with the decline of physical vigour and which clings to him like a dreadful disease,—is able to secure happiness

22 As the young calf is able to recognise its dam from among a, thousand cows, so do the pristine deeds of a man follow him.

23 As the flowers and fruits of a tree, unmoved by apparent influences never miss their proper season so does Karma done in a pristine existence bring about its fruits in proper time

24 With age, man's hair grows gray, his teeth become loose, his eyes and ears too become dim in action, but the only thing that does not decline is his desire for enjoyments

25—26 Prajapati is pleased with those deeds which please one's father, and the Earth is pleased with those acts which please one's mother, and Brahma is pleased with those acts which please one's mother, and Brahma is adored with those acts that please one's preceptor. Virtue is honored by him who honors these three. The acts of those who despise these three do not help them.

Vaishampayana said :—

27 The princes of the line of Kuru became filled with surprise upon listening to this speech of Bhishma. All of them became pleased in mind and overpowered with joy.

28. As Mantras applied for gaining victory, or the performance of the Shoma sacrifice made without proper gifts, or oblations poured on the fire without proper hymns, become fruitless and produce evil results, so sin and evil results originate from falsehood.

29 O prince, I have thus described to you this doctrine of the fruition of good and evil deeds, as recounted by the Rishis of old. What else do you wish to hear."

CHAPTER VIII.

(ANUSHASANIKA PARVA).—Continued.

Yudhishthira said —

1. "Who are deserving of adoration? Who are they to whom one may bow? Who are they, O Bharata, to whom you would lower your head? Who, again, are they whom you like? Tell me all this, O prince.

2. What is that upon which your mind turn when affliction overwhelms you Do you describe to me what is beneficial here, that is, in this region of human beings, as also hereafter.

Bhishma said —

3 I like those twice born persons whose highest wealth is Brahma, whose heaven is their knowledge of the soul, and whose penances are formed by their diligent study of the Vedas.

4 My heart longs for those in whose family persons young and old diligently bear the ancestral burthens without languishing under them.

5—7. Brahmanas well-trained in several branches of knowledge, self controlled, mild-speeched, conversant with the scriptures, well-behaved, possessed of the knowledge of Brahma, and righteous in conduct, discourse in respectable assemblies like flights of swans They in a voice deep as the muttering of clouds give vent to auspicious, sweet, excellent, and well-pronounced words, O Yudhishthira. In the courts of monarchs, they spoke these words fraught with happiness both temporal and spiritual, themselves being received with honor and attention and served with respect by those kings.

8. Indeed, my heart longs after them who endued with knowledge and all desirable attributes, and honoured by others, listen to such words when uttered in assemblies or the courts of kings.

9 My heart, O king, always yearns after them who, for the satisfaction of Brahmanas, O Yudhishthira, give to them, with devotion, food that is well-cooked and clean and wholesome.

10. It is easy to fight in battle, but not so to make a gift without pride or vanity.

11. In this world, O Yudhisthira, there are hundreds of brave men and heroes. While counting them, he who is a hero in gifts should be considered as superior.

12. O amiable one, if I had been even a vulgar Brahmana I would have considered myself as very great, not to speak of one born in a good family, gifted with righteousness of conduct, and given to penances and learning.

13 There is no one, O son of Pandu, in this world, who is dearer to me than you, O chief of Bharata's race, but Brahmanas are dearer to me than you.

14. And since, O best of the Kurus, the Brahmanas are very much dearer to me than you, it is by that truth that I expect to go to all those regions of happiness which have been gained by my father Shantanu.

15 Neither my father, nor my grandfather, nor any one else connected with me by blood, is dearer to me than the Brahmanas.

16 I do not expect any fruit, small or great, from my adoration of the Brahmanas.

17. On account of what I have done to the Brahmanas in thought, word, and deed, I do not feel any pain now.

18. People used to call me as one devoted to the Brahmanas This address always pleased me highly. To do good to the Brahmanas is the most sacred of all sacred duties.

19 I see many regions of beatitude waiting for me who have respectfully followed the Brahmanas. Very soon shall I go to those regions for good, O son

20 In this world, O Yudhisthira, the duties of women depend upon their husbands. To a woman, verily, the husband is the god and he is the highest end for which she should try. As the husband to the wife, so are the Brahmanas to Kshatriyas.

21. If there be a Kshatriya hundred years old and a good Brahmana child of only ten years, the latter should be considered as a father and the former as a son, for among the two, the Brahmana is superior.

22 A woman, in the absence of her husband, takes his younger brother for her lord, so the Earth, not having obtained Brahmana, made the Kshatriya her king

23 The Brahmanas should be protected like sons and adored like fathers or preceptors Indeed O best of the Kurus, they served reverentially as people wait with respect upon their sacrificial or Homa fires.

24 The Brahmanas are gifted with simplicity and righteousness They are given to truth They are always engaged in the behalf of all creatures. Yet when angry they are like snakes of dreadful venom They should, for these reasons, be always waited upon and served with respect and humility.

25 One should, O Yudhishthira, always fear these two, viz Energy and Penances. Both these should be shirked or kept at a distance.

26 The effects of both are quick There is this superiority, however of Penances viz, that Brahmanas gifted with Penances O king, can, if angry, kill the object of their anger.

27 Even greatest Energy and Penances, become neutralised if applied against a Brahmana who has conquered anger If the two,—that is, Energy and Penances—be set against each other, then both of them would be destroyed Again when Energy, is set against Penances, it is sure to be destroyed without leaving a remnant Penances applied against Energy cannot be destroyed completely

28 As the herdsman stick in hand protects the herd so should the Kshatriya always protect the Vedas and the Brahmanas

29 The Kshatriya should protect all pious Brahmanas as a father protects his sons He should always look after the houses of the Brahmanas for finding out that the means of subsistence may not be wanting '

(ANUSHASANIKA PARVA) —

Yudhisthira said —

1 "O grandfather, O you of great splendour, what do those men become who through stupefaction of intellect, do not make gifts to Brahmanas after having promised to make those gifts?

2 O foremost of all righteous persons, do tell me what the duties are in this matter Indeed, what becomes the end of those wicked men who do not give after having promised to give "

Bhishma said :—

3 ' The person who after having promised does not give be it little or much, has the mortification to witness his hopes frustrated like the hopes of a enunch about children.

4—5 Whatever good acts such a person does between the day of his birth and that of his death, O Bharata whatever libations he pours on the sacrificial fire, whatever gifts he makes, O chief of Bharata's race, and whatever penances he performs, all becomes useless.

6 They who are conversant with the scriptures hold this as their opinion, arriving at it, O chief of the Bharatas, with the help of a well ordered understanding.

7, Persons conversant with the scriptures also opine that such a man may be purified by giving away a thousand horses with dark ears

8 Regarding it is cited the old discourse between a jackal and an ape

9 While both were human beings, O scorcher of enemies they were intimate friends After death one of them became a jackal and the other an ape.

10 Seeing the jackal one day eating an animal carcase in the midst of a crematorium the ape, remembering his own and his friend's pristine birth as human beings, addressed him, saying —

11 Verily what dreadful sin did you commit in your pristine birth on account of which you are obliged in this birth to feed in a crematorium upon such repulsive food as the putrid carcase of an animal?

12 Thus addressed the jackal replied to the ape, saying —Having promised to give to a Brahmana I did not make him the gift

13 It is for that sin O ape that I have fallen into this wretched state of existence It is for that reason that when hungry, I am obliged to eat such food

Bhishma said —

14 The jackal then, O best of men, addressed the monkey and said —What sin did you commit for which you have become an ape

The ape said:—

15 In my former life I used to eat the fruits belonging to Brahmanas. Hence have I become an ape. Hence it is clear that one endued with intelligence and learning should never take what belongs to Brahmanas. As one should abstain from this, one should avoid also all quarrels with Brahmanas. Having promised, one should certainly make the promised gift to them.

Bhishma said:—

16 I heard this, O king, from my preceptor while he was discoursing upon the subject of Brahmanas I heard this from that pious person when he recounted the old and sacred declarations on this topic.

17. I heard this from Krishna also, O king, while he was discoursing, O son of Pandu, upon Brahmanas.

18. The property of a Brahmana should never be taken. They should always be let alone Poor, or miserly, or young in years, they should never be dishonoured.

19 The Brahmanas have always taught me this Having promised to make them a gift, the gift should be made A superior Brahmana should never be disappointed in his expectations.

20. A Brahmana, O king, in whom an expectation has been raised, has, O king, been said to be like a burning fire.

21. That man upon whom a Brahmana with raised expectations looks, is sure, O king, to be reduced to ashes as a heap of straw is capable of being consumed by a burning fire.

22 When the Brahmana, gratified by the king, addresses the king in delightful and affectionate words, he becomes, O Bharata, a source of great good to the king, for he continues to live in the kingdom like a physician fighting against various ills of the body.

23 Such a Brahmana is sure to maintain peacefully the sons and grandsons and animals and relatives and ministers and other officers and the city and the provinces of the king.

24. Such is the energy of the Brahmana, like to that of the thousand-rayed Sun himself, on the Earth.

25 Therefore, O Yudhishthira, if one wishes to come by a respectable or happy order of being in his next birth, he should, having made the promise to a Brahmana, certainly satisfy it by actually making the gift to him.

26 By making gifts to a Brahmana one is sure to acquire the highest heaven. Verily, the making of gifts is the highest of deeds that one can perform.

27 The gods and the departed manes are supported by the gifts one makes to a Brahmana. Hence one endued with knowledge should ever make gifts to the Brahmanas,

28 O chief of the Bharatas, the Brahmana is considered as the highest object to whom gifts should be made. At no time should a Brahmana be received without due adoration."

CHAPTER X.

(ANUSHASANIKA PARVA)—Continued.

Yudhishthira said:—

1 "I wish to know, O royal sage, whether any sin is committed by one who from interested or disinterested friendship delivers instructions to a person of a low order of birth.

2. O grandfather, I wish to hear this explained to me in full The course of duty is highly subtle. Men are often seen to be stupefied about that course.

Bhishma said:—

3 About it, O king, I shall recite to you, in due order, what I heard certain Rishis say in days of yore.

4 Instruction should not be given to one who belongs to a low or degraded caste. It is said that the preceptor who delivers instruction to such a person commits great sin.

5 Listen to me, O chief of Bharatas, as I recite to you, O Yudhishthira, this incident which took place in days of yore, O king, of the evil consequences of imparting of instruction to a low-born person fallen into distress.

6 The incident which I shall describe, took place in the hermitage of certain twice-born sages which stood on the auspicious breast of Himavat There, on the breast of that king of mountains, was a sacred asylum adorned with trees of various kinds.

7. Overgrown also with various species of creepers and plants, it was the resort of many animals and birds. Inhabited by Siddhas and Charanas also, it was highly delightful on account of the woods that flowered there at every season.

8 Many Brahmacharins lived there, and many hermits Many Brahmanas lived there, who were highly blessed and who resembled the sun or the fire in energy and effulgence

9 Ascetics of various kinds, observant of various restraints and vows, as also others, O king of the Bharatas who had gone through initiatory rites and were frugal in fare and possessed of purified souls, lived there

10 Large numbers of Valkhilyas and many who observed the vow of Sanyasa also, used to live there. On account of all this, the hermitage resounded with the recitation of the Vedas and the sacred Mantras uttered by its dwellers.

11. Once upon a time a Shudra endued with mercy for all creatures, ventured to come into that hermitage. Arrived at that retreat, he was duly honored by all the ascetics

12 Seeing those ascetics of diverse classes who were endued with great energy, that resembled the gods, and who were observing diverse kinds of initiation, O Bharata, the Shudra became highly pleased at heart.

13—14 Seeing everything, O chief of Bharata's race, the Shudra felt inclined to devote himself to the practice of penances. Touching the feet of the head of the order, O Bharata, he said to him — Through your favour, O foremost of twice-born persons, I wish to learn the duties of religion. You should, O illustrious one, describe to me those duties and introduce me into a life of Renunciation.

15 I am certainly inferior in colour, O illustrious one, for I am by caste a Shudra, O best of men! I wish to wait upon and serve you here Be pleased with me who humbly seek your shelter.

The Kulapati said :—

16 It is impossible that a Shudra should live here following the life of Renunciation. If it pleases you, you may stay here and serve us

17 Forsooth, by such service you shall acquire many regions of great happiness.

Bhishma said.—

18 Thus addressed by the ascetic, the Shudra began to think in his mind, O king,—How should I now act? I have great reverence for those religious duties which lead to merit.

19 Let this, however, be settled, that I shall do what would be for my behoof. Proceed he to a spot that was d stant from that hermitage, he made a hut of the twigs and leaves of trees

20 Erecting also a sacrificial platform, and making a little room for his sleep, and some platforms for the use of the gods, he began, O chief of the Bharatas, to lead a life governed by rigid observances and vows and to practise penances, abstaining entirely from speech.

21 He began to perform ablutions thrice a day, observe other vows, make sacrifices to the gods, pour libations on the sacrificial fire, and adore and worship the gods in this way.

22—23. Governing all carnal desires, living sparingly upon fruits and roots, governing all his senses, he daily welcomed and entertained all that came to his hermitage as guests, offering them herbs and fruits which grew in abundance around In this way he passed a very long time in that hermitage of his.

24 One day an ascetic came to that Shudra's asylum for making his aquaintance The Sudra welcomed and adored the Rishi with due rites, and pleased him highly.

25 Possessed of great energy, and a righteous soul that Rishi of rigid vows conversed with his host on many agreeable subjects and informed him of the place whence he had come

26 In this way, O chief of the Bharatas, that Rishi, O best of men, came into the hermitage of the Shudra in numerable times for seeing him.

27 On one of these occasions the Shudra, O king, addressing the Rishi, said,—I wish to perform the rites that are ordained for the Pitris. Do you show me kindness in this matter.

28 Very well —the Brahmana said in reply to him, O king.

29. Then, purifying himself by a bath, the Shudra brought water for the Rishi to wash his feet, and he also brought some Kusha grass, and wild herbs and fruits, and a sacred seat, and the seat called Vrishi.

30—31 The Vrishi however, was placed by the Shudra towards the south, with its head turned to the west Seeing this and knowing that it was against the ordinance, the Rishi addressed the Shudra, saying — Place the Vrishi with its head turned towards the East, and having purified yourself, do you sit with your face turned towards the north —The Shudra did everything as the Rishi directed.

32—35 Endued with great intelligence, and practising righteousness, the Shudra received every direction, about the Sraddha, as laid down in the ordinance, from that Rishi gifted with penances, marking the manner of spreading the Kusha grass, and placing the Arghyas, and as regards the rites to be observed in the matter of the libations to be poured and the food to be offered After the rites in honor of the Pitris had been finished, the Rishi, was sent away by the Shudra, whereupon he returned to his own abode After a long time, the whole of which he passed practising such penances and vows, the Shudra ascetic died in those woods. On account of the merit he acquired by those practices the Shudra in his next life, was born in the family of a great king, and in time became possessed of great splendour. The twice-born Rishi also, when the time came, paid his debt to Nature.

36 In his next life, O chief of Bharata's race, he was born in the family of a priest Thus those two, viz , that Shudra who had passed a life of penances and that twice-born Rishi who had out of kindness given the former some instructions in the matter of the rites performed in honour of the Pitris, became re-born, the one as the son of a royal race and the other as the member of a priestly family.

37. Both of them began to grow and both gained great knowledge in the usual branches of study. The Brahmana became well versed in the Vedas as also in the Atharvans.

38. The re-born Rishi gained great perfection in all sacrifices ordained in the Sutras, of the Vedanga which deals with religious rites and observances, astrology and astronomy. He took great pleasure in the Sankhya philosophy too

39 Meanwhile, the re born Shudra who had become a prince, when his father the king died, performed his last rites, and after he had purified himself by performing all the obsequial rites, he was installed by the subjects of his father as their king on his paternal throne.

40 But soon after his own installation as king he installed the re born Rishi as his priest Having made the Brahmana his priest, the king began to pass his days happily.

41—42. He ruled his kingdom piously and protected and maintained all his subjects. Every day, however, the king, seeing his priest on the occasion of receiving benedictions from him as also of the performance of religious and other sacred rites, smiled or laughed loudly In this way, O king, the re-born Shudra who had become a king, laughed at seeing his priest on numberless occasions.

43 The priest, marking that the king always smiled or laughed whenever he happened to look at him, became angry,

44 On one occasion he met the king in a place where there was nobody present. He pleased the king by agreeable conversation, 45 Taking advantage of that moment, O chief of Bharata's race the priest addressed the king, saying,—O you of great splendour, I pray you to grant me a single boon.

The king said :—

46 Of boons, O best of twice-born persons, I am ready to grant you a hundred, what do you say then of one only? From the affection I have for you and the reverence in which I hold you, there is nothing that I cannot give you

The priest said —

47 I wish to have only one boon, if, O king, you have been pleased with me. Promise that you would tell me the truth, instead of any untruth.

Bhishma said :—

48 Thus addressed by the priest, O Yudhisthira, the king said to him—So be it! If I know what you would ask me, I shall certainly tell you truly If on the other hand, I do not know it, I shall not say anything.

The priest said :—

49 Every day, on occasions of receiving benedictions from me, when, again, I am engaged in the performance of religious rites, on your behalf, on occasions also of the Homa and other rites of propitiation, why do you laugh upon seeing me?

50 Seeing you laugh at me on all occasions, my mind shrinks with shame, I have made you promise, O king, that you would answer me truly. You should not tell an untruth.

51 There must be some grave reason for your conduct. Your laughter cannot be causeless. I have great curiosity to know the reason. Do, you speak truly to me.

The king said :—

52 While you have thus accosted me, O twice born one I am bound to enlighten you even if the matter be one that should not be given out to you! I must tell you the truth. Do you listen to me with rapt attention, O twice-born one.

53. Listen, O foremost of twice-born persons, to me as I give out to you what took place (to us) in our pristine births. I remember that birth. Do you listen to me with concentrated mind.

54. In my former life I was a Shudra engaged in the practice of severe penances. You, O best of twice-born persons, were a Rishi of austere penances.

55 O sinless one, pleased with me, and moved by the desire of doing me good, you, O Brahmana, were pleased to give me certain instructions about the rites I performed in honor of my departed manes.

56. You instructed me about the manner of spreading the Vrishi and the Kusha blades and of offering libations and meat and other food, O foremost of ascetics. On account of this transgression of yours you are born as a priest.

57. I have taken birth as a king, O foremost of Brahmanas. See the changes that Time encompasses. You have reaped this fruit on account of your having instructed me.

58 It is for this reason, O Brahmana, that I smile at seeing you O foremost of twice-born persons. I do not certainly laugh at you from desire of disregarding you. You are my preceptor.

59 I am really very sorry at this change of condition. My heart burns at the thought I remember our former births, hence do I laugh at seeing you.

60 Your austere penances were all destroyed by the instructions you gave me Removing your present office of priest, do you try to regain a superior birth.

61. Do you exert so that you may not obtain in your next life a birth meaner than your present one Take as much riches as you wish, O learned Brahmana, and purify your soul, O best of men,

Bhishma continued —

62. Dismissed by the king, the Brahmana made many gifts, to persons of his own own order, of riches and land and villages.

63. He observed many rigid and severe vows as laid down by the foremost of Brahmanas. He sojourned to many sacred waters and made many gifts to Brahmanas in those places.

64 Making gifts of kine to persons of the twice-born order, his soul became purified and he succeeded in gaining a knowledge of it. Going to that very asylum where he had lived in his former birth, he practised very severe penances.

65. As the result of all this, O foremost of kings, that Brahmana gained the highest success. He became an object of respect with all the ascetics who lived in that asylum.

66. In this way, O best of kings, that twice-born Rishi fell into great distress. The Brahmana should, therefore, never give instructions to Shudras.

67. Hence, O king, the Brahmana should avoid delivering instructions to such as are low-born) for it was by giving instructions to a low-born person a Brahmana came to grief.

68 O best of kings, the Brahmana should never desire to acquire instruction from or impart instruction to, a person who belongs to the lowest order.

69 Brahmanas and Kshatriyas and Vaishyas, these three orders, are considered as twice-born. By delivering instruction to these, a Brahmana does not commit any sin.

70 They, therefore, who are good, should never discourse on any subject, for giving any instruction, before persons of the inferior caste. The course of morality is highly subtile and incapable of being understood by persons of uncleansed soul.

71. It is for this reason that ascetics adopt the vow of silence, and, honored by all, pass through initiation without speaking a single word. For fear of saying what is incorrect or what may offend, ascetics never utter a single word.

72. Even men who are righteous and endued with every accomplishment, and truth and simplicity of conduct, have been known to commit great sin on account of words spoken improperly.

73. Instruction should never be given on anything to any person. If on account of the instructions given, the instructed commit any sin that sin attaches to the Brahmana who gave the instruction.

74 The wise man, therefore, who wishes to acquire merit, should always act with wisdom That instruction which is given in exchange for money always sullies the instructor.

75 Requested by others, one should say only what is correct after determining it with the help of reflection. One should give instruction in such a way that one may, by giving it, acquire merit.

77. I have thus told you everything about instructions. Very often persons become plunged into great afflictions on account of giving instruction Hence it is proper that one should abstain from giving instruction to others."

CHAPTER XI.

(ANUSHASANIKA PARVA)—Continued.

Yudhisthira said :—

1. "Tell me O grandfather, in what kind of man or woman, O chief of the Bharatas, does the goddess of Prosperity always live"

Bhishma said :—

2. "About it, I shall describe to you what took place and what I have heard Once on a time the princess Rukmini put this question in the presence of Devaki's son.

3 Seeing the goddess of Prosperity, shining with beauty and gifted with the hue of the lotus, the mother of Pradyumna having the emblem of Makara on his banner, filled with curiosity, said these words

4 Who are those beings whom you help and whom you serve? Who, again, are those whom you do not serve? O you who are dear to Him who is the lord of all creatures, tell me this truly, O you who are equal to a great Rishi in penances and power.

5 Thus addressed by the princess, the goddess of Prosperity, with a face beautiful like the moon, and, actuated by grace in the presence of the deity having the emblem of Garuda on his banner, said these words in reply which were sweet and charming.

Shree said —

6 O blessed lady, I always live with Him who is eloquent, active, attentive to business, free from anger, given to the adoration of the gods endued with gratitude, has his passions under complete restraint, and is high minded in everything.

honor, who are distressed at every trifle, and who always indulge in anger Nor do I ever live with those who think in one way and act in a different way.

9 I never live also with him who never wishes for any acquisition for himself, or him who is so blinded as to rest satisfied with the lot in which he finds himself without any exertion, or with those who are contented with small gains.

10 I live with those who perform the duties of their own order, or those who are conversant with the duties of virtue, or those who are given to the service of the aged, or those who have their passions under restraint, or those that are gifted with purified souls, or those who observe the virtue of forgiveness, or those who are able and prompt in action, or with such women as are forgiving and self-controlled.

11. I live with those women also who are given to truth and sincerity and who adore the gods I do not live with those women also who do not look after household furniture and provisions scattered all around the house, and who always utter words against the wishes of their husbands.

12 I always avoid those women who are fond of the houses of other people and who have no modesty. On the other hand, I live with those women who are devoted to their husbands, who are blessed in conduct, and who are always adorned with ornaments and well clad.

13 I always live with those women who are truthful in words, who are handsome and lovely in appearance, who are blessed and who are gifted with all accomplishments I always avoid such women who are sinful and unclean or impure, who always lick the corners of their mouths, who have no patience or fortitude, and who are fond of dispute and quarreling, who are indolent and sleepy and always inclined to lie down. I always live in conveyances and the animals that drag them, in maidens, in ornaments and good dresses in sacrifices in clouds charged with rain in full blown lotuses and in those stars that covers the autumnal sky I live in elephants, in the cowpen in good seats and in lakes adorned with full blown lotuses.

plunging into them for bathing or satisfying their thirst. I live also in angry elephants, in bulls, in kings, on the throne, and in good men

18 I always live in that house in which the inmate pours libations on the sacrificial fire and adore kine, Brahmanas, and the gods. I live in that house where at the proper time offerings are made, to the gods, of flowers in course of worship.

19. I always live in such Brahmanas as are given to the study of the Vedas, in Kshatriyas devoted to the observance of virtue, in Vaishyas devoted to cultivation, and in Shudras devoted to the service of the three upper castes.

20 I live, with a heart firm and unshaken, in Narayana, in my embodied self In Him exists virtue, full and perfect, devotion to the Brahmanas, and the quality of goodness

21. Can I not say, O lady, that I do not live in my embodied form? That person in whom I live in spirit increases in virtue and fame and wealth and objects of desire."

CHAPTER XII.

(ANUSHASANIKA PARVA).—Continued.

Yudhishthira said:—

1 "You should, O king, tell me truly which of the two, viz, man or woman, gets the greater pleasure from an act of union with each other. Kindly remove my doubt about it."

Bhishma said:—

2. To illustrate this question, the old discourse between Bhangaswana and Shakra is cited in this connexion.

3 In days of old there lived a king name Bhangaswana He was very pious and was known as a royal sage He was, however, childless O king, and, therefore, made a sacrifice from desire of getting a son

4. The sacrifice which that powerful king celebrated was the Agnishtuta, which on account of the god of fire being alone worshipped in it is always disliked by Indra Yet it is the sacrifice that is desired by men when for the object of getting children they seek to purify themselves of their sins

5 Learning that the king was desireus of performing the Agnishtuta, the highly blessed king of the gods viz, Indra, began from that moment to look for the shortcomings of that royal sage of well controlled soul.

6 Despite all his careful watch Indra, however, O king, could not find any shortcomings on the part of the great king. Sometime after, one day, the king went on a hunting expedition.

7. Saying to himself,—This, indeed, is an opportunity,—Indra stupefied the king. The king went alone on his horse confounded, because of the king of the gods having stupefied his senses.

8 Stricken with hunger and thirst, the king's confusion was so great that he could not see the cardinal points Indeed, stricken with thirst, he began to rove about.

9 He then saw a lake that was highly beautiful and was full of transparent water. Descending from his horse, and plunging into the lake, he made it is animal to drink.

10 Tying his horse then, whose thirst had been satisfied, to a tree, the king plunged into the lake again for doing his ablutions To his surprise he found that he was metamorphosed by virtue of the waters, into a woman

11, Seeing himself thus changed in respect of sex itself the king became filled with shame. With his senses and mind completely agitated he began to think thus with his whole heart.

12—13 Alas, how shall I ride my horse? How return to my capital? On account of the Agnishtuta sacrifice I have got a hundred sons all gifted with great strength and all children of my own loins! Alas, thus changed what shall I say to them? What shall I say to my wives my relatives and well-wishers, and my subjects of the city and the provinces?

14 Rishis versed in the truths of duty and religion and other matters say that mildness and softness and susceptibility to extreme agitation are the characteristics of women, and that activity, hardness and energy are the characteristics of men Alas, my manliness is gone! For why has femininity possessed me? On account of this change of sex, how shall I succeed in riding my horse again?

16 Having thought thus the king, with great exertion, mounted his horse and returned to his capital changed though he had been into a woman.

17 Seeing that extraordinary change his sons and wives and servants, and his subjects of the city and the provinces were extremely amazed.

18. Then addressing them all, that royal sage, that foremost of orators, said,—I had gone out on a hunting expedition, accompanied by a large army. Losing all knowledge of the cardinal points I entered a thick and dreadful forest, moved by the fates.

19 In that terrible forest, I became very much thirsty and lost my senses. I then saw a beautiful lake abounding with fowl of all sorts.

20—21. Plunging into that lake for performing my ablutions, I was changed into a woman!—Summoning then his wives and counsellors, and all his sons by their names, that best of kings changed into a woman said to them these words:—Do ye enjoy this kingdom happily. About myself, I shall go to the forest, ye sons.

22. Having said thus to his children, the king went to the forest. Arrived there, she arrived at a hermitage inhabited by an ascetic.

23—24. By that ascetic the changed monarch gave birth to a hundred sons. Taking all those children of hers, she went to where her former children were, and addressing the latter, said, Ye are the children of my loins while I was a man These are my children given birth to by me in this state of change. Sons, do you all enjoy my kingdom together, like brothers born of the same parents.

25—26 Thus commanded by their parent, all the brothers, in a body, began to enjoy the kingdom as their joint property Seeing those children of the king all jointly enjoying the kingdom as brothers born of the same parents, the king of the gods, filled with anger, began to reflect,—By transforming this royal sage into a woman, I have, it appears, done him good instead of an injury.

27 Saying this, the king of the gods, viz, Indra of a hundred sacrifices, assuming the form of a Brahmana, went to the capital of the king and meeting all the children succeeded in creating dissensions amongst them.

28. He said to them,—Brothers never remain at peace even when they are the children of the same father The sons of the sage Kashyapa, viz, the gods and the Asuras, fell out with each other on account of the sovereignty of the three worlds.

29 As regards you princes, you are the children of the royal sage Bhangaswana These others are the children of an ascetic The gods and the Asuras are children of even one common father.

30. This kingdom, your paternal property is being enjoyed by these children of an ascetic,—with these words, Indra succeeded in creating disunion amongst them, so that they very soon engaged in battle and killed each other.

31. Hearing this, king Bhangaswana, who was living as an ascetic woman, burning with grief and began to bewail. The king of the gods, viz, Indra, assuming the form of a Brahmana, came where the ascetic lady was living, and meeting her, said,—O you having a beautiful face, with what grief do you burn so that you are thus bewailing? Seeing the Brahmana, the lady told him in a piteous tone.

33 Two hundred sons of mine, O twice-born one, have been killed by Time. I was formerly a king, O learned Brahmana and in that state had a hundred sons.

34 These were begotten by me after my own form, O best of twice-born persons! On one occasion I went on a hunting expedition. Stupefied, I travelled amidst a thick forest.

35 Seeing at last a lake, I plunged into it. Rising, O foremost of Brahmanas, I found that I had become a woman. Returning to my capital I installed my sons in the kingdom and then left for the forest.

36 Changed into a woman, I bore a hundred sons to my husband who is a great ascetic. All of them were born in the ascetic's retreat. I took them to the capital.

37. My children, through the influence of Time, fell out with each other, O twice-born one! Thus afflicted by Destiny, I am bewailing.

38. Indra addressed him in these harsh words,—In former days, O lady, you gave me great pain, for you did perform a sacrifice that is disliked by Indra.

39 Indeed, though I was present, you did not invoke me with honors. I am that Indra, O you of wicked understanding! It is I with whom you sought hostilities.

40. Seeing Indra, the royal sage fell at his feet, touching them with his head, and said,—Be pleased with me, O foremost of gods. The sacrifice of which you speak was performed from a desire of offspring.

41. You should, therefore, pardon me. Seeing the transformed king prostrate himself thus to him, Indra became pleased with him and and wished to give him a boon

42. Which of your sons, O king, do you wish, should revive, these whom you gave birth to as a woman, or those who were begotten by you as a man.

43 Joining her hands, the ascetic lady, answered Indra, saying,—O Vasava, let those sons of mine revive who were borne by me as a woman.

44. Filled with wonder at this reply, Indra once more asked the lady,—Why do you cherish less affection for those children of thine who were begotten by you as a man?

45 Why is it that you love more those children that were borne by you in your changed state? I wish to hear the reason of this difference in your love. You should tell me everything.

The lady said:—

49 The affection that is cherished by a woman is much greater than that which is cherished by a man Therefore, O Shakra, I wish those children to revive that were borne by me as a woman.

Bhishma said.—

47. Thus addressed, Indra became highly pleased and said to her,—O truthful lady, let all your children come back into life.

48 Do you take another boon, O foremost of kings,—whatever you like, O you of excellent vows Do you take from me whatever dignity you choose, that of woman or of man.

The lady said —

49—51. I wish to remain a woman, O Sakra In fact, I do not wish to become a man, O Vasava —Hearing this answer, Indra once more asked her, saying,—Why is it, O powerful one, that leaving aside the dignity of manhood you seek for that of womanhood? Thus accosted that foremost of kings transformed into a woman, answered,—In sexual intercourse, the pleasure that women enjoy is always much greater than what is enjoyed by men Therefore, O Sakra, I wish to continue a woman.

52 O foremost of the gods, truly do I say to you that I derive greater pleasure in my present state of womanhood I am quite content with this state of womanhood that I now have Do you leave me now, O king of heaven.

53 Hearing these words of hers, the lord of the gods answered —So be it — and bidding her farewell, went to heaven. Thus O king it is known that woman derives much greater pleasure than men under the circumstances you have asked."

CHAPTER XIII.

(ANUSHASANA PARVA) — Continued

Yudhishthira said:—

1. "What should a man do in order to pass happily through this and the other world How, indeed, should one act? What practices should one follow with this view?"

Bhishma said:—

2 "One should avoid the three deeds which are done with the body, the four which are done with words, the three which are done with the mind, and the ten roads of action.

3 The three deeds which are done with the body and should be wholly avoided are the destruction of the lives of other creatures, theft or misappropriation of others' properties and the enjoyment of of other people's wives.

4 The four acts which are done with words, O king and which should never be done or even thought of, are evil conversation, harsh words, giving other people's faults and falsehood.

5 Coveting the possessions of others doing harm to others, and disbelief in the Vedas, are the three deeds done with the mind which should always be avoided

6 Hence, one should never do any evil deed in speech, body, or mind By doing good and evil deeds, one is sure to enjoy or reap the just consequences thereof. Nothing can be more certain than this."

CHAPTER XIV.

(ANUSHASANIKA PARVA).— Continued.

Yudhisthira said:—

1 "O son of the River Ganga, you have heard all the names of the oLrd of the universe Tell us, O grandfather, all the names that are applied, O powerful one, to Him who is called Ishia and Shambhu

2 Tell us all those names which are applied to Him who is called Vabhru or vast, Him who has the universe for his form, Him who is the illustrious Lord of all the gods and the Asuras, who is called Shankara and who has an origin that is unmanifest. Tell us also of the power of Mahadeva."

Bhishma said :—

3 I am quite incompetent to recite the virtues of the highly intelligent Mahadeva. He pervades all things in the universe and yet is not seen anywhere

4 He is the creator of Brahman, Vishnu, and Indra, and he is their lord. All the gods, from Brahman to the Pishachas, adore him.

5. He is above both Prakriti and Purusha It is of Him that Rishis, conversant with Yoga and possessing a knowledge of all subjects think and reflect

6 He is indestructible and Supreme Brahma He is both existent and non-existent. Agitating both Nature and Soul by His energy, He created therefrom the universal lord of creatures, viz , Brahman.

7 Who is there, who is competent to recount the virtues of that god of gods, who is gifted with supreme Intelligence ? Man is subject to conception, birth, decrepitude, and death

8 Being such, what man like me can understand Bhava? Only Narayana, O son, that holder of the conch the discus, and the mace can comprehend Mahadeva

9 He gifted with knowledge He is the foremost of all beings in qualities He is Vishnu because he pervades the universe He is irresistible Gifted with spiritual vision He is possessed of supreme Energy He sees all things with the eye of Yoga

10 On account of his devotion to the illustrious Rudra whom he pleased, O Bharata, in the hermitage of Vadari by penances, that the great Krishna has succeeded in overwhelming the entire universe

11 O king of kings, it is through Maheshwara of celestial vision that Vasudeva has got the quality of universal agreeableness —an agreeableness which is much greater than riches

12 For a full thousand years this Madhava practised the austerest penances and at last succeeded in pleasing the illustrious and boon giving Shiva that lord of all the mobile and the immobile universe

13 In every new cycle has Krishna pleased Mahadeva In every cycle has Mahadeva been pleased with the great devotion of the great Krishna

14 Hari who himself is above all decay, saw the power of the great Mahadeva —that original cause of the universe, —on the occasion of his penances in the retreat of Vadari undergone for getting a son

15 I do not, O Bharata see any one who is superior to Mahadeva Only Krishna is competent to explain the names of that god of gods fully and without creating the desire of hearing more 16 This mighty-armed one of Vadu's race is alone competent to tell the qualities of the illustrious Shiva Verily, O king, only he is able to describe fully the power of the Supreme god.

Vaishampayana said :—

17. Having said these words, the illustrious Bhishma, the grandfather of the Kurus, addressing Vasudeva, said the following words describing the greatness of Bhava, O king.

Bhishma said :—

18 You are the Lord of all the gods and the Asuras You are illustrious You are Vishnu because you pervade the entire universe You should describe those subjects connected with Shiva of universal form about which Yudhishthira has asked me

19 In days of yore the Rishi Tandin, originated from Brahman recited in Brahman's region and before Brahman himself the thousand names of Mahadeva

19 Do you recite those names before this assemblage of Rishis having asceticism for their wealth observant of high vows, possessed of self control, and numbering the Island born Krishna among them, may hear you

21 Do you discourse the high blessedness of Him who is immutable, who is always cheerful and happy, who is Hotri, who is the universal Protector, who is Creator of the universe, and who is called Mundin and Kaparddin.

Vasudeva said :—

22 The very gods with Indra, and the Grandfather Brahman numbering among them, and the great Rishis also, cannot understand the course of Mahadeva's deeds truly and full.

23 Even He is the end which all righteous people gain. The very Adityas who are gifted with subtle sight, are unable to see his abode How then can one who is merely a man succeed in comprehending Him?

24 I shall, therefore, truly recount to you some only of the qualities of that illustrious killer of Asuras, who is considered as the Lord of all sacrifices and vows,

Vaishampayana said:—

25 Having said these words, the illustrious Vasudeva began his discourse on the qualities of the great Mahadeva gifted with the highest intelligence, after having purified himself by touching water.

Vasudeva said.—

26 Hear, ye foremost of Brahmanas, and you Yudhisthira also, O sire, and hear you too, O River's son the names which are applied to Kapardin.

27. Hear, ye, how in days of yore. I gained a sight, so difficult to get, for the sake of Shamva Verily, in those days was the illustrious god seen by me on account of Yoga-abstraction.

28. After twelve years had passed from the time when Pradyumna, the son of Rukmini, who is gifted with great intelligence, killed the Asura Shamvara in days of yore, my wife Jamvavati addressed me

29—30 Indeed, seeing Pradyumna and Charudeshna and other sons born of Rukmini, Jamvavati, desirous of a son, said these words to me, O Yudhisthira,—

30 Grant me, O you of undecaying glory, a heroic son, the foremost of powerful men, possessed of the most lovely features sinless and like yourself. And O, let there be no delay on your part in granting this prayer of mine!

31. There is nothing in the three worlds which you cannot acquire! O perpetuator of Vadu's race, you can create other worlds if only you wish! Observing a vow for twelve years and purifying yourself, you hadst worshipped the Lord of all creatures (viz, Mahadeva), and then begotten upon Rukmini the sons that she has got from you viz, Charudeshna and Sucharu and Charuvesha and Yashodhana and Charushravas and Charuyashas and Pradyumna and Shambhu.

34 O killer of Madhu do you grant me a son like those of great prowess whom you have begotten upon Rukmini.

35 Thus addressed by the princess, I replied to her having slender waist —Let me have your permission, O queen! I shall certainly obey your command.

37—40 She answered me, saying,—Go, and acquire success and 'prosperity!' Let Brahmana and Shiva and Kashyapa, the Rivers, those gods who preside over the mind, the soil, all deciduous herbs, those Chcahandas who are considered as bearers of the libations poured in sacrifices, the Rishis, Earth, the Oceans, the sacrificial presents, those syllables which are uttered for completing the cadences of Samans, the Rikshas, the Pitris, the Planets, the wives of the gods, the celestial maidens, the celestial mothers, the great cycles, kine, Chandramas, Savitri Agni, Savitri, the knowledge of the Vedas, the seasons, the year, the Kshanas, the Lavas, the Muhurtas, the Nimeshas, and the Yugas in succession, protect you, O Yadava, and keep you in happiness, wherever you may live Let no danger overtake you on your way, and let no carelessness be thine, O sinless one.

41—42. Thus blessed by her, I took her leave, bidding farewell to the daughter of the prince of monkeys. Repairing them to the presence of that foremost of men, viz, my father, of my mother, of the king, and of Ahuka, I informed them of what the daughter of the king of the Vidyadharas, in great misery, had said to me Bidding them farewell with a sorrowful heart, I then went to Gada and to Rama of great power.

43 These two gladly addressed me, saying,—Let your penances multiply without any hinderance.

44. Having got the permission of all of them, I thought of Garuda. He forthwith came to me and took me to Himavat. Arrived at Himavat, I sent him away.

45 There, on that foremost of mountains, I saw many wonderful spectacles I saw an excellent, wonderful, and agreeable hermitage for the practice of penances.

46 That charming retreat was the property of the great Upamanyu who was a descendant of Vyaghrapada. That retreat is spoken highly of and respected by the gods and the Gandharvas and seemed to be covered with Vedic beauty.

47—49. It was adorned with Dhavas and Kakubhas and Kadambas and cocoas with Kuruvakas and Ketakas and Jambus and Patalas, with banians and Varunakas and Vatsanabhas and Vilwas, with Saralas and Kapitthas and Piyalas and Shalas and Palmyras, with Vadaris and Ingudis and Punnagas and Ashokas and Amras and Kovidaras and Champakas and Panasbas, and with various other trees having fruits and flowers And that retreat was also decked with the straight stems of the Musa Sapienta.

50. Truly, that asylum was adorned with various other sorts of trees and with various kinds of fruits forming the food of various kinds of birds. Heaps of ashes were thrown in proper places all around, which enhanced the beauty of the scene.

51. It was full of Rurus and apes and tigers and lions and leopards, deer of various species and peacocks and cats and snakes.

from Mahadeva the power belonging to all the gods and enjoyed it for ten millions of years.

73 He who was the foremost of all his sons, and who was known by the name of Mandara, succeeded, through the boon he had got from Mahadeva, in fighting Shakra for a million of years

74. The terrible discus of Vishnu and the thunderbolt of Indra were both unable to make the least impression, O Keshava, in days of yore, upon the body of that great source of universal misery.

75 The discus which you carry, O sinless one, was given to you by Mahadeva after he had killed a Daitya who, proud of his strength, used to live within the waters

76 That discus, effulgent as fire, was created by the great god having the bull for his emblem Wonderful and irresistible in energy, it was given to you by that illustrious god.

77. On account of its blazing energy it was incapable of being looked at by any person except the holder of Pinaka It was, therefore, that Bhava named it Sudarshanam.

78 From that time it passed by the name of Sudarshanam in all the worlds Even that weapon, O Keshava, failed to make the least impression on the body of Hiranyakashipu's son Mandara, who appeared like an evil planet in the three worlds.

79 Hundreds of Chakras like you and thunderbolts like that of Shakra, could not inflict a scratch on the body of that evil planet gifted with great might who had acquired a boon from Mahadeva

80 Afflicted by the mighty Mandara, the gods fought hard against him and his companions, all of whom had got boons from Mahadeva.

81. Pleased with another Danava named Vidyutprabha, Mahadeva granted to him the sovereignty of the three worlds That Danava remained the king of the three worlds for a hundred thousand years

82 And Mahadeva said to him —You will become one of my attendants —Indeed the powerful Lord further conferred upon him the boon of a hundred millions of children The Unborn Lord of all creatures further gave the Danava the region known as Kushadwipa for his kingdom

83 Another great Asura, named Shatamukha, was created by Brahman For a hundred years he poured on the sacrificial fire the flesh of his own body.

84. Pleased with such penances Shankara said to him,—What can I do for you, —Shatamukha replied, saying,—O you the most wonderful, let me have the power of creating new creatures and animals

85 Give also to me, O foremost of all gods everlasting power —Thus addressed by him, the powerful lord said to him,—So be it.

86 Concentrating his mind in Yoga, the Self create Brahman, in days of yore, made a sacrifice for three hundred years, with the object of getting children.

87. Mahadeva granted him a thousand sons having qualifications proportionate to the merits of the sacrifice Forsooth, you know O Krishna, the Lord of Yoga, him who is, who is sung by the gods.

88 The Rishi known by the name of Yajnavalkya is exceedingly virtuous By worshipping Mahadeva he has gained great fame

89 The great ascetic who is Parashara's son, viz, Vyasa bent on Yoga has become famous by worshipping Shankara

90 The Valikhilyas were on a former occasion dishonored by Maghavat Filled with anger at this, they pleased the illustrious Rudra

91. That lord of the universe, that foremost one of all the gods, thus pleased by the Valikhilyas, said to them —Ye shall succeed by your penances in creating a bird which will rob Indra of the Ambrosia.

92 All the waters disappeared through the anger of Mahadeva on a former occasion The gods pleased him by celebrating a sacrifice called Saptakapala, and caused, through his favour all other waters to flow into the worlds Verily, when the three eyed god, became pleased, water once more appeared in the world

93 The wife of Atri, who was well read in the Vedas forsook her husband in anger and said —I shall no longer live under that ascetic

94 Having said these words, she sought the protection of Mahadeva Through fear of her husband Atri, she passed three hundred years, abstaining from all food

95. And all this time she slept on wooden clubs for pleasing Bhava. The great god then appeared before her and then smilingly addressed her, saying,—You will have a son.

96 And you will have that son without the help of a husband, simply through the favour of Rudra Forsooth that son, born in the family of his father, shall become rivers or in caves or on mountain-breasts, or in shrines and other places of the kind, we pass our time in the practice of penances and the recitation of sacred Mantras, Shiva being our highest refuge Without pleasing the boon giving Sthanu of undecaying glory,—him who is, who has three eyes —whence, O child, can one get food prepared with milk and good dresses and other objects of enjoyment in the world? Do you devote yourself whole-mindedly, O dear son, to Shankara.

125—126 Through his favour, O child, you are sure to obtain all such objects of wishes —Hearing those words of my mother, O destroyer of enemies, that day, I joined my hands in respect and bowing to her, said —O mother, who is this Mahadeva? How can one please him?

127 Where does that god live? How may he be seen? With what does he become pleased? What also is the form of Sharva? How may one succeed in knowing him? If pleased, will he, O mother, appear before me?

128. After I had said these words, O Krishna, to my mother, she, filled with parental affection, smelt my head, O Govinda, her eyes bathed in tears.

129 Gently patting my body, O destroyer of Madhu, my mother, adopting a tone of great humility, addressed me in the following words, O best of the gods.

My mother said :—

130. It is difficult for persons of impure souls to know Mahadeva These men are incapable of bearing him in their hearts or understanding him at all They cannot retain him in their minds. They cannot seize him nor can they see him

131 Wise men say that his forms are manifold Many are the places in which he lives. Many are the forms of his Grace.

132 Who is there who can understand in full all the excellent deeds of Isha, or of all the forms that he has assumed in days of yore?

133 Who can describe how Sharva sports and how he becomes pleased? Maheshwara of universal form lives in the hearts of all creatures.

134 While ascetics discoursed on the auspicious and excellent deeds of Ishana, I have heard from them how, moved by mercy towards his worshippers, he grants them a sight of his body

135 For showing a favour to the Brahmanas, the dwellers of heaven have recited for their information the various forms which were assumed by Mahadeva in days of yore. You have asked me about these. I shall recite them to you, O son.

My mother said :—

136 Bhava assumes the forms of Brahman and Vishnu and the king of the gods of the Rudras the Adityas, and the Ashwins, and of those gods called Vishwedevas.

137. He assumes the forms also of men and women, of Pretas and Pishachas of Kiratas and Shavaras, and of all aquatic animals That illustrious god assumes the forms of also those Shavaras who live in the woods and forests

138 He assumes the forms of tortoises and fishes and conchs He assumes the forms of those corals which are used as ornaments by men.

139 He assumes the forms of also Yakshas and Rakshasas and Snakes, of Daityas and Danavas The illustrious god assumes the forms of all creatures too which live in holes

140. He assumes the forms of tigers and lions and deer, of wolves and bears and birds of owls and of jackals as well.

141 He assumes the forms of swans and crows and peacocks of chameleons and lizards and storks He assumes the forms of cranes and vultures and Chakravakas.

142 He assumes the forms of Chasas and of mountains also O son, Mahadeva assumes the forms of kine and elephants and horses and camels and asses

143 He assumes the forms of also goats and pards and various other animals Bhava assumes the forms of various kinds of birds of beautiful plumage.

144 It is Mahadeva who assumes the form of the Sanyasin bearing the Danda (emblem of mendicancy), and also of the king with the Chhatra and the Brahman with the calabash He sometimes becomes six faced and sometimes becomes multifaced He sometimes assumes forms having three eyes and forms having many heads.

145 And he sometimes assumes forms having many millions of legs and forms having numberless stomachs and faces, and forms gifted with numberless arms and numberless sides. He sometimes appears surrounded by numberless spirits and ghosts.

146 He assumes the forms of Rishis and Gandharvas, and of Siddhas and Charanas He assumes a form which is endered white with the ashes he smears n it and adorned with a half-moon on the orehead

147. Adored with various hymns uttered vith various kinds of voice and adored vith various Mantras fraught with encomiums, he who is sometimes called Sharva, s the Destroyer of all creatures in the niverse, and it is upon him, again, that ll creatures rest as on their common basis.

148. Mahadeva is the soul of all creatures. He pervades all things He is the speaker of all subjects He lives everywhere and should be known as living in the hearts of all creatures in the universe.

149 He knows the desire of every worshipper of his. He becomes acquainted with the object with which one pays him adorations Do you, then, seek the protection of that king of the gods.

150. He sometimes rejoices, and sometimes becomes irate, and sometimes utters the syllable Hun with a very loud noise He sometimes arms himself with the discus, sometimes with the trident, sometimes with the mace, sometimes with the heavy mullets, sometimes with the scimitar, and sometimes with the battle axe.

151. He assumes the form of Shesha who keeps up the world on his head He has snakes for his belt, and his ears are decked with ear-rings made of snakes Snakes form also the sacred thread he wears. An elephant skin is his upper garment.

152 He sometimes laughs and sometimes sings and sometimes dances most beautifully. Surrounded by numberless spirits and ghosts, he sometimes plays on musical instruments Various are the instruments upon which he plays, and sweet the sounds they yield.

153 He sometimes wanders, sometimes yawns, sometimes cries, and sometimes causes others to cry He sometimes assumes the guise of a mad man, and sometimes of a drunkard, and he sometimes utters sweet words.

154 Endued with dreadful fierceness, he sometimes laughs loudly, frightening all creatures with his eyes. He sometimes sleeps and sometimes remains awake, and sometimes yawns as he pleases 155 He sometimes recites sacred Mantras and sometimes becomes the god of those Mantras which are recited. He sometimes practises penances and sometimes becomes the god for whose adoration those penances are practised He sometimes makes gifts and sometimes receives those gifts; sometimes disposes himself in Yoga and sometimes becomes the object of the Yoga of others.

156 He may be seen on the sacrificial platform or in the sacrificial stake, in the midst of the cowpen or in the fire He may not again be seen there. He may be seen as a boy or as an old man.

157. He sports with the daughters and the wives of the Rishis His hair is long and erect He is perfectly nude for he has the horizon for his dress. He has terrible eyes.

158 He is fair, he is darkish, he is dark, he is pale, he is of the color of smoke, and he is red. He has eyes large and terrible. He has empty space for his covering and he covers all things.

159 Who is there that can truly understand the limits of Mahadeva who is formless, who is made up of illusion, who is of the form of all actions in the universe, who assumes the form of Hiranyagharbha, and who is without beginning and end, and birth.

160 He lives in the heart (of every creature) He is the vital air, he is the mind, and he is the individual soul He is the soul of Yoga, and he is called Yoga He is the Yoga meditation into which Yogins enter. He is the Supreme Soul. Indeed, Maheshwara is capable of being apprehended not by the senses but through only the Soul seizing his existence.

161 He plays on various musical instruments. He is a vocalist. He has a hundred thousand eyes He has one mouth, he has two mouths, he has three mouths, and he has many mouths.

162 Devoting yourself to him, fixing your heart upon him, depending upon him, and accepting him as your one refuge, do you, O son, worship Mahadeva and then all your wishes will bear fruits!

163 Hearing those words of my mother, O destroyer of enemies from that day my devotion was directed to Mahadeva, having nothing else for its object.

164 I, then, began the practice of the austerest penances for pleasing Shankara. For one thousand years I stood on my left toe.

165 After that I passed one thousand years, living only upon fruits The next one thousand years I passed, living upon the fallen leaves of trees The next thousand years I passed, living upon water only.

166 After that I passed seven hundred years, living on air only. In this way I worshipped Mahadeva for a full thousand divine years

167—168. After this, the powerful Mahadeva the Lord of all the universe became propitiated with me Desirous of determining whether I was solely devoted to him only, he appeared before me in the form of Shakra surrounded by all the gods As the celebrated Shakra he had a thousand eyes on his body and was armed with the thunderbolt.

169 And he rode on an elephant which was entirely white, with eyes red, ears folded, the temporal juice trickling down his cheeks, with trunk contracted, dreadful to look at, and having four tusks. Indeed riding on such an elephant, the illustrious king of the gods seemed to shine with his energy. With a beautiful crown on his head and adorned with garlands round his neck and bracelets round his arms, he came where I was 171. A white umbrella was held over his head. And he was served by many Apsaras, and many Gandharvas sang his praise.

172. Addressing me he said —O foremost of twice borns, I have been pleased with you Beg of me whatever boon you wish 173—174 Hearing these words of Shakra I was not gladdened O Krishna, I answered the king of the gods in these words,—I do not wish any boon from you, or from any other god O amiable deity, I tell you truly that it is Mahadeva only from whom I may ask for boons.

175 True it is O Shakra true are those words that I say to you No other words are at all agreeable to me except those about Maheshwara

176 Commanded by that Lord of all creatures I am ready to become a worm or a tree with many branches If not acquired through the favour of Mahadeva's boons I would not accept the very sovereignty of the three worlds.

177. I may be born among the very Shwapakas but I will still be devoted to the feet of Hara! Without, again, being devoted to that Lord of all creatures, I would not like to be born in the palace of Indra himself.

178 If a person has no devotion to that Lord of the universe,—that Master of the gods and the Asuras —his misery will not terminate even if from want of food he has to live upon only air and water.

179 Those persons who do not like to live even a moment without thinking of Mahadeva's feet, have no necessity of other subjects fraught with other kinds of morality and righteousness.

180 When the unrighteous or sinful cycle comes, one should never pass a moment without devoting his heart upon Mahadeva One who has drunk the ambrosia of the devotion to Hara, becomes freed from the fear of the world.

181. One, who has not acquired the favour of Mahadeva can never succeed to devote himself to Mahadeva for a single day or for half a day or for a moment or for a Kshana or for a Lava.

182 Ordered by Mahadeva I shall cheerfully become a worm or an insect, but I do not desire for even the sovereignty of the three worlds if bestowed by you, O Sakra.

183. At the word of Hara I would become even a dog. In fact, that is my highest wish. If not given by Maheshwara, I would not have the sovereignty of the very gods.

184 I do not wish to have this celestial dominion I do not desire to have the sovereignty of the gods I do not wish to have the region of Brahman. Indeed I do not wish to have that extinction of individual existence which is called Liberation and which is a complete oneness with Brahma. But I want to become the slave of Hara.

185. As long as that Lord of all creatures, the illustrious Mahesha with crown on his head and body white like the lunar disc, does not become pleased with me, so long shall I cheerfully bear all those miseries consequent upon a hundred repetitions of decrepitude, death and birth, which embodied beings come by.

186 What persons in the universe can acquire tranquility without pleasing Rudra who is freed from decrepitude and death, who is effulgent like the Sun, the Moon, or the Fire, who is the root or original cause of everything real and unreal in the three worlds, and who exists as the one indivisible?

187. If on account of any faults, I come by re-births I shall, in those new births, devote myself solely to Bhava.

Indra said:—

188 What are your grounds for the existence of a Supreme Being or for His being the cause of all causes?

Upamanyu said —

189 I beg boons from Him whom Brahmavadins have described as existent and non-existent, manifest and unmanifest, eternal or immutable, One and many.

190 I beg boons from Him who is without beginning and middle and end, who is Knowledge and Power, who is inconceivable and who is the Supreme Soul.

191. I pray for boons from Him whence is all Power who has not been produced by any one, who is immutable, and who, though himself not sprung from any seed, is the seed of all things in the universe.

192. I pray for boons from Him who is above the quality of Darkness who is blazing Effulgence, who is the essence of all penances, who is above all our faculties and which we may devote for the purpose of comprehending him, and by knowing whom every one becomes liberated from grief or sorrow.

193 I adore him, O Purandara, who is conversant with the creation of all elements and the thoughts of all living creatures, and who is the original cause of the existence or creation of all creatures, who is omnipresent, and who has the power to give everything.

194—195 I pray for boons from Him who cannot be comprehended by argument, who is the object of the Sankhya and the Yoga systems of philosophy, and who is above all things, and whom all persons conversant with the topics of enquiry, adore, I pray for boons from Him, O Maghavat, who is the soul of Maghavat himself, who is said to be the God of the gods, and who is the Master of all creatures

196 I pray for boons from Him who it was that first created Brahman, that creator of all the worlds, having filled Ether (with His energy) and called into being the primeval egg

197. Who else than that Supreme Lord could have created Fire, Water, Wind, Earth, Space, Mind, and the principle of Greatness.

198 Tell me, O Shakra, who else than Shiva could create Mind, Understanding, Ego, the subtle elements and the senses? Who is there higher than Shiva?

199 The wise say that the Grandfather Brahman is the creator of this universe. Brahman however, got his great power and prosperity by worshipping and gratifying Mahadeva, that God of gods.

200. That great power, which is in that illustrious Being who created Brahman, Vishnu, and Rudra, was derived from Mahadeva Tell me who is there who is superior to the Supreme Lord?

201. Who else than that God of gods can bestow upon the sons of Diti lordship and power judging by the sovereignty and the power of oppressing given to the foremost of the Daityas and the Danavas?

202 The cardinal points, Time, the Sun, all luminous bodies, planets, wind, water, and the stars and constellations,—are all from Mahadeva. Tell us who is the higher than the Supreme Lord?

203 Who else is there, than Mahadeva, in the creation of Sacrifice and the destruction of Tripura? Who else than Mahadeva has grinded the enemies, coming into contact with the Daityas and the Danavas?

204. What necessity, O Purandara, is there of giving vent to tall talks full of sophistry when I see you of a thousand eyes, O best of the gods.

205. You who are adored by Siddhas and Gandharvas and the deities and the Rishis? O best of the Kushikas, all this is due to the favour of that God of gods, viz, Mahadeva.

206 Know, O Keshava, that this all, consisting of animate and inanimate creation with heaven and other unseen creation, which are in these worlds, and which have the all pervading Lord for its soul, has emanated from Maheshwara and has been created for enjoyment of the individual soul.

207. In the worlds that are known by the names of Bhu, Bhuva, Swah, and Maha, in the midst of the mountains of Loka-loka, in the islands, in the mountains of Meru, in all things which produce happiness, and in the hearts of all creatures, O illustrious Maghavat, lives Mahadeva, as held by persons conversant with all the topics of enquiry.

208 If, O Shakra, the gods and the Asuras could see any other powerful Being than Bhava, would not both of them, especially the former when opposed and oppressed by the latter, have sought the protection of that Being?

209 In all battles of the gods, the Yakshas, the Uragas, and the Rakshasas, which end in mutual destruction, it is Bhava who gives to those who meet with destruction power befitting their position and acts.

210. Tell me, who else than Maheshwara is there for conferring boons upon, and once more taking them away from Andhaka and Shukra and Dundubhi and Mahisha and many foremost of Yakshas and Vala and Rakshasas and the Nivata-kavachas?

211. Was not the seminal fluid of Mahadeva, that Master of both the gods and the Asuras, poured as a libation upon the fire? From that seed originated a mountain of gold Who else is there whose seed can be said to be possessed of such power.

212. Who else in this world is described as having the horizon only for his dress? Who else can be said to be a celibate with vital seed drawn up? Who else is there who has half his body occupied by his dear wife Who else is there who has been able to subjugate Cupid?

213 Tell me, O Indra, what other Being possesses that high region of supreme happiness which is highly spoken of by all the deities? Who else has the crematorium as his play ground? Who else is there who is so lauded for his dancing?

214 Whose worship and power remains unchangeable? Who else is there who plays with spirits and ghosts. Tell me, O god, who else has companions who are possessed of strength like his own and who are therefore, proud of that strength or power?

215 Who else is there whose place is described as unchangeable and adored with reverence by the three worlds? Who else is there who pours rain, gives heat, and blazes forth in Energy?

216 From whom else do we get our precious herbs? Who else upholds all kinds of riches Who else sports as much as he likes in the three worlds of mobile and immobile things?

217 O Indra, know Maheshwara to be the original Cause He is worshipped by Yogins by Rishis, by the Gandharvas and by the Siddhas, with the help of knowledge, of success, and of the rites laid down in the scriptures.

218 He is worshipped by both the gods and the Asuras with the help of sacrifices by acts and the ritual laid down in the scriptures The fruits of action can never touch him for he is above them all Being such, I call him the original cause of everything.

219 He is both gross and subtile He is peerless He cannot be comprehended by the senses He is endued with qualities and he is shorn of them He is the lord of qualities for they are under his control Even such is Maheshwara's place.

220 He is the cause of the continuance and the creation (of the universe) He is the cause of the universe and the cause also of its destruction He is the Past, the Present, and the Future. He is the parent of all things He is the cause of everything

221 He is mutable, he is the unmanifest he is Knowledge, he is Ignorance, he is every deed, he is every omission, he is virtue, and he is sin O Shakra, do I call Him the cause of everything

222 See, O Indra, in the image of Mahadeva the marks of both the sexes That god of gods viz Rudra, that cause of both creation and destruction shows in his form the marks of both the sexes as the one cause of the creation of the universe

223 My mother formerly told me that he is the cause of the universe and the one cause of everything There is no one who is higher than Isha O Shakra If it pleases you, do you throw yourself on his kindness and protection

224 You have evidence, O king of the gods, of the fact that the universe has originated from the union of the sexes The universe you know, is the sum of what has qualities and what has not them and has for its immediate cause the seeds of Brahman and others Brahman and Indra and Hutasha and Vishnu and all the other gods along with the Daityas and the Asuras, having the fruition of a thousand desires, always say that there is none who is higher than Mahadeva

225 Moved by desire, I solicit, with controlled mind that god known to all the mobile and immobile universe —him, who is, who has been described as the best and highest of all the celestials and who is auspiciousness itself —for getting forth with that highest of all acquisitions, viz, liberation

226 What necessity is there of other reasons? The great Mahadeva is the cause of all causes We have never heard that the celestials have at any time worshipped the emblem of any other god than Mahadeva

227 If Maheswara be not accepted tell me, if you have ever heard of it who else is there whose emblem has been adored or is being adored by all the celestials?

228 That god is indeed, the most worshipful of all celestials whose emblem Brahma, Vishnu you, O Indra, with all the other gods, always adore

229 Brahman has for his emblem the lotus Vishnu has for his the discus Indra has for his the thunder-bolt. But the creatures of the world do not bear any of the signs which mark these celestials On the other hand all creatures bear the signs which mark Mahadeva and his consorts.

Hence, all creatures must be considered as belonging to Maheshwara.

230. All female creatures, have originated from Uma, and hence it is they have the mark of femeninity which characterstise Uma, while all masculine creatures, who have originated from Shiva bear the masculine mark that marks Shiva, out. That person who holds that there is, in the three worlds with their mobile and immobile creatures, any other cause than the Supreme Lord, and that which is not marked with the mark of either Mahadeva or his wife, should be considered as very wretched and should not be numbered with the creatures of the universe.

231. Every being having the mark of the masculine sex should be known to be of Ishana, while every being with the mark of the feminine sex should be known as belonging to Uma This universe of mobile and immobile creatures is pervaded by two forms (viz., male and female).

232. It is from Mahadeva that I wish to get boons. Not getting this, O Kaushika, I would rather prefer dissolution itself Go or remain, O Shakra, as you like, O slayer of Vala.

233. I wish to have boons or curses from Mahadeva. No. I shall not acknowledge any other god Nor would I have my desires fulfilled from any other deity.

234. Having said these words to the king of the celestials, I became stricken with grief thinking that Mahadeva had not been propitiated despite my severe austerities.

235—236 Within the twinkling of an eye, however, I saw the celestial elephant I had seen before me changed into a bull as white as a swan, or the Jasminum puboscens, or a stalk of the lotus, or silver, or the ocean of milk. Of huge body, the hair of its tail was black and the color of its eyes was tawny like that of honey.

237 Its horns were hard as adamant and had the hue of gold. With them very sharp ends, whose hue was a mild red, the bull appeared to tear the Earth.

238 The animal was bedecked all over with ornaments made of the purest gold Its face and hoofs and nose and ears were beautiful and its waist too well-formed.

239 Its flanks were beautiful, and its neck was very thick Its whole form was beautiful to look at. Its hump was charming and seemed to occupy the whole of its shoulder-joint.

240 And it looked like the summit of a snow-clad mountain or like a cliff of white clouds in the sky. Upon the back of that animal I saw seated the illustrious Mahadeva with his wife Uma.

241—242. Mahadeva shone like the full-moon. The fire born of his energy shone in effulgence like lightning that flashes amid clouds. It seemed as if a thousand suns rose there, filling every quarter with a dazzling splendour That energy of the Supreme Lord looked like the Samvartaka fire which destroys all creatures at the end of the Yuga.

243 Filled to the fill with that energy, the horizon became such that I could not see anything on any side. Filled with anxiety I once more thought that it could mean.

244. That energy, however, did not pervade every side for a long time, for soon, through the illusion of that god of gods, the horizon became clear.

245 I then saw the illustrious Sthanu or Maheshwara, seated on the back of his bull, of blessed and sweet appearance and looking like a smokeless fire.

246 And the great god was accompanied by Parvati of perfect features. Indeed, I saw the blue throated and great Sthanu unattached to everything, that receptacle of all sorts of energy or force, having eighteen arms, and bedecked with all sorts of ornaments.

247. Clad in white robes, he wore white garlands, and had white unguents smeared upon his person. His banner, irresistible in the universe, was white The thread round his body was also white.

248 He was encircled by companions all endued with prowess equal to his own, who were singing or dancing or playing on various musical instruments.

249 A crescent moon, of pale color, formed his crown, and put on his forehead it looked like the moon which rises in the autumnal sky. He seemed to dazzle with splendour on account of his three eyes which looked like three suns.

250. The garland, of the purest white, that was on his body, shone like a wreath of lotuses, of the purest white, adorned with jewels and gems

251. I also saw, O Govinda, the weapons, in their embodied forms and fraught with every sort of energy, that belong to Bhava of peerless prowess.

252 The great god held a rainbow-colored bow. That bow known as Pinaka as is in reality a powerful snake.

253 Indeed, that snake of seven heads and huge body, of sharp fangs and virulent venom, of large neck and the masculine sex, was twined round with the cord that served as its bowstring.

254—255. And there was an arrow which shone like that of the sun or of the fire that appears at the end of the cycle. Verily, that arrow was the excellent Pashupata, that mighty and dreadful weapon, which is without a second, indescribable for its power, and capable of terrorising every creature. Of huge proportions, it seemed to constantly emit sparks of fire.

256 Having one foot, large teeth, and a thousand heads and thousand stomachs, it had a thousand arms, a thousand tongues, and a thousand eyes Indeed, it seemed to continually emit fire.

257 O you of great arms, that weapon is superior to the Brahma, the Narayana, the Aindra, the Agneya, and the Varuna weapons Indeed, it is capable of neutralising every other weapon in the universe.

258 It was with that weapon that the great Mahadeva had, formerly burnt and consumed in a moment the triple city of the Asuras. With the greatest ease, O Govinda, Mahadeva, using that single arrow, performed that feat.

259 That weapon, discharged by Mahadeva's arms, can, forsooth, consume in half the time taken up by a twinkling of the eye the entire universe with all its mobile and immobile creatures.

260. In the universe there is no one including, even Brahman and Vishnu and the celestials, who cannot be killed by that weapon. O sire, I saw that excellent, wonderful and peerless weapon in the hand of Mahadeva,

261. There is another mysterious and very strong weapon which is equal or, perhaps, superior to the Pashupata. I saw that also It is known in all the worlds as the Shula of the Shula-armed Mahadeva.

262. Hurled by the illustrious god, that weapon can rive the entire Earth or dry up the waters of the ocean or annihilate the entire universe.

263 Formerly Yuvanashwa's son, king Mandhatri, that conqueror of the three worlds, having imperial sway and gifted with profuse energy, was, with all his armies, killed by means of that weapon.

264 Gifted with great might and great energy and resembling Shakra himself in prowess, that king, O Govinda, was killed by the Rakshasa Lavana with the help of His Shula which he had got from Shiva.

265. That Shula is keen-pointed Highly terrible, it is capable of causing everybody's hair stand erect I beheld it in the hand of Mahadeva, as if roaring with anger, having contracted its forehead into three wrinkles.

266. It resembled, O Krishna, a smokeless fire or the sun that rises at the end of the cycle. The handle of that Shula was made of a great snake. It is really indescribable. It looked like the universal Destroyer armed with his noose.

267—268 I saw this weapon, O Govinda, in the hand of Mahadeva I saw also another weapon, viz, that sharp-edged battle-axe which, was given formerly unto Rama by Mahadeva for enabling him to root out the Kshatriyas. It was with this weapon that Rama killed in dreadful battle the great Karttaviryya who was the king of the entire world.

269 It was with that weapon that Jamadagni's son, O Govinda, was able to root out the Kshatriyas for twenty-one times.

270 Of blazing edge and highly terrible, that axe was hanging on the shoulder, adorned with a snake of Mahadeva. Indeed, it appeared on Mahadeva's body like the flame of a burning fire

271. I saw with the highly intelligent Mahadeva numberless other celestial weapons. I have, however, named only a few principal ones, O sinless one.

272 On the left side of the great god stood the Grandfather Brahman seated on an excellent car to which were yoked swans fleet-coursing like the mind.

273 On the same side was Narayana also, seated on Garuda and bearing the conch, the discus, and the mace.

274 Near the goddes Uma was Skanda seated on his peacock, bearing his dreadful arrow and bells, and looking like another Fire-God

275 Before Mahadeva I saw Nandi standing armed with his Shula and looking like a second Shankara.

276 The Munis headed by the Self-create Manu, and the Rishis having Bhrigu for their first, and the gods with Shakra at their head, all came there.

277 All the clans of spirits and ghosts, and the celestial Mothers, stood surrounding Mahadeva and saluting him with respect

278 The gods were engaged in singing the praises of Mahadeva in various hymns. The Grandfather Brahman, uttering a Rathantara, landed Mahadeva.

279 Uttering the Jyeshtha Saman Narayana also sang the praises of Bhava, Shakra also did the same with the help of those foremost of Vedic Mantras, viz, the Shata-Rudriyam.

280 Verily, Brahman and Narayana and Shakra,—those three great gods shone there like three sacrificial fires.

281. In their midst was the illustrious god like the sun in the midst of his corona, come from autumnal clouds.

282. I saw countless suns and moons also in the sky, O Keshava. I then lauded the illustrious Lord of everything, the Great Master of the universe.

Upamanyu said:—

283. I said,—Salutations to you, O illustrious one, O you who are the refuge of all things, O you who are called Mahadeva! Salutations to you who assume the form of Shakra, who are Shakra and who disguise yourself in the form of Shakra.

284 Salutations to you who are armed with the thunder, to you who are tawny, and you who are red Salutations to you who are always armed with the Pinaka, to you who always bear the conch and the Shula.

285 Salutations to you who are clad in black to you who are of dark and curly hair, to you who have dark deer-skin for your upper garment, to you who preside over the eighth lunation of the dark fortnight.

286 Salutations to you who are of white hue, to you who are called white, to you who are clad in white dress, to you who have limbs smeared with white ashes, to you who are ever engaged in white deeds

287 Salutations to you who are red in color, to you who are clad in red dress, to you who have a red banner with red flags, to you who wear red garlands and use red unguents.

288. Salutations to you who are brown colored, to you who are clad in brown dress, to you who have a brown banner with brown flags to you who wear brown garlands and use brown unguents Salutations to you who have the umbrella of royalty held over your head, to you who wear the foremost of crowns.

289 Salutations to you who are adorned with half a garland and half an armlet, to you who are decked with one ring for one ear, to you who are endued with the speed of the mind, to you who are highly effulgent

290 Salutations to you who are the foremost of gods, to you who are the foremost of Munis to you who are the foremost of celestials! Salutations to you who wear half a wreath of lotuses, to you who have many lotuses on your body.

291. Salutations to you who have half your body smeared with sandal paste, to you who have half your body decked with garlands of flowers and smeared with fragment unguents.

292. I bow to you who are bright hued like the Sun, to you who are like the Sun, to you whose face is like the Sun, to you who have eyes each of which is like the Sun.

293 I bow to you who are Soma, to you who are as mild as Soma, to you who bear the lunar disc, to you who are of lunar aspect, to you who are the foremost of all creatures to you who are adorned with most beautiful teeth.

294 I bow to you who are of a dark color, to you who are of a fair complexion, to you who have a form half of which is yellow and half white, to you who have a body half of which is male and half female, to you who are both male and female.

295—96 I bow to you who have bull for your vehicle, to you who proceed riding on the foremost of elephants, to you who are obtained with difficulty, to you who are capable of going to places unapproachable by others I bow to you whose praises are sung by the Ganas, to you who are devoted to the various Ganas, to you who follow the track that is trod by the Ganas, to thee who are always devoted to the Ganas as to a vow.

297. I bow to you who are of the complexion of white clouds, to you who have the splendour of the evening clouds to you who are incapable of being described by names, to you who are of your own form.

298 I bow to you having a garland of red color, to you who are clad in robes of red.

299 I bow to you whose crown is set with gems, to you who are adorned with a crescent, to you who wear many beautiful gems in your diadem, to you who have eight flowers on your head.

300. I bow to you who have a fiery mouth and fiery eyes, to you who have eyes effulgent like a thousand moons, to you who are of the form of fire, to you who are beautiful and agreeable, to you who are inconceivable and mysterious.

301 I bow to you who range in the sky, to you who delight in living in pasture-grounds, to you who walk on the Earth, to you who are the Earth, to you who are infinite, to you who are highly auspicious.

302 I bow to you who are nude, to you who make a happy home of every place where you may happen to be for the time being I bow to you who have the universe for your home, to you who have both Knowledge and Felicity for your Soul

303. I bow to you who always wear a diadem, to you who wear a large armlet, to you who have a snake for the garland round your neck, to you who wear many beautiful ornaments on your body.

304 I bow to you who have the Sun, the Moon, and Agni for your three eyes to you who have a thousand eyes, to you who are both male and female, to you who are divested of sex, to you who are a Sankhya, to you who are a Yogin.

305 I bow to you who are the grace of those gods who are adored in sacrifices, to you who are the Atharvans, to you who remove all sorts of disease and pain, to you who remove every sorrow.

306 I bow to you who roar as deep as the clouds, to you who display diverse kinds of illusions, to you who lord over the soil and over the seed that is sown in it, to you who are the Creator of everything.

307 I bow to you who are the Lord of all the deities, to you who are the Master of the universe, to you who are fleet like the wind, to you who are of the form of the wind.

308 I bow to you who wear a garland of gold, to you who play on hills and mountains, to you who are adored by all who are enemies of the gods, to you who are endued with fierce speed and energy.

309 I bow to you who cut off one of the heads of the Grandfather Brahman to you who have killed the Asura named Mahisha, to you who have three forms, to you who have every form

310 I bow to you who are the destroyer of the triple city of the Asuras, to you who are the destroyer of (Daksha's) sacrifice, to you who are the destroyer of the person of Kama (the god of love) to you who hold the rod of destruction.

311. I bow to you who are Skanda, to you who are Visakha, to you who are the rod of the Brahmana to you who are Bhava, to you who are Sarva, to you who are of universal form.

312 I bow to you who are Ishana, to you who are the destroyer of Bhaga, to you who are the slayer of Andhaka to you who are the universe, to you who are possessed of illusion, to you who are both conceivable and inconceivable

313. You are the one end of all creatures, you are the foremost, you are the heart of everything You are the Brahman of all the gods, you are the Red and Blue of the Rudras.

314. You are the Soul of all creatures, you are He called Purusha in the Sankhya philosophy, you are the Rishava among all sacred things, you are the auspicious of the Yogins which, according to them, is indivisible.

315 Amongst those who follow the different modes of life, you are the Householder, you are the great Lord amongst the patriarchs. You are Kuvera among all the Yakshas, and you are Vishnu amongst all the sacrifices.

316 You are Meru amongst mountains, you are the Moon among all luminaries of the sky, you are Vashishtha amongst Rishis, you are the Sun among the planets.

317. You are the lion among all the beasts, and the bull adored of all among all domestic animals.

318 Among the Adityas you are Vishnu (Upendra) among the Vasus, you are Pavaka, among birds you are Garuda, and among snakes you are Ananta.

319 Among the Vedas you are the Samans, among the Yajushes you are the Shata-Rudriyam, among Yogins you are Sanatkumara, and among Sankhyas you are Kapila.

320 Among the Maruts you are Shakra, among the Pitris you are Devarat, among all the regions you are the region of Brahman, and you are emancipation amongst all the ends of creatures.

321. Of all oceans you are the Ocean of Milk, among all mountains you are Himavat, among all the castes you are the Brahmanas, and among all learned Brahmanas you are he who has undergone the initiation.

321. You are the Sun among all things in the world, you are the destroyer called Kala You are whatever else gifted with superior energy or eminence existing in the universe.

323. You are endued with supreme power. This is my certain conclusion I bow to you O powerful and illustrious one. O you who are kind to all your worshippers.

324 I bow to you, O lord of Yogins I bow to you O original Cause of the universe. Be you pleased with me that am your worshipper, that am very miserable and helpless

325 O Eternal Lord, do you become the refuge of this adorer of yours who is very weak and miserable! O Supreme Lord, you should pardon me for all the sins I have committed taking mercy on me for my being your devoted worshipper.

326. I am stupefied by you O Lord of all the gods, on account of the disguise in which you appeared before me O Maheshwara, I did not give you the Arghya or water to wash your feet

327. Having sung thus the praises of Ishana, I offered him, with great devotion, water to wash his feet and the articles of the Arghya, and then, with joined hands I resigned myself to him, ready to carry out his command

328 Then, O sire, an auspicious shower of flowers dropped upon my head, carrying celestial fragrance and bedewed with cold water.

329 The divine musicians began to play on their kettle drums A delicious breeze fragrant and sweet, began to blow and fill me with pleasure.

330—331 Then Mahadeva accompanied by his wife, and having the bull for his emblem, having been pleased with me, addressed the deities assembled there in these words, filling me with great joy,—Behold ye gods the devotion of the great Upamanyu Indeed, steady and great is that devotion, and entirely fixed, for it remains unaltered

332—333 Thus addressed by the great God armed with the Shula, the gods, O Krishna, having bowed down to him and joined their hands in respect, said these words —O illustrious one, O God of the gods O Lord of the universe, O Lord of all, let this best of twice born persons obtain from you the fruition of all his desires!

334 Thus addressed by all the gods with the Grandfather Brahman among them Sharva, otherwise called Isha and Shankara, said these words, as if smiling, to me

The illustrious Shankara said —

335 O dear Upamanyu! I am pleased with you. See me, O foremost of ascetics! O learned Rishi, you are firmly devoted to me and you have been well tested by me.

336 I have been very highly pleased with you on account of this your devotion to Shiva I shall, therefore give you to-day the fruition of your desires.

337 Thus addressed by the highly wise Mahadeva, tears of joy came into my eyes and my hair stood erect 338 Kneeling down to him and bowing to him repeatedly, I then with a voice that was suppressed with joy, said to him.

339 O illustrious god, it appears to me that I was hitherto dead and that it is only to day that I have taken my birth, and that my birth has to-day borne fruit, since I am standing now in the presence of Him who is the Master of both the gods and the Asuras!

340 Who else is more praiseworthy than I, since I am seeing with these eyes of mine Him of immeasurable prowess whom the very gods are unable to see without first paying hearty worship?

341—342. The learned and the wise consider that as the highest of all topics, which is Eternal which is distinguished from all else, which is unborn which is Knowledge, which is indestructible, at one with you, O powerful and illustrious one, you who are the beginning of all the topics, you who are indestructible and challengeless, you who know all the ordinances, you who are the foremost of Purushas, you who are the highest of the high 343 You who had created from your right side the Grandfather Brahman, the Creator of all things, you are he who had created from your left-side Vishnu for protecting the Creation.

344—345 You are that powerful Lord who did create Rudra when the end of the cycle came and when the Creation was once more to be destroyed! That Rudra who originated from you destroyed the Creation with all its mobile and immobile beings, assuming the form of highly powerful Kala, of the cloud Samvartaka and of the all destroying fire Indeed, when the time for the dissolution of the universe sets in, that Rudra stands, ready to swallow up the universe

346 You are that Mahadeva who is the original Creator of the universe with all its mobile and immobile creatures You are he who at the end of the æon, stands, withdrawing all things into yourself.

347 You are he who pervades all things, you are the Soul of all things, you are the Creator of the Creator of all principles Incapable of being beheld by even any of the gods, you are he who exists, pervading all principles

348 If, O Lord, you have been pleased with me and if you would grant me boons let this be the boon, O Lord of all the gods that my devotion to you may remain unchanged.

349 O best of the gods, let me through your grace, have knowledge of the Present, the Past, and the Future.

350 I shall also, with all my kinsmen and friends, always eat food mixed with milk And let your illustrious self be for ever present at our gifted hermitage.

351. Thus addressed by me, the illustrious Maheshwara gifted with supreme energy, that Master of all mobile and immobile creations, viz, Shiva, adored of all the universe, then said to me these words.

The Illustrious God said:—

352 Be free from every misery and pain and be above decrepitude and death. Be gifted with fame, be endued with great energy, and spiritual knowledge.

353 You shall through my grace, be always sought by the Rishis. Be your behaviour good and righteous. May you possess all attributes and universal knowledge. Be you of agreeable appearance.

354—355 May you possess everlasting youth, and let your energy be like that of fire Whenever, again, you may wish for the presence, which is so agreeable to you of the ocean of milk, there shall that ocean appear before you Do you, with your friends, always obtain food prepared with milk, with the celestial nectar being mixed with it.

356. After the expiration of an æon you will enjoy my company. Unending shall be your family and race and kinsmen.

357. O foremost of twice-born ones your devotion to me shall be eternal. And, O best of Brahmanas I shall always be present at your hermitage.

358 Live, O son, wherever you like shorn of anxiety. Thought of by you I shall, O learned Brahmana, appear before you again.

359 Having said these words, and granted me these boons, the illustrious Ishana, effulgent like millions of Suns, disappeared there and then

360. It was even, O Krishna, that I saw, with the help of austere penances, that God of gods. I also got all that was said by the great God endued with supreme intelligence

361. See, O Krishna, before your eyes, these Siddhas living here and these Rishis and Vidyadharas and Yakshas and Gandharvas and Apsaras.

362. See these trees and creepers and plants yielding all sorts of flowers and fruits. See them bearing the flowers of every season, with beautiful leaves, and spreading a sweet smell all around.

363 O you of mighty arms, all these are gifted with a celestial nature through the favour of that god of gods, that supreme Lord, that great Deity.

Vasudeva continued:—

364—365. Hearing these words of his and seeing, as it were, with my own eyes all that he had described to me, I became filled with wonder. I then addressed the great ascetic Upamanyu and said to him, Highly praiseworthy as you are, O foremost of learned Brahmanas, for what righteous man is there except you whose retreat enjoys the distinction of being honored with the presence of that God of gods.

366 Will the powerful Shiva, will the great Shankara, O chief of ascetics, grant me also a sight of his body and show me favour?

Upamanyu said:—

367. Forsooth, O you having eyes like lotus petals, you will very soon see Mahadeva as, O sinless one, I succeeded in seeing him.

368 O you of immeasurable prowess I see with my spiritual eyes that you will in the sixth month from this, succeed in getting a sight of Mahadeva, O best of all persons.

369. You, O foremost of the Yadus will obtain from Maheshwara and his wife twenty-four boons. I tell you what is true.

370. Through the favour of that Deity gifted with supreme wisdom, I know the Past, the Future, and the Present.

371—372 The great Hara has favoured these thousands of Rishis and others Why will not the powerful Deity show favour to you, O Madhava! I always like the meeting of the gods as does one like you, who is devoted to the Brahmanas, who is full of mercy and who is full of faith I shall give you certain Mantras Recite them continuously. By this you are sure to see Shankara!

The blessed Vishnu said:—

373 I then said to him,—O twice-born one, through your favour, O great ascetic, I shall see the lord of the deities, that grinder of Diti's numberless sons.

374. Eight days, O Bharata, passed there like an hour, all of us being thus occupied with talk on Mahadeva.

375. On the eighth day, I underwent the initiation according to due rites, at the hands of that Brahmana I received the staff from his hands I went through the prescribed shave I took up a quantity of Kusha blades in my hand I wore rags for my raiments I rubbed my person with clarified butter. I put a cord of Munja grass round my loins.

376 For one month I lived on fruits The second month I lived upon water. The third, the fourth, and the fifth months I passed, living upon air only.

377. I stood all the while, upon one foot, and with my arms also raised upwards, and giving up sleep for all the time I then saw, O Bharata In the sky a light that seemed to be as dazzling as that of a thousand Suns

378 Towards the centre of that effulgence, O son of Pandu I saw a cloud looking like a mass of blue hills, adorned with rows of cranes, decorated with many a grand rainbow, with flashes of lightning and the fire looking like eyes set on it.

379 Within that cloud was the powerful Mahadeva, himself of dazzling splendour, accompanied by his consort Uma. Indeed, the great God appeared to shine with his penances, energy, beauty, effulgence, and His beloved consort by his side.

380 The powerful Maheshwara, with his wife by his side, shone in the midst of that cloud The appearance seemed to be like that of the Sun in the midst of clouds with the Moon by his side.

381 The hair on my body, O son of Kunti stood erect, and my eyes expanded with wonder upon seeing Hara, the refuge of all the gods and the remover of all their griefs.

382 Mahadeva was adorned with a diadem on his head. He was armed with his Shula He was clad in a tiger-skin, had matted locks on His head, and bore the staff in one of His hands He was armed, besides, with his Pinaka and the thunder-bolt His teeth were sharp pointed He was adorned with an excellent bracelet for the upper arm His sacred thread was formed by a snake.

383 He wore an excellent garland of various colors on his bosom that hung down to his toes Indeed, I saw him like the highly bright moon of an autumnal evening.

384 Surrounded by various clans of spirits and ghosts, he appeared like the autumnal Sun difficult of being looked at for its dazzling brightness.

385 A thousand and hundred Rudras stood around that God of controlled soul and white deeds, seated upon his bull. All of them were employed in singing his praises.

386 The Adityas, the Vasus, the Sadhyas, the Vishwedevas, and the twin Ashwins praised that Lord of the universe, by singing the hymns.

387. The powerful Indra and his brother Upendra, the two sons of Aditi, and the Grandfather Brahman, all sang in the presence of Bhava the Rathantara Saman.

388—390. Numberless masters of Yoga, all the twice-born Rishis with their children, all the celestial Rishis, the goddess Earth, the Sky, the Constellations, the Planets, the Months, the Fortnights, the Seasons, Night, the Years, the Kshanas, the Muhurtas the Nimeshas, the Yugas one after another, all the celestial Sciences and branches of knowledge, and all beings conversant with Truth, were seen bowing down that Supreme Preceptor, that great Father, that giver of Yoga.

391—393 Sanatkumara, the Vedas, the Histories Marichi, Angiras Atri, Pulastya, Pulaha, Kratu, the seven Manus, Soma, the Atharvans, and Vrihaspati, Bhrigu, Daksha, Kashyapa, Vashishtha, Kashya, the Cchchandas, Diksha the Sacrifices, Dakshina, the Sacrificial Fires, the Havis poured in sacrifices, and all the articles of the sacrifices, were seen by me, O Yudhishthira, standing there in their embodied forms.

394—397 All the presiding deities of the worlds, all the Rivers, all the snakes, the mountains, the celestial Mothers, all the wives and daughters of the celestials, thousands upon thousands and millions of ascetics, were seen to bow down to that powerful Lord who is the soul of tranquility. The Mountains, the Oceans, and the Points of the compass also did the same, the Gandharvas and the Apsaras highly proficient in music, in celestial songs, sang and hymned the praises of Bhava who is full of wonder. The Vidyadharas, the Danavas, the Guhyakas, the Rakshasas, and all created beings mobile and immobile were worshipping, in thought, word, and deed, that powerful Lord That Lord of all the gods, viz., Sarva, appeared before me, seated in all his glory.

398 Seeing that Ishana had showed himself to me by being seated in glory before my eyes, the whole universe, with the Grandfather and Shakra, looked at me.

399 I, however, had not the power to look at Mahadeva He great god then addressed me, saying,—see, O Krishna, and speak to me!

400. You have worshipped me hundreds and thousands of times There is no one in the three worlds who is dearer to me than you!

401. After I had bowed to him, his wife, viz, the goddess Uma, became pleased with me. I then addressed in these words the great God whose praises are hymned by all the gods headed by the Grandfather Brahman.

The blessed Vishnu said:—

402 'I saluted Mahadeva, saying,—I bow to you, O you who are the origin of all things The Rishis declare that you are the master of the Vedas The pious hold that you are Penance, you are Sattwa, you are Rajas, you are Tamas, and you are Truth.

403 You are Brahman, you are Rudra, you are Varuna, you are Agni, you are Manu, you are Bhava, you are Dhatri, you are Tashtri, you are Vidhatri, you are the powerful Lord of all things, you are everywhere.

404 All beings, mobile and immobile, have originated from you You have created this world with all its mobile and immobile creations.

405 The Rishis say that you are superior to the senses, the mind, the vital air, the seven fires, everything else which rests upon the all-pervading Soul, and all the celestials who are worshipped.

406 You, O illustrious one, are the Vedas, the Sacrifices, Soma, Dakshina, Pavaka, Havi, and all other ingredients of sacrifice.

407. The merit of sacrifices, gifts, the study of the Vedas, vows, practices of restraint, Modesty, Fame, Prosperity, Glory, Contentment, and Success, are all for acquiring you

408. Desire, Anger, Fear, Cupidity, Pride, Stupefaction, and Malice, Pains and Diseases, are, O illustrious one, all your offspring.

409 You are the acts of creatures, you are the joy and sorrow of those acts, you are the absence of joy and sorrow, you are that Nescience which is the eternal seeds of Desire, you are the great origin of Mind, you are Power, and you are Eternity.

410. You are the Unmanifest, you are Pavana, you are inconceivable, you are the thousand rayed Sun, you are the shining intelligence, you are the first of all the subjects, and you are the support of Life.

411—412 By the words Greatness, Soul, Understanding, Brahman, Universe, Shambhu, and Self-create, as well as other words seen (in the Vedas), your nature is comprehended as being at one with Greatness and Soul Knowing you as all this, the learned Brahmana conquers that Ignorance which is the root of the world.

413 You are the heart of all creatures, and you are worshipped by the Rishis as Soul. Your arms and feet extend to every place, and your eyes, head, and face are everywhere You hear everywhere in the universe, and you exist permeating everything.

414. You are the fruit of all acts which are performed in the Nimeshas and other divisions of time which originate from the Sun.

415 You are the original lustre. You are Male Being living in the hearts of all things. You are the successful fruits of Yoga.

416 Understanding and Intelligence and all the worlds depend upon you Those who are given to meditation, who are always busy with Yoga, who are devoted to or firm in Truth and who have conquered their passions, seek you and depend on you.

417. They who know you as the one unchangeable, or one who lives in all hearts, or one who is endowed with supreme power, or one who is the ancient Male Being, or one who is pure Knowledge, or one that is the effulgent understanding, or one that is the highest refuge of all persons gifted with intelligence, are, indeed, highly intelligent men. Indeed, such persons reign supreme over intelligence.

418 By understanding the seven subtle principles, by comprehending your six attributes, and by mastering the true Yoga, the man of knowledge succeeds in entering into your great self.

419 After I had said these words, O Partha, to Bhava, that remover of grief and pain, the universe, both mobile and immobile, roared like a lion.

420. The numberless Brahmans present there, the gods and the Asuras, the Nagas, the Pishachas the Pitrrs, the birds, various Rakshasas, various classes of ghosts and spirits, and all the great Rishis, then bowed down to that great Deity.

421. There then, dropped upon my head showers of highly fragrant celestial flowers and sweet winds blew on the spot.

422. The powerful Shankara then, given to the behoof of the universe looked at the goddess Uma, and the king of the celestials and myself also, and thus spoke to me,

423 We know, O Krishna, that you, O slayer of foes, are greatly devoted to us! Do what is for your good My love and affection for you is very great.

424 Do you ask for eight boons. I shall grant them O Krishna, O best of all persons Tell me what they are, O chief of the Yadavas. Say what you wish You will have them, however difficult of attainment they may be.

CHAPTER XV.

Krishna said —

1—2 Bending low my head with a controlled soul to that mass of energy and effulgence, I said to the great god, with a joyous heart, these words —I ask for these boons from you, namely, firmness in virtue, the destruction of enemies in battle, the highest glory, the greatest power, devotion to Yoga, your nearness, and hundreds upon hundreds of children.

3—4 Whereto Shankara said, so be it, repeating the words I had said After this, the mother of the universe, the upholdress of all things, she who purifies all things, viz, the wife of Sarva that huge receptacle of penances, said with controlled soul these words to me —The powerful Mahadeva has granted you, O sinless one, a son who shall be named Shamva.

5—6 Do you take from me also eight boons which you choose I shall, indeed, grant them to you Bowing her with my head bended, I said to her, O son of Pandu —I pray from you uniform affection for the Brahmanas the favour of my father, a hundred sons the highest enjoyments, love for my family, the favour of my mother, the attainment of tranquility and peace, and cleverness in every deed.

Uma said —

7. You will have them, O you who are endued with prowess equal to that of a celestial I never say what is untrue You will have sixteen thousand wives. Your love for them and theirs also for you shall be limitless

8. From all your kinsmen also, you will get the highest affection You will have a most beautiful person. Seven thousand guests will daily feed at your palace.

Vasudeva continued —

9. Having thus granted me boons, both the god and the goddess, O Bharata, disappeared there and then with their associates, O elder brother of Bhima.

10 All those wonderful deeds I described fully, O best of kings to that highly energetic Brahmana Upamanyu Bowing down to the great God, Upamanyu said these words to me.

Upamanyu said :—

11. There is no god like Sarva There is no end or refuge like Sarva There is none who can grant so many or so high boons There is none who is his equal in battle.

CHAPTER XVI.

Upamanyu said :—

1—2 There was in the golden cycle, O sire, a Rishi named Tandi With devoted heart he worshipped with the help of Yoga-meditation the great God for ten thousand years Hear me as I tell you the fruit or reward he reaped of such wonderful devotion He succeeded in seeing Mahadeva and lauded him by uttering some hymns.

3—6 Thinking, with the help of his penances of Him who is the supreme Soul and who is eternal and undecaying, Tandi became stricken with wonder and said these words,—I seek His refuge whom the Sankhyas describe and the Yogins think of as the great the foremost, the Male Being the pervader of all things, and the Lord of all existent objects who, is the cause of both the creation and the destruction of the universe, who is superior to all the gods the Asuras and the Munis who has nothing higher who is uncreate, who is the Lord of all things who has neither beginning nor end, and who is gifted with supreme power, who is possessed of the highest happiness, and who is effulgent and sinless

7—10 After he had said these words, Tandi, saw before him that ocean of penances, that great God who is eternal and undecaying who is peerless who is inconceivable, who is eternal, and who is without any change who is indivisible who is whole, who is Brahma, who is above all attributes, and who is gifted with attributes, who is the highest delight of Yogins who is without decrease, who is called Liberation, who is the refuge of the mind of Indra, of Agni, of the Wind God, of the entire universe, and of the Grandfather Brahman, who cannot be comprehended by the mind, who is without change of any kind, who is pure, who is capable of being apprehended by the understanding only, and who is immaterial as the mind, who cannot be comprehended, who cannot be measured, who is difficult of being attained, by persons of impure souls, who is the origin of the universe, and who is above both the universe and the quality of darkness; who is ancient, who is Purusha, who is gifted with effulgence, and who is higher than the highest.

11. Desirous of seeing Him who investing himself with vital airs, lives in the individual soul, in the form of that effulgence which is called the Mind, the Rishi Tandin passed many years practising the severest austerities, and having succeeded in seeing Him as the reward of those penances, he lauded the great God in the following terms.

Tandi said:—

12 You are the purifier of all purifiers and the refuge of all, O foremost of all beings gifted with intelligence! You are the most dreadful energy of all kinds of energy. You are the austerest penance of all penances.

13 You, O powerful one, are the liberal giver of blessings You are the supreme Truth. I bow to you.

14 I bow to you O you of a thousand rays, and, O refuge of all happiness! You are the bestower of that emancipation for which, O powerful one, Yatis, standing in fear of birth and death, strive so hard

15. The Grandfather Brahman, Indra of a hundred sacrifices, Vishnu, the Vishwedevas, the great Rishis cannot comprehend your real nature. How then can persons like ourselves expect to comprehend you.

16. Everything originates from you Upon you depends everything You are called Kala, you are called Purusha, you are called Brahma Celestial Rishis well-read in the Puranas, say that you are triune

17. You are Adhi-Purusha, Adhyatma, Adhibhuta, Adhi-Daivata, Adhi Loka, Adhi-Vijnanam, and Adhi-Yajna.

18 Wise men, when they succeed in knowing you that lives in themselves and that can be known by the very gods, become freed from all fetters and enter into a state of existence that is above all sorrow.

19. They who do not wish to know you, are constrained to pass through numberless births and deaths. You are the door of heaven and of Liberation You are he who bring all beings into existence and withdraw them again into yourself. You are the great giver.

20 You are heaven, you are liberation, you are desire You are the anger which inspires creatures You are Sattwa, you are Rajas, you are Tamas, you are the nether regions, and you are the upper regions

21. You are the Grandfather Brahman, you are Bhava, you are Vishnu, you are Skanda you are Indra, you are Savitri, you are Yama you are Varuna you are Soma, you are Dhatri, you are Manu, you are Vidhatri, and you are Kuvera the Lord of riches

22 You are Earth, you are Wind, you are Water, you are Agni, you are Ether, you are Speech, you are the Understanding, you are Steadiness, you are Intelligence, you are the Acts, you are Truth, you are Untruth, you are existent, you are non-existent

23 You are the senses, you are what is above Nature, you are immutable You are superior to existent objects, you are superior to non-existent objects, you are capable of being conceived, you are incapable of being conceived.

24 You are at one with what is Supreme Brahma, with what is the highest entity, with what is the end of both the Sankhyas and the Yogins

25 Indeed, I have been greatly rewarded by you to day on account of your granting me a sight of your form. I have attained the end of the righteous I have been rewarded with that end which is prayed for by persons whose understandings have been purified by Knowledge

26 Alas, so long I was steeped in Ignorance, for this long time I was an insensate fool, since I had no knowledge of you who are the Supreme Deity, you who are the only Eternal Entity as known by all persons.

27 In course of numberless lives have I at last succeeded in acquiring that Devotion towards you for which you have shown yourself to me, O you who are ever inclined to favour those who are devoted to you! He who knows you enjoys immortality.

28 You are always a mystery with the gods the Asuras, and the ascetics Brahma is concealed in a cave. The very ascetics cannot see or know him.

29 You are that powerful god who is the Creator of everything and whose face is turned towards all directions. You are the Soul of all things, you see all things, you pervade all things, and you know all things.

30 You make a body for yourself. You bear that body. You are an embodied Being You have a body, and you are the refuge of all embodied creatures. You are the creator of the vital airs, you possess the vital airs, you are endued with vital airs, you are the giver of the vital airs, and you are the refuge of all beings endued with vital airs

31. You are that Adhyatma, which is the refuge of all pious persons who are given to Yoga meditation and conversant with the Soul and who seek to avoid rebirth Indeed, you are that Supreme Lord who is at one with that refuge.

32 You distribute all ends, happy or miserable, to all creatures You ordain the birth and death for all created beings.

33 You are the powerful Lord who grants success to Rishis crowned with success regarding the fruition of their wishes Having created all the worlds beginning with Bhu, together with all the dwellers of heaven, you uphold and cherish them all, dividing yourself into your well known eight forms.

34 Everything originates from you. All things depend upon you All things, again, disappear in you. You are the sole Eternal object.

35 You are that region of Truth which is sought by the righteous and considered by them as the highest. You are that stoppage of individual existence sought by the Yogins You are that Liberation which is sought by persons conversant with the Soul.

36. Beings crowned with success and having Brahman amongst them have concealed you in a cave for preventing the deities and Asuras and human beings from seeing you

37 Although you live in the heart, yet are you concealed. Hence, stupefied by you the deities and Asuras and men cannot understand you, O Bhava, truly and in all your details.

38 O you living in all heart you appear before those persons who succeed in attaining to you after having purified themselves by devotion.

39 By knowing you one can avoid both death and re birth. You are the highest object of knowledge. By knowing you no higher object remains for one to know.

40 You are the greatest object of acquirement. The person that is truly wise, who by acquiring you, thinks that there is no higher object of acquisition By attaining to you who are greatly subtile and who are the highest object of acquisition, the wise man becomes immortal

41. The followers of the Sankhya system, well read in their own system of philosophy and possessing a knowledge of the qualities and of all the topics of enquiry,—those learned men who reign over the destructible by attaining to a knowledge of the subtile or indestructible,—succeed by knowing you in freeing themselves from all fetters.

42. Persons well read in the Vedas consider you as the one object of knowledge which has been explained in the Vedanta. These men, given to the suppression of vital airs, always meditate on you and at last enter into you as their highest end.

43 Riding on the car of OM, those men enter inter into Maheshwara. You are the solar door of the celestial road.

44 You are the lunar door, of that which is called the road of the Pitris. You are Kashtha, You are the points of the horizon, you are the year, and you are the cycles.

45. You are the sovereignty of the heavens, you are the sovereignty of the Earth, you are the Northern and the Southern solstices In days of yore the Grandfather Brahman sang your praises. O you who are called blue and red, by reciting various hymns and urged you to create living creatures.

46 Brahmanas conversant with Richs praise you by uttering Richs, considering you as unattached to all things and as shorn of all forms. In sacrifices, Adhvaryus, pour libations, uttering Yajushes in honor of you who are the sole object of knowledge, according to the three well known ways.

47 Persons of purified understandings, who are conversant with Samans, sing you with the help of Samans Those twice-born, again, who are conversant with the Atharvans, hymn you as Rita, as Truth, as the Highest, and as Brahma You are the highest cause of the Sacrifice. You are the Lord, and you are Supreme.

48 The night and day are your organs of hearing and organ of sight The fortnights and months for your head and arms. The seasons are your energy, penances are are your patience, and the year is your anus, and thighs, and feet.

49 You are Death, you are Yama, you are Hutasha, you are Kala, you are gifted with speed of destruction, you are the prime cause of Time and you are eternal Time.

50. You are the Moon and the Sun, with all the stars and planets and the atmosphere that fills space You are the pole-star, you are the constellation called the seven Rishis, you are the seven regions beginning with Bhu.

51. You are Pradhana and Mahat, you are Unmanifest, and you are this world. You are the universe beginning with Prahma and ending with the lowest vegetable creation You are the beginning of all creatures You are identical with the existent and the non existent.

52. You are the eight Prakritis. You are, again, above the eight Prakritis Every thing that exists, represents a portion of your divine Self.

53 You are the Supreme Eternal Happiness You are the end of all things You are the highest existence of the Righteous.

54 You are that state which is freed from every anxiety You are Eternal Brahma You are that highest state which forms the meditation of persons well-read in the auxiliary branches of the Vedas.

55 You are the highest Kashtha, you are the highest Kala You are the highest Success, and you are the highest Refuge.

56 You are the highest Tat quality You are the highest stoppage of Existence By attaining to you, Yogins think that they have acquired the highest success

57. You are Contentment, you are Success you are Shruti, and you are the Smriti You are that Refuge of the Soul which Yogins seek and you are that indestructible Prapti which men of knowledge seek.

58 You are, forsooth, that End which is sought by persons given to sacrifices and those who pour sacrificial libations, moved by particular desires, and who make large presents on such occasions

59 You are that high End which those persons seek who consume and torch their bodies with austere penances with continued recitations with those rigid vows and fasts which belong to their peaceful lives, and with other means of self affliction

60 O Eternal One, you are the End of those who are unattached to all things and who have given up all acts

61 You O Eternal One, are that End of those who seek Liberation from re birth, who give up all enjoyments, and who desire the annihilation of the elements.

62. You are that high End, O illustrious one, which cannot be described, which is pure, which is the immutable one, and which is theirs who are given to knowledge and science.

63 These are the five Ends described in the Vedas and the Scriptures and the Puranas. It is through your favour that persons acquire those Ends, or, if they fail to attain to them, it is through your favour being denied to them.

64 It was thus that Tandi, who was a heap of penances, lauded Ishana And he sang also that high Brahma which in days of yore was sung by the Creator himself.

Upamanyu said :—

65 Thus lauded by that utterer of Brahma, viz., Tandi, Mahadeva, that illustrious and powerful god who was accompanied by his wife Uma, said these words.

Tandi said :—

66 Neither Brahman, nor Indra, nor Vishnu, nor the Vishwedevas, nor the great Rishis know you Pleased at this, Shiva said the following words.

The Holy One said :—

67 You shall be indestructible and eternal You shall be freed from all sorrow You will have great fame You will be gifted with energy. You will get Spiritual Knowledge.

68 All the Rishis shall seek you, and your son, through my favour, shall become the author of Sutras, O foremost of twice-born ones

69 What wishes of yours shall I grant to-day? Tell me O son what do you seek. —At this, Tandi joined his hands and said, —O Lord, let my devotion to you be steady.

Upamanyu said :—

70. Having given to Tandin these boons and received the adorations of both the gods and the Rishis, the great Deity disappeared there and then 71 When the illustrious Deity, O lord of the Yadavas thus disappeared with all his followers, the Rishi came to my hermitage and said to me all that had taken place.

72 Do you hear, O foremost of men, for your success, all those celebrated names that Tandi said to me.

73 The Grandfather had at one time recited ten thousand names of Mahadeva. In the scriptures, a thousand names of the god occur.

74 These names are not known to all O you who is above destruction, in days of yore, the Grandfather Brahman uttered these names for worshipping the great Deity Having acquired them through the favour of the Grandfather, I and communicated them to me.

CHAPTER XVII.

(ANUSHASANIKA PARVA).—Continued.

Vasudeva said:—

1 Concentrating his mind, O Yudhishthira, the twice-born Rishi Upamanyu, with hands joined together in respect, uttered this abstract of names beginning from the very commencement.

Upamanyu said:—

2. I shall worship that great Deity who is worthy of the adorations of all creatures, by uttering those names which are celebrated over all the worlds,—names some of which were uttered by the Grandfather Brahman, some by the Rishis, and some of which occur in the Vedas, and the auxiliary sciences.

3 Those names have been used by eminent persons They are, again, true and fraught with success and are capable of accomplishing all the objects of the utterer. They have been given to Mahadeva by Vandi whose soul was purified by Vedic learning and who invented those names with the help of his devotion.

4 With those names that have been uttered by many well known pious persons and by ascetics conversant with all the subjects I shall worship him who is the greatest, who is the first, who takes to heaven, who is ready to give benefits upon all creatures, and who is auspicious.

5 Those names have been heard in the universe, having spread from the region of Brahman All of them are fraught with truth With those names I shall worship him who is Supreme Brahma, who has been described by the Vedas, and who is Eternal

6. I shall now tell you O chief of Vadu's race, those names. Hear them with rapt attention You are a devout worshipper of the Supreme Lord Adore the illustrious Bhava, knowing him above all the deities.

7. And because you are devoted to him, I shall, therefore, recite those names before you Mahadeva is Eternal Brahma. No one even one endued with Yoga is able to describe, in even a hundred years, the glory and power of that great Deity in full The beginning, middle, or end of Mahadeva cannot be apprehended by the very gods.

9 Such being the fact, who is there, O Mahadeva, that can recite the qualities of Mahadeva in full? I shall, however,—through the favour of that illustrious supreme and perfectly wise Deity, extended to me for my devotion to him—recite his attributes in an abstract of few words and letters.

10. The Supreme Lord is incapable of being worshipped by any one if he does not grant his permission to the worshipper. As for myself, it is only when I become fortunate enough to receive his permission that I succeed in worshipping him.

11. I shall mention only a few names of that great God who is without birth and without destruction, who is the original cause of the universe, who is gifted with the highest Soul, and whose origin is unmanifest.

12 Hear, O Krishna, a few names, that were uttered by Brahman himself, of that giver of boons, that worshipful god, that powerful one who has the universe for his form, and who is gifted with supreme wisdom.

13 These names that I shall recite are taken from the ten thousand names that the great Grandfather had uttered in days of yore, as clarified butter is extracted from curds.

14 As gold is the essence of rocky mountains, as honey is the essence of flowers, as Manda is the extract from clarified butter, so have these names been extracted from and represent the cream of those ten thousand names that were uttered by the Grandfather Brahman

15 This abstract of names can remove every sin however heinous It possesses the merit of the four Vedas It should be understood with care, and be kept in the memory with concentrated soul.

16 It is fraught with auspiciousness. It brings on advancement It destroys Rakshasas It is a great purifier. It should be given only to him who is devoted to the great Lord, to him who has Faith, to him who believes It should never be communicated to him who has no faith, him who is an unbeliever, him who has not conquered his soul

17 That creature, O Krishna, who entertain malice towards the illustrious Mahadeva who is the original cause of everything, who is the Supreme Soul, and who is the great Lord, has surely to go to hell with all his ancestors before and all his children after him.

119 You are eternal and immutable as also dependent on yourself; you are the lord and protector of the gods and Asuras; you are the master and protector of all creatures, you are he who puts on a coat of mail, you are he whose arms are competent to grind all enemies; you are an object of worship with even him who is called Suparvan in heaven.

120. You are he who gives the power of bearing or upholding all things; you are yourself competent to bear all things; you are fixed and steady; you are white or pure, you carry the trident that can destroy (all things), you give bodies to those that constantly revolve in the universe of birth and death, you are more valuable than riches; you are the conduct of the righteous.

121. You are he who had torn the head of Brahman after due thought; you are he who is endued with all those auspicious marks which are described in the sciences of palmistry, pad dogy, phrenology and other Branches of knowledge treating of physiognomy, etc, as the indicator of the mental tendency; you are that wooden bar which is called the axle of a car and, therefore, you are he who is attached to the car represented by the body; you are attached to all things, you are gifted with very great power, being as you are a hero of heroes.

122. You are the Veda; you are the Smritis, the Itihasas, the Puranas, and other scriptures; you are the illustrious god of every sacred shrine; your are he who has the Earth for his car, you are the inert elements that form every creature; you are he who gives life into every combination of those inert elements; you are the Pranava and other sacred Mantras that put life into dead matter, you are he who casts peaceful looks, you are severely harsh.

123. You are he in whom exist numberless precious attributes and possessions, you have a body that is red, you are he who has all the vast oceans for so many ponds filled for your drinking; you are the root of the tree of the world; you are exquisitely beautiful and shines with superior grandeur; you are of the form of ambrosia or nectar, you are both cause and effect; you are an ocean of penances

124. You are he who is desirous of getting to the highest state of existence, you are he who has already acquired that state, you are he who is known for the purity of his conduct and acts and observances, you are he who is possessed of great fame, you are the ornament of armies, you are he who is bedecked with celestial ornaments, you are Yoga, you are he from whom originates eternal time measured by Yugas and Kalpas, you are he who conveys all creatures from place to place.

125. You are of the form of Righteousness and sin and their compounds, you are great and without form, you are he who killed the powerful Asura that had approached against the sacred city of Varanasi in the form of an infuriate elephant of huge proportions, you are of the form of death, you grant all creatures fruition of their wishes proportionate to their merits, you are approachable, you know all things beyond the ken of the senses, you know the essences

126 You are he who continually shines in beauty, you put on garlands from neck to the feet, you are Hara having the Moon for his beautiful eye, you are the salt ocean of unmeasurable extent; you are the first three Yugas; you are he whose appearance is always full of advantage to others.

127 You are he who has three eyes; you are he whose forms are greatly subtile; you are he whose ears are bored for putting on jewelled ear-rings; you are the bearer of matted locks; you are the point which indicates the nasal sound; you are the two dots (in the alphabet) which indicate the sound of the aspirated H; you have an excellent face; you are the arrow that is shot by the warrior for bringing about the destruction of his enemy, you are all the weapons that are used by warriors, you are gifted with patience capable of bearing all things.

128. You are he whose knowledge has originated from the stoppage of all physical and mental functions; you are he who appears as Truth on account of the cessation of all other faculties; you are that note which, originating from the region called Gandhara, is greatly sweet to the ear; you are he who is armed with the powerful bow (called Pinaka); you are he who is the understanding and the desires which exist in all creatures, besides being the supreme upholder of all beings; you are he from whom all acts originate 129 You are that wind which originates at the time of the universal dissolution and which is capable of churning the entire universe as the staff in the hands of the dairy-maid churns the milk in the milk pot; you are he who is full, you are he who sees all things, you are the sound which arises from slapping palm against palm, your palm serves as the dish or plate whence to take his food, you have an adamantine body, you are exceedingly great.

130. You are of the shape an umbrella; you are he who has an exellent umbrella; you are well known to be at one with all creatures, you are he who having put forth three feet covered all the universe with two and wanted space for the third; you have a bald head, you are he whose form is greatly ugly and dreadful, you are he who has undergone many modifications and become all things in the universe; you are he who has the well known badge of Renunciation viz, the staff, you are he who has a Kunda, you are he who is incapable of being attained to by means of acts.

131 You are he who is at one with the green eyed king of beasts, you are of the form of all the points of the compass, you are he who is armed with the thunder, you are he who has a hundred tongues, you are he who has a thousand feet and housand heads, you are the lord and king of the celestials; you are he who is made up of all the gods, you are the great Lord or preceptor.

132 You are he who has a thousand arms, you are he who is competent to get the fruition of every wish, you are he whose protection is sought by every one; you are he who is the creator of all the worlds; you are he who is the great purifier of all from every sin, in the form of shrines and sacred waters, you are he who has three high Mantras, you are the youngest (son of Aditi and Kashyapa); you are both black and tawny.

133 You are the maker of the Brahmana's rod, you are armed with the Sataghni the noose, and the dart; you are he who was born within the primeval lotus, you are he who has a huge womb, you are he who has the Vedas in his womb, you are he who takes his rise from that infinite span of waters which appears after the dissolution of the universe.

134 You are he who has the effulgent rays; you are the creator of the Vedas; you are he who studies the Vedas; you are he who knows the meaning of the Vedas, you are devoted to Brahma; you are the refuge of all persons devoted to Brahma, you are of numberless form, you have innumerable bodies, you have irresistible prowess.

135 Your nature transcends the three universal tendencies (of Sattwa, Rajas and Tamas), you are the lord of all sentiencies you are fleet like the wind, you are fleet like the mind, you are always smeared with sandal paste, you are the end of the stock of the primeval lotus, you are he who brought the celestial cow Surabhi down from a superior station to an inferior one by imprecating a curse upon her, you are that Brahman who was unable to see your end.

136 You are adorned with a large garland of Karnikara flowers, you are adorned with a diadem of blue gems, you are the wielder of the bow called Pinaka, you are the master of the science of Brahma, you are he who has controlled his senses by the help of your knowledge of Brahma; you are he who bearest Ganga on your head, you are the husband of Uma the daughter of Himavat.

137 You are powerful; you are he who protects the universe by assuming various incarnations, you are worthy of adoration, you are that primeval Being with the equine head who recited the Vedas with a thundering voice, you are he whose favour is very great; you are the great subjugator, you are he who has killed all his enemies, you are both white and tawny.

138 You have a gold hued body, you are he who is of the form of pure joy, you are of a controlled soul, you are the basis of Ignorance which is called Pradhana and which, consisting of the three qualities of Sattwa, Rajas and Tamas is the cause whence the universe has originated, you are he whose faces are turned to every direction, you are he who has three eyes, you are he who is superior to all creatures.

139 You are the soul of all mobile and immobile beings; you are of the form of the subtile soul, you are the giver of immortality in the form of Liberation as the fruit of all acts of virtue achieved by creatures without the desire of fruits, you are the preceptor of even those who are the gods of the gods, you are Vasu the son of Aditi; you are he who has innumerable rays of light, who brings forth the universe, and who is of the form of that Soma which is drunk in sacrifices.

140 You are Vyasa, the author of the Puranas and other sacred histories, you are the creations of Vyasa's brain both abridged and unabridged, you are the sum-total of sentiencies, you are the Season, you are the Year, you are the Month, you are the Fortnight, you are those sacred Days that end or conclude these periods.

141 You are the Kalas, you are the Kashthas, you are the Lavas, you are the Matras, you are the Muhurta and Aha and Kshapa, you are the Kshanas, you are the soil upon which the tree of the universe stands, you are the seed of all creatures, you are the principle of greatness, you are the sprout of sentiency.

142 You are existent, you are non-existent, you are Manifest, you are Unmanifest, you are the Father, you are the Mother; you are the Grandfather, you are the door of Heaven, you are the door of the generation of all creatures, you are the door of Liberation, you are those acts of virtue which lead to the felicity of Heaven.

143 You are extinction, you are the gladdener, you are the region of Truth, you are superior to even that region of Truth which is attainable by the pious, you are he who is the creator of both the gods and the Asuras, you are the refuge of both the gods and the Asuras.

144. You are the preceptor of both the gods and the Asuras, you are ever victorious, you are ever worshipped by the gods and the Asuras, you guide the deities and the Asuras even as the Mahamatra guides the elephant, you are the refuge of all the gods and the Asuras, 145 You are the king of both the deities and the Asuras, you are the leader in battle of both the gods and the Asuras, you are he who transcends the senses and shines by himself, you are of the form of the celestial Rishis, you grant boons to the deities and the Asuras.

146 You are he who rules the hearts of the gods and the Asuras, you are he into whom the universe enters, you are the refuge of even him who is the ruler of the hearts of both the gods and the Asuras, you are he whose body is made up of all the gods, you are he who has no Being superior to you of whom to think, you are he who is the inner soul of the gods; you are he who has originated from his own self.

147. You are of the form of immobile things, you are he who covers the three worlds with three steps of his, you are possessed of great learning you are stainless, you are he who is freed from the quality of Rajas, you are above destruction, you are he in whose honor hymns should be sung, you are the lord of the irresistible elephant of Time, you are of the form of that lord of Tigers who is adored in the country of the Kalingas, you are he who is called the lion among the gods, you are he who is the foremost of men.

148 You are profoundly wise, you are he who first takes a share of the offerings in sacrifices, you are imperceptible, you are the collection of all the celestials, you are he in whom penances prevail, you are always in excellent Yoga, you are auspicious, you are armed with the thunderbolt, you are the source whence the weapons called maces have taken their origin You are he whom your devotees acquire in various ways.

149 You are Guha (the celestial commander-in chief); you are the supreme limit of happiness, you are at one with your creation, you are he who rescues your creatures from death, you are the purifier of all including Brahma himself, you are of the form of bulls and other horned animals; you are he who is fond of mountain summits, you are the planet Saturn, you are Kuvera the king of the Yakshas, you are consummate faultlessness.

150. You are he who gives gladness; you are all the celestials in a body, you are the cessation of all things; you are all the duties that belong to all the modes of life, you are he who has an eye on his forehead, you are he who sports with the universe as his marble ball; you are of the form of deer; you are gifted with the energy that is of the form of knowledge and penance

151. You are the master of all immobile things, you are he who has restrained his senses by various regulations and vows, you are he whose objects have all been fulfilled you are at one with Liberation, you are different from him whom we adore, you have truth for your penances, you are of a pure heart.

152 You are he who lords over over all vows and fasts, you are the highest, you are Brahma, you are the highest refuge of your devotees; you are above all fetters, you are freed from the corporeal body, you are endued with every kind of prosperity, you multiply the prosperity of your devotees, you are what is continually undergoing changes

153 I have thus O Krishna, sung the praises of the illustrious god by reciting his names in the order of their importance. Who is there who can sing the praises of the lord of the universe, that great Lord of all who is worthy of our adorations, worship, and reverence, whom the very gods headed by Brahman are unable to praise and whom the Rishis also fail to sing.

154 Helped, however, by my devotion to him and having received his permission, I have lauded that Lord of sacrifices, that Deity of supreme power, that foremost of all creatures gifted with intelligence

155 By praising with these names which increase one's auspiciousness the great lord of blessedness a worshipper of devoted soul and pure heart gains his own self

156 These names form a hymn which supplies the best means of attaining to Brahma With the help of this hymn one is sure to acquire Liberation The Rishis and the gods all praise the highest deity by uttering this hymn

157 Hymned by persons of controlled soul, Mahadeva becomes pleased with those who sing his praises thus The illustrious god is always full of mercy towards his devotees Gifted with omnipotence, he it is who gives Liberation to those who adore him

158 Those foremost of men who are endued with faith and devotion, hear and recite for others and utter with respect the praises of that highest and eternal Lord, viz, Ishana, in all their successive lives and worship him in thought, word, and deed, and worshipping him thus at all times, viz, when they are lying or seated or walking or awake or opening the eyelids or shutting them and thinking of him again and again, become objects of respect with all their fellow men and derive great pleasure and exceeding joy.

162. When a creature becomes purged of all his sins in course of millions of births in various orders of Being, it is then that devotion originates in his heart for Mahadeva.

163 It is by good luck only that undivided devotion to Bhava who is the original cause (of the universe) fully originates in the heart of one who is conversant with every mode of adoring that great Deity.

164 Such stainless and pure devotion to Rudra, which has singleness of purpose and which is simply irresistible in its course, is seldom to be found among even the gods, but never among men

165 It is through the favour of Rudra that such devotion originates in the hearts of human beings On account of such devotion, men identifying themselves wholly with Mahadeva, succeeds in acquiring the highest success

166 The illustrious Deity, who is always bent upon showing favour to them who seek him with humility rescues them from the world who throw themselves whole mindedly upon him.

167 Save the great god who frees creatures from re-birth all other gods continually nullify the Penances of men, for men have no other source of power that it is as great as these.

168 It was thus that Tandi of tranquil soul, resembling Indra himself in glory, lauded the illustrious Master of all existent and non-existent things, that great Deity clad in animal skins

169. This hymn was borne by Brahmana himself Indeed, Brahman had sung it before Shankara. You are a Brahmana. You will, therefore, comprehend it well.

170 This is cleansing, and washes away all sins This confers Yoga, Liberation, heaven and contentment.

171. He who recites this hymn with rapt devotion to Shankara, succeeds in acquiring that high end which is theirs who are devoted to the doctrines of the Sankhya philosophy.

172 That worshipper who recites this hymn daily for one year with singleness of devotion succeeds in acquiring the end that he desires.

173 This hymn is a great mystery. It formerly lived in the breast of Brahman the Creator. Brahman gave it to Shakra. Shakra gave it to Death.

174 Death gave it to the Rudras. From the Rudras Tandi got it. Indeed, Tandi got it in the region of Brahman as the reward of his austere penances.

175. Tandi communicated it to Shukra and Shukra of Bhrigu's race communicated it to Gautama Gautama, again, O descendant of Madhu, communicated it to Vaivaswata-Manu.

176 Manu communicated it to the highly intelligent Narayana, numbere among the Sadhyas and held highly dear by him The illustrious Narayana, numbered among the Sadhyas and endued with undecaying glory, communicated it to Yama

177. Vaivaswat-Yama communicated it to Nachiketa. Nachiketa, O you of Vrishni's race, communicated it to Markandeya.

178 From Markandeya, O Janarddana I got it as the reward of my vows and fasts. To you O slayer of enemies, I communicate that hymn unheard by others.

178 This hymn leads to heaven. It removes disease and bestows long life. This is worthy of the highest praise, and is consistent with the Vedas.

Krishna said :—

179—So That person, O Partha, who recites this hymn with a pure heart observing the vow of celibacy, and with his senses under restraint, regularly for one whole year, succeeds in acquiring the fruits of a horse sacrifice Danavas and Yakshas and Rakshasas and Pishachas and Yatudhanas and Guhyakas and snakes can do no harm to him.

CHAPTER XVIII.

(ANUSHASANIKA PARVA).—Continued.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. After Vasudeva had stopped, the great Yogin viz, Krishna-Dwaipayana, addressed Yudhishthira, saying,—O son, recite this hymn consisting of the thousand and eight names of Mahadeva, and let Maheshwara be pleased with you.

2. Formerly, O son, I was engaged in the practice of penances on the breast of the mountains of Meru for getting a son. It is this very hymn that was recited by me.

3. As the reward of this, I acquired the fruition of all my wishes, O son of Pandu. You will also, by reciting this same hymn, get from Sharva the fruition of all your wishes.

4. After this, Kapila, the Rishi who preached the doctrines of Sankhya, and who is honoured by the gods themselves, said,—I adored Bhava with great devotion for many lives. The illustrious god at last became pleased with me and gave me knowledge which can help one in avoiding re-birth.

5—7 After this, the Rishi named Charushirsha, that dear friend of Shakra and known also as Alamvana's son and who is filled with mercy, said,—I in former days went to the mountains of Gokarna and sat myself to practise hard austerities for a hundred years. As the reward of those penances I got from Sharva, O son of king Pandu, a hundred sons, all of whom were born without the agency of woman, of well controlled soul, conversant with righteousness, gifted with great splendour, free from disease and sorrow, and endued with lives extending for a hundred thousand years.

8. Then the illustrious Valmiki addressing Yudhishthira, said —Once upon a time, in course of a disputation, certain ascetics who possessed the Homa-fire condemned me as one guilty of Brahmanicide

9 As soon as they had condemned me as such the sin of Brahmanicide O Bharata, possessed me I then, for purifying myself, sought the protection of the sinless Ishana who is irresistible in energy.

10 I became purged of all my sins That remover of all sorrows, viz, the destroyer of the triple city of the Asuras, said to me —You will acquire great fame in the world.

11. Then Jamadagni's son that foremost of all pious persons effulgent like the Sun in the midst of that assembly of Rishis said to the son of Kunti.

12 I was possessed by the sin, O eldest son of Pandu, of Brahmanicide for having killed my brothers who were all learned Brahmanas. Purifying myself, I sought the protection, O king, of Mahadeva.

13. I sang the praises of the great God by reciting his names. At this, Bhava became pleased with me, and gave me battle-axe and many other celestial weapons.

14. And he said to me,—you will be freed from sin and you will be invincible in battle. Death himself shall not succeed in overcoming you, for you, will be freed from disease.

15. Thus did the illustrious and crested god of auspicious form said this to me. Through the favour of that god of great intelligence I got all that He had said.

16. Then Vishwamitra said,—I was formerly a Kshatriya I paid my worship to Bhava with the desire of becoming a Brahmana. Through the favour of that great god I succeeded in getting the high status, that is so difficult to acquire, of a Brahmana.

17—18 Then addressing the royal son of Pandu, the Rishi Asita-Devala said,—Formerly O son of Kunti, through the curse of Shakra, all the merit of my pious deeds was destroyed. The power, Mahadeva kindly gave me back that merit together with great fame and a long life.

19 The illustrious Rishi Gritsamada, the dear friend of Shakra who resembled the celestial preceptor Vrihaspati himself, addressing Yudhishthira of Ajamidha's race said,—

20—21 The inconceivable Shakra had formerly celebrated a sacrifice extending for a thousand years While that sacrifice was going on, I was engaged by Shakra in reciting the Samans Varishtha, the son of that Manu who originated from the eyes of Brahman, came to that sacrifice and addressing me, said,—O foremost of twice-born ones, the Rathantara is not being recited properly by you.

22 O best of Brahmanas, cease to acquire demerit by reading so faultily, and with the help of your understanding do you read the Samans correctly O you of wicked understanding, why do you perpetrate such sin destructive of Sacrifice

23—24 Having said these words, the Rishi Varishtha, who was very wrathful, yielded to that passion and addressing me once more, said,—Be thou an animal shorn of intelligence, subject to grief, ever filled with fear, and an inhabitant of trackless forests destitute of both wind and water and abandoned by other animals. Do you thus pass ten thousand years with ten and eight hundred years in addition.

25. That forest in which you will have to pass this time will be shorn of all holy trees and will, besides, be the haunt of Ruru deer and lions Verily, you shall have to become a cruel deer plunged in excess of grief.

26—27. As soon as he had said these words, O son of Pritha, I immediately became changed into a deer. I then sought the protection of Maheshwara. The great god said to me,—You will be freed from disease of every sort, and besides immortality shall be yours. You will never suffer from grief Your friendship with Indra shall remain unchanged, and let the sacrifices of both Indra and yourself multiply.

28. The illustrious and puissant Mahadeva favors all creatures in this way He is always the great dispenser and ordainer of the happiness and sorrow of all living creatures.

29 That illustrious god is incapable of being comprehended in thought, word, or deed. O son, O you who are the best of warriors, there is none who is equal to me in learning

30. After this, Vasudeva, that foremost of all intelligent men, once more said,—Mahadeva of golden eyes was pleased by me with my penances.

31. Pleased with me, O Yudhishthira, the illustrious god said to me,—You will, O Krishna, through my favour, become dearer to all persons than riches which is coveted by all 32 You will be invincible in battle Your energy shall be equal to that of Rudra Mahadeva gave me thousands of other boons at that time.

33 In a former incarnation I worshipped Mahadeva on the Manimantha mountain for millions of years.

34 Pleased with me, the illustrious god said to me those words —Blessed be you, do you solicit boons you wish for.

35—36 Hearing him I said these words, —If the powerful Mahadeva has been pleased with me, then let devotion to him be unchanged, O Ishana! This is the boon that I solicit —The great God said me — Be it so'—and disappeared there and then.

Jaigishavya said :—

37 O Yudhishthira, formerly in the city of Varanasi, the powerful Mahadeva, finding me out, conferred upon me the eight attributes of sovereignty'

Garga said :—

38. O son of Pandu, pleased with me, on account of a mental sacrifice which I had performed, the great God bestowed upon me, on the banks of the sacred river Saraswati, that wonderful science, viz., the knowledge of Time, with its sixty-four branches

39 He also conferred upon me a thousand sons, all possessed of equal merit and fully conversant with the Vedas Through his favour their periods of life as also mine have become extended to ten millions of years.

Parashara said :—

41—42 Formerly I pleased Sarva, O king. I then cherished the desire of getting a son who would be endued with great ascetic merit, and superior energy, and addressed to high Yoga, that would acquire world-wide fame, arrange the Vedas and become the home of prosperity, that would be devoted to the Vedas and the Brahmanas, and be famous for mercy. Such a son was desired by me from Maheshwara.

42 Knowing that this was the wish of my heart, that foremost of gods said to me,—Through the fruition of that object of yours which you wish to get from me, you will have a son named Krishna.

43 In that creation which shall be known after the name of Savarni-Manu, that son of yours shall be reckoned among the seven Rishis He shall arrange the Vedas, and be the propagator of Kuru's race.

44 He shall, besides, be the author of the ancient histories and do behoof to the world Gifted with severe penances he shall, again, be the dear friend of Shakra

45 Freed from all sorts diseases, that son of yours, O Parashara, shall, besides be immortal'—Having said these words, the great god disappeared there and then. Such is the good, O Yudhishthira, that I have got from that indestructible and immutable God, gifted with the highest penances and supreme energy.

Mandavya said —

46—47 Formerly, suspected wrongly of theft, I was impaled I then worshipped the illustrious Mahadeva who said to me,—You shall soon be freed and live for millions of years The pangs due to imprisonment shall not be yours.

48—49 You will also be freed from all sorts of affliction and disease And since, O ascetic, this body of yours has originated from the fourth foot of Dharma, (viz., Truth), you will be peerless on Earth Do you make your life fruitful. You will, without any obstruction be able to bathe in all the sacred waters of the Earth

50—51 And after the dissolution of your body, I shall O learned Brahmana, ordain that you will enjoy the pure felicity of heaven eternally Having said these words to me, the worshipful god having the bull for his carriage, viz, Maheshwara of peerless splendour and clad in animal skin, O king, disappeared there and then with all his companions.

Galava said:—

52—53 Formerly I studied from my preceptor Vishwamitra Getting his permission I started for home with the object of seeing my father My widowed mother stricken with sorrow and, weeping bitterly, said to me,—Alas your father will never see his son who, endued with Vedic knowledge, has been allowed by his preceptor to come home and who having all the graces of youth, is endued with self-control.

54—55 Hearing these words of my mother, I became stricken with despair about seeing again my father I then paid my adorations with a rapt soul to Maheshwara who, pleased with me, appeared before me and said —Your father your mother and yourself, O son, shall all be freed from death, Go quickly and enter your abode, you shall see your father there

56 Having got the permission of the illustrious god, I then went home, O Yudhishthira, and saw my father, O son, coming out after having finished his daily sacrifice

57. And he came out, having his hands a quantity of sacrificial fuel and Kusha grass ann some fallen fruits And he appeared to have already taken his daily food for he had washed himself properly

58 Throwing down those things from his hand my father, with eyes bathed in tears, raised me, for I had prostrated myself at his feet, and embracing me smelt my head, O son of Pandu and said —By good luck, O son, are you seen by me You have returned having acquired knowledge from your preceptor.

Vaishampayana said:—

59 Hearing these marvellous and most wonderful deeds of the great Mahadeva sung by the ascetics, the son of Pandu became amazed

60 Then Krishna that foremost of all intelligent persons, then spoke once more to Yudhishthira, that sea of virtue, like Vishnu speaking to Purulhuta.

Vasudeva said:—

61—62 Upamanyu, who appeared to shine like the Sun said to me —Those sinful men who are sullied with impious deeds, do not succeed in attaining to Ishana Having their nature sullied by the qualities of Darkness and Ignorance they can never approach the Supreme Deity It is only those twice-born persons who are of purified souls that succeed in attaining to the Supreme Deity.

63 Even if a person enjoys every pleasure and luxury, yet if he be devoted to the Supreme Deity he is considered equal to hermits of purified souls

64 If Rudra be pleased with a person he can confer upon him the dignity of either Brahma or of Keshava or of Shakra with all the gods under him, or the sovereignty of the three worlds

65 Those men O sire, who adore Bhava even mentally, succeed in freeing themselves from all sins and live in the celestial region with all the gods

66 A person who raises houses to their foundations and destroys tanks and lakes, indeed who lays waste the entire universe, does not become stained with sin if he adores and worships the illustrious three-eyed god

67 A person who is shorn of every auspicious mark and who is stained by every sin destroys all his sins by meditating upon Shiva

68 Even worms insects and birds, O Keshava, that devote themselves to Mahadeva, are enabled to move about fearlessly.

69 This is my belief that those men who devote themselves to Mahadeva become forsooth, freed from re birth

70 After this Krishna again addressed Yudhisthira the son of Dharma in the following words

Vishnu said —

71—78 The Sun the Moon, Wind Fire, Heaven Earth, the Vasus the Vishwedevas, Dhatri Aryyaman, Shukra, Vrihaspati the Rudras, the Saddhyas, Varuna, Gopa, Brahman, Shakra, Maruts, the Upanishats that teach a knowledge of Brahma, Truth the Vedas, the Sacrifices, Sacrificial Presents, Brahmanas reciting the Vedas, Soma, Sacrificer, the shares of the gods in sacrificial offerings, clarified butter poured in sacrifices, Raksha, Diksha, all kinds of restraints in the form of vows and fasts and rigid observances, Swaha, Vashat, the Brahmanas the celestial cow, the foremost acts of piety, the wheel of Time, Strength,

Fame, Self control, the Steadiness of all intelligent persons, all acts of goodness and otherwise, the seven Rishis, Understanding of the foremost order, all kinds of excellent touch, the success of all deeds, the various tribes of the celestials, those beings that drink heat, those that are drinkers of Soma, Likhas, Suyamas, Tushita, all creatures having Mantras for their bodies, Abhasuras, those beings that live upon scents only, those that live upon vision only, those that control their speech, those that restrain their minds the pure, they who are capable of assuming diverse forms through Yoga power, those celestials who live on touch, those celestials who live on vision and those who live upon the butter poured in sacrifices, those beings who can create by their will the objects they require they who are regarded as the foremost ones among the celestials, and all the other celestials, O Ajamida the Suparnas, the Gandharvas, the Pishachas, the Danavas the Yakshas, the Charanas, the snakes, all that is gross and all that is subtile, all that is soft and all that is not subtile, all sorrows and all joys, all sorrow that comes after joy and all joy that comes after sorrow, the Sankhya philosophy, Yoga, and that which is above all objects regarded as foremost and very superior,—all adorable things, all the celestials, and all the protectors of the universe who entering into the physical forces sustain and uphold this ancient creation of that illustrious Deity,—have originated from that Creator of all creatures.

79 All that I have mentioned is grosser than what the wise think of with the help of Penances Indeed, that subtile Brahma is the cause of life I bow respectfully to it. Let that immutable and indestructible Lord, always worshipped by us, grant us desirable boons.

80. That person who, governing his senses and purifying himself, recites this hymn, continually for his vow for one month, succeeds in acquiring the merit of a Horse-sacrifice

81. By reciting this hymn the Brahmana succeeds in acquiring all the Vedas; the Kshatriya becomes crowned with victory, O son of Pritha; the Vaishya, in acquiring riches and cleverness, and the Shudra, in acquiring happiness here and a good end hereafter

82. By reciting the best of hymns that can cleanse every sin and that is highly sacred and purifying, highly illustrious persons set their hearts on Rudra.

83 A man by reciting this best of hymns succeeds in living in the celestial region for as many years as there are pores in his body.

CHAPTER XIX.

(ANUSHASANIKA PARVA)—Continued

Yudhishthira said:—

1. I ask, O foremost of Bharata's race, what is the origin of the declaration, about satisfying all duties jointly, which is made on the occasion of a person's marriage

2 Is that declaration about satisfying all duties together, due only to what is laid down by the great Rishis in days of yore, or does it refer to the duty of procreating children from religious motives, or has it reference to only the carnal pleasure that is expected from such an intercourse of the sexes?

3 Great is the doubt that fills my mind about. Indeed, I think that the declaration to which I refer is contray to the natural impulses which lead to a union of the sexes. The union in this world for performing duties together ceases with death and is not to be seen to exist hereafter.

4. This union for doing all duties together leads to heaven. But heaven, O grandfather, is attained to by persons that are dead It is seen of a married couple that only one dies at a time Where does the other then remain Do tell me this.

5. Men obtain various kinds of fruits by performing various kinds of duties The occupations, again, to which menfollow are of various kinds Various, again, are the hells to which they go on account of such diversity of duties and acts

6 The Rishis have said that women, in particular are false in behaviour. When human beings are such, and when women in particular are described in the Shastras to be false, how, O sire, can there be a union between the sexes for purposes of performing all duties together

7. In the very Vedas one may read that women are false. The word 'Duty,' as used in the Vedas, appears to have been coined first for general application. Therefore the application of that word to the rites of marriage is, instead of being correct, only a form of speech forcibly applied where it has no application.

8—9 The subject appears to me to be inexplicable although I think of it always. O grandfather, O you of great wisdom, you should explain this to me fully, clearly and according to the Shrutt. In fact, do you explain to me what it is, what its characteristics are, and the way in which it has come to pass.

Bhishma said :—

10 Regarding it is cited the old discourse between Ashtavakra and the lady known by the name of Disha.

11 Formerly Ashtavakra of austere penances, desirous of marriage, begged the great Rishi Vadanya of his daughter.

12 The name by which the lady was known was Suprabha In beauty she was peerless on Earth In virtues, dignity, conduct, and manners, she was superior to all girls

13 By a look only that girl of beautiful eyes had robbed him of his heart even as a delightful grove in spring, decked with flowers, robs the spectator of his heart.

14. The Rishi addressed Ashtavakra and said,—Yes, I shall give my daughter to you Listen, however, to me Make a journey to the sacred North. You will see many things there.

Ashtavakra said :—

15 You should tell me what I shall see in that region Indeed, I am ready to carry out whatever command may be laid laid upon me by you.

Vadanya said :—

16 Passing over the dominions of the Lord of Treasures you will cross the Himavat mountains. You will then see the plateau on which Rudra lives It is inhabited by Siddhas and Charanas.

17—18. It is full of the companions of Mahadeva, frolicsome and fond of dance and possessed of various faces It is peopled with also many Pishachas, O lord, of various forms and all daubed with fragrant powders of various colors and dancing with joyous hearts in accompaniment with brazen instruments of different kinds. Encircled by these who dance with electric rapidity or refrain at times altogether from forward or backward or transverse motion of every sort Mahadeva lives there.

19 That charming spot on the mountains, we have heard, is the favourite abode of the great god. It is said that that great god as also his companions are always present there

20. It was there that the goddess Uma had practised the severest austerities for the sake of the three-eyed god. Hence, it is said, that spot is much liked by both Mahadeva and Uma.

21—22. Formerly there, on the summit of the Mahaparshwa mountains, which are situate to the north of the mountains sacred to Mahadeva, the Seasons, and the last Night, and many gods, and many human beings also, in their embodied forms, had worshipped Mahadeva. You will cross that region also in thy northward journey.

23 You will then see a beautiful and charming forest blue of color and resembling a mass of clouds There, in that forest, you will see a beautiful female ascetic looking like the goddess of prosperity herself.

24. Venerable for age and highly blessed, she is going through the initiatory rite. Seeing her there you should duly adore her with reverence.

25 Returning to this place after having seen her, you will take the hand of my daughter in marriage. If you can make this agreement, proceed then on your journey and do what I order you.

Ashtavakra said :—

26 So be it! I shall do your bidding. Verily, I shall proceed to that region of which you mention, O you of righteous soul! On your side, you should make your words truthful

Bhishma said :—

27. The illustrious Ashtavakra started on his journey He proceeded more and more towards the north and at last reached the Himavat mountains inhabited by Siddhas and Charanas.

28 Arrived at the Himavat mountains that foremost of Brahmanas then reached the sacred river Vahuda whose waters produce great merit.

29 He bathed in one of the charming Tirthas of that river, which was free from mud, and pleased the gods with oblations of water. His ablutions being over, he spread a quantity of Kusha grass and laid himself down upon it for taking rest for some time.

30. Passing the night in this way the Brahmana rose with the day. He once more performed his ablutions in the sacred waters of the Vahuda and then lighted his homa fire and adored it with the help of many foremost of Vedic mantras.

31. He then adored with the due rites both Rudra and his wife Uma, and rested for some more time by the side of that lake in the course of the Vahuda whose shores he had reached. Refreshed by such rest, he started from that region and then proceeded towards Kailasa.

32 He then saw a golden gate that seemed to blaze with beauty He saw also the Mandakini and the Nalini of the great Kuvera the Lord of Riches.

33 Seeing the Rishi arrived there, all the Rakshasas headed by Manibhadra who were engaged in protecting that lake full of beautiful lotuses came out in a body for welcoming and honouring the illustrious traveller.

34. The Rishi adored in return those Rakshasas of terrible prowess and asked them to report, forthwith, his arrival to the Lord of Riches.

35. Requsted by him to do this, those Rakshasas, O king, said to him,—king Vaishravana, without waiting for the news, is coming of his own accord to your presence.

36. The illustrious Lord of Riches is well acquainted with the object of this your journey. See him,—that blessed Master, who blazes with his own energy.

37. Then king, Vaishravana, approaching the innocent Ashtavakra, duly enquired about his welfare. The usual polite enquiries being over, the Lord of Riches then addressed the twice born Rishi, saying,—You are welcome Do tell me what do you want from me. Inform me of it, I shall, O twice-born one do whatever you may order me to accomplish.

39 Do you enter my house as pleases you. O foremost of Brahmanas Duly entertained by me, and after your business is done you may go without any obstacles being placed in your way.

40. Having said these words, Kuvera took the hand of that foremost of Brahmanas and conducted him into his palace He offered him his own seat as also water to wash his feet and the present of the usual ingredients

41 After the two had been seated the Yakshas of Kuvera headed by Manibhadra, and many Gandharvas and Kinnaras, also sat down before them

42. After all of them had taken their seats, the Lord of Riches said —Understanding what your pleasure is the various tribes of Apsaras will begin their dance.

43 It is proper that I should entertain you with hospitality and that you should be served with propriety —Thus addressed the ascetic Ashtavakra said, in a sweet voice,—Let the dance go on.

44. Then Urvara, Mishrakeshi, Rambha, Urvashi, Alumvusha, Ghritachi, Chitra, Chitrangada, Ruchi Manohara, Sukeshi, Sumukhi, Hasini, Prabha, Vidyuta, Prasami, Danta, Vidyota and Rati —these and many other beautiful Apsaras began to dance. The Gandharvas played on various kinds of musical instruments.

47. After such excellent music and dance had begun, the Rishi Ashtavakra of austere penances unconsciously passed a full celestial year there in the house of king Vaishravana.

48 Then king Vaishravana said to the Rishi,—O learned Brahmana, see a little more than a year has passed away since your arrival here.

49 This music and dance, especially known by the name of Gandharva, is a stealer of the heart (and of time) Act as you like, or let this go on if that be your pleasure.

50 You are my guest and, therefore, worthy of worship This is your house. Do you set your commands. We are all bound to you.

51. Thus addressed by king Vaishravana, the illustrious Ashtavakra, replied to him, with a pleased heart, saying,—I have been duly honored by you I desire now, O Lord of Riches, to go hence.

52—53 Indeed, I am highly pleased. All this befits you, O Lord of Riches. Through your grace, O illustrious one, and according to the command of the great Rishi Vadanya, I shall now proceed to my journey's end May you enjoy prosperity. —Having said these words, the illustrious Rishi left Kuvera's palace and proceeded northwards.

54 He crossed the Kailasa and the Mandara as also the golden mountains. Beyond those high and great mountains is situate that excellent region where Mahadeva dressed as an humble ascetic was living.

55 He went round the spot, with a composed mind bending his head in respect the while. Descending then on the Earth, he regarded himself purified for having seen that holy spot which is the residence of Mahadeva

56 Having gone round that mountain thrice the Rishi with face turned towards the north went on with a joyous heart.

57 Then he saw another forest that was very delightful It was adorned with the fruits and roots of every season, and it was filled with the music of birds.

58 There were many charming groves in the forest The illustrious Rishi then saw a beautiful asylum.

59 The Rishi saw also many golden hills decked with gems and possessed of various forms. There he saw many lakes and tanks also 60 And he saw various other highly beautiful objects Seeing these things the mind of that Rishi of purified soul became filled with joy.

61. He then saw a beautiful palace made of gold and adorned with all sorts of gems Of wonderful structure, that palace surpassed the palace of Kuvera himself in every respect.

62. Around it there were many hills and mounts of jewels and gems Many beautiful cars and heaps of jewels also were seen there.

63 The Rishi saw there the river Mandakini whose waters were covered with numberless Mandara flowers There also were seen many self luminous gems, and the soil all around was decked with diamonds of various species

64 The palace which the Rishi saw contained many chambers whose arches were set with various kinds of stones Those chambers were adorned also with nets of pearls interspersed with jewels and gems of various species

65 Various sorts of beautiful objects, capable of stealing the heart and the eye surrounded that palace That charming retreat was inhabited by numberless Rishis

66 Seeing these beautiful sights all around the Rishi began to think of where he would take shelter Proceeding then to the gate of the palace, he uttered these words —,

67. Let those that live here know that a guest has come —Hearing the voice of the Rishi, a number of maidens came out in a body from that palace.

68. They were seven in number, O king, Of different sorts of beauty, all of them were highly charming Every one of those maidens the Rishi saw stole his heart.

69 The sage could not, with even his utmost struggles control his mind In fact, seeing those maidens of very great beauty, his heart lost its balance. Seeing himself to give way to such influences, the Rishi made a vigorous effort, and greatly wise as he was he at last succeeded in controlling himself.

70. Those ladies then addressed the Rishi, saying —Let the illustrious one enter. —Stricken with curiosity about those highly beautiful ladies, as also of that palace, the twice-born Rishi entered as he was commanded Entering the palace he saw an old lady, with marks of decrepitude, dressed in white robes and adorned with every kind of ornament The Rishi blessed her, saying,—Good be to you —The old lady returned his good wishes in due form. Rising up, she offered a seat to the Rishi.

73 Having taken his seat, Ashtavakra said,—Let all the ladies go to their respective quarters Only let one stay here Let that one remain here who is endued with wisdom and who has tranquility of heart. Indeed, let all the others go away as they like

74 Thus addressed, all those damsels went round the Rishi and then left the chamber, only that aged lady remaining there

75 The day quickly passed and night came The Rishi, seated on a splendid bed addressed the old lady, saying,—O blessed lady, the night is growing deeper. Do you go to sleep

76 Their conversation being thus put a stop to by the Rishi, the old lady laid herself down on an excellent bed of great beauty.

77. Soon after, she rose from her bed and pretending to tremble with cold, left it for the bed of the Rishi.

77 The great Ashtavakra welcomed her courteously. The lady, however, stretching her arms, tenderly embraced the Rishi, O foremost of men.

79 Seeing the Rishi quite unmoved and as inanimate as a piece of wood, she became very sorry and began to converse with him.

80 There is no pleasure, except that from desire, which women can derive from a person of the other sex! I am now under the influence of lust I seek you for that reason. Do you seek me in return.

81. Be cheerful, O learned Rishi, and unite yourself with me! Do you embrace me, O learned one, for I desire you greatly.

82. O you of righteous soul this union with me is the best and desirable reward of those severe penances which you had practised At the first sight I have become disposed to seek you. Do you also seek me.

83 All this riches and every other precious article that you see here, are mine Do you, indeed, become the master of all this with my person and heart.

84 I shall satisfy every wish of yours! Do you sport with me, therefore, in these delightful forests, O Brahmana, which can grant every wish.

85 I shall obey you implicitly in every thing, and you will sport with me according to your pleasure! All objects of desire that are human or that belong to heaven shall be enjoyed by us.

86 There is no other pleasure more agreeable to women. Indeed, union with a person of the opposite sex is the most desirable object of joy that we can get.

87. When moved by the god of love women become very whimsical. Then they do not feel any pain even if they walk over a desert of burning sand.

Ashtavakra said:—

88 O blessed lady, I never approach another's wife. One's union with another man's wife is condemned by persons conversant with the scriptures on morality.

89. I am an utter stranger to enjoyments of every kind. O blessed lady, know that I have become desirous of marriage for getting children. I swear by truth itself.

90. Through the help of offspring righteously got, I shall proceed to those regions of happiness which cannot be attained without such help. O good lady, know what is consistent with morality, and knowing it, desist from your efforts.

The lady said:—

91. The very gods of wind and fire and water, or the other celestials, O twice born one, are not so agreeable to women as the god of love. Indeed, women are greatly fond of sexual union.

92 Among a thousand women, or perhaps, among hundreds of thousands, sometimes only one may be found who is devoted to her husband.

93 Under the influence of desire, they care not for family or father or mother or brother or husband or sons or husband's brother.

94. Seeking what they consider happiness, they destroy the family even as many rivers wash away the banks that contain them. The Creator himself had said this, marking the faults of women.

Bhishma said:—

95 The Rishi, bent upon finding out the faults of women, addressed that lady, saying:—Cease to speak to me thus! Yearning originates from liking. Tell me what I am to do.

96 That lady then said in return:—O illustrious one, you will all see according to time and place. Do you only live here (for sometime). O highly blessed one, and I shall consider myself sufficiently rewarded!

97—98 Thus addressed by her, the twice born Rishi, O Yudhishthira, expressed his resolution to satisfy her request, saying:—I shall live with you in this place as long as I can venture to do so.—The Rishi then seeing that lady possessed by decrepitude, began to think seriously on the matter. He appeared to be even pained by his thoughts.

99 The eyes of that foremost of Brahmanas could not get any delight from those parts of that lady's person whereupon they were fixed. On the other hand, his looks appeared to be dispelled by the ugliness of those particular limbs.

100 This lady is, forsooth, the mistress of this palace. Has she been made ugly through some curse? It is not proper that I should quickly determine the cause of this.

101. Thinking thus in his heart, and curious to know the reason, the Rishi passed the rest of that day in anxiety.

102 The lady then addressed him, saying:—O illustrious one, look at the Sun reddened by the evening clouds! What service shall I do to you?

103 The Rishi addressed her, saying:—'Fetch water for my ablution! Having bathed, I shall recite my evening prayers, controlling my tongue and the senses.'

CHAPTER XX.

(ANUSHASANIKA PARVA).—Continued.

Bhishma said:—

1. Thus ordered, the lady said,—Be it so!—She then brought oil and a piece of cloth for his wear during the ablutions.

2. With the ascetic's permission she rubbed every part of his body with the fragrant oil she had brought for him.

3 The Rishi was rubbed and when the process of rubbing was over, he went to the room set apart for the performance of ablutions. There he sat upon a new and excellent seat.

4 After the Rishi had taken his seat upon it, the old lady began to wash his body, with her own soft hands whose touch was highly agreeable

5—6 One after another in due course, the lady helped the Rishi in his ablutions Between the lukewarm water with which he was washed, and the soft hands which were engaged in washing him, the Rishi of rigid vows could not understand that the whole night had passed away in the work Rising from the bath, the Rishi became highly surprised.

7. He saw the Sun risen above the horizon on the East He was surprised at this and asked himself,—Was it really so or was it a mistake of the understanding

8. The Rishi then duly adored the god of a thousand rays This done, he asked the lady as to what he should do The old lady prepared some food for the Rishi sweet to the taste like ambrosia itself.

9 On account of the sweetness of that food the Rishi could not take much. In taking that little however, the day passed away and evening set in.

10 The old lady then asked the Rishi to go to bed and sleep An excellent bed was given to the Rishi and another was taken by herself.

11. The Rishi and the old lady occupied different beds at first, but when it was midnight, the lady left her own bed for that of the Rishi.

Ashtavakra said:—

12 O blessed lady, I am not inclined for sexual union with one who is the wife of another. Leave my bed, O good lady. Blessed be you do, you desist from this of your own accord.

Bhishma said:—

13 Thus dissuaded by the Brahmana with the help of his self control, the lady answered him, saying —I am my own mistress! In accepting me you will commit no sin.

Ashtavakra said —

14 Women can never be their own mistresses This is the opinion of the Creator himself, viz, that a woman should never be indepent.

The lady said:—

15. O learned Brahmana I am pained by desire. Mark my devotion to you You commit sin by refusing to accept me lovingly.

Ashtavakra said:—

16. Various shortcomings drag away the man who acts as he likes. As for myself, I am able to govern my inclinations by self control. O good lady, return to your own bed.

The lady said:—

17 I bow to you You should show me your favour O sinless one, I prostrate myself before you, do you become my refuge.

18 If you see sin in knowing one who is not your wife, I yield myself to you Do you, O twice-born one, accept my hand in marriage

19 You will incur no sin. I tell you truly. Know that I am my own mistress. If there be any sin in this, let it visit me only. My heart is devoted to you I am my own mistress. Do you accept me.

Ashtavakra said:—

20. How is it, O good lady, that you are your own mistress? Tell me the reason of this There is not a single woman in the three worlds who can be considered as the mistress of her own self.

21 The father protects her while she is a maiden. The husband protects her while she is young. Sons protect her when she is aged Woman can never be independent as long as they live.

The lady said. —

22 I have, since my maidenhood adopted the vow of celibacy Do not doubt it. I am still a maid Do you make me your wife O Brahmana, do not kill this devotion of mine to you.

Ashtavakra said —

23 As you are inclined to me so am I inclined to you There is this question, however, that should be settled It is true that by giving way to my inclinations I shall not be considered as acting contrary to what the Rishi (Vadanya) wishes

24. This is very wonderful Will this lead to what is good? Here is a maiden adorned with good ornaments and robes!

25 She is highly beautiful. Why did decrepitude hide her beauty so long? At present she looks like a beautiful maiden. I do not know what form she may assume hereafter.

26. I shall never swerve from that control which I have over desire and the other passions or from contentment with what I have already got. Such swerving is not good I shall keep myself united with truth.

CHAPTER XXI.

(ANUSHASANIKA PARVA) — Continued.

Yudhishthira said:—

1 Tell me why had that lady no fear of Ashtavakra's curse although Ashtavakra was gifted with great energy? How also did Ashtavakra succeed in returning from that palace?"

Bhishma said:—

2. Ashtavakra asked her, saying,—How do you change your form so? You should not say anything false I wish to know this. Do you speak truly before a Brahmana.

The lady said:—

3 O best of Brahmanas, wherever you may live, in the celestial region or on Earth this desire of union between the sexes is to be observed O you of infallible prowess, hear with rapt attention, what it all is.

4 This trial was converted by me, O sinless one, for examining you aright, O you of infallible prowess, you have conquered all the worlds by the strength of mind.

5 Know me as the embodiment of the Northern point of the compass. You have seen the lightness of the female character. Even old women are tortured by the desirs of sexual union.

6 The grandfather himself and all the gods with Indra have been pleased with you I know the object for which your illustrious self has come here.

7. O foremost of twice born persons you have been sent here by the Rishi Vadanya —the father of your bride—in order that I may instruct you According to the wishes of that Rishi I have already instructed you,

8 You will return home safely. Your journey back will not be toilsome. You will get for wife the girl you have chosen She will bear you a son.

9 Through desire I had solicited you You gave me the very best answer People of the three worlds cannot get over the desire for sexual union.

10 Return to your quarters, having achieved such merit. What else is there which you wish to hear (from me)? I shall truly describe it to you, O Ashtavakra.

11. I was gratified by the Rishi Vadanya in the first instance for your sake, O twice-born ascetic! For the sake of honoring him, I have said all this to you.

Bhishma said:—

12 Hearing these words of hers, the twice-born Ashtavakra joined his hands respectfully He then begged the lady for her permission to return Getting the permission he sought, he returned to his own hermitage.

13. Resting himself for sometime at home and getting the permission of his kinsmen and friends, he then, in a proper way, went, O delighter of the Kurus, to the Brahmana Vadanya.

14 Welcomed with the usual enquiries by Vadanya the Rishi Ashtavakra, with a well pleased heart, described all that he had seen.

15 He said,—ordered by you I proceeded to the mountains of Gandhamadana. In the quarter lying to the north of those mountains I saw a very superior goddess.

16 I was received by her with courtesy. She named you before me, and also instructed me in various matters Having listened to her I have returned, O lord

17 The learned Vadanya said to him,—take my daughter's hand according to due rites and under the proper constellations. You are the fittest bride-groom I can select for the girl.

Bhishma said:—

18 Ashtavakra said,—So be it!—and espoused the girl Indeed, having married the girl, the highly pious Rishi, became filled with joy

19 Having taken as his wife that beautiful lady, the Rishi continued to live in his own hermitage freed from every sort of mental trouble.

CHAPTER XXII.

(ANUSHASANIKA PARVA) — Continued.

Yudhishthira said:—

1. Whom have the eternal Brahmanas selected a proper object of gifts? Is a Brahmana who bears the marks of the order of life he follows to be considered as such, or is one divested of such marks to be so regarded

Bhishma said:—

2 O king it has been said that gifts should be made a Brahmana who follows the duties of his own order, whether he bears the marks of Brahmacharyya or not, for both are faultless, viz, he who bears such marks and he who is divested of them

Yudhishthira said:—

3 What sin does an impure person commit if he makes gifts of sacrificial butter or food or with great devotion, to persons of the twice-born order?

Bhishma said:—

4 He who has no self-control becomes, forsooth, cleansed by devotion Such a man, becomes purified in respect of every act

Yudhishthira said:—

5 It has been said that a Brahmana who is sought for the performance of a religious rite should never be examined The learned, however, hold that while performorming rites for the Pitris, the Brahmana who is sought to be engaged, should be examined.

Bhishma said —

6 As regards the religious rite for the deities, these do not yield fruits on account of the Brahmana who is engaged in doing them but through the grace of the deities themselves Forsooth, those persons who perform sacrifices acquire the merit of those acts, through the favour of the deities

7. The Brahmanas, O chief of the Bharatas, are always utterers of Brahma The intelligent Rishi Markandeya, gave vent to these words in days of yore.

Yudhishthira said:—

8 Why, O grandfather, are these five viz, he who is a stranger, he who is gifted with learning, he who is connected by marriage, he that is endued with penances, and he who is devoted to the performance of sacrifices, considered as proper persons?

Bhishma said:—

9 The first three viz, strangers, relatives, and ascetics when endued with these attributes, viz, purity of birth, devotion to religious acts learning, mercy, modesty, sincerity, and truthfulness, are considered as proper persons The other two, viz, men of learning and those given to sacrifices when gifted with five of these attributes, viz, purity of birth, mercy, modesty, sincerity, and truthfulness, are also considered as proper persons.

10 Listen now to me, O son of Pritha, as I recite to you the opinions of these four persons of great energy, viz, the goddes, Earth, the Rishi Kashyapa, the god of fire, and the ascetic Markandeya.

The Earth said:—

11 As a clod of earth, when thrown into the great ocean, quickly dissolves away, so every sort of sin disappears by the three high qualifications of officiation at sacrifices, teaching, and receiving of gifts.

Kashyapa said:—

12 The Vedas with their six auxiliaries, the Sankhya philosophy, the Puranas, and high birth, these cannot rescue a twice-born person if he falls away from good conduct.

Agni said:—

13. The Brahmana who, engaged in study and considering himself learned, seeks with the help of his learning to destroy the reputation of others, falls away from virtue and comes to be regarded as divorced from truth Such persons of refractory spirit never acquire regions of happiness hereafter.

Markandeya said:—

14 If a thousand Horse sacrifices and Truth were weighed in the balance, I do not know whether the former would equal even half of the latter in weight.

Bhishma said —

15 Having spoken these words, those four persons, each of whom is gifted with immeasurable energy, viz, the goddess Earth, Kashyapa, Agni, and Bhrigu's son armed with weapons, quickly went away.

Yudhishthira said —

16 If Brahmanas observing the vow of celibacy in this world eat, begging the same the offerings one makes during funeral rites, I ask, can the Shraddha be considered well performed if the performer actually makes over those offerings to such Brahmanas.

Bhishma said —

17. If, having practised the vow of Brahmacharyya for the prescribed period (of twelve years) and acquired proficiency in the Vedas and their branches, a Brahmana himself asks for the offerings made in Shraddhas and eats the same, he is considered to fall away from his vow. The Shraddha, however, is not considered as sullied in any way.

Yudhishthira said:—

18. The wise hold that duty or virtue has many ends and numerous doors. Tell me, O grandfather, what, however, are the decisions in this matter.

Bhishma said —

19. Abstention from injury to others' truthfulness, the absence of anger, mercy, self control, and sincerity or candour, O king, are the marks of virtue.

20. There are persons who wander over the Earth, lauding virtue but without practising what they preach and engaged all the while in sin, O king.

21—22. He who gives such persons gold or gems or kine or horses has to sink in hell and there live for ten years, on the fæces of such persons as live upon the flesh of dead kine and buffalos of men called Pukkasas, of others who live in the outskirts of cities and villages, and of men who give out under the influence of anger and folly, the acts and omissions of others.

23 Those foolish men who do not give a Brahmana observant of the vow of Brahmacharyya the offerings made in Shraddhas (unto one's deceased ancestors), have to proceed, O king, into regions of great misery.

Yudhishthira said :—

24. Tell me, O grand father, what is superior to Brahmacharyya? What is the highest mark of virtue? What is the highest kind of purity?

Bhishma said :—

25. I tell you, O son, that abstention from honey and meat is even superior to Brahmacharyya Virtue lies within boundaries. The best mark of virtue is Renunciation.

Yudhishthira said :—

26 In what time should one practise virtue? In what time should wealth be sought? In what time should pleasure be enjoyed? O grandfather, do tell me this.

Bhishma said :—

27 One should acquire riches the first part of his life Then should one acquire virtue, and then enjoy pleasure. One should not, however, be addicted to any of these.

28 One should respect the Brahmanas, worship his preceptor and seniors, show mercy to all creatures, be of mild disposition and sweet speech.

29 To utter untruth in a court of justice to behave deceitfully towards the king, to act falsely towards preceptors and elders, are considered as equivalent to Brahmanicide.

30. *One should never do an act of vio*lence to the king's body. Nor should one ever strike a cow. Both these offences are equal to the sin of fœticide.

31. One should never quit his (homa) fire. One should also renounce the study of the Vedas. One should never attack a Brahmana by words or deeds. All these offences are equal to Brahmanicide.

Yudhishthira said :—

32. What kind of Brahmanas should be considered as good? Who are those Brahmanas by making presents to whom one may win great merit? What kind of Brahmanas are they whom one should feed? Tell me all this, O grandfather.

Bhishma said :—

33 Those Brahmanas who are freed from anger, who are devoted to acts of virtue, who are firm in truth, and who practise self-control, are considered as good. By making gifts to them one acquires great merit.

34 One acquires great merit by making presents to such Brahmanas as are free from pride, capable of bearing everything, firm in the pursuit of their objects, gifted with mastery over their senses, devoted to the behoof of all creatures, and disposed to be friendly towards all.

35 One acquires great merit by making gifts to such Brahmanas as are free from avarice, as are pure of heart and conduct, gifted with learning and modesty, truthful in speech, and observant of their own duties as sanctioned in the scriptures.

36 The Rishis have declared that Brahmana to be a deserving object of gifts who studies the four Vedas with all their auxi*liaries and is devoted to the six well-known* duties One acquires great merit by mak*ing gifts to Brahmanas endued with* such qualifications.

37. The man who makes gifts to a worthy Brahmana multiplies his merit a thousand fold. A single pious Brahmana gifted with wisdom and Vedic lore, observant of the duties laid down in the scriptures, and marked out by purity of conduct is capable to rescue a whole family.

38. One should make gifts of kine and horses and riches and food and other kinds of articles to a Brahmana who is gifted with such qualifications. By making such gifts to such persons one acquires great happiness in the next world

39 As I have already told you even one such Brahmana can save the entire family to which the giver belongs What need I say, therefore, O dear son, of the merit of making gifts to many Brahmanas of such qualifications? In making gifts, therefore, one should always select the object to whom the gift is to be made.

40. Hearing of a Brahmana gifted with proper qualifications and respected by all good people, one should invite him even if he lives at a distance and welcoming him when he arrives, one should adore him by all means in his power.

CHAPTER XXIII.

(ANUSHASANIKA PARVA).

Continued.

Yudhishthira said:—

1. I wish you, O grandfather, to tell me what the ordinances about the rites for the deities and the departed manes on occasions of Shraddhas.

Bhishma said —

2 Having purified oneself and then performed the well known auspicious rites, one should carefully perform all acts relating to the Pitris in the afternoon.

3 What is given to men should be given in the midday with love and regard That gift which is made untimely is taken by Rakshasas

4. Gifts of articles that have been leapt over by any one, or been licked or sucked, or are not given peacefully, or have been seen by women who are impure for being in their season do not produce any merit Such gifts are considered as the portions of Rakshasas

5. Gifts of articles that have been announced before many people or from which a part has been eaten by a Shudra, or that have been seen or licked by a dog form portions of Rakshasas

6 Food which is mixed with hair or in which there are worms or which has been spoiled with spittle or saliva or which has been looked at by a dog or into which tear-drops have fallen or which has been trodden upon, should be known as forming the part of Rakshasas.

7. Food that has been eaten by a person incompetent to utter the syllable OM, or that has been eaten by a person bearing arms, O Bharata, or that has been eaten by a wicked person, should be known as due to Rakshasas.

8. The food that is eaten by a person from which a part has already been eaten by another, or which is eaten without a part thereof having been offered to gods and guests and children, is appropriated by Rakshasas Such impure food, if offered to the deities and Pitris is never accepted by them but is appropriated by Rakshasas.

9 The food that is offered by the three twice-born classes in Shraddhas in which Mantras are either not uttered or uttered incorrectly and in which the ordinances laid down in the scriptures are not duly performed, if given to guests and other people, is appropriated by Rakshasas.

10 The food that is given to guests without having been previously dedicated to the deities or the Pitris with the help of libations on the sacred fire, or which has been sullied on account of a part thereof having been eaten by a person who is wicked or of irreligious conduct, should be known as being due to Rakshasas.

11 I have described to you the dues of the Rakshasas Listen now to me as I put down the rules for determining the Brahmana who is worthy of gifts.

12 All Brahmanas that have been outcasted, as also Brahmanas who are idiots and insane, do not deserve to be invited to Shraddhas in which offerings are made to either the deities or the departed manes.

13 That Brahmana who is afflicted with leucoderma, or he who is shorn of generative power, or he who has got leprosy, or he who has got phthisis, or he who suffers from epilepsy, or he who is blind, should not, O king, be invited.

14 Those Brahmanas who practise as physicians, those who get regular pay for adoring the images of gods established by the rich, or live upon the service of the gods, those who observe vows from pride or other false motives, and those who sell Soma wine, do not deserve to be invited.

15 Those Brahmanas who are, by profession, vocalists, or dancers or players or instrumental musicians, or reciters of sacred books, or warriors, and athletes, should not, O king, be invited

16 Those Brahmanas who pour libations on the sacred fire for Shudras, or who are preceptors of Shudras, or who are servant of Shudra masters, should not be invited.

17. That Brahmana who is paid for his services as a preceptor, or who attends as a pupil upon the lectures of some preceptor for an allowance paid to him, does not deserve to be invited, for both of them are considered as sellers of Vedic learning.

18 That Brahmana who has been once induced to accept the gift of food in a Shraddha at the very beginning, as also he who has married a Shudra wife, even if gifted with every sort of knowledge, should not be invited.

19 Those Brahmanas who have no domestic fire, and they who attend upon corpses, they who are thieves, and they who have otherwise degraded themselves, do not O king, deserve to be invited.

20. Those Brahmanas whose antecedents are not known or are vile, and they who are Paunarbhava putras, should not, O king, be invited on occasions of Shraddhas.

21. That Brahmana who gives loans of money, or he who lives upon the interest of the loans given by him, or he who lives by the sale of living creatures, should not, O king, be invited

22. Persons who are henpecked or they who live by becoming the paramours of unchaste women, or they who do not perform their morning and evening prayers, should not, O king, be invited to Shraddhas.

23 Listen now to me as I say who the Brahmana is who has been ordained for acts done in honor of the gods and the departed manes. Indeed, I shall tell you what those merits are on account of which one may become a giver or a recipient of gifts in Shraddhas.

24. Those Brahmanas who perform the rites and ceremonies laid down in the scriptures, or they who are possessed of merit, or they who know well the Gayatri, or they who perform the ordinary duties of Brahmanas, even if they happen to take to agriculture for a living, are capable, O king, of being invited to Shraddhas.

25. If a Brahmana happens to be well-born, he should be invited to Shraddhas notwithstanding his taking up arms for fighting the battles of others. That Brahmana, however, O son, who happens to drive a trade for a living should be discarded.

26. That Brahmana who pours libations every day on the sacred fire, or who lives in a fixed habitation, who is not a thief and who performs the duties of hospitality to guests arrived at his house, should, O king, be invited to Shraddhas.

27. That Brahmana, O chief of Bharata's race, who recites the Savitri morning, noon, and night, or who lives upon charity begging as much as is necessary, who is observant of the rites and ceremonies laid down in the scriptures for persons of his order, should, O king, be invited to Shraddhas.

28. That Brahmana who having acquired riches in the morning becomes poor in the afternoon, or who poor in the morning becomes rich in the evening, or who is shorn of malice, or is stained by a minor fault, should, O king, be invited to Shraddhas.

29. That Brahmana who is shorn of pride or sin, who is not given to dry disputation, or who lives upon alms got in his rounds of mendicancy from house to house, should, O king, be invited to sacrifices.

30. One who does not observe vows, or who is given to untruth, who is a thief, or who lives by the sale of living creatures or by trade in general, should be invited to Shraddhas, O king, if he happen to subsequently drink Soma in a sacrifice,

31. That man who having acquired riches by foul or cruel means subsequently spends it in worshipping the gods and performing the duties of hospitality, becomes worthy, O king, of being invited to Shraddhas.

32. The riches that one has acquired by the sale of Vedic learning, or which has been acquired by a woman, or which has been gained by meanness, should never be given to Brahmanas or spent in making offerings to the departed manes.

33. That Brahmana O chief of Bharata's race, who upon the completion of a Shraddha that is performed with his help, refuses to utter the words yukta, commits the sin of swearing falsely in a suit for land.

34. The time for celebrating the Shraddha, O Yudhishthira, is that when one gets a good Brahmana and curds and clarified butter and the sacred day of the new moon and the meat of wild animals such as deer and others.

35. Upon the termination of a Shraddha performed by a Brahmana the word Swadha should be uttered. If performed by a Kshatriya the words that should be uttered are—Let your departed manes be pleased.

36—38. Upon the completion of a Shraddha performed by a Vaishya, O Bharata, the words that should be uttered are,—Let everything become endless!—

Likewise upon the completion of a Shraddha performed by a Shudra, the word that should be uttered is Swasti.—As regards a Brahmana the Punyahami declaration should be accompanied with the utterance of the syllable Om. In the case of a Kshatriya such declaration should be without the utterance of the syllable Om. In the acts performed by a Vaishya the words, instead of the syllable Om should be—Let the gods be pleased. Listen now to me as I tell you the rites that should be performed, one after another, as given in the ordinances.

39 All the rites consequent upon birth, O Bharata, are necessary in the case of all the three castes. All these rites, O Yudhishthira, in the case of both Brahmanas and Kshatriyas as also in that of Vaishyas are to be performed with the help of Mantras.

40 The girdle of Brahmana should be made of Munja grass. That of a Kshatriya should be a bowstring. The Vaishya's girdle should be made of the Valwaja grass. This has been laid down in the scriptures.

41 Listen now to me as I explain to you what forms the merits and demerits of both givers and recipients of gifts.

42 A Brahmana violates his duty by uttering an untruth. Such an act on his part is sinful. A Kshatriya perpetrates four fold and a Vaishya eight-fold the sin that a Brahmana incurs by uttering an untruth.

43 A Brahmana should not eat elsewhere, having been previously invited by a Brahmana. By eating at the house of the person by whom he has been invited afterwards, he becomes inferior and even incurs the sin of the slaughter of an animal on occasions other than those of sacrifices.

44 So also, if he eats elsewhere after having been invited by a Kshatriya or a Vaishya, he falls away from his position and incurs half the sin of the slaughter of an animal on occasions other than those of sacrifices.

45 That Brahmana, O king, who eats on occasions of such acts as are performed in honor of the gods or the departed manes by Brahmanas and Kshatriyas and Vaishyas without having performed his ablutions, commits the sin of uttering an untruth for a cow.

46 That Brahmana, O king, who eats on occasions of similar acts performed by persons belonging to three higher castes, at a time when he is impure on account of either a birth or a death among his cognates, and knowing that he is impure or through temptation, commits the same sin.

47 He who lives upon riches acquired under false pretences like that of sojourns to sacred places or who begs the giver for riches pretending that he would spend it in religious acts commits, O king, the sin of uttering an untruth.

48 That person, belonging to any of the three higher castes, O Yudhishthira, who at Shraddhas and on other occasions distributes food with the help of Mantras, to such Brahmanas as do not study the Vedas or who do not observe vows or who have not purified their conduct, forsooth, commits sin.

Yudhishthira said —

49 I wish, O grandfather, to know who those persons are by giving to whom the things dedicated to the gods and the departed manes, one may acquire sufficient rewards.

Bhishma said :—

50 Do you, O Yudhishthira, feed those Brahmanas whose wives respectfully wait for the residue of the dishes of their husbands like tillers of the soil waiting respectfully for timely showers of rain.

51 By making gifts to those Brahmanas who are always, of pure conduct, O king, who are liberated by abstaining from all luxuries and even full meals, who are given to the observance of such vows as lead to the emaciation of the body, and who approach givers with the object of getting gifts, one acquires great merit.

52 By making gifts to Brahmanas who considers conduct in the light of food, who considers conduct in the light of wives and children, who considers conduct in the light of strength, who considers conduct in the light of their refuge for crossing this world and acquiring happiness in the next, and who beg for riches only when wealth is absolutely needed, one acquires great merit.

53 By making gifts to those persons, O Yudhishthira, who having lost everything through thieves or oppressors, approach the giver, one gains great merit.

54 By making gifts to such Brahmanas as beg food from the hands of even a poor person of their caste who has just got something from others, one acquires great merit.

55 By making gifts to such Brahmanas as have lost everything in times of universal distress and as have been deprived of their wives on such occasions, and as come to givers with solicitations for alms, one acquires great merit.

56 By making gifts to such Brahmanas as observe vows, and as place themselves voluntarily under painful rules and regulations, according to the Vedic injunctions, and as come to a licit riches for spending it upon the rites necessary to complete their vows and other observances, one acquires great merit.

57 By making gifts to such Brahmanas as live at a great distance from the practices followed by the sinful and the wicked, as are shorn of strength for want of adequate support, and as are very poor in earthly possessions, one acquires great merit.

58. By making gifts to such Brahmanas as have been deprived of all their possessions by powerful men but as are perfectly innocent, and as desire to fill their stomachs with any and every sort of food, one acquires great merit.

59 By making gifts to such Brahmanas as beg on behalf of others performing penances and devoted to them, and as are satisfied with even small gifts, one acquires great merit.

60. You have now, O foremost of Bharata's race, heard what the scriptural declarations are about the acquisition of great merit by the making of gifts Hear from me now of those acts that lead to hell or heaven.

61. They, O Yudhishthira, that speak an untruth on occasions other than those when such untruth is necessary for serving the purpose of the preceptor or for giving the assurance of safety to a person in fear of his life, sink in hell.

62. They who ravish other people's wives, or have sexual intercourse with them, or assist at such sinful acts, sink in hell.

63. They who rob others of their riches or destroy the riches and properties of other people, or trumpet the shortcomings of other people, sink in hell

64 They who spoil tanks used by cattle for satisfying thirst, who injure buildings used for public meetings, who break down bridges and causeways, and who pull down dwelling-houses, have to sink in hell.

65. They who lead astray and cheat helpless women, or girls, or aged dames, or such women as have been frightened, have to sink in hell.

66 They who destroy the means of other people's subsistence, they who root out the habitations of other people, they who rob others of their wives, they who sow dissensions among friends, and they who destroy the hopes of other people, sink in hell.

67. They who trumpet forth the faults of others, they who break down bridges or causeways, they who live by following other people's calling and they who are ungrateful to friends for services received, have to sink in hell

68 They who have no faith in the Vedas and show no respect for them, they who break the vows made by themselves or make others to break them, and they who fall away from their status through sin, sink in hell.

69 They who follow improper conduct they who take exorbitant rates of interest, and they who make unduly large profits on sales, have to sink in hell.

70. They who are given to gambling, they who unhesitatingly perform wicked acts, and they who are given to killing living creatures, have to sink in hell.

71. They who make the masters dismiss the servants that are hoping for rewards or are in the enjoyment of wages or salaries or waiting for returns in respect of valuable services already done, have to sink in hell.

72 They who themselves eat without offering portions thereof to their wives or their sacred fires or their servants or their guests, and they who do not perform the rites laid down in the scriptures for honouring the departed manes and deities, have to sink in hell

73 They who sell the Vedas, they who find fault with the Vedas, and they who reduce the Vedas into writing, have all to sink in hell.

74 They who are out of the limit of the four well-known modes of life, they who follow to practices interdicted by the Shrutis and the scriptures, and they who perform wicked or sinful deeds or who do not belong to their order of birth, have to sink in hell.

75 They who live by selling hair, they who live by selling poisons, and they who live by selling oils, have to sink in hell.

76. They who put impediments in the path of Brahmanas and kine and maidens, O Yudhishthira, have to sink in hell.

77 They who sell weapons, they who forge weapons, they who make arrows, and they who make bows, have to sink in hell.

78 They who obstruct paths and roads with stones and thorns and holes have to sink in hell.

79. They who renounce preceptors and servants and loyal followers without any offence, O foremost of Bharata's race, have to sink in hell.

80. They who set bullocks to work when the animals have not come of age, they who bore the noses of bullocks and other animals for controlling them the better while engaged in work, and they who keep animals always tethered, have to sink in hell.

81. Those kings who do not protect their subjects while forcibly collect from them a sixth share of the produce of their fields, and they who, though able and possessed of resources, abstain from making gifts, have to sink in hell.

82 They who renounce persons gifted with forgiveness, self control and wisdom, or those with whom they have associated for many years when these are no longer of service to them, have to sink in hell.

83 Those men who themselves eat without giving parts of the food to children, aged men and servants, have to sink in hell

84. All these men numbered above have to go to hell Listen now to me, O foremost of Bharata's race, as I tell you who those men are who ascend to heaven.

85 The man who transgresses against a Brahmana by obstructing the adoration of gods, suffer from the loss of all his children and animals.

86 Those men, O Yudhishthira, who perform the duties laid down in the scriptures for them, practising the virtues of charity, self control and truthfulness, go to the celestial region.

87 Those men who having acquired knowledge by making obedient services to their preceptors and performing austere penances are unwilling to accept gifts, succeed in ascending to heaven.

88 Those men who save people from fear and sin and who remove the obstacles lying in the way of what they wish to accomplish and poverty and the sufferings of disease, succeed in ascending to heaven.

89 Those men who are gifted with a forgiving disposition, who are endued with patience, who are ready to perform all righteous rites and who are of pure conduct, succeed in ascending to heaven

90 Those men who abstain from honey and meat, who abstain from sexual intercourse with the wives of other people, and who abstain from wines and spirituous liquors, succeed in ascending to heaven.

91. Those men who help in the establishment of asylums for ascetics, who become founders of families, O Bharata, who open up new countries for purposes of dwelling and implant towns and cities, succeed in ascending to heaven.

92. Those men who distribute cloths and ornaments as also food and drink, and who help in marrying others, succeed in ascending to heaven.

93 Those men who have abstained from all sorts of injury or harm to all creatures, who can endure everything, and who have made themselves the refuge of all creatures succeed in ascending to heaven.

94 Those men who wait humbly upon their parents, who have controlled their senses, and who are affectionate towards their brothers, succeed in ascending to heaven.

95 Those men who master their senses though they are rich in worldly possessions, endued with robust constitution and gifted with youthful vigour, succeed in ascending to heaven.

96 Those men who are kind even towards the offenders who are of mild disposition, who have an affection for all who are of mild behaviour, and who contribute to the happiness of others by rendering them every kind of service in humility, succeed in ascending to heaven.

97. Those men who protect thousands of people, who make gifts to thousands of people, and who rescue thousands of people from distress, succeed in ascending to heaven.

98 Those men who make gifts of gold and of kine, O foremost of Bharata's race, as also of conveyances and animals, succeed in ascending to heaven

99 Those men who give away such articles as are necessary in marriages, as also servants and maids and cloths and robes succeed in ascending to heaven

100. Those men who make public pleasure-houses, gardens, wells resting-houses, and buildings for public meetings, and tanks for enabling cattle and men to satisfy their thirst, and fields for cultivation, O Bharata, succeed in ascending to heaven.

101. Those men who give houses and fields and populated villages to persons that want them, succeed in ascending to heaven

102 Those men who having themselves manufactured drinks of sweet taste and seeds and paddy or rice, give them to others, succeed in ascending to heaven

103 Those men who having been born in families high or low beget hundreds of children and live long lives, practising mercy and keeping anger under complete control, succeed in ascending to heaven.

104. I have thus explained to you, O Bharata, what the rites are in honor of the deities and the departed manes which are performed by people for the sake of the other world, what the ordinances are about making gifts, and what the views are of the Rishis of former times about both the articles of gift and the manner of giving them.

CHAPTER XXIV.

(ANUSHASANIKA PARVA).—Continued.

Yudhishthira said:—

1. O descendant of Bharata's race, you should answer this question of mine truly and in detail What are those circumstances under which a person may become guilty of Brahmanicide without actually killing a Brahmana.

Bhishma said:—

2 Formerly, O king, I had one day requested Vyasa to explain to me this very subject I shall now describe to you what Vyasa told me on that occasion. Do you listen to it with rapt attention.

3 Going to Vyasa, I addressed him saying,—You, O great ascetic, are the fourth in descent from Vasishtha! Do you explain to me this What are those circumstances under which one becomes guilty of Brahmanicide without actually killing a Brahmana?

4 Thus addressed by me, the own-begotten son of Parashara, O king, an adept in the science of morality, gave me the following answer at once excellent and fraught with certainty.

5 You should know that man as guilty of Brahmanicide who having of his own accord invited a Brahmana of pious conduct to his house for giving him alms then refuses to give anything on the pretence of there being nothing in the house.

6 You should O Bharata, know that man as guilty of Brahmanicide who destroys the means of living of a Brahmana well read in the Vedas, and all their branches, and who is shorn of attachments to worldly creatures and goods.

7. You should, O king, know that man to be guilty of Brahmanicide who puts impediments in the way of thirsty kine while engaged in satisfying that thirst.

8 You should take that man as guilty of Brahmanicide who, without studying them, finds fault with the Shrutis that have come down from preceptor to pupil for ages and ages together, or with those scriptures that have been composed by the Rishis

9 You should know that man as guilty of Brahmanicide who does not confer upon a suitable bridegroom his daughter endued with beauty and other excellent qualities.

10 You should know that foolish and sinful wight ought to be guilty of Brahmanicide who pains the Brahmanas to the very core of their hearts.

11. You should know that man to be guilty of Brahmanicide who robs the blind, the lame, and idiots.

12 You should know that man to be guilty of Brahmanicide who sets fire to the hermitages of ascetics or to forests or to a village or a town.

CHAPTER XXV.

(ANUSHASANIKA PARVA).—Continued.

Yudhishthira said:—

1. It has been said that sojourns to sacred waters is full of merit, that ablutions in such waters is meritorious, and that listening to the excellence of such waters is also meritorious. I wish to hear you expatiate on this subject, O grandfather

2 You should, O chief of Bharata's race, mention to me the sacred waters existing on this Earth. I wish, O you of great power, to hear you describe to me this subject.

Bhishma said:—

2. O you of great splendour, Angiras thus enumerated the sacred waters on the Earth. Blessed be you, you should listen to it, for you will then acquire great merit.

4—5 Once on a time approaching the great and learned Rishi Angiras gifted with tranquility of soul, while he was living in a forest, Gautama of rigid vows questioned him, saying,—O illustrious one, I have some doubts regarding the merits of sacred waters and shrines I wish to hear you describe that subject Do you, therefore, O ascetic, describe it to me.

6 What merits are acquired by a person regarding the next world, by bathing in the sacred waters on the Earth, O you of great wisdom? Do you explain to me this truly and according to the ordinance.

Angiras said :—

7. A person by bathing for seven days successively in the Chandrabhaga or the Vitasta whose waters are always seen to dance in waves, fasting all the while, is sure to become purged of all his sins and endued with the merit of an ascetic.

8. There are many rivers in the country called Kashmira. All these fall into the great river called Sindhu (Indus). By bathing in these rivers one is sure to become gifted with good character and to ascend to heaven after leaving this world.

9. By bathing in Pushkara, Prabhasa, and Naimisha, and the ocean, and Devika, and Indramarga, and Swarnavindu, one is sure to ascend where, seated on a celestial car, one is sure be filled with joy on being worshipped by the Apsaras.

10 By bathing in the waters of Hiranyavindu with a concentrated mind and respecting that sacred river, and bathing next at Kusheshaya and Devanta, one becomes purged of all one's sins

11. Going to Indratoya near the Mountains of Gandhamadana and next to Karatoya in the country called Kuranga, one should fast for three days and then bathe in those sacred waters with a concentrated heart and pure body. By doing this, one is sure to acquire the merit of a Horse-sacrifice.

12 Bathing in Gangadwara and Kushavarta and Vilwaka in the Blue mountains, as also in Kanakhala, one is sure to become purged of all one's sins and then ascend to heaven.

13 If one becomes a Brahmachārin and control his anger, devotes one self to truth and practises mercy towards all creatures, and then bathes in the Lake of Waters one is sure to acquire the merit of a Horse-sacrifice.

14 That part where Bhagirathi Ganga flows northwards is known as the union of heaven, Earth, and the nether regions Fasting for one month and bathing in that sacred Tirtha which is acceptable to Maheshwara, one can see the deities

15 One who gives oblations of water to his departed manes at Saptaganga and Triganga and Indramarga, obtains ambrosia for food if one has still to go through re-birth.

16 The man who in a pure state of body and mind performs his daily Agnihotra and fasts for one month and then bathes in Mahashrama, is sure to acquire success in one month.

17 By bathing, after a fast of three days and purifying the mind of all evil propensities, in the large lake situate in Bhrigutunga, one becomes purged of even the sin of Brahminicide.

18 By bathing in Kanyakupa and performing one's ablutions in Valaka, one wins great fame among even the celestials and shines in glory.

19 Bathing in Devika and the lake known by the name of Sundarika as also in the Tirtha called Ashwini, one acquires, in next life, great personal beauty.

20. By fasting for a fortnight and bathing in Mahaganga and Krittikangaraka, one becomes purged of all his sins and ascends to heaven.

21. Bathing in Vaimanika and Kinkinika, one acquires the power of going everywhere at will and becomes an object of great respect in the celestial region of the Apsaras.

22 If a person, controlling his anger, and observing the vow of Brahmacharyya for three days, bathes in the river Vipasa at the hermitage called Kalika, he is sure to get over re-birth.

23 Bathing in the asylum that is sacred to the Krittikas and offering oblations of water to the departed manes, and then pleasing Mahadeva, one becomes pure in body and mind and ascends to heaven.

24 If one, fasting for three days with a purified body and mind, bathes in Mahapura one becomes freed from the fear of all mobile and immobile animals as also of all two footed animals.

25 By bathing in the Devadaru forest and offering oblations of water to the departed manes and living there for seven nights with a pure body and mind, one acquires the region of the celestials on departing from this world

26 Bathing in the waterfalls at Sharastamva and Kushastamva and Dronasarmapada, one is sure to acquire the region of the Apsaras where one is dutifully served by those super-human beings

27 If one, fasting bathes at Chitrakuta and Janasthana and the waters of Mandakini, one is sure to be gifted with regal prosperity.

28 By going to the retreat of Shyama and living there for a fortnight and bathing in the sacred water that lies there, one acquires the power of disappearing at will

29 Going to the tirtha Kaushiki and living there with a pure heart and abstaining from all food and drink for three days, one acquires the power of living in the happy region of the Gandharvas

30 Bathing in the charming tirtha Gandhataraka and living there for one month, abstaining all the while from food and drink, one acquires the power of disappearing at pleasure and, then in twenty-one days of ascending to heaven,

31—32. He who bathes in the lake Matanga is sure to acquire success in one night. He who bathes in Analamva or the eternal, Andhaka, or in Naimisha, or the tirtha called Swarga, and offers oblations of water to the departed manes, controlling his senses all the while, acquires the merit of a human sacrifice.

33. Bathing in Gangahrada and the tirtha Utplavana and daily offering oblations of water there for a full month to the departed manes, one acquires the merit of a Horse-sacrifice.

34 Bathing in the confluence of the Ganga and the Yamuna as also at the tirtha in the Kalanjara mountains and offering every day oblations of water to the departed manes for a full month, one acquires the merit of ten Horse-sacrifices.

35—36 Bathing in the Shashihi lake one acquires merit much greater than what appertains to the gift of food. Ten thousand tirthas and thirty millions of other tirthas come to Prayaga, O chief of Bharata's race, in the month of Magha He who bathes in Prayaga, with a controlled mind and observing rigid vows all the while, the month of Magha, becomes purged of all his sins, O chief of Bharata's race, and attains to heaven.

37. Bathing in the tirtha that is sacred to the Maruts, as also in that which is situate in the retreat of the departed manes, in and also in that which is known by the name of Vaivaswata, one becomes purged of all one's sins and as pure and sanctified as a tirtha.

38 Going to Brahmasaras as to the Bhagirathi and bathing there and offering oblations to the departed manes every day for a full month, abstaining from food all the while, one is sure to go to the region of Soma.

39 Bathing in Utpataka and then in Ashtavakra and offering oblations of water to the departed manes every day for twelve days successively, abstaining all the while from food, one acquires the merits of a Horse-sacrifice.

40. Bathing in Ashmaprishtha and Niravinda mountains and Kraunchapadi, —all three in Gaya— one becomes purged of the sin of Brahmanicide. A bath in the first place purifies one of a single Brahmanicide, a bath in the second cleanses one of two similar offences, and a bath in the third cleanses one of three such offences.

41. Bathing in Kalavinga, one gets a large quantity of water. A man, by bathing in the city of Agni, acquires such merit as entitles him to live at his next birth in the city of Agni's daughter.

42 Bathing in Vishala in Karavirapura and offering oblations of waters to his departed manes and performing his ablutions in Devahrada too, one becomes at one with Brahma and shines in glory as such.

43 Bathing in Punaravarta-Nanda as also Mahananda, a man of controlled senses and universal mercy goes to the celestial garden of Nandana and served there by the various tribes of Apsaras.

44 Bathing with concentrated soul in the tirtha of Urvashi which is situate in the river Lohitya, on the day of full moon of the month of Kartika, one acquires the merits of Pundarika sacrifice.

45. Bathing in Ramahrada and offering oblations of water to the departed manes in the river Vipasha (Beas), and fasting for twelve days, one becomes purged of all sins

46 Bathing in the tirtha called Mahahrada with a purified heart and after fasting for one month, one is sure to acquire the status of the sage Jamadagni.

47 By exposing oneself to heat in the tirtha called Vindhya, a person given to truth and endued with compassion for all creatures should then practise austere penances, actuated by humility. By so doing, he is sure to acquire ascetic success in course of a single month

48 Bathing in the Narmada as also the tirtha named Surparaka, fasting for a full fortnight, one is sure to become in one's next birth a prince of royal blood

49 If one proceeds with controlled senses and a concentrated soul to the tirtha known as Jambumarga, one is sure to acquire success in the course of a single day and night.

50. By going to Chandalikashrama and bathing in the tirtha called Kokamukha, having lived for sometime on potherbs alone, and worn rags for raiments one is sure to get ten beautiful maidens as his wives.

51. One who lives by the side of the tirtha known by the name of Kanyashrada has never to visit the regions of Yama Such a person is sure to ascend to the regions of happiness belonging to the celestials.

52 One who bathes with controlled senses on the day of the new moon in the tirtha known by the name of Prabhasa, is sure, O you of mighty arms, of acquiring success and immortality simultaneously.

53. Bathing in the tirtha known by the name of Ujjanaka which is situate in the retreat of Arshtisena's son, and next in the tirtha which is situate in the retreat of Punya, one is sure to be purged of all his sins

54 Fasting for three days and bathing in the tirtha known as Kulya and reciting the sacred Mantras of Aghamarshana, one acquires the merit of a Horse-sacrifice.

55 Fasting for one night and bathing in Pindaraka, one becomes purified on the next day and acquires the merit of an Agnishtoma sacrifice.

56 One who goes to Brahmasara which is adorned by the woods called Dharmaranya one becomes purged of all one's sins and acquires the merit of the Pundarika sacrifice

57 Bathing in the waters of the Mainaka mountain and reciting morning and evening prayers there and living at the spot for a month controlling desire, one acquires the merit of all the sacrifices,

58 Starting for Kalodaka and Nandikunda and Uttara manasa, and reaching a spot that is a hundred Yojanas remote from any of them, one becomes purged of the sin of fœticide

59 One who succeeds in seeing the image of Nandishwara, becomes purged of all sins Bathing in the tirtha called Swargamarga one is sure to proceed to the regions of Brahman

60 The celebrated Himavat is sacred That king of mountains is the father in law of Shankara He is a mine of all jewels and gems and is the resort of the Siddhas and Charanas.

61—62 That twice born person who is a master of the Vedas and who, considering this life to be exceedingly unstable, renounces his body on those mountains, abstaining from all food and drink according to the rites laid down in the scriptures, after having worshipped the gods and bent his head in worship of the ascetics, is sure to acquire success and proceed to the eternal regions of Brahman.

63 There is nothing which one cannot get who lives in a tirtha, restraining lust and controlling anger on account of such residence.

64 For the purpose of going to all the tirthas in the world one should mentally think of those amongst them which are almost inaccessible or sojourns to which are attended with great difficulties.

65 Sojourns to tirthas yields the merits of sacrifices. They are competent to purify everybody of sin. Fraught with great good, they are capable of leading to heaven. The subject is truly a great mystery The very gods should bathe in tirthas. To them also they are sin-purifying.

66 This discourse on tirthas should be delivered to Brahmanas, and to such honest or pious persons as are bent upon gaining what is for their own behoof It should also be recited in the hearing of one's well-wishers and friends and of one's obedient and devoted disciples.

67. Angiras endued with great ascetic merit, had delivered this discourse to Gautama Angiras himself had got it from the the highly intelligent Kashyapa.

68 The great Rishis consider this discourse as deserving of constant repetition. It is the foremost of all purifying things If one recites it regularly every day, he is sure to become purged of every sin and after this life to proceed to heaven.

69 One who listens to this discourse recited in his hearing,—this discourse, viz., of Angiras, which is regarded as a mystery—is sure to attain in one's next life to birth in a good family and, what is more one would have the memory of the pristine existence.

CHAPTER XXVI.

(ANUSHASANIKA PARVA).

Continued.

Vaishampayana said:—

1—2 Equal to Vrihaspati in intelligence and Brahman himself in forgiveness, resembling Shakra in prowess and the Sun in energy, Bhishma the son of Ganga, of infinite might had been defeated in battle by Arjuna Accompanied by his brothers and many other people king Yudhishthira asked him these questions

3 The old hero was lying on a bed coveted by heroes, in expectation of that sacred moment when he could take leave of his body Many great Rishis had come there for seeing that foremost one of Bharata's race

4—6 Amongst them were Atri Vashishtha Bhrigu, Pulastya Pulaha, and Kratu There were also Angiras Gotama, Agastya, Sumati of well-restrained soul, Vishwamitra, Sthulashiras Samvarta, Pramati and Dama. There were also Vrihaspati Ushanas, Vyasa Chyavana, Kashyapa, Dhruva, Durvasas, Jamadagni, Markandeya Galava Bharadwaja, Raibhya Yavakrita and Trita.

7. There were Sthulaksha, Shavalaksha, Kanwa Medhatithi Krisha Narada, Parvata, Sudhanwan, Ekata and Dwita.

8 There were also Nitambhu, Bhuvana, Dhaumya, Shatananda, Akritavrana, Rama the son of Jamadagni and Kacha.

9—10 All these great Rishis came there for seeing Bhishma lying on his bed of arrows. Yudhishthira with his brothers duly adored those great Rishis who had come there one after another in proper order Receiving that adoration, those foremost of Rishis sat themselves down and began to converse with one another.

11 Their conversation related to Bhishma, and was highly sweet and agreeable Hearing that talk of theirs about himself, Bhishma became filled with joy and considered himself to be already in heaven

12. Having obtained their leave of Bhishma and of the Pandava princes, those Rishis then disappeared before the very sight of all the beholders

13 The Pandavas bowed again and again and offered their adorations to those highly blessed Rishis even after they had made themselves invisible

14. They then cheerfully waited upon the son of Ganga even as Brahmanas versed in Mantras wait with respect upon the rising Sun.

15. The Pandavas saw that the points of the compass shining on account of the energy of their penances, and became filled with wonder at the spectacle.

16 Thinking of the high blessedness and power of those Rishis, the Pandava princes began to discourse on the subject with their grandfather Bhishma.

Vaishampayana said —

17 After that conversation was over, the pious Yudhishthira, the son of Pandu, touched Bhishma's feet with his head and then resumed his questions about morality and virtue.

Yudhishthira said :—

18 Which countries, which provinces, which hermitages, which mountains and which rivers, O grandfather, are the foremost in sanctity.

Bhishma said :—

19 Regarding it is cited the old conversation between a Brahmana in the observance of the Shila and the Uncha vows O Yudhishthira, and a Rishi crowned with ascetic merits.

20—21. Once on a time, a foremost person, having travelled over this entire Earth adorned with mountains, arrived at last in the house of a foremost person living like a householder in accordance with the Shila vow. The latter welcomed his guest with due rites. Received with such hospitality, the happy Rishi passed the night happily in the house of his host.

22 The next morning the Brahmana in the observance of the Shila vow, having finished all his morning acts and rites and purified himself duly, gladly approached his guest crowned with ascetic success.

23 Meeting with each other and seated at their ease, the two began to take on agreeable subjects of the Vedas and the Upanishads

24 Towards the conclusion of the discourse, the Brahmana in the observance of the Shila vow respectfully addressed the Rishi crowned with success Gifted with intelligence, he put this very question which you, O Yudhishthira have put to me.

The poor Brahmana said :—

25 What are those countries, what are those provinces, what those hermitages, what those mountains, and what those rivers, that should be considered as the foremost in sanctity? Do you describe this to me.

The Rishi said :—

26 Those countries, those provinces, those retreats and those mountains, should be considered as the foremost in sanctity through which or by the side of which that foremost of all rivers, viz, Bhagirathi, flows.

27 The end which a creature can attain by penances, by Brahmacharya, by sacrifices or by practising Renunciation, one is sure to attain by only living by the side of the Bhagirathi and bathing in its sacred waters.

28 Those creatures whose bodies have been sprinkled with the sacred waters of Bhagirathi or whose bones have been laid in that sacred stream, have not to fall away from heaven at any time

29 Those men, O learned Brahmana, who use the waters of Bhagirathi in all their acts surely go to heaven after death.

30. Even those men who, having committed various sinful deeds in the first part of their lives, live in after years by the side of Ganga, succeed in attaining to a very superior end.

31. Hundreds of sacrifices cannot yield that merit which men of controlled souls are capable of acquiring by bathing in the sacred waters of Ganga.

32. A person is respected and adored in the celestial region for as long a period as his bones lie in the channel of Ganga

33 Even as the Sun, when he rises at the dawn of day, shines, having removed the darkness of night, likewise the person who has bathed in the waters of Ganga is seen to shine, purged of all his sins

34 The countries and the points of the compass which are destitute of the sacred waters of Ganga are like nights without the moon or trees without flowers.

35 Indeed, a world without Ganga is like the different castes and modes of life when they are shorn of virtue or like sacrifices without Soma.

36 Forsooth, countries and points of the compass which are without Ganga are like the sky without the Sun, or the Earth without mountains, or the etherial region without air.

37. All the creatures in the three worlds if served with the sacred waters of Ganga, derive a pleasure the like of which they cannot derive from any other source.

38 He who drinks Ganga water which has been heated by the Sun's rays, derives merit much greater than that which belongs to the vow of living upon the wheat or grains of other corn picked up from cow-dung.

39 It cannot be said whether, he who performs a thousand Chandrayana rites for purifying his body and he who drinks the water of Ganga, are equal

40 It cannot be said whether one who stands for a thousand years on one foot and one who lives for only a month by the side of Ganga are equal.

41. One who lives permanently by the side of Ganga is superior in merit to one who lives for ten thousand cycles with head hanging downwards.

42. As cotton, when it comes into contact with fire, is burnt off without a residue, so the sins of the person that has bathed in Ganga become perfectly consumed

43 There is no end superior to Ganga for those creatures who, with hearts afflicted by sorrow, seek to attain to ends which may remove that sorrow of theirs.

44 As snakes become shorn of their poison as soon as they see Garuda, so one becomes purged of all his sins as soon as he sees the sacred river Ganga.

45 They who do not enjoy fame for virtue and they who are addicted to deeds of sinfulness, have Ganga for their fame, their protection, their means of safety, their refuge or cover.

46. Many wretched men who commit various sins of a heinous nature, when they are about to sink into hell, are rescued by Ganga in the next world.

47. They, O foremost of intelligent men, who plunge every day in the sacred waters of Ganga, become the equals of great Munis and the very deities headed by Indra.

48 Those wretched men who are destitute of humility or modesty of behaviour and who are greatly sinful, become righteous and good, O Brahmana, by living by the side of Ganga.

49 As ambrosia is to the deities, as Swadha is to the Pitris, as Sudha is to the Nagas, so is Ganga-water to human beings.

50. As children stricken with hunger, solicit their mothers for food, similarly do people desirous of their highest good seek Ganga.

51. As the region of the self-created Brahman is said to be the foremost of all places, so is Ganga said to be foremost of all rivers for those who desire to bathe.

52 As the Earth and the cow are said to be the chief sustenance of the celestials so is Ganga the chief sustenance of all living creatures

53 As the celestials support themselves upon the ambrosia that is in the Sun and the Moon and that is offered in various sacrifices, so do human beings support themselves upon Ganga-water.

54 One besmeared with the sand taken from the shores of Ganga considers oneself as an inhabitant of heaven, adorned with celestial unguents.

55. He who bears on his head the mud taken from the banks of Ganga looks effulgent like the Sun himself bent on removing the surrounding darkness

56 When the wind which is moistened with the particles of Ganga-water touches one's body, it cleanses him immediately of every sin.

57 A person afflicted by calamities and about to sink under their pressures, finds all his calamities removed by the joy which originates in his heart on seeing that sacred river.

58 By the sweet notes of the swans and Kokas and other aquatic fowl that play on her breast, Ganga challenges, the very Gandharvas and by her high banks the very mountains on the Earth.

59 Seeing her surface teeming with swans and various other aquatic fowl, and having banks adorned with pasture lands with kine grazing on them, the celestial region herself loses her pride

60 The high happiness which one enjoys by living on the banks of Ganga, can never be his who is living even in the celestial region.

61. I have no doubt in this that the person who is afflicted with sins perpetrated in words and thought and act, becomes cleansed on seeing Ganga

62 By seeing that sacred river, touching it, and bathing in its waters, one rescues his ancestors to the seventh degree, and his descendants to the seventh degree, as also other ancestors and descendants

63 By hearing of Ganga, by wishing to go to that river, by drinking its waters, by touching those waters, and by bathing in them, a person rescues both his paternal and maternal families

64 By seeing, touching, and drinking the waters of Ganga, or by praising them, hundreds and thousands of sinful men become purged of all their sins

65 They who wish to make their birth, life, and learning, successful, should go to Ganga and please the departed manes and the celestials by offering them oblations of water.

66 The merit that one acquires by bathing in Ganga is such that the like of it is incapable of being acquired through the acquisition of sons or riches or the performance of meritorious acts.

67. Those who although physically able do not seek to see the sacred Ganga are, forsooth, comparable to persons suffering from congenital blindness or those who are dead or those who are benumbed through palsy or lameness.

68 What man is there who would not respect this sacred river that is adored by great Rishis knowing the Present, the Past, and the Future, as also by the very gods headed by Indra?

69 What man is there who would not seek the protection of Ganga whose protection is sought by hermits and householders, by Yatis and Brahmacharins alike?

70 The virtuous man with controlled mind, thinks of Ganga at the time when his vital airs are about to leave his body, succeeds in acquiring the highest end

71. That man who lives by the side of Ganga up to the time of his death, worshipping her reverentially, becomes freed from all fear of sin and of kings.

72. When that highly sacred river dropped from the sky, Maheshwara held it on his head It is that very river which is worshipped in heaven.

73 The three regions, are beautiful by the three courses of this sacred river The man who uses the waters of that river becomes certainly successful.

74 As the solar ray is to the gods in the celestial region, as the moon is to the departed manes as the king is to human beings, so is Ganga to all rivers

75 One who becomes bereaved of mother or father or sons or wives or riches does not feel that grief which one feels when he becomes bereaved of Ganga

76 One does not get that joy through acts that lead to the region of Brahman, or through such sacrifices and rites that lead to Heaven, or through children or riches, which one get from seeing Ganga

77 The pleasure that men derive from seeing Ganga is tantamount to what they derive from seeing the full moon.

78 That man becomes dear to Ganga who worship her with deep devotion, with mind wholly fixed upon her, with a respect that refuses to take in any other object within its sphere with a feeling that there is nothing else in the universe worthy of similar adoration and with a steadiness that knows no decrease.

79 Creatures who live on Earth in the sky or in the celestial region —indeed, even beings who are very superior —should always bathe in Ganga Indeed this is the foremost of all duties of the righteous

80 The fame of Ganga for sanctity has spread over the entire universe, since she carried all the sons of Sagara, who had been reduced to ashes, from here to the celestial region.

81. Men who are washed by the bright, beautiful, high, and rapidly moving waves, raised by the wind, of Ganga, become purged of all their sins and resemble in splendour the Sun with his thousand rays.

82 Those men of tranquil souls who have renounced their bodies in the waters of Ganga whose sanctity is as great as that of the butter and other liquids poured in sacrifices and which are capable of giving merits equal to those of the greatest of sacrifices, have certainly attained to a station equal to that of the very gods

83 Indeed, Ganga, having fame and vast extent and at one with the entire universe and respected by the deities headed by Indra, the Munis, and human beings is competent to grant the fruition of all their wishes to them who are blind, to them who are idiots, and to them who are destitute of all things.

84. They who seek refuge with Ganga, that protectress of all the universe, that flows in three currents, that is filled with water at once highly sacred and sweet as honey and productive of every sort of good, have succeeded in acquiring the beatitude of Heaven.

85 That mortal who live by the side of Ganga and sees her every day, becomes purified by her sight and touch To him the gods give every sort of happiness here and a high end hereafter.

86 Ganga is regarded as competent to rescue every creature from sin and lead him to the happiness of Heaven. She is held to be at one with Prishni the mother of Vishnu She is identical with the Word or Speech She is very remote and can not be easily attained She is the embodiment of auspiciousness, and prosperity. She is capable granting the six well known attributes beginning with lordship or power She is always bent upon showing her grace She is the displayer of all things in the universe, and she is the great resort of all creatures. Those who seek her protection in this life have surely acquired heaven.

87 The fame of Ganga has spread all over the sky and Heaven, and Earth, and all the points cardinal and subsidiary, of the compass By using the waters of that foremost of rivers mortal creatures always become crowned with high success

88. That person who, himself seeing Ganga, points her out to others finds that Ganga rescues him from re birth and confers liberation on him Ganga held Guha, the commander-in chief of the celestial army in her womb She bears the most precious of all metals, viz, gold, also in that womb of hers They who bathe in her waters every day in the morning, succeed in obtaining the three-fold objects viz, Virtue and Worldy Profit and Pleasure. Those waters are, again equal in point of sanctity to the butter that is poured with Mantras on the sacrifical fire Capable of purging one from every sin, she has descended from the celestial region and her current is held in high regard by every one.

89 Ganga is the daughter of Himavat, the wife of Hara, and the ornament of both Heaven and Earth She is the bestower of everything auspicious and is competent to give the six well-known attributes beginning with lordship or power Indeed, O king, Ganga is the one object of great sanctity in the three worlds and confers merit upon all

90 Truly, O king, Ganga is Virtue in liquefied form She is energy in a liquid form over the Earth. She is gifted with the splendour or power that belongs to the butter that is poured with Mantras on the sacrifical fire She is always adorned with large waves as also with Brahmanas who may at all times be seen making their ablutions in her waters Falling from Heaven, she was held by Shiva on his head The very mother of the heavens, she has originated from the highest mountain for running over the plains and conferring the most valuable benefits on all creatures of the Earth.

91. She is the highest cause of all things, she is perfectly pure She is as subtile as Brahma She is the best bed for the dying She takes creatures speedily to the celestial region She carries a large volume of water She confers great fame on all She is the protectress of the universe. She is at one with every form She is very much coveted by persons crowned with success Indeed, Ganga is the path to that celestial region of those who have bathed in her water

92. The Brahmanas consider Ganga as being equal to the Earth in forgiveness, and in the protection and upholding of those who live by her, further as equalling Fire and the Sun in energy and splendour, and, lastly, as always equalling Guha himself in the matter of showing favours to the true-born class.

93 Those men who, in this life, even in their minds seek that sacred river which is lauded by the Rishis, which has come out of the feet of Vishnu, which is very ancient and which is highly sacred, succeed in going to the regions of Brahman.

94 Fully convinced that children and other belongings, as also regions possessed of every kind of happiness, are transitory or frail, men of subdued souls, who are desirous of acquiring that everlasting station which is at one with Brahma, always pay their adorations to Ganga with that respect and love which are due from a son to a mother.

95 The man of purified soul who is desirous of acquiring success should seek the protection of Ganga who is like a cow that gives ambrosia instead of ordinary milk, who is prosperity's self, who is endued with omniscience, who exists for all creatures, who is the source of all sorts of food, who is the mother of all mountains, who is the refuge of all pious persons, who is immeasurable in power and energy, and who charms the heart of Brahman himself.

96 Having, with austere penances, pleased all the gods with the Supreme Lord (Vishnu) Bhagiratha brought Ganga down on the Earth Going to her, men always succeed in freeing themselves from every sort of fear both here and hereafter.

97 Observing with the help of intelligence I have mentioned to you only a small portion of the merits of Ganga My power, however, is inadequate to speak of all the merits of the sacred river, or, indeed, to measure her power and sanctity

98 One may, displaying his best powers, count the stones of the mountain Meru or measure the waters of the ocean. But one cannot count all the merits of the waters of Ganga

99 Hence, having listened to these particular merits of Ganga which I have uttered with great devotion, one should, in thought, word, and deed, respect them with faith and devotion.

100. On account of your having listened to those merits which I have recounted, you are sure to fill all the three regions with fame and acquire a measure of success that is very large and that is difficult of being won by any other person Indeed, you will, soon after that, sport in joy in many a region of great happiness created by Ganga herself for those that respect her.

101. Ganga always extends her favour to those who are devoted to her in humbleness of heart She unites those who are so devoted to her with every kind of happiness I pray that the highly-blessed Ganga may always inspire your heart and mine with the attributes of virtue.

Bhishma said :—

102 The learned ascetic gifted with high soul and great splendour, and crowned with success, having in this manner described to that poor Brahmana observing the Shila vow, on the subject of the infinite merits of Ganga, then ascended the sky.

103. The poor Brahmana observing the Shila vow, awakened by the words of that ascetic crowned with success, duly sought refuge with Ganga and acquired great success.

104 Do thou also, O son of Kunti, seek Ganga with great devotion, for you will then, as the reward thereof, acquire great and excellent success.

Vaishampayana said :—

105 Hearing this discourse from Bhishma of the praise of Ganga, Yudhishthira with his brothers became filled with great joy.

106 That person who recites or hears recited this sacred topic of the praise of Ganga, becomes purged of every sin.

CHAPTER XXVII.

(ANUSHASANIKA PARVA).—

Continued.

Yudhishthira said :—

1 You, O grandfather, are endued with wisdom and knowledge of the scriptures, with conduct and behaviour, with various kinds of excellent attributes, and also with years.

2. You are superior to others in intelligence, wisdom and penances I shall, therefore, O you the foremost of all righteous men, wish to ask you questions about virtue.

3-4 There is not another man, O king, in all the worlds, who is worthier of being accosted on such topics. O best of kings, how may one, if he happens to be a Kshatriya or a Vaishya or a Shudra, succeed in acquiring the dignity of a Brahmana? You should tell me the means. Is it by the most austere penances or by religious acts, or by knowledge of the scriptures, that a person belonging to any of the three inferior castes succeeds in acquiring the dignity of a Brahmana? Do tell me this, O grandfather.

Bhishma said —

5 The dignity of a Brahmana, O Yudhishthira, cannot be acquired by a person belonging to any of the three other castes That dignity is the highest with respect to all creatures

6 Passing through numberless orders of existence by undergoing repeated births, one at last, in some birth, becomes born as a Brahmana.

7 Regarding it is cited an old history, O Yudhishthira, of a conversation between Matanga and a she-ass.

8 Once on a time a Brahmana obtained a son who, though procerated by a person belonging to a different caste, had, however, the rites of infancy and youth performed according to the ordinances laid down for Brahmanas. The child passed by the name of Matanga and was endued with every accomplishment.

9 His father, wishing to celebrate a sacrifice, ordered him, O destroyer of enemies, to collect the articles required for the act Having received the command of his father, he started for the purpose, riding on a quick-coursing car, drawn by an ass.

10 It so happened that the ass yoked to that car was very young Instead, therefore of being reined, the animal bore away the car near its dam, viz the she-ass that had brought it forth. Matanga, dissatisfied with this, began to strike the animal with his goad on its nose.

11 Seeing those marks of violence on her child's nose, the she-ass, full of affection for him said,—Do not grieve, O child, for this treatment! A Chandala is driving you

12. There is no harshness in a Brahmana The Brahmana is said to be the friend of all creatures He is the teacher also of all creatures and their ruler. Can he punish any creature so cruelly.

13 This fellow, however, is of sinful deeds. He has no mercy to show to even such a young creature. He is simply proving the order of his birth by behaving thus. The nature which he has derived from his father forbids the growth of the sentiments of pity and kindness which are natural to the Brahmana.

14. Hearing these harsh words of the she-ass, Matanga speedily came down from the car and addressing the she ass, said,—Tell me, O blessed dame, by what fault is my mother stained?

15. How do you know that I am a Chandala? Do you answer me forthwith.

16 How indeed, do you know that I am a Chandala? How have I lost the dignity of a Brahman? O you of great wisdom tell me all this fully, from beginning to end.

The she-ass said :—

17 You were begotten upon a Brahmana woman worked up with desire, by a Shudra following the calling of a barber. You are, therefore, a Chandala by birth. You have not the dignity of a Brahmana.

Bhishma said :—

18—19 Thus addressed by the she ass Matanga returned home. Seeing him return, his father said,—I had engaged you in the difficult task of gathering the requisites of my intended sacrifice! Why have you returned without having accomplished your charge? Is it that you are not all right?

Matanga said :—

20 How can he who belongs to no definite order of birth, or to low caste be regarded as all right and happy? How, O father, can that person be happy whose mother is impure.

21. O father, this she-ass who seems to be more than a human being, tells me that I have been begotten upon a Brahman woman by a Shudra. I shall, for this reason, practise the severest penances.

22 Having said these words to his father, and firmly resolved upon what he had said, he went to the great forest and began to practise the austerest of penances.

23 Beginning those penances for the purpose of happily acquiring the dignity of a Brahmana, Matanga began to scorch the very gods by the severity of his asceticism

24 The king of the celestials, viz, Indra, appeared to him thus practising penances and said,—Why, O Matanga, do you pass your time in such grief, abstaining from all sorts of human enjoyments

25 I shall give you boons Do you name the boons Do not delay, but tell me what is in your mind Even if it be unattainable, I shall yet bestow it on you.

Matanga said:—

26 Desirous of acquiring the dignity of a Brahmana I have begun to practise these penances. After having obtained it, I shall go home. Even this is the boon I pray for.

Bhishma said :—

27. Hearing these words of his, Purandara said to him —The dignity of a Brahmana, O Matanga, which you wish to acquire, cannot be won by you.

28. It is true, you wish to acquire it, but then it cannot be won by persons of impure souls O you of foolish understanding, you are sure to meet with destruction if you persist in this pursuit. Desist, therefore, from this vain attempt forthwith.

29. This object of your desire, viz, the dignity of a Brahmana, which is the foremost of everything, cannot be even acquired by penances. Therefore, by coveting that foremost dignity, you will surely meet with destruction.

30. One born as a Chandala can never acquire that dignity which is considered as the most sacred among the celestials and Asuras and human beings.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

(ANUSHASANIKA PARVA)—Continued.

Bhishma said :—

1. Thus addressed by Indra, Matanga of restrained vows and well-controlled soul, stood for a century of years on one foot, O you of unfading glory,

2. Highly illustrious Shakra once more appeared before him and addressing him, said,—The dignity of a Brahmana, O child, is unattainable. Although you covet it, it is impossible for you to obtain it.

3. O Matanga, by coveting that very great dignity you are sure to meet with destruction. Do not, O son, betray such rashness. This is not a righteous path for you to follow.

4. O you of foolish understanding, it is impossible for you to obtain it in this world, Verily, by coveting that which is unattainable, you are sure to meet with destruction forthwith.

5. I am repeatedly forbidding you. By trying, however, to attain that high dignity by the help of your penances, despite my repeated admonitions, you are sure to meet with destruction.

8. Passing a period of one thousand years in that order, one is next born as a Shudra. In the Shudra order, again, one has to wander for a long time.

9 After thirty thousand years one is born as a Vaishya There, in that order, one has to pass a very long time.

10. After a time that is sixty times longer than what has been stated as the period of Shudra birth, one becomes a Kshatriya In the Kshatriya order one has to pass a very long time.

11. After a time that is measured by multiplying the period last referred to by sixty, one is born as a fallen Brahmana. In this order one has to wander for a long period.

12. After a time measured by multiplying the period last named by two hundred, one is born in the race of such a Brahmana as lives by the profession of arms There, in that order, one has to wander for a long period.

13 After a time measured by multiplying the period last named by three hundred, one is born in the race of a Brahmana that is given to the recitation of the Gayatri and other sacred Mantras.

14. There, in that order, one has to wander for a long period. After a time measured by multiplying the period last named by four hundred, one is born in the race of such a Brahmana who knows the entire Vedas and the scriptures. There, in that order, one has to wander for a very long period.

15. While wandering in that existence, joy and grief, desire and hatred, vanity and evil speech, seek to enter into him and make a wretch of him.

16 If he succeeds in subjugating those foes, he then acquires a high end If, on the other hand, those enemies succeed in subjugating him, he falls down from that high position like a person falling down on the ground from the high top of a palmyra tree.

17. Knowing this for certain, O Matanga, that I say to you, do you name some other boon, for the status of a Brahmana is incapable of being acquired by you.

CHAPTER XXIX.

(ANUSHASANIKA PARVA)—Continued.

Bhishma said:—

1. Thus addressed by Indra, Matanga refused to hear what he was commanded. On the other hand, with regulated vows and purified soul, he practised austerer penances by standing on one foot for a thousand years, being deeply engaged in Yoga meditation.

2 After a thousand years had passed away, Shakra once more came to see him Indeed, the destroyer of Vala and Vritra said to him the same words.

Matanga said:—

3 I have passed these thousand years, standing on one foot, with soul engaged in meditation, and in the observance of the vow of celibacy. Why is it that I have not yet succeeded in acquiring the dignity of a Brahmana?

Shakra said:—

4—5 One born as a Chandala cannot, by any means, acquire the dignity of a Brahmana Do you, therefore, name some other boon so that all this labour of yours may not prove futile! Thus addressed by the king of the celestials Matanga became filled with grief He went to Gaya and passed there a century of years, standing all the while on one foot.

6 On account of the observance of such Yoga which was extremely difficult to bear, he became very much emaciated and his arteries and veins became swollen and visible. He was reduced to only skin and bones We have heard that that righteous person, while practising those austerities at Gaya, dropped down on the ground from sheer exhaustion

7. Seeing him falling down, the lord and giver of boons engaged in the behoof of all creatures viz., Vasava speedily came to that spot and held him fast

Shakra said —

8 It seems O Matanga, that the dignity of a Brahmana which you seek is ill suited to you That dignity is incapable of being acquired by you Indeed, in your case, it is beset with many dangers

9 A person by adoring a Brahmana acquires happiness, while, by abstaining from such worship, he gets grief and misery The Brahmana is as regards all creatures, the giver of what they prize or covet and the protector of what they already have.

10. It is through the Brahmanas that the departed manes and the deities become pleased The Brahmana, O Matanga, is said to be the foremost of all created Beings. The Brahmana grants all objects which are desired and in the way they are desired.

11. Passing through numberless orders of Being and undergoing repeated re-births, one succeeds in some subsequent birth in acquiring the dignity of a Brahmana.

12 That dignity is really incapable of being obtained by persons of impure souls Do you, therefore, relinquish the idea Do you name some other boon. The particular boon which you seek is incapable of being granted to you.

Matanga said:—

13 Stricken as I am with grief, why, O Shakra, do you afflict me further? You are striking one that is already dead, by this conduct I do not pity you who having acquired the dignity of a Brahmana fail to retain it.

14 If, O you of a hundred sacrifices, the dignity of a Brahmana be really unattainable by any of the three other castes, alas men do not adhere to it who have succeeded in acquiring that high status?

15 Those who having won the dignity of a Brahmana that, like wealth, is so difficult to acquire, do not seek to keep it up, must be considered as the most wretched in this world Indeed, they are the most sinful of all creatures

16 Forsooth, the dignity of a Brahmana is highly difficult to attain, and being attained, is difficult to maintain It is capable of removing every sort of grief Alas, having got it, men do not always seek to keep it up.

17 When even such persons are considered as Brahmanas why is it that I, who am pleased with my own self, who am superior to all pairs of opposites who am dissociated from all worldly objects who am observant of the duty of mercy towards all creatures and of self-control of conduct, should not be considered worthy of that dignity?

18 How unfortunate I am, O Purandara, that through the sin of my mother I have been reduced to this plight, although I am not unrighteous in my conduct?

19 Forsooth Destiny is incapable of being warded off or conquered by individual exertion, since, O lord, I am unable to acquire, despite these persistent attempts of mine, the object for the acquisition of which I am trying 20 When such is the case, O righteous one, you should grant me some other boon if indeed, I have become worthy of your favour or if I have a little of merit!

Bhishma said —

21. The destroyer of Vala and Vritra then said to him,—Do you name the boon! Thus urged by the great Indra, Matanga said the following words —

Matanga said —

22. Gifted with the power of assuming any form at will, let me be able to journey through the skies and let me enjoy whatever pleasures I may wish for And let me also have the willing worship of both Brahmanas and Kshatriyas

23 I bow to you by bending my head, O god! You should do that also by which my fame, O Purandra, may live eternally in the world!

Shakra said —

24. You will be celebrated as the deity of a particular measure of verse and you will get the worship of all women Your fame, O son, shall become peerless in the three worlds

25 Having granted him these boons, Vasava disappeared there and then Matanga also, renouncing his life-breaths, acquired a high place

26 You may thus see, O Bharata, that the dignity of a Brahmana is very high That dignity is incapable of being acquired here as said by the great Indra himself.

CHAPTER XXX.

(ANUSHASANIKA PARVA) — Continued.

Yudhishthira said —

1. I have heard this great description, O perpetuator of Kuru's race You, O foremost of eloquent men have said that the dignity of a Brahmana is greatly difficult of acquisition.

2 It is heard however, that in former times the dignity of a Brahmana had been acquired by Vishwamitra You, however, O best of men, tell us that that dignity is incapable of being won

3. I have also heard that formerly king Vitahavya had succeeded in acquiring the dignity of a Brahmana O powerful one, I wish to hear, O son of Ganga, the story of king Vitahavya's promotion.

4 By what acts did that best of kings succeed in acquiring the dignity of a Brahmana? Was it through some boon or was it through the virtue of penances? You should tell me everything.

Bhishma said —

5 Hear, O king, how the highly illustrious royal sage Vitahavya succeeded formerly in acquiring the dignity of a Brahmana that is so difficult to attain and that is held in such high esteem by all the world.

6 While the great Manu in days yore was employed in ruling righteously his subjects, he obtained a son of righteous soul who become celebrated under the name of Sharyati

7 In Sharyati's family, O monarch, two kings were born, viz, Haihaya and Talajangha Both of them were sons of Vatsa, O foremost of victorious kings

8 Haihaya, O monarch, had ten wives. Upon them he begat, O Bharata, hundred sons all of whom were heroes who never returned from the battle field.

9 All of them resembled one another in features and prowess All of them were gifted with great strength and all of them were possessed of great skill in battle. They all studied the Vedas and the science of weapons thoroughly.

10 In Kashi also, O monarch, there was a king who was the grandfather of Divodasa The foremost of victorious men, he passed by the name of Haryyashwa.

11 The sons of king Haihaya, O chief of men, invaded the kingdom of Kashi, and advancing to the country that lies between the rivers Ganga and Yamuna, fought a battle with king Haryyashwa and killed him in it.

12 Having killed king Haryyashwa thus, the sons of Haihaya, those great car-warriors, fearlessly returned to their own charming city in the country of the Vatsas.

13 Meanwhile Haryyashwa's son Sudeva, who looked like a celestial in splendour and who was a second god of virtue, was installed on the throne of Kashi as its king.

14 The delighter of Kashi, the righteous souled prince ruled his kingdom for some time when the hundred sons of Vitahavya once more attacked his territories and defeated him in battle.

15 Having defeated king Sudeva thus, the victors returned to their own city After this, Divodasa, the son of Sudeva, became installed on the throne of Kashi as its king.

16 Understanding the prowess of those great princes, viz, the sons of Vitihavya king Divodasa, gifted with great energy, rebuilt and fotified the city of Baranasi at the command of Indra.

17—18 The territories of Divodasa were full of Brahmanas Kshatriyas, Vaishyas and Shudras And they teemed with all sorts of articles and provisions, and were adorned with prosperous shops and marts Those territories, O best of kings extended northwards from the banks of Ganga to the southern Banks of Gomati and resembled a second Amaravati (the city of Indra)

19 The Haihayas once again, O Bharata attacked that foremost of kings as he ruled his kingdom

20 The powerful king Divodasa gifted with great splendour, issuing out of his capital, gave them battle The engagement between the two parties terrible like the encounter in days of old between the celestials and the Asuras

21 King Divodasa fought the enemy for a thousand days at the end of which having lost a large number of followers and animals, he became greatly distressed.

22 King Divodasa, O king having lost his army and seeing his treasury exhausted, left his capital and fled away.

23 Going to the charming hermitage of the wise Bharadwaja, the king, O chastiser of foes, joining his hands in respect, sought the Rishi's protection

24—25 Seeing king Divodasa before him, the eldest son of Vrihaspati, viz, Bharadwaja of excellent conduct who was the monarch's priest, said to him —What is the reason of your coming here? Tell me everything, O king! I shall do that which is agreeable to you, without any scruple.

The king said —

26 O holy one, the sons of Vitahavya have killed all the children and men of my house I only have escaped with life, totally discomfited by the enemy I seek refuge with you.

27 You should, O holy one, protect me with such affection as you have for a disciple! Those princes of sinful deeds have killed my whole family, leaving myself only alive.

Bhishma said :—

28 Bharadwaja of great energy said to him who pleaded so piteously —Do not fear! Do not fear! O son of Sudeva, let your fears be gone

29 I shall perform a sacrifice, O monarch in order that you may have a son through whom you will be able to smite thousands upon thousands of Vitahavya's party.

30 After this, the Rishi performed a sacrifice with the object of bestowing a son on Divodasa As the result thereof, to Divodasa was born a son named Pratarddana

31. As soon as he was born he grew into a child of full three and ten years and quickly mastered the entire Vedas and the whole science of arms.

32 Helped by his Yoga powers, the highly intelligent Bharadwaja had entered into the prince Indeed, collecting all the energy of the objects of the universe, Bharadwaja caused it to enter the body of prince Pratarddana

33 Casing his person in shining mail and armed with the bow, Pratarddana, his praises lauded by bards and the celestial Rishis, shone resplendent like the Sun

34 Mounted on his car and with the scimitar tied to his belt, he shone like a burning fire With scimitar and shield and whirling his shield, as he went, he proceeded to the presence of his father.

35 Seeing the prince, the son of Sudeva, viz, king Divodasa, become filled with joy. Indeed, the old king thought the sons of his enemy Vitahavya as already killed

36 Divodasa then installed his son Pratarddana as the heir-apparent, and considering himself crowned with success became highly happy.

37 After this the old king commanded that chastiser of foes, viz prince Pradarddana to march against the sons of Vitahavya and kill them in battle

38 Gifted with great prowess, Pratarddana, that subjugator of hostile cities, speedily crossed Ganga on his car and proceeded against the city of the Vitahavyas.

39 Hearing the clatter of the wheels of his car, the sons of Vitahavya, riding on their own cars that looked like fortified citadels and that were capable of destroying hostile vehicles, issued out of their city.

40 Coming out of their capital, those foremost of men, viz the sons of Vitahavya, who were all skilful warriors cased

66 It was thus, O foremost of monarchs, that king Vitahavya, though a Kshatriya by the order of his birth, acquired the dignity of a Brahmana, O chief of Kshatriyas, through the grace of Bhrigu.

67 I have also told you the genealogy of the race that originated from his son Gritsamada What else would you ask?

CHAPTER XXXI.

(ANUSHASANIKA PARVA) — Continued.

Yudhishthira said:—

1. What men, O chief of Bharata's race, are worthy of homage in the three worlds? Tell me this in detail, I am never satiated with hearing you describe these topics.

Bhishma said:—

2. Regarding it is cited the old discourse between Narada and Vasudeva.

3—4 Seeing Narada on one occasion adoring many foremost of Brahmanas with joined hands, Keshava addressed him, saying,—Whom do you worship? Whom amongst these Brahmanas, O holy one, do you worship with so great respect? If it is capable of being heard by me, I wish then to hear it Do, O foremost of righteous men, tell me this.

Narada said —

5. Hear, O Govinda, as to who those are whom I am adoring, O grinder of enemies What other person is there in the world who is worthier than you to hear this?

6 I adore them, O powerful one, who constantly worship Varuna and Vayu and Aditya, and Prajanya and the deity of Fire and Sthanu and Skanda and Lakshmi and Vishnu, and the Brahmanas, and the lord of speech and the Moon, and the Waters, and the Earth, and the goddess Saraswati

8. O foremost of Vrishni's race, I always adore those Brahmanas who are endued with penances, who are conversant with the Vedas, who are always given to Vedic study, and who are possessed of great worth

9 O powerful one, I bow down my head to those persons who are freed from boastfulness who perform with an empty stomach, the rites in honor of the deities, who are always contended with what they have, and who are gifted with forgiveness

10 I adore them, O Yadava, who are performers of sacrifices, who are forgiving in nature, and self-controlled who are masters of their own senses, who worship truth and virtue, and who give away land and kine to good Brahmanas

11 I bow to them, O Yadava, who are devoted to the observance of penances, who live in forests, who live upon fruits and roots who never store anything for the morrow, and who perform all the acts and rites laid down in the scriptures.

12. I bow to them, O Yadava, who feed and cherish their servants who are always hospitable to guests, and who eat only the residue of what is offered to the deities

13 I worship them who have become irresistible by studying the Vedas, who are eloquent in discoursing on the scriptures, who are observant of the vow of Brahmacharyya, and who are always devoted to the duties of officiating at the sacrifices of others and of teaching disciples

14 I adore them that are endued with mercy towards all creatures and who study the Vedas till their backs are heated by the Sun

15 I bow to them, O Yadava, who try to acquire the grace of their preceptors, who labour in the acquisition of their Vedas who are firm in the observance of vows who wait, with dutiful obedience, upon their preceptors and seniors, and who are free from malice and envy.

16 I bow to them, O Yadava, who are observant of excellent vows, who practise silence, who have knowledge of Brahma, who are firm in truth, who are givers of libations of clarified butter and oblations of meat

17. I bow to them, O Yadava, who live upon eleemosynary alms who are emaciated for want of adequate food and drink, who have lived in the houses of their preceptors, who are averse to and destitute of all enjoyments, and who are poor in Earthly possessions

18 I bow to them, O Yadava, who have no affection for things of this Earth, who do not quarrel with others, who do not clothe themselves, who have no wants, who have become irresistible through the acquisition of the Vedas, eloquent in the exposition of virtue, and that are utterers of Brahma

19 I bow to them who are given to the practice of the duty of mercy towards all creatures, who are firm in the observance of truth, who are self controlled, and who are peaceful in their conduct

20 I bow to them, O Yadava, who are devoted to the worship of gods and guests, who are observant of the domestic mode of life, and that follow the practice of pigeons about collecting their food.

21. I always bow to those persons, who while doing all their works have an eye on the three-fold objects of life, and who are observant of truth and righteous behaviour.

22. I bow to them, O Keshava, who are conversant with Brahma, who are gifted with knowledge of the Vedas, who are attentive to the three-fold objects of life, who are free from cupidity, and who are righteous in their behaviour.

23. I bow to them, O Madhava, who live upon water only, or upon air alone, or upon the residue of the food that is offered to deities and guests, and who practise all sorts of excellent vows.

24 I always adore them who have no wives, who have wives and the domestic fire, who are the refuge of the Vedas, and who are the refuge of all creatures in the universe.

25 I always bow to those Rishis, O Krishna, who are the creators of the universe, who are the elders of the universe, who are the eldest members of the race or the family, who are dispellers of the darknes of ignorance, and who are the best of all persons in the universe.

26 For these reasons, do you also, O scion of Vrishni's race, adore every day those twice-born persons of whom I speak Worthy as they are of reverent worship, they will, when adored, confer happiness on you, O sinless one.

27. Those persons of whom I speak are always givers of happiness in this world as well as in the next Respected by all, they move about in this world, and, if adored by you, are sure to grant you happiness.

28. They who are hospitable to all persons who come to them as guests, and who are always devoted to Brahmanas and kine as also to truth, succeed in crossing all calamities and impediments.

29 They who are always devoted to peacefulness of conduct, as also they who are shorn of malice and envy, and they who are always attentive to the study of the Vedas, succeed in crossing all calamities and impediments.

30 They who bow to all the deities, they who follow one Veda as their refuge, they who are possessed of faith and are self controlled, succeed in crossing all calamities and impediments.

31. They who adore the foremost of Brahmanas with reverence and are firm in the observance of excellent vows and practise the virtue of charity, succeed in crossing all calamities and impediments

32 They who are engaged in the practice of penances, they who are always observant of the vow of celibacy, and they whose souls have been purified by penances, succeed in crossing all calamities and impediments.

33 The who are devoted to the worship of the gods and guests and dependants as also of the departed manes, and they who eat the residue of the food that is offered to deities, departed manes, guests and dependants succeed in crossing all calamities and impediments.

34. They who, having lighted the domestic fire, duly keep it burning and adore it with reverence, and they who have duly poured libations in Soma-sacrifices, succeed in crossing all calamities and impediments

35 They who behave properly towards their mothers and fathers and preceptors and other elders even as you, O foremost of the Vrishnis, do behave, (succeed in crossing all calamities and impediments)—Having said these words, the celestial Rishi ceased speaking.

Bhishma continued —

36 For these reasons, do you also, O son of Kunti, always adore with reverence the deities, the departed manes, the Brahmanas, and guests arrived at your palace, and as the outcome of such conduct you are sure to acquire a desirable end!

CHAPTER XXXII.

(ANUSHASANIKA PARVA).—

Continued.

Yudhishthira said:—

1 O grandfather, O you of great wisdom, O you who are conversant with all branches of knowledge, I wish to hear you discourse on topics connected with duty and Virtue.

2 Tell me truly, O chief of Bharata's race, what the merits are of those persons who grant protection to living creatures, of the four castes when these pray for protection.

Bhishma said —

3 O Dharma's son of great wisdom and wide spread fame, listen to this old history regarding the great merit of granting protection to others when protection is humbly sought.

4 Once on a time, a beautiful pigeon, pursued by a hawk, dropped down from the skies and sought the protection of the highly-blessed king Vrishadarbha.

5 The pure-souled, king beholding the pigeon take refuge in his lap from fear, comforted him, saying,—Be comforted, O bird! You have no fear!

6 Whence have you taken such great fright? What and where have you done it in consequence of which you have lost your senses in fear and are more dead than alive?

7 Your color, O beautiful bird resembles that of a fresh-blown blue lotus Your eyes are of the hue of the pomegranate or the Ashoka flower! Do not fear. I command you, be comforted!

8 When you have sought my protection, know that no one will have the courage to even think of catching you, who have such a protector to take care of your body.

9 I shall, for your sake, give up to-day the very kingdom of the Kashis and, if necessary my life too! Be comforted, therefore, do no fear, O pigeon.

The hawk said —

10 This bird has been ordained to be my food You should not, O king, protect him from me! I have pursued this bird and have got him Indeed, with great exertion have I got at him at last.

11. His flesh and blood and marrow and fat will be of great good to me This bird will be the means of pleasing me greatly Do not, O king, place yourself between him and me in this way.

12 I have been possessed by a terrible thirst, and hunger is knawing my bowels Release the bird and cast him off I am unable to bear the pains of hunger any longer.

13 I pursued him as my prey. See, his body is bruised and torn by me with my wings and talons. Look, his breath has become very weak You should not, O king, protect him from me!

14 In the exercise of that power which properly belongs to you you are, indeed, competent to interfere in protecting human beings when sought to be destroyed by human beings But you have no power over a sky ranging bird stricken with thirst.

15 Your power may extend over your enemies, your servants, your relatives the disputes that take place between your subjects. Indeed, it may extend over every part of your dominions and over also your own senses Your power, however, does not extend over the sky.

16 Displaying your prowess over such enemies as act against your wishes, you may establish your rule over them Your rule, however, does not extend over the sky-ranging birds. Indeed, if you have been desirous of acquiring merit (by protecting this pigeon), it is your duty to look at me also!

Bhishma said —

17 Hearing these words of the hawk, the royal sage became stricken with wonder. Without disregarding these words of his, the king, desirous of attending to his comforts, replied to him, saying the following words.

The king said :—

18. Let a bovine bull or boar or deer or bufflao be dressed to day for your sake! Do you satisfy your hunger on such food to day

19 Never to leave one who has sought my protection is my firm vow. See, O bird, this bird does not leave my lap!

The hawk said :—

20—21. I do not, O king, eat the flesh of the boar or the ox or of any of the various kinds of fowl What need have I of food of this or that kind? My business is with that food which has been eternally ordained for beings of my order? Hawks feed on pigeons,—this is the eternal ordinance.

22 O sinless Ushinara, if you feel such affection for this pigeon, do you then give me flesh from your own body, of weight equal to that of this pigeon.

The king said :—

23—25 Great is the favor you show me to day by speaking to me thus Yes, I shall do what you bid —Having said this, that best of kings, began to cut off his own flesh and weigh it in a balance against the pigeon Meanwhile in the inner apartments of the palace, the queen, adorned with jewels and gems hearing what was taking place, uttered exclamations of woe and came out, stricken with grief.

26 On account of those cries of the ladies as also of the ministers and servants, a noise deep as the muttering of the clouds arose in, the palace The sky that had been very clear became covered with thick clouds on all sides

27—28 The Earth began to tremble, as the consequence of that act of truth which the monarch did The king began to cut off the flesh from his sides, from his arms, and from his thighs, and quickly fill one of the scales for weighing it against the pigeon For all that, the pigeon continued to weigh heavier.

29 When at last the king became a skeleton of bones, without any flesh, and covered with blood, he wished to give up his whole body and, therefore, ascended the scale in which he had placed the flesh that he had previously cut off.

30. At that time, the three worlds, headed by Indra, came to that spot for seeing him. Celestial kettle-drums and various other drums were struck and played upon by invisible beings belonging to the sky.

31. King Vrishadarbha was bathed in a shower of nectar that was poured upon him Garlands of celestial flowers, of sweet fragrance and touch, were also showered upon him copiously again and again.

32 The deities and Gandharvas and Apsaras in large bands began to sing and dance around him even as they sing and dance around the Grandfather Brahman

33 The king then ascended a celestial car that excelled a mansion made entirely of gold, that had arches made of gold and gems, and that was adorned with columns made of lapis lazuli.

34. Through the merit of his act, the royal sage Shivi proceeded to eternal Heaven. Do you also, O Yudhishthira, act thus towards those who seek your protection.

35 He who protects those who are devoted to him, those who are attached to him from love and affection, and those who depend upon him, and who has mercy for all creatures succeeds in acquiring great happiness hereafter.

36 That *king who is of righteous con*duct and who is observant of honesty and integrity, succeeds by his acts of sincerity in acquiring every valuable reward.

37. The royal sage Shivi, of pure soul and gifted with great wisdom and unbaffled prowess that king of the Kashis, became celebrated over the three worlds for his virtuous deeds.

38. Anybody who would protect in the same way a seeker for protection, would certainly acquire the same happy end, O best of the Bharatas.

39 He who recites this history of the royal sage Vrishadarbha is sure to become purged of every sin, and the person who hears this history recited by another is sure to acquire the same result.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

(ANUSHASANIKA PARVA)—Continued.

Yudhishthira said.—

1. Which act, O grandfather, is the foremost of all those that have been laid down for a king? What is that act by doing which a king succeeds in enjoying both this world and the next.

Bhishma said.—

2 Even this, viz, the worship of the Brahmanas, is the foremost of all those deeds, O Bharata, which have been laid down for a king duly installed on the throne, if, indeed, he is desirous of acquiring great happiness

3 Even this is what the foremost of all kings should do Know this well, O chief of Bharata's race The king should always adore with reverence all righteous Brahmanas possessed of Vedic learning.

4 The king should, with bows, sweet speeches and gifts of all articles of enjoyment, adore all Brahmanas endued with great learning who may live in his city or provinces.

5 This is the foremost of all acts laid down for the king. Indeed, the king should always keep his eyes fixed on this. He should protect and cherish these even as he protects his own self or his own children.

6 The king should adore with greater reverence those amongst the Brahmanas who may be worthy of it When such men are freed from all anxiety, the whole kingdom shines in beauty.

7 Such individuals are worthy of adoration. The king should bow his head to such individuals Indeed, they should be honored, even as one honors his father and grandfather. The course of conduct followed by men, depends upon them as the existence of all creatures depends upon Vasava.

8 Having prowess incapable of being baffled and gifted with great energy, such men, if enraged are capable of reducing the entire kingdom to ashes by only their will, or by acts of incantation, or by other means.

9 I do not see anything that can destroy them Their power seems to be uncontrolled, being capable of reaching to the last end of the universe When angry, their looks fall upon men and things like a burning flame of fire upon a forest.

10 The most courageous men are struck with fear at their name Their virtues and powers are extraordinary and immeasurable Some amongst them are like wells and pits with mouths covered by grass and creepers, while others resemble the sky shorn of clouds and darkness.

11. Some amongst them are of dreadful dispositions. Some are as mild and soft in disposition as cotton. Some amongst them are very cunning Some amongst them are given to the practice of penances.

12 Some amongst them are employed in agricultural pursuits Some amongst them are engaged in the keep of kine Some amongst them live upon eleemosynary alms Some amongst them are even theives Some amongst them are fond of creating quarrels and disputes Some, again, amongst them are actors and dancers.

13 Some amongst them are competent to perform all feats ordinary and extraordinary The Brahmanas, O chief of Bharata's race, are of various aspects and conduct.

14. One should always sing the praises of the Brahmanas who are conversant with all duties, who are righteous of conduct, who are given to various kinds of acts, and who are seen to derive their sustenance from various callings.

15 The Brahmanas, O king, who are highly blessed, are older in respect of their origin than the departed manes, the deities, human beings, the Snakes, and the Rakshasas

16 These twice born persons are incapable of being defeated by the deities or the departed manes, or the Gandharvas or the Rakshasas or the Asuras or the Pishachas.

17 The Brahmanas are competent to make him a god, that is not a god They can, again, divest one who is a deity of his status as such He becomes a king, whom they wish to make a king He, on the other hand, is crushed whom they do not love or like.

18 I tell you truly, O king, that those foolish persons forsooth, meet with destruction who calumniate the Brahmanas and utter their dispraise.

19 Expert in praise and dispraise, and themselves the origin or cause of other people's fame and ignominy, the Brahmanas, O king, always become angry with those who seek to injure others.

20. That man whom the Brahmanas praise succeeds in becoming prosperous That man who is censured and renounced by the Brahmanas soon meets with discomfiture.

21. It is on account of the absence of Brahmanas from among them that the Shakas, the Yavanas, the Kamvojas and other Kshatriya tribes have become fallen and degraded into Shudras.

22—23 The Dravidas, the Kalingas, the Pulindas, the Ushinaras the Kolisarpas, the Mahishakas, and other Kshatriyas, have, on account of the absence of Brahmanas from among their midst, become degraded into Shudras. Defeat from them is preferable to victory, O foremost of victorious persons.

24 One killing all other living creatures in this world does not commit a sin so heinous as that of killing a single Brahmana The great Rishis have said that Brahmanicide is a heinous sin.

25 One should never utter the dispraise or calumny of the Brahmanas Where the dispraise of Brahmanas is uttered, one should sit with face hanging down or leave that place.

26 That man has not as yet been born in this world or will not take birth here who has been or will be able to pass his life happily after quarreling with the Brahmanas.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

(ANUSHASANA PARVA)—Continued.

Bhishma said:—

1. One should always offer the most respectful adoration to the Brahmanas. They have Soma for their king, and they it is who confer happiness and misery upon others.

2 They, O king should always be cherished and protected as one cherishes and protects his own father and grandfather, and should be adored with bows and gifts of food and ornaments and other articles of enjoyment as also with such things as they may wish for The peace and happiness of the kingdom originate from such respect shown to the Brahmanas even as the peace and happiness of all living creatures come from Vasava the king of the gods.

3 Let Brahmanas of pure conduct and Brahma effulgence be born in a kingdom. Kshatriyas also who are splendid car-warriors and that are capable of defeating all enemies, should be desired

4 This was said to me by Narada. There is nothing higher, O king, than this, viz, the act of making a Brahmana of good birth, having a knowledge of morality and righteousness and steadfast in the observance of excellent vows live in his mansion Such an act yields every sort of blessing.

5 The sacrificial offerings given to Brahmanas reach the very gods who accept them Brahmanas are the fathers of all creatures There is nothing higher than a Brahmana

6 The Sun, the Moon, the Wind, the Water, the Earth, the Sky, and the points of the compass all enter the body of the Brahmana and take what the Brahmana eats.

7 In that house where Brahmanas do not eat, the departed manes refuse to eat

8 The gods also never eat in the house of the wretch who hates the Brahmanas When the Brahmanas are pleased, the departed manes are also pleased.

9 The deities also become pleased when the Brahmanas are pleased There is no doubt in this They who give away the sacrificial Havi to the Brahmanas become themselves pleased

10—11 Such men never meet with destruction Indeed, they succeed in acquiring great ends Those particular offerings in sacrifices with which one pleases the Brahmanas, go to please both the departed manes and the deities The Brahmana is the cause of that Sacrifice whence all created things have originated

12 The Brahmana is acquainted with that from which this universe has originated and to which, when apparently destroyed it returns Indeed, the Brahmana knows the path that leads to the celestial regions and the other path which leads to the [illegible]

13 The Brahmana is conversant with that which has taken place and that which will take place. The Brahmana is the foremost of all two legged beings The Brahmana, O chief of the Bharatas, is fully conversant with those duties which have been laid down for his order.

14 Those persons who follow the Brahmanas are never defeated They never meet with destruction even after death. Indeed, victory is always theirs.

15 Those great persons,—indeed, those persons who have subdued their souls,— who accept the words that fall from the lips of the Brahmanas, are never defeated. Victory always becomes theirs

16 The energy and power of those Kshatriyas who scorch everything with their energy and might, when they encounter the Brahmanas, become neutralised

17 The Bhrigus conquered the Talajanghas The sons of Angiras conquered the Nipas Bharadwaja conquered the Vitahavyas as also the Ailas, O chief of Bharata's race.

18 Although all these Kshatriyas were capable of using various arms, yet the Brahmanas named owning only black deer-skins for their emblems, succeeded in conquering them effectually Bestowing the Earth upon the Brahmanas and illuminating both the worlds by the brilliance of such an act, one should accomplish acts through which one may succeed in acquiring the end of all things

19 Like fire concealed within wood, everything that is said or heard or read in this world, lies in the Brahmana

20 Regarding it is cited the old history of the conversation between Vasudeva and the Earth O chief of Bharata's race.

Vasudeva said —

21 O mother, of all creatures O auspicious goddess I wish to ask you for a solution of this doubt of mine! By what act does a man living like a house holder succeed in clearing all his sins?

The Earth said —

22 One should serve the Brahmanas. This conduct is purifying and excellent. All the impurities are destroyed of that man who serves the Brahmanas with respect

23 From this (conduct) arises prosperity. From this arises fame From this originates intelligence or knowledge of the soul. A Kshatriya, by this conduct, becomes a powerful car-warrior and a destroyer of foes and succeeds in winning great fame.

24 Even this is what Narada said to me, viz, that one should always respect a Brahmana that is well born, of rigid vows, and conversant with the scriptures, if one wishes every kind of prosperity

25 That man really grows in prosperity who is praised by the Brahmanas who are higher than those who are regarded superior to all men high or low.

26 That man who speaks ill of the Brahmanas soon meets with discomfiture, even as a clod of unbaked earth, meets with destruction when thrown into the sea.

27. Similarly, all acts that are hurtful to the Brahmanas are sure to bring about discomfiture and ruin I ook at the dark spots on the Moon and the salt waters of the ocean.

28 The great Indra had at one time been marked all over with a thousand sex marks It was through the power of the Brahmanas that those marks were metamorphosed into as many eyes

29 See, O Madhava how all these things took place Desiring fame and prosperity and various regions of beatitude in the next world, a person of pure conduct and soul should, O destroyer of Madhu, live in obedience to the dictates of the Brahmanas.

Bhishma said :—

30. Hearing those words of the goddess Earth, the destroyer of Madhu, O you of Kuru's race said,—Excellent, Excellent!—and honoured the goddess in due form.

31. Having heard this discourse between the goddess Earth and Madhava do you O son of Pritha, always, with rapt soul adore all superior Brahmanas Doing this, you will surely obtain what is highly beneficial for you.

CHAPTER XXXV.

(ANUSHASANIKA PARVA).—Continued.

Bhishma said :—

1. O blessed king, a Brahmana, by birth alone, becomes an object of worship with all creatures and entitled, as guests, to eat the first portion of all cooked food.

2. From them come all the great objects of life. They are the friends of all creatures in the universe. They are again the mouths of all the gods (for food poured into their mouths is eaten by the deities) Adored with respect, they wish us prosperity by uttering words fraught with auspiciousness

3. Disregarded by our enemies let them be engaged with these, and let them wish evil to those detractors of theirs, imprecating them with severe curses

4. About it, persons conversant with ancient history repeat the following verses sung of old respecting how in ancient times the Creator, after having created the Brahmanas, laid down their duties.

5 A Brahmana should never do anything else than what has been laid down for him. Protected, they should protect others. By acting thus, they are sure to acquire what is for their behoof

6 By doing those acts that are laid down for them they are sure to acquire Brahma prosperity, Ye shall become the exemplars of all creatures, and reins for controlling them.

7 A Brahmana endued with learning should never do that which is laid down for the Shudras By doing such acts, a Brahmana loses his merit.

8 By Vedic study he is sure to acquire prosperity, intelligence energy and power competent to scorch all things, as also glory of the most superior kind.

9 By offering oblations of clarified butter to the deities, the Brahmanas acquire high blessedness, become worthy of taking the precedence of even children in the matter of all kinds of cooked food, and gifted with Brahma prosperity.

10 Endued with faith that is fraught with mercy towards all creatures, and devoted to self control and the study of the Vedas you shall acquire the fruition of all your desires.

11. Whatever things exist in the world of men, whatever things exist in the region of the celestials, can all be achieved and acquired with the help of penances and knowledge and the observance of vows and restraints.

12 I have thus recited to you, O sinless one the verses that were sung by Brahmana himself Gifted with supreme intelligence and wisdom, the Creator himself ordained this, through mercy for the Brahmanas.

13 The power of those amongst them who are devoted to penances is equal to the power of kings They are indeed irresistible fierce fleet like lightning, and exceedingly quick in what they do.

14 There are amongst them those who are possessed of the might of lions and those who are possessed of the might of tigers Some of them are gifted with the might of boars, some of the deer and some of crocodiles.

15 Some there are amongst them whose touch resembles that of snakes of dreadful poison, and some whose bite resembles that of sharks. Some amongst them are capable of bringing about by words only the destruction of those that are opposed to them; and some are competent to destroy by a look only of their eyes.

16 Some amongst them, as already said, are like snakes of dreadful poison, and some that are gifted with very mild dispositions. The dispositions, O Yudhishthira, of the Brahmanas, are of various kinds

17. The Mekalas, the Dravidas, the Lathas, the Paundras, the Knowashiras, the Shaundikas, the Daradas the Darvas, the Chauras, Shavaras, the Varvaras, the Kiratas the Yavanas and numerous other tribes of Kshatriyas, have degenerated into the status of Shudras through the anger of the Brahmanas.

19 On account of their having disregarded the Brahmanas, the Asuras have been obliged to take refuge in the depths of the ocean Through the favour of the Brahmanas, the celestials have become denizens of the happy regions of Heaven.

20 The element of other is incapable of being touched. The Himavat mountains are incapable of being moved from their spot The current of Ganga is incapable of being resisted by a dam The Brahmanas are incapable of being governed.

21. Kshatriyas are incapable of ruling the Earth without securing the good will of the Brahmanas The Brahmanas are great. They are the deities of the very deities.

22. Do you always adore them with gifts and obedient services, if, indeed, you desire to enjoy the sovereignty of the whole Earth encircled by seas.

23 The energy and power of Brahmanas, O sinless one, become abated by the acceptance of gifts You should protect your family, O king, from those Brahmanas who do not desire to accept gifts.

CHAPTER XXXVI.

(ANUSHASANIKA PARVA).—Continued.

Bhishma said:—

1. Regarding it is cited the old history of the discourse between Shakra and Shamvara. Do you listen to it, O Yudhishthira.

2. Once upon a time Shakra, assuming the guise of an ascetic with matted locks on his head and body covered with ashes all over, rode on an ugly car and went to the Asura Shamvara.

Shakra said:—

3. Through what conduct, O Shamvara, you have been able to become the head of your family? Why do all people consider you as superior? Do you tell me this truly and fully.

Shamvara said:—

4 I never entertain any ill feelings towards the Brahmanas. Whatever instructions they give I accept with unqualified reverence. When the Brahmanas are engaged in explaining the scriptures, I listen to them with great happiness.

5 Having heard their interpretations I never disregard them. Nor do I ever offend against the Brahmanas in any way, I always adore intelligent Brahmanas I always seek information from them. I always adore their feet.

6 Approaching me with confidence, they always address me with affection and enquire after my well being If they ever happen to be careless, I am always careful. If they happen to sleep, I always remain awake.

7 Like bees drenching the cells of the comb with honey, the Brahmanas, who are my instructors and rulers, always drench me with the nectar of knowledge—who am always devoted to the path pointed out by the scriptures, who am devoted to the Brahmanas, and who am perfectly shorn of malice or evil passion.

8. I always accept with cheerful hearts whatever they say. Helped by memory and understanding, I am always careful of my own faith in them and I always think of my own inferiority to them.

9. I always lick the nectar that is at the end of their tongue, and it is for this reason that I occupy a position far above that of all others of my family like the Moon transcending all the stars.

10 The scriptural interpretations which fall from the lips of the Brahmanas and listening to which every wise man acts in the world, form nectar on Earth and may, also be likened to most excellent.

11. Seeing the battle between the celestials and the Asuras in days of old, and understanding the power of the instructions that fell from the Brahmanas, my father became filled with delight and wonder.

12 Seeing the power of great Brahmanas, my father asked the Moon the question,—How do the Brahmanas acquire success?

Soma said:—

13 The Brahmanas become crowned with success by virtue of their penances Their strength consists in speech The power of Kshatriyas is in their arms The Brahmanas, however, have words for their weapons.

14. Undergoing the discomforts of a residence in the house of his preceptor, the Brahmana should study the Vedas or at least the Pranava. Freeing himself of anger and renouncing earthly attachments, he should become a Yati, regarding all things and all creatures with equal eyes

15 If remaining in the house of his father he masters all the Vedas and acquiring great knowledge acquires a position that should command respect, people still condemn him as untravelled or home keeping.

16 Like a snake swallowing mice, the Earth swallows up these two, viz, a king that is unwilling to fight and a Brahmana who is reluctant to leave home for acquiring knowledge.

17. Pride destroys the prosperity of persons of little wit. A maiden, if she conceives, becomes stained A Brahmana incurs reproach by remaining at home.

18. This is what my father heard from the revered Soma. My father, on account of this, began to adore and respect the Brahmanas Like him, I also worship and adore all Brahmanas of high vows!

Bhishma said:—

19 Hearing these words that fell from the mouth of that prince of Danavas, Shakra began to adore the Brahmanas, and as a result thereof he succeeded in acquiring the kingship of the celestials.

CHAPTER XXXVII.

(ANUSHASANIKA PARVA).—Continued.

Yudhishthira said:—

1. Which amongst these three persons, O grandfather should be regarded as the best for making gifts, viz, one who is a through stranger, or one who is living with and known to the giver for a long time, or one who comes to the giver, from a long distance?

Bhishma said:—

2 All these are equal The fitness of some consists in their soliciting alms for celebrating sacrifices or for paying the preceptor's fee or for maintaining their wives and children. The fitness of some for receiving gifts, consists in their following the vow of wandering over the Earth, never soliciting anything but receiving when given. We should also give to one what one seeks.

3 We should, however, make gifts without afflicting those who depend upon us This is what we have heard. By afflicting one's dependants, one afflicts his own self.

4 The stranger,—one, that is, who has come for the first time,—should be considered as a proper object of gifts He who is familiar and well-known and has been living with the giver, should also be considered in the same light. The learned know that he too who comes from a distant place should be considered in an equal light.

Yudhishthira said:—

5 It is true that we should make gifts to others without afflicting any one and without going against the ordinances of scriptures One should, however, correctly determine who the person is that should be considered as a proper object for making gifts He should be such that the gift itself, when made over to him, may not grieve.

Bhishma said:—

6 If the Ritwij, the Purohita, the preceptor, the Acharya, the disciple the relative (by marriage), and kinsmen happen to be endued with learning and free from malice, then should they be considered worthy of respect and adoration.

7. Those persons who do not possess such qualifications cannot be considered as worthy of gifts or hospitality. Hence, one should with deliberation examine persons whom one meets.

56706 LIBRARY

8—9 Absence of anger, truthfulness of speech abstention from injury, sincerity, peacefulness of conduct, the absence of pride, modesty, renunciation, self-control, and tranquillity or contentment of soul,—he in whom these are by nature, and in whom there are no wicked acts, should be considered as a proper object. Such a person deserves honors.

10 Whether the person be one who is well known and familiar, or one who has come newly, whether he has or has not been seen before, if he happens to possess these qualifications, he should be considered as worthy of honors and hospitality.

11. He who denies the authority of the Vedas or tries to show that the scriptures should be disregarded, or approves of all breaches of control in society,—simply brings about his own ruin.

12—14 That Brahmana who is proud of his learning, who speaks ill of the Vedas, or who is given to the science of useless disputation, or who is desirous of acquiring victory (in disputations) in assemblies of good men by disproving the reasons that exist for morality and religion and attributing everything to chance, or who indulges in censuring and reproaching others or who reproves Brahmanas, or who is suspicious of all persons or who is foolish and bereft of judgment, or who is bitter of speech, should be known to be as hateful as a dog.

15 As a dog meets others, barking the while and seeking to bite, such a person is even so, for he spends his breath in vain and tries to destroy the authority of all the scriptures.

16 Those practices that support society, the duties of virtue, and all those acts which yield benefit to one's own self, should be attended to. A person that lives, attending to these, becomes prosperous for good.

17-18 By satisfying the debt one owes to the deities by performing sacrifices, that to the Rishis by studying the Vedas, that to the departed manes by procreating children, that to the Brahmanas by making presents to them, and that to guests by feeding them, in due order, and with purity of motive, and properly attending to the ordinances of the scriptures, a householder does not fall away from virtue.

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

(ANUSHASANIKA PARVA).—Continued,

Yudhishthira said —

1. O best of the Bharatas, I wish to hear you describe the disposition of women. Women are said to be the root of all evil. They are all considered as highly frail.

Bhishma said:—

2. Regarding it is cited the old history of the discourse between the celestial Rishi Narada and the (celestial) courtezan Panchachuda

3 Once in ancient times, the celestial Rishi Narada, having roamed over all the world, met the Apsara Panchachuda of faultless beauty, having her residence in the region of Brahman.

4 Seeing the Apsara every limb of whose body was highly beautiful, the ascetic addressed her, saying —O you of slender waist, I have a doubt in my mind. Do you explain it !—

Bhishma said —

5 Thus addressed by the Rishi the Apsara said to him —If the subject is one which is known to me and if you consider me competent to speak on it, I shall certainly say what is in my mind.

Narada said —

6. O amiable one, I shall not certainly ask you for any task that is beyond your power. O you of beautiful face I wish to hear from you of the disposition of women.

Bhishma said:—

7. Hearing these words of the celestial Rishi, that foremost of Apsaras replied to him, saying,—I am unable, being myself a woman, to speak ill of women.

8 You know what women are and with what nature they are gifted You should not, O celestial Rishi, set me to such a task.

9. To her the celestial Rishi said —It is very true, O you of slender waist ! One commits sin by speaking what is untrue. In saying, however, what is true, there can be no sin.

10. Thus addressed by him, the Apsara Panchachuda of sweet smiles consented to answer Narada's question. She then addressed herself to mention what the true and eternal shortcomings are of women.

Panchachuda said —

11 Even if high born and gifted with beauty and possessed of protectors, women wish to transgress the restraints assigned to them This fault truly attaches them, O Narada.

12 There is nothing else that is more sinful than women Verily, women are the root of all evils That is certainly known to you, O Narada.

13 Women, even when having husbands of fame and wealth, of handsome features and completely obedient to them, are prepared to disregard them if they get the opportunity.

14 This, O powerful one, is a sinful disposition with us women, casting off modesty, we seek the companionship of men of sinful habits and intentions

15 Women show a liking for those men who court them, who approach their presence, and who respectfully serve them to even a slight extent.

16. Through want of solicitation by persons of the other sex, or fear of relatives, women, who are naturally impatient of all control, do not transgress those that have been ordained for them, and remain by the side of their husbands.

17. There is none whom they cannot admit to their favours They never consider about the age of the person they are prepared to favour. Ugly or handsome, if only the person happens to belong to the opposite sex, women are ready to enjoy his companionship 18 That women remain faithful to their husbands is due not to their fear of sin, nor to mercy, nor to riches nor to the affection that originates in their hearts for kinsmen and children.

19 Women living in the respectable families envy the condition of those members of ther sex who are young and well-adorned with jewels and gems and that lead a free life.

20 Even those women who are loved by their husbands and treated with great respect, are seen to confer their favours upon men who are hump backed who are blind, who are idiots, or who are dwarfs.

21 Women may be seen to like the companionship of even those men who are inert or those men who are ugly to look at, O great Rishi, there is no man in this world whom women may consider as unfit for companionship

22—23 Through inability to obtain persons of the opposite sex, or fear of relatives, or fear of death and imprisonment, women remain, of themselves, under control

24 They are highly fickle, for they always hanker after new companions On account of their nature being unintelligible, they are incapable of being kept in obedience by loving treatment Their nature is such that they are incapable of being controlled when bent upon transgression Indeed, women are like the words uttered by the wise.

25 Fire is never satiated with fuel Ocean can never be filled with the water that the rivers bring to him The Destroyer is never satiated with killing even all living creatures Likewise, women are never satiated with men

26 This O celestial Rishi, is another mystery about women As soon as they see a man of beautiful and charming features, unfailing signs of desire appear on their body.

27 They never show sufficient regard for even such husbands as satisfy all their wishes, as always do what is agreeable to them, and as protect them from want and danger

28 Women never prize even profuse articles of enjoyment or ornaments or other delightful things, so much as they do the companionship of persons of the opposite sex.

29. The destroyer, the god of wind, death, the nether regions, the equine mouth that roves through the ocean, vomiting ceaseless flames of fire, the sharpness of the razor, dreadful poison, the snake and Fire,—all these exist in a state of union in woman.

30 Indeed from that eternal Brahma whence the five great elements have originated whence the Creator Brahman hath ordained the universe, and whence, indeed, men have sprung, have women sprung into existence At that time, again, O Narada, when women were created, these faults that I have described were planted in them.

CHAPTER XXXIX.

(ANUSHASANA PARVA) —
Continued.

Yudhishthira said —

1. Overcome by the illusion of the divine Being, all men, O king in this world, are seen to attach themselves to women.

2 Likewise, women too, are seen to attach themselves to men All this is seen taking place everywhere in the world. I have a doubt on this subject

3 Why, O delighter of the Kurus, do men still attach themselves to women? Who again, are those men with whom are women highly pleased, and who are they with whom they are displeased;

4 You should, O chief of men, explain to me how men are capable of protecting women?

5 While men take pleasure in women and sport with them, women, it seems, are engaged in imposing upon men Then, again, if a man once falls into their hands, it is difficult for him to escape from them Like kine ever I king pastures new, women like new men one after another.

6 The women have in them the sum total of that illusion which the Asura Shamvara possessed, that illusion which the Asura Namuchi possessed, that illusion which Vali or Kumbhinasi had.

7. 'If man laughs, women laugh. If man weeps, they weep If the opportunity requires they receive the man who is disagreeable to them with sweet words

8 That science of policy which the preceptor of the Asuras knew that science of policy which the preceptor of the celestials viz, Vrihaspati, knew, is not deeper or more subtile than what woman's intelligence. Indeed, how can women, therefore, be restrained by men?

9 They make a lie appear as truth, and a truth appear as a lie They who can do this—I ask, O hero,—how can they be governed by persons of the opposite sex?

10. It appears to me that Vrihaspati and other great thinkers, O destroyer of enemies, evolved the science of Policy from observation of the understandings of women

11. Whether treated by men, with respect or with hatred, women are seen to turn the heads and agitate the hearts of men.

12. Living creatures, O you of mighty arms, are virtuous Even this is what we have heard Treated with love and respect or otherwise, women are seen to deserve censure for their conduct towards men.

13 This great doubt fills my mind, viz, when their conduct is such, what man is there that can restrain them within the limits of virtue? Do you explain this to me, O highly blessed scion of Kuru's race.

14 You should tell me, O chief of Kuru's race, whether women are truly capable of being governed within the limits prescribed by the scriptures or whether any one before our time did really succeeded in so controlling them.

CHAPTER XL.

(ANUSHASANIKA PARVA)—Continued.

Bhishma said:—

1 It is true what you say, O you of mighty arms There is nothing untrue in all this that you say, O you of Kuru's race, on the subject of women, O monarch!

2 About it I shall recite to you the old history of how in days of yore the great Vipula had succeeded in restraining women within the limits laid down for them.

3 I shall also tell you O king, how women were created by the Grandfather Brahman and the object for which they were created by Him.

4. There is no creature more sinful, O son, than woman Woman is a burning fire. She is the illusion, O king, that the Daitya Maya created. She is the sharp edge of the razor. She is poison She is a snake She is fire. She is, verily, all these in a body.

5 We have heard that all human beings are characterised by righteousness and that they, in course of natural progress and improvement, attain to the dignity of god This circumstance alarmed the celestials.

6 They, therefore, O chastiser of foes, assembled together and went to the Grandfather Informing Him of what was in their minds they stood silent before him with downcast eyes

7. Having learnt what was in the hearts of the celestials the powerful Grandfather created women with the help of an Atharvan rite

8 In a former creation, O son of Kunti, women were all virtuous Those, however, that sprang from this creation by Brahman with the help of an illusion, became sinful. The Grandfather bestowed upon them the desire of enjoying all kinds of carnal pleasure.

9 Tempted by the desire of enjoyment, they began to pursue persons of the other sex The powerful lord of the deities created Anger as the companion of Lust.

10. Persons of the male sex, yielding to the power of Lust and Anger, sought the companionship of women. Women have no especial acts laid down for them. This is the ordinance that was laid down.

11—12 The Shruti declares that women are gifted with the most powerful senses that they have no scriptures to follow, and that they are living lies. Beds, seats, ornaments, food and drink and the absence of all that is respectable and righteous, indulgence in disagreeable words, and love of sexual companionship,—these were bestowed by Brahman upon women. Men are quite unable to restrain them within limits

13 The Creator himself is incapable of keeping them within proper limits, what need then be said of men?

14 This, O chief of men, I heard in former days, viz, how Vipula had succeeded in protecting his preceptor's wife in ancient times.

15. There was in days of yore a highly blessed Rishi of the name of Devasharman of great fame He had a wife, of name Ruchi, who was peerless on Earth in beauty.

16 Her loveliness intoxicated every one among the celestials and Gandharvas and Danavas. The chastiser of Paka, viz, Indra the destroyer of Vritra, O king, was in particular enamoured of her and coveted her body.

17. The great ascetic Devasharman fully knew the disposition of women. He, therefore, to the best of his power and energy, protected her.

18 The Rishi knew that Indra had no scruples in seeking the companionship of other people's wives It was, therefore, that he used to protect his wife, putting forth all his power.

19. Once on a time, O son, the Rishi became desirous of celebrating a sacrifice He began to think of how (during his own absence from home) his wife could be protected.

20 Gifted with high ascetic merit he at last hit upon the course he should adopt. Summoning his favourite disciple whose name was Vipula and who was of Bhrigu's family, he said as follows.

Devasharman said.—

21. I shall leave home in order to celebrate a sacrifice The king of the celestials always covets this Ruchi of mine. Do you, during my absence, protect her, displaying all your power.

22 You shall pass your time carefully in view of Purandara. O foremost one of Bhrigu's race, that Indra assumes various forms.

Bhishma said:—

23—24 Thus addressed by his preceptor, the ascetic Vipula, with senses restrained, always engaged in severe penances, possessed of the splendour, O king, of fire or the sun, conversant with all the duties of virtue, and ever truthful in speech, answered him, saying,—So be it!—Once more, however, as his preceptor was about to start, Vipula asked him in these words.

Vipula said:—

25 Tell me, O Muni, what forms does Shakra assume when he comes. Of what kind is his body and what is his energy? You should tell me all this.

Bhishma said:—

26 The illustrious Rishi then truly described to the great Vipula all the illusions of Shakra, O Bharata.

Devasharman said —

27 The powerful chastiser of Paka, O regenerate Rishi, is full of illusion. Every moment he assumes those forms that he chooses.

28. Sometimes he wears a diadem and holds the thunder-bolt. Sometimes, armed with the thunder-bolt and wearing a crown on his head, he adorns himself with earrings. In a moment he changes himself into the shape and aspect of Chandala.

29 Sometimes he appears with coronal locks on his head; soon again, O son, he shows himself with matted locks, his person being clad in rags. Sometimes he assumes a goodly and huge frame. The next moment he changes himself into one of emaciated limbs, and clad in rags.

30 Sometimes he becomes fair, sometimes darkish, sometimes dark, of complexion Sometimes he becomes ugly and sometimes beautiful Sometimes he appears as young and sometimes as old.

31. Sometimes he appears as a Brahmana, sometimes as a Kshatriya, sometimes as a Vaishya, and sometimes as a Shudra Indeed, he of a hundred sacrifices appears at times as a person born of impure caste, that is, as the son of a superior father by an inferior mother or of an inferior father by a superior mother.

32. Sometimes he appears as a parrot sometimes as a crow, sometimes as a swan and sometimes as a coel. He assumes the forms also of a lion, a tiger, or an elephant.

33 Sometimes he appears as a god, sometimes as a Daitya, and sometime he assumes the guise of a king. Sometimes he appears as fat and plump, sometimes as one whose limbs have been broken by the disordered wind in the system, sometimes as a bird, and sometimes as one of an exceedingly ugly form.

34 Sometimes he appears as a quadruped. Capable of assuming any form he sometimes appears as an idiot shorn of all intelligence. He assumes also the forms of flies and gnats.

35. O Vipula, no one can make him out on account of these numberless disguises that he is capable of assuming. The very Creator of the universe is not equal to that feat.

36 He makes himself invisible when he likes. He is incapable of being seen except with the eye of knowledge. The king of the celestials sometimes changes himself into the wind.

37 The chastiser of Paka always assumes these disguises. Do you, therefore, O Vipula protect this slender-waisted wife of mine with great care.

38 O foremost one of Bhrigu's race do you take every care for seeing that the king of the celestials may not defile this wife of mine like a wretched dog licking the Havi kept in view of a sacrifice.

39 Having said these words the highly-blessed ascetic viz, Devasharman, intent upon celebrating a sacrifice started from his abode, O chief of the Bharatas.

40 Hearing these words of his preceptor, Vipula began to think—I shall certainly protect this lady in every respect from the powerful king of the celestials.

41 But what should be the means? What can I do for protecting the wife of my preceptor? The king of the celestials is endued with large powers of illusion. Gifted with great energy, he is difficult of being resisted.

42 Indra cannot be kept out by enclosing this retreat of ours or fencing this yard, since he is capable of assuming numberless [illegible] successfully p[illegible]

[illegible]chination of Indra[illegible]e form of the wind, the

30. Of tranquil [illegible]s may assault the w[illegible]fe of my for his preceptor, V[illegible] best course, therefore, to him and stood bef[illegible]enter the body of this la[illegible]re. heart.

31. After his [illegible]g my prowess I shall not a while and when [illegible]tect the lad[illegible]for t[illegible]e [illegible]een po[illegible] heard by me, is capable of assuming any form he likes.

45 I shall, therefore, protect this one from Indra by my Yoga-power. For satisfying my object I shall with my body enter the body of this lady.

46 If my preceptor on return, sees his wife defiled, he will, forsooth, curse me through anger, for endued with great ascetic merit, he is gifted with spiritual vision.

47 This lady is incapable of being protected in the way in which other women are protected by men since the king of the celestials is gifted with large powers of illusion. Alas, the situation is very critical.

48 The command of my preceptor should certainly be obeyed by me. If, therefore I protect her by my Yoga power, the feat will be considered by all as a wonderful one.

49 By my Yoga power, therefore, I shall enter the body of my preceptor's lady. I shall live within her and yet not touch her body like a drop of water on a lotus leaf which lies on it yet does not drench it at all.

50—51 If I be free from the touch of passion, I cannot incur any sin by doing what I wish to do. As a traveller, in course of his sojourn, takes up his quarters (for a while) in any empty house he finds, I shall, similarly live, this day within the body of my preceptor's lady. Indeed, with mind rapt up in Yoga, I shall live to day in this lady's body.

52—53 Giving his best consideration to these points of virtue, thinking of all the Vedas and their branches, and with eye directed to the penances which his preceptor had and which he himself also was possessed of, and having settled in his mind with a view only to protect the lady, to enter her body by Yoga power, Vipula of Bhrigu's race took great care (for accomplishing his object. Listen now to me, O king as I recite to you what he did.

54 Gifted with great penances Vipula sat himself down by the side of his preceptor's wife as she of faultless features was sitting in her cottage. Vipula then began to discourse to her for bringing her over to the cause of virtue and truth.

55 Directing his eyes then to hers and uniting the rays of light that came out from her organs of vision with those that issued from his Vipula entered the lady's body even as the element of wind enters that of ether or space.

56 Penetrating her eyes with his eyes and her face with his face, Vipula lived, without moving, within her invisibly, like her shadow.

57 Restraining every part of the lady's body, Vipula continued to live within her, intent on protecting her from Indra. The lady herself knew nothing of this.

58 It was in this way, O king, that Vipula continued to protect the lady till the time of his great preceptor's return after accomplishing the sacrifice which he had gone out to perform.

CHAPTER XLI.

(ANUSHASANIKA PARVA).—Continued.

Bhishma said:—

1. One day the king of the celestials assuming a form of divine beauty, came to the hermitage of the Rishi, thinking that the opportunity he had been expecting had at last come

2. Indeed, O king, having assumed a form peerless in beauty and highly tempting to women and highly agreeable to look at, Indra entered the ascetic's asylum.

3 He beheld the body of Vipula staying in a sitting posture, immovable as a stake, and with eyes shorn of vision, like a picture drawn on the canvas.

4. And he beheld also Ruchi, seated there, adorned with eyes whose ends were highly beautiful possessed of full and round hips, and having a deep and swelling bosom. Her eyes were large and expansive like lotus petals and her face was as beautiful and sweet as the full moon.

5 Seeing Indra come in that guise, the lady wished to rise up and welcome him. Her wonder having been excited at the peerless beauty of form which the person possessed, she very much wished to ask him as to who he was.

6. Although, however, she wished to rise up and welcome him yet her limbs having been restrained by Vipula who was living within her, she failed, O king, to do what she wished. In fact she was unable to move from the place where she sat.

7 The king of the celestials then addressed her in sweet words uttered with a sweet voice.

8 Indeed, he said,—O you of sweet smiles know that I am Indra, arrived here for your sake! Know, O sweet lady, that I am afflicted by the god of love provoked by your thoughts O you of beautiful brows, I have come to you. Time passes away.

9 These words that Indra spoke were heard by the ascetic Vipula Remaining within the body of his preceptor's wife, he saw everything that took place.

10 The lady of faultless beauty, though she heard what Indra said, was, however, unable to rise up for welcoming or honoring the king of the celestials Her senses restrained by Vipula, she could make no reply.

11. Judging from the marks afforded by the body of his preceptor's wife that she was not reluctant to receive Indra with kindness, that scion of Bhrigu's race, of mighty energy restrained her limbs and senses all the more effectually, O king, by his Yoga powers.

12—13 With Yoga-fetters he bound up all her senses Seeing her seated without any mark of agitation on her body, the husband of Shachi, abashed a little, once more addressed that lady who was stupified by the Yoga-powers of her husband's disciple, in these words,—Come, come, O sweet lady!—Then the lady tried to answer him Vipula, however, restrained the words that she intended to utter.

14 The words, therefore, that actually dropped from her lips were,—What is the reason of your coming here?—These words adorned with grammatical refinements came out of her mouth that was as beautiful like the moon.

15. Subject to the influence of another, she gave vent to these words, but became rather ashamed for uttering them. Hearing her, Purandara became highly dispirited

16 Observing that awkward result, the king of the celestials, O monarch, having a thousand eyes, saw everything with his spiritual eye.

17 He then saw the ascetic living within the body of the lady Indeed, the ascetic remained within the body of his preceptor's wife like an image or reflection on a mirror.

18 Seeing the ascetic [illegible] Kshatriya sometimes as a terrible power of penance hundred sacrifices king, fearing the Rishi's person born of fear.

19 Vipula then gifted the son of a tic power, left the body prior mother or of wife and returned to his prior mother. lying near. Then he appears as a parrot flew as a crow, sometimes as a swan

Vipula said —

20. O wicked Purandara, O you of sinful mind, O wretch who have no control over your senses, neither the deities nor human beings will worship you for any length of time.

21. Have you forgotten it, O Shakra,—does it not still dwell in your remembrance,—that Gautama had cursed you on account of which your body became disfigured with a thousand sex-marks, which owing to the Rishi's mercy, were afterwards changed into so many eyes.

22 I know that you are of an exceedingly foolish understanding, that your soul is impure and that you are of an exceedingly fickle mind. O fool, know that this lady is being protected by me O sinful wretch, return whence you came.

23 O you of foolish soul, I do not reduce you to day into ashes with my energy Indeed, I am filled with mercy for you. It is for this that I do not, O Vasava, wish to burn you

24 My preceptor gifted with great intelligence, is possessed of terrible power. With eyes blazing with anger, he would, if he saw you, have burnt your sinful self to day.

25. You should not, O Shakra, do its like again. The Brahmanas should be respected by you. See that you do not, with your sons and counsellors, meet with destruction, afflicted by the power of the Brahmanas.

26 You think that you are an immortal and that, therefore, are at liberty to act thus. Do not, however, dishonor the Brahmanas. Know that there is nothing unattainable by penance.

Bhishma said —

27 Hearing these words of the great Vipula, Shakra without saying anything, and covered with shame, disappeared.

28 A moment after he had gone away Devasharman of great ascetic merit, having accomplished the sacrifice he had intended to perform, returned to his own hermitage

29 When his preceptor returned, Vipula, who had done a good deed, gave to him his wife of faultless beauty whom he had successfully protected against the machination of Indra.

30 Of tranquil soul and full of respect for his preceptor, Vipula respectfully saluted him and stood before him with a fearless heart

31 After his preceptor had rested awhile and when he was seated with his wife on the same seat, Vipula told him everything that Shakra had done.

52 Hearing these words of Vipula, that foremost of Munis, gifted with great prowess, became highly pleased with him for his conduct and desposition, his penances, and his observances.

33 Observing Vipula's conduct towards himself—his preceptor—and his devotion also, and marking his steadiness in virtue, the powerful Devasharman exclaimed,—Excellent, excellent.

34. The pious Devasharman receiving his virtuous disciple with a sincere welcome, honored him with a boon.

35 Indeed, Vipula, steady in virtue, obtained from his preceptor the boon that he would never swerve or fall away from virtue. Dismissed by his preceptor he left his house and practised the most severe austerities.

36 Devasharman also, of severe penances, with his wife, began from that day to live in those solitary woods, perfectly fearless of him who had killed Vala and Vritra.

CHAPTER XLII.

(ANUSHASANIKA PARVA) —

Continued.

Bhishma said —

1 Having satisfied his preceptor's command, Vipula practised the most severe penances Gifted with great energy, he at last regarded himself as endued with sufficient ascetic merit.

2 Priding himself upon the feat he had performed, he wandered fearlessly and contentedly over the Earth, O monarch, honored by all as one possessed of great fame for what he had done.

3 The powerful Bhargava thought that he had conquered both the worlds by that feat of his as also by his severe penances

4 After sometime, O delighter of the Kurus, the time came for a ceremony of gifts to take place with respect to the sister of Ruchi Profuse wealth and corn were to be given away in it.

5 Meanwhile, a certain celestial damsel, gifted with great beauty, was passing through the skies.

6 From her body, as she passed through the sky, some flowers dropped down on the Earth Those flowers of celestial fragrance fell on a spot not far from the hermitage of Ruchi's husband

7 As the flowers lay scattered on the ground, they were picked up by Ruchi of beautiful eyes Soon after an invitation came to Ruchi from the country of the Angas.

8 The sister, referred to above, of Ruchi, named Prabhavati, was the wife of Chitraratha the king of the Angas

9 Ruchi, of great beauty, having attached those flowers to her hair, went to the palace of the king of the Angas to answer the invitation she had received

10 Seeing those flowers on her hair, the queen of the Angas, having beautiful eyes, urged her sister to obtain some for her.

11. Ruchi, of beautiful face, speedily informed her husband of that request of her sister. The Rishi accepted the prayer of his sister-in law.

12. Summoning Vipula into his presence, Devasharman of severe penances commanded his disciple to bring him some flowers of the same sort, saying —Go, go

13 Accepting unhesitatingly the order of his preceptor, the great ascetic Vipula O king answered,—So be it!—and then proceeded to that spot whence the lady Ruchi had picked up the flowers that were wanted by her sister.

14 Arrived at that place where the flowers had fallen from the sky, Vipula saw some others still lying scattered They were all as fresh as if they had been newly plucked from the plants None of them had faded away

15 He took up those exquisitely beautiful celestial flowers Possessed of celestial fragrance O Bharata, Vipula got them there as the result of his severe penances

16. The accomplisher of his preceptor's command having obtained them he felt great delight and started quickly for the city of Champa adorned with festoons of Champaka flowers

17 As he went on he saw on his way a human couple moving in a circle hand in hand.

18 One of them made a rapid step and thereby destroyed the cadence of the movement Therefore, O king, a dispute arose between them

19 Indeed one of them charged the other, saying,—You have taken a quicker step!—The other answered —No —Indeed, as each held his own opinion obstinately, each, O king, asserted what the other denied, and denied what the other asserted.

20. While thus quarrelling with each other with great assurance, an oath was then heard among them. Indeed, each of them suddenly named Vipula in what they uttered.

21. Their oath was this —That one amongst us two who speaks falsely, shall, in the next world, meet with the end which will be the twice-born Vipula's.

22—23 Hearing these words of theirs, Vipula's face became very sad. He began to commune with himself,—I have practised severe penances. The dispute between this couple is not To me, again, it is painful. What sin have I committed that both these persons should refer to my end in the next world as the most painful one among those reserved for all creatures?

24 Thinking thus, Vipula, O best of kings, hung down his head, and with a dispirited mind began to recollect what sin he had done.

25—26. Proceeding a little way he saw six other men playing with dice made of gold and silver Engaged in play, those individuals seemed to him to be so excited that the hairs on their bodies stood erect. They also were heard by Vipula to take the same oath that he had already heard the first couple to take Indeed, their words had reference in the same way to Vipula

27 He amongst us who, led by cupidity, will act in an unfair way, shall meet with that end which is reserved for Vipula in the next world.

28 Hearing these words, however, Vipula, although he tried earnestly to recollect, could not remember any sin of his from even his earliest years, O you of Kuru's race

29 Indeed he began to burn like a fire placed in the midst of another fire Hearing that curse, his mind burnt with grief.

30 In this state of anxiety a long time was passed At last he recollected the manner in which he had acted in protecting his preceptor's wife from the machinations of Indra

31. I had entered the body of that lady, placing limb within limb face within face. Although I had acted in this way, I did not yet tell my preceptor the truth.

32 This was the sin, O you of Kuru's race, which Vipula recollected in himself. Indeed, O blessed king, forsooth, that was the sin which he had actually committed 33 Coming to the city of Champa, he gave the flowers to his preceptor Devoted to superiors and seniors, he adored his preceptor in due form"

CHAPTER XLIII.

(ANUSHASANIKA PARVA)—Continued

Bhishma said —

1 Seeing his disciple returned from his mission, Devasharman of great energy addressed him in words which I shall recite to you, O king

Devasharman said :—

2 What have you seen, O Vipula, in course of your journey O disciple, through the great forest? Then whom you have seen knew you, O Vipula. I, as also my wife Ruchi, know how you had acted in the matter of protecting Ruchi

Vipula said :—

3 O twice born Rishi who are those two whom I first saw? Who also are those other six whom I saw afterwards? All of them know me Who indeed, are they to whom youprefer in your speech to me?—

Devasharman said —

4 The first couple, O twice born one, whom you saw are Day and Night They are ceaselessly moving like a circle Both of them know the sin you have committed

5 Those other men (six in number) whom, O learned Brahmana, you saw playing cheerfully at dice, are the six Seasons They also are acquainted with your sins

6 Having committed a sin secretly, no sinful man should cherish the assuring thought that his sin is known only to himself and not to any one else

7 When a man commits a sinful deed in secret, the Seasons as also Day and Night see it always

8 Those regions that are reserved for the sinful shall be yours What you had done, you did not tell me That your sin was not known to any one was your belief, and this conviction had filled you with joy

9 You did not inform your preceptor of the whole truth choosing to hide from him a substantial portion The Seasons and Day and Night whom you have heard speak thus thought it proper to remind you of your sin.

10 Day and Night and the Seasons, do know all the good and the bad deeds, that are in a man.

11 They spoke to you in that way, O twice born one, because they have full knowledge of what you had done but which you had not the courage to inform me of, fearing you had done wrong.

12 For this reason you will visit the regions that are reserved for the sinful. You did not tell me what you had done.

13 You were fully capable, O twice-born one, of protecting my wife whose disposition, by nature, is sinful In doing what you did, you did not commit any sin. I was, for this pleased with you 14 O best of Brahmanas if I had known you to have acted wickedly, I would, without hesitation, have cursed you entirely.

15 Women become united with men. Such union, is very desirable with men You had, however, protected my wife in a different spirit If you had acted otherwise, I would have cursed Even thus is what I think

16 You had, O son, protected my wife I have known the manner in which you had done it as if you had yourself informed me of it I have, O son, become pleased with you Relieved of all anxiety, you shall go to heaven

17 Having said these words to Vipula, the great Rishi Devasharman ascended to Heaven with his wife and his disciple and began to pass his time there in great happiness

18 In course of conversation, O king, on a former occasion, the great ascetic Markandeya had described to me this history on the banks of Ganga.

19 I, therefore recite it to you Women should always be protected by you Amongst them both kinds are to be seen, that is those who are virtuous and those who are not so

20 The virtuous women are highly blessed They are the mothers of the universe They, it is, O king that keep up the Earth with all her waters and forests.

21 Those women who are sinful, who are of wicked conduct, who are the destroyer of their race, and who are wedded to sinful purposes, are capable of being ascertained by marks, expressive of the evil that is in them, which appear, O king, on their persons

22 It is thus that great persons are capable of protecting women They cannot,

O foremost of kings, protected in any other way

23. Women, O king are fierce. They are gifted with fierce prowess. They have none whom they love or like, so much as them that have sexual intercourse with them.

24. Women are like those (Atharvan) Mantrams which destroy life. Even after they have consented to live with one, they are prepared to leave him joining others They are never satisfied with one person of the opposite sex, O son of Pandu.

25. Men should not love them. Nor should they cherish any jealousy on account of them, O king! Only for the sake of virtue, men should enjoy their society, not with enthusiasm and attachment but with unwillingness and absence of attachment.

26 By acting otherwise, a man is sure to meet with destruction, O delighter of the Kurus. O foremost of kings, reason is respected at all times and under all circumstances.

27. Only one man, viz, Vipula, had succeeded in protecting woman. There is none else, O king, in the three worlds who can protect women.

CHAPTER XLIV.

(ANUSHASANIKA PARVA)—Continued.

Yudhishthira said:—

1. Tell me of that, O grandfather, which is the root of all duties, which is the root of kinsmen, of home, of the departed manes and of guests.

2 I think this should be considered as the foremost of all duties Tell me, however, O king to what sort of a person should one give his daughter.

3 Having enquired into the conduct and nature of the person, his learning and acquirements his birth, and his acts, good people should then confer their daughter upon accomplished bridegrooms

4. All righteous Brahmanas, O Yudhishthira, act thus This is known as the Brahma marriage, O Yudhishthira

5 Selecting a befitting bridegroom, the father of the girl should make him marry his daughter, having by various presents induced the bridegroom to that act This form of marriage, forms the eternal practice of all good Kshatriyas.

6 When the father of the girl, without consulting his own wishes, confers his daughter upon a person whom the daughter likes and who reciprocates the girl's sentiments, the form of marriage, O Yudhishthira, is called Gandharva by those versed in the Vedas

7. The wise have declared, O king, to be the practice of the Asuras, viz, marrying a girl after buying her at a high cost and after gratifying the cupidity of her kinsmen.

8. Killing and chopping off the heads of weeping kinsmen, the bridegroom sometimes forcibly takes away the girl he marries Such marriage, O son, passes by the name of Rakshasa.

9. Of these five, (viz, the Brahma, the Kshatra, the Gandharva, the Asura, and the Rakshasa), three are righteous, O Yudhishthira, and two are unrighteous. The Paishacha and the Asura forms should, never be followed.

10 The Brahma, Kshatra, and Gandharva forms are righteous, O prince of men! Pure or mixed, these forms should forsooth be followed.

11. The Brahmana can take three wives The Kshatriya can take two wives. The Vaishya should take a wife from only his own caste. The children born of these wives should all be considered as equal.

12 Of the three wives of a Brahmana, she taken from his own caste should be considered as the foremost Likewise of the two wives permitted to the Kshatriya, she taken from his own caste should be considered as superior. Some say that persons belonging to the three higher castes may take, only for purposes of enjoyment, wives from the lowest or the Shudra caste. Others, however, forbid the practice.

13 The righteous condemn the practice of begetting children upon Shudra women. A Brahmana, by begetting children upon a Shudra women, becomes subject to the liability of performing an expiation.

14 A person of thirty years of age should marry a girl of ten years of age wearing a single piece of cloth Or, a person of one and twenty years of age should marry a girl of seven years of age.

15 That girl who has no brother nor father should not be married, O chief of Bharata's race for she may be intended for giving birth to the heir of her father.

16. After puberty it is, the girl (if not married) should wait for three years.

On the fourth year, she should look for a husband herself.

17. The children of such a girl do not lose their respectability, nor does union with such a girl become disgraceful. If, instead of selecting a husband for herself, she acts otherwise she gets the reproach of Prajapati herself.

18. One should marry that girl who is not a Sapinda of his mother or of the same family with his father. This is the usage which Manu has declared.

Yudhishthira said:—

19. Desirous of marriage some one actually gives a dower to the girl's kinsmen; some one, the girl's kinsmen consenting, promises to give a present; some one says, —I shall carry away the girl by force;— some one simply shows his riches, some one, again, actually takes the hand of the girl with rites of marriage. I ask you, O grandfather, whose wife does the girl actually become? You are the eye to those who wish to know the truth.

Bhishma said:—

21. The deeds of men approved by the wise, are seen to yield good. False speech, however, is always sinful.

22. The girl herself who becomes wife, the sons born of her, the Ritwijas and preceptors and disciples and Upadhyayas present at the marriage all become liable to expiation if the girl gives her hand to a person other than he whom she had promised to marry. Some are of opinion that no expiation is necessary for such conduct.

23. Manu does not speak highly of the practice of a girl living with a person whom she does not like. Living as wife with a person whom she does not like, produces disgrace and sin. No one commits sin in any of the following cases.

24. In forcibly carrying away for marriage a girl that is bestowed upon the abductor by the girl's relatives with due rites, as also a girl for whom dower has been paid and accepted, there is no great sin.

25. Upon the girl's kinsmen having given their consent, Mantras and Homa should be restored to. Such Mantras truly accomplish their purpose. Mantras and Homa recited and performed in the case of a girl who has not been given away by her kinsmen, do not accomplish their purpose.

26. The engagement made by the relatives of a girl is no doubt, binding and sacred. But the engagement that is made by the bride and bride-groom, with the help of Mantras, is very much more so.

27. According to the injunctions of the scriptures, the husband should regard his wife as an acquisition due to his own pristine deeds or to what has been ordained by God. One, therefore, commits no sin by accepting for wife a girl who had been promised to another by her kinsmen or for whom dower had been accepted by them from another.

Yudhishthira said —

28. When after the receipt of dower for a girl, the girl's father sees a more eligible bride-groom —one, who is endued with the three-fold objects, does the girl's father commit sin by rejecting the person from whom dower had been received in favor of him who is more eligible?

29. In such a case either alternative appears to be sinful, for to discard the person to whom the girl has been promised can never be honorable, while to reject the person who is more eligible can never be good. I ask, how should the father act so that he might be said to do that which is beneficial? To us, of all duties this seems to deserve utmost deliberation.

30. We are desirous of determining the truth. You, indeed, are our eyes. Do you explain this to us. I am never satiated with listening to you.

Bhishma said —

31. The gift of the dower does not make the girl wife. This is well known to the person paying it. He pays it simply as the price of the girl. Then again the good never bestow their daughters induced by the dowers that others may offer.

32—33. When the person desirous of marrying happens to be gifted with such qualities as do not go down with the girl's kinsmen, it is then that kinsmen demand dower from him. The person however, who won over by another's accomplishments, says —Do you marry my girl adorning her with proper ornaments of gold and gems — and that person who satisfies this request, cannot be said to demand dower or give it, for such a transaction is not a sale. The bestowal of a daughter upon acceptance of what may properly be considered as gifts is the eternal practice.

34. In matters of marriage, some fathers say—I shall bestow my daughter upon such and such a person, some say—I shall not bestow my daughter upon such a one — Some again, say forcibly—I must bestow my daughter upon such an individual.

35 These declarations are not tantamount to actual marriage People are seen to solicit one another for the hands of maidens. Till the hand is actually taken with due rites, marriage does not happen We have heard that even this was the boon granted to men formerly by the Maruts about maidens.

36 The Rishis have laid the command upon all men that maidens should never be bestowed upon persons unless the father are eligible The daughter is the root of desire and of descendants of the collateral line This is what I think.

37. The practice of sale and purchase of the daughter, has been known to human beings for a long time On account of such familiarity with the practice, you may be able, upon careful examination, to find innumerable faults in it. The gift or acceptance of dower alone could not be considered as creating the relation of husband and wife. Listen to what I say on this head

38. Formerly, having defeated all the Magadhas, the Kashis, and the Koshalas I brought away by force two maidens for Vichitravirya.

39 One of those two maidens was married with due rites. The other maiden was not formally married on the ground that she was one for whom dower had been paid in the shape of chivalry My uncle of Kuru's race, viz, king Valhika, said that the maiden so brought away and not married with due rites should be liberated. That maiden, therefore, was recommended to Vichitravirya for being married by him according to due rites.

40. Doubting my father's words I went to others for asking their opinion I thought that my father was exceedingly punctilious in matters of morality

41. I then went to my father himself, O king, and addressed him these words from desire of knowing something about the practices of pious people in respect of marriage'—I wish, O sire, to know what in truth the practices are of righteous people'—I repeatedly expressed my wish. Such was my eagerness and curiosity, that I expressed my desire several times

42—43 After I had uttered those words that foremost of pious men, viz, my father Valhika, answered me, saying,—If in your opinion the relation of husband and wife belongs to the gift and acceptance of dower and not to the actual taking of the maiden's hand with due rites, the father of the maiden would show himself to be the follower of a creed other than that which comes from the ordinary scriptures This is what the accepted scriptures say.

44. Persons conversant with morality and duty do not hold that their words are at all authoritative who say that the relation of husband and wife arises from the gift and acceptance of dower, and not from the actual taking of the hand with due rites.

45 The saying is well known that the relation of husband and wife is created by actual bestowal of the daughter by the father. The relation of wife is not formed through sale and purchase. They who consider such status to be due to sale and the gift of dower are persons who are certainly unacquainted with the scriptures.

46 No one should bestow his daughter upon such persons In fact, they are not men with whom one may marry his daughter. A wife should never be purchased. Nor should a father sell his daughter.

47. Only those sinful persons who are possessed, besides, by cupidity, and who sell and purchase female slaves for making them servants, consider the relation of wife as capable of originating from the gift and acceptance of dower.

48—49 On this subject some people on one occasion had asked prince Satyavat the following question —If the giver of a dower to the kinsmen of a maiden happens to die before marriage, can another person take the hand of that maiden in marriage? We have doubts on this matter. Do you remove these doubts of ours for you are gifted with great wisdom and are honored by the wise.

50—51 Be you the eyes to ourselves who are desirous of learning the truth —Prince Satyavat answered, saying,—The kinsmen of the maiden should bestow her upon him whom they consider proper. There need be no scruples in this. The righteous act thus without caring for the giver of the dower even if he be alive; while, about the giver who is dead, there is not the slightest doubt.

52 Some say that the virgin wife or widow —one, whose, marriage has not been consummated with her husband by actual sexual intercourse on account of His absence or death,—may be allowed to unite herself with her husband's younger brother or such other relation. The husband dying before such consummation, the virgin-widow may either surrender herself to her husband's younger brother or practise penances.

53 In the opinion of some, the younger brother of the husband or such other relation may thus use the virgin wife or widow, though others hold that such practice, though it is frequent, originates from desire instead of being a scriptural ordinance They who say so are clearly of opinion that the father of a maiden has the right to bestow her upon any eligible person, disregarding the dower previously given by another and accepted by himself

54 If after the hand of a maiden has been promised all the initial rites before marriage be performed, the maiden may still be given to a person other than the one to whom she had been promised. Only the giver commits the sin of falsehood, so far, however, as the relation of wife is concerned no injury can occur thereto.

55 The Mantras of marriage accomplish their object of bringing about the indissoluble union of marriage at the seventh step. The maiden becomes the wife of him to whom the gift is actually made with water.

56 The gift of maidens should be made in the following way. The wise know it forsooth. A superior Brahmana should marry a maiden who is not unwilling, who belongs to a family equal to his own in purity or dignity, and who is given away by her brother. Such a girl should be married in the presence of fire, with due rites, causing her, amongst other things, to go round the bridegroom for the usual number of times.

CHAPTER XLV.

(ANUSHASANIKA PARVA) — Continued.

Yudhishthira said :—

1. If a person, after having given dower for a maiden, goes away, how should the maiden's father or other kinsmen who can bestow her, act? Do tell me this, O grandfather?

Bhishma said :—

2 Such a maiden, if she be the daughter of a sonless and rich father, should be maintained by the father. Indeed, if the father does not return the dower to the kinsmen of the giver, the maiden should be considered as belonging to the giver of the dower.

3 She may even raise children for the giver by any of those means that are laid down in the scriptures. No person, however, can marry her according to due rites.

4 Commanded by her father, the princess Savitri had in days of old chosen a husband and united herself with him. This act of hers is praised by some, but others, conversant with the scriptures, condemn it.

5 Others who are righteous have not acted thus. Others maintain that the conduct of the righteous should ever be considered as the foremost evidence of duty or morality.

6 Upon this subject, Sukratu, the grand son of the great Janaka, the king of the Videhas, has declared the following opinion.

7. There is the well known injunction of the scriptures that women can enjoy freedom at any period of their life. If this were not the path of the virtuous, how could this scriptural saying exist? As regards the pious, therefore, how can there be any question or doubt about it? How can people condemn that saying by choosing to conduct themselves otherwise?

8 The impious violation of eternal practice is considered as the practice of the Asuras. We never hear of such practice in the conduct of the ancients

9 The relationship of husband and wife is very subtile. It is different from the natural relationship of male and female which consists only in the desire for sexual intercourse. This also was said by the king of Janaka's race.

Yudhishthira said —

10. Under what authority is the property of men inherited (by others when they happen to have daughters)? As for her father the daughter should be considered the same as the son.

Bhishma said :—

11. The son is even as one's own self, and the daughter is like the son. How, therefore, can another take the riches when one lives in his ownself in the form of his daughter?

12. Whatever is the own property of the mother, is due to the maiden daughter. If the maternal grandfather happens to die without leaving sons, the daughter's son should inherit it.

13 The daughter's son offers funeral cakes to his own father and the father of his mother. Hence, for the ends of justice, there is no difference between the son and the daughter's son.

14. When a person has got only a daughter and she has been invested by him with the position of a son, if he then happens to have a son, such son shares the inheritance with the daughter. When again, a person has got a daughter and she has been invested by him with the position of a son, if he then happens to take a son by adoption or purchase, then the daughter is considered superior to such son 15 In the following case I do not see any reason why the daughter's son should be considered as the proper heir. The case is that of the daughter who has been sold by her father The sons born of a daughter who has been sold by her sire for actual price, belong exclusively to their father Such sons can never belong, even as daughter's sons, to their maternal grandfather on account of his having sold their mother for price and lost all his rights in or to her by that deed.

16 Such sons, again, become full of malice, impious in conduct, the misappropriators of other people's riches, and full of deceit and cunning Having originated from that sinful form of marriage called Asura, the offspring becomes wicked in conduct.

17 Persons acquainted with ancient history, conversant with duties, devoted to the scriptures and firm in maintaining the restrictions therein laid down, recite in this connection some verses sung in days of yore by Yama.

19 This is what Yama had sung. That man who acquires riches by selling his own son, or who bestows his daughter after accepting a dower for his own livelihood, has to sink in seven dreadful hells one after another, known by the name of Kalas. There that wretch has to feed upon sweat and urine and stools during that period.

20 In that form of marriage which is called Arsha the person who marries has to give a bull and a cow and the father of the maiden accepts the gift Some characterise this gift as a dower (or price), while some are of opinion that it should not be considered in that light The true opinion, however, is that a gift for such a purpose, be it of small value or large, should, O king, be considered as dower or price, and the bestowal of the daughter under such circumstances should be considered as a sale.

21. Despite the fact of its having been practised by a few persons it can never be taken as the eternal practice Other forms of marriage are seen, practised by men, such as marrying girls after carrying them away by force from amidst their kinsmen.

22 Those persons who have sexual intercourse with a maiden, by force are considered as perpetrators of sin. They have to sink in darkest hell.

23 Even a human being who is not a relation of blood should not be sold What need then be said of one's own child? With the riches that is acquired by doing sinful deeds no meritorious deed can be performed.

CHAPTER XLVI.

(ANUSHASANIKA PARVA) — Continued.

Bhishma said:—

1. They who know the ancient history recite the following verse of Daksha the son of Prachetas, viz,—That maiden, for whom nothing is taken by her kinsmen in the form of dower, cannot be said to be sold.

2 Honor good treatment, and everything else which is agreeable, should all be given to the maiden whose hand is taken in marriage.

3 Her father and brothers and father-in-law and husband's brothers should show her every respect and adorn her with ornaments, if they be desirous of reaping benefits, for such conduct on their part always produces considerable happiness and advantage.

4 If the wife does not like her husband or fails to please him, from such dislike and absence of joy, the husband can never have children for increasing his family.

5 Women, O king, should always be adored and treated with love. There where women are treated with honor, the very gods are said to be propitiated.

6 There where women are not adored, all acts become fruitless. If the women of a family, on account of the treatment they receive, indulge in grief and tears, that family soon becomes extinct.

7. Those houses which are cursed by women meet with destruction and ruin as if scorched by some Atharvan rite. Such houses lose their splendour. Their growth and prosperity cease, O king.

8 Manu, on the eve of his departure from this world made over women to the care and protection of men, saying that they are weak, that they fall an easy prey to the seduction of men, disposed to accept the love which is offered them, and devoted to truth,

9 There are others among them who are full of malice, covetous of honors, fierce in nature, unlovable, and impervious to reason Women, however, deserve to be respected Do ye men show them honor.

10 The virtue of men depends upon women All pleasures and enjoyments also entirely depend upon them Do ye serve them and adore them. Do ye bend your wills before them

11. The begetting of children, the nursing of children already born, and the accomplishment of all deeds necessary for the needs of society, see, all these have women for their cause.

12. By respecting women, ye are sure to acquire the fruition of all objects Regarding it a princess of the house of Janaka the king of the Videhas, sang a verse. It as this —

13 Women have no sacrifices ordained for them There are no Shraddhas which they are called upon to perform They are not required to oberve any fasts To serve their husbands wish respect and willing obedience form their only duty. Through the satisfaction of that duty they succeed in conquering Heaven.

14 In childhood, the father protects her The husband protects her in youth When she becomes old, her sons protect her. At no period of her life is woman free.

15 Women are deities of prosperity The person that desires affluence and prosperity should honor them. By cherishing women, O Bharata, one cherishes the goddess of prosperity herself, and by afflicting her, one is said to pain the goddess of prosperity.

CHAPTER XLVII.

(ANUSHASANIKA PARVA).—
Continued,

Yudhishthira said :—

1 You know fully well the ordinances of all the scriptures You are the foremost of those who are acquainted with the duties of kings You are celebrated over the whole world as a great remover of doubts.

2 I have a doubt, do you explain it to me, O grandfather As regards this doubt that has originated in my mind I shall not ask any other person for its solution

3 You should, O you of mighty arms, expound as to how a man should act who is desirous of treading along the path of duty and virtue.

4 It has been laid down, O grandfather that a Brahmana can take four wives, viz, one who belongs to his own caste, one who is a Kshatriya, one who is a Vaishya, and one who is a Shudra, if the Brahmana wishes to satisfy the desire of sexual intercourse.

5 Tell me, O best of the Kurus, which amongst those sons should inherit the father's riches one after another.

6 Who amongst them O grandfather shall take what share of the paternal wealth? I wish to hear this, viz, how the distribution has been ordained amongst them of the paternal property.

Bhishma said :—

7. The Brahmana, the Kshatriya, and the Vaishya are considered the three twice-born castes To marry in these three castes has been ordained to be the duty of the Brahmana, O Yudhishthira

8 Through erroneous judgment or cupidity or lust, O destroyer of enemies, a Brahmana takes a Shudra wife He is not competent to take, according to the scriptures, such wife.

9 A Brahmana, by knowing a Shudra woman comes by a low end in the next world He should, having done such an act, perform expiation according to the rites laid down in the scriptures

10 That expiation must be twice heavier or severer if on account of such an act, O Yudhishthira, the Brahmana gets children I shall now tell you, O Bharata, how the(paternal) wealth is to be distributed.

11 The son born of the Brahmani wife shall in the first place, appropriate from his father's wealth a bull of good marks, and the best car or vehicle.

12 What remains of the Brahmana's property O Yudhishthira, after this, should be divided into ten equal parts The son by the Brahmani wife shall take four of such parts of the paternal property.

13 The son that is born of the Kshatriya wife is, forsooth, possessed of the status of a Brahmana On account, however, of the distinction attaching to his mother, he shall take three of the ten shares into which the property has been divided.

14 The son who has been born of the wife belonging to the third caste, viz, the woman of the Vaishya caste, by the Brahmana father, shall take, O Yudhishthira, two of the three remaining shares of the father's property.

15 It has been said that the son who has been begotten by the Brahmana father upon the Shudra wife should not take any portion of the father's property, for he is not to be considered an heir. A little, however, of the paternal property should be given to the son of the Shudra wife, hence the one remaining share should be given to him out of compassion.

16. Even this should be the order of the ten shares into which the Brahmana's wealth is to be distributed. All the sons that are born of the same mother or of mothers of the same caste, shall share equally the portion that is theirs.

17. The son born of the Shudra wife should not be considered as invested with the dignity of a Brahmana on account of his being unskilled (in the scriptures and the duties ordained for the Brahmana) Only those children who are born of wives belonging to the three higher castes should be considered as invested with the dignity of Brahmanas.

18. It has been said that there are only four castes and there is no fifth. The son by the Shudra wife shall take the tenth part of his father's wealth.

19 That share, however, he is to take only when his father has given it to him He shall not take it if his father does not give it to him. Some portion of the father's riches should, forsooth, be given, O Bharata, to the son of the Shudra wife.

20. Compassion is one of the greatest virtues. It is through compassion that something is given to the son of the Shudra wife. Whatever be the object about which compassion arises, as a cardinal virtue it is always productive of merit.

21. Whether the father happens to have children (by his wives belonging to the other castes) or to have no children, to the son by the Shudra wife, O Bharata, nothing more than a tenth part of the father's wealth should be given.

22. If a Brahmana happens to have more riches than what is necessary for maintaining himself and his family for three years, he should with that riches celebrate sacrifices A Brahmana should never acquire riches for nothing.

23. The highest sum that the husband should give the wife is three thousand coins This wealth that the husband gives to the wife the latter may spend or dispose of as she likes.

24 Upon the death of the childless husband the wife shall enjoy all his riches The wife should never take any portion of her husband's riches.

25 Whatever riches O Yudhishthira, the Brahmani wife may acquire by gift from her father, should be taken by her daughter, for the daughter is like the son 26 The daughter, O king, has been ordained in the scriptures to be equal to the son, O delighter of the Kurus Thus has the law of inheritance been ordained, O foremost of Bharata's family. Remembering these ordinances about the distribution and disposal of wealth, one should never acquire riches uselessly.

Yudhishthira said:—

27 If the son born of a Shudra woman by a Brahmana father has been made in the scriptures to be disentitled to any property, by what exception of the rule then is a tenth part of the paternal property to be given to him?

28 A son born of a Brahmani wife by a Brahmana is unquestionably a Brahmana. One born of a Kshatriya wife or of a Vaishya wife, by a Brahmana husband, is likewise a Brahmana.

29 Why then, O best of kings are such sons to share the paternal property unequally? All of them, you have said, are Brahmanas, having been born of mothers that belong to the three higher castes equally entitled to the name of the twice-born.

Bhishma said:—

30. O destroyer of enemies, all wives in this world are called by the name of Dara Although that name is applied to all yet there is this great difference to be observed.

31. If having married three wives belonging to the three other castes, a Brahmana takes a Brahmani wife the very last of all, yet shall she be considered as the first in rank among all the wives and as being worthy of the greatest respect. Indeed, among all the co wives, she shall be the foremost.

32. In her apartments should be kept all necessary articles for the husband's baths, personal decorations, washing of teeth, and application of collyrium to the eyes. In her apartments should be kept the Havya and the Kavya and all else that the husband may need for the performance of his religious acts.

33 If the Brahmani wife is in the house, no other wife is entitled to attend to these needs of the husband. Only the Brahmani wife, O Yudhishthira, should help the husband in these acts.

34 The husband's food and drink and garlands and dresses and ornaments—all these should be given by the Brahmani wife to the husband, for she is the foremost in rank among all the wives of the husband.

35 These are the ordinances of the scriptures as laid down by Manu, O delighter of the Kurus! This, O king, is seen to be the course of eternal practice

36 If a Brahmana, O Yudhishthira, actuated by lust, acts in a different way, he shall come to be considered as a Chandala among Brahmanas.

37. The son born of the Kshatriya wife has been said to be equal in dignity to the son born of the Brahmani wife For all that, a distinction attaches to the son of the Brahmani wife on account of the superiority of the Brahmana wife to the Kshatriya wife in respect of the order of caste.

38 The Kshatriya wife cannot be considered as equal to the Brahmana wife in point of birth Hence, O best of kings, the son born of the Brahmani wife must be considered as the first in rank and superior to the son born of the Kshatriya wife

39 Because, again, the Kshatriya wife, is not equal in point of birth to the Brahmani wife hence the son of the Brahmani wife takes one after another, all the best things, O Yudhisthira, among his father's property

40 Likewise, the Vaishya wife cannot be considered as the equal of the Kshatriya wife in point of birth Prosperity, kingdom and treasury, O Yudhisthira, belong to the Kshatriyas

41. All these have been ordained for the Kshatriya The whole Earth O king, encircled by seas, is seen to belong to him. By following the duties of his own caste, the Kshatriya acquires immense riches

42. The sceptre of royalty is held by him Without the Kshatriya, O king, there can be no protection The Brahmanas are highly blessed, for they are the gods of the very deities

43 Following the ordinances laid down by the Rishis the Kshatriyas should adore the Brahmanas according to due rites This is the eternal usage.

44. Coveted by thieves and others, the properties of all men are protected by Kshatriyas following the duties of their order Indeed, riches and wives and every other possession owned by people would have been forcibly taken away but for this protection that the Kshatriyas give.

45 The Kshatriya, as the king, becomes the protector or rescuer of all the castes. Hence the son of the Kshatriya wife shall, forsooth, be held to be superior to him that is born of the Vaishya wife The son of Kshatriya wife for this takes a larger share of the paternal property than the son of the Vaishya mother.

Yudhishthira said —

46 You have duly said what the rules are that apply to Brahmanas What, however, are the rules that apply to the others?

Bhishma said —

47 The Kshatriya, O delighter of the Kurus can take two wives The Kshatriya may take a third wife from the Shudra caste Such practice prevails, it is true, but it is not sanctioned by the scriptures

48 This should be the order, O Yudhishthira, of the wives of a Kshatriya. The property of a Kshatriya should, O king, be divided into eight shares

49 The son of the Kshatriya wife shall take four of such shares of the paternal property. The son of the Vaishya wife shall take three of such shares.

50 The remaining one or the eighth share shall be taken by the son of the Shudra wife The son of the Shudra wife, however, shall take only when the father gives but not otherwise

51. The Vaishya can take only one wife. He can take a second wife from the Shudra caste Such is the practice, no doubt, but it is not sanctioned by the scriptures.

52 If a Vaishya has two wives one of whom is a Vaishya and the other a Shudra, there is a difference between them in respect of position.

53 The riches of a Vaishya, O chief of Bharata's race, should be divided into five portions I shall now speak of the sons of a Vaishya by a wife of his own caste and by one belonging to the inferior caste, as also of the manner in which, O king, his property is to be distributed among those children

54 The son born of the Vaishya wife shall take four of such shares of his paternal property. The fifth share O Bharata, has been said to belong to the son born of the Shudra wife

55 Such son, however, shall take when the father gives He should not take anything unless the father gives it to him. The son who is begotten on a Shudra wife by persons of the three higher castes should always be considered as disentitled to any share of the father's wealth.

56 The Shudra should take only one wife from his own caste He can, under no circumstances, take any other wife Even if he happens to have a hundred sons by this wife all of them share equally the property that he may leave behind

57 As for all the castes, the children born of the wife taken from the husband's own caste shall, it has been laid down, share equally the father's wealth.

58 The eldest son's share shall be greater than that of every other son, for he shall take one share more than each of his brothers, comprising the best things of this father. This is the law of inheritance, O son of Pritha, as declared by the Self-create himself.

59. Amongst children all born of the wife taken from the husband's own caste there is another difference, O king! In marrying, the elder ones should always precede the younger ones

60 The wives being all equal in respect of their order of birth, and the children also being all equal in respect of the position of their mothers, the son that is first-born shall take one share more than each of his other brothers The son who is next in point of age shall take a share that is next in value, while the son who is youngest shall take the share which belongs to the youngest

61. Thus among wives of all castes, they who belong to the same caste with the husband are considered as the first. This is what was declared by the great Rishi Kashyapa the son of Marichi.

CHAPTER XLVIII.

(ANUSHASANA PARVA)—Continued.

Yudhishthira said:—

1. The intermixture of castes is brought about through inducements offered by riches, or through mere lust, or through ignorance of the true order of birth

2 What, O grandfather, are the duties of persons who are born in the mixed classes and what are the acts laid down for them? Do you describe them to me.

Bhishma said —

3 In the beginning, the Lord of all creatures created the four castes and laid down their respective duties, for the sake of sacrifice.

4 The Brahmana may take four wives, one from each of the four castes In two of them, he takes birth himself Those sons however, who are begotten by him on the two other inferior, (viz, Vaishya and Shudra), are inferior, their position being settled not by that of their father but by that of their mothers.

5 The son begotten by a Brahmana upon a Shudra wife is called Parashava, meaning one born of a dead body for the Shudra woman's body is as inauspicious as a dead body. He should serve the persons of his (father's) race. Indeed, it is not proper for him to renounce the duty of service that has been laid down for him

6 With all means in his power, he should maintain his family. Even if he happens to be elder in age, he should still dutifully serve the other children of his father, who in age may be younger to him, and give them whatever he may succeed in acquiring

7 A Kshatriya may take three wives In two of them, he takes birth himself His third wife being of the Shudra caste, is considered as very inferior The son that he begets upon her is called an Ugra.

8 The Vaishya may take two wives In both of them, he takes birth himself. The Shudra can take only one wife, from his own caste The son begotten by him upon her becomes a Shudra.

9 A son who takes birth under circumstances other than those mentioned above, is considered as a very inferior one If a person of a lower caste begets a son upon a woman of a superior caste, such son is regarded as outside the pale of the four pure castes Indeed, such son becomes an object of derision with the four principal castes.

10 If a Kshatriya begets a son upon a Brahmani woman, such son, without being included in any of the four pure castes comes to be considered as a Suta. The duties of a Suta consist in reciting eulogies and encomiums of kings and other great men The son begotten by a Vaishya upon a woman of the Brahmana, order, is known as a Vaidehaka Their duties consist in taking charge of bars and bolts for protecting the privacy of women of respectable families Such sons have no purifying rites laid down for them.

11 If a Shudra knows a woman belonging to the foremost of the four castes, the son that is begotten is called a Chandala. Endued with a dreadful disposition, he must live in the outskirts of cities and towns and his duty is that of the public executioner. Such sons are always considered as wretches of their race. These, O foremost of intelligent persons, are the offspring of intermixed castes.

12. The son begotten by a Vaishya upon a Kshatriya woman becomes a Vandi or Magadha. His duties are eloquent recitations of praise. The son begotten through transgression, by a Shudra upon a Kshatriya woman, becomes a Nishada and his duties consist in the catching of fish.

13. If a Shudra happens to know a Vaishya woman, the son begotten upon her comes to be called Ayogava. The duties of such a person are those of a carpenter. The Brahmana should never accept gifts from such a person. They are not entitled to possess any kind of riches.

14. Persons belonging to the mixed castes beget upon wives taken from their own castes children invested with their position. When they procreate children in women taken from other inferior castes, such children become inferior to their fathers, for they become invested with the position of their mothers.

15. Thus as regards the four pure castes, persons beget children invested with their own position upon wives taken from their own castes as also upon them that are taken from the castes immediately below their own. When, however, offspring is begotten upon other wives, they are regarded as invested with a position that is, principally, outside the pale of the four pure castes.

16. When such children beget sons in women, taken from their own classes, those sons take the position of their fathers. It is only when they take wives from castes other than their own, that the children they beget, become invested with inferior position.

17. As an example of this it may be said that a Shudra begets upon a woman belonging to the most superior caste a son that is outside the pale of the four castes. The son that is outside the pale of the four castes, by uniting with women belonging to the four principal castes begets offspring that is further degraded in point of position.

18. From those outside the pale of the four castes and those again that are further outside that limit, children multiply on account of the union of persons with women of classes superior to their own. Thus, from persons of inferior position classes spring up altogether fifteen in number, that are equally low or still lower in degree.

19. It is only from sexual union with women of persons who should not have such union with them that mixed castes originate. Among the classes that are thus outside the limit of the four principal or pure castes, children are begotten upon woman belonging to the class called Sairindhri by men of the class called Magadha.

20. The occupation of such children is the adorement of the bodies of kings and others. They are well acquainted with the preparation of unguents, the making of garlands and the manufacture of articles used for the decoration of the body. Though free by the position that belongs to them by birth, they should live like servants. From the union of Magadhas of a certain class with women of the caste called Sairindhri, another caste originates, called Ayogava. Their business consists in the making of nets. Vaidehas, by knowing Sairindhri women, beget children called Maireyakas whose business is the manufacture of wines and spirits.

21. From the Nishadas originate a caste called Madgura and another known by the name of Dasas whose business is plying boats. From the Chandalas originates a race called Shwapaka whose business lies in keeping guard over the dead.

22. The women of the Magadhi caste, by union with these four castes of wicked nature, produce four others who live by deceitful means. These are Mangsa, Swadukara, Kshaudra, and Sougandha.

23. From the Vaideha originates cruel and sinful caste that lives by practising deception. From the Nishadas again originates the Madranabha caste whose members are seen to ride on cars drawn by asses.

24. From the Chandalas originates the caste called Pukkasa whose members are seen to eat the flesh of asses, horses and elephants. These are clad in clothes, procured by stripping human corpses. They are again seen to eat off broken earthenware.

25. These three castes of very low origin, are born of women of the Ayogava caste (by fathers taken from different castes). The caste called Kshudra originates from the Vaidehaka. The caste called Andhra which lives in the outskirts of towns and cities, also originates (from the Vaidehakas).

26. Then, again, the Charmakara, knowing woman of the Nishada caste, begets the class called Karavara. From the Chandala, again, originates the caste known by the name of Pandusaupaka.

whose business is to make baskets and other things with cleft bamboos.

27. From the union of the Nishada with a woman of the Vaideha caste, originates one who is called by the name of Ahindaka. The Chandala begets upon a Saupaka women a son who does not differ from the Chandala in position or occupation.

28 A Nishadi woman, by union with a Chandala, produces a son who lives in the outskirts of villages and towns. Indeed, the members of such a caste live in crematoria and are considered by the very lowest orders as incapable of being classed among them.

29 Thus do these mixed castes originate from improper and sinful union of fathers and mothers belonging to different castes Whether they live hidden or openly, they should be known by their occupations.

30 The duties have been laid down in the scriptures of only the four principal castes About others, the scriptures are entirely silent. Among all the castes, the members of those castes that have no duties assigned to them by the scriptures, need entertain no fears as to what they do.

31. Persons unaccustomed to the performance of sacrifices or for whom sacrifices have not been laid down, and who are deprived of the company and the instructions of the pious, whether classed among the four principal castes or out of their limit, by uniting themselves with women of other castes, led not by considerations of virtue but by uncontrolled lust, cause numerous mixed castes to originate whose occupations and houses depend on the circumstances connected with the irregular unions from which they spring.

32. Having recourse to such places where four roads meet, or crematoria, or hills and mountains, or forests and trees, they build their houses The ornaments they wear are made of iron.

33 Living in such places, openly, following their own occupations for acquiring livelihood They may be seen to live thus, adorning their persons with ornaments and engaged in the work of manufacturing various domestic and other utensils.

34 Forsooth, by assisting kine and Brahmanas and practising the virtues of abstention from cruelty, compassion, truthfulness of speech, and forgiveness, and if it is necessary, protecting others by sacrificing their own lives persons of the mixed castes, may acquire success. I have no doubt, O king that these virtues become the causes of their success.

36. He who is gifted with intelligence, should, taking everything into consideration, beget children according to the scriptural injunctions, upon women that have been declared as proper or fit for him A son begotten upon a woman belonging to a degraded caste, instead of rescuing the father, brings him to grief even as a heavy burden brings to grief a swimmer desirous of crossing a pool of water.

37. Whether a man is learned or otherwise, lust and anger are natural tendencies of humanity in this world Women, therefore, may always be seen to drag men into the wrong path.

38 The disposition of women is such that man's contact with her produces misery Hence, wise men do not allow themselves to be excessively attached to women.

Yudhishthira said —

39. There are men who belong to the mixed castes, and who are of very impure birth. Putting respectable appearance, they are, in sooth, disrespectable On account of those external signs we may not be able to know the truth about their birth Are there any signs, O grandfather, by which the truth may be known about the origin of such men?

Bhishma said —

40. A person who is born of an irregular union shows various features of disposition. One's purity of birth, again, is to be determined from one's acts which must resemble the acts of those who are admittedly good and pious.

41. A disrespectable conduct, acts opposed to those laid down in the scriptures, crookedness and cruelty, and abstention from sacrifices and other scriptural ac that lead to merit, show one's impurity birth.

42 A son inherits the disposition either the father or the mother. Some times he inherits the dispositions of both A person of impure birth can never succee in concealing his true nature.

43. As the cub of a tiger resembles it father and dam in form and in stripes o spots, so a person cannot but show the circumstande of his origin.

44. However secret may one's birth be if that birth happens to be impure, it character or nature is sure to show itself slightly or largely.

45. A person may for purposes of his own, choose to follow an insincere path, practising such conduct as seems to be pious. His own nature, however, in the these kinds of sons equal? Whose, again, is the son to be? Do you tell me this, O grandfather.

Bhishma said:—

13 His is the son from whose seed he has sprung If, however, the owner of the seed discards the son born of it, such son then becomes his upon whose wife he has been begotten. The same rule applies to the son called Adhyudha He belongs to the person from whose seed he has sprung If however, the owner of the seed forsakes him, he becomes the son of the husband of his mother. Know this is what the law declares.

Yudhishthira said:—

14 We know that the son becomes his from whose seed he has taken birth Whence does the husband of the woman who gives birth to the son derive his right to the latter? Likewise the son called Adhyuda should be known to be the son of him from whose seed he has sprung. How can they be the sons of others on account of the engagement about owning and rearing them having been broken?

Bhishma said:—

15 He who, having begotten a son of his own loins forsakes him for some reason or other, cannot be considered as the father of such son, for vital seed only cannot create sonship Such son must be held to belong to the person who is the master of the soil

16. When a man, desiring to have a son, marries a girl quick with child, the son born of his wife must belong to him, for it is the fruit of his own soil The person from whose vital seed the son has sprung, can have no right to such son.

17 The son who is born in one's soil but not begotten by the owner, O chief of Bharata's race bears all the marks of the father that has actually begotten him The son thus born is incapable of concealing the evidences of physiognomy. He is at once known by eyesight.

18 As regards the son made, he is sometimes considered as the child of the person who has made him a son and who brings him up In his case neither the vital seed of which he has been born nor the soil in which he has been born, becomes the cause of sonship.

Yudhishthira said —

19 What kind of son is that who is said to be a made son and whose sonship originates from the fact of his being taken and reared, and in whose case neither the vital seed nor the soil of birth, O Bharata, is caused as the cause of sonship.

Bhishma said:—

20. When one takes up and rears a son who has been cast off on the road by his father and mother, and when the person thus taking and rearing him cannot find out his parents after search, he becomes the father of such son and the latter becomes what is called his made son.

21. Not having anybody to own him he becomes his who rears him Such son, again, comes to be considered as belonging to that castes to which his owner or rearer belongs.

Yudhishthra said:—

22. How should the purifactory rites of such a person be performed? In whose case what sort of rites are to be performed? With what girl should he be married? Tell me all this, O grandfather.

Bhishma said:—

23. The rites of purification for such a son should be performed according to the usage of the person himself who rears him, for, renounced by his parents, such son gets the caste of the person who takes him and rears him.

24 Indeed, O you of unfading glory, the rearer should perform all the purificatory rites for such son according to the practices of his own family and kinsmen As regards the girl also, O Yudhishthira, that should be bestowed in marriage upon such a son, she should belong to the caste of the rearer himself.

25 All this is to be done only when the caste of the son's true mother cannot be learnt Among sons, he who is born of a maiden and he who is born of a mother who had conceived before her marriage but brought him forth subsequent to that act, are considered as very disgraceful and degraded.

26—27 Even these two, however, should receive the same rites of purification that are sanctioned for the sons begotten by the father in lawful marriage In respect of the son who becomes his fathers on account of his birth in the father's soil, and of those sons who are called Apsadas, and those conceived by the wife in her maidenhood but brought forth after marriage Brahmanas and others should apply the same rites of purification that are in vogue in their own castes These are the conclusions that are seen in the scriptures about the different 17 not es I have thus told you everything of other questions. What else do you wish to hear?

CHAPTER L.

(ANUSHASANIKA PARVA) — Continued.

Yudhishthira said:—

1. What is the nature of the compassion or pity that is felt at seeing the misery of another? What is the nature of that compassion or sympathy that one feels for another on account of his living in the companionship of that other? What is the nature of the supreme blessedness of kine? You should, O grandfather explain all this to me.

Bhishma said —

2 I shall, O you of great effulgence, recite to you in this connection an ancient narrative of a conversation between Nahusha and the Rishi Chyavana.

3 Formerly, O chief of Bharata's race, the great Rishi Chyavana of Bhrigu's race always practising high vows became desirous of leading for sometime the mode of life called Udavasa, and sed himself to commence it

4 Renouncing pride, anger, joy and grief, the ascetic, pledging himself to observe that vow, set himself to live for twelve years, according to the rules of Udavasa.

5 The Rishi inspired all creatures with trust. And he inspired similar confidence in all creatures living in water The powerful ascetic resembled the Moon himself in his conduct to all.

6 Bowing to all the deities and having purged himself of all sins, he entered the water at the confluence of Ganga and Yamuna, and stood there like an inanimate post of wood

7 Placing his head against it, he bore the fierce and roaring current of the two rivers united together,—the current whose speed resembled that of the wind itself

8 Ganga and Yamuna, however, and the other rivers and lakes, whose waters unite together at the confluence at Preyaga, instead of afflicting the Rishi, went beyond him.

9 Assuming the attitude of a wooden post, the great Muni sometimes laid himself down in the water and slept at ease. And sometimes, O chief of Bharata's race, the intelligent sage stood erect.

10 He became quite agreeable to all creatures living in water Without the least fear, all these used to smell the Rishi's lips.

11. In this way, the Rishi passed a long time at that grand confluence of waters. One day, some fishermen came there.

12 With nets in their hands, O you of great effulgence, those men came where the Rishi was They were many in number and all of them were bent upon catching fish

13 Well formed and broad chested, gifted with great strength and courage, and never returning in fear from water, those men who lived upon the earning by their nets, came there, resolved to catch fish.

14. Arrived at that water which contained many fish, those fishermen, O chief of the Bharatas, tied all their nets together.

15 Desirous of fish, those innumerable Kaivartas, united together and surrounded a portion of the waters of Ganga and Yamuna with their nets

16 Indeed, they threw upon the water their net which was made of new strings, capable of covering a large space, and having sufficient length and breadth

17 Getting down into the water, all of them began to drag with great force that net which was very large and had been well spread over a large space.

18 All of them were free from fear, cheerful and fully determined to do one another's bidding They had succeeded in catching a large number of fish and other aquatic animals.

19 And as they dragged their net, O king, they easily dragged up Chyavana the son of Bhrigu, along with a large number of fish

20. His body was overgrown with the river moss His beard and matted locks had become green And all over his body could be seen conchs and other mollusca attached with their heads.

21 Seeing that Rishi who was a master of the Vedas dragged up by them from the water, all the fishermen stood with joined hands and then laid themselves low on the ground and repeatedly bent their heads

22 Through fear and pain caused by the dragging of the net, and on account of their being brought upon the land, the fishes caught in the net died.

23 Seeing that great onslaught of fishes, the ascetic became filled with compassion and sighed repeatedly.

The fishermen said:—

24 We have perpetrated this sin unwillingly Be pleased with us! What wish of yours shall we fulfill? Command us, O great ascetic.

Bhishma said:—

25 Thus addressed by them, Chyavana, from among that mass of fishes around him, said,—Do ye with rapt attention hear what my most cherished wish is

26. I shall either die with these fishes or do ye sell me with them I have lived with them for a long time within the water I do not wish to leave them at such a time!

27 When he said these words to them, the fishermen became greatly terrified With pale faces they went to king Nahusha and informed him of all that had occurred

CHAPTER LI.

(ANUSHASANIKA PARVA)—Continued.

Bhishma said:—

1. Hearing the strait into which Chyavana was reduced, King Nahusha speedily went there, accompanied by his ministers and priest.

2. Having purified himself duly, the king, with joined hands and rapt attention introduced himself to the great Chyavana

3. The king's priest then adored with due ceremonies that Rishi, O king, who was observant of the vow of truth and gifted with a great soul, and who resembled a god himself.

Nahusha said:—

4 Tell me; O best of twice-born ones what act shall we do that may be pleasing to you? However difficult that deed may be, there is nothing, O holy one, that I shall not be able to do at your command

Chyavana said:—

5 These men who live by catching fish, have all been exhausted with fatigue. Do you pay them the price that may be fixed upon me along with the value of these fish.

Nahusha said —

6. Let my priest give to these Nishadas a thousand coins as price for buying the sacred one as he himself has ordered.

Chyavana said:

7. A thousand coins is not my price. The question depends upon your discretion Give them a fair price, settling with your discretion Give them a fair price, settling with your own intelligence what it should be.

Nahusha said:—

8 Let, O learned Brahmana, a hundred thousand coins be given to these Nishadas. Shall this be your price, O holy one, or do you think otherwise.

Chyavana said:—

9 I should not be bought with a hundred thousand coins, O best of kings! Let a proper price be given to these! Do you consult with your ministers.

Nahusha said:—

10. Let my priest give to these Nishadas a crore of coins If even this does not cover your value, let more be paid to them.

Chyavana said:—

11 O king, I am not with a crore of coins or even more Let that price be given to these men which would be fair or proper Do you consult with the Brahmanas.

Nahusha said:—

12 Let half my kingdom or even the whole be given away to these Nishadas. I think that would be your price What, however, do you think O twice-born one?

Chyavana said:—

13. I do not deserve to be purchased with half your kingdom or even the whole of it, O king! Let that price which is proper be given to these men. Do you consult with the Rishis!

Bhishma continued:—

14 Hearing these words of the great Rishi, Nahusha became stricken with great sorrow. With his ministers and priest he began to think on the matter.

15 There then came to king Nahusha an ascetic living in the forest and subsisting upon fruit and roots and born of a cow.

16 That best of twice born persons, addressing the king, O monarch, said these words —I shall soon satisfy you The Rishi also will be satisfied.

17. I shall never speak a falsehood,—no, not even in jest what then need I say of other occasions? You should unhesitatingly do what I bid you.

Nahusha said :—

18 Do you, O illustrious one, say what the value is of that great Rishi of Bhrigu's race O, save me from this terrible difficulty, save my kingdom, and save my family.

19 If the holy Chyavana become angry, he can destroy the three worlds, what to say then of my poor self who is ignorant of penances and who depends only on the power only of his arms?

20 O great Rishi, do you become the raft to us who have all fallen into a fathomless deep with all our counsellors and our priest! Do you settle what the value should be of the Rishi!

Bhishma said —

21. Hearing these words of Nahusha, the ascetic born of a cow and gifted with great energy spoke thus, gladdening the monarch with all his counsellers :—

22 Brahmanas, O king, belong to the foremost of the four castes. No value, however great, can be fixed upon them. Kine also are invaluable. Therefore, O king, do you regard a cow as the value of the Rishi!

23 Hearing these words of the great Rishi Nahusha became, O king, filled with joy along with all his counsellers and priest.

24 Proceeding then to Bhrigu's son Chyavana of rigid vows, he addressed him thus, O monarch, for satisfying him to the best of his power.

Nahusha said :—

25 Rise, rise, O twice-born Rishi, you have been purchased, O son of Bhrigu, with a cow as your price! O foremost of righteous persons, even this, I think, is your price!

Chyavana said :—

26 Yes, O king of kings, I do rise up. I have been properly purchased by you, O sinless one I do not, O you of unfading glory, see any riches that is equal to kine.

27 To speak of kine to hear others speak of them, to make gifts of kine, and to see kine O king, are acts, that are all praised, O hero, and that are highly auspicious and purifying

28 Kine are always the root of prosperity. There is no fault in kine Kine always give the best food, in the form of Havi, to the deities

29 The sacred Mantras, Swaha and Vashat, are always established upon kine. Kine are the chief conductresses of Sacrifices. They form the mouth of Sacrifice.

30. They bear and yield excellent and strength-giving ambrosia. They receive the adoration of all the worlds and are considered as the source of nectar.

31. On Earth, kine resemble fire in energy and form, Indeed, kine represent high energy, and are conferrers of great happiness upon all creatures.

32. That country where kine placed by their owners, breathe fearlessly, shines in beauty. The sins also of that country are all removed.

33. Kine form the stairs leading to Heaven Kine are worshipped in Heaven itself Kine are goddesses that can give everything and grant every wish There is nothing else in the world that is so high or so superior.

Bhishma said :—

34 This is what I say to you on the subject of the glory and superiority of kine, O chief of Bharata's race I am competent to describe a part only of the merits of the kine. I have not the ability to exhaust the subject.

The Nishadas said :—

35. O ascetic, you have seen us and have also spoken with us, It has been said that friendship, with the good, depends upon only seven words. Do you then, O lord, show us your favour.

36. The blazing sacrificial fire eats all the oblations of clarified butter poured upon it. Of pious soul, and gifted with great energy, you are among men, a blazing fire in energy.

37. We propitiate you O you of great learning. We surrender ourselves to you. Do you, for showing us favor, take back from us this cow.

Chyavana said :—

38. The eye of a poor or distressed person, the eye of an ascetic, or the eye of a snake of dreadful poison, consume a man with his very roots even as a fire, that burning with the aid of the wind and consumes a stack of dry grass or straw.

39 I shall accept the cow that you wish to present me —Ye fishermen, freed from every sin, go ye to heaven forthwith, with these fishes also that ye have caught with your nets

Bishma said:—

40 After this, on account of the energy of that great Rishi of purified soul those fishermen along with all those fish, through virtue of those words that he had uttered, went to heaven.

41. Seeing the fishermen ascending to heaven with those fishes in their company, became filled with wonder, O chief of Bharata's race.

42. After this, the two Rishis, viz, the one born of a cow and the other who was Chyavana of Bhrigu's race, pleased king Nahusha by granting him many boons.

43 Then the highly energetic king Nahusha that lord of all the Earth, filled with joy, O best of the Bharatas, said,—Sufficient.

44. Like a second Indra the king of the celestials, he accepted the boon about his own steadiness in virtue The Rishis having granted him the boon, the delighted king adored them both with great respect.

45. As regards Chyavana, his vow having been completed, he returned to his own hermitage The Rishi who had taken his birth from the cow, and who was gifted with great energy, also proceeded to his own hermitage

46 The Nishadas all ascended to heaven as also the fishes they had caught, O king, king Nahusha too, having got those valuable boons, entered his own city.

47—48 I have thus, O son, told you everything about what you had asked me The affection that is caught by the sight alone of others as also by the fact of living with them, O Yudhishthira and the high blessedness of kine too, and the ascertainment of true virtue, are the subject I have described Tell me, O hero what else is in your mind.

CHAPTER LII.

(ANUSHASANIKA PARVA) —

Continued.

Yudhishthira said —

1 O you of great wisdom, I have a doubt which is very great and which is as vast as the ocean itself Listen to it O mighty-armed one, and having learnt what it is, you should explain it to me.

2 I have a great curiosity about Jamadagni's son, O lord, viz., Rama that foremost of all pious persons. You should satisfy that curiosity.

3 How was Rama born who was gifted with prowess incapable of being baffled? He belonged by birth to a family of twice-born Rishis How did he become a follower of Kshatriya practices?

4 Do you then O king, recite to me in full the circumstances of Rama's birth How also did a son of the race of Kushika who was Kshatriya become a Brahmana?

5 Great, indeed, was the power of the high souled Rama, O chief of men, as also of Vishwamitra.

6 Why did the grandson of Richika instead of his son become a Kshatriya? Why also did the grandson of Kushika and not his son become a Brahmana? Why did such untoward incidents befall the grandsons of both, instead of their sons? You should explain the truth of these circumstances.

Bhishma said —

7. Regarding it is cited an old history of the discourse between Chyavana and Kushika, O Bharata!

8 Gifted with great intelligence,—Chyavana of Bhrigu's race, that best of ascetics, saw (with his spiritual eye) the stain that would affect his own race.

9 Reflecting upon the merits and faults of that incident, as also its strength and weakness, Chyavana having asceticism for his wealth, became desirous of consuming the race of the Kushikas

10. Going that to the presence of king Kushika, Chyavana said to him —O sinless one, the desire has arisen in my heart of living with you for sometime.

Kushika said:—

11. O holy one, to live together is a deed which the learned ordain for girls when these are given away The wise always speak of the practice in such connection only.

12 O Rishi having asceticism for your wealth, the residence which you seek with me is not sanctioned by the ordinance Yet, however opposed to the dictates of duty and virtue, I shall do what you may be pleased to order.

Bhishma said —

13 Ordering a seat to be placed for the great ascetic Chyavana, king Kushika accompanied by his wife, stood before him.

14 Bringing a little jar of water, the king offered him water for washing his feet. He then, through his servants, caused all the rites to be duly performed in honor of his illustrious guest.

15 The illustrious Kushika, who was observant of restraints and vows, then cheerfully presented, in due forms the ingredients consisting of honey and the other things, to the great Rishi and asked him to accept the same.

16. Having welcomed and honored the learned Brahmana thus, the king once more addressed him and said,—We two await your orders! Command us what we are to do for you, O holy one.

17. If it is our kingdom or riches or kine, O you of rigid vows, or all articles that are given away in sacrifices, which you want, tell us the word and we shall bestow all upon you

18. This palace, this kingdom, this seat of justice, are at your disposal You are the master of all these! Do you rule the Earth! As regards myself, I depend entirely upon you.

19. Addressed in these words by the king, Chyavana of Bhrigu's race, filled with great joy, said to Kushika these words in reply.

Chyavana said:—

20 I do not, O king, covet your kingdom, nor your riches nor the damsels you have nor your kine, nor your provinces nor articles needed for sacrifice! Do you listen to me.

21 If it pleases you and your wife, I shall begin to observe a certain vow I wish you and your consort to serve me during that period unhesitatingly

22 Thus addressed by the Rishi, the king and the queen became filled with delight, O Bharata, and answered him, saying,—Be it so, O Rishi.

23 Pleased with the Rishi's words, the king led him to an apartment of the palace. It was an excellent one, agreeable to see. The king showed him everything in that room

The king said:—

24 This, O holy one is your bed Do you live here as you please! O you having asceticism for your wealth, myself and my queen shall try our best to give you every comfort and every pleasure

25. While they were thus conversing with each other, the sun was over the meridian The Rishi ordered the king to bring him food and drink.

26 Bowing to the Rishi, King Kushika asked him, saying —What kind of food is liked by you? What food, indeed, shall be brought for you.

27. Filled with joy, the Rishi answered that king, O Bharata, saying,—Let food that is proper be given to me.

28 Receiving these words with respect, the king said,—So be it!—and then offered to the Rishi food of the proper kind.

29 Having finished his meals, the holy Chyavana, knowing every duty, addressed the king and the queen, saying,—I wish to sleep, O powerful one, sleep hinders me now.

30. Proceeding thence to a room that had been got ready for him that best of Rishis then laid himself down upon a bed. The king and the queen sat down.

31. The Rishi told them —Do not, while I sleep, awake me! Do ye keep yourself awake and continually press my feet as long as I sleep.

32—33 Kushika, conversant with every duty, unhesitatingly, said —So be it! Indeed, the king and the queen kept themselves awake all night, duly engaged in tending and serving the Rishi in the manner directed. The royal pair, O king, accomplished the Rishi's order with earnestness and attention.

34 Meanwhile the holy Brahmana, having thus commanded the king, slept soundly, without changing his posture or turning even once, for one and twenty days.

35 The king, O delighter of the Kurus, abstaining from food, along with his wife, sat joyfully the whole time, engaged in tending and serving the Rishi

36 On the expiration of one and twenty days, the son of Bhrigu rose of his own accord The great ascetic then went out of the room, without speaking to them at all

37 Famished and toil worn, the king and the queen followed him but that foremost of Rishis did not please to cast a single look upon any of them.

38 Proceeding a little way the son of Bhrigu disappeared in the very sight of the royal pair At this, the king, struck with grief, dropped down on the Earth.

39 Comforted, he rose up soon, and accompanied by his queen, the king possessed of great splendour, began to search everywhere for the Rishi.

CHAPTER LIII.

(ANUSHASANIKA PARVA).—Continued.

Yudhishthira said:—

1. After the Rishi had disappeared, what did the king do and what also his highly-blessed wife? Tell me this, O grandfather.

Bhishma said:—

2 Not seeing the Rishi, the king, stricken with shame, toil-worn, and losing his senses, returned to his palace, accompanied by his queen.

3. Entering his mansion in a dejected spirit, he spoke not a word with any one. He thought only of that conduct of Chyavana.

4. With a despairing heart he then went to his room There he beheld the son of Bhrigu stretched as before on his bed.

5 Seeing the Rishi there, they wondered much. Indeed, they began to think upon that very strange incident. The sight of the Rishi removed their fatigue.

6 Seated once more by his side, they again began to gently press his feet as before Meanwhile the great ascetic continued to sleep soundly as before. Only, he now lay on another side.

7. Gifted with great energy, he thus passed another twenty-one days Moved by fear, the royal pair showed no change in their attitude or sentiment towards the Rishi.

8. Awaking then from his sleep the ascetic addressed the king and the queen, saying,—Do ye rub my body with oil, I wish to have a bath.

9. Famishing and toil-worn though they were, forthwith they volunteered their services and soon approached the Rishi with a rich oil that had been prepared by boiling it a hundred times

10 While the Rishi was seated at his ease, the king and the queen, silently, continued to rub him Gifted with great ascetic merit the son of Bhrigu did not once utter the word Sufficient.

11. Bhrigu's son however saw that the royal pair were totally unmoved Rising up all on a sudden, he entered the bath room.

12—13 The various articles necessary for a bath and such as were fit for a king's use, were ready there. Without using, any of those articles, the Rishi once more disappeared there and then by his Yoga-power, before king Rushika (and his wife). This, however, O chief of Bharatas, failed to disturb the equanimity of the royal pair.

14. The next time the powerful Rishi was seen seated, after a bath, on the throne. It was from that place that he then showed himself to the king and the queen, O delighter of the Kurus.

15. With a cheerful face, king Kushika, together with his wife then offered the Rishi cooked food with great respect. Gifted with wisdom, and with heart totally unmoved, Kushika made this offer.

The Ascetic said:—

16 Let the food be brought. Assisted by his wife, the king soon brought there the food.

17. There were various kinds of meat and different preparations also thereof. There was a great variety of vegetables also and potherbs.

18 There were juicy cakes too among those dishes and several agreeable kinds of confectionery, and solid preparations of milk Indeed, the viands were different in kinds and taste. Among them there were also some food—forest produces—such as ascetics liked and took.

19 Various sweet fruits fit to be eaten by kings, were also there. There were Vadaras and Ingudas and Kashmaryyas and Bhallatakas

20. The food that was offered contained such things as are taken by house holders as also such things as are taken by the forest-dwellers. Through fear of the Rishi's curse, the king had caused all kinds of food to be gathered and got ready for his guest.

21—22. All this food, brought from the kitchen, was placed before Chyavana. A seat was also placed for him and a bed too was spread. The dishes were then caused to be covered with white cloths. Soon however, Chyavana of Bhrigu's race put fire to all the things and reduced them to ashes.

23 Gifted with great intelligence, the royal pair showed no anger at this conduct of the Rishi, who once more, after this, disappeared before the very eyes of the king and the queen.

24 The royal sage Rushika thereupon stood there in the same posture for the whole night, with his wife by his side, and without speaking a word Gifted with great prosperity, he did not yield to wrath.

25—26. Every day, good and pure food of various sorts, excellent beds, profuse articles needed for bath, and cloths of various sorts, were collected and kept ready in the palace for the Rishi. Indeed, Chyavana could not find any fault in the conduct of the king.

27. Then addressing king Kushika, the twice-born Rishi said to him,—Do you with your spouse, yoke yourself to a car and take me on it whereever I shall direct.

28. Unhesitatingly, the king answered Chyavana having asceticism for wealth, saying—So be it!—And he further enquired of the Rishi, asking,—Which car shall I bring? Shall it be my pleasure-car for making pleasure-journeys or, shall it be my war-chariot?

29—31. Thus addressed by the delighted and contented king, the ascetic said to him,—Do you promptly get ready that chariot with which you attack hostile cities! Indeed, that war-chariot of yours, with every weapon, with its standard and flags, its darts and javelins and golden columns and poles, should be made ready. Its rattle resembles the tinkling of bells. It is adorned with numberless arches made of pure gold. It is always furnished with hundreds of high and excellent weapons!—The king said,—So be it,—and soon made his great war-chariot ready.

32. And he yoked his wife thereto on the left and his own self on the right. And the king placed on the chariot, among its other articles, the goad which had three handles and which had a point hard as adamant and sharp as the needle.

33 Having placed every article upon the car, the king said to the Rishi,—O holy one, where shall the chariot proceed? O, let the son of Bhrigu issue his order.

34—35. Thus your chariot shall proceed to the place which you may be pleased to direct! Thus addressed, the holy man replied to the king, saying,—Let the car go hence, dragged slowly, step by step Obeying my will, do ye two proceed in such a way that I may not feel any exhaustion.

36 I should be borne away pleasantly, and let all your people see this march that I make through their midst. No person that comes to me, as I proceed along the road, should be driven away. I shall distribute riches among all.

37. To the Brahmanas who may approach me on the way, I shall grant their wishes and bestow upon all of them gems and riches without stint.

38—40. Let all this be done, O king, and do not entertain any scruples!—Hearing these words of the Rishi, the king called his servants and told them,—Ye should without any fear, give away whatever the ascetic will command —Then profuse jewels and gems and beautiful women, and pairs of sheep, and coined and uncoined gold, and huge elephants resembling hills or mountain summits, and all the ministers of the king, began to follow the Rishi as he was carried on that chariot.

41. Cries of Oh and Alas arose from every part of the city which was plunged in grief at that extraordinary spectacle. The Rishi struck the king and the queen suddenly with that goad having a sharp point.

42. Though thus struck on the back and the cheeks, the royal pair still showed no sign of agitation. On the other hand they continued to carry the Rishi on as before, 43 Trembling from head to foot, for no food had passed their lips for fifty nights, and exceedingly weak, the heroic pair somehow succeeded in dragging that excellent chariot.

44. Repeatedly and deeply cut by the goad, the royal pair became covered with blood. Indeed, O king, they then looked like a couple of Kinshuka trees in the flowering season.

45 Seeing the plight to which their king and queen had been reduced, the citizens became afflicted with great grief. Filled with fear of the curse of the Rishi, they kept silent under their misery.

46. Collected in masses they said to each other,—See the might of penances! Although all of us are angry, we are still unable to look at the Rishi.

47. Great is the energy of the holy Rishi of purified soul! See also the endurance of the king and his royal spouse.

48. Though exhausted with fatigue and hunger, they are still carrying the car!—The son of Bhrigu, despite the misery he caused to Kushika and his queen, could see no sign of dissatisfaction or agitation in them.

Bhishma said:—

49 The perpetuator of Bhrigu's race, seeing the king and the queen totally unmoved, began to distribute wealth very largely as if he were a second Lord of Treasures.

50. At this deed also, king Kushika showed no mark of dissatisfaction. He did as the Rishi ordered. Seeing all this, that illustrious and best of ascetics became pleased.

51. Descending from that excellent car, he unharnessed the royal pair. Having freed them, he addressed them and

52. Indeed, the son of Bhrigu, in a soft, deep, and delighted voice, said,—I am ready to give an excellent boon to you both.

53 Delicate as they were, their bodies had been pierced with the goad! Moved by affection, that best of ascetics softly touched them with his hands whose healing virtues resembled those of ambrosia itself, O chief of the Bharatas.

54. Then the king answered,—Myself and my wife have felt no exhaustion—Indeed, all their fatigue had been removed through the power of the Rishi, and hence it was that the king could say so to the Rishi.

55. Pleased with their conduct, the illustrious Chyavana said to them,—I have never before spoken falsehood. It must, therefore, be as I have said.

56 This spot on the banks of Ganga is very charming and auspicious. I shall, observing a vow, live for a little while here, O king.

57. Do you return to your city. You are exhausted! You shall come again. To-morrow O king, you shall returning with your wife, see me here.

58. You should not give to anger or grief. The time is come when you shall reap a great reward! That which is coveted by you and which is in your heart will indeed be done.

59 Thus addressed by the Rishi, king Kushika, with a pleased heart, replied to the Rishi in these pregnant words.

60. I have entertained no anger or grief, O highly blessed one! We have been cleansed and sanctified by you, O holy one! We have once more become youthful See our bodies have become greatly beautiful and possessed of great strength.

61. I do not any longer see those wounds that were caused by you on our bodies with your goad! Verily, with my wife, I am in good health.

62 I see my goddess become as beautiful in body as an Apsara. Indeed, she is endued with as much beauty and splendour as she had ever been before.

63 All this, O great ascetic, is due to your favour Indeed, there is nothing wonderful in all this, O holy Rishi of power ever unbaffled.

64 Thus addressed by the king, Chyavana said to him—You shall with your wife, return here to morrow, O king.

65 With these words, the royal sage Kushika was sent away Saluting the Rishi, the king, endued with a handsome body, returned to his capital like a second king of the celestials.

66 The counsellers then, with the priest, came out to welcome him His troops also and the dancing women and all his subjects, did the same.

67 Surrounded by them all, king Kushika, shining in beauty and splendour, entered his city, with a delighted heart, and his praises were sung by bards and encomiasts.

68. Having entered his city and performed all his morning rites, he ate with his wife. Gifted with great splendour, the king then passed the night happily.

69 Each saw the other to be possessed of fresh youthfulness All their sufferings and pains having ceased, they saw each other to resemble a celestial. Gifted with the splendour they had got as a boon from that foremost of Brahmanas, and possessed of exceedingly lovely features and beautiful forms, both of them passed a happy night in their bed.

70 In the interval spreader of the feats of Bhrigu's race, viz., the Rishi having penances for his wealth, converted by his Yoga power, that charming wood on the bank of Ganga into a retreat full of wealth of every kind and adorned with every variety of jewels and gems on account of which it excelled in beauty and splendour the very abode of the king of the celestials.

CHAPTER LIV.

(ANUSHASANIKA PARVA)—Continued.

Bhishma said:—

1. When that night passed away, the great king Kushika awoke and performed his morning rites. Accompanid by his wife he then went towards that forest which the Rishi had selected for his residence.

2 Arrived there, the king saw a palatial mansion made entirely of gold Having a thousand columns each of which was made of gems and precious stones it looked like a manston belonging to the Gandharvas.

3—4 Kushika saw in every part of that building signs of celestial design. And he saw hills with charming valleys, and lakes with lotuses on their bosom, and mansions full of rich and curious articles, and gateways and arches, O Bharata And the king beheld many open glades nd open spots carpeted with grass, and esembling fields of gold.

5 And he saw many Sahakaras adorned with blossoms, and Ketakas and Uddalakas, and Dhavas, and Ashokas, and blossoming Kundas, and Atimuktas

6 And he saw there many Champakas and Tilakas and Bhavyas and Panasas and Vyanjulas and Karnikaras adorned with flowers.

7 And the king saw many Shyamas and Varanapushpas and the creepers called Asfapadika, all clipt properly and beautifully.

8. And the king saw trees on which lotuses of various species bloomed in all their beauty, and some of which bore flowers of every season And he saw also many mansions that looked like celestial cars or like beautiful mountains.

9—10 And at some places, O Bharata there were tanks and lakes full of cool water and at others were those that were full of warm or hot water. And there were various kinds of excellent seats and costly beds and bedsteads made of gold and gems and overlaid with beautiful cloths and carpets There were profuse viands and edibles, all well dressed and ready for use.

11—12 —And there were talking parrots, she-parrots Bhringarajas, Kokilas Shatapatras with Koyashtikas and Kukkubhas, and peacocks and cocks and Datyuhas and Jivajivakas and Chakoras and monkeys and swans and Sarasas and Chakravakas

13 Here and there he saw bevies of rejoicing Apsaras and conclaves of happy Gandharvas, O monarch.

14. And he saw other Gandharvas at other places rejoicing with their dear wives The king sometimes saw these sights and sometimes could not see them.

15. The king heard also sweet notes of vocal music and the sweet voices of preceptors engaged in lecturing their disciples on the Vedas and the Scriptures. And the king also heard the harmonious notes of the geese sporting in the lakes

16 Seeing such highly wonderful spectacles, the king began to reflect inwardly, saying,—Is this a dream? Or, is all this due to an alienation of my mind? Or is it all real?

17. O, I have, without renouncing my body, attained to the beatitude of Heaven It is land is either the sacred country of the Uttara-Kurus, or the abode called Amravati, of the king of the celestials.

18. O what are these wonderful spectacles that I see!—Reflecting thus, the king at last saw that foremost of Rishis.

19 In that golden palace having columns made of jewels and gems the son of Bhrigu lay stretched on a costly and excellent bed.

20. With his wife by his side, the king approached, with an exulting heart, the Rishi as he lay on that bed. Chyavana, however, speedily disappeared at this, with the bed itself upon which he lay.

21 The king then saw the Rishi at another part of that forest, seated on a mat made of Kusha grass, and mentally engaged in the recital of some high Mantras

22 Through his Yoga-power, thus did that Brahmana stupefy the king In a moment that charming forest, those bevies of Apsaras, those bands of Gandharvas, those beautiful trees all disappeared.

23 The bank of Ganga became as silent as usual, and appeared as before covered with Kusha grass and anthills.

24 Having seen that highly wonderful spectacle and its quick disappearance also, king Kushika, with his wife, became filled with wonder.

25 With a delighted heart, the king addressed his wife saying, see, O amiable one, the various agreeable scenes and sights, occurring nowhere else, which we two have just seen.

26. All this is due to the favour of Bhrigu's son and the power of his penances. By penances one attains all which cherishes in his imagination.

27—28 Penances are superior to even the kingdom of the three worlds With penances well-performed, Liberation itself may be acquired, Mark, the power of the great and celestial Rishi Chyavana derived from his penances! He can, at his pleasure, create even other worlds.

29 Only Brahmanas are born in this world for uttering and understanding sacred deeds. Who else save Chyavana could do all this?

30. Sovereignty may be acquired easily. But the dignity of a Brahmana is not attainable It was through the power of a Brahmana that we were harnessed to a car like well-broken animals.

31. These thoughts that passed through the king's mind, became known to Chyavana Ascertaining the king's thoughts, the Rishi addressed him and said,—Come here quickly.

32. Thus addressed, the king and the queen approached the great ascetic, and bending their heads they adored him who were worthy of adoration.

33 Uttering a benediction upon the king, the Rishi, gifted with great intelligence, O king, comforted the king and said, —Sit down on that seat.

34—35 After this, O monarch, the son of Bhrigu, without guile or insincerity of any sort, pleased the king with many soft words, and then said,—O king, you have completely subjugated the five organs of action and the five organs of knowledge with the mind as their sixth. For this you have come out unhurt from the fiery ordeal I had prepared for you.

36. I have been properly honored and adored, O son, by you, O foremost of all persons gifted with speech. You have no sin, not even a minute one, in you.

37 Give me leave, O king, for I shall now proceed to the place I came from. I have been highly pleased with you, O king. Pray accept the boon I am ready to give!

Kushika said —

38. Before you, O holy one, I have staid like one staying in the midst of a fire. That I have not yet, O chief of Bhrigu's race, been reduced to ashes is sufficient.

39 Even this is the highest boon that I have got, O delighter of Bhrigu! That you have been pleased by me, O Brahmana, and that I have succeeded in rescuing my race from destruction, O sinless one, are in my case the best boons.

40 This I consider, O learned Brahmana, as a distinct mark of your favour The object of my life has been accomplished Even this is what I consider the very object of my sovereignty. This is the highest fruit of my penances 41 If, O learned Brahmana, you have been pleased with me, O delighter of Bhrigu, then do you remove some doubts which are in my mind.

CHAPTER LV.

(ANUSHASANA PARVA)—
Continued.

Chyavana said:—

1. Do you accept a boon from me Do you also O king, tell me what the doubt is that is in your mind. I shall certainly accomplish all your purposes.

Kushika said.—

2 If you have been pleased with me, O holy one, do you then, O son of Bhrigu, tell me your object in living in my palace for sometime, for I wish to hear it. What was your object in sleeping on the bed I assigned you for, one and twenty days continuously, without changing sides.

3 O foremost of ascetics, what also was your object, again in going out of the room without speaking a single word.

4. Why did you, again, without any reason, disappear and once more become visible? Why, O learned Brahmana, did you again lay yourself down on the bed, and sleep, as before, for one and twenty days.

5 Why did you go out after you were rubbed by us with oil for your bath? Why, also, after having made various kinds of food in my palace to be collected, did you consume them with fire?

6 What was the cause of your sudden journey through my city on the car? What was your object in giving away so much riches? What was your motive in showing us the wonders of the forest created by your Yoga-power.

7. What, indeed, was your motive in showing O great ascetic, so many palaces made of gold and so many bed-steads supported on posts of jewels and gems?

8 Why also did all these wonders disappear from our sight? I wish to hear the cause of all this Thinking of all these acts of yours, O perpetuater of Bhrigu's race, I became stupefied

9 I cannot comprehend your motive O you having penances for wealth, I wish to hear the truth about all those acts of yours in full.

Chyavana said:—

10 Listen to me as I tell you fully the reasons which had moved me in all these acts of mine Asked by you, O king, I cannot refuse to enlighten you

11. In days of yore, on one occasion when the deities had assembled together, the Grandfather Brahman said some words. I heard them O king and shall now repeat them to you.

12 On account of a quarrel between Brahmana and Kshatriya energy, there will occur an intermixture in my race — Your graudson, O king, will become endued with great energy and power.

13 Hearing this I came here resolved to exterminate your race. Indeed, I came,

O Kushika, seeking the utter extermination of your family, in fact, for reducing to ashes all your descendants.

14 Moved by this motive I came to your palace, O monarch, and said to you,—I shall observe some vow. Do you attend upon me and serve me dutifully.

15 While living, however, in your house I could not see any shortcomings in you it is for that reason, O royal sage, that you are still alive, for otherwise you would have by this been dead.

16 It was with this resolution that I slept for twenty-one days in the hope that somebody would awake me before I arose out of my own accord.

17. You, however, with your wife, did not awake me. Even then, O best of kings, I became delighted with you.

18. Rising from my bed I went out of the chamber without speaking to any of you I did this, O king, in the hope that you would ask me and thus I would have an opportunity of cursing you.

19 I then disappeared, and again showed myself in the room of your palace, and once more following Yoga slept for one and twenty days.

20. My motive was this. Exhausted with toil and hunger you two would be angry with me and do what would be unpleasant to me It was from this motive that I caused yourself and your wife to be afflicted with hunger.

21. In your heart, however, O king, the slightest feeling of anger or vexation did not rise For this, O king, I became higly pleased with you.

22. When I caused various kinds of food to be brought and then set fire to them, I hoped that yourself with your wife would yield to anger at the sight Even that act, however, of mine was tolerated by you.

23—24 I then ascended the car, O king, and addressed you, saying,—Do you with your wife bear me!—You did what I ordered, without the least scruple, O king! I became delighted at this. The gifts of riches I made could not excite your anger.

25. Pleased with you, O king, I created with the help of my Yoga-power that forest which yourself with your wife did see here. Listen, O king, to the object I had.

26. For pleasing you and your queen I made you to have a glimpse of Heaven, All those things which you have seen in these woods, O king, are a foretaste of Heaven.

27. O best of kings, for a little while I made you and your wife behold, in even your earthly bodies, some sights of Heaven.

28 All this was done for showing the power of penances and the reward that is in store for virtue The desire that arose in your heart, O monarch, at sight of those delightful objects, is known to me.

29 You became desirous of obtaining the dignity of a Brahmana and the merit of penances, O king, disregarding the sovereignty of the Earth, nay, the sovereignty of very Heaven.

30 You thought this O king The status of a Brahmana is highly difficult to get, having become a Brahmana, it is highly difficult to obtain the status of a Rishi, having become a Rishi it is difficult to become an ascetic.

31 I tell you that your desire will be fulfilled From you O Kushika, will originate a Brahmana who shall be called after your name. The person that will be the third in descent from you shall obtain the status of a Brahmana.

32. Through the energy of the Bhrigus, your grandson, O king, will be an ascetic gifted with the splendour of fire.

33 He shall always strike all men, indeed, the inhabitants of the three worlds, with fear. I tell you the truth.

34. O royal sage, do you accept the boon that is now in your mind I shall soon start for a sojourn to all the sacred waters Time is expiring.

Kushika said —

35 This, O great ascetic, is a high boon in my case, for you have been pleased with me! Let that take place which you have said! Let my grandson become a Brahmana, O sinless one

36 Indeed, let the dignity of Brahmanahood attach to my family, O holy one! This is the boon I pray for! I wish to once more ask you in full, O holy one.

37 In what way O delighter of Bhrigu, will the dignity of Brahmanahood attach to my family? Who will be my friend? Who will have my affection and respect?

CHAPTER LVI.

Chyavana said —

1. I should certainly, O king, tell you everything about the circumstance for which, O monarch, I came hither for exterminating your race.

2. This is well-known, O king, that the Kshatriyas should always have the help of the sons of Bhrigu in the matter of sacrifices. Through an irresistible decree of destiny, the Kshatriyas and the Bhargavas will quarrel.

3 The Kshatriyas, O king, will kill all the descendants of Bhrigu. By an ordinance of fate, they will root out the race of Bhrigu, not sparing even infants in their mothers' wombs.

4 There will then be born in Bhrigu's race a Rishi of the name of Urva. Gifted with great energy, he will in splendour certainly resemble fire or the sun.

5 He will cherish such anger as will be sufficient to consume the three worlds. He will be competent to reduce the whole Earth with all her mountains and forests into ashes.

6. For a little while he will put out the flames of that fiery rage, throwing it into the Mare's mouth that wanders through the ocean.

7—9 He will have a son of the name of Richika. The whole science of arms, O sinless one, in its embodied form, will come to him, for the extermination of the entire Kshatriya caste, through a decree of Destiny. Receiving that science by inward light, he will, by Yoga power, communicate it to his son the highly blessed Jamadagni of purified soul. That foremost of Bhrigu's race will bear that science in his mind.

10 O you of righteous soul! Jamadagni will marry a girl, taking her from your race, for spreading its glory, O chief of the Bharatas!

11 Having obtained for wife the daughter of Gadhi and your grand daughter, O king, that great ascetic will beget a twice-born son gifted with Kshatriya accomplishments.

12 In your race will be born a son, a Kshatriya gifted with the virtues of a Brahmana. Possessed of great virtue, he will be the son of Gadhi. Known by the name of Vishwamitra, he will in energy come to be considered as the equal of Vrihaspati himself, the preceptor of the celestials.

13 The illustrious Richika will grant this son to your race, this Kshatriya who will be endued with high penances. Two women will be the cause in the matter of this exchange of sons.

14 All this will take place at the command of the Grandfather. It will never be otherwise. The status of Brahmanahood will attach to one who is third in descent from you. You shall become a relative of the Bhargavas!

Bhishma said:—

15 Hearing these words of the great ascetic Chyavana, king Kushika became filled with joy, and answered as follow:—

16—17 Indeed, O best of the Bharatas, he said:—So be it!—Gifted with high energy, Chyavana once more addressed the king, and urged him to accept a boon from himself. The king replied,—Very well. From you, O great ascetic, I shall obtain the fruition of my wish.

18—19—20 Let my family become invested with the dignity of Brahmanahood, and let it always set its heart upon virtue!—The ascetic Chyavana, thus solicited, granted the king's prayer, and bidding farewell to the king, started on his intended sojourn to the sacred waters. I have now told you everything, O Bharata, relating to your questions, viz, how the Bhrigus and the Kushikas became connected with each other by marriage. Indeed, O king, everything took place as the Rishi Chyavana had said. The birth of Rama (of Bhrigu's race) and of Vishwamitra (of Kushika's race) happened in the way that Chyavana had said.

CHAPTER LVII.

(ANUSHASANIKA PARVA)—Continued.

Yudhishthira said:—

1 I am stupefied, O grandfather, to hear your words! Thinking that the Earth is now destitute of a very large number of kings all of whom were gifted with great prosperity, my heart becomes filled with grief.

2 Having conquered the Earth and acquired hundreds of kingdoms, O Bharata, I turn with grief, O grandfather, at the thought of the millions of men I have killed.

3. Alas, what will the condition be of those foremost ladies who have been deprived by us of husbands and sons and maternal uncles and brothers?

4 Having killed those Kurus—our kinsmen, that is and our friends and well-wishers—we shall have to sink in hell with heads hanging downwards. There is no doubt of this.

5 I wish, O Bharata, to afflict my body with severe penances With that end in view, O king, I wish to receive instructions from you.

Vaishampayana said :—

6 The great Bhishma, hearing these words of Yudhishthira, reflected upon them acutely with the help of his understanding, and addressed Yudhishthira in reply.

Bhishma said :—

7. Hear what I say to you It is highly wonderful and is a great mystery The subject is the ends that creatures acquire after death as the rewards of particular acts or courses of conduct they follow.

8. One goes to Heaven by penances. By penances one acquires fame By penances, O mighty king, one lives long and gets all articles of enjoyment.

9. By penances one acquires knowledge, science health and freedom from disease, beauty of person, prosperity, and blessedness, O chief of Bharata's race.

10 By penances one acquires riches. By observing the vow of silence one succeeds in bringing the whole world under His sway By making gifts one gets all kinds of enjoyable articles By observing the rite of Diksha one acquires birth in a good and high family.

11. Those who spend their lives living upon only fruits and roots succeed in acquiring kingdom and sovereignty. Those who live upon the leaves of plants and trees as their food succeed in going to Heaven.

12. One who live upon water only attains to Heaven. By making gifts one simply increases his wealth By serving with reverence his preceptor, one acquires learning. By performing Shrad has every day in honor of his Departed Manes, one acquires a large number of children.

13. By observing Diksha upon potherbs and vegetables, one acquires a large number of kine Those who live upon grass and straw succeed in going to Heaven By bathing three every day with the necessary rites, one acquires a large number of wives. By drinking the air alone, one acquires residence in the regions of Prajapati

14 The Brahmana who bathes every day and recites sacred Mantras in the two twilights becomes possessed of the position of Daksha himself By adoring the deities in a forest or desert, one acquires a kingdom or sovereignty, and by observing the vow of relinquishing the body by a long fast, one goes to the celestial region.

15 One having penances for wealth and always passing his days in Yoga obtains good beds and seats and vehicles. Renouncing the body by entering a burning fire, one becomes an object of respect in the region of Brahman

16 Those who lie on the hard and bare ground acquire houses and beds Those who clothe themselves in rags and barks get good dresses and ornaments.

17 By avoiding the several agreeable tastes one succeeds in winning great prosperity. By abstaining from meat and fish, one gets long-lived children.

18 One who passes sometime in Udavasa, mode of life, becomes the very lord of the celestial region. The man who speaks the truth, O best of men, succeeds in sporting happily with the celestials themselves.

19 By making gifts one acquires great fame on account of his high achievements. By abstention from cruelty, one acquires health and freedom from disease By serving the Brahmanas with respect, one acquires kingdom and sovereignty, and the high position of a Brahmana

20. By making gifts of water and other drinks, one acquires eternal fame on account of high achievements. By making gifts of food, one acquires various articles of enjoyment.

21. One who gives peace to all creatures, (by refraining to do them any injury), becomes freed from every region. By serving the gods, one obtains a kingdom and celestial beauty.

22 By presenting lights at places which are dark and frequented by men, one acquires a good eye-sight By giving away good and beautiful objects, one acquires a good memory and understanding.

23 By distributing scents and garlands, one acquires far-reaching fame Those who abstain from shaving off their hair and beards, get excellent children.

24 By observing fasts and initiation and baths, O Bharata, for twelve years one acquires a region which is superior to that attainable by unreturning heroes

25 By conferring one's daughter on an eligible bridegroom according to the Brahma form, one gets, O best of men male and female slaves and ornaments and fields and houses.

26 By celebrating sacrifices and observing fasts one goes to the celestial region, O Bharata. The man who gives away fruits and flowers succeeds in gaining sacred knowledge.

27. The man who gives away a thousand kine with horns bedecked with gold, succeeds in acquiring Heaven. This has been declard by the very deities in a celestial assemblage.

28 One who gives away a Kapila cow with her calf, with a brazen pot for milking, with horns bedecked with gold, and possessed of various other accomplishments, obtains the fruition of all his desires from that cow.

29 Such a person, on account of that act of gift, lives in the celestial region for as many years as there are hairs on the body of the cow and rescues in the next world his sons and grandsons and all his family to the seventh degree.

30 That man gets to the regions of the Vasus who gives away a cow with horns beautifully decorated with gold, accompanied with a brazen jar for milking, along with a piece of cloth embroidered with gold, a measure of sesame and a sum of money as gift.

31. A gift of kine rescues the giver in in the next world when he finds himself falling into the deep darkness of hell and fettered by his own deeds in this world, like a boat with sails that have caught the air rescuing a person drowning in the ocean.

32. He who confers a daughter according to the Brahma form upon an eligible person, or who makes a gift of land to a Brahmana, or who gives food according to due rites, succeeds in attaining to the region of Indra.

33. That man who presents a house, furnished with every sort of furniture to a Brahmana given to Vedic studies and endued with every accomplishment and good behaviour, lives in the country of the Uttara-Kurus.

34. By making gifts of draft bullocks, a person acquires the region of the Vasus Gift of gold secures Heaven Gift of pure gold yields greater merit still.

35 By making gift of an umbrella, one acquires a palatial residence By making gift of a pair of sandals or shoes, one acquires good cars. The reward of cloths, is personal beauty, and by making gifts of scents, one gets a fragrant body in next life.

36 One who gives flowers and fruits and plants and trees to a Brahmana, acquires, without any toil, a palatial residence containing beautiful women and plenty of riches.

37. The giver of food and drink of different tastes and other articles of enjoyment succeeds in acquiring profuse supply of such articles. The giver, again, of houses and cloths get articles of a similar nature. There is no doubt in this.

38. That person who makes gifts of garlands and incense and scents and unguents and the articles needed by men after a bath, and garlands to Brahmanas, becomes freed from every disease and, possessed of personal beauty, sports in joy in the region reserved for great kings.

39 That man, O king, who presents to a Brahmana a house that is stored with grain, furnished with beds, full of riches, auspicious, and delightful, acquires a palatial residence.

40 He who gives to a Brahmana a good bed perfumed with fragrant scents, covered with an excellent sheet, and pillows, gets without any effort on his part a beautiful wife, belonging to a respectable family and of agreeable manners.

41. The man who takes to a hero's bed on the field of battle becomes the equal of the Grandfather Brahman himself. There is no end that is higher than this. Even this is what the great Rishis have said.

Vaishampayana said:—

42. Hearing these words of his grandfather, Yudhishthira, the delighter of the Kurus, became anxious to get the end reserved for heroes and no longer expressed any disgust for leading a domestic mode of life.

43. Then, O foremost of men, Yudhishthira, addressing all the other sons of Pandu, said to them—Let the words which our grandfather has said, command your faith.'

44 Thus, all the Pandavas with the famous Draupadi amongst them, highly spoke of the words of Yudhishthira and said 'yes.'

CHAPTER LVIII.

(ANUSHASANIKA PARVA)—Continued.

Yudhishthira said:—

1. I wish, O Bharata, chief to hear from you what the rewards are, O best of the Kurus, of the planting of trees and the digging of tanks.

Bhishma said —

2. A piece of land on a best sight, fertile, situate in the midst of charming adorned with various kinds of metals and inhabited by all sorts of creatures, is considered as the foremost of spots.

3 A particular portion of such land should be chosen for digging a tank. I shall tell you, in due order, the different kinds of tanks I shall also tell you what the merits also are of the digging of tanks

4 The man who causes a tank to be dug becomes entitled to the respect and adoration of the three worlds.

5. A tank full of water is as agreeable and beneficial as the house of a friend It is gratifying to the Sun himself It also helps the growth of the celestials It is the foremost of all things that lead to fame.

6—7 The wise have said that the excavation of a tank brings on Virtue, Profit and Pleasure A tank is said to be properly excavated, if it is made on a piece of land that is inhabited by respectable persons A tank is said to be necessary for all the four purposes of living creatures. Tanks again, are considered as forming the excellent beauty of a country.

8 The celestials, human beings, Gandharvas, Departed Manes Uragas, Rakshasas, and even immobile beings, all resort to a tank full of water as their refuge.

9 I shall, therefore, recite to you the merits attached to tanks as described by great Rishis, and the rewards in store for persons who cause them to be excavated.

10 The wise have said that that man acquires the merit of an Agnihotra sacrifice in whose tank water is held in the season of rains

11. The high reward in the world that is reaped by the person who makes a gift of a thousand kine is acquired by that man in whose tank water is held in the season of autumn.

12. That person in whose tank water lies in the cold season acquires the merit of the wight who performs a sacrifice with profuse gifts of gold

13 That person in whose tank water lies in the season of dew, acquires the wise have said, the merits of an Agnishtoma sacrifice

14 That man in whose well-made tank water lies in the season of spring acquires the merit of the Atiratra sacrifice.

15 That man in whose tank water lies in the season of summer wins, the Rishi say, the merits of a horse srifice.

16 That man rescues his whole race in whose tank kine are seen to satisfy their thirst and from which pious men draw their water.

17 That man in whose tank kine satisfy their thirst as also other animals and birds, and human beings, gains the merits of a horse sacrifice.

18 Whatever quantity of water is drunk from one's tank and whatever quantity is taken therefrom by others for purposes of bathing all become stored for the benefit of the excavater of the tank and he enjoys the same eternally in the next world

19 Water, especially in the other world, is difficult to get, O son. A gift of drink yields eternal happiness

20. Make gifts of sesame here Make gifts of water Do you also give lamps. While alive and awake, do you sport happily with kinsmen. These are acts which you shall not be able to achieve in the other world.

21. The gift of drink, O chief of men, is superior to every other gift In point of merit, it is superior to all other gifts Therefore, do you make gifts of water.

22 Thus have the Rishis described the high merits of the excavation of tanks I shall now describe to you the planting of trees.

23. Of immobile objects, six classes have been spoken They are Vrikshas, Gulmas, Latas, Vallis, Twaksaras, and Trinas of diverse kinds.

24 These are the several kinds of vegetables. Listen now to the merit of their planting By planting trees one acquires fame in the world of men and auspicious rewards in the next world.

25 Such a man is applauded and respected in the world of the Departed Manes. Such a man's name does not die even when he goes to live in the world of celestials.

26. The man who plants trees rescues the ancestors and descendants of both his paternal and maternal lines Do you, therefore, plant trees, O Yudhishthira.

27. The trees that a man plants become the planter's children There is no doubt in this Departing from this world, such a man goes to the celestial region. Indeed, he enjoys many eternal regions of bliss.

28. Trees please the deities by their flowers, the Departed Manes by their fruits; and all guests and strangers by the shadow they afford.

29. Kinnaras, Uragas, Rakshasas, deities Gandharvas, and human beings, as also Rishis, all resort to trees as their refuge.

30 Trees that bear flowers and fruits please all men. The planter of trees is saved in the next world by the trees he plants like children saving their own father.

31. Therefore, the man who is desirous of achieving his own good, should plant trees by the side of tanks and rear them like his own children. The trees which a man plants are, according to both reason and the scriptures, the children of the planter.

33 That Brahmana who excavates a tank, and he who plants trees, and he who performs sacrifices, are all adored in the celestial region as men who are devoted to truthfulness of speech

33 Hence, one should cause tanks to be excavated and trees to be planted, adore the deities in diverse sacrifices, and speak the truth.

CHAPTER LIX.

(ANUSHASANIKA PARVA).—

Continued.

Yudhishthira said:—

1. Amongst all those gifts mentioned in the work other than the Vedas, which gift, O chief of Kuru's race, is the most superior, in your opinion?

2. O powerful one, great is my curiosity in this matter. Do you describe to me that gift which follows the giver to the next world?

Bhishma said:—

3—4 An assurance to all creatures of love and affection and abstention from every sort of injury, acts of kindness and favor done to a person in distress, gifts of articles made to one who solicits with thirst and agreeable to the solicitor's wishes, and whatever gifts are made without the giver's ever thinking of them as gifts made by him, form, O chief of Bharata's race, the highest and best of gifts

5. Gift of gold, gift of kine, and gift of earth,—these are considered as sin-cleansing They rescue the giver from his evil deeds.

6. O king, do you always make such gifts to the righteous Forsooth, gifts rescue the giver from all his sins.

7. That person who wishes to make his gifts eternal, should always give to persons gifted with necessary qualifications whatever articles are desired by all and whatever things are the best in his house.

8 The man who makes gifts of agreeable things and who does to others what is agreeable to others always succeeds in getting things that are agreeable to himself Such a person certainly becomes agreeable to all, both here and hereafter.

9. That man, O Yudhishthira, is a cruel wight who through vanity, does not, to the extent of his means, attend to the wishes of the poor and helpless who solicit assistance.

10. He is, indeed the foremost of men who shows favour to even an helpless enemy fallen into distress when such enemy comes and prays for help.

11 No man is equal to him who satisfies the hunger of a person who is emaciated, possessed of learning, destitute of the means of support, and weakened by misery.

12 One should always, O son of Kunti, remove by ever means in his power, the distress of the pious observant of vows and acts, who, though having no sons and wives and plunged into misery, do not yet solicit others for any kind of help

13—14 Those persons who do not utter blessings upon the deities and men, who are worthy of respect and always contented, and who live upon such alms as they get without begging, are considered as veritable snakes of virulent poison. Do you, O Bharata always protect yourself from them by making gifts to them. They are capable to make the foremost of Ritwijas. You are to find them out by means of your spies and agents.

15. You should honor those men by gifts of good houses furnished with every necessary article, with slaves and servants, with good dresses and vestments, O son of Kuru, and with all articles bringing on pleasure and happiness.

16 Righteous men of righteous deeds should make such gifts, moved by the desire that it is their duty to act in that way and not from desire of reaping any rewards therefrom Indeed, good men should act in this way so that the virtuous men described above might not, O Yudhishthira, feel any disinclination to accept those gifts sanctified by devotion and faith.

17. There are persons bathed in learning and bathed in vows Without depending upon anybody they get their means of living. These Brahmanas of rigid vows are given to Vedic study and penances without proclaiming their practices to any one

18 Whatever gifts you may make to those persons of pure conduct, of thorough mastery over their senses, and always contented with their own married wives, are sure to acquire for you a merit that will accompany you in all the worlds into which you may go.

19 One reaps the same merit by making gifts to twice-born persons of controlled souls which one acquires by properly pouring libations to the sacred fire morning and evening

20. This is the sacrifice spread out for you,—a sacrifice that is sanctified by devotion and faith and that is accompanied with Dakshina! It is superior to all other sacrifices Let that sacrifice ceaselessly flow from you as you give away.

21. Performed in view of such men, O Yudhishthira, a sacrifice in which the water that is sprinkled for dedicating gifts forms the oblations * in honor of the Departed Manes, and devotion and worship rendered to such superior men, serves to free one of the debts he owes to the deities

22 Those persons who do not give way to anger and who never desire to take even a blade of grass belonging to others, as also they who are of sweet speech, deserve to receive from us the most respectful adorations.

23 Such persons and others never pay their regards to the giver. Nor do they try for obtaining gifts. They should, however, be maintained by givers as they maintain their own sons. I bend my head to them. From them also proceeds fearlessness.

24 Ritwijas, Priests and Preceptors, when well-read in the Vedas and, when behaving mildly towards disciples, become such Forsooth, Kshatriya energy loses its force upon a Brahmana when it meets him.

25 Thinking that you are a king, that you are gifted with great power, and that you have riches do, not, O Yudhishthira, enjoy your affluence without giving anything to the Brahmanas.

26. Observing the duties of your own caste, do you adore the Brahmanas with whatever riches you have, O sinless one, for purposes of adornment or sustaining your power.

27. Let the Brahmanas live in whatever way they like You should always bend your head to them with respect. Let them always rejoice in you as your children, living happily and according to their wishes.

28. Who else save you, O best of the Kurus, can provide the means of livelihood for such Brahmanas as are gifted with eternal contentment, as are your well-wishers, and as are pleased with only a little?

29 As women have one eternal duty, in this world, viz, dependence upon, and the obedient service of, their husbands, and as such duty forms their only end, so is the service of Brahmanas our eternal duty and end

30—31. If on seeing cruelties and other sinful deeds in Kshatriyas, the Brahmanas, O son, unhonored by us, leave us all, I say, of what use would life be to us, in the absence of all contact with the Brahmanas, especially as we shall then have to carry on our existence without being able to study the Vedas, to celebrate sacrifices, to hope for worlds of bliss hereafter, and to perform great deeds?

32. I shall, about it, tell you what the eternal practice is. Formerly, O king, the Kshatriyas used to serve the Brahmanas.

33. The Vaishya likewise used in those days to adore the Kshatriya, and the Shudra to adore the Vaishya. This is what is heard. The Brahmana was like a burning fire. Without being able to touch him or approach his presence, the Shudra used to serve the Brahmana from a distance.

34 It was only the Kshatriya and the Vaishya who could serve the Brahmana by touching his body or approaching his presence. The Brahmanas are gifted with a mild disposition. They are truthful in conduct. They are followers of the true religion.

35 When angry, they are like snakes of dreadful poison. Such being their nature, do you, O Yudhishthira, serve and attend them with obedience and respect. The Brahmanas are superior to those who are higher than the high and the low.

36. The energy and penances of those Kshatriyas who blaze forth with energy and power, become powerless and neutralised when they come in contact with the Brahmanas.

37. My father himself is not dearer to me than the Brahmanas. My mother is not dearer to me than they. My grandfather, O king, is not dearer, my own life is not dearer, O king, to me than the Brahmanas.

38. On Earth there is nothing, O Yudhisthira, that is dearer to me than you. But, O chief of Bharata's race, the Brahmanas are dearer to me than even you.

39. I tell you truly, O son of Pandu! I swear by this truth, by which I hope to acquire all those blissful regions that have been Shantanu's,

40. I see those sacred regions with Brahma shining conspicuously before them I shall go there, O son, and live in them eternally.

41. Seeing these regions O best of the Bharatas, I am filled with joy at the thought of all these acts which I have done in aid and honor of the Brahmanas, O king.

CHAPTER LX.

(ANUSHASANIKA PARVA).—Continued.

Yudhishthira said:—

1. To which of two Brahmanas, when both happen to be equally pure in conduct, equally gifted with learning and purity, of birth and blood, but differing from each other in only this, viz, the one solicits and the other does not,—I ask, O grandfather, would a gift be more meritorious?

Bhishma said —

2 It has been said, O son of Pritha, that a gift made to an unsoliciting person yields greater merit than one made to a person who begs One endued with contentment is certainly more deserving than that person who is shorn of that virtue and is, therefore, helpless amidst the storms and buffets of the world.

3 The firmness of a Kshatriya consists in the protection he gives to others The firmness of a Brahmana consists in his refusal to beg The Brahmana endued with steadiness and learning and contentment gladdens the celestials.

4. The wise have said that an act of begging on the part of a poor man is a great reproach Those persons who solicit others are said to annoy the world like thieves and robbers

5. The person who solicits is said to meet with death. The giver, however, is said not to meet with death The giver is said to give life to him who solicits. By an act of gift, O Yudhishthira, the giver is said to rescue his own self also.

6 Mercy is a very high virtue Led by mercy people make gifts to those who solicit. Those, however, who do not beg but are sunk into poverty and distress, should be respectfully invited for receiving help.

7. If such Brahmanas, who must be considered as the foremost of their order, live in your kingdom, you should consider them as fire covered with ashes.

8 Burning with penances, they are capable of consuming the whole Earth. Such persons O son of Kuru's race though not generally adored, should still be considered as worthy of adoration in every way.

9 Gifted with knowledge and spiritual vision and penances and Yoga, such persons always deserve our adoration. O scorcher of enemies, do you always offer adoration to such Brahmanas.

10. One should go of his own accord to those foremost of Brahmanas who do not solicit any body and make gifts to them of various kinds of wealth in abundance The merit that comes from properly pouring libations on the sacred fire every morning and evening, is acquired by the person who makes gifts to a Brahmana endowed with learning, with the Vedas, and with high and excellent vows.

11—12. You should, O son of Kunti, invite those foremost of Brahmanas, who are cleansed by learning and the Vedas and vows, who live in independence, whose Vedic studies and penances are concealed without being announced from the house top, and who observe excellent vows, and honor them with gifts of well-built and charming houses containing servitors and robes and furniture, and all other articles of pleasure and enjoyment.

13 Knowing all duties and possessed of minute vision those foremost of Brahmanas O Yudhishthira, may accept the gifts offered to them with devotion and respect, thinking that they should not refuse and disappoint the giver.

14. You should invite those Brahmanas whose wives wait for their return like tillers in expectation of rain. Having fed them well, you should present additional food to them so that upon their return home their expectant wives might be able to distribute that food among their children who had clamoured for food but who had been consoled with promises

15 Brahmacharins of controlled senses, O son, by eating at one's house in the forenoon cause the three sacrificial fires to be pleased with the householder at whose house they eat.

16 Let the sacrifice of gift proceed in your house at midday, O son, and do you also distribute kine and gold and dresses. By acting thus, you are sure to please the king of the celestials himself.

17. That would constitute your third sacrifice, O Yudhishthira, in which offerings are made to the deities, the Departed

Manes and the Brahmanas By such sacrifice you are sure to please the Vishwedevas.

18 Let mercy to all creatures, giving to all creatures what is due to them controlling the senses, renunciation, firmness, and truth, form the final bath of that sacrifice which is formed by gift.

19 This is the sacrifice that is spread out for you —a sacrifice which is sanctified by devotion and faith, and who has a large sacrificial gift attached to it This sacrifice which is formed by gift is superior to all other sacrifices O son, let this sacrifice be always celebrated by you.

CHAPTER LXI.

(ANUSHASANIKA PARVA) — Continued.

Yudhishthira said :—

1—2 I wish to know fully, O Bharata, where one gets the high rewards of gifts and sacrifices Are those rewards acquired here or hereafter? Which amongst these two (viz, Gift and Sacrifice) yields superior merit? To whom should gifts be made? In what manner are gifts and sacrifices to be made? When also are they to be made? I ask you this, O learned sire? Do you discourse to me on the duty of gifts!

3 Do you tell me, O grandfather, what brings on the highest reward, viz, gifts made from the sacrificial platform or those made out of that place?

Bhishma said —

4 O son, a Kshatriya is generally engaged in deeds of fierceness. In his case, sacrifices and gifts, are considered as cleansing or sanctifying him.

5 The good and righteous, do not accept the gifts of persons of the royal order, who perpetrate sinful deeds Therefore, the king should celebrate sacrifices with profuse gifts in the form of Dakshina.

6 If the good and righteous would accept the gifts made to them, the Kshatriya, O king should continually make gifts with devotion and faith to them Gifts yield great merit, and are highly cleansing.

7 Observing vows, one should celebrate sacrifices and please with wealth, such Brahmanas as are friends of all creatures, endued with righteousness, conversant of the Vedas, and pre eminent for acts, conduct and penances.

8 If such Brahmanas do not accept your gifts, no merit will become yours. Do you celebrate sacrifices with profuse Dakshina, and make gifts of good and agreeable food to the righteous

9 By making an act of gift you should consider yourself as performing a sacrifice. You should, with gifts, worship those Brahmanas who perform sacrifices By doing this you will acquire a share in the merits of those sacrifices of theirs.

10. You should support such Brahmanas as have children and as are capable of sending people to heaven. By acting thus, you are sure to get a large progeny,—in fact, as large a progeny as the Parjapati himself.

11. The righteous support and advance the cause of virtue One should by giving up his all, support such men as also those who do good to all creatures

12 Yourself being rich, do you, O Yudhishthira, make gifts to Brahmanas of kine and bullocks and food and umbrellas and robes and sandles or shoes

13 Do you give to sacrificing Brahmanas clarified butter as also food and cars and vehicles with horses harnessed thereto, and dwelling houses and mansions and beds.

14 Such gifts yield prosperity and affluence to the giver, and are considered as pure, O Bharata Those Brahmanas who are not censurable for anything they do and who have no means of support assigned to them, should be found out

15 Coverily or publicly, do you maintain such Brahmanas by giving to them the means of support Such conduct always gives higher benefit to Kshatriyas than the Rajasuya and the Horse Sacrifices

16 Purged off of sin, you are sure of attaining to Heaven Filling your treasury, you should do good to your kingdom.

17. By such conduct you are sure to acquire immense riches and become a Brahman (in your next life) Do you, O Bharata, protect your own means as also the means of other people's livelihood.

18 Do you support your servants as your own children Do you, O Bharata, protect the Brahmanas in the enjoyment of what they have and make gifts to them of such articles as they have not

19 Let your life be devoted to the Brahmanas Let it never be said that you do not grant protection to the Brahmanas. Much wealth, when possessed by a Brahmana, becomes a source of evil to him

20 Constant association with riches and prosperity is sure to fill him with pride and cause him to be stupefied If the Brahmanas become stupefied and steeped in folly virtue and duties are sure to suffer destruction Forsooth if virtue and duty come to an end, it will lead to the destruction of all creatures

21 That king who having amassed riches makes it over to his treasury officers and guards, and then begins to again plunder his kingdom, saying to his officers, —Do ye bring me as much riches as you can extort from the kingdom.

22 And who spends the riches that is thus collected at his behest under circumstances of fear and cruelty, in the performance of sacrifices, should know that those sacrifices of his, are never highly spoken of by the pious.

23 The king should celebrate sacrifices with such money as is willingly paid to his treasury by prosperous and unpersecuted subjects Sacrifices should never be celebrated with money got with severity and extortion

24 The king should then celebrate great sacrifices with large presents in the shape of Dakshina when on account of his being devoted to the behoof of his subjects the latter bathe him with copious showers of riches brought willingly by them for the purpose.

25 The king should protect the riches of those that are old, of those that are minors, of those that are blind, and of those that are otherwise disqualified The king should never take any money from his people, if they, in a season of drought, succeed in growing any corn with the help of water obtained from wells Nor should he take any wealth from weeping women.

26 The riches taken from the poor and the helpless is sure to destroy the kingdom and the prosperity of the king The king should always present to the righteous all enjoyable articles in abundance He should certainly remove the fear of famishing which those men may have

27 There are no men more sinful than those upon whose food children look wistfully without being able to eat them duly.

28. If within your kingdom any learned Brahmana dies with hunger like any of those children, you shall then incur the sin of foeticide for having allowed such an act.

29 King Shivi himself had said thus, viz,—Fie on that king in whose kingdom a Brahmana or even any other man starves

30 That kingdom in which a Brahmana of the Snataka class starves, becomes overwhelmed with adversity Such a kingdom with its king also incurs reproach.

31. That king is more dead than alive in whose kingdom women are easily abducted from their husbands and sons uttering cries and groans of indignation and grief.

32 The subjects should arm themselves for killing that king who does not protect them, who simply plunders their riches, who confounds all distinctions, who is incapable of taking their lead who is without mercy, and who is considered as the most sinful of kings.

33 That king who tells his people that he is their protector but who does not or is unable to protect them, should be killed by his subjects in a body like a dog that is affected with the rabies and has become mad.

34 A fourth part of whatever sins are committed by the subjects visits that king who does not protect, O Bharata.

35 Some authorities say that the whole of those sins visits such a king Others are of opinion that a half thereof visits him. Bearing in mind however, the saying of Manu, it is our opinion that a fourth part of such sins visits the unprotecting king

36 That king, O Bharata, who affords protection to his subjects gets fourth part of whatever merits his subjects win by living under his protection.

37 Do you, O Yudhishthira, act in such a way that all your subjects may seek refuge with you as long as you are alive, as all creatures seek the refuge of the god of rain or as the birds seek the refuge of a large tree.

38 Let all your kinsmen and all your friends and well wishers, O scorcher of enemies seek refuge with you as the Rakshasas seek Kuvera or the gods seek Indra as theirs.

CHAPTER LXII.

(ANUSHASANIKA PARVA)—

Continued.

Yudhishthira said:—

1. People accept with respect the sayings of the Shrutis which say —This is to be given —This other thing is to be given!— As regards kings again they make gifts of various things to various men. What, however, O grandfather, is the best or foremost of all gifts?

Bhishma said:—

2. Of all kinds of gifts the gift of earth is said to be the first. Earth is immovable and indestructible. It is capable of giving to him who possesses it all the best things upon which he may like to have.

3. It gives dresses and vestments, jewels and gems, animals, paddy, and barley. Amongst all creatures, the giver of earth grows rich for ever and ever.

4. As long as the earth lasts, so long does the giver thereof grow rich. There is no gift that is higher, O Yudhishthira, than the gift of earth.

5. We have heard that all men have given a little quantity of earth. All men have made gifts of earth, hence all men enjoy a little of earth.

6. Whether in this or in the next world, all creatures live subject to their own deeds. Earth is Prosperity's self. She is a powerful goddess. She makes him her lord who makes gifts of her in this life to other people.

7. That person, O best of kings, who gives away earth, which is indestructible as gift is born in next life as a man and becomes also a lord of Earth.

8. The quantity of one's enjoyment in this life is equal to one's gifts in a pristine life. This is the conclusion pointed out by the scriptures. For a Kshatriya should either give away the Earth in gift or renounce his life in battle.

9. This is the highest source of prosperity to Kshatriyas. We have heard that earth when given away, cleanses and sanctifies the giver.

10. The man who is of sinful conduct who is guilty of Brahmanicide and of falsehood, is purified by a gift of earth. Indeed such a gift rescues even such a sinner from all his sins.

11. The virtuous accept gifts of earth only and no other thing from sinful kings. Like one's mother, earth when given away, purifies the giver and the taker.

12. This is an eternal and secret name of earth, viz., Priyadatta. Given away or accepted in gift, the name that is dear to her is Priyadatta.

13. The gift of earth is desirable. That king who makes a gift of earth to a learned Brahmana, gets from that gift a kingdom.

14. Upon being born again in this world, such a man, forsooth, attains to a position equal to that of a king. Hence, a king, as soon as he gets earth, should make gifts of earth to the Brahmanas.

15. None but a lord of Earth can make gifts of earth. Nor should one who is not a worthy person accept a gift of earth.

16. They who desire earth should act thus. That person who takes away earth belonging to a pious person never gets any earth.

17. By making gifts of earth to the righteous one gets good earth. Of virtuous soul, such a giver acquires great fame both in this world and in the next.

18. That pious king about whom the Brahmanas say—We live on earth given to us by him,—is such that his very enemies cannot utter the least reproach about his kingdom.

19. Whatever sins a man commits from want of the means of livelihood are all washed off by gift of only so much earth as is covered by a cow hide.

20. Those kings who are mean in their acts or are of fierce deeds should be taught that gift of earth is highly purifying and is at the same time the highest gift.

21. The ancients thought that there is always very little difference between the man who celebrates a Horse Sacrifice and him who makes a gift of earth to one who is righteous.

22. The learned doubt the acquisition of merit which all other pious acts yield. The only act about which they are dead certain, is the gift of earth which, indeed is the foremost of all gifts.

23. The wise man who makes gifts of earth, gives away all these viz. gold, silver cloth, gems and pearls and precious stones.

24. Penances sacrifice, Vedic learning, good conduct, absence of cupidity, firmness in truth, adoration of elders preceptors, and the deities, all these live in him who makes a gift of earth.

25. They who ascend to the region of Brahman by renouncing their lives in battle after having fought without any consideration for themselves for securing the behoof of their masters,—even they are unable to go above the merit of those who make gifts of earth.

26. As the mother always nourishes her own child with milk from her breast, so does earth please with all the tastes the person that makes a gift of earth.

27. Mrityu, Vaikinkara, Danda, Tama, Fire, who is highly fierce, and all heinous and terrible sins are incapable of touching the person who makes a gift of earth

28 That man of tranquil soul who makes a gift of earth pleases (by that act) the Departed Manes living in their region and the deities also hailing from the region that is theirs

29 The man who makes a gift of earth to one who is weak and cheerless and destitute of the means of life and famishing with weakness, and who thereby supplies one with the means of sustenance, deserves the honor and merit of celebrating a sacrifice.

30 As an affectionate cow runs towards her half, with full udders dropping milk similarly the highly blessed Earth, runs towards the person who makes a gift of earth

31 That man who makes to a Brahmana a gift of earth which has been tilled, or sown with seeds or which contains standing crops, or a palace well furnished with every necessary article, succeeds in becoming the accomplisher of the wishes of everybody.

32 The man who makes a Brahmana having the means of life, possessing a domestic fire and of pure vows and practices, accept a gift of earth, never falls into any danger or distress.

33 As the moon increases day by day, so the merit of a gift of earth increases every time such earth produces crops

34 Those persons conversant with ancient history sing this verse regarding the gift of earth Hearing that verse Jamadagni's son (Rama) gave away the whole Earth to Kashyapa

35 The verse to which I refer is this — Receive me in gift Give me away By giving me away you (O giver) will obtain me again! That which is given away in this life is re-acquired in the next

36 That Brahmana who recites this great saying of the Vedas at the time of a Shraddha get the highest reward

37 A gift of earth is a great expiation for the sin of those powerful men who perform Atharvan rites for injuring others Indeed by making a gift of earth one rescues ten generations of his paternal and maternal families

38 That person who knows this Vedic saying about the merits of a gift of earth succeeds in rescuing ten generations of both his paternal and maternal families Earth is the original source of all creatures. It has been said that the god of fire is the presiding genius of earth.

39 After the coronation ceremony has been performed of a king, this Vedic saying should be recited to him, so that he may make gifts of earth and may never take away earth from a pious person.

40 Forsooth, the entire wealth owned by the king belongs to the Brahmanas A king knowing well the science of duty and morality is the first requisite of the kingdom's prosperity.

41. Those people whose king is unrighteous and atheistic in conduct and belief, can never be happy Such people can never sleep or wake in peace.

42—43 On account of his deeds of wickedness his subjects become always filled with anxiety. Protection of what the subjects already have and new acquisitions by fair means are events that are not seen in the kingdom of such a king Those people again, who have a wise and righteous king, sleep happily and wake up in happiness.

44 By the Blessed and righteous act of such a king his subjects become short of anxiety The subjects, restrained from wicked deeds grow in prosperity through their own conduct Capable of keeping what they have, they go on making new acquisitions

45 That king who makes gifts of earth is considered as well born He is considered as a man He is a friend He is righteous in his acts He is a giver. He is considered as possessing prowess.

46 Those men who make gifts of ample and fertile earth to Brahmanas known to the Vedas, always shine in the world, on account of their energy, like so many suns

47 As seeds scattered on the soil grow and yield a goodly crop, so all one's wishes become successful on account of his making gifts of earth

48 The Sun, Varuna, Vishnu, Brahma the Moon the Fire-God and the illustrious and trident-bearing Mahadeva all praise the man who makes a gift of earth.

49 Living creatures originate from Earth and it is to the Earth that they return when they disappear. Living creatures which are divided into four classes have Earth for their primordial essence

50 The Earth is both the mother and father of the universe of creatures O king there is no element, O king, that can compare with Earth.

51 About it is cited the old discourse between the celestial preceptor Vrihaspati and Indra the king of Heaven, O Yudhishthira.

52 Having worshipped Vishnu in hundred sacrifices each of which w famous for plentiful gifts, Maghavat put this question to Vrihaspati, that foremost of all orators.

Maghavat said —

53 O illustrious one, by what gift does one succeed in coming to the celestial region and acquiring beatitude? O foremost of speakers, do you tell me of that gift which yields high and eternal merit.

Bhishma said :—

54 Thus addressed by the king of the celestials, the preceptor of the gods, viz, Vrihaspati of great energy, said these words in reply to him of a hundred sacrifices.

Vrihaspati said :—

55 Gift of gold, gift of kine, and gift of earth,—by these, O destroyer of Vritra, one becomes cleansed, O you of great wisdom, of all sins

56 There is no gift, O king of the celestials higher than the gift of earth, O powerful one. I consider this gift as the most superior, according to what has been declared by the wise.

57 Those heroes who, fearless of battle, give their lives in battles with enemies come to Heaven. How high soever their end, none of them can get over the giver of earth.

58. Those men who, disregarding their bodies, give their lives in battle while working for the behoof of their masters, ascend to the region of Brahman himself. But even they are unable to get over the giver of earth.

59 By making a gift of earth one rescues these eleven, viz, five generations of ancestors and six generations of descendants.

60. That person, O Purandara who makes a gift of earth rich with jewels and gems becomes purged off of all his sins and is highly respected in the celestial region.

61. If a person, O king makes a gift of rich and fertile earth that is capable of granting every wish he succeeds in attaining to the position of a king of kings (in his next life) A gift of earth, therefore, is the foremost of all gifts.

62 That person, O Vasava, who makes a gift of earth capable of satisfying every wish with fruition is considered as making a gift of every object in the world

63 That man who gives away a cow endued with every accomplishment and granting the fruition of every desire, succeeds, O you of a thousand eyes, in attaining the celestial region.

64 The giver of earth, O king of the celestials, is pleased when he comes to Heaven, by hundreds of rivers which run honey and ghee and milk and curds

65 A king, by making gifts of earth, is purged off of all his sins There is no gift therefore, which is superior to the gift of earth

66 That king who gives away the Earth bounded by the ocean, after having conquered it with the help of his weapons, is talked of by all men and his memory lasts as long as the mountains last on the surface of Earth.

67. Gifted as he is with the merits that belong to the gift of earth, the region of happiness reserved for the person who makes gift of such earth as is auspicious and rich with every taste, never becomes exhausted.

68 That king, O Shakra, who wishes to have prosperity and who wishes to acquire happiness for himself, should always make gifts of earth, with due rites, to worthy persons.

69 If after committing numerous sins *a person makes gifts of earth to the twice-*born class, he leaves off all those sins like a snake casting off its slough

70 The person who makes a gift of earth is said to make gifts of everything, that is, of seas and rivers and mountains and forests.

71. By making a gift of earth, the person is said to give away lakes and tanks and wells and rivers On account of the moisture of earth, one is said to give away articles of various tastes by making a gift of earth.

72 The man who makes a gift of earth is considered as giving away herbs and plants possessed of high and efficacious virtues, trees adorned with flowers and fruit, charming forests, and hillocks.

73 The merit which a person acquires by making a gift of earth is incapable of being acquired by the performance of even such great sacrifices as the Agnishtoma and others with profuse gifts in the shape of Dakshina.

74 The giver of earth, it has been already said rescues ten generations of both his paternal and maternal families. Likewise, by taking away earth that was given away, one sinks himself into hell and casts ten generations of both one's paternal and maternal lines into the same place of misery

75. That man who having promised to make a gift of earth does not actually make it, or who having made a gift resumes it, has to pass a long time, in great misery on account of being tied with the noose of Varuna at the command of Death.

76 Those men have never to go to Yama who honor and adore those foremost of Brahmanas who pour libations every day on their domestic fire, who are always engaged in the performance of sacrifices, who have scanty means of livelihood, and who receive with hospitality every guest seeking shelter in their houses

77. The king, O Purandara, should free himself from the debt he owes to the Brahmanas and protect the helpless and the weak of the other castes.

78. The king should never resume, O chief of the gods, earth that has been given away by another to a Brahmana, O king, of the celestials, who is destitute of the means of life.

79. The tears that would drop from the eyes of such cheerless and destitute Brahmanas on account of their lands being resumed, are capable of destroying the ancestors and descendants to the third generation of the resumer.

80. That man who re-instates a king driven away from his kingdom, gets residence in Heaven and is much honored by the denizens thereof.

81—82 That king who succeeds in making gifts of earth with such crops standing thereon as sugarcane or barley or wheat, or with kine and horses and other draft cattle —earth that has been acquired with the might of the giver's arms,—that has mineral in its bowels and that is covered with every kind of wealth on the surface, acquires unending regions of happiness in the next world, and such a king it is that is said to celebrate the earth-sacrifice!

83 That king who makes a gift of earth is purged off of every sin and, and therefore, is pure and liked by the righteous In this world he is highly honored and praised by all righteous men

84 The merit of a gift of earth increases every time the earth given away bears crops for the benefit of the owner, as a drop of oil, falling upon water, is seen to extend on every side, and cover the watery surface.

85 Those heroic kings and ornaments of assemblies who give their lives in battle with faces towards the foe, attain, O Shakra, to the region of Brahman.

86 Beautiful ladies skilled in music and dancing and adorned with garlands of flowers, approach, O king of the deities, the giver of earth as he comes to Heaven departing from the Earth.

87 That king who makes gifts of earth with due rites to persons of the twice-born order, sports in bliss in the celestial regions, worshipped all the while by the celestials and Gandharvas.

88 One hundred Apsaras, adorned with celestial garlands, approach, O king of the deities, the giver of earth as he ascends to the region of Brahman.

89 Sweet-scented flowers, an excellent conch and excellent seat, an umbrella and excellent horses with good vehicles, are always ready for the person who makes gifts of earth.

90 By making gifts of earth a king can always command fragrant flowers and heaps of gold. Having all kinds of wealth, the commands of such a king can never be disobeyed anywhere, and cries of victory welcome him whereever he may go.

91. The rewards of the gifts of earth consist of residence in the celestial region, O Purandara, and gold and flowers, and plants and herbs of medicinal virtue, and Kusha and mineral wealth and verdant grass. A person by making a gift of earth wins in his next life nectar-giving earth.

92 There is no gift equal to a gift of earth. There is none worthy of greater respect than the mother. There is no duty higher than truth. There is no riches more valuable than that which is given away.

Bhishma said —

93 Hearing these words from the son of Angiras, Vasava made a gift to him of the whole Earth with all her jewels and gems and all her riches.

94 If these verses describing the merit of the gifts of earth be recited on the occasion of a Shraddha, neither Rakshasas nor Asuras can succeed in getting any share of the offerings made in it.

95. Forsooth, the offerings one makes to the departed manes at such a Shraddha become unending. Hence, on occasions of Shraddhas, the learned man should recite these verses on the subject of the merits of the gifts of earth, in the presence and hearing of the invited Brahmanas when engaged in eating.

96. I have thus, O chief of the Bharatas, described to you that gift which is the foremost of all gifts. What else do you wish to hear?

CHAPTER LXIII.

(ANUSHASANA PARVA)—Continued.

Yudhishthira said:—

1. When a king wishes to make gifts in this world, what, indeed, are those gifts which he should make, O best of the Bharatas, to such Brahmanas as are endued with superior accomplishments? What gift is that by which the Brahmanas become readily pleased? What fruits do they give in return? O you of powerful arms, tell me what is the high reward which can be won through the merit of gifts

3 What gifts, O king, yield rewards both in this world and in the next? I wish to hear all this from you. Do you describe to me all this in detail.

Bhishma said:—

4. These very questions were formerly put by me to Narada. Hear me as I recite to you what that celestial sage had told me in reply.

Narada said:—

5. The celestials and all the Rishis speak highly of food. The course of the world and the intellectual faculties have all been fixed on food.

6. There has never been, nor will be, any gift equal to the gift of food. Hence, men always wish particularly to make gifts of food

7. In this world, food is the root of energy and strength. The vital airs are established on food. It is food that keeps up the wide universe, O powerful one

8 All classes of men, house holders and mendicants and ascetics, live upon food The vital airs depend upon food. There is no doubt in this.

9 Afflicting one's relatives, one, if desirous of his own prosperity, should make gifts of food to a great Brahmana or a person of the mendicant order.

10. That man who makes a gift of food to an accomplished Brahmana who begs the same, secures for himself in the next world wealth of great value.

11. The house-holder who seeks his own prosperity should receive with respect a deserving old man who is worn out with toil while proceeding on his way far from home when such a man comes to the house-holder's house

12. That man who, shorn of irrepressible anger and becoming righteous in nature and freed from malice, makes gifts of food, is sure to acquire happiness, O king, both in this world and in the next.

13 The house-holder should never disregard the man who comes to his place, nor should he insult him by sending him away. A gift of food made to even a Chandala or a dog is never lost.

14 That man who makes a gift of clean food to a person on the way who is fatigued and unknown to the giver, is sure to win great merit.

15 The man who pleases with gifts of food the departed manes, the deities, the Rishis, the Brahmanas, and guests arrived at his house, wins great merit.

16 That person who having committed even a heinous crime makes a gift of food to one who solicits, or to a Brahmana in special, is never stupefied by that heinous sin.

17. A gift of food made to a Brahmana becomes eternal. One made to a Shudra yields great merit. This is the difference between the merits of the gifts of food made to Brahmanas and Shudras.

18. Solicited by a Brahmana, one should not enquire about his family or conduct or Vedic learning. Asked for food, one should give food to him who asks.

19 There is no doubt in this, O king, that he who makes gifts of food gets both in this world and in the next many trees giving food and every other object of desire.

20 Like cultivators expecting auspicious showers of rain, the departed manes always expect that their sons and grandsons would present food to them.

21. The Brahmana is a great being. When he comes into one's house and solicits, saying,—Give me!—the owner of the house, whether actuated or not by the desire of gaining merit, is sure to win great merit by listening to that prayer

22–23 The Brahmana is the guest of all creatures in the universe He is entitled to the first part of every food That house increases in prosperity to which the Brahmanas go from desire of getting alms and from which they return honored on account of their desires being satisfied. The owner of such a house is born in his next life in a family O Bharata, that has all the comforts and luxuries of life.

24. A man, by making gifts of food in this world, is sure to acquire an excellent place hereafter. He who makes gifts of sweetmeats and all food that is sweet, gains a residence in heaven where he is honored of all the deities and other denizens.

25. Food forms the life-breaths of men Everything rests upon food. He who makes gifts of food gets many animals, many children, profuse riches (in other shape), and all articles of comfort and luxury in profusion.

26 The giver of food is said to be the giver of life Indeed he is said to be the giver of everything Hence, O king, such a man acquires both strength and personal grace in this world.

27. If food be given duly to a Brahmana come to one's house as a guest, the giver acquires great happiness, and is adored by the very celestials.

28 The Brahmana, O Yudhishthira, is a great Being. He is also a fertile field Whatever seed is sown on that field yields an abundant crop of merit

29 A gift of food readily yields the happiness of both the giver and the receiver. All other gifts produce unseen fruits.

30 From food originate creatures From food springs happiness and joy, O Bharata, Know that virtue and worldly profit both spring from food The cure of disease or health also comes from food.

31. In a former Æon, the Lord of all creatures said that food is ambrosia or the source of immortality. Food is Earth, Food is Heaven, Food is the Sky. Everything rests on Food.

32. In the absence of food, the five elements that form the body cease to exist in a state of unision From want of food the strength of even the strongest man is seen to fail.

33 Invitation and marriages and sacrifices all cease for want of food The very Vedas disappear when there is no food

34. All the mobile and immobile creatures of the universe depend on food Virtue and worldly profit, in the three worlds depend on food Hence the wise should make gifts of food

35 The strength, energy, fame and achievements of the man who makes gifts of food, always multiply themselves in the three worlds, O king.

36. The deity of wind, places above the clouds (the water drawn by the Sun) The water thus taken to the clouds is caused by Shakra to be poured upon the Earth, O Bharata

37. The Sun, by means of His rays draws up the moisture of the Earth. The god of wind causes the moisture to fall down from the Sun.

38 When the water comes down from the clouds upon the Earth, the goddess Earth become moist, O Bharata.

39 Then do people sow various kinds of crops upon whose outturn the universe of creatures depends It is from the food thus produced that the flesh, fat, bones and vital seed of all beings originate.

40 From the vital seed thus made, O king, spring various kinds of living creatures Agni and Soma, living within the body, create and maintain the vital seed

41. Thus from food, the Sun and the god of wind and the vital seed spring and act. All these are said to form one element or quantity, and it is from these that all creatures originate 42 That man who gives unto one who comes to his house and begs it, is said, O chief of the Bharatas, to contribute both life and energy to living creatures.

Bhishma said:—

43 Thus addressed by Narada, O king, I have always made gifts of food. Do you also, therefore, freed from malice and with a cheerful heart, make gifts of food.

44 By making gifts of food, O king, worthy Brahmanas with due rites, you may be sure, O powerful one, of attaining to Heaven.

45 Hear me, O king, as I tell you what the regions are reserved for those who make gifts of food. The mansions of those great persons shine with resplendence in the regions of Heaven.

46 Bright as the stars in the sky, and supported upon many columns, white as the disc of the moon, and adorned with many tinkling bells, and rosy like the newly risen sun, those palaces are either fixed or movable.

47 Those mansions are filled with hundreds and hundreds of things and animals that live on land and as many things and animals living in water Some of them are effulgent like lapis lazuli and some are resplendent like the sun. Some of them are made of silver and some of gold.

48 Within those mansions are many trees capable of satisfying every desire of the inmates Many tanks and roads and halls and wells and lakes are all there

49 Thousands of vehicles with horses and other animals harnessed thereto and with wheels whose clatter is always loud, are all there. Mountains of food and all enjoyable articles and heaps of cloths and ornaments are also there.

50 Numerous rivers that run milk, and hills of rice and other edibles, are also there. Indeed, many palatial residences looking like white clouds, with many beds of golden splendour, are in those regions.

51 All these are won by those men who make gifts of food in this world Do you therefore, become a giver of food Indeed, these are the regions reserved for those great and righteous persons who make gifts of food in this world For these reasons, men should always make gifts of food in this world.

CHAPTER LXIV.

(ANUSHASANIKA PARVA) — Continued,

Yudhishthira said —

1 I have heard your discourse about the ordinances for the gift of food Do you describe to me now about the conjunctions of the planets and the stars in relation to the subject of making gifts.

Bhishma said.—

2 Regarding it is recited this ancient discourse between Devaki and Narada, that foremost of Rishis

3 Once on a time when Narada of god-like features and knowing every duty arrived at Dwaraka, Devaki asked him this question.

4 The celestial Rishi Narada replied to her question in the following words Do you hear as I recite them.

Narada said :—

5 By pleasing, O blessed lady, worthy Brahmanas with pudding mixed with ghee, under the constellation Krittika, one acquires regions of great happiness

6 Under the constellation Rohini, one should, for freeing himself from the debt he owes to the Brahmanas, make gifts to them of many handfuls of vension along with rice and clarified butter and milk, and other kinds of edibles and drinks

7 One giving away a cow with a calf under the constellation called Somadaivata (or Mrigashiras), proceeds from this human region to a region in Heaven of great felicity.

8. One undergoing a fast and giving away Krishara mixed with sesame, gets over all difficulties in the next world, including those mountains with rocks sharp as razors.

9 By making gifts, O beautiful lady, of cakes and other food under the constellation Punarvasu, one gets personal beauty and great fame and takes birth in his next life in a family in which there is profuse food.

10 Making a gift of wrought or unwrought gold, under the constellation Pushya, one shines like the Moon himself in regions of surrounding darkness

11. He who makes a gift, under the constellation Ashlesha, of silver or a bull, becomes freed from every fear and acquires riches and prosperity.

12 By making a gift, under the constellation Megha, of earthen dishes filled with sesame, one gets children and animals in this world and acquires happiness in the next.

13 By making gifts, while fasting, to Brahmanas, under the constellation called Purva-Phalguni, of food mixed with Phanita, the reward is great prosperity both here and hereafter.

14 By making a gift, under the constellation called Uttara-Phalguni, of clarified butter and milk with rice called Shashthika, one wins great honors in Heaven.

15 Whatever gifts are made by men under the constellation of Uttara Phalguni yield great merit, which, again, becomes unending. This is very certain.

16 Observing a fast, the person who makes, under the constellation Hasta, a a gift of a car with four elephants, acquires regions of great happiness that are capable of granting the fruition of every wish.

17 By making a gift, under the constellation Chittra, of a bull and of good perfumes, one sports in bliss in regions of Apsaras like the deities sporting in the garden of Nandana.

18 By making gifts of riches under the constellation Swati, one acquires such excellent regions as one desires and wins, besides great fame.

19—20. By making gifts, under the constellation Vishakha, of a bull, and a cow giving profuse milk, a cart full of paddy, with a Prasanga for covering the same, and also cloths for wear, a person pleases the departed manes and the deities and acquires external merit in the other world. Such a person never meets with any calamity and certainly reaches Heaven.

21. By making gifts the Brahmanas of whatever articles they want, one acquires such means of subsistence as he wishes, and becomes rescued from Hell and every calamity that befall sinners after death.

This is the certain conclusion of the scriptures.

22 By making gifts, under the constellation Anuradha, of embroidered cloth and other dresses and of food, observing a fast all the while, one becomes honored in Heaven for a hundred cycles

23 By making a gift under the constellation Jyeshtha, of the potherb called Kalashaka with the roots, one acquires great prosperity as also such an end as is desirable.

24 By making to Brahmanas a gift under the constellation Mula, of fruits and roots, with a controlled soul, one pleases the departed manes and attains to a desirable end.

25—26 By making, under the constellation Purvashada a gift, to a Brahmana knowing the Vedas and of good family and conduct, of cups filled with curds, while observing a fast, one is born in his next life in a family having abundant kine. One secures the fruition of every desire, by making gifts, under the constellation Uttarashda, of jugs full of barley-water, with clarified butter and juice of sugar-cane in abundance

27 By making a gift, under the conjunction called Abhijit, of milk with honey and ghee unto men of wisdom, a righteous person attains to Heaven and becomes an object of adoration and honor there.

28 By making, under the conjunction Shravana a gift of blankets or other cloth of thick texture, one passes freely through every region of happiness, riding on a white car of pure resplendence.

29 By making with a controlled soul under the constellation Dhanishtha a gift of a car with bulls yoked thereto, or masses of cloths and riches, one at once acquires Heaven in his next life

30 By making gifts, under the constellation Shatabhisha, of perfumes with Aquilaria Agallocha and sandal wood, one acquires in the next world the companionship of Apsaras as also eternal perfumes of various sorts

31. By making gifts, under the constellation Purva Bhadrapada, of Rajamasha, one acquires great happiness in next life and comes by a profuse supply of every kind of food and fruits

32 One who makes, under the constellation Uttara, a gift of mutton, pleases the departed manes by such an act and acquires unending merit in the next world.,

33 If one makes a gift, under the constellation Revati, of a cow with a vessel of white copper for milking her, the cow so given away approaches him in the next world, ready to grant the fruition of every desire.

34 By making a gift, under the constellation Ashwini, of a car with horses yoked thereto, one is born in his next life in a family possessing abundant elephants and horses and cars and becomes gifted with great energy.

35 By making, under the constellation Bharani, a gift to the Brahmanas of kine and sesame, one attains in his next life great fame and abundant kine.

Bhishma said :—

36 Thus did Narada describe to Devaki the subject of what gifts should be made under what constellations Devaki herself, having heard this account related it in her turn to her daughters in law.

CHAPTER LXV.

(ANUSHASANIKA PARVA)—Continued.

Bhishma said —

1. The illustrious Atri, the son of the Grandfather Brahman, said,—They who make gifts of gold are said to make gifts of every thing in the world.

2 King Harishchandra said that the gift of gold washes off sins, leads to long life, and yields inexhaustible merit to the departed manes

3 Manu has said that a gift of drink is the best of all gifts therefore should a man cause wells and tanks and lakes to be excavated

4 A well full of water and from which various creatures draw water, is said to take off half the sinful deeds of the person who has excavated it.

5 The entire family of a person is rescued from hell and sin in whose well or tank or lake kine and Brahmanas and pious people constantly satisfy their thirst.

6 That man gets over every sort of calamity from whose well or tank every one draws water without restraint during the summer season.

7. Clarified butter is said to please the illustrious Vrihaspati, Pushan Bhaga, the twin Ashwins, and the god of fire.

8 Clarified butter is possessed of high medicinal virtues It is a high requisite of Sacrifice. It is the best of all liquids.

The merit a gift of clarified butter yields is very superior.

9 That man who wishes for the reward of happiness in the next world, who wishes for fame and prosperity, should, with a purified heart and having purified himself, make gifts of clarified butter to the Brahmanas.

10. The twin Ashwins, pleased, confer personal beauty upon that man who makes gifts of clarified butter to the Brahmanas in the month of Ashwin.

11. Rakshasas never invade the house of that man who makes gifts to the Brahmanas of pudding mixed with clarified butter.

12. That man never dies of thirst who makes gifts to the Brahmanas of jars filled with water. Such a person gets every necessary of life in profusion, and has never to suffer from any calamity or distress.

13. That man, who with great devotion and controlled senses makes gifts to the foremost of Brahmanas, is said to take a sixth part of the merits acquired by the Brahmanas by their penances.

14—15. That man who makes presents, to Brahmanas having the means of life, of fire-wood for purposes of cooking as also for enabling them to drive cold, finds all his purposes and all his acts successful. Such a one is seen to shine over all his enemies.

16. The illustrious god of fire becomes pleased with such a man. As another reward, he never becomes divested of cattle, and he is sure to win victory in battle.

17. The man who makes a gift of an umbrella gets children and great prosperity. Such a person never suffers from any eye-disease The merits also that originate from the performance of a sacrifice become his.

18. That man who makes a gift of an umbrella at the season of summer or rains, has never to suffer from any heart-burning on any account.

19—20 Such a man quickly succeeds in freeing himself from every difficulty and obstacle The highly blessed and illustrious Rishi Shandilya has said that of all gifts, the gift of a car, O king, is the greatest.

CHAPTER LXVI.

(ANUSHASANIKA PARVA)—Continued.

Yudhishthira said:—

1. I wish to hear, O grandfather what the merits are of that person who makes the gift of a pair of sandals to a Brahmana whose feet are burning or being scorched by hot sands while walking.

Bhishma said:—

2 The man who gives to the Brahmanas sandals for the protection of their feet, succeeds in crushing all thorns and gets over every sort of difficulty.

3—4 Such a man, O Yudhishthira, stands over the heads of all his enemies, cars of pure splendour, with mules yoked thereto and made of gold and silver, O monarch, approach him He who makes a gift of sandals is said to acquire the merit of making the gift of a car with well-broken horses yoked thereto.

Yudhishthra said:—

5. Tell me fully once more, O grandfather, of the merits of gifts of sesame and land, and of kine and food.

Bhishma said:—

6. Hear, O son of Kunti, what the merits are of the gift sesame Hearing me, do you then, O best of the Kurus, make gifts of sesame according to the rites.

7. Sesame seeds were created by the Self create Brahman as the best food for the departed manes. Hence, gifts of sesame seeds always please the departed manes greatly.

8. The man who makes gifts of sesame seeds in the month of Magha, to the Brahmanas, has never to see Hell which is full of all dreadful creatures.

9 He who worships the departed manes with offerings of sesame seeds is considered as worshipping the deities in all the sacrifices One should never make a Shraddha with offerings of sesame seeds without entertaining some purpose.

10. Sesame seeds sprang from the limbs of the great Rishi Kashyapa Hence, in the matter of gifts, they have come to be considered as possessed of great efficacy.

11. Sesame seeds confer both prosperity and personal beauty cleanse the giver of all his sins It is for this reason that the gift of sesame seeds is superior to the gift of every other article

12 The highly intelligent Apastamva, Shankha and Likhita, and the great Rishi Gautama, have all gone to the celestial region by having made gifts of sesame seeds

13 Those Brahmanas who make Homa with offerings of sesame abstain from sexual intercourse, and are observant of the religion of Acts, are considered as equal to vaccine Havi

14 The gift of sesame seeds is superior to all gifts Amongst all gifts, the gift of sesame is considered as yielding unending merit

15 Formerly when Havi (clarified butter) on one occasion could not be procured, the Rishi Kushika O scorcher of enemies made offerings of sesame seeds to his three sacrificial fires and succeeded in acquiring an excellent end

16 I have thus said to you, O chief of the Kurus what the regulations are about the excellent gift of sesame seeds It is on account of these regulations that the gift of sesame seeds has come to be considered as fraught with very superior merit

17. After this, listen to what I would say Once on a time the gods, desirous of making a Sacrifice, went, O king, to the presence of the Self create Brahman.

18 Having met Brahman, desirous as they were of celebrating a sacrifice on the Earth, they begged him for a piece of sacred earth, saying,—We want it for our sacrifice.

The deities said —

19 O illustrious one, you are the lord of all the Earth as also of all the gods! With your permission, O highly blessed one, we wish to perform a sacrifice.

20 The person who has not got by lawful means the earth whereon to make the sacrificial altar, acquires not the merit of the sacrifice he performs

21 You are the Lord of all the universe consisting of its mobile and immobile objects Therefore, you should grant us a piece of earth for the sacrifice we wish to make

Brahman said —

22 Ye foremost of gods, I shall give you a piece of earth whereon, ye sons of Kashyapa you shall celebrate your intended sacrifice

The gods said :—

23 Our wishes O holy one, have become successful We shall celebrate our sacrifice even here with large gifts Let, however the ascetics always worship this piece of Earth

24 Then there came to that place Agastya Kanwa Bhrigu Atri, and Vrishakapi, Asita and Devala

25 The great deities then O ye of unfading glory, celebrated their sacrifice. Those foremost of gods finished it in due time

26 Having completed that sacrifice of theirs on the breast of that foremost of mountains viz, Himavat, the celestials attached to the gift of earth a sixth part of the merit originating from their sacrifice

27 The man who makes a gift of even a span of earth with reverence and faith has never to suffer from any difficulty and has never to meet with any calamity

28 By making a gift of a house that prevents cold, wind and sun, and that stands upon a piece of clean land, the giver attains to the region of the celestials and does not fall down even when his merit becomes exhausted.

29 By making a gift of a house to live in, the giver, endued with wisdom, lives, O king, happily in the company of Shakra. Such a person receives great honors in the celestial region

30 That person in whose house a Brahmana of controlled senses, well read in the Vedas, and belonging by birth to a family of preceptors, lives in contentment, succeeds in attaining to and enjoying a region of great happiness

31 Likewise, O best of the Bharatas, by giving away a shed for the shelter of kine that can prevent cold and rain and that is substantial in structure the giver rescues seven generations of his race.

32 By giving away a piece of earth fit for cultivation, the giver acquires great prosperity By giving a piece of earth containing mineral riches, the giver advances his family

33 One should never give away earth that is barren or that is burnt, nor should one give away any earth that is near a crematorium, or that has been possessed and enjoyed by a sinful person before such gift.

34 When a man performs a Shraddha in honor of the departed manes on earth belonging to another person, the departed manes render both the gift of that earth and the Shraddha itself fruitless

35 Hence, a wise man should buy even a small piece of earth and make a gift of it. The funeral cake that is offered to one's ancestors on earth that has been duly purchased, becomes endless

36 Forests, mountains, rivers, and Tirthas, are considered as having no owners No earth need be bought here for performing Shraddhas

37. This has been said, O king, on the subject of the merits of making gifts of earth After this, O sinless one, I shall describe to you the subject of the gift of kine.

38 Kine are considered as superior to all the ascetics And therefore the divine Mahadeva practised penances in their company.

39 Kine, O Bharata, live in the region of Brahman, in the company of Soma. Forming as it does, the highest end, the twice born Rishis, crowned with success, try to attain to that very region.

40. Kine benefit human beings with milk clarified butter, curd, dung, skin, bones, horns, and hair, O Bharata

41. Kine do not feel cold or heat. They always work Even the rainy season cannot afflict them at all

42 And since kine attain to the highest end, in the company of Brahmanas therefore do the wise say that kine and Brahmanas are equal

43 Formerly king Rantideva celebrated a grand sacrifice in which an immense number of kine were offered up and killed From the juice that was secreted by the skins of the slain animals, a river was formed that passed by the name of Charmanwati

44—45 Kine no longer are animals fit for sacrifice They now are animals fit for gift That king who presents kine to foremost of Brahmanas O king is sure to get over every danger even if he falls into it The man who presents a thousand kine has not to go to hell.

46 Such a person O king wins victory everywhere The very king of the celestials had said that the milk of kine is nectar.

47. Therefore, one who presents a cow is considered as making a gift of nectar. Persons, well read in the Vedas, have declared that the clarified butter, manufactured from cow's milk, is the very best of all libations poured upon the sacrificial fire.

48—49 Therefore, the man, who presents a cow, is considered as making a gift of a libation for sacrifice A bull is the embodiment of Heaven. He who makes the gift of a bull to a qualified Brahmana, receives great honors in the celestial region. Kine, O chief of Bharata's race, are said to be the vital airs of living creatures.

50. Therefore, the man, who makes the gift of a cow, is said to make the gift of vital airs. Persons conversant with the Vedas, have said that kine are the great refuge of living creatures.

51. The man, who makes the gift of a cow is considered as making the gift of what is the high refuge of all creatures. The cow should never be given away for slaughter; nor should the cow be given to a tiller of the soil, nor should the cow be given away to an atheist. The cow should not also, O chief of the Bharatas, be given to one whose occupation is the keep of kine.

52 The wise have said that the person, who gives away the cow to any of such sinful persons, has to sink in eternal Hell.

53 One should never give to a Brahmana a cow that is lean, or that produces dead calves, or that is barren, or that is diseased, or that is defective of limb, or that is worn out with toil.

54 The man, who gives away ten thousand kine, attains to Heaven and sports in bliss in the company of Indra. The man, who makes gifts of kine by hundred thousands, wins many regions of eternal happiness.

55 Thus have I recited to you the merits of the gift of kine and of sesame, as also of the gift of earth Listen now to me as I describe to you the gift of food, O Bharata.

56 The gift of food, O son of Kunti, is considered as a very superior gift. Formerly king Rantideva ascended to the celestial region by having made gifts of food.

57 That king, who makes a gift of food to one who is toil-worn and hungry, acquires the region of supreme happiness belonging to the Self create.

58 Men cannot, by gifts of gold and dresses and of other things win that happiness which givers of food succeed in winning O you of great power.

59 Food is, indeed, the first article. Food is considered as the highest prosperity. It is from food that life originates as also energy and prowess and strength.

60. He, who always makes gifts of food, with attention to the righteous, never suffers any distress. This has been said by Parashara.

61. Having adored the deities duly, food should be first dedicated to them. It has been said, O king, that the kind of food that is taken by particular men is taken also by the gods those men worship.

62. That man, who makes gifts of food in the light half of the month of Kartika, succeeds in getting over every difficulty here and acquires endless happiness hereafter.

63 That man, who makes a gift of food to a hungry guest arrived at his house, acquires all those regions, O chief of Bharata's race, that are reserved for persons acquainted with Brahman.

64. The man, who makes gifts of food, is sure to get over every difficulty and distress Such a person gets over every sin and purges himself of every evil act.

65 I have thus described to you the merits of making gifts of food, of sesame, of earth, and of kine.

CHAPTER LXVII.

(ANUSHASANIKA PARVA)—Continued.

Yudhishthira said —

1. I have heard, O sire, of the merits of the different kinds of gift which you have described to me I understand, O Bharata, that the gift of food is especially praiseworthy and superior.

2 What, however, are the great merits of making gifts of drink. I wish to hear of this in full, O grandfather.

Bhishma said:—

3 I shall, O chief of Bharata's race, relate to you this subject Listen to me, O you of unbaffled prowess, as I speak to you.

4—5 I shall O sinless one, describe to you gifts beginning with that of drink The merit that a man wins by making gifts of food and of drink is such that the like of it, I think, is incapable of being acquired by any other gift There is no gift, superior to that of either food or drink It is from food that all living creatures are able to exist

6. Therefore, food is considered as a very superior object in all the worlds From food the strength and energy of living creatures continually increase.

7. Hence, the master of all creatures has himself said that the gift of food is a very superior gift You have heard, O son of Kunti what the auspicious words are of Savitri herself.

8 You know why those words were said, what those words were, and how they were said in course of the sacred Mantras O you of great intelligence A man, by making a gift of food, really makes a gift of life itself.

9 There is no gift in this world which is superior to the gift of life You are not unacquainted with this saying of Lomasha, O you of mighty arms.

10 The end that was attained to formerly by king Shivi on account of his having granted life to the pigeon is acquired by him, O king, who makes a gift of food to a Brahmana.

11. Hence, we have heard that they who give life attain to very superior regions of happiness in after life Food, O best of the Kurus, may or may not be superior to drink.

12 Nothing can exist without the help of what comes from water. The very lord of all the planets, viz, the illustrious Soma, has originated from water.

13 Ambrosia and Suddha and Swadha and milk, as also every sort of food, the deciduous herbs O king, and creepers originate from water.

14 From these, O king, the vital airs of all living creatures flow. The deities have nectar for their food. The Nagas have Sudha

15 The departed manes have Swadha for theirs The animals have herbs and plants for their food. The wise have said that rice, &c, form the food of human beings

16 All these, O king, originate from water Hence, there is nothing superior to the gift of water or drink

17 If a person wishes to get prosperity for himself, he should always make gifts of drink The gift of water is considered as very laudable It brings on great fame and bestows long life on the giver

18. The giver of water, O son of Kunti, always stands over the heads of his enemies. Such a person obtains the fruition of all his desires and acquires everlasting fame

19 The giver, O king, becomes purged of every sin and obtains unending happiness hereafter as he proceeds to the celestial region O you of great splendour Manu himself has said that such a person acquires regions of endless bliss in the other world.

CHAPTER LXVIII.

(ANUSHASANIKA PARVA).—Continued.

Yudhishthira said:—

1. Do you describe to me once again, O grandfather, the merits of the gifts of sesame and of lamps for lighting darkness, as also of food and clothes.

Bhishma said:—

2 Regarding it, O Yudhishthira, is recited the discourse that took place formerly between a Brahmana and Yama

3. In the region lying between the rivers Ganga and Yamuna, at the foot of the hills called Yamuna, there was a large town peopled by Brahmanas.

4 The town was known by the name of Parnashala and was very charming, O king. A large number of learned Brahmanas lived in it.

5—6. One day, Yama, the king of the dead, commanded a messenger of his, who was clad in black, having blood-red eyes and hair standing erect, and possessed of feet, eyes, and nose all of which resembled those of a crow, saying,—Go you to the town inhabited by Brahmanas and bring here the person known by the name of Sharmin and born in the race of Agastya.

7. He is intent on mental tranquility and gifted with learning He teaches the Vedas and his practices are well-known. Do not bring me another person belonging to the same race and living in the same neighbourhood.

8. This other man I want is equal to him in virtues, study, and birth. As for children and conduct, this other resembles the intelligent Sharmin.

9 Do you bring the individual I want He should be adored with respect—The messenger, going there, did the very reverse of what he had been ordered to do.

10. Attacking that person, he brought him who had been forbidden by Yama to be brought. Endued with great energy, Yama rose up on seeing the Brahmana and adored him duly.

11—12. The king of the dead then ordered his messenger, saying,—Let this one be taken back, and let the other one be brought to me.—When the great judge of the dead [said these words, that Brahmana addressed him and said,—I have finished my study of the Vedas and am no longer attached to the world. Whatever period may yet remain of my life, I wish to pass, living here, O you of unfading glory.

Yama said:—

13. I cannot determine the exact period, ordained by Time, of one's life, and hence, unurged by Time, I cannot allow one to live here. I take note of the acts of virtue (or otherwise) that one does in the world.

14. Do you, O learned Brahmana of great splendour, return forthwith to your house Tell me what also is in your mind and what I can do for you, O you of unfading glory.

Brahmana said:—

15 Do you tell me what those acts are by doing which one may acquire great merit. O best of all beings, you are the foremost of authorities in the three worlds.

Yama said:—

16. Do you hear, O twice-born Rishi, the excellent ordinances about gifts. The gift of sesame seeds is a very superior gift. It yields everlasting merit.

17. O foremost of twice-born ones, one should make gifts of as much sesame as one can. By making gifts of sesame every day, one is sure to acquire the fruition of his desires.

18. The gift of sesame at Shraddhas is highly spoken of The gift of sesame is a very superior gift. Do you make gifts of sesame to the Brahmanas according to the rites laid down in the scriptures.

19 One should, on the day of the full moon of the month of Vaishakha, make gifts of sesame to the Brahmanas. They should also be made to eat and to touch sesame on every occasion that one can afford.

20. They, who are desirous of seeing their well-being, should, with their whole minds do this in their houses. Forsooth, men should likewise make gifts of water and set up resting places for the distribution of drinking water.

21. One should make tanks and lakes and wells to be excavated. Such acts are rare in the world, O best of twice-born persons.

22. Do you always make gifts of water. This act is full of great merit, O best of twice-born persons, for making [such gifts you should put up resting places along the roads for the distribution of water.

23. After one has eaten, the gift to one should especially be made of water for drink.

Bhishma said.—

24. After Yama had said these words to him, the messenger who had borne him from his house conveyed him back to it. The Brahmana, on his return, obeyed the instructions he had received.

25. Having thus conveyed him back to his abode, the messenger of Yama fetched Sharmin who had really been sought by Yama. Taking Sharmin to him, he informed his master.

26. Endued with great energy, the judge of the dead adored that pious Brahmana, and having conversed with him for some time dismissed him for being taken back to his house.

27. To him also Yama gave the same instructions Sharmin too, returning to the world of men, did all that Yama had said

28. Like the gift of water, Yama, from desire of doing good to the departed manes, applauds the gift of lamps to light dark places, for it is considered as benefiting the departed manes.

29. Hence, O best of the Bharatas, one should always give lamps for lighting dark places. The giving of lamps increases the power of vision, of the deities, the Pitris, and one's own self.

30. It has been said, O king, that the gift of gems is a very great gift. The Brahmana, who having accepted a gift of gems sells the same for celebrating a sacrifice, commits no sin.

31. The Brahmana, who having accepted a gift of gems, makes a gift of them to Brahmanas, wins endless merit himself and confers endless merit upon him from whom he had originally received them.

32. Knowing every duty, Manu himself has said that he who, observant of proper control makes a gift of gems to a Brahmana observant of proper restraints, wins inexhaustible merit himself and confers inexhaustible merit upon the recipient.

33 The man, who is content with his own married wife and who makes a gift of dresses, acquires an excellent complexion and excellent dresses for himself.

34 I have told you, O foremost of men, what the merits are of gifts of kine, of gold and of sesame, according to various precepts of the Vedas and the scriptures.

35 One should marry and procreate offspring upon one's married wives. Of all acquisitions, O son of Kuru's race, that of sons is considered the foremost.

CHAPTER LXIX.

(ANUSHASANIKA PARVA)—Continued.

Yudhishthira said —

1. Do you, O foremost one of Kuru's family, describe to me once again the excellent ordinances about gifts, with especial reference, O you of great wisdom, to the gift of earth.

2 A Kshatriya should make gifts of earth to a pious Brahmana, such a Brahmana should accept the gift with due rites. None else, however, save a Kshatriya can make gifts of Earth.

3 You should now tell me what those objects are that persons of all classes can freely give if actuated by the desire of acquiring merit. You should also tell me what has been said in the Vedas on this subject.

Bhishma said:—

4. There are three gifts that pass by the same name and that yield equal merits. Indeed, these three confer the fruition of every desire The three objects whose gifts are of such a character are kine, earth, and knowledge.

5. That person, who tells his disciple words of good meaning drawn from the Vedas, acquires merit equal to that which is acquired by making gifts of earth and kine.

6. Likewise are kine praised; There is no object of gift higher than they. Kine are supposed to confer merit forthwith. They are also, O Yudhishthira, such that a gift of them cannot but yeild great merit.

7. Kine are the mothers of all creatures. They grant every sort of happiness The person, who seeks his own prosperity, should always make gifts of kine.

8 No one should kick at kine or pass through the midst of kine. Kine are goddesses and homes of auspiciousness. Therefore they always deserve worship.

9. Formerly, the deities, while tilling the earth whereon they celebrated a sacrifice, used the goad for striking the bullocks yoked to the plough. Hence, in cultivating earth for such a purpose, one may, without incurring censure or sin, apply the goad to bullocks. In other acts, however, bullocks should never be struck with the goad of the whip.

10. When kine are grazing or lying down, no one should tease them in any way. When thirsty and they do not get water, kine, by merely looking at such a person, can destroy him with all his relatives and friends

11. What creatures can be more sacred than kine when with the very dung of kine altars, whereon Shraddhas are performed in honor of the departed manes, or those whereon the deities are adored, are cleansed and sanctified?

12 That man who, before eating himself, gives every day, for a year, only a handful of grass to a cow belonging to another, is considered as practising a vow or observance which bestows the fruition of every desire

13 Such a person acquires children and fame and wealth and prosperity, and removes all evils and bad dreams.

Yudhishthira said:—

14 What should be the marks of those kine that deserve to be given away? What are those kine that should be looked over in the matter of gifts? What should be the characters of those persons to whom should kine be given? Who, again, are those to whom kine should not be given?

Bhishma said:—

15 'A cow should never be given to one who is not pious in conduct, or one that is sinful, or one that is covetous, or one who is a liar, or one who does not make offerings to the departed manes and celestials.

16 A person, by making a gift of ten kine to a Brahmana learned in the Vedas poor in earthly riches, possessed of many children and owning a domestic fire, attains numerous regions of great happiness

17. When a man performs any meritorious act assisted by what he has got in gift from another, he acquires a portion of that merit.

18 He who procreates a person, he who rescues a person and he who assigns the means of livelihood to a person, are considered as the three fathers.

19 Services dutifully done to the preceptor destroys sin Pride destroys even great fame. The possession of three children removes the reproach of childlessness, and the possession of ten kine removes the reproach of poverty.

20—21. To one who is devoted to the Vedanta, who is gifted with great learning, who has been filled with wisdom, who has a complete mastery over his senses, who observes the restraints laid down in the scriptures, who has withdrawn himself from all worldly attachments, to him who says agreeable words to all creatures, to him who would never do an evil act even when actuated by hunger, to one who is mild or possessed of a peaceful disposition, to one that is hospitable to all guests—to such a Brahmana, should a man, possessed of similar conduct and having children and wives, assign the means of livelihood.

22 The merit of the gift of kine to a worthy person is exactly equal to the sin of robbing a Brahmana of what belongs to him Under all circumstances anything belonging to a Brahmana should be avoided and his wives kept at a distance.

CHAPTER LXX.

(ANUSHASANIKA PARVA)—Continued.

Bhishma said —

1 Regarding it, O perpetuater of Kuru race, is recited by the righteous the narrative of the great calamity that befell king Nriga on account of his taking what had belonged to a Brahmana.

2 Sometime before certain youths of Yadu's race, while searching for water, came to a large well covered with grass and creepers

3 Desirous of drawing water from it, they worked hard for removing the creepers that covered its mouth. After the mouth had been cleaned, they saw within the well a very large lizard living within it. The youths made strong and repeated efforts for rescuing the lizard from that plight.

5. Resembling a very hill in size, the lizard was sought to be freed by cords and leathern tongs. Not succeeding in their attempts, the youths then went to Janardana

6 Addressing him they said —Covering the entire space of a well, there is a very large lizard to be seen Despite our best efforts we have not succeeded in rescuing it from that plight. This was what they said to Krishna

7. Vasudeva then went there and took out the lizard and questioned it as who it was The lizard said that it was the soul of king Nriga who had flourished in days of yore and who had celebrated many sacrifices.

8 To the lizard that said those words,

Madhava spoke —

You had done many pious deeds. You committed no sin. Why then, O king, have you come by such a distressful end? Do you explain what is this and why has it been caused?

9 We have heard that you did repeatedly make gifts to the Brahmanas numberable kine Why, therefore, have you come by this end

10. Nriga then replied to Krishna, saying,—On one occasion a cow belonging to a Brahmana who regularly adored his domestic fire, escaping from the owner's house while he was absent from home, entered my flock.

11. The keepers of my cattle included that cow in their list of a thousand In time that cow was given away by me to a Brahmana, wishing for happiness in heaven.

12. The true owner, returning home, sought for his lost cow and at last found it in the house of another Finding her, the owner said,—This cow is mine —

13. The other person contested his claim, till both, growing wroth came to me Addressing me, one of them said —You gave this cow —The other one said —You have robbed me of this cow because she is mine

14 I then begged the Brahmana to whom I had given that cow, to return the gift in exchange for hundreds and hundreds of other kine Without yielding to my earnest solicitations, he addressed me saying,—The cow I have got is well suited to time and place She gives profuse milk, besides being very quiet and very fond of us. The milk she gives is very sweet. She is lauded in my house.

16 She is nourishing, besides, a weak child of mine that has just been born I cannot, therefore, part with her — Having said these words, the Brahmana went away

17 I then begged the other Brahmana offering him an exchange, and saying,—Do you take a hundred thousand kine for this one cow.

18. The Brahmana, however, replied to me saying,—I do not accept gifts from Kshatriyas. I am able to support myself without aid Do you then, forthwith, give me that very cow which was mine. Thus, O slayer of Madhu, did that Brahmana speak to me.

19 I then offered to make gifts to him of gold and silver and horses and cars That foremost of Brahmanas refused to accept any of these gifts and departed.

20 Meanwhile, urged by Time's irresistible power, I had to depart from this world Going to the region of the departed manes I was taken before Yama the king of the dead.

21 Adoring me duly, Yama addressed me saying,— The end cannot be determined, O king, of your righteous deeds.

22 There is, however, a little sin which was unconsciously committed by you Do you suffer the punishment for that sin now or afterwards as you like.

23 You had sworn that you would protect (all persons in the enjoyment of their own) This oath of yours was not rigidly kept by you You took also what belonged to a Brahmana This has been the twofold sin you have perpetrated.

24 I answered, saying —I shall first suffer the distress of punishment, and when that is over, I shall enjoy the happiness that is in store for me, O lord!—After I had said these words to the king of the dead, I dropped down on the Earth.

25 Though fallen down I still could hear the words that Yama said to me very loudly. Those words were,—Janarddana the son of Vasudeva, will save you

26. Upon the completion of a full thousand years, when your sin will be dissipated you shall then attain to many regions of unending happiness that have been acquired by you through your own pious deeds.

27 Falling down I found myself, with head downwards, within this well, changed into a creature of the intermediate order. Memory, however, did not leave me.

28. By you I have been saved to day. What else can it testify than the power of your penances? Let me have your permission, O Krishna. I wish to ascend to the celestial region.

29 Permitted then by Krishna, king Nriga bowed his head to him and then mounted a celestial car and went to Heaven.

30. After Nriga had thus proceeded to the celestial region, O best of the Bharatas, Vasudeva recited this Verse, O delighter of the Kurus.

31. No one should knowingly misappropriate anything belonging to a Brahmana. The property of a Brahmana, if taken, destroys the taker even as the Brahmana's cow destroyed king Nriga!

32. I tell you, again, O Partha, that a meeting with the good never proves fruitless. See, king Nriga was rescued from Hell through a meeting of his with one that is good.

33 As a gift yields merit, so an act of spoliation brings on to demerit. Hence also, O Yudhishthira, one should avoid doing any injury to kine.

CHAPTER LXXI.

(ANUSHASANIKA PARVA)—Continued.

Yudhishthira said:—

1. O sinless one, do you describe to me more fully the merits of making gifts of kine O you of mighty arms, I am never satiated with your words.

Bhishma said —

2. Regarding it is cited the old discourse *between the Rishi Uddalaki and Nachi*keta.

3. Once on a time the Rishi Uddalaki, gifted with great intelligence, approaching his son Nachiketa, said to him,—Do you wait upon and serve me —

4—5. Upon the completion of the vow he had observed, the great Rishi once more said to his son,—Engaged in performing my ablutions and deeply busy with my Vedic study, I have forgotten to bring with me the fire-wood, the Kusha blades, the flowers, he water-jar, and the potherbs I had collected Bring me those things from the iver bank.

6 The son went there but found all the rticles washed away by the current Re*turning to his father, he said* —"I do not ee the things"

7. Stricken as he then was by hunger, hirst, and fatigue, the Rishi Uddalaki of great ascetic merit, in a sudden anger ursed his son, saying,—meet with Yama o day.

8 "Thus struck by his father with the hunder of his speech, the son, with joined hands said —"Be pleased with me —Soon, nowever, he dropped down on the earth dead.

9 Seeing Nachiketa prostrated upon the earth, his father became senseless with grief He, too, exclaiming —Alas, what have I done!—dropped down on the earth,

10. Filled with grief as he bewailed for his son, the rest of that day passed away and night came

11. Then Nachiketa, O son of Kuru's race, drenched by the tears of his father, showed signs of returning life as he lay on a mat of Kusha grass His regaining of life under the tears of his father resembled the sprouting forth of seeds when drenched with good showers.

12 The son, just restored to life, was still weak. His body was smeared with scents and he looked like one just awaking from a deep sleep. The Rishi asked him, saying —

13 *Have you, O son, acquired auspici*ous regions by your own deeds? By good luck, you have been restored to me. Your body does not seem to be human.

14. Thus asked by his great father, Nachiketa who had seen every thing with his own eyes, answered thus in the midst of the Rishis —

15 In obedience to your command I proceeded to the vast region of Yama which is possessed of a charming effulgence. There I saw a palatial mansion which extended for thousands of Yojanas and emitted a golden splendour on every part.

16. *As soon as Yama saw me approach*ing with face towards him, he ordered his attendants, saying,—Give him a good seat. —Indeed the king of the dead, for your sake, adored me with the Arghya and other ingredients.

17. Thus adored by Yama and seated in the midst of his counsellors, I then asked him mildly,—I have come to your house, O judge of the dead. Do you assign me those regions which I deserve for my acts.

18 Yama then answered me, saying,— You are not dead, O amiable one. Gifted with penances, your father said to thee— Meet with Yama —The energy of your father is like that of a burning fire. I could not possibly falsify that speech of his.

19 You have seen me. Do you go hence, O child The author of your body is bewailing for you You are my dear guest What wish of yours shall I fulfill? Solicit the fruition of whatever desire you may have.

20 Thus addressed by him, I replied to the king of the dead saying —I have arrived within your territory from which no traveller ever returns If I am worthy of your attentions, I wish, O king of the dead, to see those regions of great prosperity and happiness that have been reserved for doers of virtuous deeds

21 Thus addressed by me, Yama made me mount a vehicle effulgent as the Sun and to which were yoked many excellent horses Taking me on that car, he showed me, O foremost of twice born ones, all those charming regions that are reserved for the pious.

22 I saw in those regions many effulgent palaces intended for great persons. Those mansions are of various forms and are adorned with every kind of gems

23 Bright as the lunar disc, they are ornamented with rows of tinkling bells.

Hundreds among them are many storied. Within them are charming groves and gardens and transparent pools of water.

24 Effulgent like lapis lazuli and the Sun, and made of silver and gold, their color resembles that of the morning Sun Some of them are fixed and some movable.

25 Within them are many hills of foods any enjoyable articles, and dresses and beds in abundance. Within them are many tress capable of granting the fruition of every desire.

26 There are also many rivers and roads and spacious halls and lakes and large tanks Thousands of cars with rattling wheels may be seen there, having excellent horses yoked to them

27 Many rivers of milk, many hills of clarified butter and large pieces of transparent water are there Indeed, I saw many such regions, never seen by me before, of happiness and joy, approved by the king of the dead

28 Seeing all those objects, I addressed the ancient and powerful judge of the dead, saying —For whose use and enjoyment have these rivers with eternal currents of milk and clarified butter been ordained?

Yama said —

29 These rivers of milk and clarified butter are for the enjoyment of those pious persons who make gifts in the world of men. Other eternal worlds there are which are filled with such palaces free from every sort of sorrow These are reserved for those persons who make gift of kine.

30. The mere gift of kine is not laudable There are considerations of fitness or otherwise about the person to whom kine should be given the time for making those gifts the kind of kine and the rites that should be observed in making the gifts Gifts of kine should be made after knowing the qualifications of both Brahmanas and the kine themselves. Kine should not be given to one in whose house they are likely to suffer from fire or the sun.

31. That Brahmana, who is endued with Vedic learning, who is of austere penances, and who celebrates sacrifices is considered as worthy of receiving kine in gift Those kine which have been saved from distressful situations, or which have been given by poor householders from want of sufficient means to feed and cherish them, are, for these reasons, counted as of great value.

32 Abstaining from all food and subsisting upon water alone for three nights and sleeping the while on the naked earth, one should, having properly fed the kine intended to be given away, give them to Brahmanas after having pleased them also (with other gifts).

33 The kine, given away, should be accompanied by their calves They should, again, be such as to bring forth good calves at the proper seasons They should be accompanied with other articles Having completed the gift, the giver should live, for three days on only milk and abstaining from food of every other kind.

34 He, who gives a good cow that brings forth good calves at proper time, and that does not fly away from the owner's house, and accompanies such gifts with a vessel of white brass for milking her, enjoys the divine happiness for as many years as are measured by the number of hairs on the animal's body. He who gives a bull to a Brahmana, that is well-broken and capable of carrying loads, strong and young in years, disinclined to do any mischief, large sized and powerful, enjoys those regions, approved of the righteous, that are reserved for givers of kine.

35—36 He is considered as a proper person for receiving a cow in gift who is known to be mild towards kine, who takes kine for his refuge, who is grateful and who has no means of livelihood assigned to him When an old man becomes ill or when a famine takes place or when a Brahmana intends to celebrate a sacrifice, or when one wishes to till for agriculture, or when one gets a son through the efficacy of a Homa performed for the purpose, or for the use of one's preceptor, or for the sustenance of a child, one should give away a loved cow. These are the considerations that are spoken highly of about place and time. The kine worthy of being given away are those that give profuse milk, or those which are well-known, or those that have been purchased for a price, or those that have been acquired as honoraria for learning, or those that have been obtained in exchange by offering other living creatures, or those that have been got by prowess of arms, or those that have been got as marriage dower.

Nachiketa said :—

37. Hearing these words of Vaivaswata, the Regent of the dead, I once more addressed him, saying,—What are those objects by giving which, when kine cannot be had, givers may yet go to regions reserved for men making gifts of kine.

38. Accosted by me, the wise Yama answered, explaining further what the ends is which one wins by making gifts of kine He said,—In the absence of kine, a person by making gifts of the substitute of kine, acquires the merit of making gifts of kine.

39 If in the absence of kine, one makes a gift of a cow made of clarified butter, observant of a vow the while, one gets for one's use these rivers of clarified butter all of which approach one like an affectionate mother approaching her loved child.

40. If, in the absence of even a cow, made of clarified butter, one makes a gift of a cow made of sesame seeds, observing a vow the while, one succeeds with the help of that cow to get over all calamities in this world and to enjoy great happiness hereafter from these rivers of milk that you see

40. If a cow made of sesame seeds, is not available, one makes a gift of a cow made of water, he succeeds in coming to these happy regions and enjoying this river of cool and transparent water, that can grant the fruition of every desire

42 The king of the dead explained to me all this while I was his guest, and, O you of unfading glory, great was the joy that I felt on seeing all the wonders he showed me.

43. I shall now tell you what would certainly be agreeable to you. I have now got a great sacrifice whose performance does not require much riches That sacrifice may be said to originate from me, O sire Others will obtain it also. It is not quite of a piece with the ordinances of the Vedas

44. The curse that you had imprecated on me was no curse but was in sooth a blessing, since it enabled me to see the great king of the dead There I have seen what the rewards are of gifts I shall henceforth, O you of great soul, practise the duty of gift without any doubt about its rewards

45 And, O great Rishi, the righteous Yama, filled with joy, repeatedly told me — One who, by making repeated gifts has succeeded in acquiring purity of mind should then make gifts of kine in particular.

46 This subject is fraught with sanctity Do you never disregard the duties of gifts. Gifts, again, should be made to worthy persons, when time and place are suitable Do you therefore, always make gifts of kine Never entertain any doubt about it.

47. Devoted to the path of gifts formerly many great persons used to make gifts of kine Fearing to practise austere penances, they made gifts according to their power.

48 In time they shook off all sentiments of pride and vanity, and purified their souls Engaged in performing Shraddhas in honor of the departed manes and in all religious acts of righteousness, they used to make, according to their power, gifts of kine, and as the reward of those acts they have attained to the celestial region and are shining in effulgence for such virtue.

49 One should, on the eighth day of the moon that is known by the name of Kamyashtami, make gifts of kine, properly got, to the Brahmanas, after determining the fitness of the recipients. After making the gift, one should then live for ten days together upon only the milk of kine, their dung and their urine.

50 The merit that one acquires by making a gift of a bull is equal to that of the divine cow. By making a gift of a couple of kine one gains, as the reward thereof, a mastery of the Vedas. By making a gift of cars and vehicles with kine yoked thereto, one wins the merit of baths in sacred waters By making a gift of a cow of the Kapila kind, one becomes purged of all his sins

51. Indeed by giving away even a single cow of the Kapila kind that has been acquired by fair means, one becomes purged of all his sins There is nothing higher than the milk which is given by kine. The gift of a cow is truly considered as a very superior gift.

52 Kine, by giving milk, rescue all the worlds from calamity. It is kine, again, that produce the food upon which creatures live. One who, knowing the extent of the service that kine do, does not entertain in his heart love for kine, is a sinner who is sure to sink in Hell

53 If one gives a thousand or a hundred or ten or five kine, indeed, if one gives to a pious Brahmana even a single cow which brings forth good calves at proper seasons, he is sure to see that cow approach him in Heaven in the form of a river of sacred water capable of granting the fruition of every desire

54 About prosperity and the growth that kine confer, in the matter also of the protection that kine grant to all creatures of the Earth, kine are equal to the very rays of the Sun that fall on the Earth. The word that signifies the cow means also the rays of the Sun The giver of a cow begets a very large progeny inhabiting a large part of the Earth. Hence, he who gives a cow shines like a second Sun in effulgence

55. The disciple should in the matter of making gifts of kine, select his preceptor. Such a disciple is sure to go to Heaven everytime. The selection of a preceptor is considered as a high duty by persons knowing the ordinances. This is, indeed, the initial ordinance. All other ordinances depend upon it.

56. Selecting, after examination, a fit person among the Brahmanas, one should make to him the gift of a cow that has been acquired by fair means, and having made the gift make him accept it The deities and men and ourselves also, in wishing good to others, say,—Let the merits of gifts be yours on account of your virtue?

57. Thus did the judge of the dead speak to me, O twice born Rishi. I then bowed my head to the righteous Yama. Getting his permission I left his kingdom and have now come to the sole of your feet.

CHAPTER LXXII.

(ANUSHASANIKA PARVA)—Continued.

Yudhishthira said:—

1. You have, O grandfather, describe to me the topic of gifts of kine in speaking of the Rishi Nachiketa You have also, related O powerful one, the efficacy and pre-eminence of that act.

2. You have also told me, O grandfather, of great intelligence, the exceedingly painful character of the misfortune that befell the great king Nriga on account of a single transgression of his.

3 He had to live for a long time at Dwaravati (in the form of a mighty lizard) and how Krishna became the instrument of his rescue from that miserable condition.

4 I have, however, one doubt. About the regions of kine I wish to hear particularly about those regions which are reserved for the residence of persons who make gifts of kine.

Bhishma said —

5. Regarding it is cited the old discourse between Him who sprang from the primeval lotus and him who performed a hundred sacrifices.

Shakra said:—

6 I see, O grandfather, that those who live in the region of kine transcend by their effulgence the prosperity of the celestial dwellers and pass them by. This has created a doubt in my mind

7. Of what kind, O holy one, are the regions of kine? Tell me all about them, O sinless one. Indeed, what is the nature of those regions that are inhabited by givers of kine? I wish to know this.

8. Of what kind are those regions? What fruits do they yield? What is the highest object there which the inhabitants thereof succeed in acquiring? What are its virtues How also do men, shorn of anxiety, succeed in going to those regions?

9 For what period does the giver of a cow enjoy the fruits of his gift? How may persons make gifts of many kine and how may they make gifts of a few kine?

10 What are the merits of the gifts of many kine and what those of the gifts of a few only. How also do persons become givers of kine without really giving any kine? Do you tell me all this.

11. How does one making gifts of even many kine, O powerful lord, become the equal of one who has made gifts of only a few kine? How also does one who has made gifts of only a few kine equal one who has made gifts of many kine?

12 What kind of present is considered as distinguished for pre eminence in the matter of gifts of kine? You should O holy one, describe to me all this according to truth.

CHAPTER LXXIII.

The grandfather said:—

1. The questions you have put to me about kine, beginning with their gift, are such that there is none else in the three worlds, O you of a hundred sacrifices, who could put them.

2. There are many kinds of regions, O Shakra, which are invisible to even you Those regions are seen by me, O Indra, as also by those women who are chaste and who have been devoted to only one husband.

3 Rishis observe excellent vows, by means of their deeds of virtue and piety and Brahmanas of righteous souls, succeed in going there in even their human bodies.

4 Men who perform excellent vows see those regions which resemble the bright creations of dreams helped by their purified minds and by that (temporary) liberation which succeeds the loss of one's consciousness of body.

5. O you of a thousand eyes, hear me as I tell you what the attributes are of those regions There the very course of time is stopped Decrepitude is not there, nor Fire which is omnipresent in the universe There is slightest transgression does not take place, nor disease, nor weakness of any sort

6 The kine which live there, O Vasava, acquire the fruition of every desire which they cherish in their hearts I have direct experience of what I say to you

7 Capable of going everywhere at will and actually going from place to place with ease, they enjoy the fruition of desire after desire as it arises in their minds Lakes, tanks, rivers, forests of diverse kinds, mansions, hills and all kinds of delightful objects,—are to be seen there There is no region of happiness that is superior to any of these of which I speak

9 All those foremost of men, O Shakra, who are forgiving to all creatures, who endure everything, who are full of love for all things who render dutiful obedience to their preceptors, and who are freed from pride and vanity, go to those regions of supreme happiness.

10—11 He who abstains from every kind of flesh, who is possessed of a pure heart who is gifted with righteousness, who worships his parents with respect, who is endued with truthfulness of speech and conduct, who attends with obedience upon the Brahmanas, who is faultless in conduct, who never behaves with anger towards kine and towards the Brahmanas, who performs every duty, who serves his preceptors with reverence, who is devoted for his whole life to truth and to gifts, and who is always forgiving towards all transgressions against himself, who is mild and self controlled, who is full of respect for the celestials, who is hospitable to all guests who is gifted with mercy,—indeed, he who is adorned with these attributes,—succeeds in attaining to the eternal region of kine

13—14 He who is sullied with adultery, sees not such a region; nor he who is a destroyer of his preceptor, nor he who speaks falsely or indulges in idle taunts, nor he who always disputes with others, nor he who acts with hostility towards the Brahmanas Indeed, that wicked man who is sullied with such faults cannot even see these regions of happiness, nor he who injures his friends; nor he who is guileful, nor he who is ungrateful, nor he who is a cheat, nor he who is crooked in conduct, nor he who is a disregarder of religion, nor he who is a slayer of Brahmanas Such men cannot see in even imagination the region of kine that is the abode of only the pious.

15 I have told you every thing particularly about the regions of kine, O king of the celestials Hear now, O you of a hundred sacrifices, the merit of persons who are engaged in making gifts of kine.

16 He who makes gifts of kine, after purchasing them with money obtained by inheritence or acquired by fair means, attains, as the fruit of such an act, to many regions of endless happiness

17 He who makes a gift of a cow, having acquired it with money, won at dice, enjoys happiness, O Shakra, for ten thousand celestial years

18 He who acquires a cow as his share of ancestral riches is said to acquire her legitimately Such a cow may be given away. They who make gifts of kine so acquired, obtain innumerable endless regions of eternal happiness

19 That person who having acquired a cow in gift makes a gift of her with a pure heart, succeeds, forsooth, O lord of Sachi, in obtaining eternal regions of beatitude

20 That person who with controlled senses speaks the truth from his birth and who endures everything at the hands of his preceptor and of the Brahmanas and who practises forgiveness, gains an end that is equal to that of kine.

21. Improper words O lord of Sachi, should never be addressed to a Brahmana. One again should not, in even his mind, do an injury to a cow One should in his conduct, imitate the cow, and show mercy towards the cow.

22 Hear, O Shakra of the fruits which truthful persons enjoy If such a person gives away a single cow, that one cow becomes a thousand-fold.

23 If a Kshatriya endued with such qualifications, makes a gift of a single cow, his merit equals that of a Brahmana's. That single cow, listen, O Shakra, which such a Kshatriya gives away produces as much merit as the single cow that a Brahmana gives away does under similar circumstances This is the issue of the scriptures.

24 If a Vaishya, endued with similar accomplishments, were to make a gift of a single cow that cow would equal five hundred kine If a Sudra endued with humility were to make a gift of a cow, such cow would be equal to a hundred and twenty-five kine.

25. Given to penances and truth, versed in scriptures through dutiful services done to his preceptor, gifted with forgiving nature, engaged in the adoration of the deities, possessed of a tranquil soul, pure, enlightened, observant of all duties, and freed from every sort of egotism, that man who makes a gift of a cow to a Brahmana, forsooth, acquires great merit through that act of his, viz, the gift, according to proper rites, of a cow giving profuse milk Hence, one, with singleness of devotion, observant of truth, and engaged in humbly serving his preceptor, should always make gifts of kine

27 Hear, O Shakra, what the merit is of that person who, duly studying the Vedas, shows respect for kine, who always becomes glad on seeing kine and who since his birth always bows his head to kine.

28 The merit which one wins by celebrating the Rajasuya sacrifice the merit that one acquires by making gifts of heaps of gold, that high merit is acquired by a person who shows such respect for kine. Virtuous Rishis and great persons crowned with success have said so.

29 Given to truth, possessed of a tranquil soul, free from cupidity, always truthful in speech, and behaving with respect towards kine with the steadiness of a vow, the man who for a whole year, before himself taking any food, regularly presents some food to kine, acquires the merit, by such an act, of the gift of a thousand kine.

30. That man who takes only one meal a day and who gives away the entire quantity of his other meal to kine,—that man, who thus respects kine with the steadiness of a vow and shows such mercy towards them—enjoys for ten years unlimited happiness.

31. That man who takes himself only one meal a day and with the other meal saved for some time purchases a cow and makes a gift of it, acquires, through that gift, O you of a hundred sacrifices, the eternal merit of the gift of as many kine as there are hairs on the body of that single cow so given away.

32 These are sayings about the merits that Brahmanas acquire by making gifts of kine. Listen now to the merits that Kshatriyas may acquire It has been said that a Kshatriya, by purchasing a cow in this manner and making a gift of it to a Brahmana, acquires great happines for five years A Vaishya, by such conduct, wins only half the merit of a Kshatriyas, and a Shudra, by such conduct, wins half the merit that a Vaishya does 33 That man who sells himself and with the proceeds thereof purchases kine and gives them away to Brahmanas, enjoys happiness in Heaven for as long a period as kine are seen on Earth.

34—35 It has been said, O highly blessed one, that a region of eternal happiness exists in every hair of such kine as are purchased with the proceeds obtained by selling oneself. That man who having acquired kine by battle makes gifts of them, acquires as much merit as he who makes gifts of kine after having bought the same with the proceeds of selling oneself That man who, in the absence of kine, makes a gift of a cow made of sesame seeds, controlling his senses the while, is saved by such a cow from every sort of calamity or distress Such a man sports in great happiness

36 The mere gift of kine is not fraught with merit The considerations of worthy recipients, of time, of the kind of kine and of the ritual to be observed should be seen. One should determine the proper time for making a gift of kine One should also determine the distinctive qualifications of both Brahmanas and of kine themselves Kine should not be given to one in whose house they are likely to suffer from fire or the sun.

37 One who is rich in Vedic learning, who is of pure birth, who is gifted with a tranquil soul, who is given to the celebration of sacrifices, who fears the perpetration of sin who is gifted with varied knowledge, who is compassionate towards kine who is mild in conduct who gives protection to all who seek it of him, and who has no means of livelihood assigned to him, is considered as a proper person for receiving a gift of kine.

38. To a Brahmana who has no means of livelihood, to him while he is want of food for purposes of agriculture, for a child born on account of Homa for the purposes of his preceptor, for the sustenance of a child born should a cow be given Indeed, the gift should be made at a proper time and in a proper place.

39 Those kine, O Shakra, whose dispositions are well known, which have been won as honoraria for knowledge, or which have been bought in exchange for other animals (such as goats, sheep, etc), or which have been got by prowess of arms or obtained as marriage dower, or which have been acquired by being rescued from situations of danger, or which, their poor owners, being unable to maintain them, have been made over by careful keepers one's house with the wish of remaining there, are, for such reasons, considered as proper objects of gift.

40. Those kine which are strong of body, which have good dispositions, and which emit a sweet fragrance, are highly spoken of in the matter of gifts As Ga ga is the foremost of all rivers, so is a Kapila the foremost of all kine.

41. Abstaining from all food and subsisting only upon water for three nights, and sleeping for the same time upon the naked earth, one should make gifts of kine to Brahmanas after having pleased them with other presents. Such kine, freed from every vice should, at the same time, be accompanied by healthy calves Having made the gift, the giver should live for the next three days successively on food consisting only of the products of the cow.

42 By giving away a good natured cow, that quietly allows herself to be milked, that always brings forth living and healthy calves and that does not fly away from the owner's house, the giver enjoys happiness in the next world for as many years as there are hairs on her body

43 Likewise, by giving to a Brahmana a bull that is capable of carrying heavy loads, that is young and strong and quiet, that quietly bears the yoke of the plough, and that is possessed of such energy as is sufficient to undergo even great labour, one acquires such regions as are his who gives away ten kine.

44. That person who rescues kine and Brahmanas in the forest, O Kaushika, is himself rescued from every sort of danger. Hear what his merit is.

45 The merit such a man wins is equal to the eternal merit of a Horse-sacrifice Such a person acquires whatever end he desires at the hour of death.

46. For such an act a man acquires many a region of happiness,—in fact, whatever happiness he seeks in his heart.

47. Indeed, such a man permitted by kine, lives honoured in every region of happiness. That man who follows kine every day in the forest with this intention, himself living the while on grass and cow-dung and leaves of trees, his heart freed from desire of fruit, his senses controlled from every improper object, and his mind purified,—that man—O you of a hundred sacrifices, lives happily freed from the control of desire in my region or in any other region of happiness that he wishes, in the company of the celestials.

CHAPTER LXXIV.

Indra said:—

1 I desire to know, O Grandfather, what the end is of him who consciously steals a cow or who sells one from motives of cupidity

The Grandfather said —

2 Hear of the consequences that befall those persons who steal a cow for killing her for food or selling her for money, or making a gift of her to a Brahmana

3 He who, without being governed by the restraints of the Scriptures, sells a cow, or kills one, or eats the flesh of a cow, or they who, for the sake of money, allow a person to kill kine,—all these, viz., he that kills, he that eats, and he that allows the destruction,—rot in hell for as many years as there are hairs on the body of the cow so killed.

5 O you of great power, those sins and those kinds of faults that have been said to attach to one which obstructs a Brahmana's sacrifice, are said to attach to the sale and the theft of kine.

6 That man who having stolen a cow makes a gift of her to a Brahmana, enjoys happiness in Heaven as the reward of the gift but suffers misery in Hell for the sin of theft for the same period.

7. Gold has been said to form the present, O you of great splendour, in gifts of kine. Indeed, gold has been said to be the best present in all sacrifices.

8 By making a gift of kine one is said to rescue his ancestors to seventh degree as also his descendants to the seventh degree. By giving away kine with the presents of gold, one rescues his ancestors and descendants of double the number.

9 The gift of gold is the best of gifts. Gold is, again, the best present Gold is a great purifier, O Shakra and is, indeed, the best of all purifying objects.

10 O you of a hundred sacrifices, gold has been said to be the purifier of the entire family of him who gives it away I have thus O you of great splendour, told you in brief of Dakhsina

Bhishma said:—

11 This was said by the Grandfather to Indra, O chief of Bharata's race Indra delivered it to Dasharatha, and Dasharatha in his turn to his son Rama.

12. Rama of Raghu's race gave it to his dear and illustrious brother Lakshmana. While living in the forest, Lakshmana imparted it to the Rishis.

13. It has then described from generation to generation, for the Rishis of rigid vows held it amongst themselves as also the pious kings of the Earth

14. My preceptor, O Yudhishthira, communicated it to me. That Brahmana who recites it every day in the conclaves of Brahmanas in sacrifices, or at gifts of kine, or when two persons meet together, acquires hereafter many regions of unending happiness where he always lives with the celestials as his companions 16 The holy Brahman, the supreme Lord, had said so.

CHAPTER LXXV.

(ANUSHASANIKA PARVA) — Continued.

Yudhishthira said —

1. I have been greatly assured, O you of power, by you thus discoursing to me of duties. I shall, however, express the doubts I have. Explain them to me, O grandfather.

2 What are the fruits, described in the scriptures, of the vows that men observe Of what nature are the fruits, O you of great splendour, of observances of other kinds? What, again, are the fruits of one's Vedic studies.

3 What are the fruits of gifts, and what those of keeping the Vedas in memory? What are the fruits of teaching the Vedas? I wish to know all this.

4. What, O grandfather, are the merits of the non-acceptance of gifts in this world. What fruits does one enjoy who makes gifts of knowledge?

5 What merits do persons enjoy who perform the duties of their order, as also do heroes who do not retreat from the battle field What are the fruits of the observance of purity and of the practice of Brahmacharya?

6. What are the merits of serving the parents What also are the merits of serving preceptors and teachers, and what the merits of mercy and kindness?

7. I wish to know all this, O grandfather, in sooth and in particular, O you, who are conversant with all the scriptures Great is my curiosity.

Bhishma said —

8 He enjoys eternal regions of happiness, who, having properly commenced a Vrata (vow) completes its observance according to the scriptures

9 The fruits of restraints, O king, are visible even in this world These rewards that you have acquired are those of Niyamas and sacrifices

10 The fruits of the Vedic studies are seen both in this world and the next. The person who is given to the study of the Vedas is seen to sport happily both in this world and in the region of Brahma

11 Listen now to me, O king, as I tell you in detail what the fruits are of self-control The self-controlled are happy everywhere The self controlled always enjoy that happiness which results from the absence or subjugation of desire.

12 The self-controlled can go everywhere at will The self-controlled can destroy every enemy Forsooth, the self-controlled succeed in getting everything they seek.

13 The self controlled, O son of Pandu, obtain the fruition of every desire. The self-controlled and the forgiving share the happiness that men enjoy in Heaven through penances and prowess, (in arms), through gift, and through various sacrifices.

14 Self-control is more meritorious than gift A giver, after making a gift to the Brahmanas, may yield to the influence of anger A self controlled man, however, never gives way to anger Hence self control is superior to gift That man who makes gifts without yielding to anger, succeeds in acquiring eternal regions of happiness

16 Anger destroys the merit of a gift. Hence self control is superior to gift

17 There are ten thousand invisible places O monarch, in Heaven Existing in all the regions of Heaven these places belong to the Rishis Persons, leaving this world attain to them and become changed into deities.

18 O king, the great Rishis repair there, helped only by their self control, and as the end of their efforts to attain to a region of superior happiness, Hence, self-control is superior to gift.

19 The person who becomes a preceptor, and who duly adores the fire taking leave of all his miseries in this world, enjoys endless happiness, O king, in the region of Brahma.

20. That man who, having himself read the Vedas imparts a knowledge thereof to righteous disciples and who praises the acts of his own preceptor, acquires great honors in Heaven.

21 That Kshatriya who is given to the studies of the Vedas to the celebration of sacrifices to the making of gifts, and who rescues the lives of others in battle, similarly acquires great honors in Heaven.

22. The Vaishya who, observes the duties of his caste, makes gifts, reaps as the fruit of those gifts, a crowning reward. The Shudra who duly observes the duties of his order, acquires Heaven as the reward of such services.

23 Various kinds of heroes have been spoken of. Listen to me as I explain to you what the rewards are that they attain to. The rewards are fixed of a hero belonging to a heroic race.

24 There are heroes of sacrifice, heroes of self-control, heroes of truth and others equally entitled to to the name of hero. There are heroes of battle, and heroes of gift or liberality among men.

25. There are many persons who may be called the heroes of the Sankhya faith, there are many others that are called heroes of Yoga. There are others who are considered as heroes in the forest-life, of domesticity, and of renunciation.

26 Likewise, there are others who are called heroes of the intellect, and also heroes of forgiveness. There are other men who live in tranquility and who are considered as heroes of virtue.

27 There are various other kinds of heroes who practise various other kinds of vows and observances. There are heroes given to the study of the Vedas and heroes devoted to the teaching of the same.

28. There are, again, men who come to be regarded as heroes for the devotion with which they wait upon and serve their preceptors, as indeed, heroes in respect of the respect they show for their fathers. There are heroes in obedience to mothers, and heroes in the life of mendicancy they lead.

29 There are heroes in the matter of hospitality to guests, whether living as hermits or as house holders. All these heroes attain to very superior regions of happiness which are, of course, acquired by them as the rewards of their own deeds.

30 Keeping all the Vedas in memory or ablutions performed in all the sacred waters, may or may not be equal to telling the Truth every day in one's life.

31. A thousand Horse sacrifices and Truth were once weighed in the balance. It was seen that Truth weighed heavier than a thousand Horse-sacrifices.

32 It is by Truth that the Sun is giving heat, it is by Truth that fire burns up; it is by Truth that the winds blow, indeed, everything rests upon Truth.

33 It is Truth that pleases the deities, the departed manes, and the Brahmanas. Truth has been said to be the highest duty. Therefore, no one should ever transgress Truth.

34 The Munis are all given to Truth. Their prowess depends upon Truth. They also swear by Truth. Hence Truth is pre-eminent. All truthful men, O chief of Bharata's race, succeed by their truthfulness in acquiring Heaven and sporting there in happiness.

35 Self-control is the attainment of the reward that attaches to Truth. I have described it with my whole heart. The man of humble heart who is endued with self-control, forsooth, acquires great honors in Heaven.

36—37. Listen now to me, O king as I explain to you the merits of Brahmacharyya. That man who practises the vow of Brahmacharyya from his birth to the time of his Death, know, O king, has nothing unattainable! Many millions of Rishis are living in the region of Brahma.

38—39 All of them, while here, were given to Truth, and self control, and had their vital seed drawn up. The vow of Brahmacharyya, O king, duly observed by a Brahmana, is sure to dissipate all his sins. The Brahmana is said to be a burning fire. In those Brahmanas that are given to penances, the deity of fire becomes visible.

40 If a Brahmcharin gives way to anger on account of any slight, the chief of the deities himself trembles in fear. This is the visible fruit of the vow of Brahmacharyya that is observed by the Rishis.

41—42 Listen to me, O Yudhishthira, what the merit is of the worship of the father and the mother. He who dutifully serves his father without ever provoking him in anything or similarly serves his mother or (elder) brother or other senior or preceptor, it should be known, O king, acquires a residence in Heaven. The man of purified soul, on account of such service done to his seniors, has never to even see Hell.

CHAPTER LXXVI.

(ANUSHASANIKA PARVA)—Continued.

Yudhishthira said:—

1. I wish, O king, to hear you discourse in detail upon those high ordinances which regulate gifts of kine, for it is by making gifts (of kine) according to those ordinances that one acquires innumerable regions of eternal happiness

Bhishma said:—

2. There is no gift, O king, that is higher in point of merit than the gift of kine. A cow, lawfully acquired, if given away, immediately rescues the entire family of the giver.

3. That ritual which sprang for the benefit of the pious, was subsequently declared for the sake of all creatures That ritual has come down from primeval time. It existed even before it was declared. Indeed, O king, listen to me as I recite to you that ritual which affects the gift of kine.

4. Formerly, when a number of kine was brought (before him), king Mandhatri, filled with doubt about the ritual he should observe, properly questioned Vrihaspati for an explanation of that doubt.

Vrihaspati said:—

5 Duly observing restraints all the while, the giver of kine should, on the previous day, properly honor the Brahmanas and appoint the time of gift. As for the kine to be given away, they should be of the class called Rohini.

6. The kine also should be addressed with the words—Samange and Valule—Entering the fold where the kine are kept, the following Shrutis should be uttered —

7. The cow is my mother. The bull is my father. (Give me) Heaven and Earthly prosperity. The cow is my refuge —Entering the fold and acting thus, the giver should pass the night there He should again utter the formula when actually giving away the kine.

8 The giver, thus living with the kine in the fold without doing anything to control their freedom, and lying down on the naked earth, becomes readily cleansed of all his sins on account of his bringing himself down to a condition of perfect similitude with the kine.

9 When the Sun rises in the morning, you should give away the cow, accompanied by her calf and a bull. As the reward of such a deed, you will surely attain to the celestial region. You will also enjoy the blessings shown by the Mantras

10 The Mantras contain these references to kine: Kine are gifted with strength and energetic exertion Kine are also wise They are the root of that immortality which sacrifice yields They are the root of all energy. They are the steps by which earthly prosperity is gained. They are the eternal course of the universe. They multiply one's race.

11. Let the kine dissipate my sins. They have in them the nature of both the Sun and the Moon. Let them help me in the attainment of the celestial region. Let them come to me, as a mother takes to her children. May I enjoy all other blessings which have not been named in the Mantras I have uttered.

12 For alleviating or curing phthisis and other wasting diseases, and for achieving freedom from the body, if a person takes the help of the five products of the cow, kine confer blessings upon the person like the river Saraswati —Ye kine, ye are always conveyers of all sorts of merit. Pleased with me, do ye assign a desirable end for me.

13 I have to-day become what ye are. By giving you away, I really give myself away.—Ye do not belong to him who gives you away. Ye have now become mine. Possessed of the nature of both the Sun and the Moon, do ye cause both the giver and the receiver to shine with all kinds of prosperity.

14 The giver should duly utter the words found in the first part of the above Verse The twice born recipient, conversant with the ritual regulating the gift of kine, should, when receiving the kine in gift, utter the words found in the latter half of the above Verse.

15 The man who, instead of a cow, gives away the usual value thereof or cloths or gold, is considered as the giver of a cow. The giver, when giving away the usual value of a cow, should utter the words,—This cow with face upturned is being given away. Do you accept her —The man who gives away cloths should utter the words, —Bhavitavya—(this should be regarded as representing a cow). The man who gives away gold should utter the word —Vaishnavi iti, the gold is of the form and nature of a cow.

16. These are the words that should be uttered according to the kind of gift mentioned above. The reward that was reaped by making gifts of kine is residence in the celestial region for six and thirty thousand years, eight thousand years, and twenty thousand years respectively.

17. These are the merits, respectively, of gifts of things as substitutes of kine While, about him who gives an actual cow all the merits that attach to gifts of kine become his at only the eighth step of the recipient.

18. He who gives an actual cow becomes gifted with righteous conduct in this world He who gives the value of a cow becomes freed from every sort of fear. He who gives a cow never suffers from sorrow All the three, as also they who regularly perform their ablutions and other acts at early dawn, and he who is well conversant with the Mahabharata, it is well known attain to the regions of Vishnu and Soma.

19 Having given away a cow, the giver should, for three nights, adopt the vaccine vow, and pass one night with kine. Beginning again from that lunation, numbering the eighth named Kamya, he should pass three nights, living exclusively on milk and the urine and dung of the cow

20. By giving away a bull, one acquires the merit of Brahmacharyya By giving away two kine, one acquires the mastery of the Vedas That man who celebrates a sacrifice and makes gifts of kine according to the ritual laid down, attains to many great regions These, however, are not attainable by the person who does not know that ritual

21. That man who gives away even a single cow, which gives profuse milk, acquires the merit of giving away all desirable objects on Earth collected together What more should be said of the gift of many such kine as give Havya and Kavya on account of their full udders? The merit which belongs to the gift of superior oxen is greater than that of the gift of kine.

22 One should not, by giving a knowledge of this ritual, benefit a person who is not his disciple or who does not observe vows or who is bereft of faith or who is possessed of a crooked understanding Indeed this religion is a mystery, which many people do not know. One who knows it should not speak of it everywhere

23 There are, in the world, many men who have no faith. There are among men many persons who are mean and who resemble Rakshasas This religion, if given to them would lead to evil It would produce equal evil if given to such sinful men as are atheists

24 Listen to me, O king, as I recite to you the names of those pious kings who have attained to regions of great happiness as the reward of those gifts of kine which they made according to the instructions of Vrihaspati.

25. Ushinara, Vishwagashwa, Nriga, Bhagiratha, the celebrated Mandhatri the son of Yuvanashwa, king Muchukunda, Bhuridyumna, Naishadha Sonaka Pururavas, emperor Bharata to whose race belongs all the Bharatas the heroic Rama tha son of Dasharatha and many other celebrated kings of great deeds, and also king Dilipa of widely-known deeds all, on account of their gifts of kine according to the ritual, attained to Heaven. King Mandhatri, was always observant of sacrifices, gifts, penances royal duties, and gifts of kine.

18 Therefore, O son of Pritha, do you also keep in mind, those instructions of Vrihaspati which I have recited to you. Having obtained the kingdom of the Kurus, do you, with a cheerful heart, make gifts of good kine to foremost of Brahmanas.

Vaishampayana said:—

29. Thus addressed by Bhishma on the subject of properly making gifts of kine, king Yudhishthira did all that Bhishma desired Indeed, king Yudhishthira bore in mind the whole of that religion which the preceptor of the gods imparted to the Royal Mandhatri

30. Yudhishthira from that time began to always make gifts of kine and to maintain himself with grains of barley and cow-dung as both his food and drink, The king also began to sleep from that day on the naked earth and possessed of controlled soul and resembling a bull in conduct, he became the foremost of monarchs

31 The Kuru king from that day became very attentive to kine and always adored them, singing their praises From that day, the king gave up the practice of yoking kine to his cars Wherever he had occasion to go he proceeded on cars drawn by horses of good breed.

CHAPTER LXXVII.

(ANUSHASANA PARVA)—Continued.

Vaishampayana said:—

1. King Yudhishthira gifted with humility, once again asked the royal son of Shantanu on the subject of gifts of kine in full.

The king said :—

2 Do you, O Bharata, once more describe to me in full the merits of giving away kine. Indeed, O hero, I have not been satiated with hearing your nectar-like words

Vaishampayana said :—

3 Thus accosted by king Yudhishthira the just, Shantanu's son began to describe to him once again, in full, the merits of the gift of kine.

Bhishma said :—

4 By giving to a Brahmana a cow having a calf, gifted with docility and other virtues, young in years and covered round with a piece of cloth, one is purged of all his sins.

5 There are many regions which have no sun One who makes the gift of a cow has not to go there

6 That man, however, who gives to a Brahmana a cow that cannot drink or eat, that has her milk dried up, that has weakened senses and that is diseased and overcome with decrepitude, and that may, therefore, be compared to a tank whose water has been dried up —indeed, the man who gives such a cow to a Brahmana and thereby inflicts only pain and disappointment upon him, has certainly to enter into dark Hell.

7 That cow which is wrathful and vicious or diseased, or weak, or which has been brought without the price agreed upon having been paid, or which would only afflict the twice born recipient with distress and disappointment, should never be given. The regions such a man may acquire would not give him any happiness or energy.

8 Only such kine as are strong, gifted with good behaviour, young in years, and possessed of odour, are highly spoken of by all Indeed, as Ganga is the foremost of all rivers so is a Kapila cow the foremost of all kine.

Yudhishthira said :—

9 Why O grandfather, do the righteous highly speak of the gift of a Kapila cow when all good kine that are given away should be considered as equal? O you of great power, I wish to hear what the superiority is of a Kapila cow. You are indeed competent to discourse to me on this subject.

Bhishma said :—

10. I have, O son, heard old men recite this history about the circumstancess under which the Kapila cow was created. I shall recite that old history to you.

11. Formerly the Self create Brahman commanded the Rishi Daksha, saying,—Do you create living creatures.—For doing good to creatures, Daksha, first of all created food.

12. As the deities live upon nectar, so all living creatures, O powerful one, live upon the food assigned by Daksha.

13 Among all objects mobile and immobile, the mobile are superior. Among mobile creatures, Brahmanas are superior. The sacrifices are all set upon them.

14 It is by sacrifice that Soma is got. Sacrifice has been fixed upon kine The gods become pleased through sacrifices. The means of livelihood were created first, creatures came next.

15 As soon as creatures were born, they began to cry aloud for food All of them then approached their creator who was to give them food, like children approaching their parents

16 Approved of the desire of all his creatures, the holy lord of all creatures, viz, Daksha, for the sake of his creatures, himself drank a quantity of nectar.

17. He became pleased with the nectar, he drank and thereupon an eructation came out, spreading an excellent odour all around That eructation, Daksha saw gave birth to a cow which he named Surabhi. This Surabhi was thus a daughter of his, that had come out of his mouth.

18. That cow called Surabhi gave birth to a number of daughters who became the mothers of the world They were gold-hued, and were all Kapilas They were the means of livelihood for all creatures.

19 As those kine, whose complexion resembled that of nectar, began to pour milk, the froth of that milk arose and began to spread on all sides as when the waves of a running river dashing against one another, sufficient froth is produced that spreads on all sides.

20 Some of that froth fell, from the mouths of the calves that were sucking, upon the head of Mahadeva who was then sitting on the Earth. The powerful Mahadeva thereupon, stricken with anger, looked at those kine.

21. With that third eye of his which adorns his forehead, he seemed to burn those kine as he espied them Like the Sun living masses of clouds with various colours, the energy that, came out from the third eye of Mahadeva produced, O king, various complexions in those kine. Those amongst them, however, which succeeded in escaping from the looks of Mahadeva by entering the region of Soma, remained of the same color with which they were born, for no change was produced in their color. Seeing that Mahadeva had become highly wroth, Daksha, the lord of all creatures, addressed him, saying —You have, O great deity, been drenched with nectar. The milk or the froth that escapes from the mouths of calves sucking their dams is never considered as impure. The Moon, after drinking the nectar, pours it once more. It is not, therefore, regarded as impure.

25. Likewise, the milk that these kine give, being born of nectar, should not be considered as impure. The wind can never become impure Fire can never become impure Gold can never become impure The Ocean can never become impure

26 The Nectar, even when drunk by the gods, can never become impure. Likewise, the milk of a cow, even when her udders are sucked by her calf, can never become impure These kine will support all these worlds with the milk they will give and the clarified butter that will be made from it

27. All creatures wish to enjoy the sacred wealth, at one with nectar, that kine possess —Having said these words, the lord of creatures Daksha made a present to Mahadeva of a bull with certain kine.

28 Daksha pleased Rudra, O Bharata, with that present Mahadeva thus pleased, made that bull his career And it was after the form of that bull that Mahadeva adopted the emblem on the standard floating on his battle car. Therefore it is that Rudra came to be known as the bull-bannered deity.

29 It was on that occasion also that the celestials, in a body, made Mahadeva the lord of animals. Indeed, the great Rudra became the Master of kine and is named as the bull-emblemed deity.

30 Hence, O king, the gift of kine is considered as primarily desirable of Kapila kine which are endued with great energy and possessed of unchanged colour.

31. Thus are kine the foremost of all creatures in the world. It is from them that the food of all the worlds has emanated. They have Rudra for their lord They yield (nectar) in the form of milk. They are auspicious and sacred, and grantors of every wish and givers of life A person by making a gift of a cow is considered as making a gift of every article that is to be enjoyed by men.

32. That man who, wishing to acquire prosperity, reads with a pure heart and body, these Verses on the origin of kine, becomes purged of all his sins and acquires prosperity and children and wealth and animals.

33 He who makes a gift of a cow, O king, always succeeds in winning the merits of gifts of Havya and Kavya, of the offer of oblations of water to the departed Manes of religious acts whose performance brings peace and happiness of the gift of vehicles and cloths, and of cherishing of children and the old

Vaishampayana said :—

34 *Hearing these words of his grand-*father, Pritha's son, viz the royal Yudhishthira of Ajamida's race fasting with his brothers, began to make gifts of both bulls and kine of different colors to foremost of Brahmanas.

35 Indeed, for getting regions of felicity in the next, and acquiring great fame king Yudhishthira celebrated many sacrifices and as sacrificial presents, gave away hundreds of thousands of kine to such Brahmanas

CHAPTER LXXVIII.

(ANUSHASANIKA PARVA) — Continued

Bhishma said :—

1—2. Formerly, king Saudasa born of Ikshaku's race that foremost of eloquent men, on one occasion approached his family priest, viz, Vashishtha, that foremost of Rishis, crowned with ascetic success, capable of passing through every region, the receptacle of Brahma, and gifted with eternal life, and put to him the following question

Saudasa said :—

3 O holy one, O sinless one, what is that in the three worlds which is sacred and by reciting which at all times a man may win high merit ?

Bhishma said —

4 *Having first bowed to kine and puri-*fied himself, the learned Vashishtha described to king Saudasa who stood before him with head bent in reverence, the mystery about kine, a subject that is fraught with results highly beneficial to all persons.

Vashishtha said :—

5 Kine, are always fragrant The perfume of the Amyris agallochum comes out of their bodies. Kine are the great refuge of all creatures Kine form the great source of blessings to all.

6 Kine are the Past and the Future Kine are the root of eternal growth Kine are the root of Prosperity. Anything given to kine is never lost.

7 Kine from the highest food. They are the best Havi for the celestials The Mantras called Swaha and Vashat are forever established in kine

8 Kine form the fruit of sacrifices Sacrifices are established in kine Kine are the Future and the Past, and the Sacrifices rest on them.

9 Morning and evening kine give to the Rishis, O foremost of men, Havi for use in Homa, O you of great effulgence.

10 They who make gifts of kine succeed in getting over all sins which they may have committed and all kinds of dangers into which they may fall, O you of great power.

11. The man possessing ten kine and making a gift of one cow, one possessing a hundred kine and making a gift of ten kine, and one possessing a thousand kine and making a gift of a hundred kine, all acquire the same measure of merit.

12 That man who, having hundred kine, does not establish a domestic fire for daily worship, that man who though possessed of a thousand kine does not celebrate sacrifices, and that man who though having riches acts as a miser, are all three considered as not worthy of any respect

13 Those men who make gifts of Kapila kine with their calves and with vessels of white brass for milking them —kine, which are not vicious and which while given away, are wrapped round with cloths,—conquer both this and the next world.

14—15 Such persons as make gift of a young bull, that has all its senses, strong, and that may be considered as the foremost one among hundreds of herds, that has large horns adorned with ornaments, to a Brahmana endued with Vedic lore, succeed O scorcher of foes, in acquiring great prosperity and riches each time they are born in the world.

16. One should never go to bed without reciting the names of kine Nor should one rise from bed in the morning without similarly reciting the names of kine. Morning and evening one should bend one's head respectfully to kine As the result of such deeds, one is sure to acquire great prosperity.

17 One should never feel any repugnance for the urine and the dung of the cow. One should never eat the meat of kine As the result of this, one is sure to acquire great prosperity

18. One should always recite the names of kine One should never show any disregard for kine in any way If evil dreams are seen, men should recite the names of kine

19. One should always bathe, using cowdung. One should sit on dried cowdung One should never pass urine and excreta and other secretions on cowdung One should never obstruct kine in any way

20 One should eat, sitting on a cowhide purified by dipping it in water, and then look towards the west Sitting with controlled speech, one should eat clarified butter using the bare earth as his dish One reaps, on account of such deeds, that prosperity of which kine are the root.

21. One should pour libations on the fire, using clarified butter for purpose One should make Brahmanas utter blessings upon one by presents of clarified butter. One should make gifts of clarified butter. One should also eat clarified butter As the reward of such deeds one is sure to acquire that prosperity which kine grant.

22 That man who inspires a cow's form made of sesame seeds by uttering the Vedic Mantras named Gomati, and then adorns that form with every sort of gems and makes a gift of it, has never to suffer any grief on account of all his deeds of omission and commission.

23 Let kine which give profuse milk and which have horns adorned with gold,—kine viz., that are Surabhis or the daughters of Surabhis,—approach me even as rivers approach the ocean

24. I always look at kine Let kine always look at me Kine are ours. We are theirs We are there where kine are

25. Thus, at night or day, in weal or woe,—at times of even great fear —should a man exclaim By uttering such words, he is sure to become freed from every fear."

CHAPTER LXXIX.

Vashishtha said —

1 The kine which had been created in a former age practised the hardest penances for a hundred thousand years with the object of acquiring a position of great pre-eminence

2 Indeed, O scorcher of enemies, they said to themselves —We shall, in this world, become the best of all kinds of presents in sacrifices and we shall not be liable to be sullied with any fault.

3—4 By bathing in water mixed with our dung, people shall become purified ; The celestials and men shall use our dung for the purpose of purifying all creatures mobile and immobile They also who will give us away shall acquire those regions of happiness which will be ours

5 Appearing to them at the termination of their austerities, the powerful Brahman gave them the boons they sought, saying,—your desire will be fulfilled Do you rescue all the worlds

6 Crowned with fruition of their desires, they all rose up —those mothers of both the Past and the Future Every morning, people should bow respectfully to kine. As the result of this, they are sure to acquire prosperity.

7 At the termination of their penances, O king, kine became the refuge of the world It is therefore that kine are said to be highly blessed, sacred and the foremost of all things It is therefore that kine are said to stay at the very head of all creatures.

8 By giving away a Kapila cow with a calf resembling herself, giving profuse milk, free from every vicious habit, and covered with a piece of cloth, the giver acquires great honors in the region of Brahma.

9 By giving away a red cow with a calf that resembles herself, giving milk, free from every vice, and covered with a piece of cloth, one acquires great honors in the region of the Sun.

10 By giving away a cow of variegated hue, with a calf similar to herself, giving milk, free from every vice, and covered with a piece of cloth, one acquires great honors in the region of Soma.

11. By giving away a white cow, with a calf similar to herself, giving milk, free from every vice, and covered with a piece of cloth, one acquires great honors in the region of Indra.

12 By giving away a cow of dark hue, with a calf similar to herself, giving milk, free from every vice, and covered with a piece of cloth, one acquires great honors in the region of Fire-God.

13 By giving away a smoke-colored cow with a calf similar to herself, giving milk, free from every vice, and covered with a piece of cloth, one acquires great honors in the region of Yama.

14 By giving away a frothy-coloured cow, with a calf and a vessel of white brass for milking her, and covered with a piece of cloth, one acquires the region of Varuna.

15 By giving away a dust-coloured cow, with a calf and a vessel of white brass for milking her, and covered with a piece of cloth, one acquires great honors in the region of the Wind God

16 By giving away a gold hued cow, having eyes of a tawny color, with a calf and a vessel of white brass for making her, and covered with a piece of cloth, one enjoys the happiness of the region of Kuvera.

17 By giving away a cow of the hue of the smoke of straw, with calf and a vessel of white brass for milking her, and covered with a piece of cloth, one acquires great honors in the region of the departed Manes.

18 By giving away a fat cow with the flesh of its throat hanging down and accompanied by her calf, one acquires easily the high region of the Vishwedevas.

19 By giving away a Gouri cow, with a calf similar to her, giving milk, free from every vice, and covered with a piece of cloth, one acquire the region of the Vasus

20. By giving away a cow of the hue of a white blanket, with a calf and a vessel of white brass, and covered with a piece of cloth, one acquires the region of the Saddhyas.

21. By giving away a bull with a huge hump and adorned with every jewel, the giver, O king, acquires the region of the Maruts.

22 By giving away a blue-coloured bull, that is full-grown in years and adorned with every ornament, the giver acquires the regions of the celestial musicians and nymphs.

23. By giving away a cow with the flesh of her throat hanging down, and adorned with every ornament, the giver, shorn of grief, acquires the region of Prajapati himself.

24. That man, O king, who habitually makes gifts of kine, proceeds, passing through the clouds, on a sunny car to the celestial region and shines there in splendour.

25. That man who habitually makes gifts of kine is considered as the foremost of his kind When thus proceeding to celestial region, he is received by a thousand celestial damsels of beautiful hips and adorned with handsome dresses and ornaments.

These girls serve him there and minister to his delight

26 He sleeps there in peace and is awakened by the musical laughter of those gazelle eyed maidens the sweet notes of their Vinas the soft strains of their lutes, and the sweet tinkle of their Nupuras

27 The man who makes gifts of kine lives in the celestial region and is honored there for as many years as there are hairs on the bodies of the kine he gives away Falling off from the celestial region (upon the termination of his merit) such a man is born as a man and, in fact, in a superior family among men.

CHAPTER LXXX.

Vashishtha said —

1 Kine give clarified butter and milk They are the sources of clarified butter and they have originated from clarified butter They are rivers of clarified butter and eddies of clarified butter. Let kine ever be in my house

2 Clarified butter is always in my heart. Clarified butter is even established in my navel Clarified butter is in every limb of mine Clarified butter lives in my mind.

3 Kine are always at my front. Kine are always at my rear. Kine are on every side of my body. I live in the midst of kine

4 Having purified oneself by touching water, one should, morning and evening recite these Mantras every day By this, one is sure to be purged of all the sins one may commit in course of the day.

5 They who make gifts of a thousand kine, leaving this world, proceed to the regions of the Gandharvas and the celestial nymphs where there are many palatial buildings made of gold and where the celestial Ganga, called the current of Vasu, runs

6 Givers of a thousand kine go there where run many rivers having milk for their water, cheese for their mire, and curds for their floating moss.

7 That man who gives hundreds of thousands of kine away according to the ritual laid down in the scriptures acquires great prosperity (here) and great honors in the celestial region.

8 Such a man causes both his paternal and maternal ancestors to the tenth degree acquire regions of great happiness, and sanctifies his whole race.

9 Kine are sacred They are the foremost of all things in the world They are indeed the refuge of the universe They are the mothers of the very celestials They are indeed incomparable They should be dedicated in sacrifices

10 When going on journeys, one should leave the kine to his left Determining the proper time, they should be given away to worthy persons

11. By giving away a Kapila cow having large horns accompanied by a calf and a vessel of white brass for milking her, and covered with a piece of cloth one freed from fear, enters the palace of Yama that is so difficult to enter.

12 One should always recite this sacred Mantra, viz.,—Kine are of beautiful form Kine are of various forms. They are of universal form They are the mothers of the universe O, let kine approach me

13 There is no gift more sacred than that of kine There is no gift that yields more blessed merit Here has been nothing equal to the cow, nor will there be anything that will equal her.

14. With her skin, her hair her horns' the hair of her tail her milk, and her fat — with all these together,—the cow maintains sacrifice. What thing is there that is more useful than the cow?

15 Bending my head to her with respect, I worship the cow who is the mother of both the Past and Future, and by whom the entire universe of mobile and immobile creatures is sustained 16 O best of men, I have thus recited to you only a portion of the great merits of kine There is no gift in this world that is superior to that of kine There is also no refuge in this world that is higher than kine.

Bhishma said :—

17. Considering these words of the Rishi Vashishtha as highly important, that great giver of land king Saudasa, then made gifts of a very large number of kine to the Brahmanas controlling his senses all the while, and as the result of those gifts the king succeeded in acquiring many regions of happiness in the next world

---

CHAPTER LXXXI.

(ANUSHASANIKA PARVA).—Continued

Yudhishthira said:—

1 Tell me, O grandfather, what is that which is the most sacred of all sacred things in the world other than that which has been already mentioned, and which is the greatest of all purifying objects?

Bhishma said:—

2 Kine are the foremost of all objects. They are highly sacred and they save men. With their milk and with the Havi manufactured therefrom, kine sustain all creatures in the universe.

3 O best of the Bharatas, there is nothing that is more sacred than kine. The highest of all things in the three worlds, kine are themselves sacred and capable of purifying others.

4 Kine live in a region that is even greater than the region of the celestials. When given away, they save their givers. Wise men succeed in acquiring the celestial region by making gifts of kine.

5 Yuvanashwa's son Mandhatri, Yayati, and Nahusha, used always to give away kine in thousands.

6. As the reward of those gifts, they have acquired such regions as are unattainable by the very celestials. There is, about it, O sinless one, a discourse delivered of yore. I shall recite it to you.

7—8 Once on a time having finished his morning rites, the intelligent Shuka approached with a controlled mind his father, that foremost of Rishis viz., the Island born Krishna, who knows the distinction between the superior and the inferior, and saluting him said,—What is that sacrifice which appears to you as the foremost of all sacrifices?

9 What is that act by doing which wise men succeed in acquiring the highest region? What is that sacred deed by which the celestials enjoy divine happiness?

10 What forms the character of sacrifice as sacrifice? What is that upon which sacrifice rests? What is that which is considered as the best by the deities? What is that sacrifice which is above the sacrifices of this world? Do you also tell me, O father, what is that which is the most sacred of all things.

11. Having heard these words of his son O chief of Bharata's race, Vyasa, the foremost of all persons knowing duties, said as follows to him.

Vyasa said:—

12. Kine form the support of all creatures. Kine are the refuge of all creatures. Kine are the embodiment of virtue. Kine are sacred, and kine are purifiers of all.

13 Formerly kine were hornless as we have heard. For getting horns they adored the eternal and powerful Brahman.

14 Seeing the kine paying their adorations to him and sitting without food, the powerful Brahman granted to each of them what each desired.

15. Thereafter their horns grew and each got what each wished. Of various colors, and gifted with horns, they began to shine beautifully, O son!

16 Favored by Brahman himself with boons, kine are auspicious and givers of Havya and Kavya. They are the embodiments of virtue. They are sacred and highly blessed. They have excellent form and qualities.

17—18. Kine form high and excellent energy. The gift of kine is highly spoken of. Those good men who shorn of pride, make gifts of kine, are considered as doers of righteous deeds and as givers of all articles. Such men O sinless one, acquire the highly sacred region of kine.

19 The trees there yield sweet fruits. Indeed, those trees are always bedecked with excellent flowers and fruits. Those flowers, O best of twice born persons, have celestial fragrance.

20 The entire soil of that region is formed of gems. The sands there are all gold. The climate there possesses the excellencies of every season. There is no mire, no dust. It is, indeed, highly sacred.

21. The rivers there shine in resplendence for the red lotuses blossoming upon their bosoms, and for the jewels, gems and gold that are on their banks and which display the effulgence of the morning Sun.

22. There are many lakes also on whose breasts are many lotuses, mixed here and there with Nymphœa stellata, and having their petals made of costly gems, and their filaments gold hued.

23 They are also bedecked with flowering forests of the Nerium odorum with thousands of beautiful creepers twining round them, as also with forests of Santanakas bearing flowers.

24 There are rivers whose banks are variegated with many bright pearls and shining gems and gold.

25 Parts of those regions are covered with excellent trees that are decked with jewels and gems of every sort. Some of them are made of gold and some of them are effulgent like fire.

26. There stand many mountains made of gold, and many hills made of jewels and gems. These shine in beauty on account of their tall summits made of all sorts of gems.

27. The trees that bedeck those regions always put forth flowers and fruits, and are always covered with dense foliage. The flowers always yield a celestial fragrance and the fruits are greatly sweet, O chief of Bharata's race.

28 The righteous persons, O Yudhishthira, always sport there happily. Freed from grief and anger, they spend their time there crowned with the fruition of every desire.

29 Pious and illustrious persons sport there happily, moving from place to place, O Bharata, on delightful and highly beautiful cars.

30. Bevies of celestial nymphs always amuse there, with music and dance Indeed, Yudhishthira, a person goes to such regions as the fruit of his making gifts of kine.

31—32 Those regions which are owned by Pushan, and the Maruts of great power, are acquired by givers of kine In riches the royal Varuna is considered as pre eminent The giver of kine acquires riches like that of Varuna himself. One should with the steadiness of a vow, daily recite these Mantras sung by Prajapati himself viz,— Yugandharah, Surupah, Vahurupah, Vishwarupah, and Matara.

33 He who serves kine with respect and who follows them with humility, succeeds in getting many invaluable boons from kine who become pleased with him

34. One should never, even in his heart, injure kine One should, indeed, always confer happiness on them One should always respect kine and adore them, by bending low his head

35 He who does this controlling his senses all the while and filled with cheerfulness, succeeds in acquiring that happiness which is enjoyed by kine One should for three days drink the hot urine of the cow For the next three days one should drink the hot milk of the cow.

36 Having thus drunk for three days hot milk one should next drink hot clarified butter for three days Having thus drunk hot clarified butter for three days, one should live for the next three days on air only.

37. That sacred thing by whose help the celestials enjoy regions of happiness, that which is the most sacred of all sacred things, viz, clarified butter, should then be carried on the head.

38 With the help of clarified butter, one should pour libations on the sacred fire. By making gifts of clarified butter, one should make the Brahmanas utter benedictions on oneself. One should eat clarified butter and make gifts of clarified butter. As the reward of this conduct, one may then acquire that prosperity, which belongs to kine.

39. That man who, for a month, lives upon the gruel of barley picked up every day from cow-dung, becomes purged of sins as heinous as Brahmanicide.

40. After their defeat at the hands of the demons, the deities practised this expiation. It was on account of this expiation that they succeeded in regaining their position as celestials. Indeed, it was through this that they regained their strength and became successful

41. Kine are sacred. They are embodiments of virtue They are high and most efficacious purifiers of all By making gifts of kine to the Brahmanas one acquires the celestial region.

42 Living in a pure state, in the midst of kine one should mentally recite those sacred Mantras named Gomati, after touching pure water. By doing this, one becomes purified.

43—44 Brahmanas of righteous deeds, who have been purified by knowledge, study of the Vedas, and observance of vows, should, only in the midst of sacred fires or kine or conclaves of Brahmanas, impart to their disciples a knowledge of the Gomati Mantras which are in every way like a sacrifice One should observe a fast for three nights for receiving the boon formed by a knowledge of the meaning of the Gomati Mantras.

45. The man who wishes to get a son may obtain it by worshipping these Mantras. He who wishes to acquire riches may have his desire fulfilled by worshipping these Mantras. The girl desirous of having a good husband may have her wish fulfilled by the same means In fact, one may acquire the fruition of every desire he may cherish, by worshipping these sacred Mantras

46 When kine are pleased with the service one renders them they are, forsooth, capable of granting the fruition of every desire Even so, kine are highly blessed. They are the essential articles of sacrifices They are grantors of every wish. Know that there is nothing superior to kine.

Bhishma said :—

47 Thus addressed by his great father, Sruka, gifted with great energy, began from that time to adore kine every day Do you also, O son act thus.

CHAPTER LXXXII

(ANUSHASANIKA PARVA).—Continued

Yudhishthira said —

1. I have heard that the dung of the cow is gifted with prosperity I wish to hear how this has been occasioned I have doubts, O grand father which you should remove

Bhishma said :—

2 Regarding it is cited the old story, O king of the conversation between kine and goddess of prosperity O best of the Bharatas

3 Once on a time assuming a very beautiful form, the goddess Shree entered a herd of kine Seeing her beauty the kine became filled with wonder.

The kine said —

4 Who are you O goddess? Whence have you become nonpariel on Earth for beauty? O highly blessed goddess, we have been filled with wonder at your beauty

5 We wish to know who you are Who, indeed, are you? Where will you proceed? O you of very great beauty, do tell us in detail all we wish to know!—

Shree said —

6 Blessed be ye I am dear to all creatures Indeed I am known by the name of Shree Forsaken by me, the demons have been lost for ever

7 The celestials viz, Indra, Vivaswat, Soma, Vishnu Varuna and Agni, having obtained me, are sporting happily and will do so for ever.

8 Indeed, the Rishis and the celestials only when they are endued with me become successful Ye kine, those beings meet with destruction into whom I do not enter,

9 Virtue, Prosperity, and Pleasure only when endued with me, become sources of happiness. Ye kine who are givers of happiness know that I am gifted with such energy.

10 I wish to always live in every one of you Coming to your presence, I solicit you Be all of you gifted with Shree.

The kine said :—

11. You are fickle and restless. You allow yourself to be enjoyed by many persons We do not wish to have you! Blessed be you go wherever you like.

12 As regards ourselves all of us have good forms What need have we with you? Go wherever thou like You have already pleased us greatly

Shree said —

13 Is it proper with you ye kine that you do not welcome me? I am difficult of being attained. Why then do you not accept me?

14 It appears, ye creatures of excellent vows, that the popular proverb is true viz that it is certain that when one comes to another of his own accord and without being sought, he is not much respected

15 The gods, the Danavas the Gandharvas, the Pishachas, the Uragas the Rakshasas, and human beings succeed in getting me only after practising the severest austerities.

16 Ye who have such energy do ye take me! Ye amiable ones I am never dishonored by any one in the three worlds of mobile and immobile creatures

The kine said :—

17 We do not disregard you O goddess! We do not slight you! You are fickle and of a very restless heart It is for this only that we take leave of you 18 What need of much talk? Go wherever you like All of us have excellent forms What need have we with you, O sinless one?

Shree said —

19 Ye givers of honors renounced by you thus I shall certainly be an object of disregard with all the world! Do ye show me grace

20 Ye are all highly blessed Ye are ever ready to grant protection to those who seek your protection I have come to you soliciting your refuge I have no fault. Do you rescue me.

21. Know that I shall always be devoted to you! I wish to live in any part of your bodies, however repulsive it may be Indeed I wish to live even in your rectum.

22 Ye sinless ones I do not see that ye have any part in your bodies that may be considered as repulsive, for ye are sacred, and purifying and highly blessed! Do ye, however, grant my prayer Do ye tell me in which part of your bodies shall I live.

Bhishma said —

23 Thus addressed by Shree, the kine, always auspicious and bent on showing kindness to all who are devoted to them, parleyed with one another, and then addressing Shree, said to her, O king, these words

The kine said —

24 O you of great fame, it is certainly desirable that we should honor you! Do you live in our urine and dung Both these are sacred, O goddess.

Shree said :—

25 By good luck, ye have shown me much favour Let it be even as you say! Blessed be you all, I have really been honored by you, ye givers of happiness

Bhishma said —

26 Having, O Bharata, made this contract with kine Shree, there and then, before those kine disappeared

27 I have thus told you, O son the glory of the dung of kine I shall once again describe to you the glory of kine Do you listen to me

---

CHAPTER LXXXIII.

(ANUSHASANIKA PARVA) — Continued.

Bhishma said —

1 They who make gifts of kine and who live upon the remnants of things offered as libations on the sacred fire are considered O Yudhishthira, as always performing sacrifices of kind

2 No sacrifice can be performed without the help of curds and clarified butter The very character as sacrifice which sacrifices have, depends upon clarified butter Hence clarified butter is considered as the very root of sacrifice

3 Of all kinds of gifts, the gift of kine is spoken highest of Kine are the foremost of all things Themselves sacred, they are the best of purifier.

4 People should cherish kine for getting prosperity and even peace The milk, curds and clarified butter that kine yield are capable of purifying one from every kind of sin.

5 Kine are said to represent the highest energy both in this world and the next There is nothing that is more sacred or purifying than kine, O chief of the Bharatas

6 Regarding it is recited the ancient discourse between the Grandfather and chief of the celestials.

7 After the demons had been defeated and Shakra had become the lord of the three worlds, all creatures grew prosperous and became devoted to the true religion

8—10 Then, on one occasion, the Rishis, the Gandharvas the Kinnaras the Uragas, the Rakshasas the Deities, the Asuras the winged creatures, and the Prajapatis, O you of Kuru's race all assembled together and worshipped the Grandfather There were Narada and Parvata and Vishwavasu and Haha Huhu, who sang celestial songs for worshipping that powerful lord of all creatures The god of wind bore there the fragrance of celestial flowers

11—13 The Seasons also, in their embodied forms, bore the fragrance of flowers peculiar to each, to that assemblage of celestials that gathering of all creatures of the universe, where celestial maidens danced and sang in accompaniment with celestial music In the midst of that assembly, Indra, saluting the Lord of all the celestials and bowing his head to him with respect, asked him, saying —I wish, O Grandfather, to know why the region of kine is higher O holy one, than the region of the celestials themselves who are the lords of all the worlds

14 What austerities, what Brahmacharyya O lord, did kine perform on account of which they are able to live happily in a region that is even above that of the celestials.

15 Thus addressed by Indra Brahman said to the destroyer of Vala —You have always, O destroyer of Vala, disregarded kine

16 Hence you are not acquainted with glorious pre eminence of kine Listen now to me, O powerful one, as I explain to you the great energy and glorious pre-eminence of kine, O king of the celestials.

17. Kine have been said to be the limbs of sacrifice They represent sacrifice itself, O Vasava! Without them there can be no sacrifice.

18 With their milk and the Havi produced therefrom, they sustain all creatures.

19 Their male children are engaged in helping the cultivation and thereby produce various kinds of paddy and other seeds

20. From them originate sacrifices and Havya and Kavya, and milk and curds and clarified butter. Hence, O chief of the celestials, kine are sacred. Stricken with hunger and thirst, they carry various burthens.

21. Kine support ascetics. They sustain all creatures by various acts. O Vasava, kine are guileless in their conduct on account of such conduct and of many well-performed acts, they are able to live always in regions that are even above ours.

22. I have thus explained to you to-day, O you of a hundred sacrifices, the reason, O Shakra, of kine living in a place that is high above that of the celestials.

23 Kine got many excellent forms, O Vasava, and are themselves givers of boons They are called Surabhis Of sacred deeds and gifted with many auspicious marks they are highly purifying.

24 Listen to me also, O destroyer of Vala, as I tell you in full the reason why kine,—the children of Surabhi,—have descended on the Earth, O best of the celestials

25—26 Formerly, O son, when in the golden age the great Danavas became lords of the three worlds Aditi performed the severest austerities and got Vishnu within her womb Indeed, O chief of the celestials, she had stood upon one leg for many long years, desirous of having a son.

27—28 Seeing the great goddess Aditi thus practising the severest austerities, the daughter of Daksha, viz, the illustrious Surabhi herself given to virtue, likewise practised very severe austerities upon the breast of the charming mountains of Kailasa that are resorted to by both the celestials and the Gandharvas

29 Established on the highest Yoga, she also stood upon one leg for eleven thousand years.

30, The celestials with the Rishis and the great Nagas all became scorched with the severity of her penances Going there with me, all of them began to worship that auspicious goddess.

31 I then addressed that goddess gifted with penances, and said,—O goddess, O you of faultless conduct, for what purpose do you practise such severe austerities

32 O highly-blessed one, I am pleased with your penances, O beautiful one! Do you O goddess, beg what boon you wish to have I shall grant you whatever you may ask!—These were my words to her, O Purandara.

33—35 Thus addressed by me, Surabhi answered me, saying,—I have no need, O grandfather, of boons. O sinless one, that you have been pleased with me is a great boon to me. To the illustrious Surabhi, O chief of the celestials who said so to me, O lord of Sachi, I answered thus,—O goddess, I have been highly pleased with this your freedom from cupidity and desire, and with these penances of yours, O you of beautiful face. I therefore, grant you the boon of immortality.

36. You will live in a region that is higher than the three worlds, through my favour. That region shall be known to all by the name of Goloka.

37. Your offspring, ever engaged in doing good deeds, will live in the world of men In fact, O highly blessed one, your daughters will live there

38—39 You will readily get all kinds of enjoyment celestial and human, that you may think of. You will get whatever happiness exists in the celestial region, O blessed one! The regions, O you of a hundred eyes that are Surabhi's are replete with means for the satisfaction of every desire, Neither Death, nor Decrepitude, nor fire, can overcome its inhabitants

40 No ill luck, O Vasava, exists there. Many charming forests and delightful ornaments and objects of beauty may be seen there

41—42 There may be seen many beautiful cars, all excellently equipt and which move at the will of the rider, O Vasava O you having eyes like lotus petals, it is only by celibacy by penances, by Truth, by self control by gifts by various kinds of righteous deeds, by sojourns to sacred waters, in fact, by severe austerities and righteous deeds well performed, that one can attain to Goloka

43 You had asked me O Shakra and I have answered you in full O destroyer of Asuras, you should never disregard kine!

Bhishma said:—

44 Hearing these words of the self-create Brahman O Yudhishthira, Shakra of a thousand eyes began from that time to adore kine every day and to show them the greatest respect.

45—47 I have thus told you everything about the purifying character of kine, O you of great splendour I have expounded to you the sacred and high pre eminence and glory of kine that is capable of purifying one from every sin, O chief of men

That man who with senses withdrawn from every other object will recite this account to Brahmanas, on occasions when Havya and Kavya are offered, or at sacrifices, or on occasions of worshipping the departed manes succeeds in conferring upon his ancestors an endless happiness fraught with the fruition of every desire.

48 The man who is devoted to kine succeeds in getting the fruition of every desire of his Indeed, even those women who are devoted to kine succeed in securing the fulfilment of every desire of theirs

49. He who wishes for sons obtains them He who desires daughters obtains them He who desires riches succeeds in acquiring wealth, and he who desires religious merit succeeds in winning it.

50. He who desires knowledge acquires it, and he who desires happiness succeeds in acquiring happiness Indeed O Bharata, there is nothing which one devoted to kine cannot obtain.

CHAPTER LXXXIV.

(ANUSHASANIKA PARVA) — Continued,

Yudhishthira said —

1 You have O grandfather, expounded to me the highly meritorious gift of kine In the case of kings performing their duties, that gift is most meritorious

2 Sovereignty is always painful It is incapable of being borne by persons of impure souls Generally kings fail to acquire auspicious ends

3 By always making however gifts of earth, they succeed in purifying themselves You have, O prince of Kuru's race, described to me many duties

4 You have described to me the gifts of kine formerly made by king Nriga The Rishi Nachiketa in ancient times, had described the merits of this act

5 The Vedas and the Upanishads also have laid down that in all sacrifices —in fact, in all sorts of religious rites —the sacrificial present should be earth or kine or gold

6 The Shrutis however, declare that of all presents gold is very superior and is indeed, the best. I wish, O grandfather, to hear you describe truly this subject.

7 What is gold? How did it spring up? When did it come into existence? What is its essence? Who is its presiding god? What are its fruits Why is it considered as the foremost of all things?

8. Why do wise men applaud the gift of gold? Why is gold considered as the best of presents in all sacrifices?

9 Why also is gold considered as a purifier superior to earth itself and kine? Why, indeed, is it considered so superior as a sacrificial present? Do you, O grandfather, describe to me all this.

Bhishma said —

10 Listen, O king, with rapt attention to me as I recite to you in detail the circumstances connected with the origin of gold as understood by me

11. When my highly energetic father Shantanu died, I proceeded to Gangadwara for performing his Shraddha.

12 Arrived there I began the Shraddha of my father My mother Janhavi coming there, gave me great assistance.

13. Inviting many asceties crowned with success and making them take their seats before me, I began the preliminary rites consisting of gifts of water and of other things.

14 Having with a concentrated mind performed all preliminary rites as laid down in the scriptures, I began to duly offer the obsequial cake

15. I then saw, O king, that a beautiful arm, adorned with armlets and other ornaments, rose up, piercing the ground, through the blades of Kusha grass which I had spread

16 Seeing that arm rise from the ground, I became stricken with wonder. Indeed O chief of Bharata's race I thought that my father had come himself for accepting the cake I was about to offer.

17—20 Reflecting then by the light of the scriptures, I became convinced that the ordinance is in the Vedas that the cake should not be presented to the hand of him whose Shraddha is performed My conviction was that the obsequial cake should never be presented in this world by a man to the visible hand of the man whose obsequial rites are performed The departed Manes do not come in their visible forms for taking the cake On the other hand, the ordinance lays down that it should be presented on the blades of Kusha grass spread on the earth for the purpose. I then disregarding that hand which was the mark of my father's presence, and recollecting the true ordinance of the scriptures regarding the mode of presenting the cake offered the entire cake O chief of the Bharatas, upon those blades of Kusha grass that were spread before me.

21 Know, O king, that what I did was perfectly consistent with the scriptural ordinance After this, the arm of my father, O monarch, vanished in our very sight.

22—23 On that night as I slept, the departed Manes appeared to me in a dream Pleased with me they said O chief of Bharata's race, these words —We have been pleased with you, for the mark you have shown to day of your adherence to the ordinance It has pleased us to see that you have not deviated from the injunctions of the scriptures The scriptural ordinance, followed by you, has become more authoritative, O king

24—25. By such conduct you have honored and maintained the authority of yourself, the scriptures, the Vedas, the Pitris and the Rishis, the Grandfather Brahmán himself, and those elders, viz, the Prajapatis Adherence to the scriptures has been upheld You have to day, O chief of the Bharatas, acted very properly.

26—28. You have made gifts of earth and kine. Do you make gifts of gold. The gift of gold is very purifying O you that are well-conversant with duties, know that by such acts both ourselves and our fore fathers will all be purged of all our sins Such gifts rescue both ancestors, and descendants to the tenth degree of the person who makes them'—These were the words that my ancestors, appearing to me in a dream, said to me I then awoke, O king, and become filled with wonder.

29 Indeed, O chief of Bharata's race I determined upon making gifts of gold, Listen now, O king, to this old history.

30—32 It is highly praiseworthy and it gives longevity to a man who listens to it It was first recited to Rama the son of Jamadagni Formerly Jamadagni's son Rama existed with great anger, rooted out the Kshatriyas from all the face of the Earth for twenty-one times Having subjugated the entire Earth, the heroic Rama having eyes like lotus petals began to make preparations for celebrating a Horse-Sacrifice, O king that is lauded by all Brahmanas and Kshatriyas and that is capable of granting the fruition of every desire

33 That sacrifice purifies all creatures and increases the energy and splendour of those who succeed in celebrating it Gifted with great energy, Rama, by the celebration of that sacrifice, became sinless

34 Having however, celebrated that foremost of sacrifices the great Rama could not acquire perfect lightness of heart

35—37 Going to Rishis conversant with every branch of learning as also the celestials, Rama of Bhrigu's race questioned them Filled with repentance and mercy, he addressed them saying,—O highly blessed ones, do ye declare that which purifies men engaged in terrific deeds?—Thus addressed by him those great Rishis, fully read in the Vedas and the scriptures, answered him, saying —O Rama, guided by the authority of the Vedas, do you honor all learned Brahmanas Acting thus for sometime, do you once more ask the twice born Rishis as to what should be done by you for purifying yourself.

38—39 Follow the advice which those highly wise persons would give! Going then to Vashishtha and Agastya and Kashyapa, that delighter of the Bhrigus, gifted with great energy, asked them the very question—Ye foremost of Brahmanas, even this is the wish that has originated in my heart How, indeed, can I purify myself.

40 By what acts and rites may this be engendered? Or, if by gifts what is that article by giving away which this wish of mine may be satisfied, O foremost of righteous persons, if you are bent upon doing me a favour, then do tell me, ye who have asceticism for wealth, what is that by which I may succeed in purifying myself!—

The Rishis said :—

41 O delighter of the Bhrigus, the mortal that has committed sin becomes purified by making gifts of kine, of earth, and of riches This is what we have heard

42 There is another gift that is considered as a great purifier Listen to us, O twice born Rishi, as we discourse on it! That article is excellent and is wonderful to look at and is, besides, the offspring of Fire

43 Formerly the god Agni burnt all the world We have heard that from his seed sprung gold of bright complexion. It passed by the name of the good complexioned By making gifts of gold you are sure to have your wish fulfilled

44 Then the illustrious Vasishthas in especial of rigid vows, addressing him, said —Hear, O Rama, how gold which is effulgent like fire, first came into being

45. That gold will confer merit on you. In matters of gifts gold is highly spoken of I shall also tell you what is gold, whence it has come, and how it has come to be endued with superior attributes

46 Listen to me, O you of mighty arms, as I describe these subjects Know this as certain that gold is of the essence of Fire and Moon.

47—48 The goat is Fire, the sheep is Varuna, the horse is the Sun; elephants are Nagas, buffalos are Asuras; cocks and boars are Rakshasas, O delighter of the Bhrigus, earth is sacrifice, kine, water, and Soma. These are the declarations of the Smritis.

49 Churning the entire universe, a mass of energy was found. That energy is gold. Hence, O twice born Rishi, compared to all these objects gold is surely superior. It is a valuable thing, high and excellent.

50 It is therefore that the celestial and Gandharvas and Uragas and Rakshasas and human beings and Pishachas hold it with care.

51. All these beings, O son of Bhrigu's race, shine in splendour, with the help of gold, after converting it into crowns and armlets and various ornaments.

52 It is also for this reason that gold is considered as the most purifying of all cleansing things such as earth and kine and all other kinds of riches O king

53 The gift of gold O powerful king, is the highest gift It is superior to the gift of earth, of kine, and of all other things.

54 O you who are effulgent like an immortal, gold is an eternal purifier Do you make gifts of it to the foremost of Brahmanas as it is the foremost of purifying things

55 Of all kinds of presents, gold is the best They who make gifts of gold are said to be givers of all things,

56 Indeed, they who make gifts of gold are considered as givers of celestials Agni is all the deities in one, and gold has Agni for its essence 57 Hence it is that the person who makes gift of gold gives away all the celestials. Hence, O king, there is no gift higher than the gift of gold.

Vashishtha said —

58. Hear once more, O twice born Rishi as I describe the superiority of gold, O foremost of all wielders of weapons

59 I heard this formerly in the Purana O son of Bhrigu's race It represents the speech of Prajapati himself

60—62 After the marriage was over of the illustrious and great Rudra armed with the trident, O son of Bhrigu's race, with the goddess who became his consort, on the breast of that foremost of mountains, viz, Himavat, the illustrious and great deity wished to unite himself with the goddess Thereupon all the celestials, stricken with anxiety, approached Rudra Bending their heads with respect and pleasing Mahadeva and his boon-giving consort Uma, both of whom were seated together, they addressed Rudra, O perpetuator of Bhrigu's race, saying,—This union, O illustrious and sinless one, of you with the goddess, is a union of an ascetic with another. Indeed, it is the union, O lord, of one energetic person with another equally so You, O illustrious one, are of irresistible energy. The goddess Uma also is gifted with energy that is equally irresistible

64 The offspring that will result from a union like this, will, forsooth, O illustrious deity, be gifted with very great might, Indeed, O powerful lord, that offspring will consume all things in the three worlds without leaving a residue.

65 Do you then, O lord of all the universe, O you having large eyes, grant to these celestials prostrated before you a boon from desire of benefiting the three worlds

66 Do you, O powerful one, restrain this great energy of yours which may become the seed of offspring

67 Indeed, that energy is the essence of all forces in the three worlds Ye two by an act of congress, are sure to scorch the universe.

68—69 Your offspring will certainly be able to afflict the celestials Neither the goddess Earth, nor the Sky, nor Heaven, O powerful one, nor all of them together, will be able to bear your energy, we firmly believe The entire universe is certain to be burnt through the force of your energy

70 You should, O powerful one show us favour O illustrious deity That favour consists in your not begetting a son O foremost of the celestials, upon the goddess Uma,

71 Do you patiently govern your fiery and powerful energy —To the deities that said so, the holy Mahadeva having the bull for his sign, O twice born Rishi answered saying —So be it!—Having said so, the deity that has the bull for his vehicle, drew up his vital seed

73 From that time he passed by the name of Urddharetas (one that has drawn up the vital seed) At this attempt of the celestials to stop procreation, the consort of Rudra became highly wroth.

74—76 On account of her being of the opposite sex, she used harsh words:—Since ye have opposed my lord in procreating an offspring when he was desirous of procreating one upon me, as the result of this act, ye celestials, ye all shall become sonless Indeed, since ye have opposed the birth of an offspring from me, therefore, ye shall have no offspring of your own —When this curse was imprecated, O perpetuator of Bhrigu's race, the deity of fire was not there

77. It is on account of this curse of the goddess that the deities have become childless Rudra, begged them, held in himself his energy of incomparable power.

78. A small quantity, however, that came out of it is body dropped on the Earth That seed, falling on the Earth, leaped into a burning fire and there began to grow most wonderfully.

79—82. The energy of Rudra, coming in contact with another energy of great power, became one with it in essence. Meanwhile, all the celestials headed by Indra were scorched by the Asura named Taraka. The Adityas, the Vasus, the Rudras, the Maruts, the Aswins and the Saddhyas all became greatly afflicted on account of the prowess of that son of Diti All the regions of the celestials, their beautiful cars, and their palaces, and the asylums of the Rishis, were snatched away by the Asuras. Then the celestials and the Rishis, with depressed hearts, sought the protection of the illustrious and powerful Brahman of unfading glory.

CHAPTER LXXXV.

(ANUSHASANIKA PARVA).—Continued.

The Deities said:—

1. The Asura named Taraka who has received boons from you, O powerful one, is assailing the celestials and the Rishis. Let his death be ordained by you.

2. O Grandfather, we fear him greatly O illustrious one, do you save us! We have no other refuge than you

Brahman said:—

3. I treat all creatures equally, I cannot however, approve of sin. Let Taraka, that enemy of the celestials and Rishis, be speedily destroyed.

4. The Vedas and the eternal duties shall not be rooted out, ye foremost of celestials. I have ordained what is proper, in this matter. Let the anxiety of your hearts be removed.

The Celestials said:—

5 For your having granted him boons, that son of Diti has been proud of his power. He is incapable of being killed by the deities How then will his death be engendered?

6 The boon which, O Grandfather, he has obtained from you is that he should not be killed by celestials or Asuras or Rakshasas

7. The celestials have also been cursed by the wife of Rudra on account of their attempt to stop propagation The curse imprecated by her has been, O lord of the universe this, viz, that they are not to have any offspring.

Brahman said:—

8—10 Ye foremost of celestials, Agni was not there at the time the curse was given by the goddess He will beget a child for the destruction of the enemies of the gods. Superior to all the deities, Danavas, Rakshasas, human beings, Gandharvas, Nagas and feathery creatures, the son of Agni with his dart, which in his hands, will be a weapon incapable of being baffled if once hurled at the enemy, will destroy Taraka whom you fear. Indeed, all other enemies of yours will also be killed by him.

11. Will is eternal That Will is known by the name of Kama and is at one with Rudra's seed a portion of which fell into the burning form of Agni.

12. That energy, which is a powerful substance, and which resembles a second Agni, will be cast by Agni into Ganga for producing a child upon her in order to bring about the destruction of the enemies of the gods.

13 Agni did not come within the range of Uma's curse. The eater of sacrificial libations was not present there when the curse was imprecated.

14. Let the god of fire, therefore, be searched out. Let him now be set to this task. Ye sinless ones, I have told you the means for the destruction of Taraka.

15 The curses of the energetic cannot produce any effect upon the energetic. Forces, when they come into contact with a stronger force, become weakened.

16. They who are endued with penances can destroy even the boon-giving deities who are indestructible Will, or Like, or Desire sprang in former times and is the most eternal of all creatures.

17. Agni is the Lord of the universe. He is incapable of being apprehended or described Capable of going everywhere and present in all things, he is the Creator of all beings. He lives in the hearts of all creatures Gifted with great power, He is older than Rudra himself.

18—19 Let that eater of sacrificial libations, who is a mass of energy, be found out That illustrious deity will fulfill this desire of your hearts. Hearing these words of the Grandfather, the great gods then proceeded to find out the god of fire with cheerful hearts on account of their purpose having been crowned with success.

20. The gods and the Rishis then searched every portion of the three worlds their hearts being busy with the thought of Agni and eagerly desiring to see him.

21. Gifted with penances, possessed of prosperity, celebrated over all the worlds, those great ones, all crowned with ascetic success, sojourned over every part of the universe, O foremost one of Bhrigu's race,

22—24 They could not find out the eater of sacrificial libations who had concealed himself by merging his self into self. At this time, a frog, living in water, got on the surface from the nethermost regions, with cheerless heart on account of having been scorched by the energy of Agni The little creature addressed the celestials who had become stricken with fear and who were all very eager to see the god of fire, saying,—Ye gods, Agni is now living in the nethermost regions Scorched by the energy of that god and unable to bear it longer, I have come here.

25. The illustrious bearer of sacrificial offerings, ye gods, is now under the waters He has created a mass of waters within which he is living All of us have been scorched by his energy.

26 If, ye gods you wish to see him,—if you have any business with him,—go to him there.

27. As regards ourselves, we shall fly from this place, O celestials, from fear of Agni!—Having said this much, the frog dived into the water.

28 The eater of sacrificial libations came to know of the treachery of the frog Coming to that animal he cursed the whole race, saying —Ye will be deprived of the organ of taste.

29 Having made this curse on the frog he left the spot immediately for living elsewhere Indeed the powerful celestial did not show himself.

30. Seeing the condition to which the frogs were reduced for having done them a service, the celestials, O best of the Bhrigus, showed favor to those creatures I shall tell you everything about it. Do you hear me, O mighty-armed hero.

The Deities said:—

31. Though deprived of tongues through the curse of Agni and, therefore, of the sensation of taste, you will be able to utter various kinds of words.

32. Living within holes, deprived of food, shorn of consciousness, wasted and dried up, and more dead than alive, the Earth will yet hold you all.

33. Ye shall also be able to move about at night time when everything is covered with thick darkness!—Having said this to the frogs, the celestials once more journeyed over every part of the Earth for finding out the god of fire. Despite all their endeavours however, they could not find him out.

34. Then, O perpetuater of Bhrigu's race, an elephant, as large and powerful as the elephant of Shakra, addressed the gods, saying—Agni is now living within this Ashwattha tree!

35 Worked up with anger, Agni cursed all the elephants, O descendant of Bhrigu, saying,—Your tongues will be bent back.

36 Having been pointed out by the elephants, the God of Fire cursed all elephants thus and then went away and entered the heart of the Shami tree for living within it for sometime.

37. Listen now, O powerful hero what favor was shown to the elephants O foremost one of Bhrigu's race, by the celestials of unbaffled prowess who were all pleased with the service one of their representatives had rendered them.

The Deities said:—

38 With the help of even your tongues bent inwards you shall be able to eat all things, and with even those tongues ye shall be able to utter cries which will only be indistinct.

39 Having blessed the elephants thus, the inhabitants of the celestial region once more began to search Agni Indeed, having come out of the Ashwattha tree, the God of Fire had entered the heart of Shami

40 This new residence of Agni was made known by a parrot. The gods thereupon went there Enraged with the conduct of the parrot, the God of Fire cursed the whole parrot race, saying,—Ye shall from this day be deprived of the power of s, 41—42. Indeed, the eater of sacrificial offerings turned up the tongues of all the parrots. Seeing Agni at the place pointed out by the parrot, and beholding the curse imprecated upon him, the gods, moved by mercy for the poor creature, blessed him, saying, on account of your being a parrot, you shall not be wholly deprived of the power of speech. Though your tongue has been turned backwards, yet you will only be able to speak the letter K.

43—44 Like that of a child or an old man, your words shall be sweet and indistinct and wonderful—Having said these words to the parrot, and seeing the god of fire within the heart of the Shami, the gods made Shami wood a sacred fuel fit for producing fire in all religious rites. It was from that time that fire is seen to live in the heart of the Shami.

45. Men began to consider the Shami as a proper means for producing fire (in sacrifices) The waters that are in the nethermost regions had come into contact with the god of fire.

46. Those heated waters, O you of Bhrigu's race, are vomited forth by the mountain springs. On account, of Agni's having lived in them for sometime, they became hot through his power.

47. Meanwhile Agni, seeing the gods, became grieved Addressing the celestials, he asked them,—Why have you come here?

48. To him the celestials and the great Rishis said,—We wish to engage you in a particular work. You should perform it 49 When done, it will redound greatly to your credit.

Agni said:—

50. Tell me what your business is. I shall, O gods, accomplish it. I am always willing to do anything for you. Do not, hesitate, therefore, to command me.

The celestials said:—

51. There is an Asura of the name of Taraka who has been filled with pride on account of the boon he has obtained from Brahman. By his power he is able to oppose and discomfit us. Do you bring about his destruction.

52 O sire, do you rescue these celestials, these Prajapatis, and these Rishis, O highly blessed Pavaka

53. O powerful one, do you beget a heroic son possessed of your power, who will remove O bearer of sacrificial libations, our fears from that Asura.

54 We have been cursed by the great goddess Uma There is nothing else than your power which can be our refuge now. Do you, therefore, O powerful deity, rescue us all.

55 Thus addressed, the illustrious and irresistible bearer of sacrificial libations answered, saying—Be it so!—and he then proceeded towards Ganga otherwise called Bhagirathi.

56 He knew her and caused her to conceive. Indeed, in the womb of Ganga the seed of Agni began to grow even as Agni himself grows.

57. With the energy of that god, Ganga became greatly moved at heart. Indeed, she suffered great distress and became unable to bear it.

58 When the deity of fire cast his seed gifted with great energy into the womb of Ganga, a certain Asura uttered a terrific roar.

59 On account of that dreadful roar uttered by the Asura for purposes of his own, Ganga became very much terrified and her eyes rolled in fear, and betrayed her agitation.

60. Shorn of consciousness, she could not bear her body and the seed within her womb. The daughter of Janhu, carrying the energy of the illustrious god, began to tremble.

61. Overwhelmed with the energy of the seed she held in her womb, O learned Brahmana, she then addressed the god of fire, saying,—I cannot any longer, O illustrious one, bear your seed in my womb

62. Indeed, I am overcome with weakness by this seed of yours. The health I had in days before, is no longer mine. I have been greatly agitated, O illustrious one, and my heart is dead within me, O sinless one.

63 O foremost of all persons gifted with powers, I cannot bear your seed any longer. I shall throw it off induced by the distress that has befallen me, and not by caprice.

64 There has been no actual contact of my body with your seed O illustrious deity of fire. Our union, having for its cause the distress that has befallen the celestials, has been subtile and not of the flesh, O highly effulgent one.

65 Whatever merit or otherwise they may be in this deed, O eater of sacrificial offerings, must belong to you Indeed, I think, you will be visited by virtue or sin of this deed.

66. To her the god of fire said,—Do you carry the seed D>, indeed bear the fœtus endued with my power. It will produce great results

67—68 You are, indeed capable of bearing the entire Earth You will gain nothing by not holding this energy That foremost of rivers though thus dissuaded by the deity of fire as also by all the other celestials cast off the seed on the breast of Meru, that foremost of all mountains.

69 Capable of bearing that seed, yet oppressed by the power of Rudra, she could not hold that seed longer on account of its burning energy.

70—71. After she had cast it off through sheer distress that burning seed having the splendour of fire, O perpetuater of Bhrigu's race, Agni saw her, and asked that foremost of rivers —Is it all right with the fœtus you have cast off? Of what complexion has it been, O goddess? Of what form does it look? With what energy does it seem to be gifted? Do you tell me all about it.

Ganga said :—

72 The fœtus is of gold hue. In energy it is like you, O sinless one! Of an excellent color, perfectly stainless, and burning with splendour, it has lighted the entire mountain

73 O foremost of all persons gifted with penances, the fragrance of it resembles the cool perfume that is scattered by lakes adorned with lotuses

74. With the splendour of that fœtus everything around it seemed to be changed into gold as all things on mountain and low land seem to be changed into gold by the rays of the Sun

75 The splendour of that fœtus, spreading far and wide, falls upon mountains and rivers and springs

76 It seems that the three worlds, with all their mobile and immobile creatures, are being lighted up by it Such is your child O illustrious bearer of sacrificial offerings.

77. Like the Sun or your blazing self, in beauty it is like a second Soma!—Having said these words the goddess disappeared

78 The highly energetic god of fire also, having performed the business of the celestials, proceeded to the place he liked, O delighter of the Bhrigus.

79 It was on account of the result of this act that the Rishis and the celestials bestowed the name of Hiranyaretas upon the gods of fire.

80—81 And because the Earth held that seed she also came to be called by the name of Vasumati Meanwhile that fœtus, which had originated from the god of fire and been held for a time by Ganga, having fallen on a forest of reeds began to grow and at last assumed a wonderful form The presiding goddess of the constellation Krittika saw that form resembling the rising Sun

82 She henceforth began to bring up that child as her son with the milk of her breast. For this reason that highly effulgent child came to be called Kartikeya after her name.

83 And because he grew from seed that fell out of Rudra's body, he came to be called Skanda The incident also of his birth having taken place in the forest of reeds, concealed from every body's view gave him the name of Guha It was thus that gold came into existence as the offspring of the god of fire

84 Hence it is that gold came to be regarded as the foremost of all things and the ornament of the very gods It was from this incident that gold came to be called by the name of Jatarupam.

85 It is the foremost of all precious things, and among ornaments also it is the foremost. The purifier among all purifying things, it is the most sacred of all sacred objects

86 Gold is truly the illustrious Agni, the Lord of all things, and the foremost of all Prajapatis The most sacred of all sacred things is gold O foremost of twice-born ones Indeed, gold is said to have for its essence Agni and Soma.

Vashishtha said —

87 Formerly I also heard this history, O Rama, called Brahma-darshana, about the achievement of the Grandfather Brahman who is at one with the Supreme Soul.

88—89 To a sacrifice performed formerly by that foremost of gods, viz., the Lord of Rudra, O you of great power, who on that occasion had assumed the form of Varuna, there came the ascetics and all the celestials headed by Agni There also came to that sacrifice all the sacrificial limbs (in their embodied forms), and the Mantra called Vashat in his embodied form.

90 All the Samans also and all the Yajushes, in thousands and in their embodied forms, came there The Rig Veda also came there, adorned with the rules of orthoepy.

91. The Lakshanas, the Suras, the Tomas, the Niuktas, the Notes arranged in rows, and the syllable OM, as also Nigraha and Pragraha, all came there and lived in the eye of Mahadeva.

92. The Vedas with the Upanishads, Vidya, and Savitri, as also, the Past, the Present, and the Future, all came there and were held by the illustrious Shiva.

93 The powerful Lord of All then poured libations himself into his own self Indeed, the holder of Pinaka caused that Sacrifice of multifarious form to look highly beautiful.

94. He is Heaven, Sky, Earth, and the Welkin He is called the Lord of the Earth He is the Lord whose rule is acknowledged by all obstacles He is gifted with Shree and He is at one with the God of Fire

95 That illustrious god is called by various names He is Brahman, Shiva Rudra, Varuna, Agni and Prajapati He is the auspicious Lord of all creatures

96—97 Sacrifice, Penance all the rites, the goddess Diksha burning with rigid observances the several Points with the presiding deities, the consorts of all the deities their daughters and the celestials mothers, all came to Pashupati O perpetuater of Bhrigu's race, together in a body

98 Seeing that sacrifice of the great Mahadeva who had assumed the form of Varuna, all of them became highly pleased Seeing the celestial ladies of great beauty, the seed of Brahman came out and dropped upon the Earth

99 On account of the seed having fallen on the dust, the Sun took up that dust mixed with the particles of seed from the Earth with his hands and cast it into the sacrificial fire

100. Meanwhile, the sacrifice with the sacred fire of burning flames was commenced and it went on Brahman was pouring libations on the fire While thus engaged, the Grandfather became worked up with desire

101 As soon as the seed came out, he took it up with the sacrificial ladle and poured it as a libation of clarified butter, O delighter of the Bhrigus, with the necessary Mantras, on the burning fire.

102 From that seed, Brahman of great power caused the four orders of creatures to come into being. That seed of the Grandfather was endued with the three qualities of Goodness, Darkness, and Ignorance From that element in it which represented the quality of Goodness, sprang all mobile creatures gifted with the principle of action.

103 From the element of Ignorance in it, sprang all immobile creatures. The quality of Goodness, however, which lived in that seed, entered both kinds of existence. That quality of Goodness is of the nature of Light. It is eternal and of it is unending Space.

104 In all the creatures the quality of Goodness is present and is at one with that light which shows what is right and what is wrong. When the seed of Brahman was thus poured as a libation on that sacrificial fire, there came from it, O powerful one, three beings into existence.

105 They were three male persons, gifted with bodies that partook of the nature of the circumstances from which they respectively originated One arose first from the fire (called Bhrik) and hence he passed by the name of Bhrigu A second came from the burning charcoals and hence he passed the name of Angiras

106 The third originated from a heap of extinguished charcoals and he passed by the name of Kavi It has been already said that the first came out with flames issuing from his body and hence he was called Bhrigu

107 From the rays of the sacrificial fire originated another called Marichi From Marichi (afterwards) sprang Kashyapa. It has been already said that from the (burning) charcoals originated Angiras. The dwarf Rishis called Valikhillyas originated from the blades of Kusha grass spread out in that sacrice

108—109 From the same blades of Kusha grass, O you of great power originated Atri From the ashes of the fire originated the twice born Rishis, viz the Vaikhanasas endued with penances and given to Vedic learning and all of excellent qualities

110 From the eyes of Agni originated the twin Ashwins endued with great beauty. At last, from his ears, originated the Prajapatis.

111—112 The Rishis originated the pores of Agni's body. From his sweat originated Chhandas, and from his strength originated Mind. Therefore Agni has been said to be all the celestials in his individual self, by Rishis endued with Vedic learning, guided by the authority of the Vedas The pieces of wood that keep alive the flames of Agni are considered as the Months. The juices the fuel yields form the Fortnights.

113 The liver of Agni is called the Day and Night, and his fierce light is called the Muhurtas. The blood of Agni is considered as the source of the Rudras From his blood originated the gold-hued celestials called the Maitradevatas.

114 From his smoke originated the Vasus. From his flames originated the Rudras as also the (twelve) Adityas of great effulgence

115—117 The Planets and Constellations and other stars that have been set in their respective orbits in the sky, are considered as the (burning) charcoals of Agni. The first Creator of the universe declared Agni to be Supreme Brahma and Eternal, and the giver of all desires This is, indeed, a mystery. "After all these births had taken place, Mahadeva who had assumed the form of Varuna (for his sacrifice) and who had Pavana for his soul, said,—This excellent Sacrifice is mine I am the Grahapati in it The three beings that first originated from the sacrificial fire are mine! Forsooth, they should be considered as my children. Know this, ye gods who range through the skies! They are the fruits of this Sacrifice.

118 "—Agni said,—These children have originated from my limbs They have all depended upon me as the cause of their being They should, therefore, be considered as my children. Mahadeva in the form of Varuna has erred in this matter.

119 After this, the Master of all the worlds, the Grandfather of all creatures, viz., Brahman, then said,—These children are mine! The seed which I poured upon the sacrificial fire was mine

120. I am the performer of this Sacrifice. I poured on the sacrificial fire, the seed that came out of myself. He who has planted the seed always enjoys the fruit. The principal cause of these births is my seed.

121—124. The celestial went to the Grandfather and having bowed their heads to him and joined their hands in respect, they said to him,—All of us, O illustrious one, and the entire universe of mobile and immobile creatures are your offspring O sire, let Agni of burning flames, and the illustrious and powerful Mahadeva who has, for this sacrifice, assumed the form of Varuna, have their wish At these words, although born of Brahman, the powerful Mahadeva in the form of Varuna, the king of all aquatic creatures received the first born one, viz., Bhrigu effulgent as the Sun, as his own child The Grandfather then intended that Angiras should become the son of Agni.

125 Knowing the truth, the Grandfather then took Kavi as His own son. Busy with procreating creatures for peopling the Earth, Bhrigu who is considered as a Prajapati thence came to be called as Varuna's offspring.

126. Gifted with every prosperity, Angiras passed as the offspring of Agni, and the celebrated Kavi came to be known as the child of Brahman himself Bhrigu and Angiras, who had originated from the fire and the charcoals of Agni respectively, became the procreators of extensive races and tribes in the world.

127 Indeed these three, viz., Bhrigu and Angiras and Kavi considered as Prajapati are the progenitors of many races and tribes All are the children of these three. Know this, O powerful hero !!

128—129 Bhrigu begat seven sons all of whom became equal to him in merits and qualities Their names are Chyavana, Vajrashirshan, Suchi, Urva, Shukra, that giver of boons, Vibhu, and Savana. These are the seven. They are children of Bhrigu and are hence Bhargavas. They are also called Varunas on account of their ancestor Bhrigu having been adopted by Mahadeva in the form of Varuna. You belong to the race of Bhrigu.

130—131. Angiras begot eight sons They also are known as Varunas Their names are Vrihaspati, Utathya, Payasya, Shanti, Dhira, Virupa, Samvarta, and Sudhanwan the eighth These eight are considered also as the children of Agni. Freed from every evil, they are devoted to knowledge only.

132 The sons of Kavi who was adopted by Brahman himself are also known as Varunas Eight in number all of them became progenitors of races and tribes. Auspicious by nature, they all knew Brahma.

133 The names of the eight sons of Kavi are Kavi, Kavya, Dhrishnu Ushanas endued with great intelligence, Bhrigu, Viraja, Kashi, and Ugra knowing every duty.

134 These are the eight sons of Kavi. By them the whole world has been peopled. They are all called Prajapatis, and they have procreated many offspring

135 Thus, O chief of Bhrigu's race, has the whole world been peopled with the children of Angiras, and Kavi and Bhrigu.

136 The powerful and supreme Lord Mahadeva in the form of Varuna which he had assumed for his sacrifice had first, O learned Brahmana, adopted both Kavi and Angiras Hence, these two are considered as of Varuna

137. After that the eater of sacrificial libations, viz, the god of fire, adopted of Angiras Hence, all the children of Angiras are known as belonging to the race of Agni.

138 The Grandfather Brahman was, formerly propitiated by all the deities who said to him,—Let these lords of the universe save us all.

139 Let all of them become progenitors of offspring Let all of them become endued with penances. Through your favour, let all these rescue the world

140 Let them become procreators and extenders of races and tribes and let them increase your power. Let all of them become thorough masters of the Vedas and let them be performers of great deeds

141 Let all of them be friends to the divine cause Indeed, let all of them become gifted with auspiciousness Let them become founders of extensive races and tribes and let them be great Rishis Let all of them be gifted with great penances and let all of them be devoted to high celibacy.

142. All of us, as also all these, are your offspring, O you of great power You, O Grandfather, are the Creator of both the celestials and the Brahmanas

143 Marichi is your first offspring. All these also that are called Bhargavas are your progeny. Looking at this fact, O Grandfather, we shall all help and support one another.

144—145 All these shall, thus, multiply their progeny and establish yourself at the beginning of each æon after the universal destruction Thus addressed by them Brahman, the grandfather of all the worlds, said to them,—So be it! I am pleased with you all!—Having said so to the celestials, he proceeded to the place he had come from.

146 Thus is what took place in days of yore in that sacrifice of the great Mahadeva, that foremost one of all the celestials In the beginning of creation when he for the purposes of his sacrifice had assumed the form of Varuna

147 Agni is Brahman. He is Pashupati He is Sarva He is Rudra. He is Prajapati It is well-known that gold is the offspring of Agni.

148 When fire is not to be had, gold is used as a substitute. Guided by the marks of the auditions of the Veda, one who is conversant with authorities and who knows the identity of gold with fire, acts thus.

149—150. Putting a piece of gold on some blades of Kusha grass spread out on the ground, the sacrificer pours libations upon it If libations are poured upon also the pores of an anthill, upon the right ear of a goat upon a piece of level earth, upon the waters of a Tirtha, or on the hand of a Brahmana, the illustrious god of fire becomes pleased and considers it as a source of his own advancement as also that of the celestials through his.

151 Hence, it is that we have heard that all the celestials consider Agni as their refuge and are devoted to him Agni originated from Brahman, and from Agni originated gold.

152. Hence, we have heard that those virtuous persons who make gifts of gold are considered as giving away all the deities.

153 The man who makes gifts of gold acquires a very high end Regions of burning effulgence are his Indeed, O Bhargava, he becomes installed as the king of kings in the celestial region.

154 That person who, at sun-rise, makes a gift of gold according to the ordinance and with proper Mantras, succeeds in warding off the evils foreshadowed by ominous dreams

155. The man who, as soon as the Sun has risen, makes a gift of gold becomes purged of all his sins. He who makes a gift of gold at mid-day destroys all his future sins

156 He who, with controlled soul, makes a gift of gold at the second twilight succeeds in living with Brahman and the god of wind and Agni and Soma in their respective regions

157. Such a man acquires fame in regions of great happiness that belong to Indra himself Acquiring great fame in this world also and purged of all his sins, he sports in joy and happiness.

158 Such a man acquires many other regions of happiness and becomes peerless for glory and fame His course perfectly unobstructed, he succeeds in going every*where at will*

159 He has never to fall down from the regions which he acquires, and the glory he attains to, becomes very great. Indeed, by making gifts of gold one acquires numberless regions of happiness all of which he enjoys for good.

160 That man who, having lighted a fire at sunrise, makes gifts of gold in view of the observance of a particular vow, succeeds in acquiring the fruition of all his desires.

161. It has been said that gold is at one with Agni. The gift of gold, therefore, yields great happiness. The gift of gold leads to the possession of those merits and qualities that are desired, and purifies the heart.

162. I have thus told you, O sinless one, the origin of gold. O you of power, know how Kartikeya grew up, O delighter of Bhrigu's race.

163 After a long time Kartikeya grew up He was then, O perpetuator of Bhrigu's race, chosen by all the celestials with Indra at their head, as the commander-in-chief of the celestial forces.

164. He killed the Daitya Taraka as also many other Asuras, at the command of the king of the celestials, O Brahmana, and moved also by the desire of benefiting all the worlds.

165 I have also, O you of great power, described to you the merits of making gifts of gold Do you, therefore, O foremost of all speakers, make gifts of gold.

Bhishma said:—

166 Thus addressed by Vashishtha, Jamadagni's son of great power then made gifts of gold to the Brahmanas and became cleansed of his sins.

167. I have thus told you, O king, everything about the merits of the gifts of gold and about its origin also, O Yudhishthira.

168 Do you also, therefore, make profuse gift of gold to the Brahmanas Indeed O king, by making such gifts of gold, you will surely be purged of all your sins.

CHAPTER LXXXVI.

(ANUSHASANIKA PARVA).—Continued.

Yudhishthira said:—

1. You have, O grandfather described to me fully the merits of the gift of gold according to the ordinances laid down in the scriptures and the Veda.

2. You have also described the origin of gold. Do you tell me now how Taraka met with destruction.

3. You have, said, O king, that that Asura had become unslayable by the gods Do you tell me fully how his destruction was brought about.

4. O perpetuator of Kuru's race, I wish to hear this from you, I mean the details of Taraka's destruction. Great is my curiosity to hear the narrative.

Bhishma said —

5 The gods and the Rishis, O king, reduced to great distress, urged the six Krittikas to rear that child.

6 Amongst the celestial ladies there were none, except these, who could by their power, bear the seed of Agni in their wombs.

7. The god of fire became highly pleased with those goddesses for their readiness to sustain the conception caused by the seed of Agni which was gifted with his own great power.

8 When the energy of Agni, O king, was divided into six parts and placed within the channels, the six Krittikas began to nourish the portion that each held in her womb.

9 As the great Kumara, however, began to grow within their wombs, their bodies being possessed by his energy, they could not get peace anywhere.

10. Filled with energy as their bodies were, the time at last came for delivery. All of them, it so happened, O prince of men, delivered simultaneously.

11. Though held in six different wombs, yet when all the parts as they came out, united into one The goddess Earth held the child, taking it up from a mass of gold

12 Indeed, the child, possessed of a beautiful form, shone like the god of Fire. Of beautiful features he began to grow in a charming forest of reeds.

13 The six Krittikas saw that child of theirs looking like the morning Sun Filled with affection for him,—indeed, loving him very much,—they began to rear him with their milk.

14. On account of his having been born of the Krittikas and reared by them, he was known in the three worlds by the name of Kartikeya. Having originated from the seed which had fallen off from Rudra he was named Skanda, and because of his birth in a solitary forest of reeds he was called Guha.

15—17 The thirty-three gods, the points of the compass together with their presiding deities, and Rudra, Dhatri, Vishnu, Yama, Pushan, Aryyaman, Bhaga, Angsha Mitra, the Sadhyas, Vasava, the Vasus, the Ashwins, the Waters, the Wind, the Firmament, Chandramas and all the Constellations and the Planets and the Sun, and all the Richs and Samans and Yajushes in their embodied forms, came there to see that wonderful child who was the son of the god of Fire

18. The Rishis sang hymns of praise and the Gandharvas sang in honor of that child called Kumara of six heads, twelve eyes, and greatly devoted to the Brahmanas.

19—20. His shoulders were broad, and he had twelve arms, and the splendour of his body resembled that of fire and Aditya. As he lay stretched on a clump of heath, the gods with the Rishis, seeing him became filled with great joy and considered the great Asura as already killed. The celestials then began to bring him various kinds of toys and articles that could amuse him

21. As he played like a child, various sorts of toys and birds were given to him Garuda of excellent feathers gave to him a child of his, viz, a peacock having plumes of variegated color.

22 The Rakshas gave to him a boar and a buffalo Aruna himself gave him a cock of fiery splendour.

23 The Moon gave him a sheep, and the Sun gave him some dazzling rays of his The mother of all kine, viz, Surabhi, gave him kine by hundreds and thousands 24 Agni gave him a goat having many good qualities Ila gave him profuse flowers and fruits. Sudhanwan gave him a riding chariot and a car of the great Kuvara.

25—26 Varuna gave him many auspicious and good products of the Ocean with some elephants The king of the celestials gave him lions and tigers and pards and various kinds of the birds of the air, and many terrible beasts of prey and many umbrellas also Many Rakshasas and Asuras began to follow that powerful child

27 Seeing the son of Agni grow up, Taraka sought, by various means, to bring about his destruction but could not do anything to that powerful deity.

28 The gods for time invested Agni's son born a solitary forest with the command of their army And they also informed him of the oppressions made upon them by the Asura Taraka.

29 The commander in-chief of the celestial army grew up and became possessed of great energy and power. In time Guha killed Taraka, with his irresistible dart.

30. Indeed, Kumara killed the Asura as easily as if in sport. Having brought about the destruction of Taraka the re-established the king of the celestials in his sovereignty of the three worlds.

31. Gifted with mighty power, the celestial general shone in beauty and splendour. The powerful Skanda became the protector of the celestials and did what was agreeable to Shankara 32 The illustrious son of Pavaka had a golden form. Indeed, Kumara is always the leader of the celestial arms.

33 Gold is the powerful energy of the god of fire and was born with Kartikeya. Hence is gold highly sacred valuable, and excellent and has unending merit.

34 Thus, O son of Kuru's race, did Vashistha recite formerly this topic to Rama of Bhrigu's race Do you, therefore, O king of men, try to make gifts of gold.

35 By making gifts of gold, Rama became purged of all his sins, and finally acquired a high place in Heaven that is unattainable by other men.

(ANUSHASANIKA PARVA).—Continued.

Yudhishthira said :—

1 You have described to me, O you of righteous soul, the duties of the four castes Do you, similarly, O king, describe to me now all the ordinances regarding the Shraddha

Vaishampayana said :—

2 Thus addressed by Yudhisthira, the son of Shantanu began to recite to him the following ritual, consistent with the ordinances of the Shraddha.

Bhishma said —

3 Listen O king, with rapt attention, to me as I describe to you the ritual of the Shraddha That ritual is auspicious, laudable productive of fame and progeny, and is considered as a sacrifice, O scorcher of enemies, in honor of the departed Manes.

4 Gods or Asuras or human beings, Gandharvas or Uragas or Rakshasas, Pishachas or Kinnaras, every one should always adore the departed Manes

5 It is seen that people adore the departed Manes first and please the celestials next by offering them their worship. Hence, one should always adore the departed Manes with every care.

6 It is said, O king, that the Shraddha performed in honor of the departed Manes is performable afterwards But this general rule has a special restraint.

7. The (deceased) grandfather become gratified with the Shraddha that may be performed on any day. I shall, however, tell you now what the merits and demerits are of the respective lunar days

8 I shall describe to you, O sinless one, what fruits are attained on what days by performing the Shraddha Do you listen to me with rapt attention

9 By worshipping the departed Manes on the first day of the light fortnight, one obtains in his abode beautiful wives capable of producing many children all endued with desirable accomplishments

10 By performing the Shraddha on the second day of the light fortnight, one gets many daughters By performing it on the third day, one acquires many horses By performing it on the fourth day, one gets a large herd of smaller animals in his house

11. They, O king, who perform the Shraddha on the fifth day, get many sons Those men who perform the Shraddha on the sixth day, acquire great splendour.

12 By performing it on the seventh day, O king, one wins great fame By performing it on the eighth day one, secures great profits in commercial pursuits

13 By performing it on the ninth day one acquires many animals of uncloven hoofs By performing it on the tenth day, one acquires many valuable kine.

14 By performing it on the eleventh day one gets valuable cloths and utensils Such a man also gets many sons all of whom become endued with Brahma splendour.

15 By performing the Shraddha on the twelfth day, one always sees if he desires various sorts of beautiful silver and gold articles

16—17. By performing the Shraddha on the thirteenth day one reigns supreme over his kinsmen Forsooth, all the young men in the family of him who performs the Shraddha on the fourteenth day die Such a man becomes entangled in war By performing the Shraddha on the day of the new moon, one gets the fruition of every desire

18 In the dark fortnight all the days beginning with the tenth leaving only the fourteenth day out are good days for the performance of the Shraddha Other days of that fortnight are not so

19 Then again, as the dark fortnight is better than the light one so the afternoon of the day is better than the forenoon for the Shraddha

CHAPTER LXXXVIII.

(ANUSHASANIKA PARVA)—Continued.

Yudhishthira said —

1. O you of great power, tell me what that object is which if dedicated to the departed Manes, becomes inexhaustible! What Havi again (if offered) lasts for all time? What, indeed, is that which becomes eternal?

Bhishma said:—

2 Hear me, O Yudhishthira, what those Havis are which persons conversant with the ritual of the Shraddha consider as suitable for the Shraddha and what the fruits are of each.

3 With sesame seeds, rice, barley, Masha water, root and fruits, if given at Shraddhas, the departed Manes, O king, remain pleased for a month

4 Manu has said that if a Shraddha is performed with profuse sesame, such Shraddha becomes inexhaustible. Of all sorts of food, sesame seeds are considered as the best.

5 With fishes offered at Shraddhas, the departed Manes remain pleased for two months With mutton they remain pleased for three months and with the flesh of the hare for four.

6 With the flesh of the goat O king, they remain pleased for five months, with becon for six months, and with the flesh of birds for seven

7 With venison got from those deer that are called Prishata they remain pleased for eight months and with that obtained from the Ruru for nine months, and with the meat of the Gavaya for ten months

8 With the meat of the buffalo they remain pleased for eleven months. With beef presented at the Shraddha, they remain pleased for a full year.

9 Payasa mixed with clarified butter is as much as acceptable to the departed Manes as beef With the meat of the Vadhrinasa the Pitris remained pleased for twelve years

10 The flesh of the Rhinoceros offered to the departed Manes on the anniversaries of the lunar days on which they died becomes endless The potherb called Kalashaka, the petals of the Kanchana flower, and meat of the goat also, thus offered, prove inexhaustible.

11. Regarding it, O Yudhishthira, there are some Verses, originally sung by the departed Manes, that are now sung (in the world). Sanatkumara communicated them to me in former days

12. He who has taken birth in our race, should give us Payasa [mixed with clarified butter on the thirteenth day (of the dark fortnight), under the constellation Magha, during the Sun's southward course.

13 One born in our race, should under the constellation Magha, as if in the observance of a vow, offer the meat of goat or the petals of the Kanchana flower. One should also offer us, with due rites, Payasa mixed with clarified butter, dedicating it on a spot covered by the shadow of an elephant.

14 Many sons should be coveted so that even one may go to Gaya, where stands the banian that is celebrated over all the worlds and that makes all offerings made under its branches endless.

15 Even a little of water, roots, fruits, meat, and rice mixed with honey, if offered on the anniversary of the day of death, becomes endless

CHAPTER LXXXIX.

(ANUSHASANIKA PARVA)—Continued.

Bhishma said:—

1. Hear me, O Yudhishthira, as I tell you what these optional Shraddhas are that should be performed under the different constellations and that were first spoken of by Yama to king Shashavindu.

2 That man who always performs the Shraddha under the constellation Krittika is considered as performing a sacrifice after establishing the sacred fire Such a person, freed from fever, goes to Heaven with his children.

3 He who is desirous of children should perform the Shraddha under the constellation Rohini while he who is desirous of power should do it under the constellation Mrigashiras. By performing the Shraddha under the constellation Ardra, a man becomes the doer of terrific deeds.

4 A man, by performing the Shraddha under Punarvasu, makes much gain by agriculture The man who is desirous of growth and advancement should perform the Shraddha under Pushya.

5 By doing it under the constellation Aslesha one begets heroic children. By doing it under the Maghas one gains superiority over kinsmen.

6 By doing it under the (prior) Phalgunis, one gains good fortune. By doing the Shraddha under the later Phalgunas one gets many children, while by performing it under Hasta, one gets the fruition of his wishes.

7 By performing it under the constellation Chitra one gets beautiful children. By doing it under the constellation Swati, one makes much profit by trade.

8 The man who desires children, acquires the fruition of his desire by performing the Shraddha under the constellation Vishakha. By doing it under Anuradha, one becomes an Emperor.

9 By making offerings in honor of the departed Manes under the constellation Jeshthya, with devotion and humility, one acquires sovereignty, O foremost one of Kuru's race.

10 By doing the Shraddha under Mula, one gains health, and by doing it under the prior Ashada, one acquires excellent fame. By performing it under the later Ashada, one succeeds in travelling over the whole world, freed from every sorrow.

11. By doing it under the constellation Abhijit, one acquires great knowledge. By doing it under Shravana, one, after death, attains to a very high end

12 The man who performs the Shradha under the constellation Dhanistha becomes a king. By doing it under the constellation presided over by Varuna (viz., Shatavisha), one becomes a successful physician

13 By performing the Shraddha under the constellation of the prior Bhadrapada, one acquires many goats and sheep while by doing it under the later Bhadrapada, one acquires thousands of kine.

14 By performing the Shraddha under the constellation Revati, one acquires many utensils of white brass and copper. By doing it under Ashwini, one acquires many horses, while under Bharani, one lives long.

15 Listening to these ordinances about the Shraddha, king Shashavindu acted accordingly, and succeeded in easily conquering and ruling the whole Earth.

CHAPTER XC.

(ANUSHASANA PARVA).—Continued.

Yudhishthira said.—

1. You should, O foremost one of Kuru's race, tell me to what kind of Brahmanas, O grandfather, should the offers made at Shraddhas, be given away.

Bhishma said —

2 The Kshatriya who is conversant with the ordinances about gift should never examine Brahmanas In all matters, however, relating to the worship of the deities and the departed Manes, an examination has been said to be proper.

3 The deities are adored on Earth by men only when they are filled with devotion originating from the celestials themselves Hence, one should, approaching them, make gifts to all Brahmanas, respecting such gifts as are made to the celestial themselves.

4 In Shraddhas, however, O king, the man of intelligence should examine the Brahmanas Such examination should be about their birth, conduct, age, appearance, and learning.

5. Amongst the Brahmanas there are some who pollute the line and some who purify it Listen to me, O king, as I tell you who those Brahmanas are that should be excluded from the line.

6—11 He who is wily, or he who is guilty of fœticide, or he who is ill of consumption, or he who keeps animals, or he who has no Vedic study, or is a common servant of a village, or lives upon usury, or he who is a singer, or he who sells all articles, or he who is guilty of arson, or he who is a poisoner, or he who is a pimp by profession, or he who sells Soma or he who teaches palmistry, or he who is in the employ of the king or he who is a seller of oil, or he who is a cheat and false swearer, or he who has a quarrel with his father, or he who tolerates a paramour of his wife, or he who has been cursed, or he who is a thief, or he who lives by some mechanical art, or he who puts on disguises or he who is deceitful in his conduct, or he who is hostile to those he calls his friends, or he who is an adulterer, or he who is a preceptor of Shudras, or he who has taken up the profession of arms or he who wanders with dogs (for hunting), or he who has been bit by a dog, or he who has married before his elder brothers or he who seems to have undergone circumcision, he who violates the bed of his preceptor, he who is an actor or mime, he who lives by setting up an idol, and he who lives by calculating the conjunctions of stars and planets and asterisms, are considered as fit to be excluded from the line.

12 Persons knowing the Vedas say that the offerings made at Shraddhas, if eaten by such Brahmanas, go to fill the stomachs of Rakshasas, O Yudhishthira

13 That person who having eaten at a Shraddha does not abstain that day from Vedic studies, or who has known that day a Shudra woman, must know that his departed Manes on account of such deeds of his, have to lie for a month on his own excreta.

14—15 The offerings made at Shraddhas if presented to a Brahmana who sells wine, become converted into human excreta, if presented to a Brahmana who practises as a physician, they become converted into pus and blood, if presented to one who lives by setting up an idol, they fail to produce any fruit, if presented to one who who lives upon usury, they lead to infamy, if presented to one who is engaged in trade, they become productive of no fruits either in this world or in the next If presented to a Brahmana who is born of a widowed mother, they become as fruitless as libations poured on ashes.

16. They who present the Havya and Kavya to such Brahmanas who do not perform the duties ordained for them and who do not observe those rules of good conduct that persons of their order should observe find such presents productive of no merits hereafter.

17. That little witted man who makes gifts of such articles to such men knowing their dispositions obliges, by such conduct, his departed Manes to eat human excreta in the next world.

18 You should know that these wretched Brahmanas deserve to be excluded from the line Those Brahmanas also of little energy who are engaged in instructing Shudras belong to the same class.

19 A Brahmana who is blind stains sixty individuals of the line, one who is destitute of manly powers stains a hundred, while one who is afflicted with white leprosy stains as many as he looks upon, O king

20 Whatever offerings made at Shraddhas are eaten by one with his head wrapped round with a cloth whatever is eaten by one with face southwards and whatever is eaten with shoes or sandals on, all goes to please the Asuras.

21 Whatever, again is given with malice, and whatever is given without respect, have been ordained by Brahman himself as the portion of the king of Asuras (viz., Vali)

22 Dogs and such Brahmanas as are polluters of lines, should not be suffered to look upon the offerings made at Shraddhas Therefore, Shraddhas should be performed at a place that is properly hedged around or concealed from the view. That spot should also be covered with sesame seeds.

23. That Shraddha which is done without sesame seeds, or that which is done by a person in anger, has its Havi robbed by Rakshasas and Pishachas.

24. According to the number of Brahmanas seen by one who deserves to be excluded from the line is the loss of merit he causes of the foolish performer of the Shraddha who invites him to the least.

25 I shall now, O chief of Bharata's race, tell you who are purifiers of the line. Do you find them out by examination.

26. All those Brahmanas who are purified by knowledge, Vedic study, vows and observances and they who are of good and righteous conduct, should be known as purifiers of everything

27. I shall now tell you who deserve to sit in the line You should know them to be such whom I shall mark out presently. He who is conversant with the three Nachiketas, he who has set up the five sacrificial fires, he who knows the five Suparnas he who knows the six branches (called Angas) of the Vedas, he who is a descendant of fathers who were engaged in teaching the Vedas and is himself engaged in teaching, he who is well conversant with the Prosody, he who is acquainted with the Jeshthya Saman he who is obedient to his parents, he who is conversant with the Vedas, and whose ancestors have been so for ten generations he who knows only his married wives and this at their seasons, and he who has been purified by knowledge, by the Veda, and by vows and observances,—even such a Brahmana,—purifies the line.

30—32. He who reads the Atharvashiras, who is given to the observance of Brahmacharya's practices, and who is steady in the observance of righteous vows, who is truthful and of pure conduct, and who duly satisfies the duties laid down for his order, they also who have undergone fatigue and labour for bathing in the sacred waters, who have done the final bath after celebrating sacrifices with proper Mantras, who are freed from anger, who are not restless, who are endued with forgiveness, who are self controlled masters of their senses, and they who are devoted to the behoof of all creatures,—these should be invited to Shraddhas

33 Anything given to these, becomes endless. These, indeed, are purifiers of lines There are others also, highly blessed, who should be considered as purifiers of the line.

34. They are Yatis and those who are conversant with the religion of Emancipation, and they who are devoted to Yoga and they who properly observe excellent vows, and they who, with collected mind, recite (sacred) histories to foremost of Brahmanas.

35—36 They who are conversant with commentaries, they also who are given to grammatical studies, they who study the Puranas and they who study, the Dharma-shastras, and having studied them act up to the standard laid down in them, he who has lived in the house of his preceptor, he who is truthful in speech, he who is a giver of thousands, they that are foremost in Vedic lore and (in the knowledge of) the scriptural and (philosophical aphorisms,—these purify the lines as far they look at it.

38 And because they purify all who sit in the line, therefore are they called purifiers of lines. Utterers of Brahma say that even a single person who happens to be the descendant of ancestors who were teachers of the Veda and who is himself a Vedic teacher, purifies full seven miles around him.

39 If he who is not a Ritwik and that is not a Vedic teacher takes the foremost seat in a Shraddha, with even the permission of the other Ritwiks there present, he is said to take the sins of all who may be sitting in the line.

40. If, on the other hand, he happens to be conversant with the Vedas and freed from all those faults which are considered as capable of polluting the line he shall not, O king, be considered as fallen. Such a man would then be really a purifier of the line.

41 For these reasons, O king, you should properly examine the Brahmanas before inviting them to Shraddhas. You should invite only such among them as are devoted to the duties laid down for their order, and as are born in good families, and as are gifted with great learning.

42 He who performs Shraddhas for feeding only his friends and whose Havi does not please the celestials and the departed Manes, fails to ascend to Heaven.

43 He who collects his friends and relatives only on the occasion of the Shraddha he performs, fails to proceed (after death) by the celestial path. The man who converts the Shraddha he performs, into an occasion for only collecting his friends, never succeeds in ascending to Heaven The man who converts the Shraddha into an occasion for treating his friends, becomes alienated from Heaven even like a bird dissociated from the perch when the chain tying it breaks.

44 Therefore, he who performs a Shraddha should not honor his friends He may make gifts of riches to them on other occasions by collecting them together. The Havi and the Kavi offered at Shraddhas should be served to them who are neither friends nor enemies but are only indifferent or neutral.

45 As seed sown on a barren soil does not sprout forth, or as one who has not sown does not get a share of the produce, so that Shraddha the offerings in which are eaten by an unworthy person, yields no fruit either in this world or in the next.

46 That Brahmana who is destitute of Vedic study is like a fire made by burning grass or straw, and becomes soon put out even like such a fire The offerings made at Shraddhas should not be given to him even as libations should not be poured on the ashes of the sacrificial fire

47. When the offerings made at Shraddhas are exchanged by the performers with one another, they become Pishacha presents Such offerings please neither the gods nor the departed Manes Instead of reaching the other world, they wander about even here like a cow which has lost her calf wandering about within the fold.

48. As those libations of clarified butter that are poured upon the extinguished ashes of a sacrificial fire never reach either the gods or the departed Manes, similarly a gift that is made to a dancer or a singer or a Dakshina presented to a lying or deceitful person, yields no merit.

49 The present that is given to a lying or deceitful person destroys both the giver and the receiver without benefiting them in any way. Such a present is destructive and highly censurable. The Pitris of the person making it have to fall down from the celestial path.

50 The gods know them to be Brahmanas who always walk, O Yudhishthira, within the limits set up by the Rishis who know all duties, and who have a firm faith in their efficacy.

51. Those Brahmanas who are given to Vedic study, to knowledge, to penances, and to acts, O Bharata, should be known as Rishis.

52. The offerings made at Shraddhas, should be given to those who are devoted to knowledge. Indeed, they are to be considered as men who never speak ill of the Brahmanas.

53 Those men should never be fed on occasions of Shraddhas who speak ill of Brahmanas in course of conversation in the midst of conclaves. If Brahmanas, O king, be vilified, they would destroy three generations of the calumniater.

54 This is the saying, O king, of the Vaikhanasa Rishis Brahmanas knowing the Vedas should be examined from a distance.

55 Whether one likes them or not, one should give to such Brahmanas the offerings made at Shraddhas. That man who feeds thousands upon thousands of unworthy Brahmanas acquires merit that is attainable by feeding even one Brahmana if the latter happens to be endued with a knowledge of the Vedas, O Bharata!

CHAPTER XCI.

(ANUSHASANIKA PARVA)—Continued.

Yudhishthira said:—

1. By whom was the Shraddha first conceived and at what time? What also is its substance? In the time when the world was inhabited by only the descendants of Bhrigu and Angiras, who was the Muni who established the Shraddha?

2 What deeds should not be done at Shraddha? What are those Shraddhas in which fruits and roots are to be offered? What kinds also of paddy should be avoided in Shraddhas? Tell me all this, O grandfather

Bhishma said:—

3 Listen to me, O king, as I tell you how the Shraddha was introduced, the time of such introduction, the essence of the rite, and the ascetic who conceived it.

4 From the Self Create Brahman sprang Atri, O you of Kuru's race In Atri's family was born a Muni named Dattatreya

5 Dattatreya got a son named Nimi having asceticism for wealth Nimi got a son named Shrimat who was gifted with great beauty of person

6 Upon the expiration of a full thousand years, Shrimat having practised the severest austerities, yielded to the influence of Time and departed from this world

7. His father Nimi, having performed the purificatoy rites according to sanctioned rites, became stricken with great grief, thinking continually of the loss of his son

8 Thinking of that cause of sorrow, the great Nimi collected together various agreeable objects on the fourteenth day of the moon. The next morning he rose from bed.

9 Stricken as his heart was with grief, as he rose from sleep that day he succeeded in withdrawing it from the one object upon which it had been working. His mind became busy with other matters

10—11. With rapt attention he then conceived the idea of a Shraddha All those articles of his own food, containing fruits and roots, and all those kinds of staple grains which he liked, were carefully thought of by that sage having penances for wealth.

12. On the day of the New Moon he invited a number of worthy Brahmanas Gifted with great wisdom, Nimi made them sit on seats and honored them by going round them.

13. Approaching seven such Brahmanas whom he had brought to his house together, the powerful Nimi gave them food consisting of Shyamaka rice, unmixed with salt.

14 Towards the feet of those Brahmanas engaged in eating the food that was served to them a number of Kusha blades was spread out, on the seats they occupied, with the tops of the blades directed towards the south.

15 With a pure body and mind and with rapt attention, Nimi, having placed those blades of sacred grass in the way indicated, offered cakes of rice to his dead son, uttering his name and family.

16 Having done this, that foremost of ascetics became filled with regret at the idea of having done a deed that had not been laid down in any of the scriptures Indeed, filled with regret, he began to think of what he had done.

17. Never done before by the ascetics alas, what have I done! How shall I avoid being cursed by the Brahmanas?

18. He then thought of the original founder of his race As soon as he was thought of, Atri having penances for wealth came there 19 Seeing him greatly stricken with grief consequent on the death of his son, the immortal Atri comforted him with agreeable advice.

20 He said to him,—O Nimi, this rite that you have conceived, is a sacrifice in honor of the departed Manes Do not fear, O you, having asceticism for wealth. Formerly the Grandfather Brahman himself laid it down.

21. This rite that you have conceived, has been ordained by the Self Create himself. Who else save the Self-Create could ordain this ritual in Shraddhas?

22 I shall now tell you, O son, the excellent ordinance laid down in the matter of Shraddhas Ordained by the Self-Create himself, O son, follow it. Listen to me first.

23 Having first performed the Karana on the sacred fire with the help of Mantras, O you having penances for wealth, one should always pour libations next to the god of fire, and Soma, and Varuna.

24. The Self-Create next ordained a portion of the offerings to the Vishwedevas also, who are always the companions of the departed Manes.

25. The Earth also, as the goddess who sustains the offerings made at Shraddhas, should then be lauded under the names of Vaishnavi, Kashyapi, and the inexhaustible.

26 When water is being fetched for the Shraddha, the powerful god Varuna should be lauded After this, both Agni and Soma should be invoked with respect and pleased (with libations), O sinless one.

27. Those deities named Pitris were created by the Self-Create. Others also, highly blessed, viz, the Ushmapas, were created by him. For all these, shares have been sanctioned of the offerings made at Shraddhas.

28 By worshipping all these gods at Shraddhas, the ancestors of the persons performing them become purged of all sins. The departed Manes referred to above as those created by the Self Create are seven in number.

29 The Vishwedevas, having Agni for their mouth, have been mentioned before. I shall now mention the names of those great deities who deserve shares of the offerings made at Shraddhas

30—33 They are Vala, Dhriti, Vipapma, Punyakrit, Pavana, Parshni, Kshemaka, Samudra, Dhyanasana Viraswat Viryyavat, Hemat, Kritimat, Krita Jitatman, Munivirya, Dhritiman Bhayankara, Anukarman, Pratha, Pradatri, Angiramat, Shailabha, Parama, Krodhi, Dhiroshni, Bhupati, Srajas, Vajra, and Vari,—these are the eternal Vishwedevas. There are others also whose names are Vidyutvarchas, Somavarchas, and Suryashri by name.

34—37. Others also are Somapa, Suryasavitra, Dattatman, Pundariyaka, Ushminabha, Nabhoda, Vishwayu, Dipti, Chamuhara, Suresha, Vyomari, Shankara, Bhava, Isha, Karttri, Kriti, Daksha Bhuvana, Divyakarmakrit, Ganita, Panchaviryya, Aditya, Rashmimat, Saptakrit, Somavarchas, Vishwakrit, Kavi, Anugoptri, Sugoptri, Naptri, and Ishwara,—these highly blessed ones are called Vishwedevas They are eternal, and they know all that occurs in Time.

38—39 Kodrava, and Pulaka are the species of paddy which should not be offered at Shraddhas Assafœtida also, among articles used in cooking, should not be offered, as also onions and garlics, the produce of the Moringa, pterygosperma,, Bauhinia Variegata, the meat of animals killed with poisoned arrows, all varieties of Cucurbita Pepo, Cucurbita lagenaria, and black salt.

40—41. The other articles that should not be offered at Shraddhas are the flesh of the domesticated hog, the meat of all animals not killed at sacrifices, Nigella sativa, salt of the variety called Vid, the potherb that is called Shitapaki, all sprouts and also the Irapa bispinosa. All kinds of salt should be excluded from the offerings made at Shraddhas, and also the fruits of the Eugenia Jambolana.

42 All articles, again upon which any one has spat or upon which tears have fallen should be avoided at Shraddhas Among offerings made to the departed Manes or with the Havya and Kavya offered to the celestials, the potherb called Sudarshana should not be included

43—44. Havi mixed with this is not acceptable to the departed Manes. From the place where the Shraddha is being performed, the Chandala and the Shwapacha should be excluded, as also all who wear yellow clothes and persons suffering from leprosy, or one who has been outcasted, or one who is guilty of Brahmanicide, or a Brahmana of mixed descent, or one who is the relative of an outcast man. These all should be excluded by wise persons from the place where a Shraddha is being performed.

45. Having said these words formerly to the Rishi Nimi of his own race, the illustrious Atri having penances for wealth then went back to the Grandfather's court in the celestial region.

CHAPTER XCII.

(ANUSHASANIKA PARVA)—Continued

Bhishma said:—

1. After Nimi had acted thus, all the great Rishis began to celebrate the sacrifice in honor of the departed Manes (called the Shraddha) according to rites laid down in the ordinance

2. Performing all duties, the Rishis, having performed Shraddhas, began to also offer oblations of sacred waters, with attention.

3 On account, however, of the offerings made by persons of all classes, the departed Manes began to digest that food.

4 Soon they, and the celestials also with them, became afflicted with indigestion Indeed, afflicted with the heaps of food that all persons began to give them, they went to Soma.

5—7. Approaching Soma they said—Alas, great is our misery on account of the food that is offered to us at Shraddhas Do you ordain what is necessary for our comfort?—Soma answered to them, saying—If, ye gods, ye are desirous of acquiring comfort do ye then go to the abode of the Self Create Even he will do what is for your behoof—At these words of Soma, the celestials and the departed Manes then went O Bharata, to the Grandfather where he was seated on the summit of the mountains of Meru.

The gods said:—

8 O illustrious one, with the food that is offered us in sacrifices and Shraddhas we are suffering very much O lord, show us favour and do what would be for our behoof.

9 Hearing these words of theirs the Self Create said to them in reply—Here the god of fire is sitting beside me. Even he will do what is for your good.

Agni said:—

10. Ye sires, when a Shraddha comes, we shall in a body eat the offerings made to us If ye eat those offerings with me, ye shall, forsooth, succeed in digesting them easily.

11 Hearing these words of the God of fire, the departed Manes became comforted

It is for this reason also that in making offerings at Shraddhas a share is first offered to the God of Fire, O king.

12. If a portion of the offerings be first made to the God of Fire at a Shraddha, O king, Rakshasas of twice-born origin cannot then do any injury to such a Shraddha.

13 Seeing the God of Fire at a Shraddha, Rakshasas fly away from it. The ritual of the Shraddha is that the cake should first be offered to the (departed) father. Next, one should be offered to the grandfather.

14. Next should one be offered to the great-grandfather. This is the ordinance relating to Shraddha. Over every cake that is offered, the offerer should, with rapt attention, utter the Savitri Mantras.

15 This other Mantra also should be uttered, viz, to Soma who is fond of the departed Manes. A woman that has become impure on account of her season, or one whose ears have been cut off, should not be allowed to remain where a Shraddha is being done. Nor should a woman be brought from a family other than that of the person who is performing the Shraddha.

16. While crossing a river, one should offer oblations of water to his Pitris, naming them all. Indeed, when one comes upon a river one should please his Pitris with oblations of water.

17. Having offered oblations of water first to the ancestors of his race, one should next offer such oblations to his departed friends and relatives.

18. When one crosses a river on a car to which is yoked a couple of oxen of variegated color, or from them that cross a river on boats, the departed Manes expect oblations of water.

19. Those who know this always offer oblations of water with rapt attention to the departed Manes. Every fortnight, on the day of the New Moon one should make offerings to his departed ancesters

20—21. Growth, longevity, energy, and prosperity become all attainable through devotion to the departed Manes The Grandfather Brahman, Pulastya, Vashishtha, Pulaha, Angiras Kratu and the great Rishi Kashyapa,—these, O prince of Kuru's race, are considered as great masters of Yoga.

22. They are numbered among the departed Manes Even this is the high ritual in the matter of Shraddha, O king. Through Shraddhas performed on Earth, the deceased members of his race become freed from a poison of misery.

23 I have thus, O prince of Kuru's race, explained to you, according to the scriptures, the ordinances relating to Shraddhas. I shall once more discourse to you on gifts.

CHAPTER XCIII.

(ANUSHASANIKA PARVA) — Continued.

Yudhishthira said :—

1. If Brahmanas who observe a vow (viz, fast) eat, at the invitation of a Brahmana, the Havi, can they be charged with the sin of violating their vow? Tell me this, O Grandfather.

Bhishma said :—

2. Let those Brahmanas eat, moved by desire, who observe such vows as are not laid down in the Vedas. About those Brahmanas, however, who observe such vows as are laid down in the Vedas, they are considered as guilty of a breach of their vow, O Yudhishthira, by eating the Havi of a Shraddha at the request of him who performs the Shraddha.

Yudhishthra said :—

3. Some people say that fast is a penance. Is penance really at one with fast or is it not so? Tell me this, O grandfather.

Bhishma said :—

4 People do consider a regular fast for a month or a half month as a penance. The truth, however, is that one who mortifies his own body is not to be considered, either as an ascetic or as one conversant with duty.

5 Renunciation, however, is considered as the best of penances. A Brahmana should always abstain from food, and observe the vow of celibacy.

5. A Brahmana should always practise self denial controlling even speech, and recite the Vedas The Brahmana should marry and surround himself with children and relatives, from desire of acquiring virtue. He should never sleep.

7. He should abstain from meat He should always read the Vedas and the scriptures He should always speak the truth, and practise self control He should eat the residue (viz, of what remains after serving the deities and guests) Indeed, he should be hospitable towards all that come to his house. He should always eat nectar,

He should duly observe all rites and celebrate sacrifices.

Yudhishthira said :—

8 How may one come to be considered as always observant of fasts? How may one become observant of vows? How, O king, may one come to be an eater of the residue? By doing what may one be said to be fond of guests

Bhishma said :—

9 He who takes food only morning and evening at the appointed hours and abstains from all food during the interval, is said to be an abstainer from food.

11. He who knows only his married wife and that only at her season, is said to be observant of the vow of celibacy. By always making gifts, one comes to be considered as truthful in speech,

12. By abstaining from all meat obtained from animals killed for nothing, one becomes an abstainer from meat. By making gifts one becomes purged of all sins, and by abstaining from sleep during day time, one comes to be considered always awake

13 He who always eats what remains after serving the guests and servants, know, O Yudhishthira, is said to always eat nectar.

14. He who abstains from eating till Brahmanas have eaten, is considered as conquering Heaven by such abstention.

15. He who eats what remains after serving the celestials, the departed Manes, and relatives and dependants, is said to eat Vighasa or the residue.

16 Such men acquire many regions of happiness in the abode of Brahman himself. There, O king, they live in the company of Apsaras and Gandharvas.

17. Indeed, they sport and enjoy in those regions, with the celestials and guests and the departed Manes in their company, and surrounded by their own children and grandchildren. Even such becomes their high end.

Yudhishthira said :—

18 People are seen to make various kinds of gifts to the Brahmanas What, however, is the difference, O grandfather, between the giver and the receiver?

Bhishma said :—

19. The Brahmana accepts gifts from him who is righteous, and from him who is sinful If the giver happens to be virtuous, the receiver commits little sin. If, on the other hand, the giver happens to be impious, the receiver sinks in hell.

20 Regarding it is cited an old history of the conversation between Vrishadarbhi and the seven Rishis, O Bharata

21—22. Kashyapa, Atri, Vashishtha, Bharadwaja, Gautama, Vishwamitra, Jamadagni, and the chaste Arundhati (the wife of Vashishtha), all had a common maid servant whose name was Ganda A Shudra named Pashusakha married Ganda and became her husband.

23 Kashyapa and others, formerly, observed the austerest penances and roved over the world, desirous of acquiring the eternal region of Brahman by the help of Yoga-meditation.

24. About that time, O delighter of the Kurus, there took place a severe drought. Stricken with hunger, the whole world of living creatures become greatly weak.

25 At a sacrifice which had been performed formerly by Shivi's son, he had given away to the Ritwiks a son of his as the sacrificial present.

26 About this time, long lived as the prince was, he died of starvation. The Rishis named, afflicted with hunger, approached the dead prince and sat encircling him.

27 Indeed, those foremost of Rishis, seeing the son of him at whose sacrifice they had officiated, O Bharata, thus dead of starvation, began to cook the body in a vessel, actuated by the pangs of hunger.

28. All food having disappeared from the world of men, those ascetics, desirous of saving their lives, had recourse, for purposes of living, to such a miserable end.

29. While they were thus engaged, Vrishadarbha's son, viz, king Shaivya, in course of his roving, came upon those Rishis. Indeed, he met them on his way, engaged in cooking the dead body, moved by the pangs of hunger.

The son of Vrishadarbha said :—

30. The acceptance of a gift will immediately relieve you all. Do you, therefore, accept a gift for the maintenance of your bodies! Ye ascetics having penances for wealth listen to me as I declare what wealth I have.

31. That Brahmana who solicits me is ever dear to me. Indeed I shall give you a thousand kine of white hair, foremost in speed, each accompanied by a bull, and each having a well born calf, and, therefore, giving milk.

32. I shall also give you a thousand bulls of white color and of the best species and capable of carrying heavy loads I shall also give you a large number of kine, of good nature, the foremost of their kind, all fat, and each of which, having brought forth her first calf, is quick with her second.

39 Tell me what else I shall give of foremost villages, of grain, of barley, and of even the rarer and more precious jewels. Do not seek to eat this food that is inedible Tell me what should I give you for the maintenance of your bodies.

The Rishis said :—

34 O king, to accept gifts from a monarch is very sweet at first but it is poison in the end Knowing this well, why do you, O king, tempt us then with these offers?

35 The body of the Brahmana is the divine field By penance, it is purified Then again, by pleasing the Brahmana, one pleases the celestials.

36 If a Brahmana accepts the gifts made to him by the king, he loses, by such acceptance, the merit that he would otherwise win by his penances that day. Indeed, such acceptance destroys that merit as a burning fire destroys a wilderness

37. May you be happy, O king, as the result of the gifts you make to those who solicit you —Saying these words to them, they left that place, proceeding by another way,

38. The flesh those great ones had intended to cook remained uncooked Indeed, abandoning that flesh, they went away, and entered the forest in search of food.

39. After this, urged by their master, the ministers of the king, entered those woods and plucking certain figs tried to give them away to those Rishis.

40. The officers of the king filled some of those figs with gold and mixing them with others tried to induce those ascetics to accept them.

41. Atri took up some of those figs and finding them heavy refused to take them He said,—We are not shorn of knowledge. We are not fools.

42 We know that there is gold within these figs. We have our senses about us. Indeed, we are awake instead of being asleep If accepted in this world, those will yield bitter results hereafter. He who seeks happiness both in this world and in the next, should never accept these.

Vashishtha said :—

43 If we accept even one gold coin, it will be counted as a hundred or even a thousand. If, therefore, we accept many coins, we shall surely attain to an unhappy end in the next world.

Kashyapa said :—

44 All the paddy and barley on Earth, all the gold and animals and women that are in the world, are incapable of satisfying the desire of a single person Hence, a wise man should, removing cupidity, adopt tranquillity.

Bharadwaja said :—

45. The horns of a Ruru, when they first appear, begin to grow with the growth of the animal The cupidity of man is like this. It has no limit.

Gautama said :—

46. All the objects which exist in the world cannot satisfy even a single person, Man is like the ocean, for he can never be filled (i e, satisfied)

Vishwamitra said :—

47. When one desire cherished by a person becomes satisfied, there originates immediately another whose satisfaction sought and which pierces him like an arrow.

Jamadagni said :—

48 Abstention from accepting gifts supports penances as their root. Acceptance however, destroys that.

Arundhati said :—

49 Some people hold that things of the world may be stored for spending them upon the acquisition of virtue I think, however, that the acquisition of virtue is better than that of riches.

Gauda said :—

50 When these my lords, who are gifted with great energy, are so very much afraid of this when seems to be a great terror, weak as I am, I fear it the more.

Pashusakha said :—

51. The value of virtue is very superior, There is nothing superior to it. That wealth is known to the Brahmanas. I wait upon them as their servant, only for learning to prize that wealth.

The Rishis said :—

52. May he be, as the result of the gifts he makes, who is the king of the people of this land Let his gift bear fruit who has sent these fruits to us, enclosing gold within them.

Bhishma said :—

53 Having said these words, those Rishis of steadfast vows abandoning the figs having gold within them left that place and proceeded where they liked

The ministers said :—

54 O king, coming to know of the existence of gold within the figs, the Rishis have departed. Let this be known to you.

Bhishma said :—

55. Thus addressed by his ministers, king Vrishadarbhi became stricken with anger against all those Rishis Indeed, to take vengeance upon them, the king entered his own apartment.

56. Practising the austerest of penances, he poured on his sacred fire libations of clarified butter, accompanying each with Mantras uttered by him.

57. From that fire there then originated, as the outcome of the incantation, a form capable of striking every one with fear. Vrishadarbhi named her as Yatudhani

58. That form which had originated from the incantations of the king, looking as dreadful as the Last Night, appeared with joined hands before the king Addressing king Vrishadarbhi, she said,—What shall I do?

Vrishadarbhi said :—

59 Go and follow the seven Rishis, as also Arundhati, and the husband of their maid-servant, and the maid servant herself, and undestand what the meanings are of their names.

60. Having learnt their names, do you kill all of them After killing them you may go wherever you like.

Bhishma said :—

61. Saying —So be it —The Rakshasi who had been named Yatudhani in her proper form went to that forest in which the great Rishis, travelled in search of food.

62. Indeed, O king, those great Rishis with Atri among them, roamed within the forest, living upon fruits and roots.

63 In course of their travel they saw a mendicant of broad shoulders and plump arms and legs and well-grown face and abdomen. Of limbs that were all adipose, he was travelling with a dog in his company

64 Seeing that mendicant whose limbs were all well developed and beautiful Arundhati exclaimed addressing the Rishis —None of you will ever be able to show such well grown features

Vashishtha said :—

65 The sacred fire of this person is not like ours, for while he is able to pour libations on it, morning and evening, none of us can do the same It is therefore that we see both him and his dog so well-formed.

Atri said :—

66 This man does not like us, feel the sufferings of hunger. His energy has not suffered, like ours, any decrease. Acquired with the greatest difficulty, his Vedas have not, like ours disappeared. Hence it is that we see both him and his dog so well-grown.

Vishwamitra said :—

67. This man is not, like us, unable to observe the eternal duties laid down in the scriptures, I have become idle. I feel the sufferings of hunger, I have lost the knowledge I had acquired This man is not like us in this matter. Hence I see both him and his dog so well grown.

Jamadagni said —

68 This man has not to think of storing his annual grain and fuel as we are to do. Hence I see both him and his dog so well-formed.

Kashyapa said :—

66 This man has not, like us, four brothers of the same blood who are begging from house to house, uttering the words —Give—Give'—Hence it is that I see him and his dog so well grown.

Bharadwaja said —

70. This man has no regret like ours for having condemned and cursed his wife. He has not acted so wickedly and foolishly. Hence I see both him and his dog so well-formed.

Gautama said :—

71. This man has not like us only three pieces of covering made of Kusha grass, and a single Ranku skin, each of which, again, is three years old. Hence it is that I see both him and his dog so well-formed.

Bhishma continued :—

72 Seeing those great Rishis the wandering mendicant, approached them, and accosted them all by touching their hand, according to the practice.

73 Conversing then with each other about the difficulty of getting sustenance in that forest and the consequent necessity of undergoing the pangs of hunger, all of them left that place

74 Indeed they travelled through that forest, all bent upon a common object viz, the plucking of fruits and the extraction of roots for maintenance.

75 One day, as they were travelling, they saw a beautiful lake filled with lotuses Its banks were covered with trees which stood thickly near one another. The waters of the lake were pure and transparent.

76 Indeed the lotuses that adorned the lake were all of the color of the rising sun The leaves that floated on the water were of the color of lapis lazuli

77 Various kinds of aquatic fowls were sporting on its bosom There was but one path leading to it The banks were not covered with mire and the access to the water was easy

78 Urged by Vrishadarbha the Rakshasa of dreadful appearance who had originated from his incantations and who had been named Yatudhani, guarded the lake,

79 Those foremost Rishis, with Pashusakha in their company, went towards the lake, which was thus guarded by Yatudhani, for the object of collecting some lotus-stalks.

80—81 Seeing Yatudhani of fearful aspect standing on the banks of the lake, those great Rishis addressed her, saying,— Who are you who thus stand alone in this solitary forest? For whom do you wait here? What, indeed, is your purpose? What do you do here on the banks of this lake adorned with lotuses?

Yatudhani said :—

82 It matters not who I am I deserve not to be accosted. You having ascetic wealth, know that I am the guard set to watch this lake.

The Rishis said :—

83 All of us are hungry. We have nothing else to eat With your permission we would collect some lotus stalks.

Yatudhani said :—

84 According to agreement, do you take the lotus stalks as you please We must, one by one give me your names You may then, without delay, take the stalks!

Bhisma said :—

85 Ascertaining that her name was Yatudhani and that she stood there for killing them, Atri, who was famishing with hunger, addressed her, and said these words.

Atri said :—

86 I am called Atri because I purify the world from sin For, again, thrice studying the Vedas every day, I have made days of my nights That again, is no night in which I have not studied the Vedas. Therefore also I am called Atri, O beautiful lady!

Yatudhani said :—

87 O you of great effulgence, the explanation you have given me of your name is incapable of being understood by me. Do you therefore go and plunge into this tank filled with lotuses.

Vashishtha said :—

88 I am gifted with Yoga powers, I live again, as a householder, and am considered as the foremost of all persons that lead such a mode of life On account of my being gifted with (such) powers, of my living as a householder, and of my being considered, as the foremost of all householders, I am called Vashishtha.

Yatudhani said :—

89 The etymological signification of your name is simply incomprehensible to me inasmuch as the inflections which the original roots have undergone are unintelligible. Go and plunge into this lake of lotuses.

Kashyapa said :—

90 I always protect my body, and on account of my penances I have become gifted with effulgence For thus protecting the body and for this effulgence that is due to my penances, I pass by the name of Kashyapa.

Yatudhani said :—

91. O you of great effulgence, the etymological signification you have given of your name is what I cannot comprehend Go and plunge into this lake filled with lotuses

Bharadwaja said :—

92 I always support my sons, my disciples, the celestials, the Brahmanas, and my wife. On account of my thus supporting all with ease, I pass by the name of Bharadwaja.

Yatudhani said.—

93 The etymological signification you have given me of your name is what I cannot fully understand, on account of the many inflections the root has undergone Go and plunge into this lake filled with lotuses

Gotama said:—

94 I have conquered Heaven and Earth by the help of self-control For my considering all creatures and objects impartially, I am like a smokeless fire. Hence I am incapable of being subjugated by you When, again, I was born, the effulgence of my body removed the surrounding darkness For these reasons I am called Gotama.

Yatudhani said:—

95 The explanation you have given me of your name, O great ascetic, is beyond the range of my comprehension Go and plunge into this lake of lotuses.

Vishwamitra said:—

96 The celestials of the universe are my friends. I am also the friend of the universe. Hence, O Yatudhani, I am called Vishwamitra.

Yatudhani said:—

97. The explanation you have given of your name is a puzzle to me, on account of the inflections the root has undergone Go and plunge into this lake of lotuses.

Jamadagni said:—

98 I have originated from the sacrificial fire of the celestials Hence am I called Jamadagni, O you of beautiful features.

Yatudhani said:—

99 The etymological signification you have given, O great ascetic, of your name, passes the range of my comprehension Do you go and plunge into this lake of lotuses

Arundhati said.—

100 I always live by the side of my husband and hold the Earth jointly with him I always incline my husband's heart towards me. I am, therefore, called Arundhati

Yatudhani said —

101 The explanation you have given of your name is beyond my understanding, on account of the inflections the roots have undergone. Go and plunge into this lake of lotuses.

Ganda said —

102 The Ganda means a portion of the cheek As I have that portion a little elevated above the others I am, O you who have originated from the sacrificial fire of Shaivya, called by the name of Ganda

Yatudhani said:—

103 The explanation which you have given of your name is perfectly incomprehensible to me, on account of the inflections which the root has undergone. Go and plunge into this lake of lotuses.

Pashusakha said:—

104 I protect and tend all animals I see, and I am always a friend to all animals Hence am I called Pashusakha, O you who have originated from the (sacrificial) fire (of king Vrishadarbha).

Yatudhani said.—

105 The explanation you have given of your name is what I cannot understand on account of the inflections which the roots have undergone. Go and plunge into this lake of lotuses

Shunasakha said —

106 I cannot explain the etymology of my name like these ascetics But know, O Yatudhani that I am called by the name of Shunasakha.

Yatudhani said —

107 You have mentioned your name only once I have not been able to understand the explanation you have given, do you therefore, mention it again, O twice-born one

Shunasakha said —

108 Since you have not been able to catch my name on account of my having mentioned it only once, I shall strike you with my triple stick! Struck with it, be you reduced forthwith into ashes.

Bhishma continued —

109 Struck then on the head by the Sannyasin, with his triple stick which resembled the punishment inflicted by a Brahmana the Rakshasi who had originated from the incantations of king Vrishadarbha dropped down on the Earth and became reduced to ashes

110 Having thus killed the powerful Rakshasi Shunasakha thrust his stick into

he earth and sat himself down on a grassy plot of land.

111. The Rishis then, having, as they liked, plucked a number of lotuses and taken up a number of lotus-stalks, came up from the lake, filled with joy

112. Throwing on the ground the mass of lotuses which they had collected with great labour they plunged once more into it for offering oblations of water to the departed Manes.

113 Coming up they went to that side of the bank where they had placed the lotus stalks Reaching that place, those foremost of men found that the stalks were nowhere to be seen.

The Rishis said —

114 What sinful and cruel men has stolen away the lotus stalks collected by our hungry selves from desire of eating —

Bhishma said :—

115 Those foremost of twice born persons, suspecting one another, O destroyer of enemies said,—We shall each have to swear to our innocence

116 All those ascetics then, exhausted with hunger and exertion, agreeing to the proposal, took these oaths.

Atri said —

117 Let him who has stolen the lotus-stalks touch kine with his foot, pass urine facing the sun, and study the Vedas on excluded days.

Vashishtha said :—

118—119 Let him who had stolen the lotus-stalks abstain from reading the Vedas, or leash hounds or be a wandering mendicant unrestrained by the ordinances laid down for that mode of life or be a destroyer of persons who seek refuge with him or live upon the proceeds of the sale of his daughter, or solicit riches from those who are low and vile

Kashyapa said —

120—121 Let him who has stolen the lotus stalks give vent to all sorts of words in all places, give false evidence in a court of law, eat the flesh of animals not killed in sacrifices, make gifts to unworthy persons [illegible] persons at unseasonable times, [illegible] sexual connection with women

[illegible]aja said :—

123 Let him who has stolen the stalks be cruel and sinful in his conduct towards women and kinsmen and kine Let him humiliate Brahmanas, in disputations, by showing his superior knowledge and skill Let him study the Richs and the Yajushes disregarding his preceptor. Let him pour libations upon fires made with dry grass or straw.

Jámadágni said :—

124—125 Let him who has stolen the lotus stalks be guilty of throwing filth and dirt on water. Let him be filled with enmity towards kine. Let him be guilty of having sexual union with women at times other than their season Let him incur the hatred of all persons Let him gain the living from the earnings of his wife. Let him have no friends and let him have many enemies. Let him be another's guest for getting in return those acts of hospitality which he has done to that other.

Gotama said :—

126—127 Let him who has stolen the lotus stalks be guilty of throwing away the Vedas after having read them. Let him renounce the three sacred fires. Let him be a seller of the Soma (plant or juice) Let him live with that Brahmana who lives in a village which has only one well from which water is drawn by all classes and who has married a Shudra woman.

Vishwamitra said :—

128. Let him who has stolen the lotus stalks be doomed to see his preceptors and seniors and his servants maintained by others during his own life-time. Let him not have a good end Let him be the father of many children.

129 Let him be always impure and a wretch among Brahmanas Let him be proud of his riches Let him be a tiller of the soil and let him be filled with malice

130. Let him wander in the rainy season. Let him be a paid servant Let him be the priest of the king Let him assist at the sacrifices of such impure persons who are not worthy of being assisted at their sacrifices

Arundhati said —

131 Let her who has stolen the lotus-stalks always humiliate her mother in law. Let her be always vexed with her husband. Let her eat whatever good things come to her house without giving a part to others.

132 Disregarding the kinsmen of her husband, let her live in her husband's house and eat, every evening, the flour of fried barley Let her come to be considered as unenjoyable. Let her be the mother of a heroic son.

Ganda said :—

133 Let her who has stolen the lotus-stalks be always a speaker of untruth Let her always fall out with her kinsmen ! Let her give away her daughter in marriage for money.

134. Let her eat the food which she has has cooked alone and without giving a part it to of anybody ! Let her pass her whole life as a slave Indeed, let her who has stolen the lotus-stalks be quick with child on account of sexual union under circumstances of guilt.

Pashusakha said :—

135 Let him who has stolen the lotus-stalks be born of a slave mother Let him who have many unworthy children. And let him never bow to the celestials.

Shunasakha said :—

136 Let him who has removed the lotus stalks acquire the merit of bestowing his daughter in marriage upon a Brahmana who has studied all the Samans and the Yajushes and who has carefully observed the vow of celibacy Let him perform the final ablutions after having read all the Atharvans !

All the Rishis said —

137. The oath you have taken is no oath at all, for all the deeds which you have mentioned are very desirable for the Brahmanas ! It is evident, Shunasakha, that you have appropriated our lotus stalks.

Shunasakha said :—

138 Not seeing the lotus stalks deposited by you what you say is indeed true, for it is I who have actually stolen them

139 Before you all I have made those stalks disappear Ye sinless ones, the act was done by me for testing you

140 I came here for protecting you That woman who lies killed there was called Yatudhani She was of a dreadful disposition Originated from the incantations of king Vrishadarbhi, she had come here from the desire of killing all of you

141 Ye ascetics having penances for wealth, begged on by that king, she had come but I have killed her. That wicked and sinful creature, originated from the sacrificial fire, would otherwise have taken your lives

142 It was for killing her and saving you that I came here, O ye learned Brahmanas Know that I am Vasava ! you have entirely got rid of the influence of cupidity On account of this, you have acquired many eternal regions fraught with the fruition of every desire as soon as it rises in the heart ! Do you rise, forthwith from this place and go to those regions of beatitude, O twice-born ones, that are reserved for you

Bhishma said —

143 The great Rishis highly pleased at this replied to Purandara, saying,—So be it !—They then ascended to the celestial region the company of Indra himself

144—145 Thus, those great persons, though worn out with hunger and though tempted at such a time with the offer of various kinds of enjoyable articles, refrained from giving way to temptation As the outcome of such self denial they attained to the celestial region It appears, therefore, that one should, under all circumstances, renounce cupidity

146—147 Even this, O king is the highest duty Cupidity should be renounced. The man who recites this account in assemblies of men, succeeds in acquiring riches, Such a man has never to come by a distressful end The departed Manes the Rishis, and the celestials become all pleased with him Hereafter, again, he becomes gifted with fame and religious merit and riches

CHAPTER XCIV.

(ANUSHASANA PARVA)—

Continued.

Bhishma said —

1 Regarding it is cited the old history of the oaths on the occasion of a sojourn to the sacred waters.

2 O best of the Bharatas, the act of theft had been committed by Indra, and the oaths were taken by many royal and twice born Rishis.

3 Once on a time, the Rishis, having assembled together, proceeded to the western Prabhasa They held a consultation there which resulted in a determination on their part to sojourn to all the sacred waters on Earth

4 There were Shakra, Angiras, the highly learned Kavi, Agastya, Narada and Parvata, and Bhrigu and Vashishtha and Kashyapa and Gautama and Vishwamitra and Jamadagni, O king.

5 There were also the Rishi Galava and Ashtaka and Bharadwaja and Arundhati and the Valakhilyas, and Shivi and Dilipa and Nahusha and Amvarisha and the royal Yayati and Dhundhumara and Puru

6. These foremost of men, headed the great performer of hundred sacrifices, the slayer of Vritra, sojourned to all the sacred waters one after another, and at last reached the highly sacred Kaushiki on the day of the full moon in the month of Magha.

7 Having purified themselves of all sins by ablutions performed in all the sacred waters, they at last proceeded to the very sacred Brahmasara. Bathing in that lake, those Rishis gifted with fiery energy began to gather and eat the stalks of the lotus.

8. Amongst those Brahmanas, some had extracted the stalks of the lotus and some the stalks of the Nymphœa stellata. Soon they found that the stalks extracted by Agastya had been taken away by somebody.

9 The foremost of Rishis, Agastya, addressing them all, said,—Who has taken away the good stalks which I had extracted and deposited here? I suspect some one amongst you must have taken them. Let him who has taken them away return them to me. You should not thus misappropriate my stalks.

10. It is heard that Time attacks the energy of virtue. That Time has come upon us Hence, virtue is afflicted. It is proper that I should go to Heaven for good, before sin assails the world and establishes itself fully here.

11. Before the time comes when Brahmanas, loudly uttering the Vedas, within the precincts of villages and inhabited places, cause the Shudras hear them, before the time comes when kings offered against the rules of virtue from motives of policy, I shall go to the celestial region for good.

12. Before men cease to regard the distinctions between the lower, the middle and the higher classes, I shall go to the celestial region for good Before Ignorance attacks the world and covers all things in darkness, I shall go to the celestial region for good.

13 Before the time comes when the strong begin to oppress the weak and treat them as slaves, I shall go to the celestial region for ever. Indeed, I dare not remain on Earth for seeing these things.

14 The Rishis, much concerned at what he said, addressed that great ascetic and said,—We have not stolen your stalks! You should not cherish these suspicions against us, O great Rishi, we shall take the most dreadful oaths.

15 Having said these words, conscious as they were of their own innocence, and desirous of upholding the cause of virtue, those Rishis and royal sages then began to swear, one after another, the following oaths.

Bhrigu said :—

16 Let him who has stolen your stalks censure when censured, assail when assailed, and eat the flesh that is attached to the back-bone of animals.

Vashishtha said :—

17. Let him who has stolen your stalks neglect his Vedic studies, leash hounds, and having taken himself to the mendicant order live in a city or town.

Kashyapa said :—

18 Let him who has stolen your stalks sell all things in all places misappropriate trusts, and give false evidence!

Gotama said :—

19 Let him who has stolen your stalks live, showing pride in all things, with an understanding that does not see all creatures with an equal eye, and always giving way to the influence of desire and anger. Let him be a cultivator of the soil, and let him be moved by malice.

Angiras said :—

20. Let him who has stolen your stalks be always impure! Let him be a censurable Brahmana Let him leash hounds Let him be guilty of Brahmanicide Let him be averse to expiations after having committed sin.

Dhundhumara said :—

21 Let him who has stolen your stalks be ungrateful to his friends! Let him take birth in a Shudra woman! Let him eat alone any good food.

Dilipa said :—

22 Let him who has stolen your stalks attain to those regions of misery and infamy which are reserved for that Brahmana who lives in a village having but one well and who knows a Shudra woman.

Puru said :—

23 Let him who has stolen your stalks practise as a physician! Let him be supported by the earnings of his wife! Let him draw his maintenance from his father-in-law!

Shukra said :—

24 Let him who has stolen your stalks eat the flesh of animals not killed in sacrifices! Let him have sexual union at day-time! Let him be a servant of the king.

Jamadagni said:—

25 Let him who has stolen your stalks study the Vedas on forbidden days or occasions. Let him feed friends at Shraddhas performed by him! Let him eat at the Shraddha of a Shudra.

Shivi said:—

26 Let him who has stolen your stalks die without having established a fire (for daily worship)! Let him be guilty of obstructing the celebration of sacrifices by others! Let him fall out with those who practise penances!

Yayati said:—

27. Let him who has stolen your stalks be guilty of having sexual union with his wife when she is not in her season and when he is himself in the observance of a vow and bears matted locks on his head! Let him also disregard the Vedas!

Nahusha said:—

28. Let him who has stolen your stalks live in domesticity after having betaken himself to the vow of mendicancy! Let him act in whatever way he pleases, after having performed the initiatory rites in view of a sacrifice or some solemn observance! Let him take pecuniary satisfaction for teaching his disciples.

Amvarisha said:—

29 Let him who has stolen your stalks be cruel and sinful in his conduct towards women and kinsmen and kine! Let him be guilty also of Brahmanicide!

Narada said:—

30 Let him who has stolen your stalks be one who identifies the body with the soul! Let him study the scriptures with an unworthy preceptor Let him chaunt the Vedas, violating at each step the rules of orthoepy! Let him disregard all his elders

Nabhaga said —

31. Let him who has stolen your stalks always speak untruth and quarrel with those who are pious Let him bestow his daughter in marriage after accepting a pecuniary satisfaction offered by his son-in-law.

Kavi said —

32 Let him who has stolen your stalks be guilty of striking a cow with his foot Let him pass urine, facing the sun! Let him renounce the person who seeks shelter at his hands.

Vishwamitra said —

33 Let him who has stolen your stalks become a servant who acts deceitfully towards his master! Let him be the priest of a king! Let him officiate as the sacrificial priest of one who should not be assisted at his sacrifices!

Parvata said:—

34 Let him who has stolen your stalks be the head of a village. Let him make journeys on asses Let him leash hounds for maintenance.

Bharadwaja said:—

35 Let him who has stolen your stalks be guilty of all the transgressions of him who is cruel in conduct and untruthful in speech.

Ashtaka said:—

36 Let him who has stolen your stalks be a king shorn of wisdom, capricious and sinful in his conduct, and disposed to rule the Earth impiously.

Galava said:—

37 Let him who has stolen your stalks be more infamous than a sinful man Let him be sinful in his deeds towards his kinsmen and relatives Let him proclaim the gifts he makes to others.

Arundhati said —

38 Let her who has stolen your stalks speak ill of her mother-in-law Let her dislike her husband Let her eat alone any good food that comes to her house.

The Valakhilyas said —

39 Let him who has stolen your stalks stand on one foot at the entrance of a village Let him, while knowing all duties, be guilty of every transgression.

Shunasakha said:—

40 Let him who has stolen your stalks be a Brahmana who sleeps happily having neglected his daily Homa Let him, after becoming a religious mendicant, act in any way he likes, without observing any control

Surabhi said —

41. Let her who has stolen your stalks be milked, with he, (hind) legs bound with a rope of human hair, and with the help of a calf not her own, and, while milked, let her milk be held in a vessel of white brass

Bhishma said —

42 After the Rishis and the royal sages had taken various oaths, O Kuru

king the thousand eyed chief of the celestials, filled with joy, looked at the angry Rishi Agastya

43 Addressing the Rishi who was very angry at the disappearance of his lotus stalks, Indra thus declared what was passing in his mind Hear, O king, the words Indra spoke in the midst of those twice-born and celestial Rishis and royal sages.

Shakra said —

44 Let him who has stolen your stalks acquire the merit of him who bestows his daughter in marriage upon a Brahmana who has duly observed the vow of Brahmacharyya or who has duly studied the Samans and the Yajushes Let him also have the merit of one who takes the final bath after completing his study of the Atharva Veda.

45 Let him who has stolen your stalks acquire the merit of having studied all the Vedas. Let him be observant of all duties and righteous in his conduct Indeed, let him go to the region of Brahman.

Agastya said —

46 You have, O destroyer of Vala, uttered a benediction instead of a curse Give them to me, for that is the eternal duty

Indra said —

47 O holy one, I did not remove your stalks, moved by cupidity. Indeed, I removed them from desire of hearing this assembly recite what the duties are that we should observe. You should not yield to anger.

48. Duties are the foremost of Shrutis. Duties form the eternal path I have listened to this discourse of the Rishis (on duties) that is eternal and immutable, and that is above all change

49 Do you then, O foremost of learned Brahmanas, take back these stalks of yours O holy one, you should forgive my transgression, O you who are free from every fault

Bhishma said —

50 Thus addressed by the king of the celestials, the ascetics vis, Agastya, who had been very angry, took back his stalks Gifted with intelligence, the Rishi became cheerful.

51. After this, those dwellers of the forest went to various other sacred waters Indeed, going to those sacred waters they performed their ablutions everywhere.

52. The man who reads this discourse with rapt attention on every Parva day, will not beget an ignorant and wicked son. He will never be shorn of learning.

53 No calamity will ever befall him. He will besides, be free from every sort of sorrow. He will never suffer from decrepitude and decay. Freed from stains and evil of every sort, and gifted with merit, he is sure to acquire Heaven.

54 He who studies this Shastra observed by the Rishis, is sure, O king, to attain to the eternal region of Brahman that is full of happiness.

CHAPTER XCV.

(ANUSHASANIKA PARVA).—Continued.

Yudhishthira said :—

1—3 O chief of Bharata's race by whom was the custom of giving umbrellas and sandals at Shraddhas introduced? Why was it introduced and for what purpose are those gifts made? They are given not only at Shraddhas, but also at other religious rites They are given on many occasions with the view of winning religious merit I wish to know in full, O twice-born one, the true meaning of this practice.

Bhishma said :—

4 Do you, O prince, attentively listen to the details I shall recite about the custom of giving away umbrellas and shoes at religious rites, and as to how and by whom it was introduced.

5 I shall also tell you in full, O prince, how it acquired the force of a permanent observance and how it came to be considered as a meritorious act.

6 I shall in this connection, recite the conversation between Jamadagni and the great Sun Formerly the illustrious Jamadagni, O powerful king, of Bhrigu's race, was engaged in practising with his bow.

7—10 Taking his aim, he shot arrow after arrow His wife Renuka used to pick up the arrows when he shot and repeatedly bring them back to that descendant, gifted with the burning energy of Bhrigu's race. Pleased with the whizzing noise of his arrows and the twang of his bow, he amused himself thus by repeatedly shooting his arrows which Renuka brought back to him One day, at noontide, O monarch, in that month when the Sun was in Jyeshthamula, the Brahmana, having shot all his arrows, said to Renuka,—O large-eyed lady, go and fetch me the arrows I have shot from my bow.

11—14 O you of beautiful eye-brows! I shall again shoot them with my bow!—The lady proceeded on her errand but was compelled to sit under the shade of a tree, on account of her head and feet being scorched by the heat of the Sun. The black-eyed and graceful Renuka, having rested for only a moment, feared the curse of her husband and, therefore, began to collect and bring back the arrows. Taking them with her, the celebrated lady of beautiful features came back, distressed in mind and her feet smarting with pain. Trembling with fear, she approached her husband.

15 The Rishi, stricken with anger, repeatedly addressed his fair-faced wife, saying,—O Renuka, why have you been so late in returning?

Renuka said:—

16. O you, having penances for wealth, my head and feet were scorched by the rays of the Sun! Oppressed by the heat, I took shelter under the shade of a tree!

17. This has been the cause of the delay! Informed of the cause, do you, O lord, cease to be angry with me.

Jamadagni said:—

18. O Renuka, this very day shall I destroy, with the fiery energy of my weapons, the star of the day with his burning rays, who has afflicted you thus.

Bhishma continued:—

19 Drawing his celestial bow, and taking up many arrows, Jamadagni stood, turning his face towards the Sun and watching him as he moved on.

20. Then O son of Kunti, seeing him ready for fight, the Sun approached him in the guise of a Brahmana, and said to him,—What has the Sun done to offend you?

21. Passing through the sky, he draws up the moisture from the Earth; and in the form of rains he pours it down once more on her.

22. It is through this, O twice-born one, that the food of human beings springs up—food that is so agreeable to them! The Vedas say that it is food that forms the vital airs.

23. O Brahmana, hidden in the clouds and encompassed by his rays, the Sun drenches the seven insular continents with showers of rain.

24. O powerful one, the moisture, thus poured, spreading itself into the leaves and fruits of vegetables and herbs, is changed into food.

25—26 O son of Bhrigu, the rites consequent on birth, religious observances, investiture with the sacred thead, gifts of kine, marriage, all articles in view of sacrifices, the rules for the governance of men, gifts, all sorts of union, and the acquisition of riches, originate from food! You know this well!

27. All the good and sweet things in the universe, and all the efforts made by living creatures, originate from food! I duly recite what is well known to you! Indeed, you fully know all that I have said.

28 Do you, therefore, O twice-born Rishi, appease your anger! What will you gain by annihilating the Sun?'

CHAPTER XCVI.

(ANUSHASANIKA PARVA)—Continued.

Yudhishthira said:—

1. What did that foremost of ascetics, viz., Jamadagni gifted with great energy, do when thus besought by the Sun?

Bhishma said:—

2. O descendant of Kuru, inspite of all the prayers of the Sun, the sage Jamadagni, effulgent like fire, continued to cherish his anger.

3—4. Then, O king, the Sun, in the guise of a Brahmana, bowed his head to him and addressed him, with clasped hands, in these sweet words,—O twice-born Rishi, the Sun is always moving! How shall you pierce the Lord of day who is continually moving forward?

Jamadagni said:—

5 With the eye of knowledge I know you to be both moving and motionless! I shall surely read you a lesson this day.

6 At midday you appear to stay in the firmament for a moment. It is then, O Sun, that I shall pierce you with my arrows! There is no swerving from this resolution of mine.

Surya said:—

7. O twice-born Rishi, forsooth, you know me, O best of archers! But, O holy one, though I have offended, see I pray for your protection.

Bhishma said :—

8 At this, the worshipful Jamdagni smilingly addressed the Sun, saying.—O Sun, when you have sought my protection, you have nothing to fear.

9—10 He would get over the simplicity that exists in Brahmanas, the stability that exists in the Earth, the mildness existing in the Moon the gravity existing in Varuna the effulgence existing in Agni, the brightness of Meru, and the heat of the Sun, who would kill a suppliant for protection.

11. The man who can kill a suppliant is capable of violating the bed of his preceptor, of killing a Brahmana and of drinking alcohol

12 Do you therefore, think of some remedy for this evil, by which people may be relieved when heated by your rays

Bhishma continued :—

13 So saying, that excellent descendant of Bhrigu remained silent for some time, and the Sun immediately gave him an umbrella and a pair of sandals.

Surya said —

14 Do you O great Rishi take this umbrella with which the head may be protected and my rays warded off This pair of sandals is made of leather for the protection of the feet.

15 From this day the gift of these articles in all religious rites shall be established as a custom.

Bhishma continued :—

16 This custom of giving umbrella and shoes was introduced by the Sun O descendant of Bharata, these gifts are regarded meritorious in the three worlds

17 Do you, therefore give away umbrellas and shoes to Brahmanas I have no doubt that you will then acquire great religious merit by the deed

18—19 O foremost one of Bharata's race, he who gives away a white umbrella with a hundred ribs to a Brahmana, acquires eternal happiness after death and lives in the region of Indra, respected by Brahmanas Apsaras, and Devas.

20 O powerful one, he who gives shoes to Snataka Brahmanas as also to Brahmanas practising the rites of religion whose feet have become sore with the heat of the Sun, acquires regions coveted by the very celestials

21, Such a man, O Bharata, lives happily in the highest Heaven after his death.

22 O foremost one of Bharata's race, I have thus recited to you, in full, the merits of giving away shoes and umbrellas at religious ceremonies.

CHAPTER XCVII.

(ANUSHASANIKA PARVA) — Continued.

Yudhishthira said :—

1. O foremost one of Bharata's race, do you describe to me all the deities of the household mode and tell me all that a man should do in order to acquire prosperity in this world.

Bhishma said :—

2 O Bharata, I shall in this connection, recite to you the old story of Vasudeva and the goddess Earth

3 The powerful Vasudeva, O excellent prince of Bharata's race after singing the praises of the goddess Earth, accosted her about this very subject that you have required about.

Vasudeva said :—

4. Having adopted the domestic mode of life, what acts should I, or one like me, do and how are such acts to yield success

The goddess Earth said :—

5 O Madhava, the Rishis, the celestials, the departed Manes, and men should be adored, and sacrifices should be performed by a householder.

6 Do you also learn this from me that the celestials are always pleased with sacrifices and men are pleased with hospitality. Therefore, the householder should please them with such objects as they desire.

7. By such acts O destroyer of Madhu, Rishis also are pleased The householder, abstaining from food, should daily attend to his sacred fire and to his sacrificial offerings

8—10 The celestials, O destroyer of Madhu are pleased with such deeds The household'er should daily offer oblations of food and water, or of fruits, roots and water, for the satisfaction of the departed Manes, and give boiled food to the Vaishwedevas, and oblations of clarified butter to Agni, Soma, and Dhanwantari.

11—12. He should offer separate and distinct oblations to Prajapati He should make sacrificial offerings duly, to Yama in the South, to Varuna in the West, to Soma in the North, to Prajapati within the homestead, to Dhanwantari in the North-East, and to Indra in the East.

13 He should offer food to men at the entrance of his house. These, O Madhava, are known as the Vali offerings The Vali should be offered to the Maruts and the deities in the interior of one's house

14 To the Vishwedevas it should be offered in open air, and to the Rakshasas and evil spirits the offerings should be made at night.

15 After making these offerings, the householder should make offerings to Brahmanas, and if no Brahmana be present, the first portion of the food should be thrown into the fire.

16 When a man wishes to offer Shraddha to his ancestors, he should, when the Shraddha ceremony is done, please his ancestors and then make the Vali offerings duly.

17 He should then make offerings to the Vaishwedevas He should next invite Brahmanas, and then properly entertain guests arrived at his house, with food.

18 By this act, O prince, are guests pleased He who does not live in the house long, or, having come, goes away after a short time, is called a guest.

19—20 To his preceptor, to his father, to his friend and to a guest, a householder should say, I have got this in my house to offer you to-day!—And he should offer it accordingly every day.

21. The householder should do whatever they would order him to do This is the established custom The householder, O Krishna should take his food the last of all, after having offered food to all of them

22 The householder should adore with offerings of honey, etc, his king, his priest, his preceptor, and his father in law, as also Snataka Brahmanas even if they were to live in his house for whole year.

23. In the morning as well as in the evening, food should be offered on the ground to dogs, the cooks for dogs and birds This is called the Vaishwedeva offerings.

24 The householder, who performs these ceremonies with mind shorn of passion, obtains the blessings of the Rishis in this world, and after death acquires the heavenly regions.

Bhishma said :—

25 Having heard all this from the goddess Earth, the powerful Vasudeva acted accordingly. Do you also act in the same way.

26 By performing these duties of a householder, O king, you shall acquire fame in this world and Heaven after death!

CHAPTER XCVIII.

(ANUSHASANIKA PARVA)—Continued.

Yudhishthira said —

1. Of what kind is the gift of light, O chief of Bharata's race? How did this gift originate? What are the merits of it? Do you tell me all this

Bhishma said :—

2 Regarding it, O Bharata, is recited the old discourse between Manu that lord of creatures, and Suvarna.

3 There was formerly an ascetic O Bharata, named Suvarna. His complexion was like that of gold and hence he was called Suvarna.

4 Gifted with good birth good conduct and good qualities he had mastered all the Vedas Indeed, by the accomplishments he possessed, he succeeded in excelling many persons of noble birth.

5 One day that learned Brahmana beheld Manu, the lord of all creatures, and approached him Meeting each other, they made the usual polite enquires

6 Both of them were in the truth Having met each other, they sat down on charming breast of the golden mount Meru

7 Seated there they began to talk with each other on various subjects about the great deities and twice-born Rishis and Daityas of ancient times

8 Then Suvarna addressing the Self-create Manu said these words —You should answer one question of mine for the behoof of all creatures

9 O lord of all creatures, the celestials are seen to be adored with presents of flowers and other good scents What is this? How has this practice come into operation? What also are the merits of it? Do you describe this subject to me.

Manu said —

10 Regarding it is recited the old discourse between Shukra and the great (Daitya) Vali.

11. Once on a time, Shukra of Bhrigu's race approached Vali the son of Virochana while he was ruling the three worlds

12 Having adored the descendant of Bhrigu with the Arghya the king of the Asuras, that profuse giver of sacrificial presents sat down after his guest had seated himself

13 This very subject which you have introduced regarding the merits of the gift of flowers and incense and lamps came up on the occasion Indeed, the king of the Daityas put this high question to Shukra that most learned of all ascetics

Vali said :—

14 O foremost of all persons conversant with Brahma, what indeed, is the merit of giving flowers and incense and lamps? You should, O foremost of Brahmanas, describe this to me.

Shukra said :—

15 Penance first sprang into existence. Afterwards came religion In the interval many creepers and herbs sprang up

16. Their species were numerable All of them have the Moon for their lord Some of these creepers and herbs came to be considered as Ambrosia and some came to be considered as Poison Others that were neither this nor that formed one class.

17. That is Ambrosia which gives immediate pleasure and joy to the mind That is Poison which tortures the mind greatly by its smell

18 Know again that Ambrosia is highly auspicious and that Poison is highly inauspicious All the herbs are Ambrosia Poison is born of the energy of fire.

19 Flowers please the mind and confer prosperity. Hence men of pious deeds bestowed the name Sumanas on them

20 That man who of a state of poverty offers flowers to the celestials finds that the celestials become pleased with him, and as the result of such satisfaction confer prosperity upon him.

21. O king of the the Daityas those celestials to whom worshippers offer flowers, O lord uttering their names the while, become pleased with the offerers on account of their devotion.

22 The (herbaceous) herbs are of various kinds and possess different qualities They should be classed as fierce, mild, and powerful

23 Listen to me as I tell you which trees are useful for purposes of sacrifice and which are not so Hear also what garlands are acceptable to Asuras, and what are beneficial when offered to the celestials.

24 I shall also set forth in due order what garlands are liked by the Rakshasas, what by the Uragas, what by the Yakshas, what by human beings, and what by the departed Manes, in proper order.

25 Flowers are of various kinds Some are wild, some are from trees which grow in the midst of human dwellings, some belong to trees which never grow unless planted on well-cultivated soil, some are from trees growing on mountains, some are from trees which are not prickly, and some from trees which are prickly. Fragrance, beauty of form and taste also make grounds of classification

26 The scent of flowers is of two kinds, agreeable and disagreeable. Those flowers which have sweet smell should be offered to the celestials.

27 The flowers of trees which have no thorns are generally white in color. Such flowers are always acceptable to the celestials, O lord.

28 A wise man should offer garlands of aquatic flowers such as the lotus and the like, to the Gandharvas and Nagas and Yakshas.

29 Such plants and herbs as produce red flowers, as have keen scent, and as are prickly, have been laid down in the Atharvans as fit for all acts of incantation for injuring enemies.

30 Such flowers as have keen energy, as are painful to the touch, as grow on trees and plants having thorns, and as are either bloody-red or black, should be offered to (evil) spirits and unearthly beings.

31. Such flowers as please the mind and heart, as are very agreeable when pressed, and as are of beautiful form, have been said, O lord, to be worthy of being offered to men.

32 Such flowers as grow on cemeteries and crematoria, or in places dedicated to the celestials, should not be brought and used for marriage and other rites having growth and prosperity for their object, or for acts of pleasure in secrecy.

33 Such flowers as grow on mountains and in vales, and as are beautiful to look at and sweet scented should be offered to the celestials. Sprinkling them with sandal-paste, such sweet flowers should be duly offered according to the scriptural ordinances.

34. The celestials become pleased with the scent of flowers, the Yakshas and Rakshasas with their sight; the Nagas with their touch, and human beings with all three, viz, scent, sight, and touch.

35 Flowers, when offered to the celestials please them immediately. They are capable of accomplishing every object by merely wishing its accomplishment As such, when pleased with devotees offering them flowers, they cause all the objects cherished by their worshippers to be immediately achieved.

36 Pleased, they gratify their worshippers Honored they make their worshippers enjoy all honors Disregarded and insulted, they make those vilest of men to be ruined and consumed.

37. I shall after this, speak to you of the merits of the ordinances about the gift of incense. Know, O king of Asuras, that incenses are of various sorts Some of them are auspicious and some inauspicious.

38. Some incenses consists of exudations Some are made of fragrant wood set on fire And some are artificial, being made by the hand, of various articles mixed together Their scent is of two sorts, viz, agreeable and disagreeable Listen to me as I describe the subject fully 39 All exudations except that of the Boswellia serrata are agreeable to the celestials It is, however, certain that the best of all exudations is that of the Balsamodendron Mukul.

40 Of all Dhupas of the Sarj class, the Aquilaria Agallocha is the best It is very acceptable to the Yakshas, the Rakshasas and Nagas The exudation of the Boswellia serratta, and others of the same class, are much acceptable to the Daityas.

41. Dhupas made of the exudation of the Shorea robusta and the Pinus deodara, mixed with various spirits of strong scent, are, O king, acceptable to human beings

42 Such Dhupas are said to immediately please the celestials, the Danavas, and spirits. Besides these, there are many other kinds of Dhupas used by men for purposes of pleasure or enjoyment.

43 The offer of flowers and the gift of such Dhupas as yield gratification are equal in merits

44 I shall now speak of the merits of the gift of lights, and who may give them at what time and in what manner, and what should be the kind of lights that should be offered.

45 Light is said to be energy and fame and goes upwards Hence the gift of light, which is energy, increases the energy of men.

46 There is a hell named Andhatamas. The period also of the Sun's southward course is considered as dark. For avoiding that hell and the darkness of this period, one should give lights during that period when the Sun is in northern solstice Such an act is highly spoken of by the good

47 Since, again, light has an upward course and is considered as a remedy for darkness, therefore, one should give lights Thus is the conclusion of the scriptures

48 It is by giving lights that the celestials have become gifted with beauty, energy, and resplendence. By abstention from such a deed, the Rakshasas have become gifted with the opposite attributes. Hence, one should always give lights

49 By giving lights a man becomes gifted with keen vision and resplendence. One who gives lights should not be looked with jealousy by others. Lights, again, should not be stolen, nor put out when given by others

50 One who steals a light becomes blind Such a man has to grope through darkness and becomes shorn of resplendence. One who gives lights shines in beauty in the celestial regions like a row of lights.

51. Among lights, the best are those in which clarified butter is burnt Next in order are those in which the juice of deciduous herbs is burnt. One seeking prosperity and growth should never burn fat or marrow or the juice that comes from the bones of creatures.

52 The man who desires his own aggrandisement and prosperity should always give lights at descents from mountains, in roads through forests and inaccessible regions, under sacred trees standing in the midst of human dwellings, and in crossings of streets.

53 The man who gives lights always illumines his race acquires purity of soul and effulgence of form Indeed, such a man, after death, lives in the company of the luminous bodies in the sky.

54 I shall now describe to you the merits, with the fruits they bring about, of Vali offerings made to the celestials the Yakshas, the Uragas, human beings, spirits and Rakshasas

55 Those unscrupulous and wicked men who eat without first serving Brahmanas and celestials and guests and children, should be known as Rakshasas.

56 Hence, one should first offer the food one has got ready to the celestials after having adored them duly with controlled senses and rapt attention One should offer the Vali to the celestials, bending his head in respect.

57. The celestials are always supported by food that householders offer They bless such houses in which offerings are made to them The Yakshasas and Rakshasas and Pannagas, as also guests and all houseless persons, are supported by the food offered by householders.

58 Indeed, the celestials and the departed Manes derive their sustenance from such offerings. Pleased with such offerings they please the offerer in return with longevity and fame and riches.

59. Clean food, of sweet scent and look, mixed with milk and curds, should, along with flowers, be offered to the celestials.

60. The Valis that should be offered to Yakshas and Rakshasas should be rich with blood and meat, with wines and spirits accompanying, and adorned with fried paddy.

61. Valis mixed with lotuses and Utpalas are very acceptable to the Nagas. Sesame seeds, boiled in raw sugar, should be offered to the spirits and other unearthly Beings

62. He who never takes any food without first giving a part of it to the Brahmanas and celestials and guests, becomes entitled to first portions of food. Such a man becomes gifted with strength and energy. Hence one should never take any food without first offering a portion thereof to the celestial after adoring them with respect.

63 One's house always shines in beauty on account of the household deities that live in it. Hence, he who desires his own advancement and prosperity should adore the household gods by offering them the first portion of every food.

64 Thus did the learned Kavi of Bhrigu's race discourse to Vali the chief of the Asuras That discourse was next recited by Manu to the Rishi Suvarna. Suvarna, in his turn, recited it to Narada.

65 The celestial Rishi Narada recited to me the merits of the several acts mentioned Informed of those merits, do you, O son, perform the several acts mentioned

CHAPTER XCIX.

(ANUSHASANIKA PARVA).—Continued.

Yudhishthira said:—

1. I have, O chief of the Bharatas, heard what the merits which presenters of flowers and incense and lights acquire. I have heard you speak also of the merits of a due observance of the ordinances in respect of the presentation of the Vali You should O grandfather, discourse to me once more on this subject.

2 Indeed, tell me, O Sire, once more of the merits of presenting incense and lights. Why are Valis offered on the ground by householders.

Bhishma said.—

3 Regarding it is recited the old discourse between Nahusha and Agastya and Bhrigu.

4 The royal sage Nahusha, O monarch, having penances for wealth, acquired the sovereignty of the celestial region by his own good deeds.

5 With controlled senses, O king, he lived in the celestial region, engaged in doing diverse acts of both human and celestial nature.

6. From that great king flowed various kinds of human acts and various kinds of celestial deeds, also, O king.

7—8 The various rites with respect to the sacrificial fire, the collection of sacred fuel and of Kusha grass, as also of flowers, and the presentation of Vali consisting of food adorned with fried paddy, and the offer of incense and of light,—all these, O monarch, occurred daily in the house of that great king while he lived in the celestial region. Indeed, though living in the celestial region he celebrated the sacrifice of recitation and the sacrifice of meditation.

9 And, O chastiser of foes, Nahusha, although he had become the king of the deities, yet adored all the deities, as he used to do formerly, with due rites and ceremonies.

10. Sometime after, Nahusha realized his position as the king of all the deities. This filled him with pride From that time all his deeds were suspended.

11. Filled with pride on account of the boon he had received from all the celestials, Nahusha caused the very Rishis to bear him on their shoulders. On account, however, of his abstention from all religious acts, his energy began to wane.

12 The time was very long for which Nahusha, filled with arrogance, continued to employ the foremost of Rishis, having penances for wealth, as the bearers of his vehicles.

13 He make the Rishis perform by turns this humiliating work. The day came when it was Agastya's turn to carry the vehicle, O Bharata.

14—15 At that time, Bhrigu that foremost of all persons conversant with Brahma went to Agastya while the latter was seated in his hermitage, and addressing him said,—O great ascetic, why should we patiently suffer such indignities inflicted on us by this wicked Nahusha who has become the king of the deities.

Agastya said —

16. How can I succeed in cursing Nahusha, O great Rishi? You know how the Boon-giving (Brahman) himself has given Nahusha the best of boons.

17 Coming to the celestial region, the boon that Nahusha prayed for, was that, whoever would come within the range of his vision would, deprived of all energy, come within his control.

18 The Self-born Brahman granted him this boon, and it is therefore that neither yourself nor I have been able to consume him Forsooth, it is for this reason that none one else amongst the foremost of Rishis has been able to consume or throw him down from his elevated position.

19 Formarly, O lord, nectar was given by Brahman to Nahusha for drinking Therefore we can do nothing to him

20. The great god, it appears, gave that boon to Nahusha for plunging all creatures into grief That wretched man behaves most unrighteously towards the Brahmanas.

21. O foremost of all speakers, tell us what should be done under the circumstances Forsooth, I shall do what you will advise.

Bhrigu said :—

22. It is at the command of the Grandfather that I have come to you with the view of counteracting the power of Nahusha who is gifted with great energy but who has been stupefied by fate.

23 That exceedingly wicked being who has become the king of the celestials, will to day yoke you to his car. With the help of my power I shall to day hurl him down from his position as Indra on account of his having transcended all restraints.

24 I shall to-day, in your very sight, re-establish the true Indra in his position,—him, viz, who has celebrated a hundred horse sacrifices,—having hurled the wicked and sinful Nahusha from that seat.

25 That impious king of the celestials will to-day insult you by a kick on account of his understanding being afflicted by fate and for bringing about his own downfall

26 Enraged at such an insult I shall to day curse that sinful wretch that enemy of the Brahmanas, who has transcended all restraints, saying,—Be you metamorphosed into a snake.

27. Before your eyes, O great ascetic, I shall to-day hurl down on the Earth the wicked Nahusha who shall be deprived of all power on account of the cries of Fie that will be uttered from all sides.

28 Indeed, I shall hurl down Nahusha to-day that sinful man who has besides, been stupefied by lordship and power I shall do this, if you like it, O ascetic

39 Thus addressed by Bhrigu, Mitravaruna's son Agastya of unfading power and glory, became highly pleased and freed from every anxiety.

CHAPTER C

(ANUSHASANIKA PARVA)—Continued.

Yudhishthira said —

1 How was Nahusha plunged into distress? How was he hurled down on the Earth? How, indeed, was he deprived of the sovereignty of the celestials? You should recite everything to me.

Bhishma said :—

2 Thus did those two Rishis, viz, Bhrigu and Agastya, talk with each other. I have already told you how Nahusha, when he first become the king of the celestials, acted in a proper way Indeed, that great royal sage performed all human and celestial deeds.

3—4 Nahusha who had become the king of the celestials, made gifts of light, and properly deserved all other rites of a similar nature —the due presentation of Valis and all rites as are performed on especially sacred days Pious acts are always done by wise men, in both the world of men and that of the celestials. Indeed, O foremost of kings if such acts are observed, householders always succeed in acquiring prosperity and aggrandisement

5 Even such is the effect of the gift of lamps and of incense, as also of bows and prostrations, to the celestials

6 When food is cooked the first portion thereof should be offered to a Brahmana The particular offerings called Vali should also be presented to the household gods. The deities become pleased with such gifts

7 It is also well known that the measure of gratification which the celestials derive from such offerings is a hundred times as great as that which the householder himself gets from making them.

8 Pious and wise persons make offering of incense and lights accompanying them with bows and prostrations Such acts always yield advancement and prosperity to those that do them.

9 Those rites which the learned perform in course of their ablutions, and with the help of waters accompanied with bows to the gods, always contribute to the satisfaction of the celestials

10 When adored with proper rites, the highly-blessed departed Manes, Rishis having asceticism for wealth, and the household deities, all become pleased

11. Filled with such ideas, Nahusha, that great king, when he obtained the sovereignty of the celestials observed all these rites and duties fraught with great glory.

12 Sometime after, the good fortune of Nahusha decreased, and as the outcome of it, he neglected all these observances and began to act in defiance of all control in the manner I have already described.

13 The king of the celestials, on account of his abstention from observing the ordinances about the offers of incense and light, began to decline in power.

14 His sacrificial rites and presents were obstructed by Rakshasas. It was at this time that Nahusha yoked that foremost of Rishis viz, Agastya, to his car.

15 Possessed of great strength Nahusha smiling all the while set that great Rishi speedily to the task, commanding him to bear the vehicle from the banks of the Saraswati At this time, Bhrigu, possessed of great energy, addressed the son of Mitravaruna, saying —

16—17 Do you shut your eyes till I enter into the matted locks on your head — Having said this, Bhrigu of unfading glory and great energy entered into the matted locks of Agastya who stood still like a wooden post, for hurling king Nahusha from the throne of Heaven. Soon after Nahusha saw Agastya approach him for bearing his car.

18 Seeing the king of the celestials, Agastya addressed him, saying —Do you yoke me to your vehicle forthwith! To what region shall I bear you

19 O lord of the celestials, I shall bear you to the spot which you may be pleased to direct!—Thus addressed by him, Nahusha caused the ascetic to be yoked to his car.

20 Bhrigu, who was living within the matted locks of Agastya, became highly pleased at this act of Nahusha. He took care not to look at Nahusha.

21 Fully acquainted with the power which the illustrious Nahusha had acquired on account of the boon which Brahman had granted him, Bhrigu acted thus Agastya also though treated by Nahusha in this way, did not yield to anger.

22—28 Then, O Bharata king Nahusha urged Agastya on with his goad. The pious Rishi did not still yield to anger. The lord of the celestials himself enraged, then struck Agastya on the head with his left foot When the Rishi was thus struck on the head, Bhrigu, who was living within Agastya's matted locks, became incensed and cursed the sinful Nahusha, saying,—Since you have struck with your foot on the head of this great Rishi, do you, therefore, fall down on the Earth, changed into a snake, O wretch of wicked understanding!—Thus, imprecated by Bhrigu who had not been seen, Nahusha, forthwith became transformed into a snake and dropped down on the Earth, O chief of Bharata's race!—If, O monarch, Nahusha had seen Bhrigu, the latter would not then have succeeded, by his power, in hurling the former down on the Earth. On account of the various gifts that Nahusha had made, as also his penances and religious observances, though hurled down on the Earth, O king, he succeeded in keeping his memory. He then began to propitiate Bhrigu with a view to get rid of the curse.

29. Agastya also, filled with mercy joined Nahusha in pacifying Bhrigu for the termination of the curse. At last Bhrigu felt mercy for Nahusha and arranged for the working out of the curse.

Bhrigu said:—

30. There will appear a king (on Earth) of the name of Yudhishthira, the foremost of his race. He will rescue you from this curse!—Having said this, the Rishi disappeared from the presence of Nahusha.

31. Agastya also, of great energy, having thus performed the business of the true Indra, that arbitrator of a hundred sacrifices, returned to his hermitage, adored of all members of the regenerate order.

32. You have, O king, rescued Nahusha from Bhrigu's curse. Rescued by you, he ascended to the region of Brahman before your eyes.

33. As regards Bhrigu, having hurled Nahusha on the Earth, he went to the region of Brahman and informed the Grandfather of it.

34. The Grandfather having called Indra back, addressed the celestials, saying,—Ye celestials, through the boon I had granted him, Nahusha had obtained the sovereignty of Heaven.

35. Deprived, however, of that sovereignty by the enraged Agastya, he has been hurled on the Earth, O celestials, you will not succeed in living without a king.

36—38 Do you, therefore once more install Indra as the king of Heaven.—The celestials filled with joy, O son of Pritha, replied to the Grandsire who said so to them, saying,—So be it. Brahman then, O best of kings, installed Indra in the sovereignty of Heaven. Made once more the king of the celestials, Vasava began to shine in beauty and resplendence. This is what took place formerly through the transgressions of Nahusha.

39 On account, however, of the merits he had acquired through deeds of the kind I have mentioned, Nahusha succeeded in once more regaining his lost position. Hence, when evening comes, householders should give lights.

40. The giver of lights is sure to win celestial vision after death. Givers of light become as resplendent as the full moon.

41. The giver of lights becomes gifted with beauty of form and strength for years corresponding with the number of twinkles for which the lights given by him burn or blaze.

CHAPTER CI.

(ANUSASANIKA PARVA).—Continued.

Yudhishthira said:—

1 Where do those foolish, wretched and sinful men go, O king, who steal or misappropriate such articles as belong to Brahmanas?

Bhishma said:—

2. I shall, about it, O Bharata, recite to you the conversation between a Chandala and a low Kshatriya.

This Kshatriya said:—

3 You seem, O Chandala, to be old in years, but your conduct appears to be like that of a boy! Your body is besmeared with the dust raised by dogs and asses, but without minding that dust you are anxious about the little drops of milk that have fallen upon your persons.

4. It is plain that such acts as are censured by the pious are ordained for the Chandala. Why, indeed, do you seek to wash off the spots of milk from your body.

The Chandala said:—

5—6. Formerly, O king, certain kine belonging to a Brahmana were stolen. While they were being carried away, some milk from their udders dropped upon a number of Soma plants that grew by the road-side. Those Brahmanas who drank the juice of the plants thus bedewed with milk, as also the king who celebrated the sacrifice in which that Soma was drunk, had to sink in hell. Indeed, for having thus appropriated something belonging to a Brahmana, the king with all the Brahmanas who had helped him had to go to hell.

7. All those men also, Brahmanas and Kshatriyas, who drank milk or clarified butter or curds, in the palace of the king who had stolen the Brahmana's kine, had to fall into hell.

8 The stolen kine also, shaking their bodies, killed with their milk the sons and grandsons of those who had stolen them, as also the king and the queen although the latter treated the animals with great care and attention.

9 As for myself, O king, I used to live the life of a celibate in that place where these kine were placed after they had been stolen away. The food I had got by begging became sprinkled over with the milk of those kine.

10 Having taken that food, O Kshatriya, I have, in this life, become a Chandala. The king who had stolen the kine belonging to a Brahmana came by a wretched end.

11. Hence, one should never steal or appropriate anything belonging to a Brahmana. Mark, to what state I am reduced on account of my having eaten [illegible] had been sprinkled over with milk belonging to a Brahmana.

12 It is for this reason that Soma plants should never be destroyed by wise men. They who sell the Soma plant are held in low esteem by the wise.

13 Indeed, O son, they who purchase Soma and they who sell it, both sink in the hell called Raurava after death.

14 That man who, possessing a knowledge of the Vedas duly sells Soma becomes in his next life a usuer and speedily meets with destruction.

15—16 For three-hundred times he has to sink into hell and become changed into an animal which subsists upon human excreta Serving a low person, pride, and rape upon a friend's wife, if weighed against one another in a balance, would show that pride, which is above all restraints, is the heaviest Mark this dog, so sinful and disagreeably pale and lean

17—23 It is through pride that living creatures come by such a miserable end As for myself, I was born in a large family in a former birth of mine O lord, and I was a perfect master of all branches of knowledge and all the sciences. I knew the immensity of all these faults, but moved by pride, I became blinded and ate the meat attached to the vertebral columns of animals. On account of such conduct and such food, I have come by this state Mark, the reverses engendered by Time! Like a person whose cloth has caught fire at one end, or who is pursued by bees, see, I am running filled with fear, and smeared with dust! The house holders are rescued from all sins by a study of the wise O Kshatriya, a sinful Brahmana becomes rescued from all his sins by a study of the Vedas, if he becomes a forest recluse and abstains from attachment of every kind O chief of Kshatriyas, I am, in this life, born in a sinful caste.

24. I cannot see clearly how I may succeed in purifying myself from all sins On account of some meritorious deed of a former life I have not lost the memory of my previous births

25 O king, I throw myself on your mercy! I ask you Do you remove my doubt By what auspicious course of conduct should I wish to acquire my liberation? O foremost of men, by what means shall I succeed in getting rid of my Chandalahood.

The Kshatriya said:—

26. Know, O Chandala the means by which you may be able to acquire liberation By renouncing your life for the sake of a Brahmana, you may come by a desirable end.

27 By throwing your body on the fire of battle as a libation to the beasts and birds of prey for the sake of a Brahmana, indeed by renouncing your life thus, you may achieve liberation. By no other means will you succeed in acquing it.

Bhishma said:—

28 Thus accosted, that Chandala, O scorcher of enemies poured his life-breaths as a libation on the fire of battle for the sake of protecting a Brahmana's riches and as the result of that act attained to a very desirable end.

29 Hence, O son, you should always protect the property of the Brahmanas, if, O chief of Bharata's race, you wish, O you of mighty arms, an end consisting of eternal happiness.

CHAPTER CII.

(ANUSHASANA PARVA).—
Continued.

Yudhishthira said —

1. O grandfather, it has been said that all righteous men attain to the same region after death It is true O Bharata, that there is difference of position among them?

Bhishma said —

2 By different acts, O son of Pritha, men acquire different regions. They who are righteous in conduct acquire blissful regions while they who are sinful acquire miserable regions.

3 Regarding it is cited the old discourse, O son, between the ascetic Gautama and Vasava

4 A certain Brahmana named Gautama, mild and self-controlled and with all his senses under complete control, saw an infant elephant that had lost his mother and that was highly cheerless on that account.

5 Full of mercy and steady in the observance of his vows, the ascetic nursed that infant animal. After a long time the little beast grew up into a large and powerful elephant.

6 One day, Indra, in the guise of king Dhritarashtra, seized that powerful elephant which was as huge as a hill and from whose rent temples the juice was trickling down

7—8. Seeing the elephant dragged away, the great ascetic Gautama of rigid vows said to king Dhritarashtra,—O ungrateful Dhritarashtra, do not rob me of this elephant. It is considered by me as a son and I have reared it with much pain It is said that between the pious, friendship is formed by merely the exchange of seven words. You should see, O king, that the sin of injuring a friend does not affect you

Gautama said :—

9—10. You should not, O king, take away by force this elephant which brings me my fuel and water, which protects my hermitage when I am away, which is exceedingly docile and obedient to his instructor, which carefully does what his preceptor commands, which is mild and well broken, and which is grateful and very dear to me Indeed, you should not take it away without caring for my protestations and cries.

Dhritarashtra said :—

11. I shall give you a thousand kine, a hundred maid-servants, and five hundred pieces of gold. I shall also, O great Rishi, give you various other kinds of wealth What use can Brahmanas have with elephants ?

Gautama said —

12. Keep, O king, your kine and maid-servants and coins of gold and various gems and various other kinds of riches What, O king, have Brahmanas to do with riches

Dhritarashtra said :—

13 Brahmanas have no use for elephants. Indeed, O learned Brahmana, elephants are intended for Kshatriyas In taking away an animal, viz, this foremost of elephants, for my use, I cannot be considered as committing any sin Do you cease obstructing me thus, O Gautama.

Gautama said :—

14. O illustrious king, going even to that region of Yama where the pious live happily and the sinful in grief, I shall take from you this my elephant.

Dhritarashtra said :—

15. They who are destitute of religious acts, they who have no religious faith and are atheists, they who are sinful and are always engaged in pleasing their appetites only they have to go to the region of Yama and suffer the misery he inflicts. Dhritarashtra shall go to a higher region and not there.

Gautama said :—

16. Men are restrained in the region of Yama. No falsehood can be told there. Only truth prevails in that place. There the weak persecute the strong Going there I shall compell you to yield up this elephant to me.

Dhritarashtra said :—

17. Only those persons who, intoxicated with pride, treat their eldest sister and father and mother as enemies, have to go, O great ascetic, to such a region I shall go to a higher region Indeed, Dhritarashtra shall not have to go there.

Gautama said —

18 Those highly blessed ones go to the region called Mandakini, of king Vaishravana for enjoying joy and comfort. There live Gandharvas and Yakshas and Apsaras Going even there, O king, I shall compell you to yield up this elephant to me.

Dhritarashtra said —

19 Those persons who consider hospitality to guests as a vow, who observe good vows, who give shelter to Brahmanas, and who eat what remains after distribution among his dependants, adorn the region called Mandakini of Kuvera. I shall not go there, for a higher region is reserved for me.

Gautama said :—

20 If you go to those charming woods, decked with flowers, which stand on the summit of Meru, which echo with the melodious notes of Kinnaris, and which are graced with beautiful Jamvus of wide-spreading branches, I shall proceed even there and compell you to yield up this elephant to me

Dhritarashtra said —

21—22 Those Brahmanas who have mild dispositions, who are devoted to truth, who are endued with scriptural knowledge, who are compassionate to all creatures, who study the Puranas with all the histories, who pour libations on the sacred fire and make gifts of honey to the Brahmanas, go to such regions, O great Rishi ! I shall go to a higher region. Indeed, Dhritarashtra shall not go there If you are acquainted with any other well-known region of happiness, speak to me, for I shall go even there.

Gautama said :—

23 If you go to the woods owned by Narada and held dear by him, which are adorned with flowers and which echo with the melodious songs of the prince of Kinnaras, and which are the eternal habitation of Gandharvas and Apsaras, I shall follow you there and compell you to yield up this elephant to me.

Dhritarashtra said:—

24. They who never beg, they who cultivate music and dancing, and always move about happily, proceed to such regions O great Rishi, I shall go to a region which is higher. Indeed, Dhritarashtra shall not have to go there.

Gautama said —

25—26 If you go to that region where the Uttara-Kurus blaze in beauty and pass their days happily, O king, in the company of the very celestials, where those beings who originate from fire, those who originate from water, and those who originate from mountains, live happily, and where Shakra rains down the fruition of every desire, and where women live in perfect freedom, uncontrolled by rules of any kind regulating their conduct or motions and where there is no feeling of jealousy among both the sexes, —if you go there, even there shall I go and compell you to yield up this elephant to me.

Dhritarashtra said:—

27—28 Those men who are freed from desire for all articles of enjoyment, who abstain from meat, who never take up the rod of punishment, and never inflict the least harm on mobile and immobile creatures, who have formed themselves the soul of all creatures, who never accost others by pronouncing blessings upon them, who are entirely freed from the idea of mineness, who are shorn of attachments for every thing, who view profit and loss as also praise and blame in equal light, only those men, O great Rishi, go to such regions I shall go to a higher region Indeed, Dhritarashtra shall not go there.

Gautama said:—

29 Next to these shine in beauty those eternal regions, full of excellent perfumes which are free from passions of every kind and which are destitute of sorrow. These form the abode of the great king Soma If you go there, even there shall I proceed and compell you to yield up this elephant to me.

Dhritarashtra said:—

30—31. Those men who always make gifts without receiving any gift, who never accept any service from others, who possess nothing which they cannot give to a worthy person, who are hospitable to all creatures, who are inclined to show favour to every one, who are of forgiving dispositions, who never speak ill of others, who protect all creatures by covering them with mercy, and who are always righteous in their conduct, only those men O great Rishi, go to such regions I shall go to a higher region Indeed, Dhritarashtra shall not go there.

Gautama said:—

32 Next to these shine in beauty other regions that are eternal free from passion and Darkness and sorrow, and which lie at the foot of the great Sun God If you go there, even there shall I go and compell you to yield up this elephant to me.

Dhritarashtra said:—

33—34. Those men who attentively study the Vedas, who are given to the service of their preceptors, who observe penances and excellent vows, who are firm in truth, who never utter words of disobedience or enmity to their preceptors, who are always alert, and ever ready in the service of elders and preceptors,—they go, O great Rishi, to such regions, they who are pure who are gifted with cleansed souls, who are of controlled speech, who are firm in truth and who are well versed in the Vedas. I shall proceed to a higher region. Indeed, Dhritarashtra shall not go there.

Gautama said —

35 Next to those are the eternal regions which shine in beauty, which are full of excellent perfumes, which are free from passion, and which are destitute of every sorrow They form the abode of the great king Varuna. If you proceed there, even there shall I go and compell you to yield up this elephant to me.

Dhritarashtra said —

36—37 Those men who adore the celestials by observing the vow called Chaturmasya, who perform a hundred and ten sacrifices, who pour libations every day on their sacred fire with devotion and faith for three years according to the ordinances declared in the Vedas, who perform without hesitation of all duties, who walk steadily along the way trod by the pious who steadily sustain the course of conduct followed by the righteous souled,—only they go to such regions. I shall go to a higher region. Indeed, Dhritarashtra shall not go there.

Gautama said:—

38. Above them are the regions of Indra, free from passion and sorrow, which are difficult of access and coveted by all men.

Going even to the abode of Indra himself of great energy, I shall, O king, compel you to yield up this elephant to me.

Dhritarashtra said —

39 He who lives for a hundred years, who is gifted with heroism, who studies the Vedas and who celebrates sacrifices with devotion, indeed, such men proceed to the region of Shakra I shall go to a higher region, Indeed, Dhritarashtra shall not go there.

Gautama said :—

40 Above the firmament are the regions of the Prajapatis, of superior happiness, abounding in every happiness, and shorn of sorrow. Belonging to those powerful ones from whom the creation has originated they are coveted by all persons If you go there, even there shall I go and compell you to yield up this elephant to me.

Dhritarashtra said :—

41. Those kings who have bathed upon the termination of the Rajasuya sacrifice, who are gifted with righteous souls, who have protected their subjects properly, and who have washed their limbs with purified water upon the termination of the Horse-sacrifice, go to such regions. Indeed Dhritarashtra shall not go there.

Gautama said :—

42. Next to those, shine in beauty those eternal regions, full of delicious perfumes, freed from passion, and transcending all sorrow. Those are the regions of kine, very hard to get in, where oppression can never be If you go there, I shall go even there and compell you to yield up this elephant to me.

Dhritarashtra said :—

43—44 He who, having a thousand kine, gives away a hundred kine every year, or having a hundred kine gives away ten every year to the best of his power, or possessing only ten or even five kine gives away therefrom one cow, and they who give a mature old age practising the vow of celibacy all their days, who obey the injunctions of the Vedas, and who, gifted with energy of mind go to sacred waters and shrines, live happily in the region of kine

45—48. They who go to Prabhasa and Manasa, the lakes of Pushkara, the large lake called Mahasara the sacred forest of Naimisha, Varuda, Karatoya, Ganga, Gayashiras, Vipasha, Sthulavaluka Krishna, the five rivers (of the Punjab), the extensive lake called Mahahrada, Gomati, Kaushiki, Champa, Saraswati, Dribhadwati, and Yamuna,—indeed those illustrious Brahmanas, firm in the observance of vows, who go to these sacred waters,—go to the regions of which you speak Gifted with celestial bodies and adorned with celestial garlands, those blessed individuals, always emitting the sweetest perfumes, go to the regions of joy Indeed, Dhritarashtra shall not go there.

Gautama said —

49—51. Next to these are regions where there is no fear of the least cold or heat, no hunger, no thirst, no pain, no sorrow, no joy, no one who is agreeable or disagreeable, no friend, and no enemy no decrepitude and no death, and where there is neither virtue nor sin Going, even to that region which is freed from passion, which is full of happiness, and where there is wisdom and the quality of Sattwa,—indeed, going to even that sacred abode of the self-create Brahman —I shall compel you to yield up this elephant to me.

Dhritarashtra said :—

52—53. They who are shorn of all attachments, who are gifted with purified souls, who steadily observe the foremost vows, who are given to Yoga which is the outcome of the pacification of the mind, and who have acquired the happiness of Heaven —those persons possessed of the quality of Sattwa—come to the sacred region of Brahman O great ascetic, you shall not be able to discover Dhritarashtra there.

Gautama said —

54. There where the foremost of Rathantaras is sung, where altars are covered with the sacred Kusha blades, for the celebration of Pundarika sacrifices, there where Soma-drinking Brahmanas sojourn on cars drawn by excellent horses, going even there I shall compel you to yield up this elephant.

55 I think you are the destroyer of Vritra viz, the god who has celebrated a hundred sacrifices, engaged in passing through all the regions of the universe I hope I have not, through mental weakness, committed any fault by the words I have addressed you.

The God of a hundred sacrifices said —

57 Yes, I am Maghavat. I came on earth for seizing this elephant I bow to you. Do you command me. I shall immediately accomplish all that you may be pleased to say.

Gautama said :—

58. Do you give me, O [illegible]

celestials, this white elephant that is so young for it is only ten years of age I have raised it as a child of my own. Living in this forest, it has grown under my eye and has been to me a dear companion Do you set free this my child that you have seized and wish to take away.

The god of a hundred sacrifices said :—

58. This elephant that has been a son, to you, O foremost of Brahmanas, comes to you looking wistfully at you. See it smells your feet with its nostrils My salutations to you. Do you pray for my well-being.

Gautama said :—

59. O king, of the celestials, I do always think of your good I always offer you worship. Do you also, O Shakra, impart your blessings to me Given by you, I accept this elephant.

The God of a hundred sacrifices said :—

60 Amongst all those great and foremost of Rishis who firmly follow truth and who have the Vedas planted in their heart, you alone have been able to recognise me. Therefore I am exceedingly pleased with you.

61. Do you, therefore, O Brahmana, come with me speedily, accompanied by this your son. You are worthy of going to various regions of great happiness, without the delay of even a single day.

Bhishma said :—

62. Having said these words, the holder of the thunderbolt, taking Gautama with him and placing him before, along with his son, this, that elephant, went to Heaven, that is difficult of attainment by even the pious.

63. He who would listen to this history every day or would recite it, controlling his senses all the while, will go to the region of Brahman even as Gautama himself.

CHAPTER CIII.

(ANUSHASANIKA PARVA).—Continued.

Yudhishthira said :—

1. You have described to us the various kinds of gift, tranquility of soul, truth, mercy, contentment with one's married wife, and the merits of gift.

2. You know very well, O grandfather, that there is nothing whose power is superior to that of Penances You should explain to us what forms the highest penance.

Bhishma said :—

3 I tell you, O Yudhishthira, that one acquires a regions of happiness according to the nature of penances he practises. This is what I hold, O son of Kunti, that there is no Penance superior to abstention from food.

4. Regarding it is recited the ancient discourse between Bhagiratha and the illustrious Brahman.

5. We have heard, O Bharata, that Bhagiratha attained to that region which is superior to that of the celestials of kine, and of the Rishis.

6. Seeing this, O monarch, the Grandfather Brahman, addressing Bhagiratha, said,—How, O Bhagiratha, have you attained to this region that is so hard to get at.

7. Neither the celestials, nor Gandharvas, nor mankind, O Bhagiratha, succeed in coming here without having performed the severest austerities How, indeed, have you come by this region.

Bhagiratha said :—

8 I used to make gifts of hundred thousands of gold coins to the Brahmanas practising the vow of celibacy all the while. It is not by dint of the merit of those gifts, O learned one, that I have acquired this region.

9 I celebrated the Ekaratri (one-night's) sacrifice (consisting of fasts and gifts) for ten times, and the Pancharatri (five-nights') sacrifices for as many times. I performed eleven times the Ekadashratri sacrifice. I performed a hundred times the great sacrifice of Jyotishtoma. It is not, however, through the merits of those sacrifices that I have acquired this region of happiness.

10. For a hundred years I lived continuously by the side of the sacred Jahnavi, all the while performed the severest austerities. There I made gifts to the Brahmanas of thousands of males and numberless female slaves.

11. By the side of the Pushkara lake I made gifts to the Brahmanas, for a hundred thousand times, a hundred thousand horses, and two hundred thousand kine.

12. I also gave away a thousand women of great beauty, each adorned with golden moons, and sixty thousand more, decked with ornaments of pure gold. It is not, however, through the merits of those deeds that I have suceeded in acquiring these regions.

13 O lord of the universe, performing those sacrifices known as Gosava, I gave away ten Arvudas of kine, presenting each Brahmana with ten kine, each of whom was accompanied with her calf, each of whom gave milk at the time, and with each of whom were given a vessel of gold and one of white brass for milking her.

14 Celebrating many Soma sacrifices, I gave away to each Brahmana ten kine each of whom gave milk and each of whom had brought forth only her first calf, besides making presents to them of hundreds of kine belonging to that kind which is known by the name of Rohini.

15 I also gave away to the Brahmanas twice ten Prayutas of other kine, all giving milk, It is not through the merit of those gifts, O Brahman, that I have succeeded in acquiring to this region of happiness.

16 I also gave away a hundred thousand horses of the Valhika breed, all of white complexion, and adorned with garlands of gold It is not, however, through the merits of those deeds that I have acquired this region.

17. I gave also eight crores of golden coins to the Brahmanas, O Brahman, and another ten crores also, in each sacrifice that I celebrated It is not, however, through the merits of those deeds that I have acquired this region of happiness.

18 I also gave away seventeen crores of horses, O Grandfather, each of green color, each having black ears, and each adorned with garlands of gold.

19 I also gave away seventeen thousand huge elephants having teeth as large as plough-shares, each having those whirls on its body, which are called Padmas, and each bedecked with garlands of gold.

20 I gave away ten thousand cars, O Grandfather, whose parts were made of gold, and which were adorned with various ornaments of gold.

21. I also gave away seven thousand other cars with horses yoked to each. All the horses that were yoked to them were adorned with ornaments of gold Those cars represented the presents of a sacrifice and were of exactly that kind which is indicated in the Vedas

22. In the ten great Vajapeya sacrifices that I celebrated, I gave away a thousand heroes each gifted with the power of Indra himself, judged by their prowess and the sacrifices they had celebrated.

23—24. Spending a vast sum of money, O Grandfather, and celebrating eight Rajashya sacrifices I gave away to the Brahmanas who officiated in them, a thousand kings whose necks were adorned with garlands of gold, after having defeated them in battle It is not, however, through the merits of those deeds that I have acquired this region.

25 In those sacrifices, O Lord of the universe I made presents as profuse as the stream of Ganga herself. Each Brahmana I gave two thousand elephants decked with gold, as many horses adorned with golden ornaments, and a hundred villages of the best kind.

26—27. Indeed, I gave these thrice to each Brahmana observant of penances, living on regulated diet, adopting tranquility of soul, and controlling speech, I lived for a long time on the breast of Himavat by the side of that Ganga whose irresistible current was borne by Mahadeva on his head It is not through the merit of these deeds, O grandfather, that I have acquired this region.

28 Throwing the Shami, I worshipped the gods in numberless such sacrifices as are completed in course of a single day, and such others as take twelve days for completing, and others still as can be completed in thirteen days, besides many Pundarikas I have not acquired this region through the merits of any of those sacrifices.

29 I gave to the Brahmanas eight thousands of white bulls, each possessed of a beautiful hump, and each having one of its horns covered with gold. To them I also gave beautiful wives whose necks were adorned with chains of gold.

30. I also gave away masses of gold and wealth of other kinds. I gave away hills of gems and valuable stones I gave away Villages, thousands in number and filled with wealth and corn.

31. With all my senses about me, I gave away the Brahmanas a hundred thousand kine each of whom had brought forth only her first calf, at many great sacrifices which I celebrated It is not, however, through the merits of those deeds that I have acquired this region.

32 I worshipped the celestials in a sacrifice that is completed in eleven days Twice I worshipped them in sacrifices that are completed in twelve days. I worshipped them also many a time in the Horse-sacrifices. I performed the Arkayana sacrifice sixteen times. It is not through the merits of those deeds that I have acquired this region.

33 I also gave each Brahmana a forest of Kanchana trees extending for a Yojana on every side, and with each tree adorned with jewels and gems It is not through the merits of that deed that I have acquired this region

34 For thirty years with heart perfectly freed from anger, I observed the Surayana vow that has very superior merit, and gave away to the Brahmanas every day nine hundred kine.

35. Indeed, O Lord of the universe, every one of those kine belonged to the Rohini species and gave milk at the time I gave them away It is not through the merits of those deeds, O king of the deities, that I have acquired this region.

36. I adored thirty fires, O Brahman, every day. I worshipped the celestials in eight sacrifices in which the fat of all animals was poured on the fire I worshipped them in seven sacrifices in which the fat of human beings was poured on the fire.

37. I adored them in a thousand and twenty-eight Vishwajit srcrifices. It is not through the merits of those sacrifices, O king of all the celestials, that I have acquired this region.

38. On the banks of Sarayu and Vahuda and Ganga, as also in the forest of Naimisha, I gave away millions of kine to the Brahmanas It is not through the merits of those deeds that I have acquired this region.

39. The vow of fast had been known to Indra. He had, however, kept it a secret. Shukra, the descendent of Bhrigu, gained a knowledge of it by means of spiritual sight acquired through penances Burning with energy as he does, it is Ushanas who first made it known to the universe. I observed that vow, O boon giving Deity.

40. When I finished that very superior vow, the Brahmanas became all pleased with me. A thousand Rishis came there.

41. All those Brahmanas and Rishis, O powerful lord, pleased with me, said —Do you go to the region of Brahman!—It is on account of the merits of that vow that I have succeeded in acquiring this region of very superior happiness. There is no doubt in this.

42. Asked by the Supreme Creator of all things, I have duly explained the merits of the vow of fast. In my opinion, there is no penance higher than fast. I bow to you, O foremost of all the celestials. Be propitiated, with me.

Bhishma said :—

43 King Bhagiratha, who had said so and who was worthy of every honor, was, on the conclusion of his speech, honored by Brahman according to the rites ordained for that purpose.

44 Do you, therefore, O Yudhishthira, observe the vow of fast and adore the Brahmanas every day. The words uttered by Brahmanas can do every thing both in this world and in the next.

45. Indeed, the Brahmanas should ever be pleased with gifts of dresses and food and white-complexioned kine and good dwelling houses and palaces. The very celestials should please the Brahmanas. Freeing yourself from cupidity, do you practise this vow of very superior merit that is not known to all.

CHAPTER CIV.

(ANUSHASANIKA PARVA).—

Continued.

Yudhishthira said :—

1. Man, it is said, is gifted with a period of life extending for a hundred years, and with great energy and power. Why then, O grandfather, do human beings die even in their youth?

2. By what does a man become long-lived, and by what is his life shortened? Through what does a man acquire the fame that depends upon great deeds? Through what does one acquire wealth and prosperity?

3. Is it by penances, or celibacy or silent recitation of sacred Mantras, or drugs? Is it by his deeds, or mind, or speech? Do you explain to me this, O grandfather.

Bhishma said :—

4 I shall tell you what you ask me. In fact, I shall tell you what the reason is for which one becomes short lived, and what the reason is for which one becomes long-lived.

5 I shall also explain to you the reason for which one succeeds in winning the fame that depends on great deeds, and the reason for which one succeeds in acquiring riches and prosperity. Indeed, I shall enlighten you about the manner in which one must live in order to be possessed of what is good for him.

6. It is by conduct that one acquires a long life, and it is by conduct that one

31. One should never cut others with wordy arrows. Indeed, one should never utter any cruel speech. One should never accept anything in gift from a person who is low and vulgar. One should never utter such words as pain other people or as are inauspicious or as are sinful.

32. Wordy arrows fall from the mouth. Pierced therewith, the victim grieves day and night. The wise man should never shoot them for cutting the vitals of other people.

33. A forest, pierced with arrows or cut down with the axe, grows again. The man, however, who is pierced with words unwisely spoken, becomes the victim of wounds that fester and bring on death.

34. Barbed arrows and Nalikas and broad headed arrows are capable of being extracted from the body. Wordy arrows however, are incapable of being extracted, for they lie embedded in the very heart.

35. One should not taunt a person who is defective of a limb or who has a limb in excess or one who is shorn of learning, or one who is miserable, or one who is ugly or poor, or one who is shorn of strength.

36. One should avoid atheism vilifying the Vedas, censuring the celestials, malice, pride, arrogance, and harshness.

37. One should not angrily take up the rod of punishment for laying it upon another. Only the son or the pupil, it has been said, can be mildly reprimanded for purposes of instruction.

38. One should not vilify Brahmanas, nor should point at the stars with one's fingers. If asked, one should not say what the duration is on a particular day. By telling it, his life becomes shortened.

39. Having answered calls of nature or having walked over a road, one should wash his feet. One should also wash his feet before sitting to recite the Vedas or to eat any food.

40. These are the three things which are considered as pure and sacred by the celestials and as such fit for the Brahmana's use, viz., that whose impurity is unknown, that which has been washed in water, and that which has been well spoken of.

41. Samayava, Krishara, meat, Shashakuli, and Payasa should never be cooked for one's oneself. Whenever cooked, these should be offered to the celestials.

42. One should attend every day to his sacred fire. One should every day give alms. One should, controlling speech the while, clean his teeth with the tooth stick.

43—44. One should never be in bed when the sun is up. If one fails any day to be up with the sun, he should then perform an expiation. Rising from bed, one should first salute his parents, and preceptors, or other elders worthy of respect. By so doing one acquires a long life. The tooth-stick should be thrown off when done with, and a new one should be used every day.

45. One should eat food which is not forbidden in the scriptures, abstaining from food of every kind on days of the new moon and the full moon. One should, with senses controlled, answer calls of nature, facing the north.

46—47. One should not adore the celestials without having first washed his teeth. Without also adoring the celestials first, one should never repair to any person except his preceptor or one who is old in years or one who is righteous or one who is wise. Wise men should never see themselves in an unpolished or dirty mirror.

48. One should never know a woman that is unknown or with one that is big with child.

49. One should never sleep with head turned towards the north or the west. One should not lie down upon a broken bedstead.

50. One should not sleep on a bed without having examined it first with the help of a light. Nor should one sleep on a bed with another by his side. One should never sleep in a transverse direction. One should never make an agreement with theists or do anything in conjunction with them.

51. One should never drag a seat with the foot and sit on it. One should never bathe in a nude state nor at night.

52. An intelligent person should never allow his limbs to be rubbed or pressed after bathing. One should never smear unguents upon his body without having first gone through bath. Having bathed, one should never wave his cloth in the air.

53. One should not wear wet clothes every day. One should never take off his body the garlands of flowers one may wear. Nor should one wear such garlands over his outer garments.

54. One should never even talk with a woman during the period of her menses. One should not answer a call of nature on a field or at a place too near an inhabited village.

55. One should never answer a call of nature on a piece of water. One should first wash his mouth thrice with water before eating any food.

acquires riches and prosperity. Indeed, it is by conduct that one acquires the fame that depends upon great deeds both in this world and in the next.

7. The man whose conduct is improper or wicked never acquires a long life. All creatures fear such a man and are oppressed by him.

8. If, therefore, one wishes his own advancement and prosperity, one should, in this world, follow the path of righteousness and conduct himself properly. Good conduct succeeds in removing the inauspiciousness and misery of even one that is sinful.

9. Virtue is singled out by conduct. The good and virtuous are so on account of the conduct they follow. The marks, again, of good conduct are afforded by the deeds of those that are good or righteous.

10. People regard that man who acts righteously and who does good acts even if they only hear of him without actually seeing him.

11. The atheists, they who are destitute of all acts, they who are disobedient to preceptors and violate the injunctions of the scriptures, they who are unacquainted with and, therefore, unobservant of duties and they who are wicked of conduct, become short lived.

12. They who are of improper conduct, they who violate all restraints, they who are unscrupulous about sexual congress, become shortlived here and have to go to Hell hereafter.

13. Even those men live for a hundred years who, though destitute of all accomplishments, follow propriety and righteousness of conduct and become endued with faith and freed from malice.

14. He who is free from anger, who is truthful in speech, who never does any injury to any creature in the universe, who is shorn of malice and crookedness and insincerity, succeeds in living for a hundred years.

15. He who always breaks little clods of earth, or tears up the grass that grows under his feet, or cuts off his nails with his teeth, or is always impure, or very restless, never succeeds in living long.

16. One should wake up from sleep at the hour known as the Brahma Muhurta and then think of both religion and worldly profit. Getting up from bed, one should then wash his face and mouth, and joining his hands in an attitude of respect, then say the morning prayers.

17. In this way, one should when evening [illegible], say his evening prayers also, controlling speech the while. One should never look at the rising sun, nor at the setting sun.

18. Nor should one look at the sun when he is in eclipse, nor at his image in the water, nor at midday when he is at the meridian. The Rishis, on account of their worshipping the two twilights, with great regularity succeeded in acquiring longevity.

19—20. Hence one should, controlling speech, say his prayers regularly at the two twilights. As regards those Brahmanas who do not say their prayers at the two twilights, a righteous king should set them to perform such deeds as are ordained for the Shudras. Persons of every caste should never have sexual congress with other people's wives.

21. There is nothing that shortens life so effectually as sexual union with other people's wives.

22. The adulterer shall have to live in Hell for as many thousand years as the number of pores on the bodies of the women with whom he may commit the offence.

23. One should dress one's hair, apply collyrium to one's eyes, and wash one's teeth, as also worship the celestials in the forenoon.

24—27. One should not gaze at urine or fæces, or tread on it or touch it with one's feet. One should not set out on a journey at early dawn, or at mid day or in the evening twilight, or with a companion that is unknown, or with a Shudra, or alone. While passing along a road, one should, standing aside, always give way to a Brahmana, to kine, to kings, to an old man, to one that is loaded with a burthen, to a woman big with child or to one that is weak. When one meets a large tree that is known, one should walk round it. One should also, when coming upon the crossing of four roads, walk round it before pursuing his journey. At mid day, or at midnight or at night in general, or at the two twilights one should not proceed to the crossings of the four roads. One should never wear sandals or clothes that have been worn by another.

28—30. One should always observe the vow of celibacy, and should never cross his legs. One should observe the vow of celibacy on the day of the new moon, as also, on that of the full moon, as also on the eighth lunar day of both fortnights. One should never eat the flesh of animals not killed in sacrifices. One should never eat the flesh of the back of an animal. One should avoid censuring and calumniating others, as also all kinds of deceitful conduct.

stronger than any of these two, destroys, not only the object of his anger but his entire family as well, not by looks alone but by thought also.

80. A wise man should, therefore, tend these three carefully. One should never engage in any disputation with his preceptor.

81. O Yudhishthira, if the preceptor becomes angry, he should always be pacified with due honors. If the preceptor is entirely in the wrong, still one should follow and honor him.

82. Forsooth, calumnious sayings against the preceptor always consume the lives of those who utter them. One should always answer a call of nature at a spot far distant from his dwelling place. One should wash his feet at a distance from his dwelling place.

83. One should always throw the remnants of his dishes and plates at a spot distant from his dwelling place. Indeed, he who wishes for his own behoof should do all this. One should not wear garlands of red flowers. Indeed, the wise should wear garlands of white flowers.

84. Rejecting the lotus and the lily, O you of great might, one may bear on his head, however, a flower that is red, even if it be an aquatic one.

85. A garland of gold can never become impure. After one has bathed, O king, he should use perfumes mixed with water.

86. One should never wear his upper garment for covering the lower limbs or the lower garments for covering the upper ones. Nor should one wear clothes used by another. One should not, again, wear a piece of cloth that has not its fringes.

87. When one goes to bed, O king, he should wear a different piece of cloth. When passing along a road, one should wear a different piece of cloth. So also, when adoring the celestials, one should wear a different piece of cloth.

88. The intelligent man should smear his limbs with unguents made of Priyangu, sandal wood, Vilwa, Tagara, and Keshara.

89. In observing a fast, one should purify himself by a bath, and adorn his body with ornaments and unguents. One should always abstain from sexual union on days of the full moon and the new moon.

90. One should never, O king, eat off the same plate with another even if he be of his own or equal rank. Nor should one ever eat any food that has been prepared by a woman in her menses.

91. One should never eat any food or drink any liquid whose essence has been taken off. Nor should one eat anything without giving a part thereof to persons who wistfully gaze at the food that one happens to take. The intelligent man should never sit near an impure person. Nor should one sit near persons who are foremost in virtue.

92—93. All food that is forbidden in religious rites should never be taken even on other occasions. The fruits of the Ficus religiosa and the Ficus Bengalensis as also the leaves of the Crotolaria Juncea, and the fruits of the Ficus glomerata, should never be eaten by one who seeks his own good. The flesh of goats, of kine, and the peacock, should never be eaten.

94—95. One should also abstain from dried flesh and all flesh that is stale. The intelligent man should never eat any salt, taking it up with his hand. Nor should he eat curds and flour of fried barley at night. One should abstain also from flesh of animals not killed in sacrifices. One should, with rapt attention, eat once in the morning and once in the evening, abstaining entirely from all food in the interval.

96. One should never eat any food in which he may find out a hair. Nor should one eat at the Shraddha of an enemy. One should eat silently, one should never eat without covering his body with an upper garment, and without sitting down.

97—100. One should never eat any food placing it on the naked ground. One should never eat except in a sitting posture. One should never make any noise while eating. The intelligent man should first offer water and then food to one who has become his guest, and after having served the guest thus, should then take his meals himself. He who sits down to dinner in a line with friends and himself eats any food without giving thereof to his friends, is said to eat dreadful poison. As regards water and Payasa and flour of fried barley and curds and clarified butter and honey, one should never, after drinking or eating these, offer the residue thereof to others. One should never, O king, eat any food hesitatingly.

101. One seeking one's own good, should never drink curds finishing his meal. After the meal is finished one should wash his mouth and face with the (right) hand only, and taking a little water should then dip the toe of the right foot in it.

102. After washing, one should touch the crown of his head with the (right) hand. With rapt attention, one should next touch fire.

56. Having finished his meals, one should wash his mouth thrice with water and twice again. One should eat, with face turned eastwards, his food, controlling speech the while and without censuring the food that is eaten.

57. One should always leave a residue of the food that is placed before one for eating. Having finished his meals, one should mentally touch fire. If one eats with face turned eastwards, he becomes long-lived. By eating with face turned southwards, one acquires great fame.

58. By eating with face turned westwards, one acquires great riches. By eating with face turned northwards, one becomes truthful in speech. Having finished his meals, one should wash all the upper holes of one's body with water.

59. Likewise, all the limbs, the navel, and the palms of the hands should be washed with water. One should never sit upon husk of corn, or upon hair, or upon ashes, or upon bones.

60. One should, never use the water that has been used by another for bathing. One should always perform the Homa for propitiating the celestials, and recite the Savitri Mantras.

61. One should always eat in a seated posture. One should never eat while walking. One should never answer a call of nature standing. One should never answer a call of nature on ashes or in a cowpen.

62. One should wash his feet before sitting to one's meals. One should never sit or lie down for sleep with wet feet. One who sits to his meals after having washed his feet, lives for a century.

63. One should never touch these three things, while one is in an impure state, viz, fire, a cow, and a Brahmana. By observing this rule, one lives long.

64. One should not, while he is in an impure state, cast one's eyes on these three things, viz, the sun, the moon and the stars.

65. The life-breaths of a young man go upwards, when an old and venerable person comes to his house. He gets them back by standing up and properly saluting the guest.

66. Old men should always be saluted. One should, upon seeing them, offer seats with his own hand. After the old man has taken his seat, a person should sit and remain with hands joined in respect. When an old man goes along the road, one should always follow him instead of walking ahead.

67. One should never sit on a torn or broken seat. One should, without using it any longer, throw away a broken vessel of white brass. One should never eat without a piece of upper garment covering his body. One should never bathe in a nude state.

68. One should never sleep in a naked state. One should never even touch the remnants of other people's dishes and plates. One should never, while he is in an impure state, touch another's head, for it is said in the scriptures that the vital airs are all concentrated in the head.

69. One should never strike another on the head or seize another by the hair. One should not join his hands together for scratching his head.

70. One should not, while bathing, repeatedly dip his head in water. By so doing one shortens one's life. One who has bathed by dipping the head in water should not, afterwards put oil to any part of his body.

71. One should never take his meals without eating some sesame. One should never teach (the Vedas or any scriptures) at a time when he is impure. Nor should one study while is impure.

72—74. When a storm rises or a bad smell spreads itself in the atmosphere, he should never think of the Vedas. Persons knowing ancient history recite a Gatha sung by Yama in days of yore. He who runs while impure or studies the Veda under similar circumstances, indeed, that twice-born Brahman who studies the Veda at forbidden times loses his Veda and shortens his life.

75—76. Hence, one should never study the Veda with rapt attention at forbidden times. They who answer a call of nature, with face towards the sun or towards a burning fire, or towards a cow, or towards a twice born person, or on the road, become shorthived. At day time both calls of nature should be answered with face turned towards the north.

77—78. At night, those calls should be answered facing the south. By so doing one does not shorten his life. One who wishes to live long should never disregard or insult any of these three, however weak or emaciated they may appear to be, viz, the Brahmana, the Kshatriya, and the snake. All three are gifted with dreadful poison. The snake, if angry, burns the victim with only a look of its eye.

79. The Kshatriya also, if angry, burns the object of his anger, as soon as he sees him, with his energy. The Brahmana,

127. Sons should also be settled and a portion of the family inheritance given to them O Bharata, as their provision One should bathe by dipping his head in water before he sits down to perform any act in honor of the departed Manes or the deities.

128 One should never perform a Shraddha under the constellation of his nativity. No Shraddha should be performed under any of the Bhadrapadas (prior or later), nor under the constellation Krittika, O Bharata.

126. The Shraddha should never be performed under any of those constellations that are considered as dreadful (such as Ashlesha, etc,) and any of those that upon calculation, seem to be hostile Indeed, in this matter, all these constellations should be avoided which are forbidden in astrology

130 One should sit facing either the east or the north while being shaved by a barber By so doing, O great king, one succeeds in living long.

131. One should neither vilify others nor reproach himself, for, O chief of the Bharatas, it is said that calumny is sinful whether of others or of oneself.

132 In marrying, one should avoid a woman who is deficient of any limb A maiden too, if such, should also be avoided A woman of the same Pravara should also be avoided; as also one who is ill-formed in body; as also one who has been born in the race to which one's mother belongs

133 A wise man should never know a woman who is old, or one who has given up the domestic mode of life for entering the forest mode or one who is faithful to her husband or one whose organs of generation are not healthy or well formed.

134—136 You should not marry a woman who is of a yellow color, or one who is attacked with leprosy, or one born in a family in which there has been epilepsy, or one that is low in birth and habits, or one that is born in a family in which the disease called leprosy has appeared, or one belonging by birth to a family in which there are early deaths Only that maiden who is gifted with auspicious indications, and who is accomplished for all sorts of qualifications, who is agreeable and beautiful, should be married. One should marry, O Yudhishthira, in a family who is higher (or at least equal to his own.

137—138 One who is desirous of his own prosperity, should never marry a woman who is of an inferior caste or who has fallen away from the caste of her birth. Carefully lighting up the fire, one should perform all those acts which have been ordained and declared in the Vedas or by the Brahmanas One should never seek to injure women. Wives should always be protected.

139 Malice always shortens life. Hence, one should always abstain from entertaining malice. Sleep at day time shortens life. To sleep after the sun rise shortens life.

140. They who sleep at any of the twilights, or at nightfall, or who go to sleep in a state of impurity, have their lives shortened Adultery always shortens life. One should not remain in a state of impurity after shaving.

141. One should, O Bharata, carefully abstain from reading or reciting the Vedas, and eating, and bathing at eventide.

142. When the evening twilight sets in one should collect his senses for meditation, without doing any act. One should collect his senses for meditation, without any act. One should, O king, bathe and then adore the Brahmanas.

143—144 Indeed, one should bathe before adoring the celestials and reverentially saluting the preceptor. One should never go to a sacrifice unless invited. Indeed, one may go there without an invitation, if he wishes to only see how the sacrifice is conducted If one goes to a sacrifice without an invitation and if one does not on that account, receive proper adoration from the sacrificer, his life becomes shortened, One should never go alone on a journey to foreign parts. Nor should one ever go alone to any place at night.

145—146 Before evening sets in, one should return to his house and remain within it. One should always obey the commands of his parents and preceptor, without at all judging whether those commands or good not One should, O king, attend carefully to the Vedas and the military science.

147 Do then, O king, carefully attend to the practice of riding an elephant, a horse and a war chariot. The man who attends to these with care, succeeds in acquiring happiness.

148 Such a king succeeds in becoming unconquerable by enemies, and govern his servants and kinsmen without any of them being able to subjugate him. The king who attains to such a position and who carefully *attends to the duty of protecting his sub*jects, has never to incur any loss.

149 You should, O king, be proficient in logic, as also the science of words, the 103 The man who knows how to observe all these ordinances carefully succeeds in acquiring the foremost place among his kinsmen. One should, after finishing his meals, wash his nose and eyes and ears and navel and both hands with water.

104 One should not, however, keep his hands wet. Between the tip and the root of the thumb is situate the sacred Tirtha known by the name of Brahma.

105—106 On the back of the little finger, it is said, is situate the Deva-Tirtha The intervening space between the thumb and the forefinger, O Bharata, should be used for performing the Pitri rites, after touching water according to the ordinance One should never vilify other people. Nor should one ever utter anything that is disagreeable.

107. The man who desires his own good, should never seek to bring on himself the wrath of others One should never seek to talk with an outcaste. The very sight of such a person should be shunned.

108 One should never come in contact with a degraded person By avoiding such contact one succeeds in acquiring a long life One should never indulge in sexual intercourse at day time Nor should one know a maiden, or a harlot nor a barren woman.

109—110 One should never know a woman who has not bathed after the expiry of her menses. By avoiding such acts one succeeds in acquiring a long life After washing the several limbs directed in view of religious acts, one should wash his lips thrice, and once more twice. By doing this, one becomes purified and fit for religious rites The several organs of sense should each be washed once, and water should also be sprinkled over the entire body.

111—112 Having done this one should perform the adoration of the departed Manes and the celestials, according to the ordinances of the Vedas Listen to me, O you of Kuru's race as I tell you what purification is cleansing and beneficial for a Brahmana Before beginning to eat and after finishing the meal, and in all deeds requiring purification the Brahmana should rinse his mouth with water placed on the limb called the Brahma-tirtha.

113—114 After ejecting any matter from the throat or spitting, one should wash his mouth before he can become pure A kinsman who happens to be old, or a friend who happens to be poor, should be accommodated in one's house and his comforts looked after as if he were a member of the family. By doing this, one succeeds in winning both fame and longevity. To keep pigeons as also parrots both male and female, in one's house is highly blessed.

115—116 If these live in one's house, they succeed in removing calamity. The same is the case with cockroaches If fireflies and vultures and wood-pigeons and bees enter a house and live in it, acts of propitiating the celestials should be performed. These are creatures of evil omen, as also ospreys

117. One should never give out the secrets of great men; one should never have sexual union with a forbidden woman Nor should one ever have such union with the consort of a king or with women who are the friends of queens.

118—120. One should never make friends with physicians, or with children, or with persons who are old, or with one's servants, O Yudhishthira. One should always provide for friends, for Brahmanas and for such as seek his protection By doing this, O king, one acquires a long life. A wise man should live in such a house as has been constructed with the help of a Brahmana and an engineer skilled in his calling, if, indeed, O king, he seeks for his own behoof One should not, O king, sleep at the evening twilight Nor should one study at such an hour for acquiring any branch of knowledge.

121. An intelligent man should never eat also at such an hour. By acting thus, one acquires a long life One should never perform any act in honor of the departed Manes at night time One should not adorn his body after finishing his meals.

122 One should not bathe at night, if he seeks his own aggrandisement. One should also, O Bharata always abstain from the flour of fried barley at night

123. The residue of food and drink, as also the flowers with which one has adored the celestials should never be used Inviting a guest at night, one should never, with excessive courtesy, compell him to eat to his fill. Nor should one eat to his fill, at night

124—125 One should not kill a bird (for eating it), especially after having fed it, A wise man should espouse a maiden born in a high family, gifted with auspicious marks, and of full age Begetting children upon her and thus perpetuating his race by that means, one should make over his sons to a good preceptor for being educated generally, O Bharata, as also in the especial customs of the family, O monarch. The daughters that one may beget should be married to youths of respectable families, who are again possessed of intelligence.

but giving any share thereof to his younger brothers.

12 If brothers wish (during the life-time of their father) to partition the family property, the father should give equal shares to all his sons

13 If the eldest brother happens to be a vicious man and without any accomplishments, he may be disregarded by his younger brothers If the wife or the younger brother happens to be sinful, her or his good must still be looked after.

14 Persons conversant with the efficacy of righteousness hold that virtue is the highest good. The Upadhyaya is superior to even ten Acharyyas. The father is equal to ten Upadhyayas.

15 The mother is equal to ten fathers or even the whole Earth. There is no senior equal to the mother. Indeed, she is above all in respect of the reverence due to her

16 It is therefore, that people regard the mother to deserve so much respect After the demise of the father, O Bharata, the eldest brother should be considered as the father

17 It is the eldest brother who should assign to them their means of support and protect and maintain them All the younger brothers should bow to him and obey his command.

18 Indeed, they should depend upon him, as they did upon their father during his life time. So far as the body is concerned, O Bharata, it is the father and the mother who creates it.

19. That birth, however, which the Acharyya ordains, is considered as the true birth which is really unfading and immortal The eldest sister, O chief of Bharata's race is like a mother. The wife of the eldest brother also is like the mother, for the younger brother, in infancy, receives nursing from her.

CHAPTER CVI.

(ANUSHASANA PARVA).—

Yudhishthira said —

1 O grandfather, all the orders of men, including the very Mlechchhas are naturally disposed to observe fasts We, however, do not know the reason thereof.

2 We have heard that only Brahmanas and Kshatriyas should observe the vow of fasts. How, O grandfather, are the other castes to be taken as acquiring any merit by the observance of fasts?

3 How have vows and fasts come to be observed by persons of all castes, O king? What is that end which one devoted to the observance of fasts, acquires?

4 It has been said that fasts are greatly meritorious and that fasts are a great refuge. O king, what is the fruit that is acquired in this world by the man who observes fasts?

5 By what means is one purged of his sins? By what means does one acquire virtue. By what means, O best of the Bharatas, does one succeed in acquiring Heaven and merit.

6 After having observed a fast, what should one give away, O king? O tell me, what those duties are by which one may succeed in acquiring objects leading to happiness.

Vaishampayana said :—

7. Kunti's son begotten by the deity of Dharma, who was conversant with every duty and who said so to him, Shantanu's son, Bhishma, who knew every duty, answered in the following words.

Bhishma said :—

8 Formerly, O king, I heard of these high merits, O chief of Bharata's race, as belonging to the observance of fasts according to the ordinance.

9 I had, O Bharata, asked the Rishi Angiras of great ascetic merit, the very same questions which you have asked me to-day.

10 Accosted by me thus, the illustrious Rishi, who originated from the sacrificial fire, answered me even thus about the observance of fasts according to the ordinance.

Angiras said —

11 Fasts for three nights together, are ordained for Brahmanas and Kshatriyas, O delighter of the Kurus Indeed, O king, a fast for one night, for two nights, and for three nights, may be observed by them
