12 Fast for one night is ordained for Vaishyas and Shudras. If they observe fasts for two or three nights by mistake, such fasts never bring on their advancement.

13 Fasts for two nights have been ordained for Vaishyas and Shudras (on certain special occasions) Fasts for three nights, however, have not been ordained for them by persons knowing duties.

science of music, and the four and the sixty branches of knowledge known by the name of Kala.

150. One should every day hear the Puranas and the histories and all the other narratives that exist, as also the biographies of all great men.

151. When one's wife is in her season, one should never know her, nor even summon her for conversation A wise man may take her into his company on the fourth day after the bath of purification

152 If one holds sexual union on the fifth day from the first appearance of the catamenial flow he gets a daughter. By holding it on the sixth day, he gets a son A wise man should, in the matter of sexual intercourse attend to this rule.

153 Kinsmen and relatives by marriage and friends should all be treated with respect One should, to the best of his power worship the celestials in sacrifices, giving away various kinds of articles as sacrificial presents.

154 After the period laid down for the domestic mode of life, one should, O king, become a hermit I have thus told you briefly all the characteristics of persons who succeed in living long

155. What I have not told you should be heard by you from the mouths of persons well versed in the three Vedas O Yudhishthira You should know that conduct is the root of prosperity. Conduct increases fame

156 It is conduct which prolongs life, It is conduct which destroys all calamities and evils Conduct has been said to be superior to all the branches of knowledge.

157. It is conduct which begets virtue, and it is virtue which prolongs life. Conduct gives fame, long life, and Heaven. Conduct is the most efficacious rite of propitiating the celestials The Self create Brahman himself has said that one should show mercy to all orders of men.

CHAPTER CV.

(ANUSHASANIKA PARVA) — Continued.

Yudhishthira said:—

1. Tell me, O chief of Bharata's race, how the eldest brother should treat his younger brothers, and how the younger brothers should behave towards their eldest brother.

Bhishma said:—

2 Do you, O son, always behave towards your younger brothers as their eldest brother should You are always the eldest of all these your brothers You should always treat your younger brothers in the way in which a preceptor treats his disciples.

3 If the preceptor happens to be otherwise, the disciple cannot possibly behave towards him in a respectful or proper way. If the preceptor is possessed of purity and good conduct, the disciple also succeeds in acquiring conduct of the same kind, O Bharata.

4. The eldest brother should at times not notice the acts of his younger brothers, and though possessed of wisdom should at times act as if he does not understand their acts If the younger brothers be guilty of any sin, the eldest brother should correct them by indirect ways and means

5 If there be good understanding among brothers and if the eldest brother seeks to correct his younger brothers by direct or ostensible means, persons who are enemies, O son of Kunti, who feel pain on seeing such good understanding and who, therefore, always seek to bring about a disunion, try to disunite the brothers and sow dissension among them.

7. It is the eldest brother who increases the prosperity of the family or destroys it entirely. If the eldest brother happens to be not gifted with sense and wicked in conduct, he encompasses the destruction of the whole family.

7. That eldest brother who injures his younger brothers ceases to be considered as the eldest and forfeits his share in the family property and deserves to be checked by the king.

8. That man who acts deceitfully, has, forsooth, to go to the regions of grief and every kind of evil The birth of such a person is of no avail like the flowers of the cane.

9 That family in which a sinful person is born becomes subject to every evil Such a person brings about infamy, and all the good deeds of the family disappear.

10. Such among the brothers as are addicted to wicked deeds forfeit their shares of the family property. In such a case, the eldest brother may appropriate the entire joint property without giving any portion thereof to his younger brothers.

11. If the eldest brother makes any money, without using the paternal property and by going to a distant place he may appropriate for his own use, such wealth with-but giving any share thereof to his younger brothers.

12 If brothers wish (during the life time of their father) to partition the family property, the father should give equal shares to all his sons

13 If the eldest brother happens to be a vicious man and without any accomplishments, he may be disregarded by his younger brothers If the wife or the younger brother happens to be sinful, her or his good must still be looked after.

14. Persons conversant with the efficacy of righteousness hold that virtue is the highest good. The Upadhyaya is superior to even ten Acharyyas. The father is equal to ten Upadhyayas.

15 The mother is equal to ten fathers or even the whole Earth. There is no senior equal to the mother. Indeed, she is above all in respect of the reverence due to her

16 It is therefore, that people regard the mother to deserve so much respect After the demise of the father, O Bharata, the eldest brother should be considered as the father

17 It is the eldest brother who should assign to them their means of support and protect and maintain them All the younger brothers should bow to him and obey his command

18 Indeed, they should depend upon him, as they did upon their father during his life time So far as the body is concerned, O Bharata it is the father and the mother who creates it.

19 That birth, however, which the Acharyya ordains is considered as the true birth which is, really unfading and immortal The eldest sister, O chief of Bharata's race, is like a mother. The wife of the eldest brother also is like the mother, for the younger brother, in infancy, receives nursing from her.

Yudhishthira said —

1 O grandfather all the orders of men, including the very Mlechchhas are naturally disposed to observe fasts We, however, do not know the reason thereof.

2. We have heard that only Brahmanas and Kshatriyas should observe the vow of fasts. How, O grandfather, are the other castes to be taken as acquiring any merit by the observance of fasts?

3 How have vows and fasts come to be observed by persons of all castes, O king? What is that end which one devoted to the observance of fasts, acquires?

4 It has been said that fasts are greatly meritorious and that fasts are a great refuge O king, what is the fruit that is acquired in this world by the man who observes fasts?

5 By what means is one purged of his sins? By what means does one acquire virtue. By what means, O best of the Bharatas, does one succeed in acquiring Heaven and merit.

6 After having observed a fast, what should one give away, O king? O tell me, what those duties are by which one may succeed in acquiring objects leading to happiness.

Vaishampayana said :—

7. Kunti's son begotten by the deity of Dharma, who was conversant with every duty and who said so to him, Shantanu's son, Bhishma, who knew every duty, answered in the following words.

Bhishma said :—

8 Formerly, O king, I heard of these high merits, O chief of Bharata's race, as belonging to the observance of fasts according to the ordinance.

9 I had, O Bharata, asked the Rishi Angiras of great ascetic merit, the very same questions which you have asked me to-day.

10 Accosted by me thus, the illustrious Rishi, who originated from the sacrificial fire, answered me even thus about the observance of fasts according to the ordinance.

Angiras said —

11 Fasts for three nights together, are ordained for Brahmanas and Kshatriyas, O delighter of the Kurus. Indeed, O king a fast for one night, for two nights, and for three nights, may be observed by them

12 Fast for one night is ordained for Vaishyas and Shudras If they observe fasts for two or three nights by mistake, such fasts never bring on their advancement.

13 Fasts for two nights have been ordained for Vaishyas and Shudras (on certain special occasions) Fasts for three nights, however, have not been ordained for them by persons knowing duties.

14—15 The wise man who, with his senses and soul under restraint, O Bharata, fasts, by abstaining from one of the two meals, on the fifth and the sixth days of the moon as also on the day of the full moon becomes gifted with forgiveness and personal beauty and knowledge of scriptures Such a person never becomes childless and poor.

16—18 He who celebrates sacrifices for worshipping the deities on the fifth and the sixth days of the moon, becomes superior to all the members of his family and succeeds in feeding a large number of Brahmanas He who observes fasts on the eighth and the fourteenth days of the dark fortnight, becomes freed from diseases and possessed of great energy. The man who abstains from one meal every day throughout the month called Margashirsha, should, with respect and devotion, feed a number of Brahmanas By so doing he becomes freed from all his sins Such a man becomes gifted with prosperity, and all sorts of grain become his.

19 He becomes gifted with energy. In fact, such a person reaps profuse harvest from his fields, acquires great riches and much corn.

20 That man, O son of Kunti, who passes the whole month of Pausha, abstaining every day from one of two meals, becomes a gainer of good fortune and pleasant features and great fame.

21 He who passes the whole month of Magha, abstaining every day from one of the two meals, is born in a high family and attains to a position of eminence among his kinsmen

22 He who passes the whole month of Bhadravata, confining himself every day to only one meal, becomes a favourite with women who, indeed, readily acknowledge his sway.

23 He who passes the whole of the month of Chaitra taking every day one meal only, is born in a high family and becomes rich in gold, gems, and pearls

24 The person whether male or female, who passes the month of Vaishakha taking himself or herself every day one meal, and keeping his or her senses under restraint, succeeds in attaining to a position of eminence among kinsmen.

25 The person who passes the month of Jaishtha taking himself every day one meal succeeds in acquiring a position of eminence and great riches. If a woman, she reaps the same reward

26 He who passes the month of Ashadha taking himself one meal a day and with senses steadily concentrated upon his duties, becomes possessed of much corn, great riches, and a large progeny.

27. He who passes the month of Sravana, taking himself one meal a day receives the honors of Abhisheka wherever he may happen to live, and attains to a position of eminence among kinsmen whom he supports.

28 That man who takes himself only one meal a day for the whole month of Proshthapada, becomes possessed of great riches.

29 The man who passes the month of Ashwin, taking himself one meal a day, becomes pure in soul and body, possessed of many animals and vehicles and a large progeny.

30. He who passes the month of Kartika, taking himself one meal every day, becomes possessed of heroism, many wives and great fame.

31 I have now told you, O king, what the fruits are that are obtained by men by observing fasts for the two and ten months in detail Listen now, O king, to me as I tell you what the rules are about the lunar days.

32 The man who, abstaining from it every day, takes rice at the termination of every fortnight, becomes possessed of a great many kine, a large progeny, and a long life

33 He who observes fasts for three nights every month and acts thus for two and ten years, acquires a position of eminence among his kinsmen and friends, without a rival to contest his claim and without any anxiety caused by any one trying to rise to the same height.

34 These rules which I speak of, O chief of Bharata's race, should be observed for twelve years. Be disposed to do it.

35—35 That man who eats once in the forenoon and once after evening and abstains from drinking at the interval, and who shows mercy towards all creatures, and pours libations of clarified butter on his sacred fire every day, acquires success, O king, in six years There is no doubt in this Such a man acquires the merit of the Agnistoma sacrifice

37 Gifted with merit and freed from every sort of stain he acquires the region of the Apsaras which echo with the sound of songs and dance, and passes his days in the company of a thousand highly beautiful ladies.

38 He rides on a car of the color of melted gold and receives great honors in the region of Brahma

39—40 After the exhaustion of that merit, such a person returns to Earth and acquires elevated position That man who passes one whole year, taking himself every day only one meal, acquires the merit of the Atiratra sacrifice He ascends to Heaven after death and receives great honors there.

41—42 Upon the termination of that merit he returns to the Earth and acquires a position of eminence He who passes one whole year fasting for three days in succession and taking food on every fourth day, and abstaining from injury from every sort, adhering to truthfulness of speech, and keeping his senses under control, acquires the merit of the Vajapeya sacrifice.

43—44 Such a person ascends to Heaven after death and receives great honors there That man, O son of Kunti who passes a whole year observing fasts for five days and taking food on only the sixth day, gains the merit of the Horse sacrifice The chariot he rides, is drawn by Chakravakas.

45—46. Such a man enjoys every kind of happiness in Heaven for full forty thousand years He who passes a whole year observing fasts for seven days and taking food on only every eighth day, gains the merit of the Gavamaya sacrifice The chariot he rides, is drawn by swans and cranes

47—48 Such a person enjoys all kinds of happiness in Heaven for fifty thousand years. He who passes a whole year, O king, taking food only at intervals of a fortnight, gains the merit of a continuous fast for six months. This has been said by the illustrious Angiras himself Such a man lives in Heaven for sixty thousand years.

49 He is roused every morning from his bed by the sweet notes of Vinas and Vallakis and flutes, O king.

50 He who passes a whole year, drinking only a little water at the termination of every month, acquires, O king, the merit of the Vishnuyaga sacrifice

51. Such a man rides a chariot drawn by lions and tigers He lives in Heaven for seventy thousand years in the enjoyment of every sort of happiness.

52. No fast for more than a month, O king, has been ordained Even this, O son of Pritha, is the ordinance about fasts that has been declared by sages conversant with duties.

53. That man who unafflicted by disease and free from every malady, observes a fast, indeed acquires, at every step, the merits of Sacrifices

54 Such a man ascends to Heaven on a car drawn by swans Gifted with power, he enjoys every sort of happiness in Heaven for a hundred years

55 A hundred Apsaras of the most beautiful features, wait upon, and sport with him

56 He is roused from his bed every morning by the sound of the Kanchis and the Nupuras of those ladies.

57 Such a person rides on a car drawn by a thousand swans Living again, in a region teeming with hundreds of the most beautiful ladies, he passes his time in great joy.

58—59 The person who seeks Heaven, does not want strength when he becomes weak, or the cure of wounds when he is wounded, or the administration of medicine when he is ill or soothings by others when he is angry, or the mitigation, by the expenditure of money, of sorrows caused by poverty.

60 Leaving this world where he suffers all sorts of privations he proceeds to Heaven and rides on cars bedecked with gold, his body adorned with all sorts of ornaments. There, in the midst of hundreds of beautiful ladies, he enjoys all sorts of pleasure and happiness, cleansed of every sin

61 Indeed, abstaining from food and enjoyments in this world he renounces this body and ascends to Heaven as the fruit of his penances There purged of all his sins, he enjoys health and happiness and all his wishes become crowned with success

62—63 Such a person rides on a celestial car of golden color, effulgent like the morning sun, set with pearls and lapis lazuli resounding with the music of Vinas and Murajas, adorned with banners and lamps and echoing with the sounds of celestial bells

64 Such a person enjoys all sorts of happiness in Heaven for as many years as there are pores in his body.

65. There is no Shastra superior to the Veda There is no person more worthy of respect than the mother There is no acquisition superior to that of virtue, and no penance superior to fast.

66 There is nothing more sacred, in Heaven or Earth, than Brahmanas Similarly there is no penance that is superior to the observance of fasts

67. It was by fasts that the celestials have succeeded in becoming dwellers of Heaven It is by fasts that the Rishis have acquired high success.

68. Vishwamitra passed a thousand celestial years, taking one meal a day, and as the consequence thereof acquired the status of a Brahmana.

69 Chyavana, Jamadagni, Vashishtha, Gautama and Bhrigu—all these great Rishis gifted with the virtue of forgiveness—have attained to Heaven through the observance of fasts.

70. Formerly Angiras declared so to the great Rishis. The man who teaches another the merit of fasts, has never to suffer any sort of misery.

71. The ordinances about fasts, in their due order, O son of Kunti, have originated from the great Rishi Angiras The man who daily reads these ordinances or hears them read, becomes freed from all sins.

72. Not only is such a person freed from every calamity, but his mind arises above all sorts of shortcomings Such a person succeeds in understanding the sounds of all creatures other than human, and acquiring eternal fame, becomes the foremost of men.

CHAPTER CVII.

(ANUSHASANIKA PARVA)—Continued.

Yudhishthira said:—

1. O grandfather, you have duly described to us the subject of Sacrifices, including the merits in full that attach to them both here and hereafter.

2. It should be remembered, however, O grandfather, that Sacrifices are incapable of being celebrated by poor men, for these require a large store of various articles.

3. Indeed, O grandfather, the merit attaching to Sacrifices can be acquired by only kings and princes. That merit is incapable of being acquired by those who have no wealth and power and who live alone and are helpless

5 Do you tell us, O grandfather, what the ordinances are about those acts that are fraught with merit equal to what belongs to Sacrifices and which, therefore, are capable of being performed by poor men.

Bhishma said:—

6 Listen, O Yudhishthira! Those ordinances that I have told you of,—those, viz., that were first promulgated by the great Rishi Angiras, and that have reference to meritorious fasts for their soul,—are considered as equal to Sacrifices.

7—8. That man who takes one meal in the forenoon and one at night, without taking any food or drink during the interval, and who observes this regulation for a period of six years successively abstaining all the while from injuring any creature and regularly pouring libations on his sacred fire every day, attains, forsooth, to success Such a man acquires hereafter a car of the color of heated gold, and acquires a residence, for millions of years in the region of Prajapati, in the company of celestial ladies, that ever echoes with the sound of music and dance, and shines with the effulgence of fire

9 He who passes three years, taking one meal a day and abstaining all the while from intercourse with any other woman except his own married wife, attains to the merit of the Agnishtoma sacrifice

10—14 Such a man is considered as having performed a Sacrifice with plenty of gifts in gold, that is dear to Vasava himself. By practising truthfulness of speech making gifts, respecting the Brahmanas, avoiding malice, becoming forgiving and self controlled, and conquering anger, a man acquires the highest end Riding on a car of the color of white clouds that is drawn by swans, he lives, for millions and millions of years, in the company of Apsaras. Fasting for a whole day and taking only one meal on the second day, he who pours libations upon his sacred fire for the period of a whole year,—indeed, he who observes such a fast and attends every day to his fire and rises every day from bed before sunrise, acquires the merit of the Agnishtoma sacrifice. Such a man acquires a car drawn by swans and cranes.

15—17. Surrounded by the most beautiful ladies, he lives in the region of Indra That man who takes only one meal every third day, and pours libations every day on his sacred fire for a period of a whole year,—indeed, he who thus attends to his fire every day and wakes up from sleep every morning before sun rise, acquires the high merit of the Atiratra sacrifice. He acquires a car drawn by peacocks and swans and cranes.

18 Proceeding to the region of the seven Rishis, he lives there surrounded by Apsaras of great beauty. It is well-known that such residence lasts for full three Padmas of years

19—20 Fasting for three days successively, he who takes only one meal every fourth day, and pours libations every day on his sacred fire, acquires the great merit of the Vajapeya sacrifice. The car he acquires is graced by highly beautiful celestial ladies who have Indra for their father.

21. He lives in the region of Indra for millions and millions of years, and enjoys great happiness by witnessing the sports of the king of the gods.

22—23 Fasting for four days successively he who eats only one meal every fifth day, and pours libations on the sacred fire every day for the period of a whole year, and who lives without cupidity, telling the truth, respecting the Brahmanas, abstaining from every sort of injury, and avoiding malice and sin, acquires the merit of the Vajapeya sacrifice.

24 The car he rides, is made of gold and drawn by swans and effulgent like many suns rising together. He acquires, besides, a palatial building of pure white

25 He lives there happily for full one and fifty Padmas of years

26—27 He who fasting for five days, takes food only on the sixth day, and pours libations on his sacred fire every day for one year, and who performs three ablutions in course of the day for purifying himself and saying his prayers and paying his adoration, and who leads a celibate life, divested of malice in his conduct, acquires the merit of the Gomedha sacrifice.

28 He acquires an excellent car adorned with pure gold effulgent like a blazing fire and drawn by swans and peacocks

29 He sleeps on the lap of Apsaras and is awakened every morning by the melodious sound of Nupuras and Kanchis.

30 He leads such a happy life for ten thousand millions of years and three thousand millions besides and eight and ten Padmas and two Patakas.

31. Such a man lives also, honored by all, in the region of Brahma for as many years as there are hairs on the bodies of five thousand bears.

32—34 Fasting for six days, he who takes only one meal every seventh day and pours libations on the sacred fire every day, for a full year, controlling speech all the while and observing the vow of celibacy and abstaining from the use of flowers and unguents and honey and meat, acquires the region of the Maruts and of Indra Crowned with the fruition of every wish as it originates in the mind, he is waited upon and adored by celestial ladies.

35 He acquires the merits of a sacrifice in which profuse gold is given away Proceeding to the regions named, he lives there for numberless years in the enjoyment of greatest happiness.

36—37. He who shows mercy to all and fasting for seven days eats on every eighth day for a whole year, and, pouring libations every day on the sacred fire, worship the celestials, regularly, acquires the great merits of the Paundarika sacrifice. The car he rides is lotus-hued

38 Forsooth, such a man acquires also a large number of young and beautiful ladies, some having complexions that are dark, some with complexions like that of gold, and some that are Shyamas, whose looks and gestures are of the most agreeable kind

39—40. He who fasts for eight days and takes only one meal on every ninth day for one full year, and pours libations on the sacred fire every day, wins the great merits of a thousand Horse sacrifices. The car he rides in Heaven is beautiful like a lotus.

41. He always journeys, on that car, accompanied by the daughters of Rudra bedecked with celestial garlands and gifted with the effulgence of the midday sun or of fires of burning flames.

42 Acquiring the regions of Rudra, he lives there in great happiness for numberless years.

43—44 He who fasts for nine days and takes only one meal every tenth day for a whole year, and pours libations on his sacred fire every day, gains the high merit of a thousand Horse sacrifices and attains to the companionship of Brahmana's daughters whose beauty charm the hearts of all creatures.

45 These ladies, possessed of such beauty, and some of them possessed of color of the lotus and some like that of the same flower of the blue variety, always keep him in joy.

46 He acquires a beautiful car which moves in beautiful circles and which looks like the dense cloud called Avarta, resemble also an ocean wave

47. That car resounds with the constant tinkle of rows of pearls and gems, and the melodious sound of conchs and is adorned with columns made of crystals and diamonds, as as also with an altar constructed of the same minerals.

48 He rides such a car, drawn by swans and cranes, and lives for millions and millions of years in great happiness in Heaven

49—51. He who fasts for ten days and eats only clarified butter on every eleventh day for one full year and pours libations on his sacred fire every day, who never, in word or thought, seeks the company of other people's wives and who never utters a falsehood even for the sake of his mother and father, succeeds in seeing Mahadeva of great power seated on his car. Such a person acquires the great merit of a thousand Horse sacrifices

52 He sees the car of the Self-create Brahman himself approach for taking him on it. He rides on it accompanied by celestial ladies gifted with great beauty, and complexions as effulgent as that of pure gold.

53. Gifted with the blazing splendour of the cycle fire he lives for many years in a celestial mansion in Heaven, full of every happiness

54 For those numberless years he experiences the joy of bending his head in respect to Rudra worshipped by the celestials and Danavas

55—56 Such a person sees every day the great god That man who having fasted for eleven days, eats only a little clarified butter on the twelfth, and acts thus for a whole year, succeeds in acquiring the merits of all the Sacrifices The car he rides, is effulgent like a dozen suns

57—58 Adorned with costly gems and pearls and corals, embellished with rows of swans and snakes and of peacocks and Chakravakas uttering their melodious notes and beautified with large domes, is the quarter to which he attains in the region of Brahman

59 That house, O king, is always filled with men and women This is what the highly blessed Rishi Angiras, knowing every duty, said

60. That man who having fasted for twelve days eats a little clarified butter on the thirteenth, and acts thus for a whole year, succeeds in acquiring the merits of the divine sacrifice

61. Such a man gets a car of the color of the new blown lotus adorned with pure gold and heaps of jewels and gems

62. He goes to the regions of the Maruts which are full of celestial ladies, which are adorned with every kind of celestial ornament, which are filled with celestial perfumes, and which contain every element of happiness

63 Countless is the number of years he lives in those happy regions.

64 Soothed with the sound of music and the sweet voice of Gandharvas and the sounds and blare of drums and Panavas, he is constantly pleased by celestial ladies of great beauty

65 That man who having fasted for thirteen days, eats a little clarified butter on the fourteenth day, and acts thus for a full year, acquires the merits of the Mahamedha sacrifice.

66 Celestial ladies of indescribable beauty, and whose age cannot be determined, for they look ever young, adorned with every ornament and with armlets of blazing effulgence, wait upon him with many cars and follow him in his journeys

67 He is waked every morning from his bed by the melodious note of swans, the tinkle of Nupuras, and the highly agreeable jingle of Kanchis Indeed, he lives in a superior house, waited upon by such celestial ladies, for years as countless as the sands on the shores of Ganga.

68—70 That man who, keeping his senses under restraint, fasts for a fortnight and takes only one meal on the sixteenth day, and acts thus for a whole year, pouring libations every day on his sacred fire, acquires the great merits of a thousand Rajasuya sacrifices The car he rides, is highly beautiful and is drawn by swans and peacocks

71—73 Riding on such a car which is, besides, adorned with garlands of pearls and the purest gold and graced with bevies of celestial ladies decked with ornaments of every sort, having one column and four arches and seven altars exceedingly auspicious, having thousands of banners and echoing with the sound of music, celestial and of celestial attributes, set with gems and pearls and corals and effulgent like lightning, such a man lives in Heaven for a thousand cycles, having elephants and rhinoceroses for dragging that car of his.

74. That man who having fasted for fifteen days takes one meal on the sixteenth day and acts thus for one whole year, acquires the merits of the Soma sacrifice.

75 Proceeding to the celestial region, he lives in the company of Soma's daughters. His body fragrant with unguents whose perfumes are as sweet as those of Soma himself, he acquires the power of going immediately to any place he likes

76. Seated on his car he is waited upon by beautiful damsels of agreeable manners, and commands all articles of enjoyment

77. He enjoys such happiness for many years.

78—79 That man who having fasted for sixteen days, eats a little clarified butter on the seventeenth day, and acts thus for a whole year, pouring libations every day on his sacred fire, proceeds to the regions of Varuna and Indra and Rudra and the Maruts and Ushanas and Brahman himself.

80. There he is waited upon by celestial ladies and sees the celestial Rishi called Bhurbhuva and sees the entire universe.

81. The daughters of the king of the deities gladden him there Those damsels, of agreeable manners and adorned with every ornament, are capable of assuming thirty-two forms.

82. As long as the Sun and the Moon move in the sky, so long does that wise man live in those regions of happiness, living upon the succulence of ambrosia and nectar.

83 That man who having fasted for seventeen days, takes only one meal on the eighteenth day, and acts thus for a whole year, succeeds in seeing the seven regions of the universe.

84. While making his journeys on his car, he is always followed by a large train of cars producing the most agreeable rattle and ridden by celestial ladies shining with ornaments and beauty.

85 Enjoying the greatest happiness, the car he rides, is celestial and endued with the greatest beauty It is drawn by lions and tigers, and produces rattle as deep as the muttering of the clouds

86 He lives in such happiness for a thousand æons, living upon ambrosia that is as sweet as nectar itself

87. That man who having fasted, for eighteen days, eats only one meal on the nineteenth day and acts thus for a full year, succeeds in perceiving all the seven regions of the universe

88. The region to which he attains is peopled by various tribes of Apsaras and resounds with the sweet note of Gandharvas. The car he rides is effulgent like the sun

89 His heart shorn of every anxiety, he is waited upon by the foremost of celestial ladies. Decked with celestial garlands, and possessed of beauty, he lives in such happiness for millions and millions of years.

90—91. That man who having fasted for nineteen days, eats only one meal on every twentieth day, and acts thus for a full year, observing all the while truthfulness of speech and observance of other (excellent) rituals, abstaining also from meat, leading a celibate life and devoted to the behoof of all creatures, acquires the extensive regions of great happiness, belonging to the Adityas.

92. While making his journeys on his own car, he is followed by a large train of cars ridden by Gandharvas and Apsaras decked with celestial garlands and perfumes.

93—94. That man who having fasted for twenty days, takes a single meal on the twenty first day, and acts thus for a full year, pouring libations every day on his sacred fire, acquires the regions of Ushanas and Shakra, of the Ashwins and the Maruts, and lives there in uninterrupted happiness of great measure.

95 Unacquainted with all sorrows, he rides the foremost of cars for making his journeys, and waited upon by foremost of celestial ladies, and possessed of power, he sports in joy like a celestial himself.

96—97. That man who having fasted for twenty-one days, takes a single meal on the twenty-second day, and acts thus for a full year, pouring libations on his sacred fire every day, abstaining from injuring any creature, observing truthfulness of speech, and freed from malice, acquires the regions of the Vasus and becomes endued with solar effulgence.

98 Gifted with the power of going every where at will, living upon nectar, and riding on the foremost of cars, his body decked with celestial ornaments, he sports in joy in the company of celestial ladies.

99—100. That man who having fasted for twenty-two days takes a single meal on the twenty third day, and acts thus for a full year, thus regulating his diet and keeping his senses under restraint acquires the regions of the Wind-God of Ushanas and of Rudras Capable of going everywhere at will, and always roving at will, he is adored by various tribes of Apsaras.

101 Riding on the foremost of cars and his body decked with celestial ornaments, he sports for numberless years in great happiness in the company of celestial ladies.

102—103 That man who having fasted for twenty-three days eats a little clarified butter on the twenty fourth day, and acts thus for a full year, pouring libations on his sacred fire, lives for countless years in great happiness in the regions of the Adityas, his body decked with celestial dresses and garlands and celestial perfumes and unguents

104 Riding on an excellent car, made of gold and gilted with great beauty and drawn by swans, he sports in joy in the company of thousands and thousands of celestial ladies.

105 That man who having fasted for twenty-four days, takes a single meal on the twenty-fifth day, and acts thus for full year, succeeds in getting a car of the foremost kind full of every object of enjoyment.

106—108 He is followed in his journeys by a large train of cars drawn by lions and tigers, and producing a sound as deep as the muttering of the clouds, ridden by celestial ladies, and all made of pure gold and endued with great beauty. Himself riding on an excellent celestial car endued with great beauty, he lives in those regions for a thousand æons, in the company of hundreds of celestial ladies, and living upon ambrosia that is sweet as nectar itself

109—112 That man who having fasted for twenty-five days takes only one meal on the twenty sixth day, and acts thus for a full year in the observance of such a regulation about diet, keeping his senses under restraint, freed from attachment, and pouring libations, every day on his sacred fire,—that blessed man—adored by the Apsaras, acquires the regions of the seven Maruts and the Vasus When making his journeys, he is followed by a large train of cars made of excellent crystal and adorned with all sorts of gems and ridden by Gandharvas and Apsaras who show him every honor. He lives in those regions, in enjoyment of such happiness, and gifted with celestial energy, for two thousand cycles

113—114 That man who having fasted for twenty-six days eats a single meal on the twenty-seventh day, and acts thus for a full year, pouring libations every day on his sacred fire, acquires great merit and proceeding to the celestial region, receives honors from the deities Living there, he subsists on nectar, freed from thirst of every kind, and enjoying every happiness

115. His soul purified of every dross and making his journeys on a celestial car of great beauty, he lives there, O king, acting like the celestial Rishis and the royal sages.

116. Gifted with great energy, he lives there in great happiness in the company of celestial ladies of highly agreeable manners, for three thousand cycles and æons

117—118 That man who having fasted for twenty-seven days takes a single meal on the twenty-eighth day, and acts thus for a full year, with soul and senses under perfect restraint, acquires very great merit, which, in fact, is equal to what is acquired by the celestial Rishis Having every article of enjoyment, and gifted with great energy, he shines with the effulgence of the midday sun

119—120. Sportive ladies of the most delicate features and gifted with splendour of complexion, having deep bosoms, tapering thighs and full and round hips, decked with celestial ornaments, please him with their company while he rides on a delightful and excellent car effulgent like the sun and equipped with every article of enjoyment, for thousands and thousands of æons

121—123 That man who having fasted for twenty-eight days, takes a single meal on the twenty-ninth day, and acts thus for a full year, observing all the while truthfulness of speech, acquires auspicious regions of great happiness that are adored by celestial Rishis and royal sages The car he obtains is effulgent like the sun and the moon, made of pure gold and adorned with every sort of gem, ridden by Apsaras and Gandharvas singing melodiously.

125 Endued with every article of enjoyment and with great energy, and possessed of the splendour of a burning fire, he shines like a celestial, with a celestial form having every excellence.

126 The regions he attains are those of the Vasus and the Maruts, of the Saddhyas and the Ashwins, of the Rudras and of Brahman himself.

127 That man who having fasted for a full month, takes a single meal on the first day of the following month, and acts thus for a full year, looking on all things impartially, attains to the regions of Brahman himself.

128. There he lives upon ambrosia. Gifted with a beautiful form highly agreeable to all, he shines with energy and prosperity like the sun himself of a thousand rays.

129 Devoted to Yoga and adorned with celestial dresses and garlands and smeared with celestial perfumes and unguents he passes his time in great happiness, not experiencing the least sorrow He shines on his car attended by ladies that blaze forth with effulgence emitted by themselves.

130. Those ladies the daughters of the celestial Rishis and the Rudras, worship him with veneration.

131. Capable of assuming various forms that are highly delightful and highly agreeable, their speech is characterized by various kinds of sweetness, and they are able to please the person they wait upon in various kinds of ways.

132—133. While making his journeys, he rides on a car that looks like the sky itself in color. In his rear are cars which look like the Moon, before him are those which resemble the clouds, on his right are cars that are red, below him are those that are blue; and above him are those that are of variegated color. He is always worshipped by those who wait upon him.

134 Gifted with great wisdom, he lives in the region of Brahman for as many years as are measured by the drops of rain that fall in course of a thousand years on the insular continent of Jamvudwipa

135 Indeed, gifted with the effulgence a deity, he lives in that region of unalloyed happiness for as many years as the drops of rain which fall upon the Earth in the rainy season

136. The man who, having fasted for a whole month, eats on the first day of the following month, and acts thus for ten years, acquires the status of a great Rishi He has not to undergo any change of form while going to the celestial region for enjoying the rewards of his deeds in this life

137. Indeed, this is the status which one acquires by controlling speech, practising self-denial, subjugating anger, sexual appetite, and the desire to eat, pouring libations on the sacred fire and regularly worshipping the two twilights

138. That man who purifies himself by the observance of these and similar vows and practices, and who eats in this way, becomes as pure as ether and gifted with solar effulgence.

139 Such a man, O king, proceeding to the celestial region in even his own corporeal frame, enjoys all the happiness that is there like a celestial at his will

140. I have thus told you O chief of the Bharatas what the excellent ordinances are about sacrifices, one after another, as dependent upon the fruits of fasts.

141—142 Poor men, O son of Pritha, may, nevertheless acquire the fruits thereof (by the observance of fasts). By observing these fasts, even a poor man may acquire the highest end, O foremost one of Bharata's race, devoting himself all the while besides, to the worship of the celestials and the Brahmanas I have thus recited to you in full the ordinances about fasts.

143 Do not entertain any doubt about those men who so observe vows who are so heedful and pure and great, who are so freed from pride and malice who are endued with such devoted understandings, and who pursue their end with such firmness and fixity of purpose without ever deviating from their path.

CHAPTER CVIII.

Yudhishthira said —

1. Tell me, O grandfather, of that which is considered as the foremost of all Tirthas. Indeed you should expound to me what that Tirtha is which conduces to the greatest purity.

Bhishma said:—

2 Forsooth, all Tirthas are possessed of merit. Listen, however, with attention to me as I tell you what the Tirtha, the cleanser, is of men gifted with wisdom

3 Following eternal Truth, one should bathe in the Tirtha called Manasa, which is unfathomable, stainless, and pure, and which has Truth for its waters and the understanding for its lake.

4 The fruits, in the form of cleansing, that one gains by bathing in that Tirtha, are freedom from cupidity, sincerity, truthfulness, mildness, mercy, abstention from injuring any creature, self control, and tranquillity.

5 Those men who are freed from attachments, who are shorn of pride, who are above all pairs of opposites, who have no wives and children and houses and gardens, etc, who are gifted with purity, and who live upon the alms given to them by others, are considered as Tirthas.

6 He who knows the truths of all things and who is freed from the idea of mineness, is said to be the highest Tirtha In finding out the marks of purity, your gaze should ever be directed towards these qualities.

7—8 Those persons from whose souls the qualities of goodness darkness, and ignorance have been washed off, they who, not caring for purity and impurity, pursue the ends they have proposed to themselves, they who have renounced everything they who are possessed of omniscience and gifted with universal sight, and they who are of pure conduct, are considered as Tirthas possessing the purifying power.

9 That man whose limbs only are wet with water, is not considered as one that is washed. He, on the other hand is considered as washed who has washed himself by self-denial Even such a person is said to be pure both internally and externally

10. They who never busy themselves with what is past, they who feel no attachment for present acquisitions, indeed, they who are free from desire, are said to be possessed of the highest purity.

11. Knowledge is said to form the especial purity of the body So also freedom from desire, and cheerfulness of mind

12 Purity of conduct forms the purity of the mind The purity that one acquires by ablutions in sacred waters is considered as inferior. Indeed that purity which originates from knowledge, is considered as the best

13 Those ablutions which one performs with a burning mind in the waters of the knowledge of Brahma in the Tirtha called Manasa, are the true ablutions for truth-knowing persons

14. That man who is endued with true purity of conduct and who is always given to the preservation of a proper attitude towards all, indeed, he who is gifted with attributes and merit, is considered as truly pure

15 These that I have mentioned have been said to be the Tirthas of the body Listen to me as I tell you what those sacred Tirthas are that are situate on the Earth also

16 As special attributes of the body have been said to be sacred, so there are particular spots on Earth as well and particular waters, which are considered sacred

17 By reciting the names of the Tirthas, by performing ablutions there, and by offering oblations to the departed Manes in those places, one's sins are dissipated Those men whose sins are thus dissipated, succeed in acquiring the celestial region, when they leave this world.

18. On account of their association with pious persons, through the special efficacy of the earth itself, of those spots and of particular waters, there are certain portions of the Earth that have come to be considered as sacred

19. The mental Tirthas are separate and distinct from those of the Earth. That person who bathes in both, acquires success forthwith

20—21. As strength without exertion or exertion without strength can never perform anything, singly and as these, when combined can do all things, so one that becomes gifted with the purity that is contributed by the Tirthas in the body as also by that which is contributed by the Tirthas on the Earth, becomes truly pure and acquires success. That purity which is derived from both sources is the best.

CHAPTER CIX.

(ANUSHASANIKA PARVA) — Continued.

Yudhishthira said —

1 You should, O grandfather, tell me what is the highest, the most beneficial, and the most certain fruit of all sorts of fasts in this world

Bhishma said :—

2 Listen, O king, to what was recited by the Self-create himself and by doing which a person, forsooth, acquires the highest happiness.

3 That man who fasts on the twelfth day of the moon in the month called Margashirsa and adores Krishna as Keshava for the whole day and night acquires the merits of the Horse sacrifice and becomes purged off of all his sins.

4 He who similarly, fasts on the twelfth day of the moon in the month of Pausha and adores Krishna as Narayana, for the whole day and night, acquires the merits of the Vajapeya sacrifice and the highest success.

5 He who fasts on the twelfth day of the moon in the month of Magha and adores Krishna, as Madhava, for the whole day and night, acquires the merits of the Rajasuya sacrifice, and rescues his own family

6 He who fasts on the twelfth day of the moon in the month of Phalguna and adores Krishna as Govinda, for the whole day and night, acquires the the merit of the Atiratra sacrifice and goes to the region of Soma

7. He who fasts on the twelfth day of the moon in the month of Chaitra and adores Krishna as Vishnu, for the whole day and night, acquires the merit of the Pundarika sacrifice and proceeds to the region of the celestials.

8 By observing a similar fast on the twelfth day of the month of Vaishakha and adoring Krishna as the destroyer of Madhu for the whole day and night, one acquires the merits of the Agnishtoma sacrifice and proceeds to the region of Soma.

9 By observing a fast on the twelfth lunar day in the month of Jaishtha and adoring Krishna as him who had covered the universe with three steps of his, one acquires the merits of the Gomedha sacrifice and sports with the Apsaras in great happiness.

10 By observing a fast on the twelfth day of the moon in the month of Ashadh and adoring Krishna as the Dwarf, one acquires the merits of the Naramedha sacrifice and sports in happiness with the Apsaras

11. By observing a fast for the twelfth lunar day of the month of Shravana and adoring Krishna for day and night as Shreedhara, one acquires the merits of the sacrifice called Panchayajna and acquires a beautiful car in the celestial region whereon he sports in joy.

12 By observing a fast on the twelfth day of the moon in the month of Bhadrapada and adoring Krishna as Hrishikesha for the whole day and night, one acquires the merits of the Sautramani sacrifice and becomes purged off of all sins.

13 By observing a fast for the twelfth day of the moon in the month of Ashwin and adoring Krishna as Padmanabha, one acquires, forsooth, the merits of that sacrifice in which a thousand kine are given away

14 By observing a fast for the twelfth day of the moon in the month of Kartika and adoring Krishna as Damodara, one acquires, forsooth, the combined merits of all the sacrifices.

15 He who, in this way, worship Krishna for a whole year as Pundarikaksha, acquires the power of recollecting the incidents of his pristine births and acquires much wealth in gold.

16 Likewise he who adores Krishna every day as Upendra, acquires oneness with him After Krishna has been adored thus, one should, at the conclusion of his vow, feed a number of Brahmanas or make gifts of clarified butter to them.

17 The illustrious Vishnu that ancient Being, has himself said that there is no fast which possesses superior merits.

CHAPTER CX

(ANUHASANIKA PARVA)—Continued.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. Approaching Bhishma venerable in years, viz, Bhishma, who was then lying on his bed of arrows, the highly wise Yudhishthira put the following questions.

Yudhishthira said —

2 How, O grandfather, does one acquire beauty of form and prosperity and sweetness of disposition? How, indeed, does one acquire religious merit and wealth and pleasure? How does one win happiness?

Bhishma said :—

3—9. In the month of Margashira, when the moon comes in conjunction with the asterism called Mula, when his two feet are united with that very asterism, O king, when Rohini is in his calf, when his knee-joints are in Ashwini and his thighs are in the two Ashadas, when Phalguni makes his arms, and Krittika his waist, when his navel is in Bhadrapada, his ocular region in Revati, and his back on the Dhanishthas, when Anuradha makes his belly, when with his two arms he reaches the Vishakhas, when his two hands are indicated by Hasta, when Punarvasu, O king, makes his fingers, Ashlesha his nails when Jyeshtha makes his neck, when Shravana makes his ears, and Pushya his mouth, when Swati is said to make his teeth and lips when Shatabhisha is his smile and Magha his nose, when Mrigashiras is known to be in his eye, and Chitra in his forehead, when his head is in Bharani, when Ardra forms his hair, O king, the vow called Chandravrata should be taken in hand. Upon the termination of that vow, gifts of clarified butter should be made to Brahmanas conversant with the Vedas.

10. As the fruit of that vow one acquires prosperity, personal beauty and that good luck which brings about knowledge Indeed, one becomes, on account of such a vow, as full of attribute as the full Moon himself.

CHAPTER CXI.

(ANUSHASANIKA PARVA).—Continued.

Yudhishthira said :—

1 O grandfather, O greatly wise one, conversant with all the scriptures, I wish to know those excellent ordinances by which mortals have to travel through their rounds of re birth.

2 What is that conduct by following which, O king, men succeed in acquiring high Heaven and what is that conduct by which one sinks in Hell?

3 When, renouncing the dead body that is as inert as a piece of wood or clod of earth, people proceed to the other world, what are those which follow them there?

Bhishma said —

4 Yonder comes the illustrious and highly intelligent Vrihaspati Do you ask his blessed self. The subject is an eternal mystery

5 None else is capable of explaining the matter. There is no speaker like Vrihaspati.

Vaishampayana said :—

6 While the son of Pritha and the son of Ganga were thus conversing with each other there came at the spot from the sky the illustrious Vrihaspati of purified soul

7 King Yudhishthira, and all others headed by Dhritarashtra, stood up and received Vrihaspati with proper honors Excellent was the worship they offered to the preceptor of the celestials.

8 Then approaching the illustrious Vrihaspati, Dharma's royal son, Yudhishthira, asked him the question in proper form, desirous of knowing the truth.

Yudhishthira said :—

9 O illustrious one, you are conversant with all duties and all the scriptures Do you tell me what is truly the friend of mortal creatures?

10. Is the father, or mother, or son, or preceptor, or kinsmen, or relatives, or those called friends, that may be said to truly form the friend of a mortal creature? One goes to the next world, leaving his dead body that is like a piece of wood or a clod of earth. Who is it that follows him there?

Vrihaspati said :—

11. One is born alone, O king, and one dies alone, one crosses alone the difficulties one meets with, and one alone meets whatever misery falls to his lot.

12—13 One has really no companion in these deeds The father, the mother, the brother, the son, the preceptor, kinsmen, relatives and friends, leaving the dead body as if it were a piece of wood or a cold of earth, after having mourned for only a moment, all turn away from it and mind their own affairs.

14 Only virtue follows the body that is thus left by them all It is, therefore plain, that virtue is the only friend and that virtue only should be sought by all.

15 A virtuous man would acquire that high end which is formed by Heaven. If sinful, he goes to Hell.

16 Hence, an intelligent man should always seek to acquire virtue through wealth acquired by fair means Virtue is the one only friend which creatures have in the next world

17 Moved by cupidity, or stupefaction, or mercy, or fear, one shorn of knowledge is seen to do unfair deeds for the sake of even another, his judgment thus stupefied by cupidity.

18 Virtue, wealth, and pleasure,—these three form the fruit of life One should win these three by means of being free from impropriety and sin

Yudhishthira said —

19 I have carefully heard the words spoken by your illustrious self,—these words that are fraught with virtue and that are highly beneficial I wish now to know of the state of the body (after death).

20 The dead body of man becomes subtile and unmanifest It becomes invisible How is it possible for virtue to follow it?

Vrihaspati said :—

21—22 Earth, Wind, Ether, Water, Light Mind, Yama (the king of the dead), Understanding, the Soul as also Day and Night, all together witness the merits of all living creatures With these, virtue follows the creature (when dead).

23 When the body becomes bereft of life skin, bones flesh the vital seed, and blood, leave it simultaneously.

24 Gifted with merit (and demerit) individual soul (after the destruction of this body) comes by another body After the attainment by individual soul of that body the presiding deities of the five elements once more witness all his deeds, good and bad

25 What else do you wish to hear? If gifted with virtue, individual soul enjoys happiness. What other subject, belonging to this or the other world, shall I describe to you?

Yudhishthira said :—

26 Your illustrious self has explained how Virtue follows individual soul I wish to know how the vital seed is originated.

Vrihaspati said :—

27—28 The food that these gods O king, who live in the body, viz Earth, Wind, Ether, Water, Light and Mind eat, pleases them When those five elements become pleased, O monarch, with Mind numbering as their sixth, their vital seed then becomes generated, O you of purified soul.

29 When an act of union takes place between male and female, the vital seed comes out and causes conception I have thus explained to you what you had asked. What else do you wish to hear.

Yudhishthira said —

30. You have, O illustrious one, said how conception takes place Do you explain how the individual soul that takes birth, grows.

Vrihaspati said :—

31 As soon as individual soul enters the vital seed, he becomes overwhelmed by the elements already mentioned. When individual soul become disunited therewith, he is said to attain to the other end (viz., death).

32 Gifted with these elements, the individual soul comes by a body The deities that preside over those elements, witness all his deeds, good and bad. What else do you wish to hear.

Yudhishthira said :—

33. Living off skin, bone and flesh, and becoming destitute of all those elements, in what does individual soul reside, O illustrious one, for enjoying and suffering happiness and misery?

Vrihaspati said :—

34 Endued with all his acts, individual soul quickly enters the vital seed, and availing of the menstrual flow of women, takes birth in time, O Bharata.

35 After birth, individual soul receives woe and death from the messengers of Yama Indeed, he goes through misery and a painful round of re-birth

36 Endued with life, O king, individual soul in this world, from the moment of his birth enjoys and suffers his own (pristine deeds), depending upon virtue (and its reverse)

37 If individual soul according to the best of his power, follows virtue from the day of his birth, he then succeeds in enjoying uninterruptedly, when re-born, happiness

38 If, on the other hand, without following virtue without interrution, he acts sinfully, he reaps happiness at first as the reward of his virtue and suffers misery after that.

39 Endued with sin, individual soul has to go to the dominions of Yama and suffering great misery there, he has to take birth in an intermediate order of being.

40—41. Listen to me as I tell you, what the different acts are by doing which individuals soul, stupefied by folly, has to take birth in different orders of being, as declared in the Vedas, the scriptures, and the histories Mortals have to go to the dreadful regions of Yama In those regions, O king, there are places which are fraught with every merit and which are worthy on that account of being the habitations of the very celestials.

42 There are, again, places in those regions that are worse than those which are occupied by animals and birds. Indeed, there are places of these kinds in the abode of Yama which is equal to the region of Brahman himself in merits

43—44 Creatures, fettered by their deeds, suffer various kinds of misery I shall, after this, tell you what those acts and dispositions are on account of which a person acquires an end that is fraught with great misery and terror.

45. If a twice-born person, having studied the four Vedas, becomes stupefied by folly and accepts a gift from a fallen man, he has then to take birth in the order of asses

46 He has to live as an ass for fifteen years Shaking off his assinine form, he has next to take birth as an ox and which state he has to live for seven years.

47. Throwing off his bovine form, he has next to take birth as a Rakshasa of the twice-born order. Living as a Rakshasa of the twice-born order for three months, he then regains his status of a Brahmana.

48 A Brahmana, by officiating at the sacrifice of a degraded person, has to take birth as a vile worm. In this form he has to live for fifteen years, O Bharata.

49 Freed from his worm birth, he is next born as an ass As an ass he has to live for five years, and then as a hog, in which state also he has to remain for as many years.

50 After that, he is born as a cock, and living for five years in that form, he is born as a jackal and lives for as many years in that state. He is then born as a dog, and living thus for a year he regains his manhood.

51. That foolish disciple who offends his preceptor by injuring him, has certainly to undergo three changes in this world.

52. Such a person, O king, has in the first instance to become a dog. He has then to become a beast of prey, and then an ass. Living his assinine form, he has to wander for sometime in great misery as a spirit After the expiration of that time, he is born as a Brahmana

53 That sinful disciple who even in thought knows the wife of his preceptor, has, on account of such a sinful heart, to undergo many dreadful shapes in this world

54 First taking birth in the canine order he has to live for three years Throwing off the canine form when death comes, he is born as a vile vermin.

55 In this form he has to live for a year. Renouncing that form he succeeds in regaining his status as a human being of the twice-born order.

56. If the preceptor kills, without reason, his disciple who is even as a son to him, he has, on account of such a wilful deed of sin on his part, to take birth as a beast of prey.

57 That son who disregards his father and mother, O king, is born after renouncing his human form as an ass

58 Assuming the assinine form he has to live for ten years After that he is born as a crocodile, in which form he has to live for a year. After that he regains the human form.

59 That son with whom his parents become angry, has, on account of his evil thoughts towards them, to take birth as an ass

60. As an ass he has to live for ten months He is next born as a dog and has to remain as such for fourteen months After that he is born as a cat and living in that form for seven months he regains his human form.

61. Having spoken ill of parents, one is born as a Sarika Striking them one is born, O king, as a tortoise

62 Living as a tortoise for ten years, he is born as a porcupine After that he has to take birth as a snake, and living for six months in that form he regains human form.

63 That man who, while living upon the food that his royal master supplies, commits deeds injurious to the interests of his master, stupefied by folly, has, after death, to take birth as a monkey.

64 For ten years he has to live as a monkey, and after that for five years as a mouse After that he is born as a dog, and living in that form for six months he succeeds in regaining his human form.

65. That man who misappropriates what is deposited with him in trust, has to undergo a hundred births. He at last takes birth as a vile worm.

66 In that order he has to live for fifteen years, O Bharata. Upon the exhaustion of his sin in this way, he succeeds in regaining his human form.

67 That man who has malice towards others, has, after death, to take birth as a Sharngaka That wicked man who becomes guilty of breach of trust has to take birth as a fish.

68 Living as a fish for eight years, he is born, O Bharata, as a deer. Living as a deer for four months, he is next born as a goat.

69 After the expiration of a full year, he renounces his goatish body, and is then born as a worm. After that he succeeds in regaining his human form.

70—71 That shameless insensate man who, through stupefaction, steals paddy, barley, sesame, Masha, Kulattha, oil seeds, oats, Kasaya, Mudga, wheat, Atasi, and other kinds of corn, is born as a mouse.

72 After leading the life for sometime, he is next born as a hog. As soon as he is born as a hog he has to die of disease.

73 On account of his sin, that foolish man has next to take birth as a dog, O king Living as a dog for five years, he then regains his human form.

74 Having committed an act of adultery with the wife of another man, one is born as a wolf. After that he has to assume the forms of a dog and jackal and vulture He has next to take birth as a snake and then as a Kanka (a bird of prey) and then as a crane.

75 That sinful wight who, out of foolishness knows his brother's wife, has to take birth as a male Coel and to live in that form for a whole year, O king.

76 He who, through lust, knows the wife of a friend, or the wife of preceptor, or the wife of his king, has after death to take the form of a hog.

77 He has to live in this form for five years and then to assume that of a wolf for ten years For the next five years he has to live as a cat and then for the next ten years as a cock.

78 He is next born as an ant, for three months and then as a worm for a month. Having undergone these births, he has next to live as a vile worm for fourteen years.

79 When his sin becomes exhausted by such punishment, he at last regains the human form

80 When a marriage is about to take place, or a sacrifice, or an act of gifts is about to be made, O you of great power, the man who puts in any impediment, has to take birth in his next life as a vile worm

80 Assuming such a form he has to live, O Bharata, for fifteen years When his sin is exhausted by such suffering, he re-gains the human form.

81. Having once bestowed his daughter in marriage upon a person, he who seeks to bestow her again upon a second husband, is compelled, O king, to take birth among vile worms

83 Assuming such a form, O Yudhishthira, he has to live for thirteen years Upon the exhaustion of his sin by such sufferance, he re gains the human form.

84 He who eats without having performed the rites in honor of the celestials or those in honour of the departed Manes or without having offered (even) oblations of water to both the Rishis and the departed Manes has to take birth as a crow.

85 Living as a crow for a hundred years, he next assumes the form of a cock. His next change is that of a snake for a month. After this, he regains the human form.

86 He who disregards his eldest brother who is like a father, has, after death, to take birth as a crane.

87. Having assumed that form he has to live in it for two years. Renouncing that form at the conclusion of that period, he re-gains the human form.

88 That Shudra who knows a Brahmani woman, has, after death, to take birth as a hog

89 As soon as he takes birth in that order he dies of disease, O king. The wretch has next to take birth as a dog, O king, on account of that sinful deed.

90. Renouncing his canine form he regains, upon the exhaustion of his sin, the human form The Shudra who begets offspring upon a Brahmani woman, leaving off his human form, is born again as a mouse.

91. The man who becomes guilty of ingratitude O king, has to go to the regions of Yama and there to suffer very painful and severe treatment at the hands of the emissaries, provoked to fury, of the grim king of the dead.

92—93. Clubs with heavy hammers and mallets, sharp-pointed lances, heated jars, dreadful sword blades, heated sands, thorny Shalmalis,—these and many other engines of torture such a man has to suffer in the regions of Yama, O Bharata.

94 O chief of Bharata's race, having suffered such dreadful treatment in the regions of the grim king of the dead, the ungrateful person has to return to this world and take birth among vile vermin.

95 He has to live as a vile vermin for a period of fifteen years, O Bharata He has then to enter the womb and die prematurely before birth.

96 After this, that person has to enter the womb a hundred times successively. Indeed, having undergone a hundred re-births, he at last is born as a creature in some intermediate order between man and inanimate nature

97. Having suffered misery for a great many years, he has to take birth as a hairless tortoise.

98 A person who steals curds is born as a crane One becomes a monkey by stealing raw fish. That intelligent man who steals honey, is born as a gadfly

99 By stealing fruits or roots or cakes, one becomes an ant By stealing Nishpava, one becomes a Halagolaka.

100. By stealing Payasa, one becomes, in his next birth, a Tittiri bird By stealing cakes, one becomes a screech-owl.

101. That little witted man who steals iron, has to take birth as a cow That man who steals white brass, is born as a bird of the Harita species.

102 By stealing a silver vessel, one becomes a pigeon By stealing a golden vessel, one has to take birth as a vile vermin

103 By stealing a piece of silken cloth, one becomes a Krikara By stealing a piece of cloth made of red silk, one becomes a Vartaka

104 By stealing a piece of muslin, one becomes a parrot By stealing a piece of cloth that is of fine texture, one becomes a duck after renouncing his human body.

105 By stealing a piece of cloth made of cotton, one becomes a crane By stealing a piece of cloth made of jute, one becomes a sheep in his next life.

106 By stealing a piece of linen, one is born as a hare By stealing different sorts of colouring matter, one is born as a peacock.

107—108 By stealing a piece of red cloth one is born as a bird of the Jivanjivaka species By stealing unguents (such as sandalpaste) and perfumes in this world, the avaricious man, O king, is born as a mole Assuming the form of a mole one has to live in it for fifteen years.

109 After the exhaustion of his sin by such suffering, he regains the human form. By stealing milk, one becomes a crane.

110 That man O king, who, through stupefaction of the understanding, steals oil, is born, after renouncing this body, as an animal who lives upon oil as his form

111 That wretch, who, himself well-armed, kills another while that other is unarmed, for getting his riches or out of hostile feelings, has, after renouncing his human body, to take birth as an ass.

112. Assuming that assinine form, he has to live for a period of two years and then he is killed by a weapon Renouncing his assinine body, he has to take birth, in his next life, as a deer always anxious (for fear of being killed)

113—114 Upon the expiration of a year from the time of his birth as a deer, he is killed by a weapon. Thus renouncing his form of a deer, he next takes birth as a fish and dies on account of being dragged up in a net, on the expiration of the fourth month He has next to take birth as a beast of prey. He has to live in that form, for ten years and then he takes birth as a bird in which form he has to live for five years

115. Actuated by the change that is occasioned by time, he then renounces that form, and his sin having been exhausted, he re-gains the human form.

116 That man of little understanding who slays a woman, has to go to the regions of Yama and to suffer various kinds of pain and misery. He then has to pass through full twenty-one transformations.

117 After that, O king, he has to take birth as a vile vermin Living as a vermin for twenty years, he regains the human form

118—119 By stealing food, one has to take birth as a bee Living for many months in the company of other bees, his sin become exhausted and he re gains the human form By stealing paddy, one becomes a cat

120 That man who steals food mixed with sesame cakes, is in his next birth born as a mouse large or small according to the largeness or smallness of the quantity stolen

121. He bites human beings every day and, therefore, becomes sinful and passes through a varied round of re births. That foolish man who steals clarified butter has to take birth as a gallinule.

122 That wicked man who steals fish has to take birth as a crow. By stealing salt one has to take birth as an imitating parrot.

123 That man who misappropriates trust property, has to suffer a diminution in the period of his life, and dying has to take birth among fishes

124 Having lived for sometime as a fish, he dies and re gains the human form Regaining, however, the human form he becomes short lived.

125 Indeed, having perpetrated sins, O Bharata, one has to take birth in an order intermediate between that of humanity and vegetables Those people do not know the principles of virtue who take their own hearts for their guide.

126 Those men who commit various sinful deeds, and then seek to expiate them by continuous vows and observances of piety, enjoy happiness and suffer misery and live in great anxiety of heart

127 Those sinful men who yield to the influence of cupidity and stupefaction, are surely born as Mlechchhas who are unworthy of being associated with

128 Those men, on the other hand, who abstain from sin all their lives, become free from disease of every sort, gifted with beauty of form, and possessed of riches

129 Women also, when they act in this way attain to births of the same kind Indeed, they have to take births as the males of the animals I have mentioned.

130 I have told you all the faults of the misappropriation of others' properties I have described to you very briefly the subject, O sinless one

131—132 In connection with some other subject, O Bharata, you will again hear of those faults I heard all this, O king, formerly from Bhrahman himself, and I asked all about it in a proper way, when he described it in the midst of the celestial Rishis I have told you truly and in detail all that you had asked me.

133 Having listened to all this, O king, do you always set your heart on virtue,

CHAPTER CXII.

(ANUSHASANIKA PARVA)—

Continued.

Yudhishthira said —

1. You have told me, O twice born one, what the end is of virtue or sin I wish now to hear, O foremost of speakers, of what the end is of virtue.

2 Having committed various sinful deeds, by what acts do people succeed in acquiring an auspicious end in this world? By what acts also, do people acquire auspicious end in the celestial region?

Vrihaspati said —

3 By committing sinful deeds with perverted mind, one gives way to the influence of sin, and accordingly goes to Hell.

4 That man who, having perpetrated sinful deeds through stupefaction of mind, feels the pangs of repentance and sets his heart on meditation (of the deity), has not to suffer the consequences of his sins

5 One becomes freed from his sins inasmuch as he repents for them.

6. If one, having committed a sin, O king, mentions it before Brahmanas conversant with duties, he speedily becomes freed from the obloquy arising from his sin.

7 Accordingly as one mentions his sins, fully or otherwise, with concentrated mind, he becomes cleansed therefrom fully or otherwise, like a snake freed from his diseased slough.

8 By making, with a concentrated mind gifts of various kinds to a Brahmana and concentrating the mind (on the deity), one attains to an auspicious end

9 I shall now tell you what those gifts are O Yudhishthira, by making which a person, even if guilty of having committed sinful deeds, may become gifted with merit.

10 Of all kinds of gifts, that of food is considered as the best. One desirous of acquiring merit should, with a sincere heart, make gifts of food.

11 Food is the vital air of men. From it all creatures originate All the worlds of living creatures are established upon food. Hence food is highly spoken of

12 The deities, Rishis, departed Manes, and men, all praise food Formerly king Rantideva, proceeded to the celestial region by making gifts of food

13 Good food that has been acquired by fair means, should be given, with a cheerful heart, to Brahmanas possessed of Vedic learning.

14 That man, whose food, given with a cheerful heart, is taken by a thousand Brahmanas, has never to take birth in an intermediate order.

15 A person, O king, by feeding ten thousand Brahmanas, becomes cleansed of sin and devoted to Yoga practices.

16 A Brahmana knowing the Vedas, by giving away food acquired by him as alms, to a Brahmana devoted to the study of the Vedas, succeeds in acquiring happiness here

17—18 That Kshatriya who, without taking anything belonging to a Brahmana, protects his subjects lawfully, and makes gifts of food, obtained by his strength to Brahmanas foremost in Vedic knowledge, with concentrated heart, succeeds by such conduct, O you of righteous soul, in cleansing himself, O son of Pandu, of all his sinful deeds.

19 That Vaishya who divides the produce of his fields into six equal parts and makes a gift of one of those shares to Brahmanas, succeeds by such conduct in cleansing himself from every sin.

20 That Shudra who, acquiring food by hard labour and at the risk of life itself, makes a gift of it to Brahmanas, becomes purged off of every sin

21. That man who, by dint of his physical strength, acquires food without doing any act of injury to any creature, and makes gift of it to Brahmanas, succeeds in avoiding all calamities.

22 A person by cheerfully making gifts of food acquired by fair means to Brahmanas pre eminent for Vedic learning, becomes purged off of all his sins.

23 By treading in the path of the pious, one becomes freed from all sins A person by making gifts of such food as creates great energy, becomes himself endued with great energy.

24 The path made by charitable persons, is always trod by the wise They who make gifts of food, are considered as givers of life The merit they acquire by such gifts, is eternal

25 Hence, a person should, under all circumstances seek to acquire food by fair means, and having got it to make always gifts of it to worthy men Food is the great support of living creatures.

26 By making gifts of food, one has never to go to Hell. Hence, one should always make gifts of food, having got it by fair means.

27. The house-holder should always try to eat after having made a gift of food to a Brahmana Every man should make the day fruitful by making gifts of food.

28—29 A person by feeding, O king, a thousand Brahmanas who are all conversant with duties and the scriptures and the sacred histories, has not to go to Hell and to return to this world for going through re-births. Gifted with the fruition of every desire, he enjoys great happiness in the next world.

30. Gifted with such merit, he sports in happiness, freed from every anxiety, possessed of personal beauty and great fame and endued with wealth.

31 I have thus told you all about the great merit of gifts of food This is the root of all virtue and merit, as also of all gifts, O Bharata.

CHAPTER CXIII.

(ANUSHASANIKA PARVA) — Continued.

Yudhishthira said :—

1. Which amongst these is more efficacious to a person, namely, abstention from injury, the observance of the Vedic ritual, meditation, control over the senses, penances and obedient services rendered to the preceptors.

Vrihaspati said —

2 All these six are meritorious. They are different doors of virtue I shall discourse upon them now Do you listen to them, O chief of the Bharatas!

3 I shall tell you what forms the highest good of a human being. That man who practises the religion of universal mercy, acquires his highest good

4 That man who keeps under restraint the three passions, viz, lust, anger and avarice by throwing them upon all creatures, acquires success

5 He who for his own happiness, kills other innocent creatures with the rod of punishment, never acquires happiness in the next world

6 That man who considers all creatures as his own self, and treats them as his own self, laying aside the rod of punishment and completely controlling his anger, succeeds in acquiring happiness

7 The very celestials who are desirous of a fixed habitation become stupefied in ascertaining the road of that person who forms himself the soul of all creatures and considers them all as his own self, for such a person leaves no track behind.

8 One should never do that to another which he considers as injurious to his own self. This, in brief, is the rule of virtue. One by acting in a different way by giving way to desire, becomes guilty of sin.

9 In refusing and giving, in weal and woe, in the agreeable and the disagreeable, one should judge of their effects by considering his own self.

10. When one injures another, the injured in return injures the injurer. Likewise when one cherishes another, that other cherishes the cherisher One should form his own rule of conduct according to this I have told you what virtue is even by this subtile way.

11. The preceptor of the celestials endued with great intelligence, having said this to king Yudhishthira the just ascended upwards for proceeding to the celestial region before our eyes.

CHAPTER CXIV.

Vaishampayana said .—

1. After this, king, Yudhishthira gifted with great energy, and the foremost of eloquent men, addressed his grandfather lying on his bed of arrows, in the following words

Yudhishthira said :—

2 O you of great intelligence, the Rishis and Brahmanas and the celestials led by the authority of the Vedas, all speak highly of the religion of mercy

3 But, O king, what I ask you is this: how does a man who has perpetrated acts of injury to others in word thought and deed, succeed in purifying himself from misery.

Bhishma said :—

4 Brahmavadins have said that there are four kinds of mercy or abstention from injury If even one of those four kinds be not observed the religion of mercy, it is said, is not observed

5 As all quadruped animals are incapable of standing on three legs so the religion of mercy cannot stand if any of those four divisions or parts be wanting.

6—7 As the foot prints of all other animals are sunk in those of the elephant, so all other religions are said to be contained in that of mercy A person becomes guilty of injury through acts, words, and thoughts.

8 Discarding it mentally in the beginning, one should next discard it in word and thought. He who, according to this rule, abstains from eating meat is said to be purified in a three fold way.

9 It is heard that ||Brahmavadins point out three causes (for the sin of eating meat) That sin may attach to the mind to words, and to deeds

10 It is, therefore, that wise men who are gifted with penances refrain from eating meat. Listen to me O king, as I tell you what the faults are which attach to the eating of meat.

11. The meat of other animals is like the flesh of one's son That foolish person, stupefied] by folly, ¶who eats meat is considered as the vilest of human beings

12. The union of father and mother produces children Similarly the cruelty that a helpless and sinful wretch commits, produces its progeny of repeated re-births fraught with great misery.

13 As the tongue is the cause of sensation of taste, so, the scriptures declare, attachment proceeds from taste.

14. Well dressed, cooked with salt or without salt, meat, in whatever form one may take it, by and by attracts the mind and enslaves it.

15. How will those foolish men who live upon meat succeed in listening to the sweet music of celestial drums and cymbals and lyres and harps?

16 They who eat meat highly speak of it, allowing themselves to be stupefied by its taste which they declare to be something inconceivable, undescriable, and unimaginable.

17. Such praise even of meat is sinful Formerly, many pious men by giving the flesh of their own bodies protected the flesh of other creatures and as a result of such deeds of merit, have proceeded to the celestial region.

18 In this way, O king, the religion of mercy is surrounded by four considerations I have thus declared to you that religion which contains all other religions within it.

CHAPTER CXV.

Yudhishthira said:—

1 You have told it many times that abstention from injury is the highest Religion. In Shraddhas, however, that are performed in honour of the departed Manes, persons for their own behoof, should make offerings of various kinds of meat.

2 You have said so while discoursing formerly upon the ordinances about Shraddhas How can meat, however, be procured without killing a living creature? Your declarations therefore, appear to me to be contradictory.

3 A doubt has, therefore, sprung in our mind about the duty of abstaining from meat. What are the sins that one commits by eating meat, and what are the merits that one acquires?

4 What are the demerits of him who eats meat by himself slaying a living creature? What are the merits of him who eats the meat of animals, slain by others? What the merits or demerits of him who kills a living creature for another? Or of him who eats meat buying it of others?

5 I wish O sinless one, that you should describe to me this subject in full I wish to ascertain this eternal Religion with certainty.

6 How does one acquire longevity? How does one acquire strength? How does one acquire faultlessness of limbs? Indeed, how does one become gifted with excellent marks?

Bhishma said:—

7 Listen to me, O scion of Kuru's race what the merit is of abstention from meat Listen to me as I declare to you what the excellent ordinances, in sooth, are on this subject.

8 Those great men who desire beauty, faultlessness of limbs, long life, understanding, mental and physical strength, and memory, should abstain from acts of injury

9. Numberless discourses took place, between the Rishis, on this subject, O scion of Kuru's race Listen, O Yudhishthira, what their opinion was.

10 The merit acquired by that person, O Yudhishthira, who, with the steadiness of a vow, worships the celestials every month (1 Horse sacrifices is equal to him who discards honey and meat.

11. The highly wise seven celestial Rishis the Valakshillyas, and those Rishsi, who drink the rays of the sun, all speak highly of abstention from meat.

12 The Self create Manu has said that man who does not eat meat, or who does not kill living creatures, or who does not cause them to be killed, is a friend of all creatures

13 Such a man is incapable of being oppressed by any creature He enjoys the confidence of all living beings He always enjoys, besides, the praise of the pious

14 The virtuous Narada has said that that man who wishes to multiply his own flesh by eating the flesh of other creatures, meet with disaster.

15 Vrihaspati has said that that man who abstains from honey and meat, gains the merit of gifts and sacrifices and penances.

16 In my view, these two persons are equal, viz, he who worships the celestials every month in a Horse sacrifice for a century and he who abstains from honey and meat.

17 On account of abstention from meat, one is considered as one who always worships the celestials in sacrifices or as one who always makes gifts to others or as one who always practises the severest austerities

18 That man who having eaten meat, gives it up afterwards, wins merit by such a deed that is so great that a study of all the Vedas or a performance, O Bharata of all the sacrifices, cannot give its like

19 It is very difficult to abstain from meat after one has known it staste Indeed it is extremely difficult for such a person to observe the great vow abstention from meat, a vow that assures every creature by removing all fear.

20 That learned person who gives to all living creatures the gift of complete assurance, is forsooth regarded as the giver of life breaths in this world

21. This is the high Religion which wise men esteem very highly The vital airs of other creatures are as dear to them as those of his own self

22 Men gifted with intelligence and purified souls should always treat others as they themselves wish to be treated

23 It is seen that even those men who are endued with learning and who seek to acquire the greatest good in the shape of Liberation, are not free from the fear of death.

23 What necessity there be said o those innocent and healthy creatures gifted with love of life, when they are sought to be killed by sinful wretches living by slaughter?

24 Therefore, O king, know that the discarding of meat is the highest refuge of Religion, of the celestial region, and of happiness.

25 Abstention from injury is the highest Religion. It is, again, the highest penance It is also the highest truth from which all duty emanates.

26 Flesh cannot be had from grass or wood or stone Unless a living creature is killed, it cannot be procured Hence is the fault in eating flesh.

27 The celestials, who live upon Swaha, Swadha, and nectar, are given to truth and sincerity Those persons however, who are for satisfying the sensation of taste, should be known as Rakshasas pervaded by the quality of Darkness

28—29 That man who abstainsf from meat is never put in fear, O king by any creature wherever he may be viz, in terrible forest or inaccessible fastnesses, by day or by night, or at the two twilights in the open squares of towns or in conclaves of men, from upraised weapons or in places where there is great frigit from wild animals or snakes.

30 All creatures seek his protection. He is trusted by all He never causes any anxiety in others, and himself has never to become anxious

31 If there were nobody who ate flesh there would then be nobody to slay living creatures The man who slays living creatures kills them for the sake of the person who eats flesh

32 If flesh were not considered as food there would then be no destruction of living creatures It is for the sake of the eater that the destruction of living creatures is carried on in the world

33 Since O you of great splendour, the period of life is shortened of persons who kill living creatures or cause them to be killed it is clear that the person who seeks his own behoof, should give up meat altogether.

34 Those dreadful persons who are engaged in the destruction of living creatures never find protectors when they are in need Such persons should always be molested and punished even as beasts of prey

35 Through cupidity or stupefaction of sense, for the sake of strength and energy, or through association with the sinful, men show tendency for committing sin.

36 That man who seeks to multiply his own flesh by (eating) the flesh of others has to live in this world in great anxiety and after death has to take birth in indifferent races and families

37. High Rishis given to the observance of vows and self control have said that abstention from meat is worthy of praise, productive of fame and Heaven, and a great satisfaction itself.

38. This I heard formerly, O son of Kunti, from Markandeya when that Rishi discoursed on the sins of eating flesh.

39 He who eats the flesh of animals are who desirous of living but who have been slain by either himself or others commits the sin of slaughter for his this act of cruelty

40 He who purchases flesh, kills living creatures through his money He who eats flesh, kills living creatures through such act of eating He who binds or seizes and actually kills living creatures is the slaughterer. These are the three sorts of slaughter, each of these three acts being so.

41 He who does not himself eat flesh but approves of an act of slaughter, becomes stained with the sin of slaughter.

42 By abstaining from meat and showing mercy to all creatures one becomes incapable of being molested by any creature, and acquires longevity, perfect health and happiness

43 The merit won by abstaining from meat we have heard is superior to that of one who makes presents of gold, of kine, and of land.

44 One should never eat meat of animals not dedicated in sacrifices and that are, therefore, killed uselessly, and that has not been offered to the gods and departed Manes with the help of the ordinances There is not the least doubt that a person by eating such meat goes to Hell.

45 If one eats the meat that has been sanctified on account of its having been procured from animals dedicated in sacrifices and that have been killed for the purpose of feeding Brahmanas, one incurs a little fault By behaving otherwise, one becomes stained with sin.

46. That wretched man who kills living creatures for the sake of those who would eat them, commits great sin. The eater's sin is not so great.

47. That wretched man who following the path of religious rites and sacrifices laid down in the Vedas, would kill a living creature from desire of eating its flesh, would certainly go to Hell.

48 That man who having eaten flesh abstains from it afterwards, acquires great merit on account of such abstention from sin

49 He who arranges for obtaining flesh he who approves of those arrangements, he who kills, he who buys or sells, he who cooks, and he who eats, are all considered as eaters of flesh

50 I shall now cite another authority, depending upon the saying of the ordainer himself, that is ancient, worshipped by the Rishis, and established in the Vedas.

51. It has been said that that religion which has acts for its marks, has been ordained for house holders, O chief of kings, and not for those men who are desirous of Liberation.

52 Manu himself has said that meat which is sanctified with Mantras and properly dedicated, according to the ordinances of the Vedas, in rites performed in honor of the departed Manes,—is pure.

53—54 All other meat is useless slaughter, and is, therefore, inedible, and leads to Hell and infamy. One should never eat, O chief of Bharata's race, like a Rakshasa, any meat that has been procured by means not sanctioned by the ordinance. Indeed, one should never eat flesh obtained from useless destruction and that has not been sanctified by the ordinance

55 That man who wishes to avoid disaster should abstain from the meat of every living creature

56 It is heard that in the former Æon persons desirous of acquiring regions of merit hereafter, celebrated sacrifices with seeds regarding such animals as dedicated by them

57. Doubtful about the propriety of eating flesh, the Rishis asked Vasu the king of the Chedis, for removing their doubt King Vasu knowing that flesh should not be taken, answered that it was edible, O king.

58 From that moment Vasu dropped down from the sky on the Earth. After this he once more repeated his opinion, with the result that he had to go down below the Earth for it.

59 Desirous of doing good to all men, the great Agastya by the help of his penances ded cated, once for all, all wild deer to the celestials.

60 Hence there is no longer any necessity of purifying those animals for offering them to the celestials and the departed Manes Served with flesh according to the ordinance, the departed Manes become pleased.

61. Listen to me, O king of kings, as I tell you this, O sinless one There is absolute happiness in abstaining from meat, O king.

62. He who practises severe austerities for a century, and he who abstains from meat, are both equally meritorious. This is my opinion.

63. In the light half of the month of Kartika in especial, one should abstain from honey and meat It has been ordained, that there is great merit in it.

64. He who abstains from meat for the four months of the rainy season, acquires the blessed achievements, viz , longevity, fame, and power.

65 He who abstains for the whole month of Kartika from meat of every kind, gets over all sorts of woe and lives in complete happiness

66 They who abstain from flesh by either months or fortnights have the region of Brahma ordained for them on account of their abstention from cruelty.

67 Formerly many kings, O son of Pritha, who had formed themselves the souls of all creatures and who has known the truths of all things, viz , Soul and Not-Soul had abstained from flesh either for the whole of the month of Kartika or for the whole of the light fortnight in that month.

68—70 They were Nabhaga, Amvarisha the great Gaya, Ayu, Anaranya, and Dwilipa, Raghu, Puru, Kartavirya, Amruddha, Nahusha, Yayati, Nriga Vishwaksena, Shasavindu Yuvanashwa, Shivi the son of Ushinara, Muchukunda, Mandhatri, and Harischandra

71. Do you always speak the truth Never speak an untruth Truth is an eternal duty. It is by truth that Harischandra roves through the sky like a second Moon

72—77. These other kings also, viz , Shyenachitra, O monarch, and Somaka, Vrika, Raivata Rantideva, Vasu, Srinjaya, Dushmanta, Karushima, Rama, Alarka, Nala, Virupashwa, Nimi, intelligent Janaka, Aila, Prithu, Virasena, Ikshaku, Shambhu, Shweta, Sagara, Aja, Dhundhu, Subahu, Haryyashwa, Kashupa and Bharata, O monarch, did not eat flesh for the month of Kartika, and, therefore, attained to the celestial region, and gifted with prosperity, blaze forth with effulgence in the region of Brahmana, worshipped by Gandharvas and surrounded by a thousand, beautiful ladies.

78 Those great men who practise this excellent Religion which is marked out by abstention from injury, succeed in living in the celestial region.

79 Those pious men who, from the time of birth, abstain from honey and meat and wine, are considered as ascetics.

80 That man who practises this religion consisting of abstention from meat or who recites it for making others hear it, will never have to go to Hell, even if he be a great wicked man.

81—82 He, O king, who always reads these ordinances about abstention from meat that are sacred and worshipped by the Rishis, or hears it read, becomes purged off of every sin and acquires great happiness on account of the fruition of every desire Forsooth, he acquires an eminent position among kinsmen.

83 When afflicted with calamity, he immediately gets over it. When obstructed with obstacles, he succeeds in freeing himself from them with the utmost ease. When suffering from a disease he becomes quickly cured, and afflicted with sorrow he becomes liberated from it with greatest ease.

84 Such a man has never to take birth in the intermediate order of animals or birds Born in the order of men, he attains to great personal beauty Gifted with great prosperity, O chief of Kuru's race, he acquires great fame as well.

85 I have thus told you, O king, all that should be said about the subject of abstention from meat, together with the ordinances about both the religion of action and inaction as framed by the Rishis.

CHAPTER CXVI.

(ANUSHASANIKA PARVA)—Continued.

Yudhishthira said:—

1. Alas, those cruel men, who not caring for various other sorts of food, want only flesh, are really like great Rakshasas.

2 Alas, they do not relish various kinds of cakes and diverse sorts of pot-herbs and various species of Khanda with juicy flavour so much as they do flesh

3 I cannot understand this at all I think they feel that there is nothing so tasteful as meat

4 I wish, therefore, O powerful one, to hear what the merits are of abstention from flesh and the sin about the eating of flesh, O chief of Bharata's race

5 You know every duty Describe to me, in full, according to the ordinances on duty, this subject. Do tell me what, indeed, is edible and what inedible?

6 Tell me, O grandfather, what is flesh, of what substances it is, the merits of abstention from it, and the sins for eating meat.

Bhishma said —

7 O mighty-armed one, what you say is true! There is nothing on Earth that is superior to meat in taste

8. There is nothing that is more beneficial than meat to persons who are lean, or weak, or afflicted with disease, or addicted to sexual union or exhausted with travel.

9 Meat quickly increases strength. It ordains great development. There is no food, O scorcher of enemies, that is superior to meat.

10. But, O delighter of the Kurus, those who abstain from it, win great merits. Listen to me as I describe it to you.

11. That man who wishes to increase his own flesh by the meat of another living creature, is such that there is none meaner and more cruel than he.

12 In this world there is nothing that is dearer to a creature than his life Hence, one should show mercy to the lives of others as he does to his own life

13 Forsooth, O son, flesh has its origin in the vital seed There is great sin attaching to its eating, as, indeed, there is merit in abstaining from it.

14 One does not, however, commit any sin by eating flesh sanctified according to the ordinances of the Vedas The Shruti says that animals were created for sacrifice, They who eat flesh in any other way are said to follow the Rakshasa practice

15 Listen to me as I tell you what the ordinance is for the Kshatriyas They do not commit any sin by eating flesh that has been acquired by power.

16 All wild deer have been dedicated to the celestials and the departed Manes in days of old, O king, by Agastya Hence, the hurting of deer is not censured.

17. There can be no hunting without risk of one's own life. There is equality of risk between the killer and the killed Either the animal is killed or it kills the hunter.

18 Hence, O Bharata, even royal sages take to hunting By such conduct they do not become stained with sin. Indeed, the practice is not considered sinful

19 There is nothing, O delighter of the Kurus, that is equal in point of merit, either in this world or in the next, to the practice of mercy to all living creatures.

20 The merciful man has no fear. Those innocent men who are endued with mercy, have both this world and the next.

21. Persons conversant with duty say that that Religion is worthy of being called Religion which is characterised by abstention from cruelty. The man of purified soul should do only such acts as have mercy for their soul

22 That flesh which is dedicated in sacrifices performed in honour of the deities and the departed Manes is called Havi That man who is given to mercy and who behaves with mercy towards others, has no fear to entertain from any creature.

23—24 It is heard that all creatures abstain from causing any fear to such a creature All creatures protect him when he is wounded or fallen down or prostrated or weakened or bruised Indeed they do so, under all circumstances, whether he is on even or uneven ground Neither snakes nor wild animals neither Pishachas nor Rakshasas, ever kill him.

25 When circumstances of fear originate, he becomes freed from fear who frees others from situations of fear. There has never been, nor will there ever be, a gift which is superior to the gift of life.

26 It is certain that there is nothing dearer to oneself than his life. Death, O Bharata, is a disaster to all creatures.

27—29 When the time comes for Death, a trembling of the entire body is seen in all creatures Undergoing birth in the uterus, decrepitude and sufferings of all sorts in this ocean of the world, living creatures may be seen to be continually going forward and coming back Every creature is afflicted by Death While living in the uterus, all creatures are cooked in the fluid juices, that are alkaline and sour and bitter, of urine and phlegm and faeces,—juices which produce painful sensations and are difficult to bear There in the uterus, they have to live in a state of helplessness and are even repeatedly torn and pierced

30 They who are covetuous of meat, are seen to be repeatedly cooked in the uterus in such a state of helplessness. Going through all sorts of birth, they are cooked in the Hell called Kumbhipaka

31. They are assailed and killed, and in this way have to travel again and again There is nothing so dear to one as his life when one comes to this world

32—35 Hence, a person of purified soul should be merciful to all living creatures That man, O king, who abstains from every kind of meat from his birth, forsooth, acquires a large space in the celestial region They who eat the flesh of animals who are desirous of life, are themselves eaten by the animals they eat This is my opinion Since he has eaten me, I shall eat him in return, this, O Bharata, forms the character as Mansa of Mansa The destroyer is always slain After him the eater meets with the same fate

36—37 He who acts with hostility towards another, becomes the victim of similar deeds done by that other. Whatever acts one does in whatever bodies, he has to suffer the consequences thereof in those bodies Abstention from cruelty is the highest Religion Abstention from cruelty is the greatest self-restraint.

38. Abstention from cruelty is the highest gift Abstention from cruelty is the highest penance Abstention from cruelty is the highest sacrifice. Abstention from cruelty is the highest power.

39 Abstention from cruelty is the greatest friend Abstention from cruelty is the greatest happiness Abstention from cruelty is the highest truth Abstention from cruelty is the highest Shruti

40 Gifts made in all sacrifices, ablutions performed in all sacred waters, and the merit which one acquires from making all kinds of gifts mentioned in the scriptures,—all these do not equal abstention from cruelty in merit.

41. The penances of a man who abstains from cruelty are endless The man who abstains from cruelty is considered as always performing sacrifices. The man who abstains from cruelty is the father and mother of all creatures

42 Even these, O chief of Kuru's race, are some of the merits of abstention from cruelty. Altogether, the merits of it are so many that they are incapable of being exhausted even if one were to speak for a century.

CHAPTER CXVII.

(ANUSHASANIKA PARVA).—Continued.

Yudhishthira said —

1. Wishing to die and wishing to live, many persons surrender their lives in the great sacrifice (of battle) Tell me, O grandfather, what is the end that these attain to

2—3 To give up life in battle is fraught with sorrow for men O you of great wisdom, you know that to give up life is difficult for men whether they are rich or poor, or are in happiness or misery In my opinion, you are gifted with omniscience Do you tell me the reason of this.

Bhishma said:—

4 In prosperity or adversity, in weal or woe, living creatures, O king, coming into this world, live according to a particular method

5 Listen to me as I explain the reason to you The question you have put to me, is, indeed, excellent, O Yudhishthira!

6 Regarding it, O king, I shall explain to you the old discourse that took place formerly between the Dwaipayana Rishi and a crawling worm

7. Formerly when that learned Brahmana, viz, the Krishna Dwaipayana, having identified himself with Brahma, roamed over the world, he saw on a road over which cars used to pass, a worm moving quickly

8 The Rishi knew the course of every creature and the language of every animal Gifted with omniscience, he addressed the worm he saw in these words.

Vyasa said —

9 O worm, you appear to be greatly alarmed, and to be in great haste. Tell me, where do you run, and whence have you been afraid?

The worm said .—

10. I am stricken with fear on hearing the rattle of that large car. O you of great intelligence, it makes a fearful roar. It is almost come.

11. The sound is heard Will it not kill me? I am flying away for this. I hear the sound of the bulls.

12. They are breathing hard under the whip of the driver, as they are carrying the heavy load. I hear also the various sound made by the men who are driving the bulls.

merit from desire of fruit. The very accomplishments that one seeks to acquire are sought from desire of the happiness they will produce.

5 Learned or ignorant (in a previous existence) the creature that is, in this life, shorn of speech and understanding and hands and feet, is really shorn of everything

6 He who becomes a superior Brahmana worships while alive, the deities of the Sun and the Moon, uttering various sacred Mantras O worm, you will come by that state of existence

7. Acquiring that status, you will enjoy all the elements converted into articles of enjoyment When you have acquired that state, I shall impart to you Brahma Or, if you wish, I may place you in any other status.

8. Agreeing to the words of Vyasa, the worm did not leave the road, but remained on it. Meawhile, the large car which was coming in that direction came there

9—11. Torn to pieces by the assault of the wheels, the worm died Born at last in the Kshatriya order through the grace of Vyasa of immeasurable power, he proceeded to see the great Rishi He had, before becoming a Kshatriya, to pass through various orders of birth, such as hedge hog and Iguana and boar and deer and bird, and Chandala and Shudra and Vaishya Having given an account of his various changes to the truth-telling Rishi, and remembering the Rishi's kindness for him, the worm (now with joined hands fell at the Rishi's feet and touched them with his head

12 My present status is that great one which is coveted by all and which only persons having ten well known attributes, can get Indeed, I who was formerly a worm have thus acquired the status of a prince.

13 Elephants of great strength decked with golden chains carry me on their backs. To my cars are yoked Kamvoja horses of high mettle

14 Numerous cars to which are attached camels and mules bear me. With all my relatives and friends I now eat food rich with meat.

15 Adored by all, I sleep, O highly blessed one, on rich beds in charming rooms to which disagreeable winds cannot blow.

16. Towards the dawn, bards and encomiasts sing my praises even as the deities utter the agreeable praises of Indra their chief.

17. Through your favour who are firm in truth and gifted with immeasurable energy, I who was before a worm have now become a Kshatriya

18 I bow my head to you, O you of great wisdom Do you command me as to what I should now do Ordained by the power of your penances, I have come by this position

Vyasa said :—

19 I have to-day been adored by you, O king, with various words expressive of respect Changed into a worm, your memory had become clouded That memory has again appeared.

20 The sin you had committed in a pristine life, has not yet been dissipated — that sin, viz which was acquired by you while you were a Shudra covetous of riches and cruel in conduct and hostile to the Brahmanas

21—22 You were able to obtain a sight of my body That was an act of merit to you while you were a worm On account of your having saluted and worshipped me, you shall rise higher, for, from the Kshatriya order you shall rise to the status of a Brahmana, if only you die on the field of battle for the sake of kine or Brahmanas

23 O prince, enjoying much happiness and celebrating many sacrifices with profuse presents, you shall attain to Heaven and, changed into eternal Brahma, you shall enjoy perfect beatitude.

24. Those who take birth in the intermediate order, become Shudras The Shudra rises to the status of the Vaishya; and the Vaishya to that of the Kshatriya The Kshytriya who takes a pride in the discharge of the duties of his caste, succeeds in acquiring the status of a Brahmana. The Brahmana, by following a righteous conduct, acquires Heaven which is full of happiness.

CHAPTER CXIX.

(ANUSHASANIKA PARVA)—

Continued

Bhishma said —

1 Having renounced the status of a worm and taken birth as a Kshatriya of great energy, the person remembering his previous changes, O monarch, began to practise severe austerities.

2 Seeing those severe austerities of the Kshatriya who was well conversant with Religion and Profit Krishna-Dwaipayana, that foremost of Brahmanas, went to him.

Vyasa said:—

3 The penances, O worm, of the Kshatriyas consist of the protection of all creatures. Consider these duties of the Kshatriya to be the penances laid down for you. You shall come by the status of a Brahmana.

4 Ascertaining what is right and what is wrong, and purifying your soul, do you duly cherish and protect all creatures, judiciously satisfying all good desires and correcting all that is unholy.

5 Be you of purified soul, be contented and be devoted to the practice of virtue. Acting thus, you will then, when you die, become a Brahmana.

Bhishma said:—

6 Although he had retired into the forest, yet, O Yudhishthira, having heard the words of the great Rishi, he began to cherish and protect his subjects righteously.

7. Soon, O best of kings, that worm, on account of the duty of protecting his subjects, became a Brahmana after renouncing his Kshatriya body.

8. Seeing him changed into a Brahmana, the celebrated Rishi, viz, Krishna-Dwaipayana of great wisdom came to him.

Vyasa said:—

9. O chief of Brahmanas, O blessed one, be not troubled. He who acts piously, comes by a respectable birth. He, on the other hand, who acts impiously comes by a low and vile birth. O you who are conversant with virtue, one attains to misery according to the measure of his sin.

10 Therefore, O worm, do not be troubled through fear of death. The only fear you should entertain, is about the loss of virtue. Do you therefore go on practising virtue.

The worm said:—

11. Through your favour, O Holy One, I have attained from happy to happier positions! Having obtained such prosperity as is established in virtue, I think my demerits have been lost.

Bhishma said:—

12. The worm having, at the command of the holy Rishi, acquired the status of a Brahmana that is so difficult to attain caused the Earth to be marked with a thousand sacrificial stakes.

13 That foremost of all persons conversant with Brahma then gained a residence in the region of Brahman himself. Indeed, O son of Pritha, the worm acquired the highest status viz, that of eternal Brahma, as the result of his own deeds done according to the counsels of Vyasa.

14 Those foremost of Kshatriyas, also, who have renounced their life breaths, exerting their energy all the while, have all acquired a meritorious end. Therefore, O king, do not mourn on their account.

CHAPTER CXX.

(ANUSHASANIKA PARVA)—Continued.

Yudhishthira said:—

1. Which amongst these three is superior, viz, Knowledge, Penances, and Gifts? I ask you, O foremost of pious men. Tell me this, O grandfather.

Bhishma said:—

2. Regarding it is cited the old conversation between Maitreya and Krishna-Dwaipayana.

3 Once on a time, Krishna Dwaipayana, O king, while wandering over the world in disguise, proceeded to Baranasi and waited upon Maitreya who belonged by birth to a race of ascetics.

4 Seeing Vyasa arrive, that foremost of Rishis, viz, Maitreya, gave him a seat and after adoring him with due rites, entertained him with excellent food.

5 Having eaten that good food which was very wholesome and which gave every kind of gratification, the great Krishna became highly pleased and as he sat there, he even laughed aloud.

6 Seeing Krishna laugh, Maitreya addressed him, saying,—Tell me, O Righteous Souled One, what the reason is of your laughter? You are an ascetic, gifted with power to control your emotions. Great joy, it appears has come over you.

7. Saluting you and adoring you with bent head, I ask you thus, viz, what the power is of my penances and what the high blessedness is that is yours.

8 The acts I do, are different from those of yours. You are already emancipated though alive. I, however, am not yet freed. For all that, I think that there is not much difference between you and me. I am, again, distinguished by birth.

Vyasa said:—

9 This wonder that has filled me has originated from an ordinance which appears like a hyperbole, for the comprehension of of the people The declaration of the Vedas seems to be untrue But why should the Vedas say an untruth?

10. It has been said that there are three roads which form the best vows of a man One should never injure, one should always tell the truth, and one should make gift.

11. The Rishis of old said this, following the ordinances laid down in the Vedas These injunctions of yore, should certainly be followed by us even in our times

12. Even a small gift, made under the circumstances laid down, yields great fruits You have given a little water with a sincere heart to a thirsty man.

13 Yourself thirsty and hungry, you have by giving me such food, conquered many high regions of happiness O powerful one, as one does by many sacrifices.

14. I am greatly delighted with your very sacred gift, as also with your penances Your power is that of virtue Your appearance is that of virtue.

15—16 The fragrance of virtue, is about you. I think that all your acts are performed according to the ordinance. O son, gift is superior to ablutions in sacred waters and to the accomplishment of all Vedic vows Indeed, O Brahmana, gift is more auspicious than all religious rites If it be not more meritorious than all religion rites there can be no question about its superiority.

17. All those rites laid down in the Vedas which you highly speak of, do not equal a gift, for, gift is undoubtedly fraught with very superior merit.

18. The road that has been made by those men, who make gifts is the road that is trodden by the wise They who make gifs are considered as givers of even the life breaths The duties that form virtue are established in them

19. As the Vedas when well-studied, as the controlling of the senses, as a life of universal Renunciation, so is Gift which is fraught with very superior merit

20. You, O son, will rise from joy to greater joy (for performing the duty of making gifts) The intelligent man certainly rises from joy to greater joy.

21. We have undoubtedly seen many instances of this. Men gifted with prosperity succeed in acquiring riches, making gifts, celebrating sacrifices, and acquiring happiness as the result thereof

22. It is always observed, O you of great wisdom to happen naturally that happiness is followed by misery, and misery is followed by happiness.

23 Wise men have said that human beings in this world have three kinds of conduct Some are righteous, some are sinful, and some are neither righteous nor sinful.

24 The conduct of the person who is devoted to Brahma is not considered either way. His sins are never considered as sins. So also the man who is devoted to the duties laid down for him, is considered as neither pious nor sinful.

25 Those men who are devoted to sacrifices, gifts, and penances, are considered as pious These, however, who injure other creatures and are unfriendly to them, are considered sinful

26 There are some men who appropriate others' properties. These certainly fall into Hell and meet with misery All other acts that men do are indifferent, being considered as neither righteous nor sinful.

27. Do you sport and grow and rejoice and make gifts and celebrate sacrifices. Neither men of knowledge nor those gifted with penances will then be able to get the better of you.

CHAPTER CXXI.

(ANUSHASANIKA PARVA)—

Continued.

Bhishma said:—

1. Thus addressed by Vyasa, Maitreya, who was a worshipper of deeds, who had been born in a family gifted with great prosperity, who was wise and endued with great learning, said to him these words.

Maitreya said:—

2. O you of great wisdom, it is what you have said. O powerful one, with your permission I wish to say something.

Vyasa said:—

3 Whatever you wish to say, O Maitreya in what way so even, do you say, O man of great wisdom, for I wish to hear you.

Maitreya said:—

4 Your words on the subject of Gift are faultless and pure. Forsooth, your soul has been purified by knowledge and penances

5 On account of your soul being purified, even this is the great advantage I reap from it With the help of my understanding I see that you are gifted with high penances.

6 As regards ourselves we succeed in acquiring prosperity through only seeing personages like you I think, that is due to your favour and originates from the nature of my own acts

7. Penances, knowledge of the Vedas, and birth in a pure family, these are the causes of the status which one acquires of a Brahmana When one is possessed of these three qualities, then does he come to be called a twice born person

8. If the Brahmana be pleased, the departed Manes and the deities also are pleased There is nothing superior to a Brahmana possessed of Vedic learning.

9 Without the Brahmana all would be darkness Nothing would be known The four castes would not exist The distinction between virtue and sin, Truth and Untruth, would disappear.

10 Men, when they sow on a well cultivated field, reap an abundant harvest Even so, one reaps great merit by making gifts to a Brahmana endued with great learning.

11. If there were no Brahmana gifted with Vedic learning and good conduct for accepting gifts, the wealth possessed by rich men would be useless.

12. The ignorant Brahmana, by eating the food that is offered to him, destroys what he eats The food also that is eaten destroys the eater. That is called food which is given away to a worthy man in all other cases he who takes it, makes the donor's gift thrown away and the receiver is likewise ruined for his unduly taking it

13 The Brahmana endued with learning, becomes the subjugator of the food that he eats Having eaten it he begets other other food The ignorant man who eats the food offered to him, loses his right to the children he procreates, for the latter become his whose food has enabled the progenitor to beget them. This is the shortcoming of persons eating other people's food when they have not the power to conquer that food.

14 The merit which the giver wins by making the gift is equal to what the taker acquires by accepting the food Both the giver and the taker depend equally upon each other. This is what the Rishis have said.

15 There where Brahmans exist, gifted with Vedic learning and conduct, people are enabled to acquire the sacred fruits of gifts and to enjoy them both in this world and the next.

16 Those men who are of pure birth, who are devoted to penances, and who make gifts and study the Vedas, are considered as worthy of the most respectful adoration.

17 It is those good men who have chalked out the path by treading on which one does not become stupefied It is those men who take others to the celestial region. They are the men who carry on their shoulders the burthen of Sacrifices and live for good

CHAPTER CXXII.

Bhisma said —

1. Thus addressed, the Holy One replied to Maitreya, saying,—By good luck, you are gifted with knowledge By good luck, your understading is of this kind

2. Good men highly speak of righteous qualities By your good luck you are not overwhelmed by personal beauty, youth and prosperity.

3 This favour done to you is due to kindness of the celestials. Listen to me, as I describe to you what is even superior to gift.

4 All scriptures, religious treatises, and rites that are seen in the world, have all originated from the Vedas, according to their due order.

5 Following them I highly speak of gift. You highly speak of penances and Vedic learning. Penances are sacred. Penances are the means by which one may acquire the Vedas and the celestial region.

6 With the help of penances and of knowledge one acquires the highest fruits. It is by penances that one dissipates his sins and all else that is evil.

7. We have heard that with whatever purpose in view one performs penances, one acquires the fruition thereof on account of those penances. The same may be said of knowledge

8 Whatever is difficult to do, whatever is difficult to conquer, whatever is difficult to attain and whatever is difficult to cross, can all be done with the help of penances. Of all things, penances are of very superior power

9 The man who drinks alcohol, or he who takes forcibly other men's properties, or he who is guilty of fœticide, or he who violates the bed of his preceptor, succeeds in crossing with the help of penances Indeed, one becomes purged off of all these sins through penances

10 One gifted with all knowledge and, therefore, having true vision, and an ascetic of whatever kind are equal One should always bow to these two

11. All men who have the Vedas for their wealth should be adored Likewise all men gifted with penances deserve to be adored They who make gifts get happiness in the next world and much prosperity in this world

12 By making gifts of food, righteous men of this world obtain both this world and that of Brahman himself with many other regions of superior happiness

13 Those men who are worshipped by all, themselves worship him who makes gifts Those men who are honored everywhere, themselves honor him who makes gifts Wherever the giver goes, he hears himself his own praise

14 He who does acts and he who omits to do them, gets each what is proportionate to his acts and omissions. Whether one lives in the upper regions or in the nether, one always acquires those places to which one becomes entitled by his deeds.

15 As regards yourself, you will certainly obtain whatever food and drink you may covet, for you are gifted with intelligence, good birth, Vedic learning and mercy

16 You are possessed of youth, O Maitreya! You are observant of vows Be devoted to virtue. Do you take instructions from me about those duties which you should first follow,—the duties, viz, of householders.

17. That house in which the husband is pleased with his married wife and the wife pleased with her husband, all auspicious results ensue.

18 As filth is washed away from the body with water, as darkness is removed by the light of fire so is sin washed off by gifts and penances

19. Bless you O Maitreya, may you have palaces! I depart hence in peace. Do you remember what I have said You shall then be able to reap many advantages!

20 Maitreya then walked round his illustrious guest and bowed his head to him, and joining his hands in respect, said,—Let blessing be to you also, O Holy One!

CHAPTER CXXIII.

(ANUSHASANIKA PARVA)—Continued

Yudhishthira said.—

1 O you who know all duties I wish to hear, in full, what forms the excellent conduct of good and chaste women Do you, O grandfather, describe this to me!

Bhishma said.—

2—4 Once on a time, in the celestial region, a lady named Sumana of Kekaya's race, addressing Shandili gifted with great energy and conversant with the truth regarding everything and gifted with omniscience said —By what conduct, O auspicious lady, by what course of deeds have you succeeded in acquiring the celestial region, purged off of every sin? You shine with your own energy like a flame of fire You appear to be a daughter of the Lord of stars, come to Heaven in your own effulgence.

5 You put on dresses of pure white, and are quite cheerful and at your ease. Seated on that celestial car, you shine, O auspicious dame, with energy multiplied a thousandfold.

6 You have not, I understand, attained to this region of happiness by great penances and gifts and vows. Do you tell me the truth!

7. Thus questioned sweetly by Sumana, Shandili of sweet smiles, addressing her fair interrogatrix, thus answered her silently. I did not wear yellow robes, nor barks of trees I did not shave my head; nor did I keep matted locks on my head. It is not on account of these deeds that I have acquired the status of a celestial.

9 I never carelessly addressed any harsh words to my husband.

10 I was always devoted to the adoration of the celestials, the departed Manes, and the Brahmanas Always careful I waited upon and served my mother-in law and father-in law.

11. This was my resolution that I should never act deceitfully I never used to stay at the door of our house nor did I speak long with any body.

12 I never did any evil deed I never laughed aloud, I never did any injury. I never gave out any secret. Thus did I myself act

13 When my husband, having left home upon any business, used to return, I always served him by giving him a seat, and adored him with respect.

14 I never ate food of any kind which was unknown to my husband and with which my husband was not pleased.

15. Rising early in the morning I did and caused to be done whatever was brought about and required to be done for the sake of relatives and kinsmen

16 When my husband leaves home for going to a distance place on any errand I remained at home engaged in various kinds of auspicious deeds for blessing his enterprise.

17. During the absence of my husband I never use collyrium, or ornaments; I never wash myself properly or use garlands and unguents or adorn my feet with lacdye or body with ornaments.

18 When my husband sleeps in peace I never awake him even if important business wanted his attention. I was happy to sit by him lying asleep

19 I never urged my husband to work hard for acquiring riches to support his family and relatives I always kept secrets without giving them out to others. I used to always keep our premises clean

20 That woman who, with rapt attention, follows her duty receives profuse honors in the celestial region like a second Arundhati

Bhishma said,—

21 The illustrious and highly blessed Shandili, of pious conduct having said these words to Sumana on the subject of woman's duties towards her husband disappeared there and then

22. That man, O son Pandu, who reads this discourse at every full moon and new moon, succeeds in acquiring the celestial region and enjoying great happiness in the bowers of Nandana

CHAPTER CXXIV.

(ANUSHASANIKA PARVA) — Continued.

Yudhishthira said —

1 In which is superior efficacy, Conciliation or Gifts? Tell me, O chief of Bharata's race, which of these two is superior in efficacy.

Bhishma said —

2 Some become pleased by Conciliation, while others are pleased by Gifts Every man, according to his own nature, likes the one or the other.

3 Listen to me, O king as I explain to you the merits of Conciliation, O chief of Bharata's race, so that the most furious creatures may be cooled down by it.

4 Regarding it, is cited the ancient narrative of how a Brahmana, who had been seized in the forest by a Rakshasa, was freed

5 A certain Brahmana gifted with eloquence and intelligence fell into distress, for he was seized in a lone forest by a Rakshasa who wished to feed on him.

6 The Brahmana gifted as he was with understanding and learning was not at all moved Without allowing himself to be stupefied at the sight of that terrible cannibal, he resolved to apply Conciliation and see its effect on the Rakshasa.

7. Respectfully saluting the Brahmana with words, the Rakshasa put to him this question: You shall escape, but tell me why I am so pale and lean.

8 Reflecting for a short time, the Brahmana accepted the question of the Rakshasa and replied in the following well-spoken words

The Brahmana said.—

9 Living in a place distant from your house moving in a sphere that is not your own and deprived of the company of your friends and kinsmen you are enjoying vast riches It is therefore that you are so pale and lean

10 Indeed O Rakshasa your friends, though well treated by you, are still not well disposed towards you on account of their own vicious nature It is for this that you are so pale and lean

11. You are gifted with merit and wisdom and a well controlled soul Yet it is your lot to see others who have merit and wisdom honored in preference to yourself. It is for it is that you are so pale and lean.

12 Persons having riches much greater than yours but inferior to you in merit, are, indeed, disregarding you. It is for this that you are so pale and lean.

13 Though distressed for want of the means of support, yet you are actuated by the greatness of your mind to disregard such means as are open to you for getting your sustenance. It is for this that you are so pale and lean.

14 On account of your virtuous nature you had deprived yourself for doing good to another. This person, O righteous Rakshasa, considers you deceived and defeated. It is for this that you are so pale and lean.

15 I think you are grieving for those persons who with souls possessed by lust and anger, are suffering misery in this world. It is for this that you are so pale and lean.

16 Though wise, you are ridiculed by others who are entirely destitute of it. Persons of wicked conduct are vilifying you. It is for this that you are so pale and lean.

17 Indeed, some enemy of yours, with a friendly tongue, coming to you behaved at first like a pious man and then has left you, beguiling you like a knave. It is for this that you are so pale and lean.

18 You are well conversant with the course of world's affairs. You are well skilled in all mysteries. You are gifted with power. Those who know you to be such do not yet respect and praise you. It is for this that you are so pale and lean.

19 Staying in the midst of bad men engaged together in some business, you had discoursed to them, removing their doubts. Still they did not admit your superior merits. It is for this that you are so pale and lean.

20 Indeed, though destitute of riches and intelligence and Vedic learning you wish yet, with the help of your energy alone, to accomplish something great. It is for this that you are so pale and lean.

21 It appears that although you are resolved to practise severe austerities by retiring into the forest, yet your kinsmen are not favourably disposed towards this project of yours. It is for this that you are so pale and lean.

22 Some rich neighbour of yours endued with youth and handsome features covets your dear wife. It is for this that you are so pale and lean.

23 The words spoken by you even when excellent, in the midst of rich men, are not regarded by them as wise or well-timed. It is for this that your so pale and lean.

24 Some dear kinsman of yours shorn of intelligence though repeatedly instructed in the scriptures, has become angry. You have not been able to pacify him. It is for this that you are so pale and lean.

25 Indeed somebody having first set you to the accomplishment of some object desirable to you, is now trying to deprive you of the fruit thereof. It is for this that you are so pale and lean.

26 Though possessed of excellent qualities and adored by all on that account, you are yet considered by your kinsmen as adored for their sake and not for your own. It is for this that you are so pale and lean.

27 Indeed, through shame you are unable to give out some purpose in your heart, moved also by the inevitable delay that will take place in its accomplishment. It is for this that you are so pale and lean.

28 Indeed, you wish with the help of your intelligence, to control various persons with various kinds of understandings and inclinations. It is for this that you are so pale and lean.

29 Shorn of learning, without courage, and without much riches, you seek such fame as is won by knowledge and prowess and gifts. Indeed, it is for this that you are so pale and lean.

30 You have not been able to get something which you have long been seeking for. Or, what you try to do is sought to be undone by somebody else. It is for this that you are so pale and lean.

31 Indeed, without being able to see any fault on your part, you have been cursed by somebody. It is for this that you are so pale and lean.

32 Having no wealth and accomplishments you try in vain to remove the grief of your friends and the sorrows of sorrowing men. It is for this that you are so pale and lean.

33 Seeing virtuous persons living like householders unrighteous persons living according to the forest mode and liberated persons attached to domesticity and fixed abodes, you have become so pale and lean.

34 Indeed, your acts connected with Virture, Profit, and Pleasure, as also the well-timed words spoken by you, do not produce fruit. It is for this that you are so pale and lean.

35 Though gifted with wisdom, yet desirous of living, you live with wealth obtained by you in gift from somebody of evil conduct It is for this that you are so pale and lean.

36. Seeing sinful persons multiplying on every side and virtue languishing, you are filled with grief. It is for this that you are so pale and lean.

37. Urged by them you seek to please all your friends even when they are quarrelling and opposing one another. It is for it is that you are so pale and lean.

38 Seeing persons gifted with Vedic learning engaged in improper deeds, and learned persons unable to keep their senses under control you are filled with grief. It is for this that you are so pale and lean 39 Thus praised, the Rakshasa adored that learned Brahmana in return, and making him his friend and bestowing sufficient riches upon him in gift, sent him away.

CHAPTER CXXV.

(ANUSHASANIKA PARVA)—Continued

Yudhishthira said:—

1. Tell me, O grandfather, how should a poor man, desirous of achieving his own behoof, act after having acquired the status of humanity and come into this region of acts that is so difficult to acquire.

2 Tell me also what is the best of all gifts, and what should be given under what circumstances? Tell me, O son of Ganga, who are truly worthy of honor and adoration. You should describe these mysteries to us.

3 Thus accosted by that famous king, viz, the son of Pandu, Bhishma explained to that king these great mysteries about duty.

Bhishma said:—

4 Listen to me with rapt attention O king, as I explain to you, O Bharata, these mysteries of duties as the holy Vyasa had explained them to me formerly.

5 This subject is a mystery to the very celestials, O king Yama of pure deeds with the help of vows well observed and Yoga meditation, had acquired the knowledge of these mysteries as the high fruits of his penances

6—8 What pleases what deity, what pleases the departed Manes, the Rishis, the companions of Mahadeva, the goddess Shri, Chitragupta, and the powerful Elephants which rule the cardinal points of the compass, what forms the religion of the Rishis,—the religion, viz, which has many mysteries and which yields high fruits,—the merits of what are called great gifts, and the merits of all the sacrifices, he who knows these, O sinless one, and knowing acts according to his knowledge, becomes freed from stains if he has stains, and acquires the merits indicated.

9 One oilman is equal to ten butchers. Equal to ten oilmen is one drinker of alcohol Equal to ten drinkers of alcohol is one harlot. Equal to ten harlots is a single king.

10—11 A great king is said to be equal to half of these all Hence, one should not accept gifts from these. On the other hand, one should attend to the science, which is sacred and which has virtue for its marks of the threefold objects of life. Amongst these, Wealth and Pleasure are naturally attractive. Hence, one should, with rapt attention, listen to the sacred expositions of Religion for the fruits of listening to the mysteries of Religion are very great One should certainly hear every subject bearing on Religion as ordained by the celestials themselves.

12. In it is contained the ritual about the Shraddha in which have been declared the mysteries of the departed Manes The mysteries about the deities have also been explained there 13 It contains the duties and practices, productive of great merit, of the Rishis also, together with the mysteries attaching to them It contains an exposition of the merits of great sacrifices and all kinds of gifts.

14 Those men who always read the scriptures about these subjects, those who bear them properly in their mind and he who, having listened to them, follows them in practice, are all considered to be as holy and sinless as the powerful Narayana himself.

15 The merits of the gift of kine those that belong to the performance of ablutions in sacred waters, those that are acquired by the celebration of sacrifices—all these are acquired by that man who treats guests with respect.

16—17 They who listen to these scriptures they who are gifted with faith, and they who have a pure heart it is well known, conquer many regions of felicity. Those pious men, who are gifted with faith, become cleansed of all sins and no sin can touch them Such men always increase in virtue and succeed in attaining to the celestial region.

18 Once on a time, a celestial messenger, coming to the court of Indra of his own accord but remaining invisible, addressed the king of the deities in these words:—

19 At the command of Ashwini Kumars (the celestial physicians) and who are gifted with every desirable quality, I have come to this place where I see human beings the departed Manes and the celestials assembled together.

20 Why, indeed, is sexual intercourse interdicted for the man who performs a Shraddha and for him also who eats at a Shraddha? Why are three rice-balls offered separately at a Shraddha?

21. To whom should the first of those balls be offered? To whom should the second one be offered? And whose has it been said is the third or the remaining one? I wish to know all this!

22. After the celestial messenger had said these words connected with virtue and duty, the celestials who were seated towards the east and the departed Manes also, praising that ranger of the sky, began as follows.

The Pitris said:—

23 Welcome are you, and blessings upon you! Do you listen, O best of all rangers of the sky! The question you have put is a high one and fraught with deep import.

24. The departed Manes of that man who indulges in sexual intercourse on the day he performs a Shraddha or eats at a Shraddha have to lie for a whole month on his vital seed

25 We shall explain the classification of the rice balls offered at a Shraddha The first rice ball should be thought of as being thrown into the waters.

26 The second ball should be given to one of the wives to eat The third ball should be thrown into the burning fire.

27 This is the ordinance about the Shraddha This is the ordinance of the rites of religion. The Pitris of that man who acts according to this ordinance become pleased with him and remain always cheerful

28 The progeny of such a man increases and he always commands endless riches

The Celestial Messenger said:—

29 You have explained the division of the rice balls and their consignment one after another to the three, together with the reasons thereof.

30 Whom does that rice ball which is thrown into the waters, reach? How does it, by being so thrown, please the deities and how does it rescue the departed Manes?

31. The second ball is eaten by the wife. That has been laid down in the ordinance. How do the Pitris of that man become the eaters thereof?

32 The last ball goes into the burning fire How does that ball succeed in finding its way to you, or who is he to whom it goes?

33 I wish to hear this,—that is what are the ends attained by the balls offered at Shraddhas when thus disposed of by being thrown into the waters given to the wife, and thrown into the burning fire.

The Pitris said:—

34 The question which you have asked is of deep import. It involves a mystery and is wonderful We have been highly pleased with you, O ranger of the sky

35 The very celestials and the Munis applaud acts done in honor of the departed Manes Even they do not know what the certain conclusions are of the ordinances about the acts done in honor of the Pitris

36 Excepting the great, immortal, and excellent Markandeya, that learned Brahmana of great fame, who is ever devoted to the Pitris, none amongst them is conversant with the mysteries of the ordinances about the Pitris.

37 Having heard from the holy Vyasa what the end is of the three rice balls offered at the Shraddha, as explained by the Pitris themselves in reply to the question of the celestial messenger, I shall explain the same to you Do you hear, O king, what the conclusions are about the ordinances about the Shraddha.

38 Listen with attention, O Bharata, to me as I explain what the end is of the three rice balls That rice ball which goes into water is considered as pleasing the deity of the Moon.

39 That deity being pleased O you of great intelligence gratifies in return the other deities and the Pitris also with them. It has been laid down that the second rice-ball should be eaten by the wife.

40 The Pitris who always wish for progeny bestow children on the woman of the house Listen now to me as I tell you what becomes of the rice-ball, that is thrown into the burning fire.

41 With that ball the Pitris are pleased, and as the result thereof, grant the fruition of all desires to the person offering it I have thus told you everything about the end of the three rice-balls offered at the Shraddha and consigned to the three (viz, water, the spouse, and the fire)

42 That Brahmana who becomes the priest at a Shraddha forms himself by that deed, the Pitri of the person performing the Shraddha Hence, he should abstain that day from sexual intercourse with even his own wife

43 O best of all rangers of the sky, the man who eats at a Shraddha should remain pure for that day By acting otherwise, one surely commits the sin I have indicated It cannot be otherwise

44 Hence the Brahmana who is invited to a Shraddha for eating the offerings, should eat them after purifying himself by a bath and remain pious for that day by abstaining from every kind of injury or evil The progeny of such a person multiplies and he also who feeds him gets the same reward.

Bhishma said :—

45 After the Pitris had said so a Rishi of austere penances, named Vidyutprabha, whose form was effulgent like the Sun, spoke

46—47 Having heard those mysteries of religion as explained by the Pitris, he addressed Shakra, saying —Stupefied by folly, men kill numerous creatures born in the intermediate orders, such as worms ants, snakes, sheep, deer and birds They commit a great sin by these acts What, however, is the remedy?

48 When this question was asked, all the gods and Rishis having penances for wealth and the highly blessed Pitris praised that ascetic

Shakra said —

49 Thinking in one's mind of Kuru kshetra and Gaya and Ganga and Prabhasa and the lakes of Pushkara one should dip his head in a piece of water.

50 By so doing he becomes purged off of all his sins like the Moon freed from Rahu He should thus bathe for three days successively and then fast for every day.

51 Besides this, he should touch (after bathing) the back of a cow and bow his head to her tail Vidutprabha, after this, once more addressing Vasava said,—I shall describe a rite that is more subtle Listen to me, O you of a hundred sacrifices.

52 Rubbed with the astringent powder of the hanging roots of the banian and annointed with the oil of Priangu, one should eat the Shashtika paddy mixed with milk By so doing he becomes purged off of all his sins

53 Listen now to another mystery unknown to many but which was discovered by the Rishis with the help of meditation. I heard it from Vrihaspati while he recited it before Mahadeva.

54—55 O king of the celestials, do you hear it with Rudra in your company, O lord of Shachi If a person, ascending a mountain, stands there on one foot, with arms upraised and joined together, and, abstaining from food, looks at a burning fire,—he acquires the merits of severe penances and obtains the rewards of fasts.

56 Heated by the rays of the Sun, he becomes purged off of all his sins One who acts thus in both the summer and the winter seasons, becomes freed from every sin.

57 Purged off of every sin, one acquires a splendour of complexion for all time Such a man burns with energy like the Sun or shines in beauty like the Moon.

58 After this, the king of the celestials viz, he of a hundred sacrifices, seated in the midst of the gods, then sweetly addressed Vrihaspati, with these excellent words —

59 O Holy One do you describe those mysteries of religion which are fraught with happiness to human beings and what the faults are which they commit, together with the mysteries of them.

Vrihaspati said —

60—61 They who pass urine facing the Sun they who do not show respect for the wind they who do not pour libations on the burning Fire; they who milk a cow whose calf is very young, actuated by the desire of obtaining from her as much milk as possible, commit many sins I shall describe what those faults are, O lord of Shachi Do you hear me

62—63 The Sun Wind the carrier of sacrificial oblations, O Vasava and kine who are the mothers of all creatures, were created by the Self Create himself, for rescuing all the worlds, O Shakra. These are the deities of human beings Listen all to the conclusions of religion.

64 Those wicked men and wicked women who pass urine facing the Sun, live in great infamy for eighty-six years

65 That man O Shakra who cherishes no respect for the Wind, gets children that come out prematurely from the womb of his wife Those men who do not pour libations on the burning fire, find that the fire, when they do light it up for such rites as they wish to perform, refuses to eat their libations.

66 Those men who drink the milk of kine whose calves are very young never get children for perpetuating their races

67. Such men see their children die and their families shrink These are the consequences of the acts referred to, as observed by twice-born persons, venerable for age in their respective families

68. Hence, one should always avoid that which has been interdicted, and do only that which has been directed to be done, if one is desirous of securing his prosperity. This that I say to you is very true.

69—70. After the celestial preceptor had said this, the highly blessed celestials, with the Maruts, and the highly blessed Rishis questioned the departed Manes, saying, Ye Pitris with what acts of human beings, who are generally gifted with little understandings, do you become pleased? What gifts, made in course of such rites as are performed for improving the position of deceased persons in the other world, become inexhaustible in efficacy?

71. By doing what acts can men become freed from the debt they owe to their ancestors? We wish to hear this. Great is our curiosity.

The Pitris said :—

72. Ye highly blessed ones, the doubt existing in your minds has been properly explained. Listen as we describe the deeds of righteous men with which we become pleased.

73. Blue-hued Bulls should be liberated Gifts should be made to us, on the day of the new moon, of sesame seeds and water In the season of rains, lamps should be lighted. By these deeds of men, they can free themselves from the debt they owe to their ancestors.

74 Such gifts never become vain. On the other hand, they yield great and endless fruits. The gratification we derive from them is considered to be inexhaustible

75. Those men, who gifted with faith, beget offspring, rescue their deceased ancestors from miserable Hell, 76—77. Hearing these words of the Pitris, Vriddha Gargya, endued with penances and high energy, became filled with wonder so that the hair on his body stood erect. Addressing them he said,—Ye having penances for wealth, tell us what the merits are of setting free Bulls having blue complexions. What merits, again, are of the gift of lamps in the season of rains and the gift of water with sesame seeds?

The Pitris said :—

78 If a bull of blue complexion, upon being liberated, raises a (small) quantity of water with its tail, the Pitris become pleased with that water for full sixty thousand years

79 The mud such a bull raises with its horns from the banks (of a river or lake), succeeds, forsooth, in sending the Pitris to the region of Soma.

80. By giving lamps in the season of rains, one shines with effulgence like Soma himself The man who gives lamps is never subject to the quality of Darkness.

81—82 Those men who make gifts, on the day of the new moon, of sesame seeds and water, mixed with honey and using a vessel of copper, O you having penances for wealth, are considered as duly performing a Shraddha with all its mysteries. These men get children of sound health and cheerful minds.

83 The merit acquired by the giver of the Pinda takes the form of the growth of his family. Indeed, he who performs these acts with faith, becomes freed from the debt he owes to the ancestors.

84 Thus have been laid down the proper time for the performance of the Shraddha, the ordinances about the rites to be observed, the proper person that should be fed at the Shraddha, and the merits that belong to it. I have described everything to you in due order.

CHAPTER CXXVI.

(ANUSHASANIKA PARVA).—

Continued.

Bhishma said :—

1. The king of the celestials, viz., Indra, after the Pitris had ceased to speak, addressed the powerful Hari saying,—O Lord, what are those deeds which please you? How, indeed, do men succeed in pleasing you?

Vishnu said :—

2 That which I greatly hate, is the detraction of Brahmanas Forsooth, if the Brahmanas are adored, I consider myself adored.

Pitris, the deities, and the sacred fires, all return disappointed on account of such treatment of the guest.

27 That man who does not perform the duties of hospitality towards the guest arrived at his house comes to be considered as equally sinful with those who are slayers of women or of kine, who are ungrateful towards benefactors, who are slayers of Brahmanas, or who are violators of the beds of their preceptors.

Agni said:—

28—30. Listen ye with rapt attention. I shall describe the demerits of that man of wicked understanding who lifts up his feet for striking therewith a cow or a highly blessed Brahmana or a burning fire. The infamy of such man spreads throughout the world and reaches the boundary of Heaven itself. His Pitris become filled with fear. The deities also become highly dissatisfied with him. Gifted with great energy, Fire refuses to accept the libations poured by him.

31. For a hundred lives he has to rot in Hell. He is never rescued at any time.

32—33 One should, therefore, never touch a cow with his feet, or a Brahmana of high energy, or a burning fire, if he is gifted with faith and seeks his own behoof. These are the demerits declared by me of one who lifts up his feet towards these three.

Vishwamittra said:—

34—36. Listen to a great mystery that is unknown to most of men and which is connected with religion. He, who offers to the departed Manes, rice boiled in milk and sugar, sitting with face directed to the south at noontide, in the shade caused by an elephant's body in the month of Bhadrapada, under the constellation Magha acquires great merits Hear of those merits The man who makes such an offering to the Pitris under such circumstances is considered as performing a great Shraddha each year for thirteen years successively.

The kine said:—

37—39 That man becomes purged off of all his sins who worships a cow with these Mantras,—viz,—O Vahula, O Samanga O you who are fearless everywhere, O you who are forgiving and full of auspiciousness, O friend, O source of all plenty, in the region of Brahman, formerly you were present with your calf in the sacrifice of Indra the holder of the thunderbolt! You were stationed in the sky and in the path of Agni! The celestials with Narada among them worshipped you on that occasion by calling you Sarvamsaha!—Such a man attains to the region of Purandara. He acquires, besides, the merits that belong to kine, and the splendour of the Moon also 40 Such a man becomes freed from every sin, every fear, every grief At the end, he acquires residence in the happy region of the Thousand eyed Indra.

Bhishma said:—

41. After this, the highly blessed and illustrious seven Rishis, headed by Vashishtha, rose and going round the Lotus-born Brahman, stood around him with hands joined in respect.

42 Vashishtha, that foremost of all persons conversant with Brahma became their spokesman and put this question which conduces to the behoof of all creatures but especially to the Brahmanas and Kshatriyas.

43 By doing what acts may virtuous men who have no worldly belongings, succeed in acquiring the merits of sacrifices?

44. Hearing this question of theirs, the Grandfather Brahman began to say what follows.

Brahman said:—

45 Excellent is this question, ye highly blessed ones! It is at once auspicious and high and full of mystery This question that you have put is subtle and conduces to the well-being of mankind.

46 Ye Rishis having penances for wealth, I shall recite everything to you in full Do you listen with attention to what I say as to how men acquire the merits of sacrifices.

47—48 In the lighted fortnight of the month of Pousa when the constellation Rohini is in conjunction, if one, purifying himself by a bath, lies, under the canopy of heaven clad in a single piece of cloth, with faith and rapt attention and drinks the rays of the Moon, he wins the merits of great sacrifices

49 Ye foremost of twice born persons, this is a great mystery that I declare it to you in reply to your question, you who know the truths of all subjects.

CHAPTER CXXVII.

Vibhavasu (the Sun) said:—

1—2. There are two offerings. One of these consists of a palmful of water and the other called Akshata consists of rice-grains with clarified butter. One should, on the day of the full moon, stand facing that bright orb and make to him the two offerings mentioned, viz, a palmful of water and the rice-grains with clarified butter called Akshata. The man who presents these offerings is said to worship his sacred fire Indeed, he is considered as one who has poured libations on the three (principal) fires.

3 That man of little understanding who cuts down a large tree on the day of the new moon, becomes sullied with the sin of Brahmanicide. By killing even a single leaf one commits that sin

4 That foolish man who chews a tooth-brush on the day of the new moon is considered as injuring the god of the moon by such a deed The departed Manes of such a person become annoyed with him.

5. The celestials do not accept the libations poured by such a man on days of the full moon and the new moon His departed Manes become enraged with him, and his family become extinct.

Shree said :—

6—7. The celestials and departed Manes leave that sinful house, in which eating and drinking vessels and seats and beds lie scattered, and in which women are beaten, Without accepting the offerings made to them by the owners of such houses, the celestials and the departed Manes fly away from such a sinful house.

Angiras said :—

8 The offspring of that man multiplies who stands every night for a full year under a Karanjaka tree with a lamp for lighting it, and holds in his hands the roots of the Suvarchala plant.

Bargya said —

9 One should always do the duties of hospitality to his guests One should give lamps in the hall or shed where sacrifices are celebrated, One should avoid sleep during the day, and abstain from all sorts of flesh or food.

10 One should never injure kine and Brahmanas One should always recite the names of the Pushkara lakes and the other sacred waters Such a course of duty is the foremost Even it is forms a high religion with its mysteries If observed in practice, it is sure to yield great results

11 If a person celebrates even a hundred sacrifices, he is doomed to see the exhaustion of the merits belonging to the libations poured therein The duties, however, which I have mentioned are such that when observed by persons having faith, their merit becomes endless

12—13 Listen now to another great mystery unknown to many The celestials do not eat the libations on occasions of Shraddhas and rites in their honour or on occasions of those rites which are performed on ordinary lunar days or on the especially sacred days of the full moon and the new moon, if they see a woman in her menses or one who is the daughter of a mother suffering from leprosy.

14 The ancestors of the man who allows such a woman to come near the place where the Shraddha is being performed by him, do not become pleased with him for thirteen years.

15 Clad in white clothes, and becoming pure in body and mind, one should invite Brahmanas and make them utter their benedictions On such occasions one should also recite the the Bharata It is by observing all these that the offerings made at Shraddhas become endless.

Dhaumya said :—

16 Broken utensils, broken bedsteads, cocks and dogs as also such trees as have grown within dwelling houses, are all inauspicious objects.

17 In a broken utensil exists Kali himself, while in a broken bedstead is loss of money When a cock or a dog is seen, the celestials do not eat the offerings made to them. Scorpions and snakes find shelter under the roots of a tree. Hence, one should never plant a tree within his house.

Jamadagni said :—

18—19 That man whose heart is not pure, is sure to go to Hell even if he worships the celestials in a Horse Sacrifice or in a hundred Vajapeya Sacrifices, or if he practises the severest austerities with head down most Purity of heart is considered as equal to Sacrifices and Truth.

20. A very poor Brahmana, by giving only a portion of powdered barley with a pure heart to a Brahmana, acquired the region of Brahman himself. This is a sufficient proof

CHAPTER CXXVIII.

Vayu said:—

1. I shall recite some duties the observance of which produces happiness to mankind. Do you listen also, with rapt attention, to certain transgressions upon which they depend.

2—4. That man who offers for the four months of the rainy season sesame and water (to the Pitris), and food, according to the best of his power, to a Brahmana thoroughly expert in duties, who duly pours libations on the sacred fire, and makes offerings of rice boiled in sugared milk who gives lamps in honor of the ancestors, with sesame and water, indeed he who does all this with faith and rapt attention, acquires all the merits of a hundred sacrifices in which animals are offered up to the celestials.

5 Listen to this other great mystery that is unknown to all That man who thinks it all right when a Shudra lights up the fire upon which he is to pour libations or who does not see any fault when women who are incompetent to assist at Shraddhas and other rites are allowed to assist at them, commit a sin.

6. The three sacrificial fires become enraged with such a person. In his next life, he is born as a Shudra. His departed Manes, together with the celestials, are never pleased with him.

7. I shall now recite what the expiations are which one must perform for purifying himself from such sins Listen to me with attention. By performing those expiatory rites, one becomes happy and free from fever.

8 Fasting all the while, one should, for three days, with rapt attention pour libations, on the sacred fire, of the urine of the cow mixed with cowdung and milk and clarified butter.

9 The celestials accept the offerings of such a man on the expiration of a full year. His departed Manes also, when the time comes for him for performing the Shraddha, become pleased with him

10 I have thus recited what is righteous and what unrighteous, with all their unknown details, about human beings desirous of attaining to Heaven. Men who abstain from these sins or who having committed them perform the expiatory rites pointed out, succeed in attaining to the celestial region when they leave this world.

CHAPTER CXXIX.

Lomasha said:—

1. The departed Manes of those men who, without having wives of their own, know the wives of other people, are disappointed when the time for the Shraddha comes.

2. He who knows the wives of other people, he who indulges in sexual union with a barren woman, and he who appropriates what belongs to a Brahmana, are equally sinful.

3 Forsooth, the departed Manes of such people cut them off without wishing to have any intercourse with them. The offerings they make fail to please the celestials and the departed Manes.

4. Hence, one should always abstain from sexual union with women who are the lawful wives of others, as also with women who are barren. The man who seeks his own good, should not appropriate what belongs to a Brahmana.

5 Listen now to another mystery, unknown to all, about Religion One should, having faith, always do the command of his preceptor and other elders.

6. On the twelfth lunar day, as also on the day of the full moon, every month, one should make gifts to Brahmanas of clarified butter and of Akshata. Listen to me as I say what the measure is of the merit that such a person wins.

7. By such a deed one is said to increase Soma and the Ocean. Vasava, the king of the celestials, confers upon him a fourth part of the merits of a Horse-Sacrifice.

8. By making such gifts, a person becomes gifted with great energy and prowess. Well-pleased with him, the divine Soma grants him the fruition of his desires.

9 Listen now to another duty, together with the foundation on which it depends, which yields great merits In this age of Kali, that duty, if performed, gives much happiness to men

10—11 That man who, rising at dawn and purifying himself by a bath, dresses himself in white clothes and with concentrated attention makes gifts to Brahmanas of vessels full of sesame seeds, who makes offerings to the departed Manes of water with sesame seeds and honey, and who gives lamps as also the food called Krishara, acquires great merits. Listen to me as I say what those merits are.

12—13 The divine chastiser of Paka has attributed these merits to the gift of vessels of copper and brass filled with sesame seeds He who makes gifts of kine he who makes gifts of land which yield eternal merit, he who performs the Agnishthoma sacrifice with profuse presents in the form of Dakshina to the Brahmanas are all considered by the celestials as acquiring merits equal to those which one acquires by making gifts of vessels filled with sesame seeds

14 Gifts of water with sesame seeds are considered by the departed Manes as yielding eternal gratification to them. The grandfathers all become highly pleased with gifts of lamps and Krishara.

15 I have thus recited the ancient ordinance laid down by the Rishis, that is highly spoken of, by both the departed Manes and the celestials in their respective regions.

CHAPTER CXXX.

(ANUSHASANIKA PARVA)—Continued.

Bhishma said:—

1. The diverse Rishis there assembled together with the departed Manes and the deities, then, with rapt attention, asked Arundhati who was gifted with great ascetic merit

2 Having penances for wealth Arundhati was equal to her husband the high-souled Vashishtha in energy, for both in vows and conduct she was her husband's equal.

3 Addressing her, they said,—We wish to hear from you the mysteries of duty and religion. You should O amiable lady, tell us what you consider as a great mystery.

Arundhati said.—

4—5 The great progress I have been able to make in penances is owing to your consideration for me in thus remembering my poor self With your gracious permission I shall now describe duties that are eternal and are great mysteries I shall describe them with the causes on which they depend Listen to me as I describe them to you in full A knowledge of these should be communicated to him only who has faith or who has a pure heart

6 These four, viz, he who is bereft of faith, he who is full of pride, he who is guilty of Brahmanicide, and he who violates the bed of his preceptor, should never be talked to Religion and duty should never be communicated to them.

7—8 The merits acquired by a person who gives away a Kapila cow every day for twelve years, or by a person who worships the deities every month in a sacrifice, or by him who gives away hundreds of thousands of kine in the great Pushkara do not equal those that are his with whom a guest is pleased

9 Listen now to another duty whose observance yields happiness to mankind It should be observed with its secret ritual by a person having faith. Its merits are certainly high.

10—12 Listen to what they are If a person, rising at dawn and taking with him a quantity of water and a few blades of Kusha grass goes to a cowpen and arrived there, washes a cow's horns by sprinkling thereon that water with those blades of Kusha grass and then causes the water to drip down on his own head he is considered, on account of such a bath, as one who has performed his ablutions in all the sacred waters that the wise have heard to exist in the three worlds and that are honored and resorted to by the Siddhas and Charanas

13 After Arundhati had said these words, all the deities and ancestors applauded her, saying —Excellent, Excellent, —Indeed all the beings there were highly pleased and all of them adored Arundhati.

Brahman said:—

14 O highly blessed one, excellent is the duty that you have described together with its secret ritual Praise be to you! I grant you this boon viz, that your penances will continually increase.

Yama said:—

15 I have heard from you an excellent and agreeable subject Listen now to what Chitragupta has said and what is agreeable to me

16 Those words touch on duty with its secret ritual and are worthy of being heard by the great Rishis as also by men having faith and desirous of achieving their own good.

17 Nothing is lost of either virtue or sin that is committed by creatures On days of the full moon and the new moon those acts are taken to the Sun where they rest.

18 When a mortal goes into the regions of the dead the Sun witnesses all his deeds

He who is virtuous, acquires the fruits of his virtue there.

19—20 I shall now tell you of some auspicious duties that are approved of by Chitra gupta. Water for drink, and lamps for lighting darkness should always be given, as also sandals and umbrellas and Kapila kine with due rites In Pushkara especially one should make the gift of a Kapila cow to a Brahmana conversant with the Vedas

21 One should also always maintain his Agnihotra with great care Here is another duty which was proclaimed by Chitragupta.

22 The best of creatures should listen to what the merits are of that duty separately. In course of time, every creature is destined to undergo dissolution,

23 The little witted meet with great distress in the regions of the dead, for they become stricken with hunger and thirst Indeed, they have to rot there in pain There is no escape for them from such a disaster.

24 They have to enter into a thick darkness I shall now tell you of those duties by discharging which one may succeed in getting over such disasters.

25 The performance of those duties costs very little but yields great merit Indeed, such performance yields great happiness in the other world The merits of the gift of water for drink, are excellent In the next world, in especial, those merits are very great 26 A large river full of excellent water is ordained in the other world for them who make gifts of water for drink Indeed, the water contained in that river is endless and cool and sweet as nectar.

27 He who makes gifts of water in this world drinks from that river in the next world when he goes there Listen now to the profuse merits accruing from the gift of lamps.

28. The man who gives lamps in this world, has never to even see the thick darkness (of Hell) The Sun and the Moon and the God of Fire always give him their light when he goes to the other world.

29 The celestials ordain that on every side of such a person there should be burning light. Indeed, when the giver of lights goes to the world of the dead, he himself shines in pure effulgence like a second Sun.

30 Hence, one should give lights while here and water for drink in especial Listen now to what the merits are of the person who makes the gift of a Kapila cow to a Brahmana knowing the Vedas, especially if the gift be made in Pushkara.

31 Such a man is considered as having made a gift of a hundred kine with a bull—a gift that yields eternal merit,

32 The gift of a single Kapila cow is capable cleansing whatever sins the giver may be guilty of, even if those sins be as grave as Brahmanicide, for the gift of a single Kapila cow is considered as equal in merit to that of a hundred kine

33 Hence, one should give away a Kapila cow at that Pushkara which is considered as the senior, on the day of the full moon in the month of Kartika Men who succeed in making such a gift have never to meet with distress of any kind, or sorrow, or thorns giving pain

34 That man who gives away a pair of sandals to a superior Brahmana who is worthy of the gift, acquires similar merits By giving away an umbrella, a person gets comfortable shade in the next world

35 A gift made to a worthy person never goes for nothing It is sure to yield agreeable results to the giver Hearing these opinions of Chitragupta, the Sun's hairs stood erect.

36 Gifted with great splendour he addressed all the celestials and the departed Manes, saying,—Ye have heard the mysteries about duty, as explained by the great Chitragupta

37 Those human beings who gifted with faith, make these gifts to great Brahmanas, become freed from fear of every sort.

38 These five kinds of men, sullied with vicious deeds, have no escape Indeed, these wretched men of sinful conduct, should never be talked to Indeed, they should always be avoided

39 Those five are he who is the destroyer of a Brahmana he who is the destroyer of a cow, he who is addicted to sexual union with other people's wives, he who is bereft of faith (in the Vedas) and he who maintains himself by selling the virtue of his wife

40 These men of sinful conduct, when they go to the region of the dead, rot in hell like worms which live upon pus and blood.

41 These five are avoided by the departed Manes, the celestials, the Snataka Brahmanas, and other twice born persons who are given to the practice of penances.

CHAPTER CXXXI.

(ANUSHASANIKA PARVA)—Continued.

Bhishma said:—

1—2 Then all the highly blessed celestials and the departed Manes, and the highly-blessed Rishis also addressing the Pramathas said,—Ye are all highly blessed beings Ye are invincible night rangers Why do you afflict those men who are vile and impure and that are unclean?

3 What acts are considered as obstacles to your power? What, indeed are those acts on account of which ye cannot afflict men? What are those acts that are destructive of Rakshasas and which prevent you from influencing the dwellings of men?

4 Ye night rangers, we wish to hear all this from you

The Pramathas said:—

5—6 Men are rendered unclean by acts of sexual intercourse They who do not purify themselves after such deeds they who insult their elders they who from stupefaction eat different sorts of meat, the man also who sleeps at the foot of a tree, he who keeps any animal matter under his pillow while lying down for sleep, and he who lies down or sleeps putting the head where his feet should be placed or his feet where his head should be placed,—these men are considered by us as unclean Indeed, these men have many holes

7—8 Those also are classed amongst those who throw their phlegm and other uncleanness into the water, Forsooth, these men deserve to be killed and eaten up by us Indeed we afflict those human beings who are endued with such conduct Listen now to what those acts are which are considered as antidotes and on account of which we fail to do any injury on men

9—11 Those men on whose body are marks of Gorochana or who hold Vachas in their hands, or who make gifts of clarified butter with Akshata or who place clarified butter and Akshata on their heads or those who abstain from meat, are incapable of being afflicted by us That man in whose house the sacred fire burns day and night without being ever extinguished or who keeps the skin or teeth of a wolf in his house or a full tortoise, or from whose house the sacrificial smoke is seen to curl upwards or who keeps a cat or a goat that is either tawny or black in colour, is free from our power.

12 Those householders who keep these things in their houses always find them free from the attacks of even the most dreadful spirits that live on carrion

13 Those beings also, that like the range through different worlds seeking pleasure, are unable to do any harm to such houses. Therefore, should men keep such articles in their houses as are destructive of Rakshasas. We have thus told you everything in solution of your great doubts

CHAPTER CXXXII.

(ANUSHASANIKA PARVA)—Continued.

Bhishma said:—

1—2 After this, the Grandfather Brahman sprung from the primeval lotus and resembling the lotus (in agreeableness and fragrance), addressed the celestials headed by Vasava, the husband of Sachi,—Yonder sits the powerful Naga who lives in the nether regions, Gifted with great strength and energy, and with great prowess, also, His name is Renuka He is certainly a great being

3—5 Those powerful elephants of great energy and power, who hold the entire Earth with her hills waters, and lakes, should be seen by this Renuka at your request Let Renuka go to them and ask them about the mysteries of religion or duty!—Hearing these words of the Grandfather, the celestials, well pleased, sent (the elephant) Renuka to where those upholders of the world are

6 Going where those elephants are, Renuka addressed them, saying—Ye powerful creatures I have been commanded by the celestials and the departed Manes to question you about the mysteries of religion and duty! I desire to hear you discourse on that subject in detail; Ye highly blessed ones do ye discourse on the subject as your wisdom may dictate.

7 Standing in the eight quarters the elephants said—On the sacred eighth day of the dark fortnight in the month of Kartika when the constellation Ashlesha is in the ascendant, one should make gifts of treacle and rice.

8—11. Renouncing anger, and living on regulated diet, one should make these offerings at a Sraddha, uttering these Mantras—Let Valadeva and other Nagas endued with great strength let other powerful snakes of huge bodies that are indestructible and eternal, and let all the other great snakes that have taken their birth in their family, make Vali offerings to me for the increase of my strength and energy. Indeed let my strength be as great as that of the blessed Narayana when he raised the submerged Earth Uttering these Mantras, one should make Vali offerings upon an anthill After sunset, offerings of raw sugar and rice should be made on anthill selected The anthill should previously be strewn with Gajendra flowers Offerings should also be made of blue clothes and fragrant unguents.

13. If offerings are made thus, those beings that live in the nether regions, carrying the weight of the upper regions upon their heads or shoulders, become well-pleased and gratified. As for ourselves, we also do not feel the exertion of upholding the Earth, on account of such offerings being made to us

14 Afflicted with the burthen we bear, this is what we think (beneficial for men), without the slightest selfish end By observing this rule for a full year, fasting on each occasion, Brahmanas Kshatriyas, and Vaishays and Shudras, acquire great merits from such gifts

15. We think that the making of such Vali offerings on the anthill is really fraught with very superior merits

16. By making such offerings, one is considered as doing the duties of hospitality for a hundred years to all the powerful elephants which exist in the three worlds.

17. Hearing these words of the powerful elephants, the celestials and the departed Manes, and the highly blessed Rishis, all spoke highly of Renuka

CHAPTER CXXXIII

Maheshwara said —

1 You have recited excellent duties from your memory Listen all of you now to me as I declare some mysteries about religion and duty.

2. Only those persons whose understandings have been fixed on religion and who are endued with faith, should be instructed about those mysteries of duty and religion that are fraught with high merits

3 Hear what the merits are that become his, who, with heart shorn of anxiety, gives food every day, for a month, to kine, and contents himself with one meal a day throughout such period

4 The kine are highly blessed They are considered as the most sacred of all sacred things. Indeed it is they who are upholding the three words with the celestials, Asuras, and human beings

5 Respectful services done to them, yield great merit and grave results That man who every day gives food to kine daily, acquires accumulated religious merits

6 Formerly, in the golden age, I had expressed my approval of these creatures. Afterwards Brahman, sprung from the primeval lotus requested me (to show kindness towards kine)

7 It is therefore that emblem of bull stands on my standard overhead I always sport with kine Hence, should kine be adored by all

8 Kine are endued with great power They are givers of boons If addressed, they would grant boons That person who gives food to kine even for a single day, receives from those beneficent creatures, for that deed a fourth part of the merits he may acquire by all his good acts in life

CHAPTER CXXXIV.

Skanda said —

1—2 I shall now describe a duty that is approved of by me Do ye listen to it with rapt attention. That person who takes a little earth from the horns of a bull of blue color, smears his body therewith for three days and then performs his ablutions, wins great merits Hear what those merits are By such a deed he would wash away every stain and evil, and acquire sovereign sway hereafter

3 Every time he is born in this world he becomes celebrated for his heroism Hear of another mystery unknown to all

4 Taking a vessel of copper and placing therein some cooked food after having mixed it with honey, one should offer it as offering to the rising Moon on the evening of the day when that luminary is at full

5—6 Do ye learn, with faith, what the merits are of the person who acts thus The Saddhyas, the Rudras, the Adityas, the Vishwedevas, the two Ashwins, the Maruts and the Vasus, all accept that offering. By such an offering, Soma increases as also ocean that great receptacle of waters This duty that is declared by me and that is unknown to all, if performed, certainly yields great happiness

7—8 That person who, gifted with faith and freed from malice, listens every day with rapt attention to the mysteries about religion and duty that are preserved by the great deities and those mysteries also of the same kind that are preserved by the Rishis, has never to succumb to any evil Such a person becomes also freed from every fear.

9. That man who, with his senses under thorough restraint, reads these sections describing these auspicious and meritorious duties, together with their mysteries,—duties that have been described (by the previous speakers),—acquires all the merits of their actual performance.

10. Sin can never lord over him Indeed, such a man can never be stained with faults of any sort Indeed, one acquires profuse merits by reading these mysteries, or by reciting them to others, or by hearing them recited.

11. The celestials and the departed Manes eat for ever the Havi and the Kavi offered by such a creature Both these, on account of the virtues of the offerer, become inexhaustible. Even such is the merit of the person who, with rapt attention, recites these mysteries to foremost of Brahmanas on days of the full moon or the new moon.

12 Such a person, on account of such a deed, becomes steady in the performance of all duties He also enjoys personal beauty and prosperity He succeeds besides this, in becoming the favourite for all time, of the Rishis and the celestials and the departed Manes

13 If a person becomes guilty of all sins except those which are classed as grave or heinous, he becomes purged off of them all by only listening to the recitation of these mysteries about religion and duty.

Bhishma said :—

14—15 Even these, O king, are the mysteries about religion and duty living in the breasts of the deities Held in high esteem by all the celestials and promulgated by Vyasa, they have now been declared by me for your behoof. One who is conversant with religion and duty thinks that this excellent knowledge is even superior to the entire Earth full of riches and wealth.

16 This knowledge should not be given to one who has no faith, or to one who is an atheist, or to one who has fallen away from the duties of his caste, or to one who is shorn of mercy or to one who is given to the science of empty disputations, or to one who is hostile to his preceptors, or to one who thinks all creatures to be different from oneself.

CHAPTER CXXXV.

(ANUSHASANIKA PARVA).—Continued.

Yudhishthira said :—

1. Who are those persons, O Bharata from whom a Brahmana in this world may take his food? From whom may a Kshatriya, a Vaishya, and a Shudra take their food respectively?

Bhishma said :—

2 A Brahmana may take his food from another Brahmana, or from a Kshatriya, or from a Vaishya, but he must never take food from a Shudra

3 A Kshatriya may take his food from a Brahmana, a Kshatriya or a Vaishya. He must, however, not take food given by Shudras who are given to evil ways and who partake of all sorts of food without any hesitation.

4 Brahmanas and Kshatriyas can partake of food given by such Vaishyas as serve the sacred fire every day, as are faultless in character, and as perform the vow of Chaturmasya.

5 But the man who accepts food from a Shudra, swallows the very abomination of the Earth, and drinks the excretions of the human body, and partakes of the filth of all the world

6 He partakes of the very filth of the Earth who takes his food thus from a Shudra. Indeed, those Brahmanas who accept their food from Shudras, take the dirt of the Earth.

7. If one engages in the service of a Shudra, he is doomed to perdition, though he may duly perform all the rites of his caste A Brahmana, a Kshatriya, or a Vaishya, so engaging, is doomed, although given to the proper performance of religious rites

8 It is said that a Brahmana's duty consists in studying the Vedas and seeking the behoof of humanity, that a Kshatriya's duty consists in protecting men and that a Vaishya's in promoting their material prosperity.

9 A Vaishya lives by distributing the fruits of his own deeds and agriculture The breeding of kine and trade are the legitimate duties in which a Vaishya may engage without fear of censure

10 The man who gives up his own proper occupation and does that of a Shudra, should be regarded as a Shudra, and, on no account, should any food be accepted from him

11. Professors of medicine mercenary soldiers the priest who acts as warder of the house, and persons who devote a whole year to study without any profit, are all to be regarded as Shudras

12—13 And those who foolishly partake of food offered at ceremonials in a Shudra's house, suffer from a dreadful disaster. On account of partaking such forbidden food, they loose their family, strength, and energy, and acquire the status of lower animals degenerating to the position of dogs, fallen in virtue and devoid of all religious observances.

14. He who takes food from a physician, takes but an excrement, the food of a harlot is like urine, that of a skilled mechanic is like blood.

15 If a good Brahmana takes the food of one who lives by his learning, he is considered as taking the food of a Shudra. All good men should avoid such food.

16 The food of a person who is censured by all, is said to be like a drink from a pot of blood The acceptance of food from a wicked person is as heinous as the killing of a Brahmana.

17. One should not accept food if he is slighted and not received with due honors by the giver. A Brahmana, who does so, is soon possessed by disease, and his family soon becomes extinct.

18 By accepting food from the warder of a city, one degenerates to the status of the lowest outcaste.

19. If a Brahmana accepts food from one who is guilty of slaying either a cow or a Brahmana, or from one who has committed adultery with his perceptor's wife, or from a drunkard, he helps to promote the family of Rakshasas.

20. By taking food from a eunuch, or from an ungrateful person, or from one who has misappropriated money entrusted to his care, one is born in the country of the Savaras situated beyond the limit of the middle country

21. I have thus duly described to you the persons from whom food may be accepted and from whom it may not Now tell me, O son of Kunti, what else do you wish to hear from me to-day.

CHAPTER CXXXVI.

(ANUSHASANIKA PARVA)—

Continued.

Yudhishthira said:—

1. You have told me fully of those from whom food may be taken and of those from whom it should not be taken?

2 But I have grave doubts on one point. Do you O sire, enlighten me, do you tell me what expiation a Brahmana should make upon accepting the different kinds of food, those especially offered in honor of the celestials and the oblations made to the departed Manes?

Bhishma said —

3 I shall tell you, O prince, how great Brahmanas may be freed from all sins incurred by accepting food from others.

4 In accepting clarified butter, the expiation is made by pouring oblations on the fire, reciting the Savitri hymn In accepting sesamum, O Yudhishthira, the same expiation has to be made.

5 In accepting meat, or honey, or salt, a Brahmana becomes purged off of all sins by standing till the rising of the Sun.

6—7 If a Brahmana accepts gold from any one, he becomes cleansed of all sins by silently reciting the great Gayatri, and by holding a piece of iron in his hand, before the public In accepting money or clothes or women or gold, the purification is the same as before.

8 In accepting food, or rice boiled in milk and sugar, or sugarcane juice, or sugargane, or oil, or any sacred thing, one becomes purified by bathing thrice during the day, viz, at morn, noon and eve.

9 If one accepts paddy, flowers, fruits, water, half ripe barley, milk, or curdled milk, or anything made of meal or flour, the expiation is done by reciting the Gayatri prayer a hundred times.

10 In accepting shoes or clothes at obsequial ceremonies, the sin is dissipated by reciting devoutly the same hymn a hundred times.

11. The acceptance of the gift of land during an eclipse or during the period of impurity, is expiated by observing a fast during three successive nights

12 The Brahmana who partakes of oblations offered to departed Manes in course of the dark fortnight, is purified by fasting for a whole day and night

13. Without performing his ablutions a Brahmana should not recite his evening prayers, nor engage in religious meditation, nor take his food a second time. By so doing he is purified

14. Therefore the Shraddha of departed Manes has been ordained to be performed in the afternoon and then the Brahmana who has been invited beforehand should be treated with food

15 The Brahmana who takes food at the house of a dead person on the third day after the death, is purified by bathing three times daily for twelve days

16 After the expiration of twelve days, and performing the purification ceremonies duly, the sin is dissipated by giving clarified butter to Brahmanas

17. If a man takes any food in the house of a dead person within ten days after the death, he should perform all the expiations before mentioned, and should recite the Savitri hymn and perform the sin destroying Isti and Kushmanda penances.

18—19 The Brahmana who takes his food in the house of a dead person for three nights becomes purified by performing his ablutions thrice daily for seven days and thus gains all the objects of his desire, and is never troubled by misfortunes

20 The Brahmana who takes his food in the company of Shudras, is purged from all impurities by duly performing the ceremonies of purification

21 The Brahmana who takes his food in the company of Vaishyas, is purged off of all sins, by living on alms for three successive nights.

22 If a Brahmana takes his food with Kshatriyas, he should perform expiation by bathing with his clothes on 23 By eating with a Shudra on the same plate the Shudra loses his family prestige; the Vaishya by eating on the same plate with a Vaishya, loses his cattle and friends. The Kshatriya loses his prosperity, and the Brahmana, his effulgence and power.

24 In such cases expiations should be performed, and propitiatory rites should be observed and oblations offered to the celestials. The Savitri hymn should be recited and the Revati rites and Krichhra penances should be performed for destroying the sin

25 If any of the above four castes partake of food partly eaten by a person of any other caste, the expiation is forsooth, made by smearing the body with sacred articles like Rochana, Durba grass, and turmeric.

CHAPTER CXXXVII.

(ANUSHASANIKA PARVA).—Continued.

Yudhishthira said:—

1 O Bharata! kindly tell me which of the two is better, viz., charity or devotion? By this expell a great doubt from off my mind

Bhishma said:—

2 Listen to me as I recite the names of the princes who having been devoted to virtue, and having purified their hearts by penances and practised gifts and other acts of virtue, undoubtedly acquire the different celestial regions

3 The Rishi Atreya respected of all, attained O King, to the excellent celestial regions by imparting the knowledge of the limitless Supreme Being to his pupils.

4 By offering the life of his dear son, for the behoof of a Brahmana King Shivi the son of Ushinara was taken from this world to the celestial region

5 Pratardana the king of Kashi secured to himself unique and eternal fame in this as well as in the other world by giving his son to a Brahmana

6 Rantideva the son of Sankriti attained to the highest heaven by duly making gifts to the great Vasishtha

7 Devavriddha too went to the celestial region by giving a hundred-ribbed and excellent golden umbrella to a Brahmana for a sacrifice

8 The worshipful Amvarisha, too, has acquired the celestial region by making a gift of all his kingdom to a highly powerful Brahmana

9 King Janamejaya of the solar race, went to the highest heaven by making a gift of earrings, fine vehicles, and cows to Brahmanas,

10. The Royal Sage Vrishadarvi went to the celestial region by making gifts of various jewels and beautiful houses to Brahmanas.

11. King Nimi of Vidarva, acquired the celestial region with his sons, friends and cattle, by giving his daughter and kingdom to the great Agastya.

12. The illustrious Rama, the son of Jamadagni, acquired the eternal regions far beyond his expectation by giving lands to Brahmanas.

13 Vashishtha, the greatest of Brahmanas, saved all the creatures at a time of great drought when the Rain God did not bestow his grateful showers upon the Earth, and for this deed he has secured eternal bliss for himself.

14 The highly-illustrious Rama the son Dasharatha, acquired the eternal regions by making gifts of riches at sacrifices.

15. The illustrious Royal Sage Kakshasena went to the celestial region by duly making over to the great Vahsishtha the wealth which he had deposited with him.

16 Forthwith Marutta the son of Abikshita and the grandson of Karandhama, by giving his daughter in marriage to Angiras, went to the celestial region.

17. The highly devout king of Panchala, Brahmadatta, attained the blessed way by giving away a valuable conchshell.

18 King Mitrasaha ascended to Heaven by giving his favourite wife Madayanti to the great Vashishtha.

19 Sudyumna, the son of Manu, attained to the most blessed regions by duly punishing the high-souled Likhita.

20. The celebrated Royal Sage Sahastrachitta went to the blessed regions by sacrificing his dear life for a Brahmana.

21. The king Satadyumna went to heaven by giving to Maudgala a golden palace filled with all the objects of desire

22 Formerly, King Sumanyu by giving to Shandilya heaps of food resembling a hill, went to the celestial region.

23. The Shalwa prince Dyutimat of great effulgence attained to the highest regions by giving his kingdom to Richika

24 The Royal Sage Madirashwa went to the region of the celestials by giving his slender-waisted daughter to Hiranyahasta.

25. The lordly Lomapada attained all the objects of his desire by giving his daughter Shanta in marriage to Rishyashringa.

26. The Royal Sage Bhagiratha went to the eternal regions by giving his famous daughter Hansi in marriage to Kautsa.

27 King Bhagiratha acquired the most blessed regions by giving hundreds and thousands of kine with their young one to Kolala.

28 These and many other men, O Yudhishthira, have attained to the celestial region, by the merit of their charities and penances and they have also returned from there again and again.

29 Their fame will last as long as the world will last. I have related to you, O Yudhishthira, this story of those good householders who have attained to eternal regions by virtue of their charities and penances

30 These people have acquired the celestial region by their charities and by performing sacrifices and by procreating children.

31. O foremost scion of Kuru's race, these men devoted their virtuous intellects to the celebration of sacrifices and charities by always performing acts of charity

32 O powerful prince, as night has set in I shall explain to you in the morning whatever doubts may spring up in your mind.

CHAPTER CXXXVIII.

(ANUSHASANIKA PARVA)—Continued.

Yudhishthira said:—

1. I have heard from you, O sire, the names of those kings who have ascended to the celestial region O you whose power is great in the observance of the vow of truth, by following the religion of gift,

2 How many kinds of gift are there? What are the fruits of the several kinds of gifts respectively.

3 For what reasons what kinds of gifts made to what persons yield merits? Indeed, to what persons should what gifts be made? For what reasons are how many kinds of gifts to be made? I wish to hear all this in full.

Bhishma said:—

4. Listen, O son of Kunti, in full to me, O sinless one, as I describe the subject of gifts. Indeed, I shall tell you, O Bharata, how gifts should be made to all the orders of men.

5 Gifts are made from desire of merit, from desire of profit, from fear, from free choice, and from pity, O Bharata! Gifts, therefore should be known to be of five sorts Listen now to the reasons for which gifts are thus divided into five classes.

6 With mind shorn of malice, one should make gifts to Brahmanas, for by making gifts to them one wins fame in this world and great happiness in the next

7. He is in the habit of making gifts, or he will make gifts, or he has already made gifts to me Hearing such words from solicitors, one gives away all kinds of riches to a particular solicitor.

8. I am not his, nor is he mine If disregarded, he may injure me From such motives of fear even a learned and wise man may make gifts to an ignorant wretch.

9 This one is dear to me I also am dear to him Actuated by considerations like these an intelligent person, freely and with alacrity, makes gifts to a friend.

10 The person who solicits me is poor. He is, again, satisfied with a little. From considerations such as these, one should always make gifts to the poor, moved by pity.

11. These are the five sorts of gift. They increase the giver's merits and fame The Lord of all creatures has said that one should always make gifts according to his power.

CHAPTER CXXXIX.

(ANUSHASANIKA PARVA)—Continued

Yudhishthira said:—

1. O grandfather, you are endued with great wisdom Indeed, you are fully conversant with every branch of learning. In our great family you are the only individual who have mastered sciences

2 I wish to hear from you discourses of Religion and Profit, which bring on happiness in the next world and that are fraught with wonder to all creatures.

3 The time that has come is full of distress. The line of it does not generally come to kinsmen and friends. Indeed, except you, O foremost of men, we have now none else who can take the place of an instructor.

4 If, O sinless one, I with my brothers deserve your favour, you should answer the questions I wish to ask you.

5 This one is Narayana who is gifted with every prosperity and is honored by all the kings Even he waits upon you, showing you every indulgence and honoring you greatly.

6 You should describe it to me, through affection, for my benefit as also for that of my brothers, in the presence of Vasudeva himself and of all these kings.

Vaishampayana said:—

7. Hearing these words of king Yudhishthira, Bhishma, the son of the river Ganges, filled with joy on account of his affection for the monarch and his brothers, said what follows.

Bhishma said:—

8 I shall certainly recite to you discourses that are charming on the subject, O king, of the power of this Vishnu as displayed in days of yore and as I have heard (from my preceptors).

9 Listen to me also as I describe the power of that great god who has a bull for his emblem Listen to me as I describe also the doubt that filled the mind of the wife of Rudra and that of Rudra himself.

10 Once on a time the virtuous Krishna observed a vow extending for two and ten years For seeing him who had performed the rite of initiation for the observance of his great vow, there came to that place Narada and Parvata, and Krishna-Dwaipayana and Dhaumya, that foremost of silent reciters, Devala, Kashyapa, and Hastikashyapa.

12 Other Rishis also, gifted with initiation and self-restraint, followed by their disciples and accompanied by many Siddhas and many ascetics of great merit, came there.

13 The son of Devaki offered them such laudable honors of hospitality as are offered to the gods alone.

14 Those great Rishis sat themselves down upon seats some of which were green and some were gold-hued and some were made of the plumes of the peacock and some were perfectly new and fresh.

15 Thus seated, they began to converse sweetly with one another on subjects of Religion and Duty as also with many royal sages and celestials.

16. At that time the energy, in the form of fire, of Narayana rising from the fuel that consisted of the rigid observance of his vow, came out of the mouth of Krishna of wonderful deeds.

17 That fire began to consume those mountains with their trees and creepers and little plants, as also with their birds and deer and beasts of prey and reptiles

18. Soon the summit of that mountain presented a distressing and pitiful sight Inhabited by animals of various kinds which began to utter cries of woe and pain, the summit soon became bereft of every living creature.

19 That fire of powerful flames having consumed everything without living a residue, at last returned to Vishnu and touched his feet like a docile disciple

20 That crusher of enemies viz Krishna seeing that mountain burnt cast a benignant look upon it and thereby brought it back to its former condition

21 That mountain thereupon once more became bedecked with flowering trees and creepers, and once more echoed with the notes and cries of birds and deer and animals of prey and reptiles

22 Seeing that wonderful and inconceivable spectacle, all the ascetics became filled with wonder. Their hair stood erect and their vision was disturbed with tears

23. Seeing those Rishis thus stricken with wonder, that foremost of speakers Narayana addressed them in these sweet and refreshing words —

24. Why, indeed, has wonder filled the hearts of this collection of Rishis, these ascetics who are always free from attachment of every kind, who are divested of the idea of mine ness, and who are fully conversant with every sacred science

25 These Rishis having penances for wealth and freed from every stain, should explain to me truly this doubt which has originated in my mind.

The Rishis said:—

26 You are the creator of all the worlds, and the destroyer of them again You are Winter, you are Summer, and you are the Season of Rains.

27 Of all the creatures, mobile and immobile that exist on Earth you are the father, you are the mother, you are the master, and you are the origin.

28 Even thus O destroyer of Madhu is a matter of wonder and doubt with us O source of all auspiciousness you should explain to us that doubt, viz, the issue of fire from your mouth.

29 Our fears being removed, we shall then, O Hari, recite to you what we have heard and seen.

Vasudeva said —

30 The fire that came out from my mouth and that resembles the all destroying Yuga-Fire in splendour, and by which this mountain has been crushed and scorched is nothing else than the power of Vishnu

31 Ye Rishis ye are persons who have governed anger, who have brought your senses under complete control who are gifted with wealth of penances, and who are very gods in power. Yet you have allowed yourselves to be agitated and distressed

32 I am now engaged wholly with the observances about a rigid vow Indeed on account of my observing the vows of an ascetic a fire came out from my mouth. You should not allow yourselves to be agitated therefor

33 It is for observing a rigid vow that I came to this charming and sacred mountain The object that has brought me here is to acquire, by the help of penances, a son that would be my equal in power.

34 On account of my penances the Soul existing in my body became changed into fire and came out of my mouth That fire had gone to see the boon giving Grandfather all the universe.

35. The Grandfather, ye foremost of ascetics, told my soul that half the energy of the great god having the bull for his emblem would take birth as my son

36 That fire returning from its mission, has come back to me and approached my feet like a disciple desirous of attending to me dutifully Indeed, renouncing its fury it has come back to its own proper nature.

37 I have thus told you in brief, a mystery belonging to Him who has the lotus for his origin and who is gifted with great intelligence Ye Rishis having penances for wealth, you should not yield to fear

38 You are gifted with far reaching vision You can proceed to every place without any obstacle Radiant with vows observed by ascetics, you are adorned with knowledge and science

39 I now ask you to tell me something that is highly wonderful which you have heard of or seen on Earth or in the celestial region

40 I am anxious to taste the honey of words which will drop from your lips and which, I am sure, will be as sweet as a jet of nectar itself.

41. If I see anything on Earth or in the celestial region, which is highly delightful and wonderful but which is unknown to all of you, O god-like Rishis, that is on account of my own supreme Nature which is incapable of being obstructed by anything Anything wonderful which I know by nature or by my own inspiration, ceases to appear wonderful to me.

43 Anything, however, that is recited by pious persons and that is heard from those who are good, deserves to be accepted with respect and faith. Such discourses exist on Earth for a long time and will last like characters engraved on rocks.

44 I wish, therefore, to hear at this meeting of ourselves, something dropping from the lips of persons who are good and who cannot fail to be productive of good to men.

45 Hearing these words of Krishna, all those ascetics became filled with wonder. They began to look at Janarddana with those eyes of theirs that were as beautiful and large as the petals of the lotus

46 Some of them began to glorify him and some began to adore him with respect. Indeed, all of them then sang the praises of the destroyer of Madhu with words whose meanings were adorned with the eternal Richs

47 All those ascetics then appointed Narada, that foremost of all persons conversant with words, to satisfy the request of Vasudeva.

The Ascetics said :—

48—49 You should, O Narada, describe in full, from the beginning, to Hrishikesha, that wonderful and inconceivable incident which took place, O powerful one, on the mountains of Himavat and which, O ascetic, was seen by those of us who had gone there in course of our sojourn to the sacred waters Indeed, for the behoof of all the Rishis here collected, you should recite that incident

50 Thus addressed by those ascetics, the celestial Rishi, viz, the divine Narada, then recited the following story whose incidents had taken place sometime before

CHAPTER CXL

(ANUSHASANIKA PARVA.—)

Continued.

Bhishma said :—

1 Then Narada, that holy Rishi, that friend of Narayana, recited the following discourse that took place between Shankara and his wife Uma

Narada said :—

2 Once on a time the pious lord of all the celestials, viz, Mahadeva having bull for his emblem, practised severe penances on the sacred mountains of Himavat the resort of Siddhas and Charanas.

3 That charming mountain is overgrown with various kinds of herbs and adorned with various flowers. At that time they were inhabited by the different tribes of Apsaras and crowds of ghosts.

4 There the great god sat, filled with joy, and encircled by hundreds of ghostly beings who presented various aspects to the eye of the beholder. Some of them were ugly and awkward, some were very beautiful, and some presented the most wonderful appearances

5 Some had faces like the lion's, some like the tiger's, and some like the elephant's. In fact, the faces of those goblins presented every variety of animal faces—Some had faces resembling that of the jackal, some those of the pard's, some like the ape's, some like the bull's.

6 Some of them had faces like the owl's, some like the hawk's, some had faces like those of the deer.

7 The great god was also encircled by Kinnaras and Yakshas and Gandharvas and Rakshasas and various other created beings The retreat of Mahadeva also abounded with celestial flowers and shone with celestial rays of light.

8 It was perfumed with celestial sandal, and celestial incense was burnt on all sides. And it echoed with the sounds of celestial instruments.

9 Indeed, it resounded with the beat of Mridangas and Panavas, the blare of conchs, and the sound of drums It was full of goblins of diverse tribes that danced in joy and with peacocks also that danced with plumes outspread.

10 It was the resort of the celestial Rishis, the Apsaras danced there in joy. The place was exceedingly beautiful to look at It was exceedingly beautiful, resembling Heaven itself. Its view was wonderful and, indeed, its beauty and sweetness was beyond description.

11 With the penances of that great god who sleeps on mountain breasts that king of mountains shone with great beauty. It resounded with the chaunt of Vedas uttered by learned Brahmanas given to Vedic recitation Echoing with the hum of bees, O Madhava the mountain became peerless in beauty

12. Seeing the great god, who has a fierce form and who looks like a great festival, the ascetics became filled, O Janardana, with great joy.

13—14 All the highly blessed ascetics the Siddhas who have drawn in their vital seed, the Maruts, the Vasus, the Saddhyas, the Vishwedevas, Vasava himself, the Yakshas, the Nagas, the Pishachas, the Regents of the world, the several sacred Fires, the Winds, and all the great creatures lived on that mountain with minds concentrated in Yoga

15 All the Seasons were present there and filled those regions with all sorts of wonderful flowers Various kinds of burning herbs illuminated the woods and forests on that mountain.

16 Various species of birds, filled with joy, danced about and sang merrily on the charming breast of that mountain Those birds were exceedingly loveable on account of the notes they uttered.

17 The great Mahadeva sat, beautifully on one of the peaks that was adorned with excellent minerals, as if it served the purposes of a fine bedstead

18 Round his loins was a tiger-skin and a lion-skin was his upper garment His sacred thread consisted of a snake His arms were decked with a pair of red armlets.

19. His beard was green. He had matted locks on his head Of dreadful features he fills with fear the hearts of all the enemies of the gods He removes the fear of all creatures He is adored by his worshippers as the deity having the bull for his emblem

20. The great Rishis, seeing Mahadeva, bowed to him by touching the ground with their heads Gifted with forgiving souls, they all became freed from every sin and thoroughly purified.

21. The retreat of that lord of all creatures, filled with many terrible forms, shone with a peculiar beauty Abounding with many large snakes, it was unapproachable and unbearable.

22 Within the twinkling of the eye O destroyer of Madhu, everything there became highly wonderful Indeed, the house of that great deity having the bull for his emblem began to blaze with a terrible beauty.

23. To Mahadeva seated there, came his wife the daughter of Himavat, surrounded by the wives of the ghostly beings who are the companions of the great god Her dress was like that of her husband and the vows she observed, were like those of his.

24 She held a jar on her loins that was filled with the waters of every Tirtha, and was accompanied by the presiding goddess of all the mountain rivers. Those auspicious ladies followed her.

25 The goddess came, raining flowers on all sides and various kinds of sweet perfumes She who loved to live on the breast of Himavat, advanced in this guise towards her great husband

26 With smiling lips and desirous of playing a jest, the beautiful Uma covered from behind with her two beautiful hands, the eyes of Mahadeva.

27. As soon as Mahadeva's eyes were thus covered, all the regions became dark, and life seemed to be extinct everywhere in the universe The Homa rites ceased The universe became suddenly deprived of the sacred Vashat also

28 All living creatures became dispirited and filled with fear. Indeed, when the eyes of the lord of all creatures were thus closed, the universe appeared sunless

29. Soon, however, that besetting darkness disappeared A powerful and burning flame of fire came out from Mahadeva's forehead

30. A third eye, resembling another sun, appeared (on it) That eye began to shine like the Yuga Fire and began to consume that mountain.

31. Seeing what took place, the large-eyed daughter of Himavat bowed her head to Mahadeva gifted with that third eye which resembled a blazing fire. She stood there with looks fixed on her husband.

32—33 When the mountain forests burned on all sides with their Salas and other trees of straight stems, and their delightful sandals and various excellent medicinal herbs, herds of deer and other, animals filled with fear, came quickly to the place where Hara sat and sought His protection. With those creatures almost filling it, the Hermitage of the great deity shone with a sort of peculiar beauty.

34 Meanwhile that fire, swelling wildly, soared up to the very sky and endued with the splendour and unsteadiness of lightning and looking like a dozen suns in power and effulgence, covered every side like the all-destroying Yuga Fire

35 In a moment the Himavat mountains were consumed, with their minerals and summits and blazing herbs

36 Seeing Himavat crushed and consumed, the daughter of that king of mountains sought the protection of the great deity and stood before him with her hands joined in respect

37 Seeing Uma overcome by womanly mildness and finding that she was reluctant to see her father Himavat reduced to that pitiable condition, then Sharva cast kind looks upon the mountain.

38 In a moment the whole of Himavat regained his former condition and became as beautiful to look at as ever Indeed, the mountain displayed a cheerful aspect All its trees became bedecked with flowers.

39 Seeing Himavat restored to his natural condition the goddess Uma, divested of every fault addressed her husband, that master of all creatures viz, the divine Maheshwara, in these words

Uma said —

40 O Holy One O Lord of all creatures, O God holding trident, O you of high vows, a great doubt has filled my mind! You should remove that doubt of mine

41. Why has this third eye appeared in your forehead? Why also was the mountain consumed with the forests and all that belonged to it?

42. Why also, O illustrious god, have you restored the mountain to its former condition? Indeed, having burnt it once, why have you again filled it with trees?

Maheshwara said —

43 O goddess without any fault, for your having covered my eyes through an act of indiscretion, the universe became in a moment devoid of light

44 When the universe became sunless and therefore, all became dark, O daughter of the prince of mountains, I created a third eye for protecting all creatures

45 The great energy of that eye crushed and consumed this mountain For pleasing you, however, O goddess, I once more restored Himavat to his pristine condition for making good the injury.

Uma said —

46 O Holy One, why are those faces of yours which are on the east, the north, and the west, so beautiful and so agreeable to look at like the very moon.

47. And why is that face of yours which is on the south so dreadful? Why are your matted locks tawny in colour and so erect? Why is your throat blue like the peacock's plumes?

48 Why, O illustrious god is the Pinaka always in your hand? Why are you always a Brahmacharin with matted locks?

49 O lord, you should explain all these to me I am your wife who seeks to follow the same duties with you Further, I am your devoted worshipper, O deity having highly the bull for your emblem

50 Thus addressed by the daughter of the king of mountains, the illustrious holder of Pinaka, the powerful Mahadeva became highly pleased with her.

51 The great god then addressed her, saying,—O blessed lady, hear as I explain with the reasons thereof, why my forms are so

---

CHAPTER CXLI.

(ANUSHASANIKA PARVA) — Continued.

The Blessed and Holy One said :—

1. Formerly a blessed and foremost of women, was created by Brahman, called Tilottama, by collecting beauty from every beautiful object in the universe.

2 One day, that lady of beautiful face, peerless in the universe for beauty of form, came to me, O goddess, for circumambulating me but, in sooth, moved by the desire of tempting me.

3 In whatever direction that lady of beautiful teeth turned a new face of mine instantly appeared. All these faces of mine became handsome to look at 4 Thus, on account of the desire of seeing her, I became four faced, through Yoga power Thus I showed my high Yoga power in becoming four faced.

5 With that face of mine which is turned towards the east, I exercise the sovereignty of the universe With that face of mine which is turned towards the north, I sport with you, O you of faultless features.

6 That face of mine which is turned towards the west is handsome and auspicious With it I ordain the happiness of all creatures That face of mine which is turned towards the south is dreadful With it I destroy all creatures.

7 I live as a Brahmacharin with matted locks on my head for doing good to all creatures. The bow Pinaka is always in my hand for accomplishing the work of the celestials.

8. Formerly, Indra, desirous of acquiring my prosperity, had hurled his thunderbolt at me With that weapon my throat was scorched. Therefore I have become blue-throated.

Uma said :—

9 When, O foremost of all creatures, there are so many excellent beautiful cars, why have you selected a bull for your vehicle?

Maheshwara said :—

10. Formerly, the Grandfather Brahman created the celestial cow Surabhi giving profuse milk. After her creation there sprang from her a large number of kine all of which gave sufficient quantities of milk sweet as nectar.

11. Once on a time a quantity of froth fell from the mouth of one of her calves on my body. I was enraged at this and my anger scorched all the kine which thereupon became diversified in colour.

12. I was then pacified by the Lord of all the worlds, viz., Brahman, conversant with all subjects. It was he who gave me this bull both as a car for bearing me and as device on my banner.

Uma said :—

13 You have many houses, in the celestial region, of various forms and possessed of every comfort and luxury. Why, O Holy One, do you live in the crematorium, abandoning all those delightful palaces.

14. The crematorium is full of the hair and bones (of the dead), abounds with vultures and jackals, and is covered with hundreds of funeral pyres.

15 Full of carrion and muddy with fat and blood, with entrails and bones scattered all over it, and always echoing with the howls of jackals, it is certainly an impure place.

Maheshwara said :—

16 I always travel over the whole Earth in search after a sacred spot I do not, however, see any spot that is more sacred than the crematorium

17. Therefore, of all houses, the crematorium appears to me to be the best, shaded as it generally is by branches of the banian and adorned with torn garlands of flowers.

18 O you of sweet smiles the multitudes of goblins that are my companions love to live in such spots I do not like, O goddess, to live anywhere, without those goblins by my side

19 Therefore, the crematorium is a sacred house to me Indeed, O auspicious lady, it appears to me to be very Heaven Highly sacred and endued with great merit, the crematorium is much praised by persons desirous of having holy abodes.

Uma said :—

20 O Holy One, O lord of all creatures, O foremost of all observers of duties and religious rites, I have a great doubt, O holder of Pinaka, O giver of boons

21. These ascetics, O powerful lord, have practised various kinds of austerities. In the world are seen ascetics wandering everywhere under various forms and clad in various kinds of dress

22 For benefitting this large number of Rishis, as also myself, do you kindly remove, O chaister of all enemies, this doubt of mine.

23 What are the characteristics of Religion or Duty? How, indeed, do men unacquainted with the details of Religion or Duty succeed in observing them O powerful lord, O you who are conversant with Religion, do you tell me this.

Narada said :—

24. When the daughter of Himavat, put this question, the assemblage of Rishis there present, adored the goddess with words adorned with Richs and with hymns fraught with deep meaning.

Maheshwara said :

25 Abstention from injury, truthfulness of speech, mercy towards all beings tranquility of soul and the making of gifts to the best of one's power form the foremost duties of the householder.

26—27. Abstention from sexual union with the wife of other men protection of the riches and the woman committed to his care, reluctance to appropriate what is not given to one, and avoidance of honey and meat — these are the five chief duties Indeed, Religion or Duty has many branches all of which yield happy results These are the duties which those embodied creatures who consider duty as superior, should observe and practise. These are the sources of merit.

Uma said :—

28 O Holy One I wish to ask you another question about which I entertain great doubts. You should answer it and remove my doubts. What are the meritorious duties of the four castes.

29 What are the duties of the Brahmana? What of the Kshatriya? What are the duties of the Vaishya? And what are the duties of the Shudra.

The Holy One said:—

30 O highly blessed lady, the question you have put, is a very proper one Those persons who belong to the twice born order, are considered as highly blessed, and are, indeed, gods on earth

31. Forsooth, the observance of fasts, is always the duty of the Brahmana When the Brahmana succeeds in properly observing all his duties, he becomes at one with Brahma.

32. The proper observance of the duties of Brahmacharyya, O goddess, are his ritual The observance of vows and the investiture with the sacred thread form his other duties It is by these that he becomes truly twice-born.

33 He becomes a Brahmana for adoring his preceptors and other elders as also the celestials Indeed, that religion which has for its soul the study of the Vedas, is the source of all virtue Even that is the religion which those embodied creatures who are given to virtue and duty, should observe and practise.

Uma said:—

34 O Holy One, my doubts have not been removed You should explain in detail what the duties are of the four respective castes of men.

Maheshwara said:—

36. Listening to the mysteries of religion and duty, observance of the vows laid down in the Vedas attention to the sacred fire, and accomplishment of the business of the preceptor, leading a mendicant life, always bearing the sacred thread, constant recitation of the Vedas, and rigid observance of the duties of a celibate life, constitute the duties of the Brahmana.

37. After the student life is over, the Brahmana, at the behest of his preceptor, should leave his preceptor's abode for returning to his father's house. Upon his return he should duly marry a proper wife.

38 Another duty of the Brahmana consists of avoiding the food prepared by the Shudra. Walking along the path of virtue, always observing fasts and the practices of Brahmacharyya, form his other duties.

39 The householder should keep up his domestic fire for daily adoration. He should study the Vedas. He should pour libations in honor of the departed Manes and the celestials. He should keep his senses under proper restraint He should eat what remains after serving gods and guests and all his dependants. He should be abstemious in food, truthful in words, and pure both in body and mind.

40 Attending to guests is another duty of the householder, as also the keeping up of the three sacrificial fires. The householder should also attend to the ordinary sacrifices called Ishti and should also dedicate animals to the deities according to the ordinances.

41. Indeed, the celebration of sacrifices is his greatest duty as also a complete abstention from injury to all creatures Never to eat before serving the celestials and guests and dependants is another duty of the householder. The food that remains after serving gods and guests and the dependants is called Vighasa. The householder should eat Vighasa.

42. Indeed, to eat after the members of his family including servants and other dependants, is considered as one of the especial duties of the twice-born householder, who should, besides, be conversant with the Vedas.

43. The conduct of husband and wife, in the case of the householder, should be equal. He should every day make offerings of flowers and other articles to those celestials who preside over domesticity.

44 The householder should see that his house is every day properly rubbed with (cowdung and water). He should also observe fasts every day. Well cleaned and well-rubbed, his house should also be every day fumigated with the smoke of clarified butter poured on his sacred fire in honor of the celestials and the departed Manes.

45 Even these are the duties of a twice-born householder. Those duties really upholds the world. Those duties always and eternally emanate from those pious persons among the Brahmanas who live like householders.

46 Do you listen to me with rapt attention, O goddess, for I shall now tell you what the duties are of the Kshatriya and about which you have asked me.

47. From the beginning it has been said that the duty of the Kshatriya is to protect all creatures The king gets a fixed share of the merits acquired by his subjects. By that means the king becomes gifted with righteousness.

48. The king who rules and protects his subjects piously, acquires by virtue of the protection he offers to others, many regions of happiness in the next world

49 The other duties of a Kshatriya consist of self control and Vedic study, the pouring of libations on the sacred fire, the making of gifts study, the bearing of the sacred thread, sacrifices, the performance of religious rites the support of servants and dependants, and preseverance in acts that have been undertaken.

51—52 Another duty of his is to give punishments proportionate to the offences committed It is also his duty to celebrate sacrifices and other religious rites according to the ordinances laid down in the Vedas Properly judging the disputes of litigants before him, and truthfulnes of speech, and interference for helping the distressed, are the other duties by doing which the king acquires great glory both in this world and in the next He should also sacrifice his life on the field of battle, having shown great prowess on behalf of kine and Brahmanas.

53 Such a king acquires in the celestial region such regions of happiness as are capable of being acquired by the performance of Horse Sacrifices

54 The duties of the Vaishya always are the keep of cattle and agriculture, the pouring of libations on the sacred fire, the making of gifts, and study.

55 Trade, walking in the path of virtue, hospitality peacefulness, self-control welcoming of Brahmanas, and renouncing things are the other eternal duties of the Vaishya.

56 The Vaishya, engaged in trade and walking in the path of virtue, should never sell sesame and perfumery and juices or liquid substances He should perform the duties of hospitality towards all

57. He is at liberty to pursue virtue and profit and pleasure according to his means and asmuch as is judicious for him The service of the three twice born classes forms the high duty of the Shudra.

58 That Shudra who is truthful in speech and who has controlled his senses, is considered as having acquired meritorious penances Indeed the Shudra, who having got a guest performs the duties of hospitality towards him is considered as acquiring the merit of great penances

59. That intelligent Shudra whose conduct is virtuous and who adores the deities and Brahmanas, gets desirable rewards of virtue

60. O beautiful lady, I have thus recited to you what are the duties of the four castes Indeed, O blessed lady, I have told you what are their respective duties. What else do you wish to hear?

Uma said :—

61. You have recited to me what are the respective duties of the four castes, auspicious and beneficial for them Do you now tell me O Holy One, what are the common duties of the all castes

Maheshwara said :—

62. The foremost of all beings in the universe, viz, the Creator Brahmana always seeking righteous accomplishments, created the Brahmanas for rescuing all the worlds Among all created beings, they are gods on Earth.

63 I shall at the begining tell you what are the religious acts which they should do and what are the rewards which they acquire through them The religion of the Brahmanas is the foremost of all religions

64 For the sake of the virtue three religions were created by the Self-Create Whenever the world is created those Religions are created by the Grandfather. Do ye listen.

65 These are the three eternal Religions The Religion prescribed in the Vedas is the greatest, that of the Smritis is the next in the order of importance; the third in importance is that which is based upon the practices of the virtuous

66 The Brahmana, endued with learning should have the three Vedas He should never make the study of the Vedas. He should devote himself to the three well-known deeds (of making gifts, studying the Vedas, and performing sacrifices) He should be above the three (viz, lust anger and cupidity) He should be the friend of all creatures A person who possesses these qualities is called a Brahmana

67 The lord of all the universe declared these six deeds for the observance of Brahmanas Listen to those eternal duties.

68 The celebration of sacrifices officiating at the sacrifices of others, the making of gifts the acceptance of gifts teaching and study, are the six deeds by doing which a Brahmana acquires religious merit

69 Indeed the daily study of the Vedas is a duty Sacrifice is (another) eternal duty. The making of gifts according to his power and the ordinance, is, in his case, much praised.

70 Tranquility of mind is a great duty that is in vogue among the righteous Householders of pure mind are capable of acquiring very great merit.

71—72 Indeed, he who purifies his soul by the performance of the five sacrifices, who is truthful in speech, who is shorn of malice, who makes gifts, who treats with hospitality and honor all regenerate guests, who lives in well cleaned houses, who is shorn of pride, who is always sincere in his dealings, who uses sweet and assuring words towards others, who takes a pleasure in serving guests and others arrived at his house, and who eats the food that remains after the requirements have been satisfied of all the members of his family and dependants, acquires great merit.

73 That man who offers water to his guests for washing their feet and hands, who presents the Arghya for honoring him, who duly gives seats, and beds, and lamps for lightning the darkness, and shelter to those who come to his house, is considered, as highly righteous

74 That householder who rises at dawn and washes his mouth and face and gives food to his guests and having honored them duly dismisses them from his house and follows them for a little distance, wins eternal merit.

75 Hospitality towards all, and the pursuit of the three fold objects, are the duties of the householder The duties of the Shudra consist in the pursuit of the three-fold objects

76 The Religion laid down for the householder has action for its chief characteristic Auspicious, and beneficial to all creatures, I shall explain it to you

77 The householder should always make gifts according to his power He should also perform sacrifices frequently, Indeed he who wishes to secure his own good, should always achieve meritorious acts

78 The householder should acquire riches by fair means, The riches thus acquired should be carefully divided into three parts keeping the requirements of virtue in view

79 With one of those portions he should accomplish all acts of virtue With another he should seek to satisfy his cravings for pleasure The third portion he should lay out for increasing

80 The Religion of Renunciation is different It exists for Liberation I shall tell you the conduct that constitutes it. Listen to me in full O goddess

81 One of the duties inculcated by that Religion is Mercy towards all creatures. The man who follows it should not live in one place for more than a day For acquiring Liberation, the followers of this Religion free themselves from the fetters of hope (or desire).

82 They have no attachment to habitation, to the Kamandalu they bear for the the keep of water, to the clothes that cover their loins, or the seat whereupon they rest, or the triple stick they bear in their hands, or the bed they sleep on, or the fire they want, or the chamber in which it lies.

83. A follower of this Religion fixes his heart upon the workings of his soul. His mind is devoted to Supreme Brahma. He is filled with the idea of attaining to Brahma. He is always devoted to Yoga and the Sankhya philosophy.

84 He seeks for no other shelter than the foot of a tree, He lives in vacant houses of men. He sleeps on the banks of rivers He takes a pleasure in living by such banks.

85 He is freed from every attachment, and from every bond of affection He merges the existence of his own soul into the Supreme Soul

86. Standing like a stake of wood, and abstaining from all food he does only such deeds as point to Liberation Or, he may wander about, devoted to Yoga These are the eternal duties of a follower of the Religion of Renunciation.

87 He lives aloof from men He is freed from all attachments. He never lives in the same place for more than a day. Freed from all fetters, he roves over the world Freed from all ties, he never sleeps on even the same river-bank for more than a day.

88 This is the Religion of persons conversant with Liberation, as declared in the Vedas This is the righteous path that is trodden by this virtuous. He who follows in this path, leaves no vestige behind

89 Vikshus (mendicants) are of four kinds They are Kutichakas, Vahudakas, Hansas, and Paramhansas. The second is superior to the first, the third to the second, and the fourth to the third

90. There is nothing superior to the Paramhansa; nor is there anything inferior to it or equal to it or superior to it. It is a condition shorn of sorrow and happiness, auspicious and freed from decrepitude and death, and without any change.

Uma said:—

91 You have described the Religion of the householders, that of Liberation, and that which is based upon the observances of the pious These paths are noble and highly beneficial to the world of living creatures

92 O you who are conversant with every religion I wish to hear what the high Religion is of the Rishis. I always have a liking for those who live in hermitage

93 The perfume that comes out of the the smoke of the libations of clarified butter poured on the sacred fire, seems to pervade all the hermitages and make them delightful Seeing this O great god, my heart becomes always filled with joy

94—95 O powerful god, I have doubts about the Religion of the Ascetics You are conversant with the details of all religions. Do you enlighten me O god of gods, in detail about this subject truly about which I have asked you, O great god

The Blessed and Holy One said.—

96 Yes, I shall recite to you the high and excellent Religion of the Ascetic By following the dictates of that Religion, O auspicious lady the Ascetics acquire success through the severe penances they practise.

97 O highly blessed one, do you hear, from the beginning, what are the duties of those pious Rishis who know every duty and who are known by the name of Phenapas

98 The Grandfather Brahman drank some nectar That water had flowed in the celestial region from a great sacrifice

99 The froth of that water is highly sacred and it partook of His own nature Those Rishis who live upon the measure of froth that thus came out are called Phenapas (Froth eaters) This is the conduct of those pure Rishis, O lady having penances for wealth! Listen now to me as I explain to you who the Valikhillyas are

100 The Valikhillyas are ascetics who have acquired success by their penances They live in the solar disc Living like birds those Rishis conversant with every duty of righteousness, live according to the Uncha mode

101 Their dress consists of deer skins or barks of trees Freed from pairs of opposites the Valikhillyas having penances for wealth, walk in this track of virtue.

102 They are as big as a digit of the thumb Divided into classes each class lives in the practice of its duties They wish only to practise penances. The merits they acquire by their righteous conduct are very great.

103 They are considered as having acquired an equality with the gods and exist for the fulfilment of the purposes of the gods Having dissipated all their sins by severe penances, they shine in effulgence, lighting up all the points of the compass

104 Others, called Chakracharas, are gifted with cleansed souls and devoted to the practice of mercy, Righteous in their conduct and possessed of great purity, they live in the region of Soma

105 Thus living near enough to the region of the departed Manes, they duly live by drinking the rays of Soma There are others called Samprakshalas and Ashmakuttas and Dantolukhalas.

106 These live near the Soma drinking celestials and others that drink flames of fire. With their wedded wives and with passions under complete restraint, they too live upon the rays of Soma

107 They pour libations of clarified butter on the sacred fire and worship the departed Manes under proper forms They also celebrate the well known sacrifices This is said to form their religion

108 This religion of the Rishis, O goddess is always observed by those who are houseless and who are free to go through every region including that of the celestials There are again, other classes about whom I shall speak now Do you listen

109 It is necessary that they who observe the different religions of the Rishis, should control their passions and know the Soul Indeed, in my opinion, lust and anger should be completely controlled

110—111 With corn (wealth) acquired by the Uncha mode, they should perform the following duties, viz, the pouring of libations on the sacred fire, occupying a fixed seat employing oneself during the time in the sacrifice called Dharmaratri performance of the Soma Sacrifice, acquisition of especial knowledge the giving of sacrificial presents, which forms the fifth, the daily performance of sacrifices, devotion to the worship of the ancestors and the deities, hospitality towards all

112—113 Abstention from all luxurious dishes prepared from cow's milk taking a pleasure in tranquility of heart, lying on naked rocks or the earth devotion to Yoga, eating potherbs and leaves of trees, and living upon fruits and roots and wind and water and moss, are some of practices of the Rishis by which they acquire the end that belongs to persons unsubjugated

114—115 When the smoke has ceased to curl upwards from a house, when the husking machine has ceased to ply, when the hearth-fire has been put out, when all the inmates have taken their food, when dishes are no longer carried from room to room, when mendicants have ceased to walk the streets, it is then that the man who is devoted to the Religion of Truth and tranquillity of soul wishing to have a guest should eat what remnant of food may still remain in the house By acting thus, one becomes a practiser of the Religion of the Munis.

116 One should not be arrogant, nor proud; nor cheerless and discontented; nor wonder at anything Indeed one should treat his friends and enemies alike Indeed one who is the foremost of all persons conversant with duties should treat all creatures like friends

CHAPTER CXLII

Uma said:—

1 Hermits live in charming regions, among the springs and fountains of rivers, in bowers by the sides of rivers and rills, on hills and mountains in woods and forests, and in sacred places full of fruits and roots.

2 With rapt attention and observing vows and rules, they live in even such places.

3 I wish, O Shankara to hear the sacred ordinances which they follow These hermits, O god of all gods, are persons who depend for the protection of their bodies, upon themselves alone.

Maheshwara said:—

4 Do you hear with rapt attention what are the duties of Hermits. Having listened to them with one mind, O goddess, do you fix your heart upon virtue.

5 Listen then to what the acts are that should be practised by righteous hermits crowned with success, observant of rigid vows and rules, and living in woods and forests

6—7. Performing ablutions thrice a day, adoring the departed Manes and the celestials, pouring libations on the sacred fire, performing of those sacrifices and rites called Ishti-Homa, picking up the grains of Nivara paddy, eating fruits and roots, and using oil that is pressed out from Inguda and castor seeds, form their duties.

8 Having performed the practises of Yoga and become crowned with (ascetic) success and freed from lust and anger, they should seat themselves in the attitude called Virasana. Indeed, they should live in those places which are inaccessible to cowards.

9—10. Observant of the excellent ordinances about Yoga, sitting in summer in the midst of four fires on four sides with the sun overhead, duly practising what is called Manduka-Yoga, and always seated in the attitude called Virasana, and lying on naked rocks or the earth, these men, with hearts fixed upon virtue, must expose themselves to cold and water and fire.

11 They live upon water or air or moss. They use two pieces of stone only for husking their corn Some of them use their teeth only for such a purpose They do not keep utensils of any sort.

12 Some of them clothe themselves with rags and barks of trees or deer skins Thus do they pass their lives for the time allotted to them according to the ordinances

13 Remaining in woods and forests, they wander within woods and forests live within them, and are always to be found within them Indeed, these hermits entering into woods and forests live within them as disciples, obtaining a preceptor, live with him

14—16 The performance of the rites of Homa and the observance of the five sacrifices are their duties A due observance of the rules about distribution of the fivefold sacrifices as ordained in the Vedas, devotion to sacrifices, forming the eighth, observance of the Chaturmashya, performance of the Paurnamashya and other sacrifices, and performance of the daily sacrifices are the duties of these celibate men, freed from every attachment, and cleansed from every sin Indeed, they should live thus in the forest

17 The sacrificial ladle and the water-vessel are their chief properties They are always devoted to the three fires Virtue is in their conduct and adhering to the path of virtue, they acquire the highest end

18 These Munis, crowned with success and ever given to the Religion of Truth, acquire the highly sacred region of Brahman, or the eternal region of Soma

19 O auspicious goddess, I have thus recited to you in brief, the outlines of the religion that is followed by hermits and that has many practices in detail.

Uma said:—

20 O Holy One, O lord of all creatures, O you adored of all beings, I wish to hear what is the religion of those conclaves of ascetics who are followers of the scriptures describing ascetic success. Do you recite it to me

21. Living in woods and forests and well-accomplished in the scriptures of success, some amongst them live and act as they like, without being controlled by particular practices; others have wives How, indeed, have their practices been ordained.

Mahadeva said:—

22. O goddess, the shaving of the head and the wearing of the brown robes are the characteristics of those recluses who rove about freely; while the characteristics of those who sport with wives consist in passing their nights at home.

23 Performing ablutions three times a day is the duty of both the classes, while the Homa, with water and wild fruits, belongs to the married recluses as performed by the Rishis in general. Absorption in Yoga-Meditation, and performance of those duties which form righteousness and which have been laid down as such, are some of the other duties prescribed for them.

24. All those duties also of which I have spoken to you before as belonging to recluses living in forests, are the duties of these also Indeed, if those duties are observed, they who observe them acquire the rewards of severe penances.

25 Those forest recluses who lead married lives should indulge in the gratification of their senses with these married wives of theirs By indulging in sexual union with their wives at only those times when their seasons come, they perform the duties which have been laid down for them.

26 The religion which these virtuous men are to follow is the Religion that has been laid down and followed by the Rishis With their eyes set upon the acquisition of virtue, they should never pursue any other object of desire from a sense of uncontrolled caprice.

27. That man who gives promises of safety to all creatures, freed as his soul becomes from the stain of malice or harmfulness, becomes gifted with virtue.

28. Indeed, that person who shows mercy to all creatures, who adopts as a vow of sincere conduct towards all creatures, and who forms himself the soul of all creatures, becomes gifted with virtue.

29 A bath in all the shrines, and sincere conduct towards all creatures, are regarded as equal in point of merit, or, perhaps, the latter is a little distinguished above the other in point of merit.

30. Sincerity, it has been said, is Virtue; while insincerity or crookedness is sin That man who acts sincerely becomes indued with Virtue.

31 The man who is always devoted to sincerity of conduct, succeeds in acquiring a residence among the celestials. Hence, he who wishes to achieve the merit of virtue, should be sincere.

32. Gifted with a forgiving nature and self-control, and with anger under complete subjection, one should transform himself into an embodiment of Virtue and become freed from malice. Such a man, who becomes devoted, besides to the discharge of all the duties of Religion, becomes indued with the merit of Virtue.

33 Freed from drowsiness and procrastination, the righteous person, who follows the path of Virtue to the best of his power, and becomes possessed of pure conduct, and who is venerable in years, comes to be considered as equal to Brahma itself.

Uma said:—

34 By what course of duties, O god, do those ascetics who are attached to their respective retreats and have penances for wealth, succeed in becoming indued with great splendour?

35 By what acts, again, do kings and princes who are immensely rich, and others who are poor, succeed in getting high rewards?

36 By what acts, O god, do dwellers of the forest succeed in acquiring that place which is, eternal and in adorning their persons with celestial sandal paste.

37 O illustrious god of three eyes, O destroyer of the triple city, do you remove this doubt of mine about the auspicious subject of the observance of penances by telling everything in full.

The illustrious Deity said:—

38 Those who observe the vows of fasts and control their senses who abstain from injury of any kind to any creature, and who practise truthfulness of speech, acquire success and ascending to the celestial region sport in happiness with the Gandharvas as their companions, freed from every kind of evil.

39 That pious man who lies down in the attitude of Manduka-Yoga, and who properly and according to the ordinance performs meritorious deeds after having been duly initiated, sports in happiness in the next world in the company of the Nagas.

40 That man who lives in the company of deer and lives upon such grass and vegetables as drop from their mouths, and who has undergone the initiation and attends to the duties attached to it, succeeds in going to the capital of Indra.

41. That man who lives upon the moss he gathers and the fallen leaves of trees that he picks up, and puts up with all the severities of cold, acquires a very high place.

42. That man who lives upon either air or water or fruits and roots, acquires in the next life the affluence that belongs to the Yakshas and sports in happiness in the company of the various tribes of Apsaras.

43 Having practised for twelve years, according to the rites laid down in the ordinances, the vow relating to the endurance of the five fires in the summer season, one becomes in his next life a king.

44 That man who, having observed vows about food, practises penances for twelve years, carefully abstaining from all interdicted food, and forbidden hours as well, during the period, becomes in his next life a king.

45 That man who sits and lies on the bare ground with the canopy of heaven over his head, observes the course of duties of initiation, and then renounces his body by abstaining from all food, acquires great happiness in the celestial region.

46—51. The rewards of one who sits and lies down upon the naked ground are said to be excellent cars and beds, and rich palaces effulgent like the moon, O lady. That man who having lived upon abstemious diet and observed various excellent vows, lives depending upon his own self and then renounces his body by abstaining from all food, succeeds in ascending to Heaven and enjoying all its happiness That man who having lived in entire dependence upon his own self, observes for twelve years the duties of initiation, and at last renounces his body on the great ocean, succeeds in attaining to the regions of Varuna after death. That man who living in entire dependence upon his own self observe the duties of initiation for twelve years, and pierces his own feet with a sharp stone, acquires the happiness of the region that belongs to the Guhyakas. He who cultivates self with the help of self, who frees himself from the influence of all pairs of opposites, who is freed from every sort of attachment, and who mentally observes for twelve years such a course of conduct after initiation attains to Heaven and enjoys every happiness with the celestials as his companions.

52. He who lives in entire dependence upon his own self and observes for twelve years the duties of initiation and finally renounces his body on the fire as an oblation to the celestials, acquires the region of Brahma and is held in high esteem there.

53—55 That twice-born man, O goddess, who having properly performed initiation keeps his senses under control, and placing his Self on Self frees himself from the sense of mine ness, desirous of achieving virtue, and sets out, without a covering for his body, after the due observance of the duties of initiation for twelve years and after having placed his sacred fire on a tree, and walks along the path of heroes and lies down in the attitude of heroes, and always acts like heroes, certainly acquires the end that is reserved for heroes.

56 Such a man goes to the eternal region of Shakra where he becomes crowned with the fruition of all his desires and where he sports in joy, his body decked with garlands of celestial flowers and celestial perfumes.

57—58 Indeed that pious person lives happily in Heaven, with the celestials as his companions The hero, following the practices of heroes and devoted to that Yoga which belongs to heroes, living in the practice of Goodness, having renounced everything, performed the initiation, controlled his senses, and observing purity of both body and mind, is sure to acquire that path which is reserved for heroes Eternal regions of happiness are his.

59 Riding on a car that moves at the will of the rider, he passes through all happy regions as he likes, Indeed, living in the regions of Shakra, that blessed person always sports in joy, freed from every calamity.

CHAPTER CXLIII.

Uma said:—

1 O Holy One, O you who had torn off the eyes of Bhaga and the teeth of Pushan, O destroyer of the sacrifice of Daksha, O three eyed deity, I have a great doubt.

2 Formerly, the illustrious Self-Create created the four castes. Through the evil result of what deeds does a Vaishya become a Shudra?

3 Through what acts does a Kshatriya become a Vaishya and a Brahmana becomes a Kshatriya? By what means may such degradation of castes be warded off?

4 Through what deeds does a Brahmana take birth in his next life, in the Shudra caste? Through what acts, O powerful deity, does a Kshatriya also come down to the status of a Shudra?

5 O sinless one O lord of all created beings do you O illustrious one, remove this doubt of mine. How, again, can the three castes naturally succeed in acquiring the status Brahmanhood?

The Illustrious One said :—

6. The status of a Brahmana, O goddess, is highly difficult to attain O auspicious lady, one becomes a Brahmana through creation or birth Similarly the Kshatriya, the Vaishya, and the Shudra, all becomes so through original creation This is my opinion.

7. He, however, that is born a Brahmana goes down from his status through his own evil deeds Hence, the Brahmana after having acquired the status of the first order, should always protect it.

8 If one who is a Kshatriya or Vaishya performs those duties which are assigned to the Brahmana, after the manner of a Brahmana, he becomes a Brahman.

9 That Brahmana who renounces the duties of his order for following those of the Kshatriya, is considered as one who has fallen away from the status of a Brahmana and who has become a Kshatriya.

10—11. That little-witted Brahmana, who, moved by cupidity and folly, follows the practices assigned to Vaishyas, forgetful of his position as a Brahmana that is highly difficult to attain, comes to be considered as one who has become a Vaishya Likewise, one who is a Vaishya by birth may, by following the practices of a Shudra become a Shudra Indeed, a Brahmana falling away from the duties of his own order, may go down to the status of even a Shudra.

12. Such a Brahmana, degraded from the order of his birth and outcasted, without attaining to the region of Brahman, sinks into Hell, and in his next birth becomes born as a Shudra.

13—14 A highly blessed Kshatriya or a Vaishya, who renounces the duties of his order, and follows the practices of a Shudra, falls away from his own order and becomes a person of mixed caste. It is in this way that a Brahmana, or a Kshatriya, or a Vaishya, comes by the position of a Shudra.

15 That man who has acquired clearness of vision, through practice of the duties of His own caste, who is gifted with knowledge and science, who is pure (in body and mind) who knows every duty and is devoted to the practice of all his duties, is sure to enjoy the rewards of virtue.

16 I shall now recite to you O goddess, a saying uttered by Brahman on this subject The virtuous and those who are desirous of acquiring merit always pursue with firmness the culture of the soul.

17 The food that comes from cruel and fierce persons is censurable So also is the food that has been cooked for serving a large number of persons The same is said of the food that is cooked for the first Shraddha of a dead person So also is the food that is sullied for the usual faults and the food that is supplied by a Shudra. These should never be taken by a Brahmana at any time

18 The food of a Shudra, O goddess is always disapproved of by the great deities. This I think is the authority enunciated by the Grandfather with his own mouth.

19 If a Brahmana, who has set up the sacred fire and who performs sacrifices, were to die with any portion of a Shudra's food remaining undigested in his stomach, he is sure to be born a Shudra.

20 On account of those remains of a Shudra's food in his stomach, he falls away from the position of a Brahmana. Such a Brahmana becomes surely a Shudra.

21 The Brahmana in his next life comes by the position of that order upon whose food he lives through life or with the undigested portion of whose food in his stomach he dies.

22 That man who having acquired the sacred position of a Brahmana which is so difficult to acquire, disregards it and eats forbidden food, falls away from his high status

23—24 That Brahmana who drinks alcohol, who becomes guilty of Brahmanicide or mean in his conduct, or a thief, or who breaks his vows, or becomes impure, or unmindful of his Vedic studies, or sinful, or characterised by cupidity, or guilty of cunning, or a cheat, or who does not observe vows, or who marries a Shudra woman, or who derives his livelihood by pandering to the lusts of other people, or who sells the Soma plant, or who serves a person of a low caste, falls away from his status of Brahmanhood

25. That Brahmana who violates the bed of his preceptor, or who cherishes malice towards him, or who takes a pleasure in speaking ill of him, falls away from the status of Brahmanhood even if he knows Brahma.

26 By these good deeds again, O goddess, when performed, a Shudra becomes a Brahmana, and a Vaishya becomes a Kshatriya.

27 The Shudra should perform all the duties sanctioned for him, properly and according to the ordinance He should always serve, with obedience and humility, persons of the three other castes and serve them with care.

28 Always following the path of virtue, the Shudra should cheerfully do all this He should honor the celestials and twice-born persons He should observe the vow of hospitality to all persons.

29 With senses kept under control and becoming abstemious in food, he should never approach his wife except in her season He should ever search after persons who are holy and pure As regards food, he should eat that which remains after the needs of all persons have been fulfilled.

30. If, indeed, the Shudra wishes to be a Vaishya (in his next life) he should also abstain from meat of animals not killed in sacrifices If a Vaishya wishes to be a Brahmana (in his next life) he should perform these duties He should be truthful in speech, and shorn of pride or arrogance He should be above all pairs of opposites He should observe the duties of peace and tranquility.

31—34 He should worship the celestials in sacrifices, attend with devotion to the study and recitation of the Vedas, and become pure in body and mind. He should keep his senses under control, honor the Brahmanas, and seek the behoof of all the orders Living like a householder and eating only twice a day at the appointed hours, he should satisfy his hunger with only such food as remains after all the members of his family with dependants and guests have been fed He should be abstemious in food, and act without being actuated by the desire of reward He should be free from egotism He should worship the deities in the Agnihotra and pour libations according to the ordinance. Performing the duties of hospitality towards all persons he should, as already said, eat the food that remains after serving all others for whom it has been cooked He should, according to the ordinances laid down, adore the three fires Such a Vaishya of pure conduct is born in his next life in a high Kshatriya family.

35 If a Vaishya, after having taken birth as a Kshatriya, performs the usual purificatory rites, becomes invested with the sacred thread, and betakes himself to the observance of vows, he becomes, in his next life, an honored Brahmana.

36 Indeed, after his birth as a Kshatriya, he should make presents, worship the deities in great sacrifices with profuse presents, study the Vedas, and desirous of attaining to Heaven, should adore the three fires

37 He should interfere for removing the sorrows of the distressed and should always righteously cherish and protect his subjects He should be truthful, and do all true works, and seek happiness in conduct like this.

38 He should administer proper punishments, without laying aside the rod of punishment for good He should induce men to do righteous deeds. Guided by considerations of policy, he should take a sixth of the produce of the fields

39 He should never indulge in sexual pleasure, but live cheerfully and independently, well conversant with the science of Wealth or Profit Of righteous soul, he should seek his married wife only in her season

40 He should always observe fasts, keep his soul under restraint, devote himself to the study of the Vedas, and be pure in body and mind He should sleep on blades of Kusha grass spread out in his fire-chamber.

41 He should pursue the three-fold objects of life, and be always cheerful. He should always say "it is ready" to Shudras desirous of food.

42 He should never wish for anything from motives of gain or pleasure He should adore the ancestors and gods and guests.

43 In his own house he should live the life of a mendicant He should duly worship the deities in his Agnihotra, morning, noon, and evening every day, by pouring libations according to the ordinance.

44 With his face turned towards the enemy, he should renounce his life breaths in battle fought for the behoof of kine and Brahmanas Or he may enter the three fires sanctified with Mantras and renounce his body By doing all this he is born in his next life as a Brahmana.

45 Gifted with knowledge and science, purified from all dross and fully conversant with the Vedas, a pious Kshatriya, by his own deeds, becomes a Brahmana.

46 It is with the help of these deeds, O goddess that a person who has originated from a degraded caste, viz a Shudra, may become a Brahmana purged off of all sins and possessed of Vedic learning.

47 One who is a Brahmana, when he becomes wicked in conduct and observes no distinction about food, falls away from the status of Brahmanhood and becomes a Shudra.

48 Even a Shudra, O goddess who has purified his soul by pure deeds and who has controlled all his senses, deserves to be waited upon and served with respect as a Brahmana. This has been said by the Self Create Brahman himself.

49 When a pious nature and pious deeds are seen in even a Shudra, he should, according to my opinion, be held superior to a person of the three twice born classes.

50 Neither birth, nor the purificatory rites, nor learning, nor offspring can be considered as grounds for conferring upon one the dignity of a twice born person. Indeed, conduct is the only ground.

51 All Brahmanas in this world are Brahmanas on account of conduct. A Shudra, if he is of good conduct, is considered as equal to a Brahmana.

52 The position of Brahma, O auspicious lady, is equal wherever it exists. This is my opinion. He, indeed, is a Brahmana in whom the dignity of Brahma exists,—that condition which is bereft of qualities and which has no stain attached to it.

53 The boon-giving Brahman, while he created all creatures, himself said that the division of human beings into the four orders as dependant on birth is only for purposes of classification.

54 The Brahmana is a great field in this world—a field having feet, for it moves from place to place. He who plants seeds in that field, O beautiful lady, reaps the corps in the next world.

55 That Brahmana who wishes to secure his own good, should always live upon the remains of the food that may remain in his house after satisfying the needs of all others. He should always follow the path of virtue. Indeed, he should tread along the path of Brahma.

56 He should live, engaged in the study of the Samhitas, and remaining at home he should perform all the duties of a householder. He should always be given to the study of the Vedas, but he should never derive the means of livelihood from such study.

57. That Brahmana who always acts thus following the path of virtue, adoring his sacred fire, and engaged in the study of the Vedas, comes to be considered as Brahma.

58 Having acquired the position of a Brahmana, it should always be protected with care, O you of sweet smiles, by avoiding the stain of contact with persons born in inferior castes, by abstaining from the acceptance of gifts, and by other acts laid down in the scriptures.

59 I have thus told you a mystery, viz, the manner in which a Shudra may become a Brahmana, or that by which a Brahmana falls away from his own pure position and becomes a Shudra.

CHAPTER CXLIV.

Uma said:—

1 O Holy One, O lord of all beings, O you adored of deities and Asuras equally, tell me what are the duties and derelictions of men. Indeed, O powerful one, remove my doubts.

2 It is by these three, viz, thought, word and deed, that men become fettered with bonds. It is by the same three that they become freed from these fetters.

3 By following what conduct, O god—indeed, by what kind of acts—by what behaviour and qualities and words, do men succeed in ascending to Heaven?

The God of gods said:—

4 O goddess, you are well conversant with the true meaning of duties. You are ever devoted to Virtue and Self-Control. The question you have asked me is fraught with the benefit of all creatures. It increases the intelligence of all persons. Do you, therefore, listen to the answer.

5 Those persons who are devoted to the Religion of Truth who are righteous and destitute of the indications of the several modes of life and who enjoy the wealth acquired by fair means, succeeds in ascending to Heaven.

6 Those men who are freed from all doubts, who are gifted with omniscience, and who have eyes for seeing all things are never fettered by either virtue or sin. Those men who are shorn of all attachments can never be fettered by the chains of action.

7 They who never injure others in thought, word, or deed and who never attach themselves to anything, can never be fettered by deeds.

8 They who abstain from killing any creature who are gifted with righteous conduct who have mercy who treat friends and foes equally, and who are self-controlled, can never be fettered by acts.

9 Those men who are gifted with mercy towards all beings who succeed in creating the confidence of all living creatures and who have shaken off malice in their conduct, succeed in ascending to Heaven.

10 Those men who have no desire to appropriate others' properties, who never associate with the spouses of others and who enjoy only such wealth as has been acquired by fair means, succeed in ascending to Heaven.

11. Those men who treat the wives of other people as their own mothers and sisters and daughters, succeed in attaining to Heaven.

12 Those men who abstain from misappropriating others' things who are perfectly contented with what they themselves possess, and who live depending upon their own destiny, succeed in ascending to Heaven.

13 Those men who never know other peoples' wives, who are masters of their senses and who are given to righteous conduct, succeed in ascending to Heaven

14 This is the path, created by the gods, that the pious should follow. This is the path freed from passion and aversion, sanctioned for the pious to follow.

15 Those men who are devoted to their own wives and who seek them in only their seasons and who do not indulge in sexual pleasure, succeed in ascending to Heaven.

16 For the sake of multiplying their merit or for acquiring their means of livelihood, the wise should follow charity, penances and purity of both body and mind

17. Those who wish to ascend to Heaven, should follow in this tract and not any other.

Uma said.—

18 Tell me, O illustrious god, O sinless lord of all creatures, what are those words by which one becomes fettered and what are those words by speaking which one may be freed from fetters.

Maheshwara said —

19 Those men who never tell falsehood for either themselves or for others, or in jest or for exciting laughter, succeed in ascending Heaven.

20. They who never tell lies for acquiring their livelihood or for acquiring merit or through mere caprice, succeed in ascending to Heaven.

21. They who utter words which are smooth and sweet and faultless, and who with sincerity welcome all whom they meet with, succeed in ascending to Heaven.

22 They who never utter words which are harsh bitter and cruel and who are free from deceitfulness and evil of every kind, succeed in ascending to Heaven.

23 Those men who never utter deceitful words which create disunion between friends and who always speak what is true and what promotes good feelings, succeed in ascending to Heaven.

24 Those men who avoid harsh words and abstains from quarrels with others, who are equal in their conduct to all creatures, and who have governed their souls, succeed in ascending to Heaven.

25 They who abstain from evil speech or sinful conversation, who avoid disagreeable speeches and who utter only auspicious and agreeable words, succeed in ascending to Heaven.

26 They who never utter, under anger, such words as cut others to the quick, and who, even when under the influence of anger, speak words that are peaceful and agreeable, succeed in ascending to Heaven.

27 This religion, O goddess of speech, should always be followed by men. It is auspicious and characterised by Truth. The wise should always avoid untruth.

Uma said:—

28. Tell me, O god of gods, O holder of Pinaka, O you who are highly blessed, what those thoughts are by which a person may be fettered.

Maheshwara said:—

29 Gifted with merit that originates from mental acts, O goddess, one ascends to Heaven Listen to me, O auspicious one, as I recite to you what those acts are.

30. Listen to me, O you of sweet face, how also a mind of ill-regulated features, becomes fettered by ill regulated or evil thoughts.

31. Those men who do not seek, even mentally, to take other peoples' things even when they lie in a lone forest, succeed in ascending to Heaven.

32. Those men who care not others' belongings, even when they see it lying in a house or a village that has been deserted, ascend to Heaven.

33 Those men who do not seek, even mentally, to associate with the married wives of others, even when they see them in deserted places and under the influence of desire, succeed in ascending to Heaven.

34 Those men who, meeting with friends or enemies, behave in the same friendly way towards all, succeed in ascending to Heaven

35 Those men who are possessed of learning and mercy, who are pure in body and mind, who are firm in truth, and who are contented with what belongs to them, succeed in ascending to Heaven.

36 Those men who do not bear ill will to any creature, who do not stand in need of labour for their livelihood, who bear friendly hearts towards all beings, and who entertain mercy towards all, succeed in ascending to Heaven.

37 Those men who have faith, who have mercy, who are holy, who seek the company of holy men, and who know the distinctions between right and wrong, succeed in ascending to Heaven.

38 Those men, O goddess who know the consequences of good and bad deeds, succeed in ascending to Heaven.

39 Those men who are just in all their dealings, who have desireable accomplishments, who are devoted to the deities and the Brahmanas, and who are persevering in doing all good acts, succeed in ascending to Heaven.

40 All these men O goddess succeed in ascending to Heaven through the meritorious results of their deeds. What else do you wish to hear?

Uma said —

41 I have a great doubt, O Maheshwara, on a subject about human beings You should explain it to me carefully

42 By what deeds does a man succeed O powerful deity, in acquiring a long life? By what penances also does one acquire a long life?

43 By what acts does one become short-lived on Earth? O you who are perfectly stainless, you should tell me what are the consequences of acts.

44 Some have great good fortune and some suffer from misfortune Some are possessed of noble, and some are of ignoble, birth.

45 Some have such repulsive features as if they are made of wood while others look very handsome at even the first sight

46 Some appear to have no wisdom while others are possessed of it Some, again, are seen gifted with high intelligence and wisdom enlightened by knowledge and science

47 Some have to suffer little pain while others there are that are loaded with heavy calamities Such diverse sights are seen of men O illustrious one, you should tell me the reason of all this!

The god of gods said —

48 Indeed O goddess, I shall describe to you the fruits of acts It is by them that all human beings in this world enjoy or suffer the consequences of their acts

49—51. That man who assumes a dreadful aspect for the purpose of taking the lives of other creatures who arms himself with strong sticks for injuring other creatures, who is seen with uplifted weapons, who kills living creatures, who is shorn of mercy, who always causes tribulation to living beings, who refuses to grant protection to even worms and ants, who is cruel, one who is such, O goddess, sinks in Hell One who has an opposite disposition and who is righteous in deeds, becomes born as a handsome man.

52 The man who is cruel, goes to Hell, while he who is merciful, ascends to Heaven The man who goes to Hell, has to suffer great misery

53 One who having sunk in Hell, rises therefrom, takes birth as a short lived man.

54—57. That man who is given to slaughter and injury, O goddess, becomes, through his sinful deeds, liable to destruction Such a person becomes disagreeable to all creatures and short-lived That man who belongs to what is called the White class, who abstains from the destruction of living creatures, who has thrown away all weapons and never inflicts any punishment on any body, who never injures any creature who never causes anybody to kill creatures for him, who never kills or strikes even when struck or attempted to be killed, who never sanctions or approves an act of destruction who is gifted with mercy towards all creatures who treats others as his own self,—such a superior man, O goddess succeeds in acquiring to the dignity of a celestial Filled with joy, such a man enjoys various kinds of luxurious articles

58 If such a person is ever born in the world of men, he becomes long lived and enjoys great happiness

59 This is the way of those who are of righteous conduct and righteous deeds, and who are blessed with longevity, the way that was marked out by the Self-Create Brahman himself and which is marked by abstention from the destruction of living creatures.

CHAPTER CXLV.

Uma said:—

1. By what nature, what conduct, what deeds, and what gifts, does a man succeed in attaining to Heaven.

Maheshwara said:—

2—6 He who has a liberal disposition, who honors Brahmanas and treats them with hospitality, who makes gifts of food and drink and clothes and other articles of enjoyment to the destitute, the blind and the distressed, who makes gifts of houses erects halls digs wells, constructs shelters whence pure and cool water is distributed, excavates tanks makes arrangements for the free distributions of gifts every day, gives to all comers what each prays for, who makes gifts of seats and beds and vehicles, wealth, jewels and gems houses, all kinds of corn kine, fields, and women—he who always makes these gifts with a cheerful heart, becomes a denizen, O goddess, of the celestial region.

6 He lives there for a long time, enjoying various kinds of superior articles Passing his time happily in the company of the Apsaras, he sports in the garden of Nandana and other delightful regions.

7. After the exhaustion of his merits he falls down from the celestial region and takes birth in the order of humanity, in a rich family, O goddess, which has a large command of every article of enjoyment

8 In that life he gets all articles for gratifying his wishes and appetites Indeed, blessed with the possession of such articles, he gets, riches and a well filled treasury.

9 The Self Create Brahman himself declared it formerly that it is even such persons, O goddess who become highly blessed and possessed of liberal dispositions and handsome features.

10. There are others, O goddess, who are incapable of making gifts Gifted with small understandings, they cannot make gifts even when solicited by Brahmanas and possessed of immense riches.

11. Seeing the destitute, the blind, the distressed, and mendicants, and even guests arrived at their houses, those persons always filled with the desire of pleasing the organ of taste, turn away, even when expressly solicited by them.

12. They never make gifts of wealth or dresses, or viands, or gold, or kine, or any kind of food

13 Those men who are disinclined to relieve the distress of others, who are full of cupidity, who have no faith in the scriptures, and who do not make gifts—verily, these men of little understanding, O goddess, have to sink in Hell

14 In course of time, when their sufferings in Hell, terminate they take birth in the order of humanity, in poor families.

15 Always suffering from hunger and thirst, excluded from all decent society, hopeless of ever enjoying all goodly things, they lead wretched lives

16 Born in families which are destitute of all articles of enjoyment, these men never succeed in enjoying the goodly things of Earth. Indeed O goddess, it is through deeds that persons become wretched and poor.

17 There are others who are arrogant and proud for the possession of riches. Those senseless wretches never offer seats to worthy persons.

18 Gifted with little understandings, they do not give way to them who deserve such an honor. Nor do they give water for washing the feet to persons to whom it should be given.

19 Indeed, they do not honor, according to the ordinance, with gifts of the Arghya, such persons as deserve to be honored therewith They do not offer water for washing the mouth to such as deserve to have that honor.

20—21. They do not treat their very preceptors, when the latter arrive at their houses in the manner in which preceptors should be treated Living in cupidity and pride, they refuse to treat their elders and aged men with love and affection, even insulting those who deserve to be honored and asserting their superiority over them without showing reverence and humility. Such men, O goddess, sink in Hell.

22 When their sufferings terminate after many years, they rise from Hell, and take birth as men, in low, and wretched families.

23 Indeed, they who humiliate their preceptors and seniors, have to take birth in such castes as those of Swapakas and Pukkasas who are greatly vile and bereft of intelligence.

24—28 He who is not arrogant or filled with pride, who is a worshipper of the deities and Brahmanas, who enjoys the esteem of the world, who bows to every one who deserves his reverence, who utters smooth and sweet words, who benefits persons of all castes, who is always devoted to the behoof of all beings, who does not feel hatred for anybody, who is sweet-tongued who is an utterer of sweet and cooling words, who gives way to one who deserves to have way, who worships his preceptors in the manner in which preceptors deserve to be adored, who welcomes all creatures with proper courtesy, who does not bear ill will towards any creature, who lives, adoring elders and guests with such honors as they deserve, who is ever bent upon having as many guests as possible, and who adores all who honor his house with their presence succeeds, O goddess, in ascending to Heaven Upon the exhaustion of his merit, he is born as a man in a high and respectable family.

29 In that life he gets all articles of enjoyment in profusion and jewels and gems and every kind of riches in abundance. He gives to worthy persons what they deserve He performs every duty and every act of virtue

30 Honored of all creatures and receiving their respect, he obtains the fruits of his own deeds

31. Even such a person acquires a high birth in this world This that I have recited to you was said by the Ordainer (Brahman) himself formerly

32—34. That man who is fierce in conduct, who creates terror in all creatures, who injures other beings with hands or feet or cords or sticks, or brick-bats or clods of hard clay, or other means of wounding and paining, O beautiful lady, who practises various kinds of deceit for killing living creatures or vexing them, who chases animals and causes them to tremble in fear,—indeed that man, who acts thus, is certain to sink in Hell

35 If in course of time he is born as man in a low and wretched family which meets with obstacles of every kind on every side.

36 He is hated by all A wretch among men, he becomes so for his own deeds

37—38 Another, who is possessed of mercy, casts it is (benign) eye on all creatures. Gifted with a friendly vision, treating all creatures as if he were their father, shorn of every hostile feeling, with all his passions under complete restraint, he never vexes any creature and never fills them with fear by means of his hands or feet which are always under his control He inspires the confidence of all beings

39 He never afflicts any creature with either cords or clubs or brick bats or clods of hard earth or weapons of any sort His deeds are never fierce or cruel, and he is full of mercy.

40 One who is given to such practices and conduct, certainly ascends to Heaven There he lives like a god in a celestial palace full of comfort.

41 If, upon the exhaustion of his merit, he has to take birth as a man, he becomes born as a man who has not to fight with difficulties of any kind or to meet with any fear. Indeed, he enjoys great happiness

42 Happy and not compelled to work for his livelihood, he lives freed from every kind of anxiety. Even this O goddess, is the path of the virtuous In it there are no obstacles or afflictions

Uma said —

43 In the world some men are masters of inferences and the premises leading to them Indeed, they are masters of science and knowledge, have large progeny, and are gifted with learning and wisdom

44. Others, O god are shorn of wisdom, science, and knowledge, and are marked out by folly By what particular acts does a person become endued with wisdom?

45 By what acts, again, does one become of little wisdom and distorted vision? Do you remove this doubt of mine O you who are the foremost of all beings knowing duties.

46 Others there are, O god, who are blind from the moment of their birth Others there are who are diseased and impotent Do you, O god, tell me the reason of this.

Maheshwara said :—

47—48 Those men who always enquire about what is for their behoof and what is to their detriment, of Brahmanas learned in the Vedas, crowned with success and knowing all duties who avoid all kinds of evil deeds, who achieve only such deeds as are good succeed in ascending to Heaven after leaving this world, and enjoy great happiness as long as they live there

49 Indeed upon the exhaustion of their merit, when they take their birth in the order of humanity, they become born as men endued with great intelligence. They enjoy every kind of happiness and auspiciousness on account of that intelligence with which they are born.

50 Those men of foolish understandstandings who cast wicked eyes upon the married wives of other men, become cursed with congenital blindness on account of that sinfulness of theirs.

51 Those men who, moved by desire in their hearts, cast their eyes on naked women, those men of wicked acts take birth in this world to pass their whole lives in one continuous disease.

52. Those men of foolish and wicked acts who indulge in sexual union with women of castes different from their own,—those men of little wisdom,—have to take birth in their next lives as persons shorn of the virility.

53 Those men who cause animals to be killed and those who violate the beds of their preceptors, and those who indulge in promiscuous intercourse have to take birth in their next lives as persons shorn of manhood

Uma said:—

54 What deeds, O foremost of the celestials are faulty, and what deeds are faultless? What, indeed are those deeds by doing which a man succeeds in acquiring what is for your highest good?

Maheshwara said:—

55 That man who is desirous of determining what is righteousness, and who wishes to acquire prominent virtues and qualities, and who always puts questions to the Brahmanas with a view to find out the path leading to his highest good, succeeds in ascending to Heaven.

56 If he is born as a man, he becomes gifted with intelligence and memory and great wisdom.

67 This, O goddess, is the line of conduct that the pious are to follow and that is fraught with great good I have told you of it for the behoof of human beings.

Uma said:—

58 There are men who hate virtue and who are gifted with little understandings They never wish to approach Brahmanas knowing the Vedas.

59 There are others who observe vows and who are given to the duty of performing Shraddhas Others, again, are destitute of all vows They do not care for observances and are like Rakshasas in conduct.

60 Some there are who are given to the performance of sacrifices and some who do not care for Homa For what deeds do men become possessed of these different natures.

Maheshwara said:—

61. Through the Vedas, the limits have been laid out of all the acts of human beings. Those men who acts thus according to the authority of the Vedas, are seen to become devoted to the observance of vows

62—63. Those men, however, who being influenced by folly accept unrighteousness for its reverse, become destitute of vows, transgress all restraints, and come to be considered as Brahmarakshasas Indeed, it is these men who do not care for Homa, who never utter the Vashat and other sacred Mantras, and who come to be considered as the lowest and vilest of men.

64. Thus, O goddess, have I explained to you the entire ocean of duties of human beings for the sake of removing your doubts, not omitting the sins of which they become guilty.

CHAPTER CXLVI.

Narada said:—

1. Having said these words, the powerful Mahadeva himself became desirous of hearing, and with that view he questioned his dear wife who was seated by his side and was bent upon doing his will.

Mahadeva said:—

2. You, O goddess, know what is Supreme and what is not so You know all duties, O you who love to live in the retreats of ascetics You are gifted with every virtue, possessed of beautiful eyebrows, and hair ending in the fairest curls, O daughter of Himavat, the king of mountains.

3 You are skilled in every work You are gifted with self-control and look impartially towards all creatures. Divested of the senses of mine-ness, you are devoted to the practice of all the duties O you of beautiful features, I wish to ask you (about something). I wish that, asked by me, you will describe to me that subject.

4 Savitri is the chaste wife of Brahman. The chaste Shachi is the wife of Indra. Dhumorna is the wife of Markandeya, and Riddhi of (king) Vaishravana

5 Varuna has Goury for his consort, and the Sun-God has Suvarchala. Rohini is the chaste wife of Shashin, and Swaha of Vibhavasu.

6 Kashyapa has Aditi All these consider their husbands as their gods. You have, O goddess, conversed and associated with all of them every day.

7. It is, therefore, O you knowing every duty, that I wish to question you about the duties of women, O you whose words are always consistent with righteousness I wish to hear you describe that subject from the beginning.

8. You practice all the duties of virtue with me. Your conduct is exactly like mine, and the vows you observe are the same that are observed by me. Your power and energy are equal to mine, and you have practised the austerest penances

9 The subject, when described by you will become highly meritorious. Indeed, that subject will then become authoritative in the world.

10. Women, in especial, are the highest refuge of women O you of beautiful hips, among human beings the course of conduct laid down by you will be followed from generation to generation.

11. Half of my body is made up of half your body. You are always engaged in doing the work of the celestials, and it is you are the cause of have peopling the Earth.

12. O auspicious lady, you know all the eternal duties of women. Do you, therefore, tell me in full what the duties are of your sex.

Uma said :—

13. O holy one, O lord of all created things, O source of all that is past present, and future, it is through your favour that the words I am uttering are originating in my mind.

14 All these Rivers (that are of my sex), O god of gods, having the waters of all the Tirthas, are approaching your presence for enabling you to perform your ablutions in them.

15 After consulting them I shall describe the subject in due order That person who, though capable, is still free from egotism, is rightly called a Purusha

16 As for women, O lord of all beings, she follows persons of her sex By consulting these foremost of Rivers, they will be honoured by me.

17. The sacred Saraswati is the foremost river of all rivers She goes towards the ocean and is truly the first of all rivers.

18—20 Vipasha, also, is here, and Vitasta, Chandrabhaga, Iravati, Shatadru, the river Devika, Kaushiki, and Gomati, and this celestial River who has in her all the sacred Tirthas, viz, the goddess Ganga, who having originated from the celestial region has descended on the Earth and is considered as the foremost of all rivers!—Having said this, the wife of that god of gods, that foremost of all pious persons, smilingly addressed all those Rivers of her sex.

21 Indeed, the wife of the great god, devoted to the performance of all duties, questioned those individuals of her sex about the duties of women Indeed, those foremost of rivers having Ganga for their first all know the duties of women.

Uma said :—

22 The illustrious god has asked a question about the duties of women I wish to answer Shankara after having consulted with you

23 I do not find any branch of knowledge on Earth or Heaven that is capable of being mastered by any individual without your help Ye rivers that run towards the ocean it is, therefore, that I seek your opinions

24 It was in this way that those foremost of Rivers, all of whom were auspicious and highly sacred, were accosted by Shiva's wife Then the celestial River Ganga, who adored the daughter of the king of mountains in return, was selected for answering the question,

25 Indeed, she of sweet smiles is held as swelling with various kinds of understanding and well conversant with the duties of women The sacred goddess capable of removing all fear of sin, gifted with humility in consequence of her intelligence, well acquainted with all duties, and endued with an exceedingly comprehensive intelligence sweetly smiling, uttered these words —

27 O goddess, you are always given to the due performance of all duties You have favored me highly by thus questioning me O sinless one, you are honoured by the entire universe, yet you ask me that am but a River.

28 That person who, though himself competent yet asks another, or who pays a graceful tribute to another, certainly deserves, I think to be considered as righteous-souled Indeed such a person deserves to be called learned and wise.

29 That person never falls into disgrace who asks such speakers as are gifted with knowledge and science and as are well conversant with premises and inferences.

30 A proud man, even when gifted with intelligence, by speaking in the midst of an assembly otherwise, finds himself uttering only words of weak meaning.

husband, and no god that can compare with him

54 A woman considers husband's grace and Heaven as equal, or, if unequal the inequality is very trivial O Maheshwarat I do not wish Heaven itself if you are not satisfied with me.

55 If the husband that is poor, or diseased or distressed, or fallen among enemies, or afflicted by a Brahmana's curse, were to command the wife to accomplish anything that is improper or unrighteous or that may bring on the destruction of life itself, the wife should, without any hesitation, accomplish it, guided by the code whose propriety is sanctioned by the Law of Distress.

57. I have thus O god, explained at your command, what the duties of women are. Indeed that woman who acts thus, becomes entitled to a share of the merits acquired by her husband.

Narada said:—

58 Thus addressed, the great god highly spoke of the daughter of the king of mountains and then dismissed all persons who had assembled there, together with all his own attendants.

59 The various tribes of ghostly beings, as also all the embodied Rivers, and the Gandharvas and Apsaras, all bowed their heads to Mahadeva and departed for returning to the places whence they had come.—

CHAPTER CXLVII.

The Rishis said:—

1. O holder of Pinaka, O tearer of the eyes of Bhaga, O you adored of the entire universe, we wish to hear the glory of Vasudeva.

Maheshwara said —

2 Hari is superior to the Grandfather himself. He is the Eternal Purusha. Otherwise called Krishna, He is endued with the splendour of gold and gifted with solar effulgence.

3. Having ten arms, He is gifted with great energy, and is the Destroyer of the enemies of the celestials He has a whirl on His breast, and curly locks of hair on His head, He is adored of all the celestials.

4 Brahman has sprung from his abdomen I have originated from his head. All the luminaries in the sky have originated from his hair. From the bristles on his body have originated all the gods and demons.

5 From his body have originated the Rishis as also all the eternal worlds He is the abode of the Grandfather and of all the gods

6. He is the Creator of this Earth and He is the Lord of the three worlds He is also the Destroyer of all creatures mobile and immobile

7 He is indeed, the Foremost of all the celestials He is their Master. He is the Chastiser of all enemies He is gifted with Omniscience He exists in everything He is capable of going everywhere He permeates everything.

8 He is the Supreme Soul He is the Worker of all the senses He covers the universe He is the Supreme Lord There is nothing in the three worlds which is superior to Him.

9—11. He is Eternal He is the destroyer of Madhu, and is otherwise called Govinda The Giver of honors He will cause all the kings of Earth to be killed in battle for securing the purposes of the celestials taking birth in a human form. The celestials abandoned by Him are unable to do their work on Earth Without Him as their leader they cannot do anything He is the leader of all creatures and is worshipped by all the gods.

12—13 Within the abdomen of this Master of the gods Who always does celestial work, of this One Who is at one with Brahma, and Who is always the refuge of the twice born Rishis, lives Brahman. Indeed, the latter lives happily in Hari's body which is his abode I myself, that am called Sharva, also live happily in that happy abode of mine.

14 All the celestials, too live happily in His body Gifted with great effulgence, He has eyes which resemble lotus petals The goddess of prosperity lives within Him and He lives always in her company.

15—17 The bow called Sharanga and the discus (called Sudarshana) are his weapons, as well as a sword He has the emblem of the enemy of all the snakes on his standard He is distinguished by excellent conduct, by purity, by self-control, by prowess, by energy, by the most beautiful form by tallness and well proportioned limbs by patience, by sincerity, by riches, by mercy by the beauty of form, and by power He shines, having all celestial weapons of wonderful form and make.

18 He has Yoga for his illusion He has a thousand eyes He is free from every stain or fault He is high minded He is gifted with heroism He is an object of pride with all his friends He is dear to all his kinsmen and relatives and they are dear to him

19 He is gifted with forgiveness He is free from pride or egotism He is devoted to the Brahmanas and is their leader He removes the fears of all persons stricken with fear. He increases the joys of all his friends

20 He is the refuge of all creatures He is ever engaged in protecting and cherishing the distressed Having mastery over all the scriptures and every kind of affluence, He is adored by all beings.

21 Knowing all duties, He is a great benefactor of even enemies when they seek His protection. Conversant with policy and endued with policy, He is an utterer of Brahma and has all His senses under perfect restraint.

22—23 For doing good to the celestials, Govinda will take birth in the family of the great Manu Indeed gifted with great intelligence, He will take birth in the auspicious and righteous family of that Prajapati Manu will have a son named Anga. After Anga will come Antardhaman

24 From Antardhaman will come Havirdhaman, that lord of all creatures, free from every stain. Havirdhaman will beget an illustrious son named Prachina Varhi

25 He will have ten sons having Prachetas for their first Prachetas will have a son named Daksha who will be regarded as a Prajapati Daksha will beget a daughter named Dakshayani.

26 From Dakshayani will spring Aditya and from Aditya will spring Manu Manu will beget a daughter named Ila and a son named Sudyumna.

27 Ila will have Vudha for her husband, and from Vudha will spring Pururavas From Pururavas will spring Ayu From Ayu will spring Nahusha and Nahusha will beget a son named Yayati

28 From Yayati will spring a powerful son named Yadu Yadu will beget Kroshtri Kroshtri will beget a powerful son named Vrijinvat.

29 Vrijinvat will beget the invincible Ushadgu Ushadgu will beget a son named Chitraratha.

30—31. Chitraratha will have a younger son of the name of Shura. Indeed, in the family of these powerful men of energy known all over the world, gifted with excellent conduct and various accomplishments given to the performance of sacrifices and pure in behaviour,—in the pure family honored by the Brahmanas Shura will take his birth He will be a foremost Kshatriya, gifted with great energy, and possessed of great fame.

32 Shura, that giver of honors, will beget a son, the perpetuator of his family, of the name of Vasudeva, otherwise called Anakadundhuvi

33 Vasudeva will have a son of name Vasudeva He will have four hands He will be greatly liberal and will honor the Brahmanas greatly Identical with Brahma, he will love and like the Brahmanas, and the Brahmanas will love and like him

34 That scion of Yadu's race will liberate many kings confined in the prison of the king of the Magadhas (Jarasandha) after defeating him in his capital buried among mountains.

35 Gifted with great energy, he will be rich with the jewels and gems of all rulers of the Earth Indeed, in energy he will be peerless on Earth.

36—39 Possessed of great prowess, he will be the king of all kings of the Earth. Foremost among all the Surasenas, the powerful one living at Dwaraka, will rule and protect the entire Earth after defeating all her kings, conversant as he will be with the science of policy Assembling together do ye all worship Him, as ye adore the Eternal Brahman, with speech, flowers, and excellent incense and perfumes He who wishes to see me or the Grandfather Brahman should first see the illustrious Vasudeva of great power If He is seen I am seen, as also the Grandfather Brahman, that foremost of all the celestials.

40—42 I do not find any difference in this Know this, O Rishis having asceticism for wealth That person with whom the lotus eyed Vasudeva becomes pleased, is liked by all the deities with Brahman amongst them That man who will seek the protection of Keshava will succeed in acquiring great achievements and victory and Heaven He will be an instructor in religion and duties, and will acquire great religious merit.

43 All persons knowing religion and duties should, with great readiness, bow down to that Lord of all the gods By adoring that powerful one, one will acquire great merit.

44 Gifted with great energy, that god with the desire of benefiting all creatures, created millions of Rishis for the sake of virtue.

45 Those millions of Rishis, thus created by that great Ordainer are now living on the mountains of Gandhamadana, headed by Snatkumara and engaged in the performance of penances.

46 Hence, ye foremost of twice born ones, that foremost of all eloquent persons viz, the righteous Vasudeva, should be worshipped by all The illustrious Hari the powerful Narayana, is, indeed, the foremost of all beings in Heaven.

47 Adored he adores and honored, he honors, to them who make offerings to him, he makes offerings in return Worshipped, he worships in return

48 If seen always, he sees the seers always If one seeks His refuge and protection, He seeks the seeker as His refuge in return O foremost of all righteous ones, if adored and worshipped, He adores and worships in return

49 This is the practice of the faultless Vishnu This is the vow that is practised by all righteous people of that first of all deities, that powerful Lord of all creatures

50 He is always adored in the world That Eternal Being is adored by even the celestials Those persons who are devoted to Him with the steadiness of a vow become freed from calamity and fear proportionate to his devotion

51 The regenerate ones should always adore Him in thought word, and deed The son of Devaki should be seen by them with respect and in order to see Him with respect they should undertake the performance of penances.

52 O foremost of ascetics this is the path that I show to you By seeing Him, you will have seen all the foremost of celestials.

53 I, too, bow my head in respect to that Lord of the universe, that Grandfather of all the worlds, that powerful and huge boar.

54 By seeing Him one sees the Trinity Ourselves, viz, all the celestials, live in Him.

55 He will have an elder brother who will be known over all the world by the name of Vala Having a plough for his weapon, in form he will look like a white hill In fact he will be gifted with strength capable of uplifting the entire Earth.

56 Upon the car of that divine person a tall palmyra, three-headed and made of gold will be his standard

57 The head of that mighty-armed hero, that Lord of all the worlds, will be covered with many huge snakes. All weapons of attack and defence will also come to him as soon as he will think of them.

58—59 He is called Ananta (Infinite). That Illustrious One is at one with the immutable Hari Once on a time, the celestials thus spoke to the mighty Garuda, the son of Kashyapa —Do you, O powerful one, see if this One has any end —Though gifted with great energy and power, Garuda, however, could not find out the end of this Illustrious One who is at one with the Supreme Soul.

60. Supporting the entire Earth on His head, He lives in the nether regions He roves through the universe as Shesha, filled with great joy

61 He is Vishnu, He is the illustrious Ananta, He is the supporter of the Earth He who is Rama is Hrishikesha He who is Achyuta is Ananta the bearer of the Earth

62 Both of those foremost of all creatures are celestial and gifted with divine prowess One of them is armed with the discus and the other with the plough They deserve every honor and should be seen

63 I have through my kindness for you, have thus described to you the nature of Vasudeva This, O ye ascetics having penances for wealth, is Virtue

64 I have described all this to you so that ye may, with respect and care adore Krishna, that Foremost One of Vadu's race.

CHAPTER CXLVIII.

Narada said:—

1. At the conclusion of Mahadeva's speech, loud roars were heard in the sky. Thunders bellowed, with flashes of lightning. The sky was covered with blue and thick clouds

2 The god of the clouds then poured pure water like to what he does in the season of rains A thick darkness appeared The cardinal points could no longer be made out.

3 Then on that charming sacred and eternal breast of that celestial, mountain, the assembled Rishis no longer saw the ghostly beings who associate with Mahadeva

4 Soon, however, the sky cleared Some of the Rishis started for the sacred waters Others returned whence they came

5 Seeing that wonderful and inconceivable spectacle, they became filled with surprise. They had heard the discourse, too, between Shankara and Uma with the same feelings.

6. That Foremost of all Beings, of whom the great Shankara spoke to us on that mountain, are You You are at one with Eternal Brahma

7 Sometime before, Mahadeva burnt Himavat with his energy, You have shown us a similar wonderful spectacle Indeed, we remember that by what we have seen to day.

8 O Mighty-Armed Janarddana, I have thus, O Powerful One, recited to You the glory of that God of gods, viz , Him that is called Kapardin or Girisha.

Bhishma said:—

9 Thus addressed by those hermits' Krishna, the delighter of Devaki, paid due honors to all those Rishis.

10. Filled with joy, those Rishis once more addressed Krishna, saying,—O Destroyer of Madhu, do you repeatedly show yourself to us at all times

11 O Powerful One, Heaven itself cannot rejoice us so much as a sight of Yourself Everything that was said by the illustrious Bhava is true.

12—13 O Crusher of enemies, we have told you all about that mystery, You are yourself acquainted with the truth of every subject Since, however, asked by us, You were kind enough to ask us in return, we have, therefore, recited everything to You for only pleasing You. There is nothing in the three worlds that You do not know.

14 You are fully acquainted with the birth and origin of all things, indeed, with everything that works as a cause. On account of the lightness of our character, we cannot keep close any mystery.

15 Indeed, in Your presence, O Powerful One, we indulge in incoherencies from the lightness of our hearts. There is no wonderful thing which You do not know.

16 You know whatever is on Earth, and whatever is in the celestial region We take our leave of You, O Krishna, for returning to our respective quarters May You increase in intelligence and prosperity.

17. O Sire, You will soon get a son after You or even more distinguished than Yourself He will be gifted with great energy and splendour. He will achieve great feats, and become possessed of power as great as Yours.

Bhishma said:—

18 After this, the great Rishis bowed to that God of gods, that scion of Yadu's race, that Foremost of all Beings. They then went round Him and taking His leave, departed.

19 As regards Narayana, who is gifted with prosperity and blazing effulgence, He returned to Dwaraka after having duly observed that vow of His

20. His wife Rukmini conceived, and on the expiration of the tenth month a son was born of her, gifted with heroism and honored by all for his highly wonderful accomplishments.

21. He is at one with that Kama (Desire) which exists in every creature and which pervades every condition. Indeed, He moves within the hearts of both gods and demons, 22 This Krishna is that foremost of all persons He, gifted with the complexion of the clouds is that four-handed Vasudeva Through affection He has taken up the cause of the Pandavas, and you also, ye sons of Pandu, have attached yourselves to Him.

23 Achievements, Prosperity, Intelligence, and the Path that leads to the celestial region, are all there where this One, viz , the Illustrious Vishnu of three steps, is

24 He is the thirty-three gods headed by Indra There is no doubt in this He is the one Ancient God He is the Foremost of all gods He is the refuge of all creatures

25. He is without beginning and without destruction. He is unmanifest He is the great Destroyer of Madhu Gifted with mighty energy, He has taken birth (among men) for doing the purposes of the gods.

26—27. This Madhava is the expounder of the most difficult truths about Profit or Wealth, and He is also their achiever. O son of Pritha, the victory you have got over your enemies, your peerless achievements, the dominion you have acquired over the whole Earth, are all owing to having Narayana espoused your cause

28. The fact of your having got the inconceivable Narayana for your protector and refuge, enabled you to become an Adhwaryyu (chief sacrificer) for pouring multitudes of kings as libations on the burning fire of battle His Krishna was your great sacrificial ladle resembling the all destroying fire which appears at the end of the cycle and kinsmen, was much to be pitied inasmuch as, moved by anger, he made war with Hari and the wielder of Gandiva.

30 Many sons of Diti, many foremost of Danavas, of huge bodies and vast strength, have died in the fire of Krishna's discus like insects in a forest fire.

31. How incapable then must human beings be of fighting against that Krishna,—human beings who, O foremost of men, are shorn of strength and power.

32 As regards Jaya, he is a powerful Yogin resembling the all destroying cycle fire in energy Capable of drawing the bow equally with both hands he is always in the van of fight With his energy, O king, he has killed all the soldiers of Suyodhana.

33 Listen to me as I tell you what Mahadeva having the bovine bull for the emblem on his standard had recited to the ascetics on the breast of Himavat His utterances form a Purana.

34 The advancement or greatness energy, strength, prowess power, humility, and family that are in Arjuna can form only a third part of the attributes of Krishna.

35 Who is there who can transcend Krishna in these attributes? Whether that is possible or not, listen Peerless Excellence prevails where the illustrious Krishna is

36 As for ourselves we are persons of little understanding Dependent upon the will of others we are highly unfortunate Knowingly we betook ourselves to the eternal path of death

37 You however, are devoted to sincerity of conduct Having formerly promised not to take your kingdom, you did not take it, desirous of keeping your promise

38 O king, you make too much of the destruction of your kinsmen and friends in battle You should remember, however, O chastiser of enemies, that it is not fair to break a promise.

39 All those who have fallen on the field of battle have really been killed by Time Indeed, all of us have been killed by Time Time is indeed, all powerful

40. You are fully acquainted with the power of Time Afflicted by time you should not grieve Know that Krishna Himself otherwise called Hari is that Time with blood-red eyes and with club in hand

41 For these reasons, O son of Kunti, you should not grieve for your (slain) kinsfolk Be always free, O delighter of the Kurus, from grief.

42 You have heard me sing the glory and greatness of Madhava That is sufficient for making a good man understand Him

43 Having heard the words of Vyasa as also of the highly intelligent Narada, I have described to you the adorableness of Krishna. I have myself added, from my own knowledge something to that account

44 Indeed I have described also on the Surpassing Power of Krishna as recited by Mahadeva, to that assembly of Rishis I have also described to you the discourse too between Maheshwara and the daughter of Himavat, O Bharata

45 He who will remember that discourse when coming out from a foremost person, he who will listen to it, and he who will recite it, is sure to acquire what is highly beneficial

46 That man will find all his wishes fulfilled Departing from this world he will ascend to the celestial region There is no doubt in this

47 That man who wishes to obtain what is beneficial for himself, should devote himself to Janarddana

48 O king of the Kurus, you should also remember those incidents of duty and virtue which were declared by Maheshwara.

49 If you act according to those precepts if you carry the rod of punishment rightly, if you protect your subjects properly you may be sure of attaining to the celestial.

50 You should, O king, protect your subjects always according to the dictates of virtue The strong rod of punishment which the kings bear has been said to be the embodiment of his virtue or merit.

51. Hearing this discourse fraught with righteousness, between Shankara and Uma, that I have recited before this pious assemblage one should adore with respect that god having the bull for the device on his banner.

52 One who becomes even desirous of listening to that discourse, should adore Mahadeva with respect Indeed the person who wishes to obtain what is beneficial for him, should worship Mahadeva with a pure heart.

53 This is the behest of the sinless and high souled Narada He has commanded such adoration of the great god O son of Pandu, do you obey that command of Narada.

54 O powerful king, these are the wonderful incidents which took place on the sacred breast of Himavat about Vasudeva and Sthanu O son of Kunti Those events emanated from the very nature of those great deities

55 Accompanied by the holder of Gandiva, Vasudeva practised eternal penances in the hermitage of Vadari for ten thousand years

56 Indeed, Vasudeva and Dhananjaya, having eyes like lotus petals, practised severe austerities for three entire cycles. I have learnt this from Narada and Vyasa, O king

57 The lotus eyed and mighty-armed Vasudeva while yet a child performed the great feat of killing Kansa for the relief of his kinsmen

58 I dare not O son of Kunti, enumerate the feats of this Ancient and Eternal Being, O Yudhishthira

59 O son forsooth, high and great benefits will be reaped by you who have that foremost of all persons, viz, Vasudeva, for your friend

60 I grieve for the wicked Duryodhana about even the next world to which he has gone It was for him that the entire Earth has been depopulated with her horses and elephants

61. Indeed, through the fault of Duryodhana, of Karna, of Shakuni and of Dussasana as the fourth, that the Kurus have died

Vaishampayana said —

62. While that foremost of men, viz, the son of Ganga, spoke to him thus, the Kuru king (Yudhishthira) remained entirely silent in the midst of those great persons.

63 All the kings with Dhritarashtra amongst them became stricken with wonder upon hearing the words of the Kuru grandfather. In their minds they adored Krishna and then turned towards him with hands clasped in respect.

64 The Rishis also headed by Narada, accepted and highly spoke of the words of Krishna and approved of them joyfully.

65 These were the wonderful subjects recited by Bhishma which Yudhishthira with all his brothers heard with joy

66 Some time after, when king Yudhishthira saw that Bhishma who had given away profuse riches as presents to the Brahmanas in the sacrifices celebrated by him had rested and become refreshed the intelligent king once more asked him as follows.

CHAPTER CXLIX

(ANUSHASANIKA PARVA) — Continued

Vaishampayana said —

1 Having heard all the duties in full and all those sacred deeds and objects which purify human beings of their sins, Yudhishthira once more addressed the son of Shantanu in the following words

Yudhishthira said:—

2 Who may be said to be the One God in the world? Who may be said to be the One Object which is our only refuge? Who is He by adoring whom or singing whose praises human beings would get what is beneficial?

3 What religion is that which, according to your judgment is the foremost of all religions? What are those Mantras by reciting which a living creature becomes freed from the fetters of birth and life?

Bhishma said —

4 One should always, diligently and throwing away all idleness, sing the praises of that Lord of the universe, that God of gods, (viz, Vasudeva) who is Infinite and the foremost of all Beings, by uttering His thousand names.

5—6 By always adoring with respect and devotion that immutable Being, by meditating on Him, by singing His praises, and bowing the head to Him, and by celebrating sacrifices to Him, indeed, by always praising Vishnu, who is without beginning and without end or destruction, who is the Supreme Lord of all the worlds, and who is the Master and Controller of the universe, one can succeed in getting over all sorrow

7 Indeed, He is devoted to the Brahmanas, knowing all duties and practices, the enhancer of the fame and achievements of all persons the Lord of all the worlds, highly wonderful, and the prime cause of the origin of all creatures.

8. This, in my judgment, is the foremost religion of all religions viz one should always adore and sing the praises of the lotus-eyed Vasudeva with devotion

9 He is the highest Energy He is the highest Penance He is the highest Brahma. He is the highest Refuge.

10 He is the most Holy of all holies the most sacred of all sacred objects He is the God of all the gods, and He is the immutable Father of all creatures.

11 On the advent of the primitive cycle, all creatures originate from Him On the expiration, again of the cycle, all things disappear in Him.

12. Hear, O king, the thousand names, highly efficacious in dissipating sins, of that Foremost One in all the worlds, that Master of the universe, viz, Vishnu.

13 All those names, derived from His attributes, secret and well-known, of the great Vasudeva, which were sung by the Rishis, I shall recite to you for the good of all

14 They are, Om! He who enters all things besides Himself, He who covers all things, He to whom sacrificial libations are poured, the Lord of the Past, the Present, and the Future, the Creator (or Destroyer) of all existent things, the preserver of all existent things the Existent, the Soul of all things, the Originator of all things (I—IX);

15 Of purified Soul, the Supreme Soul the Highest Refuge of all liberated persons, the Immutable, He who lies enclosed in a case, the Witness, He who knows the material case in which He lives, the Indestructible (X—XVII),

16. He upon whom the mind rests during Yoga meditation, the Guide or leader of all persons conversant with Yoga, the Lord of both Pradhana or Prakriti and Purusha, He who assumed a human form with a leonine head, He of beautiful features and equipments, He of beautiful hair, the foremost of Purushas (XVIII—XXVI), IV

17. The embodiment of all things, the Destroyer of all things He who transcends the three qualities of Goodness, Darkness, and Ignorance, the Motionless, the Beginning of all things, the source into which all things go at the universal Dissolution, the Immutable, He who takes birth at his own will, He who causes the acts of all living creatures to fructify, the Upholder of all things, the Source from which the primal elements have originated, the Powerful One, He in whom exists the unbounded Lordship over all things (XXV—XXXII),

18. The Self-Create, He who gives happiness to His worshippers, the presiding Genius in the midst of the Solar disc, the Lotus-Eyed the Loud-Voiced, He who is without beginning and without end, He who upholds the universe, He who ordains all deeds and their fruits, He who is superior to the Grandfather Brahman (XXXIII—XLVI),

19 The Immeasurable, the Lord of the senses, He from whose navel the primeval lotus originated, the Lord of all the celestials, the Divine Architect, the Mantra, He who weakens or emaciates all things, He who is vast, the Ancient One, He who is enduring (XLVII—LVI),

20 He who is incapable of being apprehended (by either the senses or the mind), the Eternal One, Krishna, the Red-Eyed, He who kills all creatures at the time of the universal dissolution, He who is vast for knowledge and power and other attributes of the kind, He who resides in three parts of every creature, That which cleanses, is auspicious, and high (LVII—LXIV),

21 He who urges all creatures in their acts, He who makes the vital airs work, He who causes all living creatures to live, the Eldest, the Foremost of all those who are considered as the Lords of all creatures He who has gold in his abdomen, He who has the Earth for his abdomen, the Lord of Sree or Lakshmi, the Destroyer of Madhu (LXV—LXXIII),

22 The Omnipotent, He who is endued with great prowess, He who is armed with the bow, He who is possessed of a mind capable of understanding all treatises, He who roves through the universe, riding on Garuda, He who is well-suited to the offerings made to him and who has the power to enjoy them properly, the Peerless, He who is incapable of being discomfited, He who knows all acts that are done, He who is at one with all deeds, He who rests on His own true self (LXXIV—LXXXIV),

23 The Lord of all the celestials, He who is the Refuge of all, the embodiment of the highest happiness, He whose seed is the universe He who is the source of all things, the Day, the Year, the Snake the embodiment of Conviction, He who sees all things (LXXXV—XCIV),

24 The Unborn, the Lord of all creatures He who has acquired success, He who is Success itself, He who is the beginning of all things, He who is above deterioration, He who is virtue in the form of the bull and the great boar that raised the submerged Earth, He who is of immeasurable soul, He who stands aloof from all kinds of union (XCV—CIII),

25 He who is Pavaka among the deities called Vasus, He that is of liberal soul, being shorn of anger, hatred, pride and other evil passions, Truth He in whose soul is equable on account of His perfect impartiality, He who has been measured by His adorers, He who is always equal, being above all change or modification, He who never refuses to grant the wishes of His adorers, He whose eyes are like lotus petals, He whose deeds are always marked by Virtue (CIV—CXIII),

26 He who destroys all creatures, the Many-headed, He who upholds the universe, He who is the source of the universe, He who is of pure or spotless reputation, the Immortal One, He who is Eternal and Fixed He who has beautiful limbs, He who has such knowledge having penance for its mark that He is able to agitate Nature for evolving the universe out of her (CXIV—CXXII);

27 He who goes everywhere, the Omniscient One He who shines forth in unmodified effulgence, He whose troops are everywhere, He who is coveted by all He who is the Veda, He who is conversant with the Veda, He who is conversant with all the branches of the Veda, He who represents the branches of the Veda, He who settles the interpretations of the Vedas He who has no superior in wisdom (CXXIII—CXXXIII),

28. He who is the Master of all the worlds He who is the Lord of the celestials, He who is the Supervisor of both Virtue and Sin He who is both Effect and Cause, He who is four-souled, He who is known by four forms (as above), He who has four horns, He who has four arms (CXXXIV—CXLI),

29 He who shines forth in effulgence, He who is the giver of food and cherishes the good, He who does not put up with those that are wicked, (or He who puts up with the occasional transgressions of his devotees), He who existed before the universe came into life, He who is stainless, He who is ever victorious, He who defeats the very celestials, He who is the material cause of the universe, He who repeatedly Lives in material causes (CXLII—CI);

CHAPTER CL.

(ANUSHASANIKA PARVA)—Continued.

Yudhishthira said:—

1. O grandfather, O you of great wisdom, O you who know all branches of knowledge, what is that subject of silent recitation by reciting which every day one may win the merit of virtue in a large measure?

2. What is that Mantra for recitation, which gives success, if recited on the occasion of starting on a journey or in entering a new building, or at the beginning of any undertaking, or on the occasion of sacrifices in honor of the deities or of the manes?

3. You should tell me what, indeed, what Mantra it is, which propitiates all malevolent influences, or brings on prosperity or growth or protection from evil, or the destruction of enemies, or the dispelling of fears, and which, at the same time, is consistent with the Vedas.

Bhishma said:—

4 Hear, O king, with rapt attention, what that Mantra is which was declared by Vyasa. It was ordained by Savitri and is highly excellent. It is capable of purifying a person forthwith of all his sins.

5 Hear, O sinless one, as I recite to you the ordinances about that Mantra. Indeed, O chief of the sons of Pandu, by listening to those ordinances, one becomes purged of all his sins.

6 One who recites this Mantra day and night becomes never sullied by sin. I shall now declare it to you what that Mantra is Do you listen with rapt attention.

7. Indeed, the man who hears it becomes gifted with longevity, O prince, and attaining to the fruition of all his desires, sports happily both in this life and in the next.

8 This Mantra, O king, was daily recited by the foremost of royal sages performing Kshatriya duties and steadily observing the vow of truth.

9 Indeed O foremost of kings, those monarchs who, with controlled senses and tranquil soul recite this Mantra every day, succeed in winning unrivalled prosperity.

10 Salutations to Vashishtha of high vows, after having bowed with respect to Parashara, that Ocean of the Vedas Salutations to the great snake Ananta, and salutations to all those who are crowned with success, and who are of undecaying glory.

11 'Salutations to the Rishis, and to Him who is the Highest of the High, the god of gods, and the giver of boons to all those that are foremost. Salutations unto Him of a thousand heads, Him that is most auspicious, Him who has a thousand names, viz., Janarddana.

12—13 Aja, Ekapada, Ahirvradhna, the unvanquished Pinakin, Rita, Pitrirupa, the three-eyed Maheshwara, Vrishakapi, Shambhu, Havana, and Ishwara,—these are the celebrated eleven Rudras, who are the lords of all the worlds.

14—15 These eleven high-souled ones have been mentioned as a hundred in the Shatarudra (of the Vedas). Angsha, Bhaga, Mitra, Varuna the lord of waters, Dhatri, Aryaman, Jayanta, Bhaskara, Tashtri, Pushan, Indra, and Vishnu, are said to comprise a tale of twelve. These twelve are called Adityas and they are the sons of Kashyapa as the Shruti declares.

16 Dhara, Dhruva, Soma, Savitra, Anila, Anala, Pratyusha, and Prabhava, are the eight Vasus, named in the scriptures.

17. Nasatya and Dasra are said to be the two Ashwins. They are the sons of Martanda born of his wife Samjna, from whose nostrils they emanated.

18 After this I shall recite the names of those who are the witnesses of all deeds in the worlds. They take note of all sacrifices, of all gifts, of all good deeds.

19—20. Those lords among the deities see everything although they are invisible. Indeed, they see all the good and bad deeds of all beings. They are Mrityu Kala, the Vishwedevas, the Pitris having forms, the great Rishis having penances for wealth, the Munis, and others crowned with success and devoted to penances and Liberation.

21. These of sweet smiles confer various benefits upon those men who recite their names Indeed, gifted as they are with celestial energy, they confer various regions of happiness created by the Grandfather upon such men

22 They live in all the worlds and attentively mark all deeds By reciting the names of those lords of all living creatures, one always becomes gifted with righteousness and wealth and enjoyments in profusion.

23 One acquires hereafter diverse regions of auspiciousness and happiness created by the Lord of the universe.

24—28 These thirty-three deities who are the lords of all beings, as also Nandishwara of huge body, and that pre-eminent one who has the bull for the emblem on his banner, and those masters of all the worlds, viz., the followers and associates of him called Ganeshwara and those called Saumyas, and those called the Raudras, and those called the Yogas, and those who are known as the Bhutas, and the luminaries in the firmament, the Rivers, the sky, the king of birds (viz, Garuda), all those persons on Earth who have become crowned with success on account of their penances, and who are existing in an immobile or mobile form, Himavat, all the mountains the four Oceans, the followers and companions of Bhava who are gifted with prowess equal to that of Bhava himself, the illustrious and ever victorious Vishnu and Skanda, and Amvika —these are the great souls by reciting whose names with controlled senses, one becomes purged of all his sins.

29—30. After this, I shall recite the names of those foremost Rishis who are known as Manavas. They are Yavakrita, and Raibhya and Arvavasu and Paravasu, and Aushija, and Kakshivat, and Valá the son of Angiras. Then is Kanwa the son of the Rishi Maudhatithi, and Varishada.

31. All these are gifted with the energy of Brahma and have been spoken of as creators of the universe. They have originated from Rudra and Anala and the Vasus. By reciting their names people get great benefits.

32. Indeed, by doing good deeds on Earth, people sport happily in the celestial region, with the celestials. These Rishis are the priests of Indra. They live in the East.

33. That man who, with rapt attention, recites the names of these Rishis succeeds in ascending to the regions of Indra and getting great honours there.

34—35. Unmuchu, Pramuchu, Swastwyatreya of great energy, Dridhavya, Urdhavahu, Trinasoma Angiras, and Agastya of great energy, the son of Mitravaruna —these seven are the Ritwijas of the Yama the king of the dead, and live in the southern quarter.

36—37. Dridheyu, Riteyu, illustrious Parivyadha, Ekata, Dwita and Trita — the last three gifted with solar effulgence, —and Atri's son of rigeteous soul viz, the Rishi Saraswata,—these seven who had acted as Ritwijas in the great sacrifice of Varuna—have taken up their abodes in the Western quarter.

38—39. Atri, the illustrious Vashishtha, the great Rishi Kashyapa, Gotama, Bharadwaja, Vishwamitra the son of Kushika, and Richika's fierce and energetic son Jamadagni —these seven are the Ritwijas of the Lord of treasures and live in the Northern quarter.

40. There are seven other Rishis who live in all directions without being confined to any particular one. They, it is who give fame and of all that is beneficial to men, and they have been sung as the creators of the worlds.

41. Dharma, Kama, Kala, Vasu, Vasuki, Ananta, and Kapila —these seven are the upholders of the world.

42. Rama, Vyasa, Drona's son Ashwatthaman, are the other Rishis. These are the great Rishis as divided into seven groups, each group consisting of seven

43. They are the creators of that peace and good which men enjoy. They are said to be the Regents of the quarters. One should turn his face to that direction in which one of these Rishis live if one desires to adore him.

44—45. Those Rishis are the creators of all creatures and have been considered as the purifiers of all. Samvarta, Merusavarna, the righteous Markandeya, and Sankhya and Yoga, and Narada and the great Rishi Durvasas,—these are gifted with severe penances and great self-control, and are celebrated over the three worlds.

46. There are others who are equal to Rudra himself. They live in the region of Brahman. By naming them with respect a soulless man obtains a son, and a poor man acquires riches.

47-48. Indeed, by naming them, one acquires success in religion, and wealth and pleasure. One should also take the name of that celebrated king who was Emperor of all the Earth and equal to a Prajapati, viz, that foremost of monarchs, Prithu, the son of Vena. The Earth became his daughter. One should also name Pururavas, of the Solar race and equal unto Mahendra himself in power.

49. He was the son of Ila and celebrated over the three worlds. One should indeed, take the name of that dear son of Vudha.

50—51. One should also take the name of Bharata, that hero celebrated over the three worlds. He also who in the golden age worshipped the gods in a grand Gomedha sacrifice viz the illustrious Rantideva, who was equal to Mahadeva himself, should be named. Gifted with penances, possessed of every auspicious mark, the source of every kind of good to the world, he was the conqueror of the universe.

52. One should also take the name of the royal sage Shweta of illustrious fame.

He had pleased the great Mahadeva and it was for his sake that Andhaka was killed

53 One should also take the name of the illustrious royal sage Bhagiratha, who through the favour of Mahadeva succeeded in bringing down the sacred river from the celestial region.

54. It was Bhagiratha who caused the ashes of the sixty thousand sons of Sagara to be washed with the sacred waters of Ganga and thereby rescued them from their sin. Indeed, one should take the names of all these who were gifted with the blazing effulgence of fire, great beauty, and high energy.

55. Some of them were of awe-inspiring forms and great power. One should take the names of these deities and Rishis and kings, those lords of the universe,—who are multipliers of fame.

56—57. Sankhya, and Yoga which is highest of the high, and Havya and Kavya and that refuge of all the Shrutis viz, Supreme Brahma, have been declared to be the sources of great good to all creatures These are sacred and sin-purifying, and have been spoken of very highly These are the foremost of medicines for curing all diseases, and are the givers of success in all deeds.

58 Controlling one's senses one should O Bharata, take the names of these morning and evening It is these who protect. It is these who shower rain It is these who shine and give light and heat It is these who blow. It is these who create all things.

59 These are considered as the foremost of all, as the leaders of the universe, as highly clever in the performance of all things, as gifted with forgiveness, as complete masters of the senses. Indeed, it has been said that they remove all the evils to which human beings are subject.

60 These great ones are the witness of all good and bad deeds Rising up in the morning one should take their names, for by this one is sure to acquire all that is good.

61. He who takes the names of these, becomes freed from the fear of fires and of thieves. Such a man never finds his way obstructed by any obstacle By taking the names of these great ones, one becomes free from bad dreams of every kind.

62—63. Purged of every sin such men take birth in auspicious families That twice-born person who with controlled senses recites these names on occasions of performing the initiatory rites of sacrifices and other religious practices, becomes, as the outcome thereof, gifted with righteousness, devoted to the study of the soul, possessed of forgiveness, and self control, and free from malice. If a man suffering from disease recites them he becomes freed from his sin in the form of disease

64. By reciting them within a house, all evils are removed from the inmates By reciting them within a field, the growth of all kinds of crops is helped.

65—68 Reciting them at the time of starting on a journey, or while one is away from his home one meets with good fortune. These names lead to the protection of his ownself, of his children and wives, of his wealth, and of his seeds, and plants The Kshatriya who recites these names at the time of joining a battle sees destruction overtake his enemies and good fortune crown him and his party The man who recites these names on occasions of performing the rites in honor of the deities or the manes, helps the manes and the deities eat to the sacrificial Havya and Kavya. The man who recites them becomes freed from fear of disease and beasts of prey, of elephants and thieves.

69—70. His burden of anxiety becomes lightened, and he becomes freed from every sin By reciting these excellent Savitri Mantras on board a vessel, or in a car, or in the courts of kings, one acquires high success Here where these Mantras are recited, fire does not burn wood

71. There children do not die, nor snakes live. Indeed at such places, there can be no fear of the king, nor Pishachas and Rakshasas.

72. Indeed, the man who recites these Mantras ceases to have any fear of fire or water or wind, or beasts of prey.

73 These Savitri Mantras, recited duly bring on the peace and well being of all the four castes Those men who recite them with respect become freed from every sorrow and at last acquire a high end

74 Even these are the results acquired by them who recite these Savitri Mantras which are of the form of Brahma. That man who recites these Mantras in the midst of kine, sees his kine become fruitful.

75—76 Whether when starting on a journey, or entering a house on returning, one should recite these Mantras on every occasion These Mantras form a great mystery of the Rishis and are the very highest of those which they silently recite. Such are these Mantras to them who practise the duty of recitation and pour libations on the sacrificial fire.

77. This that I have said to you, is the excellent opinion of Parashara It was recited formerly to Shakra himself Representing, as it does, Truth or Eternal Brahma, I have declared it fully to you 78—79. It forms the heart of all creatures, and is the highest Shruti. All the princes of the solar and lunar families, viz, the Raghavas and the Kuravas, recite these Mantras every day after having purified themselves. These form the highest end of human creatures. One becomes freed from every trouble and calamity by daily reciting the names of the celestials, of the seven Rishis, and of Dhruva. Indeed, such recitation speedily frees one from distress.

80. The sages of olden times, viz, Kashyapa, Gotama, and others, and Bhrigu, Angiras and Atri and others, and Shukra, Agastya, and Vrihaspati, and others, all of whom are regenerate Rishis, have worshipped these Mantras. Approved of by the son of Bharadwaja, these Mantras were attained by the sons of Richika Having acquired them again from Vashishtha, Shakra and the Vasus went forth to battle and succeeded in vanquishing the Danavas.

81. That man who makes a present of a hundred kine with their horns covered with plate of gold to a Brahmana gifted with much learning and well-conversant with the Vedas, and he who causes the excellent Bharata story to be recited in his house every day, are said to acquire equal merits.

82. By reciting the name of Bhrigu, one's virtue becomes enhanced. By bowing to Vashishtha, one's energy becomes enhanced, By bowing to Raghu, one becomes victorious in battle. By reciting the praises of the Ashwins, one becomes freed from diseases.

83 I have thus, O king, told you of the Savitri Mantras which are at one with eternal Brahma. If you wish to question me on any other subject, you may do so. I shall, O Bharata, answer you.

CHAPTER CLI.

(ANUSHASANIKA PARVA).—Continued.

Yudhishthira said :—

1. Who are worthy of being adored? Who are they to whom we should bow? How, indeed, should we behave towards whom? What course of conduct, O grandfather, towards what classes of persons is considered faultless?

Bhishma said :—

2. The humiliation of Brahmanas would humiliate the very celestials. By bowing to Brahmanas, one does not, O Yudhishthira, commit any fault.

3 They, indeed, deserve to be adored, They deserve to have our vows You should behave towards them as if they are your sons Indeed, it is those wise men who upholds all the worlds.

4 The Brahmanas are the great causeways of Virtue about all the worlds. Their happiness consists in renouncing all kinds of riches. They are devoted to the vow of controlling speech.

5 They are agreeable to all creatures, and observe various excellent vows. They are the refuge of all creatures in the universe They are the authors of all the regulations which govern the worlds. They are endued with great fame.

6. Penances are always their great riches Their power consists in speech. Their energy emanates from the duties they observe Knowing all duties, they are gifted with minute vision, so that they are cognizant of the subtlest considerations

7. They are of righteous desires. They live in the observance of well done duties. They are the cause ways of Virtue The four kinds of living creatures exist, depending upon them as their refuge.

8 They are the path or road along which all should go. They are the guides of all They are the eternal upholders of all the sacrifices They always uphold the heavy loads of fathers and grandfathers.

9 They never droop under heavy loads even when passing along difficult roads, like strong cattle. They are attentive to the requirements of manes and deities and guests. They are entitled to eat the first portions of Havya and Kavya.

10. By the very food they eat, they rescue the three worlds from great fear. They are, as it were the Island for all worlds They are the eyes of all persons gifted with sight.

11. The wealth they possess consists of all the branches of knowledge known by the name of Shiksha, and all the Shrutis Gifted with great skill, they are conversant with the most subtle relations of things. They know the ends of all things, and their thoughts are always engaged upon the science of the soul.

11 They are gifted with the knowledge of the beginning, the middle, and the end of all things, and they are persons in whom doubts no longer exist on account of the certitude of their knowledge. They are fully aware of the distinctions between what is superior and what is inferior. They it is who acquire the highest end.

13. Shorn of attachments, purged of all sins, getting over all pairs of opposites, they are unattached to all worldly things Deserving of every honor, they are always esteemed by persons gifted with knowledge and high souls.

14. They cast impartial looks on sandal paste and filth or dirt, on what is food and what is not food. They see with an equal eye their brown dresses of coarse cloth and fabrics of silk and animal skins.

15 They would live for days together without partaking of any food, and dry up their limbs by such abstention They devote themselves earnestly to the study of the Vedas, controlling their senses.

16 They would make gods of those who are not gods, and not gods of those who are gods. Enraged, they can create other worlds and other Regents of the worlds than those who exist.

17. Through the curse of those great ones the ocean became so saline as to be undrinkable. The fire of their anger yet burns in the forest of Dandaka, unquenched by time.

18. They are the gods of the gods, and the cause of all causes They are the authority of all authorities What man of intelligence and wisdom is there who would seek to humiliate them.

19 Amongst them the young and the old all deserve honors They honor one another on account of distinctions in respect of penances and knowledge.

20 Even the Brahmana who is destitute of knowledge is a god and is a great instrument for purifying others. He amongst them then, who is possessed of knowledge is a much higher god and like the ocean when full (to the brim).

21. Learned or unlearned, the Brahmana is always a great deity. Purified or not, Fire is ever a great god.

22. A blazing fire, even when it burns on a crematorium, is not considered as sullied on account of the character of the spot whereon it burns. Clarified butter looks beautiful whether kept on the sacrificial altar or in a chamber.

23 So if the Brahmana be always engaged in evil deeds, he is still to be considered as deserving of honors. Indeed, know that the Brahmana is always a great god.

CHAPTER CLII.

(ANUSHASANIKA PARVA)—Continued.

Yudhishthira said:—

1. "Tell us, O king, what is that reward of the worship of Brahmanas, seeing which you adore them O you of superior intelligence! Indeed, what is that success, emanating from their adoration, guided by which you worship them?

Bhishma said:—

2. Regarding it is cited the conversation between Pavana and Arjuna, O Bharata.

3 Gifted with a thousand arms and great beauty the powerful Kartavirya, formerly became the lord of all the world. He had his capital in the city of Mahishmati.

4. Of unbaffled prowess, that king of the Haihaya race of Kshatriyas governed the whole Earth begirt by seas, together with all her islands and all her precious mines of gold and gems.

5 Respecting the duties of the Kshatriya order, as also humility and Vedic learning, the king made large gifts of wealth to the Rishi Dattatreya.

6 Indeed, the son of Kritavirya thus worshipped that great ascetic who, becoming pleased with him, asked him to solicit three boons.

7. Thus requested by the Rishi for boons, the king addressed him saying,—Let me have a thousand arms when I am in the midst of my elders. While, however, I remain at home let me have, as usual, only two arms.

8 Indeed, let combatants, when fighting, see me possessed of a thousand arms. Observant also of high vows let me succeed in subjugating the entire Earth by my prowess.

9 Having acquired the Earth righteously, let me govern her with vigilance. There is a fourth boon which, O foremost of twice-born persons, I solicit thee to grant.

10 O faultless one, being disposed to favor me, you should grant it to me! Dependent as I am on you, whenever I may happen to go wrong, let pious men come forth to instruct and set me right.

11. Thus addressed, that Brahman replied to the king, saying—So let it be! thus were those boons acquired by that king of burning effulgence.

12—14 Riding then on his car which was effulgent like fire or the Sun the king, blinded by his great prowess, said,—Who, indeed, is there who can be considered as my equal in patience and energy, in fame and heroism, in prowess and strength?—After he had uttered these words, an invisible voice in the sky, said—O ignorant wretch, do you not know that the Brahmana is superior to the Kshatriya? The Kshatriya, helped by the Brahmana, rules all creatures.

15 When pleased I am able to create many creatures When angry, I am able to destroy all In thought, word, and deed, I am the foremost The Brahmana is certainly not above me.

16 The first proposition here is that the Brahmana is superior to Kshatriyas The counter-proposition is that the Kshatriya is superior. You have said that the two are united together A distinction, however, is observable in this

17 It is seen that Brahmanas take refuge with Kshatriyas The Kshatriyas never seek the refuge of Brahmanas Indeed, throughout the Earth, the Brahmanas accepting such refuge under the pretence of teaching the Vedas, get their maintenance from the Kshatriyas.

18 The duty of protecting all creatures lies with the Kshatriyas. It is from the Kshatriyas that the Brahmanas derive their livelihood. How then can the Brahmana be superior to the Kshatriyas?

19 Well, I shall, from to day, bring under my subjection, your Brahmanas who are superior to all creatures but who have mendicancy for their occupation and who are so self conceited.

20. What the virgin Gayatri has said from the sky is not true Robed in skins the Brahmanas move about in independence. I shall bring those independent men under my subjection.

21. Deity or man, there is none in the three worlds who can throw me off from the sovereignty I enjoy. Hence, I am certainly superior to the Brahmanas.

22. This world that is now considered as having Brahmanas for its foremost dwellers shall soon be made such as to have Kshatriyas for its foremos dwellers There is none who is capable of withstanding my power in battle.

23 Hearing these words of Arjuna, the sky-ranging goddess became moved

24 Then the god of wind addressing the king from the sky, said—Renounce this sinful attitude Bow to the Brahmanas By injuring them you will bring about troubles on your kingdom

25 The Brahmanas will either kill you king, though you are, or endued with great might as they are they will drive you away from your kingdom, despoiling you of your energy.

26 Hearing this speech, the king addressed the speaker saying,—Who indeed, are you?—The god of wind answered—I am the god of wind and the messenger of the celestials. I say to you what is for your benefit.

Arjuna said:—

27 Oh, I see that you have to-day shown your devotion and attachment to the Brahmanas Tell me now what kind of earthly creature is the Brahmana

28 Tell me does a superior Brahmana resemble the Wind in any respect? Or, is he like Water, or Fire, or the Sun, or the Firmament?—

CHAPTER CLIII.

The god of wind said:—

1. Hear, O deluded man, what the attributes are of Brahmanas who have all highly souls. The Brahmana is superior to all those which, O king, you have named.

2 Formerly, the Earth, indulging in a spirit of rivalry with the king of the Nagas, forsook her character as Earth. The regenerate Kashyapa caused destruction to befall her by actually paralysing her.

3. The Brahmanas are always unconquerable O king, in Heaven as also on Earth Formerly, the great Rishi Angiras, through his energy, drank off all the waters.

4 Having drunk off all the waters as if they were milk the great Rishi did not feel yet his thirst to be satisfied He, therefore, once more caused the Earth to be filled with water by raising a mighty wave

5 On another occasion, when Angiras became enraged with me I fled away, leaving the world and lived for a long time concealed in the Agnihotra of the Brahmanas, through fear of that Rishi.

6. The illustrious Purandara, an account of his having coveted the body of Ahalya, was cursed by Gautama, yet, for the sake of Virtue and wealth the Rishi did not destroy outright the king of the celestials

7. The Ocean, O king, that was full in former days of crystal water, cursed by the Brahmanas, became saline in taste.

8 Even Agni who is] gold hued, and who blazes with effulgence when destitute of smoke, and whose flames [uniting together, burn upwards, when cursed by the angry Angiras, became divested of all these qualities.

9 See, the sixty thousand sons of Sagara, who came here to worship the Ocean, have all been pulverised by the Brahmana Kapila of golden hue.

10. You are notequal to the Brahmanas. Do you, O king, seek your own good The Kshatriya of even great power bows to Brahmana children who are still in their mothers' wombs.

11. The large kingdom of the Dandakas was destroyed by a Brahmana. The powerful Kshatriya Talajangha was destroyed by a single Brahmana, viz., Aurva.

12 You, too, have acquired a large kingdom, great might, religious merit, and learning, which are all difficult of acquirement, through the grace of Dattatreya.

13 Why do you, O Arjuna, adore Agni everyday who is a Brahmana? He is the bearer of sacrificial libations from every part of the universe. Are you ignorant of this fact.

14. Why, indeed, do you allow yourself to be stupefied by folly when you are not ignorant of the fact that a superior Brahmana is the protector of all creatures in the world and is, indeed, the creator of the living world?

15 The Lord of all creatures, Brahman, unmanifest, gifted with power, and of unfading glory, who created this vast universe with its mobile and immobile creatures, (is a Brahmana)

16 Some ignorant persons there are, who say that Brahman was born of an Egg. From the original Egg, when it opened, mountains and the cardinal points and the waters and the Earth and the Heavens all came into existence.

17. No one had seen this birth of the creation. How then can Brahman be said to have taken his birth from the original Egg, when especially he is said to be Unborn? It is said that vast increate Space is the original Egg It was from this increate Space that the Grandfather was born.

18. If you ask,—Whereon would the Grandfather, after his birth from increate Space, rest, for there was then nothing else?—the answer may be given thus There is an existent Being of the name of Consciousness. That mighty Being is gifted with great energy.

19 There is no Egg. Brahman, however, is existent. He is the Creator of the universe and is its King!—Thus addressed by the god of wind, king Arjuna remained silent.

CHAPTER CLIV.

The god of wind said:—

1. Once on a time, O king, a king named Anga wished to give away the entire Earth as sacrificial present to the Brahmanas At this, the Earth became stricken with anxiety.

2. I am the daughter of Brahman. I hold all creatures. Having obtained me, alas, why does this foremost of kings wish to give me away to the Brahmanas?

3 Renouncing my character as the soil, I shall now go to my father. Let this king with all his kingdom meet with destruction!—Forming this conclusion, she departed for the region of Brahman.

4 Seeing the goddess Earth about to go, the Rishi Kashyapa himself immediately entered the visible body of the goddess, renouncing his own body, by the help of Yoga.

5. Thus penetrated by the spirit of Kashyapa, the earth grew in prosperity and became full of all kinds of vegetable produce. Indeed, O king, for the time the Kashyapa pervaded the earth, Virtue became foremost everywhere and all fears ceased.

6 Thus, O king, the earth remained penetrated by the spirit of Kashyapa for thirty thousand divine years, fully alive to all those functions which it used to discharge while it was penetrated by the spirit of Brahmana's daughter.

7. Upon the expiration of this period, the goddess returned from the region of Brahman and arrived here bowed to Kashyapa and from that time became the daughter of that Rishi.

8. Kashyapa is a Brahmana. This was the feet, O king, that a Brahmana did,

Tell me the name of the Kshatriya who is superior to Kashyapa.

9 Hearing these words, king Arjuna remained silent. The god of wind once more said to him,—Hear now, O king, the story of Utathya who was born in the family of Angiras.

10. The daughter of Soma, named Bhadra, came to be considered as peerless in beauty. Her father Soma regarded Utathya to be the fittest of husbands for her.

11. The famous and highly blessed maiden of faultless limbs, observing various vows practised the severest austerities from the desire of getting Utathya for her husband.

12 After some time, Soma's father Atri, inviting Utathya to his house, bestowed upon him the famous maiden Utathya who used to give away sacrificial presents in profusion, duly received the girl for his wife.

13 It so took place, however, that the beautiful Varuna had, from a long time before, coveted the girl Coming to the forest where Utathya lived, Varuna stole away the girl when she had plunged into the Yamuna for a bath.

14 Abducting her thus, the Lord of the waters took her to his own house That mansion was wonderful It was adorned with six hundred thousand lakes.

15. There is no palace that can be considered more beautiful than that of Varuna. It was adorned with many places and by the presence of various tribes of Apsaras and of various excellent articles of enjoyment.

16—17 There, within that palace, the the Lord of waters, O king, sported with the damsel A little while after, Utathya came to know of the ravishment of his wife Indeed, having heard all the facts from Narada, Utathya addressed the celelestial Rishi, saying —Go O Narada, to Varuna and speak with due severity to him. Ask him as to why he has abducted my wife, and, indeed, tell him in my name that he should give her up

18. You may tell him further,—You are a protector of the worlds, O Varuna, and not a destroyer. Why then have you abducted my wife bestowed upon me by Soma?

19. Thus requested by Utathya, the celestial Rishi Narada went to where Varuna was and addressing him, said —Do you liberate the wife of Utathya. Indeed, why have you abducted her?

20 Hearing these words of Narada, Varuna replied to him, saying,—This timid girl is very dear to me. I dare not let her go.

21—22 Receiving this reply, Narada went to Utathya and cheerlessly told him,—O great ascetic, Varuna has driven me from his house, catching me by the throat He is reluctant to restore to you your wife. Do you act as you please.

22. Hearing these words of Narada, Angiras became enraged Having penances for wealth he solidified the waters and drank them off, by his energy.

24 When all the waters were thus drunk off, the Lord of that element became very dispirited with all his friends and kinsfolk For all that, he did not still give up Utathya's wife.

25 Then Utathya, that foremost of twice born persons, filled with anger, commanded Earth, saying —O amiable one, do you show land where there are at present the six hundred thousand lakes.

26—27. At these words of the Rishi the Ocean receded from the spot marked out, and land appeared which was highly sterile. To the rivers which flowed through that region, Utathya said,—O Saraswati, do you become invisible here Indeed, O timid lady, leaving this region, go you to the desert O auspicious goddess, let this region, destitute of you, cease to become sacred.

28 When that region became dry he repaired to Angirasa, taking with him Utathya's wife, and made her over to him.

29 Getting back his wife, Utathya became cheerful Then, O chief of the Haihaya family, that great Brahmana rescued both the universe and the Lord of waters from the situation of distress into which he had reduced them

30—31 Knowing every duty, the highly energetic Rishi Utathya, after getting back his wife, O king, said to Varuna,—I have recovered my wife, O lord of waters, with the help of my penances and after inflicting such distress on you as made you cry aloud in pain Having said this, he went home, with that wife of his.

32 Even such, O king, was Utathya, that foremost of Brahmanas. Shall I go on? Or, will you yet persist in your opinion? What, is there a Kshatriya that is superior to Utathya?

CHAPTER CLV.

Bhishma said.—

1. Thus addressed, king Arjuna remained silent. The god of wind once more spoke to him—Listen now, O king, to the greatness of the Brahmana Agastya.

2. Once on a time, the gods were defeated by the Asuras upon which they became very dispirited. The sacrifices of the deities were all robbed, and the Swadha of the manes was also misappropriated

3. Indeed, O chief of the Haihayas, all the religious acts and observances of human beings also were stopped by the Danavas Shorn of their prosperity, the celestials wandered over the Earth as we have heard

4. One day, in course of their wanderings, they met Agastya of high vows, that Brahmana, O king, who was gifted with great energy and solar splendour.

5—6. Saluting him duly, the celestials made the usual polite enquiries They then, O king, said these words to that high souled one,—We have been defeated by the Danavas in battle, and have, therefore, been deprived of affluence and prosperity Do you, therefore, O foremost of ascetics, rescue us from this situation of great fear.

7. Thus informed of the condition to which the celestials had been reduced, Agastya became highly enraged Highly energetic, he at once blazed forth like the *all consuming fire at the time of the uni*versal dissolution.

8. With the burning rays which then came out from the Rishi, the Danavas began to be burnt. Indeed, O king, thousands of them began to drop down from the sky.

9 Burning with the energy of Agastya, the Danavas, abandoning both Heaven and Earth, fled towards the south.

10. At that time the Danava king Vali was celebrating a Horse-Sacrifice in the nether regions Those great Asuras who were with him in those regions or who were living in the bowels of the Earth, were not burnt.

11. The celestials, upon the destruction of their enemies, then regained their own regions, their fears entirely removed. Encouraged by what he did for them, they then begged the Rishi to destroy those Asuras who had taken refuge within the bowels of the Earth or in the nether regions.

12 Thus requested by the gods, Agastya replied to them saying,—Yes I can consume those Asuras who are living underneath the Earth, but if I achieve such a feat, my penances will suffer decay. Hence, I shall not exert my power.

13 Thus, O king, were the Danavas consumed by the illustrious Rishi with his own energy. Thus did Agastya of purified soul, O monarch, accomplish that deed with the help of his penances

14 O sinless one, so was Agastya as described by me. Shall I continue? Or, will you say anything in reply? Is there any Kshatriya who is greater than Agastya?—

Bhishma said:—

15 *Thus addressed king Arjuna re*mained silent The god of wind once more said—Hear, O king one of the great feats of the illustrious Vasishtha.

16 Once on a time the celestials were engaged in celebrating a sacrifice on the shores of the lake Vaikhanasa Knowing his power, the sacrificing gods thought of Vasishtha and made him their priest in imagination.

17 Meanwhile, seeing the gods reduced and emaciated on account of the initiation they were undergoing, a race of Danavas, of the name of Khalins, of statures as gigantic as mountains, wished to kill them.

18 Those amongst the Danavas that were either disabled or killed in the fight were plunged into the waters of the Manasa lake and on account of the boon of the Grandfather they immediately came back to vigour and life.

19 Taking up huge and terrible moun*tain summits and maces and trees,* they agitated the waters of the lake, making them swell up to the height of a hundred Yojanas.

20 They then ran against the celestials numbering ten thousand. Afflicted by the Danavas the gods then sought the refuge of their king Vasava

21. Shakra however, was soon afflicted *by them In his distress he sought the pro*tection of Vashishtha At this, the holy Rishi Vashishtha assured the celestials, removing their fears.

22 Understanding that the gods had become greatly dispirited the ascetic did this through mercy. He displayed his energy and burnt without any exertion, those Danavas called Khalins

23 Having penances for wealth, the Rishi brought the River Ganga, who had gone to Kailasa, to that spot, Indeed, Ganga appeared, piercing through the waters of the lake.

24. The lake was penetrated by that river. And as that celestial river piercing through the waters of the lake, appeared it flowed on, under the name of Sarayu The palace wherein those Danavas fell came to be called after them

25 Thus were the dwellers of Heaven, headed by Indra, rescued from great distress by Vashishtha It was thus that those Danavas, who had received boons from Brahman, were killed by that great Rishi

26 O sinless one, I have described to you the feat which Vashishtha accomplished. Shall I go on? Or, will you say anything? Was there a Kshatriya who could be said to excel the Brahmana Vashishtha?

CHAPTER CLVI.

(ANUSHASANIKA PARVA)—Continued.

Bhishma said:—

1. Thus addressed, Arjuna remained silent. The god of wind once more addressed him saying,—Hear me, O foremost one of the Haihayas, as I describe to you the achievement of the great Atri.

2. Once on a time as the gods and Danavas were fighting each other in the dark, Rahu pierced both the Sun and Moon with his arrows.

3 The gods, overwhelmed by darkness began to fall before the powerful Danavas, O foremost of kings

4—5 Repeatedly struck by the Asuras, the celestials began to lose their strength They then saw the learned Brahmana Atri having penances for wealth, engaged in the observance of austerities Addressing that Rishi who had all his senses and in whom anger had been extinguished, they said —See O Rishi, these two, viz, the Moon and the Sun who have both been pierced by the Asuras with their arrows.

6 On account of this, darkness has overtaken us, and we are being struck down by the enemy. We do not see the end of our troubles Do you, O lord of great power, rescue us from this great fear.

The Rishi said:—

7. How, indeed, shall I protect you?—They answered, saying —Do you become the Moon Do you also become the Sun, and do you begin to kill these robbers

8 Thus begged by them, Atri assumed the form of the darkness destroying Moon. Indeed, on account of his agreeable disposition, he began to look as beautiful and delightful as the Moon himself.

9 Seeing that the real Moon and the real the Sun had become darkened by the arrows of the enemy, Atri assuming the forms of those luminaries, began to shine forth over the field of battle, helped by the power of his penances.

10 Indeed, Atri made the universe shine in light, removing all its darkness. By displaying his power, he also subjugated, the vast multitudes of those enemies of the celestials

11. Seeing those great Asuras burnt by Atri, the gods also, protected by Atri's energy, began to despatch them quickly.

12 Displaying his prowess and collecting all his energy, it was thus that Atri illumined the god of day, rescued the celestials, and killed the Asuras.

13 This was the feat that that twice-born one, helped by his sacred fire —that silent reciter of Mantras, that one clad in deer-skins —performed! See O royal sage, the act achieved by that Rishi who lived upon fruits only.

14 I have thus described to you, in full, the feat of the great Atri Shall I go on? Or, will you say anything? Is there a Kshatriya who is superior to this twice-born Rishi?

15 Thus addressed, Arjuna remained silent. The god of wind once more spoke to him —Hear O king, the feat achieved by the great Chyavana.

16 Having made his promise to the twin Ashwins Chyavana addressed the chastiser of Paka, saying —Do you make the Ashwins drinkers of Soma with all the other celestials.

Indra said —

17. The Ashwins have been outcasted by us How, then, can these be admitted into the sacrificial circle for drinking Soma with the others? They are not classed with the celestials. Do not, therefore, tell us so.

18 O you of great vows, we do not wish to drink Soma in the company of the Ashwins! Whatever other commands you may be pleased to utter, O learned Brahmana, we are ready to do.

Chyavana said —

19 The twin Ashwins shall drink Soma with all of you. Both of them are gods, O king of the celestials, for they are the sons of the Sun.

20 Let the gods do what I have said, By acting according to those words, the gods will reap great advantage By acting otherwise, evil will overtake them.

Indra said —

21. I shall not, O foremost of twice born persons, drink Soma with the Ashwins Let others drink with them as they please. As for myself, I dare not do it.

Chyavana said :—

22 If, O destroyer of Vala, you will not obey my words, you shall, this very day, drink Soma with them in sacrifice, compelled by me.

The god of wind said :—

23 Then Chyavana taking the Ashwins with him, began a great religious rite for their benefit The gods all became stupefied by Chyavana with the help of his Mantras.

24. Seeing that feat undertaken by Chyavana, Indra became enraged. Taking up a huge mountain he ran against that Rishi.

25. The king of the deities was also armed with the Thunderbolt Then the illustrious Chyavana, gifted with penances, cast angry looks upon Indra as he advanced.

26 Throwing a little water at him, he paralysed the king of the deities with his Thunderbolt and mountain As the result of the religious rite he had begun, he created a terrible Asura hostile to Indra.

27 Made of the libations he had poured on the sacred fire, that Asura was called Mada, of mouth gaping wide Such was the Asura that the great ascetic created with the help of Mantras. There were a thousand teeth in his mouth, extending for a hundred Yojanas

28 Of terrible appearance, his fangs were two hundred Yojanas in length One of his cheeks rested on the Earth and the other touched the sky.

29 Indeed, all the gods with Vasava seemed to stand at the root of that great Asura's tongue, as fishes when they enter into the wide open mouth of a leviathan.

30. While standing within the mouth of Mada, the gods consulted speedily and then addressing Indra, said —Do you soon bend your head in respect to this twice born personage.

31. We shall without any hesitation drink Soma with the Ashwins in our company.—Then bowing down his head to Chyavana, Shakra obeyed his command.

32 Thus did Chyavana make the Ashwins drinkers of Soma with the other gods. Calling back Mada, the Rishi then assigned him his work.

33 Soma was ordered to live in dice, in hunting, in drinking, and in women. Hence, O king, those men who betake themselves to these, forsooth, meet with destruction.

34 Hence, one should always renounce these faults to a great distance Thus, O king, I have described to you the feat achieved by Chyavana Shall I go on? Or, will you say anything in reply? Is there a Kshatriya who is higher than the Brahmana Chyavana?

(ANUSHASANIKA PARVA).—Continued.

Bhishma said :—

1—2. Hearing these words of the god of wind, Arjuna remained silent. At this, the god of wind once more addressed him saying,—When the dwellers of Heaven, headed by Indra, found themselves within the mouth of the Asura Mada, at that time, Chyavana took away from them the Earth.

3 Deprived previously of Heaven and now of the Earth also, the gods became very dispirited Indeed, those great ones, afflicted with grief, then threw themselves unreservedly upon the Grandfather's protection.

The gods said :—

4. O you who are adored by all creatures of the universe the Earth has been taken away from us by Chyavana, while we have been deprived of Heaven by the Kapas, O powerful one.

Brahman said :—

5 Ye dwellers of Heaven, do you, with Indra repair speedily and seek the protection of the Brahmanas By pleasing them you will succeed in regaining both the regions as before.

6 Thus instructed by the Grandfather, the deities went to the Brahmanas and begged for their protection. The Brahmanas replied enquiring —Whom shall we subjugate?—I has asked the celestials said to them,—Do ye subjugate the Kapas.

7 The Brahmanas then said,—Bringing them down on the Earth first, we shall quickly subjugate them —After this, the Brahmanas began a rite having for its object the destruction of the Kapas As soon as this was heard of by the Kapas, they immediately sent a messenger of theirs, named Dhani, to those Brahmanas.

8 Dhani, coming to them as they sat on the Earth, thus communicated to them the message of the Kapas,—The Kapas are like you all Hence, what will be the results of these rites which it appears you are determined upon?

9 Of all them are well conversant with the Vedas and gifted with wisdom All of them care for sacrifices All of them have Truth for their vow, and for these reasons all of them are considered as equal to great Rishis

10. The goddess of Prosperity sports among them, and they, in their turn, support her with respect. They never know their wives uselessly, and they never eat the flesh of such animals as have not been killed in sacrifices.

11. They pour libations in the sacrificial fire (every day) and obey the commands of their preceptors and elders All of them are of souls under perfect restraint, and never take any food without dividing it duly among their children

12 They always proceed on cars and other vehicles together. They never know their wives when the latter are in menses. They all act in such a way as to acquire regions of happiness hereafter. Indeed, they are always righteous in their deeds.

13 They never eat anything themselves, when enciente women or old men have not eaten They never indulge in play or sports of any kind in the forenoon. They never sleep during the day.

14 When the Kapas have these and many other virtues and qualities, why, indeed, would you seek to subjugate them? You should abstain from the attempt Indeed, by such abstention you would achieve what is for your good.

The Brahmanas said:—

15. Oh, we shall subjugate the Kapas In this matter, we are quite of a piece with the celestials Hence, the Kapas deserve to be killed by us. As regards Dhanin, he should return whence he came

16. After this Dhanin, returning to the Kapas, said to them —The Brahmans are not disposed to do you any good —Hearing this, all the Kapas took up their weapons and went towards the Brahmanas.

17. Seeing the Kapas advancing against them with the standard of their cars upraised, the Brahmanas immediately created certain fires for the destruction of the vital airs of the Kapas.

18. Having brought about the destruction of the Kapas, those eternal fires, created with the help of the Vedic Mantras, began to shine in the firmament like so many clouds.

19 The gods having assembled together in battle, killed many of the Danavas. They did not know at that time that it was the Brahmanas who had encompassed their destruction.

20 Then coming there, O king, the highly energetic Narada informed the deities how their enemies, the Kapas, had been really killed, by the Brahmanas of mighty energy.

21 Hearing these words of Narada, the dwellers of Heaven became highly pleased. They also lauded those regenerate and illustrious allies of theirs.

22. The energy and prowess of the celestials then began to increase, and adored in all the worlds, they acquired also the boon of immortality.

23 After the god of wind had said these words, king Arjuna adored him duly and addressing him answered in these words. Hear, O mighty-armed king, what Arjuna said.

Arjuna said:—

24 O powerful god, always and by all means do I live for the Brahmanas. Devoted to them, I adore them always.

25. Through the favour of Dattatreya I have acquired this might of mine. Through his favor I have been able to perform great feats in the world and acquire high merit.

26 Oh, I have with attention, heard the achievements O god of wind, of the Brahmanas with all their interesting details as described by you truly.

The god of wind said:—

27. Do you protect and maintain the Brahmanas, by performing those Kshatriya duties which are yours by birth. Do you protect them even as you protect your own senses There is danger to you from the family of Bhrigu All that, however, will happen on a distant day.

is to Him that the warriors dedicate all kinds of their cars at the time of war.

19 He is eternal, and it is under that illustrious one that the Sky, Earth Heaven, all things exist and stay. He it was who caused the vital seed of the gods Mitra and Varuna to fall within a jar, whence originated the Rishi known by the name of Vashishtha.

20 It is Krishna who is the god of wind, it is he who is the powerful Ashwins, it is he who is that first of gods, viz., the Sun having a thousand rays. It is he by whom the Asuras have been subjugated It is he who covered the three worlds with three footsteps.

21. He is the soul of the celestials and human beings, and Pitris. It is he who is the Sacrifice performed by those persons who are conversant with the rituals of sacrifices. It is he who rises every day in the sky (in the form of the Sun) and divides Time into day and night, and courses for half the year northwards and for half the year southwards.

22. Innumerable rays of light come out from his upwards and downwards and transversely and illumine the Earth Brahmanas conversant with the Vedas worship him Taking a portion of his rays the Sun shines in the sky Month after month, the sacrificer ordains him as a sacrifice Twice-born persons conversant with the Vedas hymn his praises in sacrifices of all kinds. He it is who is the wheel of the year, having three naves and seven horses to drag it. It is thus that he supports the seasons.

24 Gifted with great energy, pervading all things, the foremost of all creatures it is Krishna who alone upholds all the worlds He is the Sun, the remover of all darkness He is the Creator of all. Do you, O hero, approach that Krishna.

25. Once on a time, the great and powerful Krishna lived, for a while, in the form of Agni in the forest of Khandava among some straw or dry grass Soon was he pleased Capable of going everywhere at will, it was Krishna who, having subjugated the Rakshasas and Uragas poured them as libations upon the burning fire.

26 It is Krishna who gave to Arjuna a number of white horses It is he who is the creator of all horses. This world represents his car. He it is who yokes that car for setting it in motion. That car has three wheels.

27. It has three kinds of motion. It has four horses yoked to it. It has three naves

28 It is this Krishna who is the refuge of the five original elements with the sky among them It is he who created the Earth and Heaven and the intervening space. Indeed, it is this Krishna of immeasurable and burning energy who has created the forests and the mountains It is this Krishna who, desirous of punishing Shakra who was about to hurl his thunder at him, crossed the rivers and at once paralysed him He is the one great Indra who is worshipped by the Brahmanas in great sacrifices with the help of a thousand old Richs

29 It was this Krishna, O king, who alone was able to keep the highly energetic Rishi Durvasas as a guest for some time in his house He is said to be the one ancient Rishi He is the Creator of the universe Indeed, he creates everything from his own nature.

30 Superior to all the celestials, it is he who teaches all the deities He scrupulously observes all ancient ordinances Know, O king that this Krishna, who is called Vishwaksena, is the fruit of all deeds which relate to pleasure of all deeds which are founded on the Vedas, and of all deeds which appertain to the world.

31. He is the white rays of light which are seen in all the worlds He is the three worlds. He is the three Regents of all the worlds He is the three sacrificial fires. He is the three Vyahritis, indeed, this son of Devaki is all the gods together

32 He is the Year, He is the Seasons; He is the Fortnights, He is the Day and the Night, He is those divisions of time which are called Kalas, and Kashthas, and Matras and Muhurtas, and Layas, and Kshanas Know that this Vishwaksena is all these.

33 The Moon and the Sun, the Planets, the Constellations and the Stars, all the Parva days, including the day of the full moon, the conjunctions of the constellations, and the seasons, have, O son of Pritha, emanated from this Krishna who is Vishwaksena.

34 The Rudras the Adityas the Vasus, the Ashwins the Sadhyas the Vishwedevas, the Maruts, Prajapati himself, the mother of the celestials, viz., Aditi and the seven Rishis, have all originated from Krishna.

35 Changing himself into the Wind he scatters the universe Of universal form, he becomes Fire which consumes all things. Changing himself into Water, he drenches and submerges all, and assuming the form of Brahman, he creates all the various animate and inanimate creatures.

36 He is himself the Veda yet he learns all the Vedas. He is himself the Veda, yet he learns all the Vedas. He is himself all the ordinances, yet he observes all the ordinances which have been laid down in matters connected with Righteousness and the Vedas and that force or might which rules the world Indeed know, O Yudhishthira, that this Keshava is all the mobile and immobile universe.

37 He is of the form of the most resplendent light. Of universal form this Krishna is shorn in that blazing effulgence. The original cause of the soul of all existent creatures, he at first created the waters. Afterwards he created this universe.

38 Know that this Krishna is Vishnu Know him to be the soul of the entire universe Know him to be all the seasons, he is these various wonderful visitations of Nature which we see, he is the clouds that pour rain and the lightning which flashes in the sky. He is the elephant Airavata In fact, he is the immobile and mobile universe.

39 The clay of the universe and above all attributes, this Krishna is Vasudeva When he becomes individual soul he is called Sankarshana Next, he changes himself into Pradyumna and then into Aniruddha. Thus, the great Krishna, who has sprung from himself, divides himself in fourfold form

40. For creating this universe which consists of the five primal elements, he begins this work, and causes it to go on in the fivefold form of animate existence containing celestial and Asuras and human beings and beasts and birds He it is who then creates the Earth and the Wind, the Sky, Light, and also Water, O son of Pritha.

41. Having created this universe of immobile and mobile objects divided into four orders of being (viz., viviparous, oviparous, vegetable, and fifth born), he then created the Earth with her fivefold seed. He then created the Sky for pouring copious rain on the Earth.

42—44 Forsooth, O king, it is this Krishna who has created this universe. He has originated from his own self, it is he who causes all things to exist through his own power. He it is who has created the celestials, the Asuras, the human beings, the worlds, the Rishis, the departed manes and all creatures. Desirous of creating, that Lord of all creatures duly created the entire universe of life. Know that good and evil mobile and immobile, have all originated from this one who is Vishwaksena. Whatever exists, and whatever will come into being, all is Keshava. This Krishna is also the death which overtakes all creatures when their end comes. He is eternal and it is he who upholds the cause of Virtue. Whatever existed in the past, and whatever we do not know, indeed, all that also is this Vishwaksena

45 All that is noble and meritorious in the universe, all that is good and evil, is Keshava who is inconceivable. Hence it is absurd to think of anything which is superior to Keshava

46 Keshava is such More than this, He is Narayana, the highest of the high, immutable and undecaying. He is the eternal and changeless cause of the entire mobile and immobile universe with its beginning, middle, and end, as also of all creatures whose birth follows their wish.

CHAPTER CLIX.

(ANUSHASANIKA PARVA)—Continued.

Yudhishthira said.—

1 Tell us O destroyer of Madhu the prosperity which originates from the worship of the Brahmanas You are a master of this subject. Indeed, our grandfather knows you

Vasudeva said.—

2 Hear me, O king, with attention, O chief of Bharata's race, as I recite to you what the merits of the Brahmanas are, O foremost one of Kuru's race

3—4 Once on a time while I was seated at Dwaravati, O delighter of the Kurus, my son Pradyumna, enraged by certain Brahmanas, came to me and said —O destroyer of Madhu, what merit is there for adoring the Brahmanas Whence is their lordship derived both in this world and in the next.

5 O giver of honors, what rewards are gained by constantly adoring the Brahmanas? Kindly explain this clearly to me, for my mind is disturbed by doubts about this.

6 When Pradyumna said, these words to me, I answered him as follows Do you hear, O king, with rapt attention, what these words were

7 O child of Rukmini, listen to me as I tell you what prosperity one may acquire by adoring the Brahmanas. When one tries to acquire the threefold objects of life (viz., Virtue, Profit and Pleasure), or Emancipation, or fame and prosperity, or the treatment and cure of disease, or the worship of the deities and the departed manes, he should take care to please the twice-born ones. They are each a king Soma. They are the dispensers of happiness and misery.

9 O child of Rukmini, whether in this or in the next world, O son, everything agreeable has originated from the Brahmanas I have no doubt in this.

10. From the adoration of the Brahmanas originate achievements and fame and strength. Men and the Regents of the universe, adore the Brahmanas.

11. How then, O son, can we disregard them, thinking that we are lords of the Earth? O mighty armed one, do not allow your anger to embrace the Brahmanas as its object.

12 In this as also the next world Brahmanas are considered as great Beings They have direct knowledge of everything in the universe. Verily, they are capable of reducing everything into ashes, if angry.

13 They are capable of creating other worlds and other Regents of worlds. Why then should not persons gifted with energy and true knowledge treat them with obedience and respect?

14 Formerly in my house, O son, lived the Brahmana Durvasas whose complexion was green and tawny. Clad in rags, he had a stick made of the Vilwa tree His beard was long and he was greatly emaciated.

15—16 He was taller in stature than the tallest man on Earth Wandering over all the worlds of human beings and of the deities and other superior beings, he sang constantly among assemblies and in public squares.—Who is there who would cause the Brahmana Durvasas to live in his house, doing the duties of hospitality towards him?

17. He becomes wroth with every one If he finds even the slightest transgression! Hearing this about my nature, who is there who will give me refuge?

18 Indeed, he who would give me shelter as a guest should not do anything to anger me!—When I saw that no one ventured to give him shelter in his house, I invited him and made him live in my abode.

19 On certain days he would eat the food sufficient for the needs of thousands of persons On other days he would eat very little. On some days he would go out of my house and would not return.

20 He would sometimes laugh without any reason and sometimes cry uselessly At that time there was nobody on Earth as old as he.

21. One day, entering the quarters which were given to him, he burnt all the beds and coverlets and all the well-adorned damsels who were there for serving him. Doing this, he went out.

22. Of highly praiseworthy vows, he met me shortly after this and addressing me, said,—O Krishna, I wish to eat frumenty forthwith.

23 Having understood his mind previously, I had set my servants to prepare every kind of food and drink.

24 Indeed, many excellent viands had been kept ready. As soon as I was asked, I caused hot frumenty to be brought and offered to the ascetic.

25. Having eaten some, he quickly said to me,—O Krishna, take some of this frumenty and smear all your limbs with it.

26 Unhesitatingly I did as directed. Indeed, with the residue of that frumenty I smeared my body and head.

27 The ascetic at that time saw your beautiful mother standing near. Laughing the while, he smeared her body also with that frumenty.

28 The ascetic then caused your mother, whose body was smeared over with frumenty, to be yoked to a car without any delay. Ascending that car he started from my house.

29 Highly intelligent that Brahmana shone with effulgence like fire, and struck, before me, my youthful Rukmini, as if she were an animal born to drag the cars of human beings.

30 Seeing this, I did not feel the slightest grief born of malice or the desire to injure the Rishi. Having yoked Rukmini to the car, he went out, desirous of passing along the high road of the city.

31—32 Seeing that extraordinary spectacle, some Dasharhas, filled with anger, addressed one another and began to converse thus;—Who else is there on Earth who would live after having yoked Rukmini to a car! Indeed, let the world be filled with Brahmanas only! Let no other orders take birth here!

33. The poison of a virulent snake is greatly powerful More powerful than poison is a Brahmana There is no physician for a person who has been bit or burnt by the virulent snake of a Brahmana.

34 As the irresistible Durvasas proceeded on the car, Rukmini loitered on the road and frequently dropped down. At this the twice born Rishi became angry and began to urge Rukmini on by striking her with the whip

35 At last, filled with an irresistible passion, the Brahmana leaped down from the car, and fled towards the south, running on foot, over a pathless ground

36 Seeing that foremost of Brahmanas, flying along the pathless ground, we followed him, although we were smeared with frumenty, exclaiming behind him,—Be pleased with us, O holy one.

37 Gifted with great energy, the Brahmana seeing me, said, O mighty armed Krishna, you have subdued anger by the strength of your nature.

38 O you of excellent vows I have not found the slightest fault in you. O Govinda, I have been highly pleased with you Do you solicit the fruition of such desires as you please.

39—40. Behold duly, O son what the power is of myself when I become pleased with any one As long as celestials and human beings will continue to entertain a liking for food so long will every one among them cherish the same liking for you that they cherish for their food As long, again, as there will be Virtue in the several worlds, so long will the fame of your deeds last.

41. Indeed, your distinction will last so long in the three worlds O Janarddana, agreeable you will be to all persons

42 Whatever articles of yours have been broken or burnt or otherwise destroyed (by me) you will see restored, O Janarddana, to their former state or they will reappear even in a better form.

43 As long again, O you of unfading glory, as you will wish to live, so long will you have no fear of death attacking you through such parts of your body as have been smeared with the frumenty I gave you.

44 O son, why did you not smear that frumenty on the soles of your feet as well? By not doing it, you have acted in a way that is not approved by me — These were the words that he said well pleased with me on that occasion. After he had ceased speaking I saw that my body became gifted with great great beauty and splendour.

45 To Rukmini also, the Rishi, well pleased with her, said —O beautiful lady, you will be the foremost one of thy sex in fame, and you will enjoy great glory, and achievements You will never suffer from decrepitude or disease or loss of complexion.

46 Every one will see you engaged in waiting upon Krishna, possessed as you already are with a fragrant odor which is always present in you

47. You will become the foremost of all wives, numbering sixteen thousand, of Keshava At last, when the time comes for your departure from the world, you will acquire the inseparable companionship of Krishna hereafter —

48—49 Having said these words to your mother, the Rishi once more addressed me and uttering the following words, left the spot Indeed, the Rishi Durvasas, shining like a fire, said,—O Keshava, may you be so disposed always towards the Brahmanas —After uttering these words, that Brahmana disappeared there and then before my eyes.

50 After his disappearance, I began to follow the vow of uttering certain Mantras silently without being heard by anybody. From that day I resolved to do whatever commands I should receive from the Brahmanas.

51. Having adopted this vow, O son, along with your mother, both of us, with hearts filled with joy re entered our palace

52 Entering our house I saw that everything which the Rishi had broken or burnt had re appeared fresh.

53 Seeing those new articles, which had besides become more durable, I became stricken with wonder. O son of Rukmini, from that day forth I have always adored the Brahmanas in my mind.

54. This, O chief of Bharata's race, is what I said on that occasion about the greatness of those Brahmanas who are the foremost of their order.

55 Do you also O son of Kunti, adore the highly blessed Brahmanas every day with gifts of wealth and kine, O powerful one 56 It was thus that I won the prosperity I enjoy—the prosperity that is born of the favour of Brahmanas. Whatever, again, Bhishma has said of me, O chief of the Bharatas, is all true.

CHAPTER CLX.

(ANUSHASANIKA PARVA).—Continued.

Yudhishthira said:—

1. You should, O destroyer of Madhu, explain to me that knowledge which you have acquired through the favour of Durvasas.

2. O foremost of all persons having intelligence, I wish to know everything about the great blessedness and all the names of that great one truly and in detail!

Vasudeva said:—

3. I shall recite to you the good which I have acquired and the fame which I have won through the favour of that great one. I shall describe to you the subject, after having bowed unto Kaparddin.

4. O king, listen to me as I recite to you that Shata-Rudriya which I repeat, with controlled senses, every morning after rising from bed.

5. The great lord of all creatures, viz, the Grandfather Brahman himself, having penances for riches, composed those Mantras, after having observed especial penances for some time. O sire, it is Shankara who created all the creatures in the universe, mobile and immobile.

6. There is no being who is superior, O monarch, to Mahadeva. He is the highest of all beings in the three worlds.

7. There is no one who is capable of standing before that great Being. Indeed, there is no Being in the three worlds who is his equal.

8. When he stands, filled with anger, on the field of battle, the very scent of his body deprives all foes of consciousness and they who are not killed tremble and fall down.

9. His roars are terrible, like the mutterings of clouds. Hearing those roars in battle, the very hearts of the celestials break in twain.

10—12. When the holder of Pinaka becomes angry and assuming a terrible mien merely casts his eye upon deity, Asura, Gandharva, or snake, that individual cannot obtain peace of mind by taking shelter in the recessess of even a mountain cave. When that lord of all creatures, viz, Daksha, desirous of celebrating a sacrifice, spread his sacrifice out, the brave Bhava, yielding to anger (at Daksha's slight of him), pierced the Sacrifice. Shooting his arrow from his terrible bow, he roared aloud.

13. Indeed, when Maheshwara became angry and suddenly pierced with his arrow the embodied form of sacrifice, the celestials became filled with sorrow, losing happiness and tranquility of heart.

14. On account of the twang of his bowstring the whole universe became agitated. The celestials and the Asuras, O son of Pritha, all became cheerless and stupefied.

15. The Ocean rolled in agitation and the Earth trembled to her centre. The hills and mountains began to move from their bases and ran on all sides. The vault of the sky became cracked.

16. All the worlds became covered with darkness. Nothing could be seen. The light of all the luminaries became darkened, along with that of the Sun himself, O Bharata.

17. The great Rishis, stricken with fear and desirous of doing good to themselves and the universe, performed the usual rites of propitiation and peace.

18. Meanwhile, Rudra of terrible prowess rushed against the celestials. Filled with anger, he tore out the eyes of Bhaga.

19. Excited with anger, he attacked Pushan with his foot. He tore out the teeth of that god as he sat employed in eating the large sacrificial ball (called Purodasha).

20. Trembling with fear, the celestials bent their heads to Shankara. Without being appeased, Rudra once more placed on his bowstring a sharp and blazing arrow.

21. Seeing his prowess, the celestials and the Rishis became all alarmed. Those foremost of gods began to pacify him.

22. Joining their hands in respect, they began to recite the Shata-Rudriya Mantras. Thus lauded by the celestials, at last Maheshwara became gratified.

23. The deities then assigned a large share to him. Trembling with fear, O king, they sought refuge with him.

24. When Rudra became pleased, the embodiment of sacrifice, which had been cut in twain, became once more united. Whatever limbs of his had been destroyed by the arrows of Mahadeva, became once more whole and sound.

25. The Asuras gifted with great energy had formerly three cities in the firmament. One of these had been made of iron; one of silver, and the third of gold.

26. With all his weapons, Maghavat the chief of the celestials, was unable to form of his which is mild and auspicious, is said to be engaged in the practice of the vow of celibacy.

5 That other form of his which is highly terrible performs all the destructive operations in the universe Because he is great and the Supreme Lord of all (Ishwara), therefore he is called Maheshwara

7. And because he burns and oppresses, is keen and fierce, and gifted with great energy, and is engaged in eating flesh and blood and marrow, that he is called Rudra.

8. Because he is the foremost of all the celestials, and because his dominion and acquisitions are very extensive, and because he protects the vast universe, therefore the is called Mahadeva

9—10 Because he is of the form or color of smoke, therefore he is called Dhurjjati Because by all his deeds he performs sacrifices for all and seeks the well being of every creature, therefore he is called Shiva or the auspicious one Living in the sky, he burns the lives of all creatures and is besides, fixed in a particular path from which he does not deviate

11. His emblem, again is fixed and immovable for all time He is, for these reasons, called Sthanu He is also of multiform aspect He is present, past, and future.

12 He is mobile and immobile For this he is called Vahurupa The celestials called Vishwedevas live in his body He is, for this, called Vishwarupa having an universal form.

13. He has a thousand eyes; or, he has numberless eyes; or, he has eyes on all sides and on every part of his body. His energy comes out through his eyes. There is no end of his eyes

14 Because he always nourishes all creatures and sports also with them, and because he is their lord or master, therefore is he called Pashupati (the lord of all creatures.

15 Because his emblem always observes the vow of Brahmacharyya, all the worlds, therefore, adore it This act of worship is said to please him highly.

16 If there is one who adores him by creating his image, and another who adores his emblem, the latter it is who wins great prosperity for ever.

17. The Rishis, the celestials, the Gandharvas, and the Apsaras, adore that emblem of his which is ever erect and upraised.

18 If his emblem is adored, Maheshwara becomes highly pleased with the adorer. Affectionate towards his devotees, he confers happiness upon them with a cheerful soul.

19 This great god loves to live in crematoria and there he burns and consumes all dead bodies. Those persons who celebrate sacrifices on such grounds attain at the end to the regions of heroes.

20 Engaged in his proper duty, he it is who is considered as the Death who lives in the bodies of all creatures He is, again, those vital airs called Prana and Apana, in the bodies of all embodied creatures.

21. He has many burning and terrible forms. All those forms are adored in the world and are known to Brahmanas gifted with knowledge.

22 Amongst the gods he has many significant names. Indeed, the meanings of those names are derived from either his greatness or vastness, or his feats, or his conduct.

23. The Brahmanas always recite the excellent Shata Rudriya in his honor, that is in the Vedas as also that which has been composed by Vyasa.

24 Indeed the Brahmanas and Rishis call him the eldest of all beings.

25 He is the first of all the celestials, and it was from his mouth that he created Agni. That great deity, ever willing to grant protection to all, never forsakes his supplicants

26—27 He would much rather give up his own life and suffer all possible afflictions himself Long life, health and freedom from disease, affluence, wealth, various kinds of pleasures and enjoyments, are conferred by him, and it is he also who snatches them away The lordship and affluence that one sees in Shakra and the other celestials are, indeed, his.

28 It is he who is always engaged in all that is good and evil in the three worlds. On account of his fullest control over all objects of enjoyment he is called Ishwara.

29 Because he is the master of the vast universe, therefore he is called Maheshwara. The whole universe is prevaded by him in various forms His mouth roars and burns the waters of the sea in the form of the huge mare's head.

Bhishma said :—

19 Virtue is sometimes seen to be destroyed by a wicked man of great power. If you think, O king, that virtue should really be of three sorts, I answer that your conclusion is supported by reason.

20. The truth is that virtue is one and indivisible, although it is capable of being seen from three different points.

21. The paths, of those three, which form the foundation of virtue have each been laid down. Do you act according to the instructions laid down. You should never wrangle about virtue and then seek to have those doubts of yours removed.

22. O chief of the Bharatas, let no doubts like these ever take possession of your mind Do you obey unhesitatingly what I say. Follow me like a blind man or like one who, having no sense himself, has to depend upon that of another.

23. Abstention from injury, truth, absence of anger (or forgiveness), and liberality or gifts,—these four, O king do you practise, for these four form eternal virtue.

24. Do you also, O mighty-armed prince, follow that conduct towards the Brahmanas which is consistent with what has been observed towards them by your father and grandfather. These are the principal marks of virtue.

25. That foolish wight, who would destroy the weight of authority by denying that to be a standard which has always been accepted as such, would himself fail to become an authority among men Such a man becomes the cause of much sorrow in the world.

26 Do you respect the Brahmanas and treat them with hospitality. Do you always serve them in this way. The universe rests on them. Do you understand them to be such.

Yudhishthira said —

27. Tell me, O grand father, what the respective ends are of those who hate virtue and of those who worship and observe it.

Bhishma said —

28. Those men who hate virtue are said to have their hearts possessed by the qualities of passion and darkness. Such men have always to go to Hell

29 Those men, on the other hand, O king who always observe virtue those men who are given to truth and sincerity, are called good They always enjoy the pleasures or happiness of the celestial regions

30. On account of their waiting upon their preceptors with respect their hearts always turn towards virtue Indeed they who worship virtue, attain to the region of the celestials.

31. Those individuals whether men or celestials, who are shorn of cupidity and malice and who emaciate or afflict their bodies by the practic of austerities succeed, on account of the virtue which they thus acquire, to attain to great happiness

32 The righteous always adore them with love and affection as a hungry man's stomach longs for ripe and sweet fruits

Yudhishthira said :—

33 What are the marks of the wicked, and what are those deeds which the good do? Explain to me this, O holy one. Indeed, tell me what characteristics are of the good and the wicked.

Bhishma said :—

34. The wicked are evil in their practices, incapable of being governed by rules, and evil tongued The good are however, always good in their deeds Indeed the acts these men do are considered as the characteristics of good deeds

35 The good or the righteous, O king, never answer the two calls of nature on the public road or in the midst of a cowpen, or on a field of paddy.

36 After feeding the five they take their own food They never talk while eating, and never go to sleep with wet hands.

37 Whenever they see any of the following, they go round them for showing them respect viz, a burning fire, a bull, the image of a deity, a cowpen, a crossing place of four roads, and an old and virtuous Brahmana.

38 Themselves standing aside they give the way to those that are old, those that are afflicted with burdens, ladies, those that hold high appointments in the village or town administration, Brahmanas, kine, and kings.

39 The righteous or good man is he who protects his guests, servants and other dependants, his own relatives and all those who seek his protection. Such a man always welcomes these with the usual polite enquiries.

40 As ordained by the deities human beings should take their food twice a day, viz, morning and evening During the interval one should not eat anything By following this rule about eating, one is said to observe a fast.

41 As the sacred fire waits for libations to be poured upon it when the hour for Homa arrives, so a woman, when her period is over, expects sexual union with her husband

42 One, who never knows his wife at any other time except after the period of menses, is said to observe the vow of Brahmacharya. Amrita (nectar), Brahmanas, and kine,—these three are considered as equal.

43 Hence, one should always adore, with due rites, Brahmanas and kine One does not commit any fault or stain by eating the meat of animals killed in sacrifices with the help of Mantras from the Yajur Veda.

44. The flesh of the back bone, or that of animals not killed in sacrifices should be avoided even as one avoids the flesh of his own son One should never cause his guest to go without food whether he lives in his own country or in a foreign land.

45 After completing his study one should give the due present to his preceptor. When one sees his preceptor, he should receive him with respect and adoring him present him a seat

46 By adoring his preceptor, one increases the period of his life as also his fame and prosperity One should never censure the old, nor send them on any business

47—49 One should never be seated when any one that is old is standing By acting thus one protects the duration of his life One should never cast his eyes on a naked woman, nor a naked man One should never indulge in sexual congress except in privacy, One should eat also without being seen by others Preceptors are the foremost of shrines, the heart is the foremost of all sacred objects, knowledge is the foremost of all objects of search, and contentment is the foremost of all happiness Morning and evening one should listen to the grave counsels of the aged.

50 One acquires wisdom by constantly waiting upon the aged While reading the Vedas or employed in eating, one should use his right hand

51—52 One should always keep his speech and mind under perfect control, as also his senses With well cooked frumenty, Yavaka Krishara, and Havi (clarified butter), one should adore the departed manes and the celestials in the Shraddha called Ashtaka The same should be used in adoring the Planets One should not undergo a shave without calling down a blessing upon himself If one sneezes, one should be blessed by those present All, who are ill or suffer from diseases, should be blessed. The extension of their lives should be prayed for.

53 One should never address an eminent person familiarly. Under even the greatest difficulties one should never do this. To thou such a person and to kill him are equal Learned persons are degraded by such a manner of address.

54 Such a word can be used to those who are inferior, or equal, or to disciples. A sinful man always speaks of the sins he has committed.

55. Those men, who have deliberately committed sins, meet with destruction by trying to conceal them from the good. Indeed, the confirmed sinners try to conceal their sinful deeds from others.

56 Such persons think that their sins are seen neither by men nor the celestials. The sinful man, laden with his sins, takes birth in a miserable order of being

57 The sins of such a man continually grow, even as the interest charged by an usurer daily multiplies itself. If having committed a sin, one seeks to have it covered by virtue, that sin becomes destroyed and leads to virtue instead of to other sins

58 If a quantity of water be poured upon salt, the latter is immediately dissolved So when expiation is performed, sin is dissipated

59. For these reasons one should never conceal a sin Concealed it is sure to increase Having committed a sin, one should confess it before the good They would then destroy it forthwith.

60 If one does not enjoy in good time what he has stored with hope, the result is that the stored wealth passes into another man's hands after the death of him who has stored it

61. The wise have said that the mind of every creature is the true test of virtue Hence, all creatures in this world have an innate tendency to achieve virtue.

62 One should achieve virtue alone or single handed. Indeed, one should not proclaim himself virtuous and walk with the standard of virtue upraised for purposes of show They are said to be traders in virtue who practice it for enjoying its fruits

63 One should worship the celestials without giving way to sentiments of pride. Similarly, one should serve his preceptor without deceit One should make arrangements for securing to himself invaluable riches in the next world which consists in gifts made here to worthy persons.

CHAPTER CLXIII.

(ANUSHASANIKA PARVA).—Continued.

Yudhishthira said —

1. It is seen that if a person happens to be unfortunate, he fails to acquire riches how greatsoever his strength. On the other hand, if he happens to be fortunate, he amasses riches, even if he be a weak or a foolish wight.

2. When, again, the time does not come for acquisition, one cannot make an acquisition, even if he tries his best. When, however, the time comes for acquisition, one acquires great wealth without any exertion

3. Hundreds of men may be seen who gain no result even when they try their best Many persons, again, are seen to make acquisitions without any exertion

4 If riches were the result of exertion, then one could, with exertion, acquire it forthwith Indeed if the case were so, no learned man could then be seen to take the protection for the sake of his livelihood, of one destitute of learning

5 Among men, that which is not to be attained, O chief of the Bharatas, is never attained Men are seen to fail in gaining results even if they try their best

6 One may be seen to seek riches by hundreds of means (and yet failing to acquire it), while another, without at all seeking it, gets it. Men may be seen doing evil deeds continually (for wealth) and yet they do not gain it.

7. Others get wealth without doing any evil act whatever. Others, again, who follow the duties assigned to them by the scripture, are without wealth One may be seen to be without any knowledge of the science of ethics and polity even after he has studied all the treatises on that science.

8. One, again, may be seen appointed as the prime minister of a king without having at all studied the moral and political sciences A learned man may be seen who has wealth An ignorant man may be seen having wealth • Both kinds of men, again, may be seen who has wealth.

9 If by the acquisition of learning one could acquire the happiness of riches then no man of learning could be found living, for the very means of his livelihood, under the protection of one shorn of learning

10 Indeed, if one could obtain, by the acquisition of learning, all desirable objects like a thirsty individual having his thirst satisfied upon getting water, then none in this world would have shown idleness in acquiring learning.

11. If one's time has not come, one does not die even if cut with hundreds of shafts On the other hand, one dies if his hour has come, even if it be a blade of grass with which he is struck.

Bhishma said —

12 If one, by performing arduous works, fails to acquire wealth, he should then practise severe austerities Unless seeds be sown, no crops appear.

13 It is by making gifts that one gets numerous objects of enjoyment, one becomes endued with intelligence and wisdom by waiting upon the elders The wise have said that one becomes long lived by practising the duty of abstention from cruelty to all creatures.

14 Hence, one should make gifts and not speak lies and one should adore individuals. Indeed one should be sweet speeched towards all and always do what is agreeable to others One should seek to attain to purity, one should always abstain from doing injury to any creature

15 It is but proper, O Yudhishthira, that you should be possessed by peaceful sentiments, since their deeds and Nature are the ruling causes of happiness and misery to even insects and ants.

CHAPTER CLXIV.

Bhishma said —

1. If one does good deeds or causes others to do them, he should then expect to attain to the merits of virtue, likewise if one does evil deeds and causes others to do them, he should never expect to attain to the merits of virtue.

2 At all times, it is Time, which entering the understanding of all creatures, sets them to deeds of virtue or sin and then confers happiness or misery upon them.

3 When a person, seeing the fruits of virtue understands virtue to be superior, it is then that he inclines towards virtue and puts faith in it One, however, whose understanding is not firm, cannot place faith in it

4. As regards faith in virtue, it is this To place faith in virtue is the mark of the wisdom of all persons One, who is acquainted with what should be done and what should not be done, with a view to opportuneness should, with care and devotion, do what is right.

5 Those virtuous men, who have in this life been blessed with riches acting of their own accord, take particular care of their souls so that they may not, in their next lives, have to take birth as persons with the quality of darkness predominating in them.

6. Time can never make the cause of misery One should therefore know that the soul which is virtuous is certainly pure

7. As regards sin, it may be said that, even when it is very great it is incapable of even touching virtue which is always protected by time and which shines like a burning fire

8 These are the two results achieved by virtue, viz. the purity of the soul and unsusceptibility of being touched by iniquity Indeed virtue is fraught with victory Its effulgence is so great that it lights up the three worlds

9 A wise man cannot catch hold of a sinful person and forcibly make him pious When seriously urged to act piously, the sinful only act with hypocrisy, moved by fear

10 Even the righteous among the Shudras never betake themselves to such hypocrisy under the pretext that persons of the Shudra order are not permitted to live according to any of the four prescribed modes.

11. I shall tell you particularly what the duties truly are of the four castes. So far as their bodies are concerned, the individuals belonging to all the four castes have five primal elements for their constituent ingredients; they are all of the same substance in this matter.

12 For all that, their practices relating to life or the world and the duties of virtue, vary despite these distinctions and sufficient liberty of action is left to them by which all individuals may attain to an equality of condition.

13 The regions of happiness which represent the results or rewards of virtue are not eternal, for they are destined to come to an end. Virtue, however, is eternal When the cause is eternal, why is the effect not so? The answer to this is as follows. Only that virtue is eternal which is not prompted by the desire of fruit or reward.

14 All men are equal as regards their physical organism All of them, again, have souls which are equal in nature. When dissolution comes, all else dissolves away What remains is the desire for acquiring virtue. That, indeed, re-appears (in next life) of itself

15 When such is the result the inequality of condition, seen among human beings, cannot be considered in any way anomalous So also it is seen that those creatures that belong to the intermediate orders of existence are equally subject, about their acts, to the influence of example.

CHAPTER CLXV.

(ANUSHASANIKA PARVA)—

Vaishampayana said:—

1 Desirous of acquiring the merit which destroys sins that perpetuator of Kuru's race, viz. Yudhishthira the son of Pandu, questioned Bhishma who was lying on a bed of arrows saying.

Yudhishthira said:—

2 What indeed is beneficial for a person in this world? What is that by doing which one may acquire happiness? By what may one be purged of all his sins? Indeed what is that which destroys sins?

Vaishampanana said:—

3 On this subject, the royal son of Shantanu O foremost of men, duly recited the names of the celestials to Yudhishthira who was desirous of hearing.

Bhishma said:—

4 O son, the following names of the celestials with those of the Rishis, if duly recited morning, noon, and evening, destroy all sins.

5—6 Acting with the help of his senses, whatever sins one may commit by day or by night or by the two twilights, willingly or unwillingly, one is sure to be cleansed therefrom and become thoroughly pure by reciting these names. One, that takes those names has never to become blind or deaf; indeed, by taking those names, one always succeeds in getting what is beneficial.

7 Such a man never takes birth in the intermediate order of being, never goes to hell and never becomes a human being of any of the mixed castes. He has never to fear any calamity When death comes, he never becomes stupefied.

8. The master of all the celestials and Apsaras, resplendent with effulgence, adored of all creatures, inconceivable, indescribable, the life of all living beings, and unborn is the Grandfather Brahman, that Lord of the universe. His chaste wife is Savitri. Then comes that origin of the Vedas, the creator Vishnu, otherwise called Narayana of immeasurable power.

10—34. Then comes the three-eyed Lord of Uma, then Scanda the commander in-chief of the celestial army, then Vishakha, then Agni the eater of sacrificial libations, then Vayu the god of wind, then Chandramas; then the sun god, gifted with effulgence, then the illustrious Shakra the husband of Sachi, and Yama with his wife Dhumorna; and Varuna with Gauri; Kuvera the lord of riches with his wife Riddhi; the amiable and illustrious cow Surabhi; the great Rishi Vishravas, Sankalpa, Ocean, Ganga; the other sacred Rivers, the Maruts, the Valakhilyas crowned with success of penances; the island-born Krishna, Narada, Parvata, Vishwavasu, the Hahas; the Hahas, Tumvuru, Chitrasena; the celestial messenger; the highly-blessed celestial maidens; the celestial Apsaras, Urvashi, Menaka, Rambha, Mishrakeshi, Alambusha, Vishwachi, Ghritachi, Panchachada, Tilottama, the Adityas, the Vasus, the Ashwins, the Pitris; Dharma, (Righteousness), Vedic learning, Penances, Diksha, Perseverance (in religious acts) the Grandfather, Day and Night, Kashyapa, the son of Marichi Shukra, Vrihaspati, Mangala the son of Earth, Budha, Rahu, Shanaishchara the Constellations, the Seasons, the Months, the Fortnights, the Year, Garuda the son of Vinata, the several Oceans, the sons of Kadru, viz, the Snakes, Shatarudra, Vipasha, Chandrabhaga, Saraswati Sindhu Devika, Prabhasa, the lakes of Pushkara, Ganga, Mahanadi, Vena, Kaveri, Narmada, Kulampuna, Vishalya, Karatoya, Amvuvahini, Sarayu, Gandaki, the great river Lohita, Tamra, Arunu, Vetravati, Parnasa, Gautami, Godavari, Vena, Krishnavena, Dwija, Drishadvati, Kaveri, Vankhu, Mandakini, Prayaga, Prabhasa, the sacred Naimisha, the spot sacred to Vishweswara or Mahadeva, viz, Kashi that lake of crystal water, Kurukshetra, full of many sacred waters, the foremost of oceans (viz, the ocean of milk), Penances, Gifts, Jamvumarga, Hiranwati, Vitasta, the river Plakshavati, Vedasmriti, Vedamati, Malava, Ashwavati, all sacred spots on Earth, Gangadwara, the sacred Rishikulya, the river Chitravaha, the Charmanwati, the sacred river Kaushiki, the Yamuna, the river Bhimarathi, the great river Vahuda, Mahendravani, Tridiva, Nilika, Saraswati, Nanda the other Nanda, the large sacred lake Gaya, Phalgutirtha, Dharmaranya (the sacred forest) inhabited by the celestials, the sacred celestial river, the lake created by the Grandfather Brahman, which is sacred and celebrated over the three worlds and auspicious and capable of purifying all sins, the Himavat mountain having excellent herbs, the Vindhya mountain variegated with various kinds of metals, containing many tirthas and ever-crown with medicinal herbs, Meru, Mahendra, Malaya, Shweta gifted with silver, Shringavat, Mandara, Nila, Nishadha, Dardura, Chitrakuta, Anjanabha, the Gandhamadana mountains, the sacred Somagiri, the various other mountains, the cardinal points of the compass, the subsidiary points, the Earth, all the trees, the Vishvedevas, the Firmament, the Constellations, the Planets, and the Deities,—let these all, named and unnamed, rescue and purify us

35 The man, who takes the names of these, becomes purged of all his sins By singing their praises and pleasing them, one becomes freed from every fear.

36 Indeed, the man, who delights in singing the hymns in laudation of the deities, becomes purged of all such sins as lead to birth in impure orders.

37—38. After this recital of the deities, I shall name those learned Brahmanas crowned with ascetic merit and success and capable of purifying one of every sin. They are Yavakrita and Raibhya and Kalshivat and Aushija, and Bhrigu and Angiras and Kanwa and the powerful Medhatithi, and Varhi endued with every accomplishment. These all belong to the Eastern region.

39—40 Others, viz, Unmuchu, Pramuchu, Mumuchu, all highly blessed the highly energetic Swastyatreya, the highly powerful Agastya, the son of Mitra and Varuna, Dridhayu and Urdhavahu these two foremost and celebrated of Rishis,—these live in the Southern quarter.

41—43 —Listen now to me as I name those Rishis who live in the Western quarter. They are Ushangu with his uterine brothers, greatly energetic, Dirghatamas, Gautama, Kashyapa, Ekata, Dwita, Trita, the righteous souled son of Atri (viz, Durvasas), and the powerful Saraswat. Listen now to me as I name those Rishis who adore the celestial in sacrifices, living in the Northern region.

44—47 They are Atri, Vasishtha, Shaktri, Parasara's son Vyasa of great energy, Vishwamitra, Bharadwaja, Jamadagni, the son of Richika, Rama, Auddalaka, Shwetaketu Kohala, Vipula, Devala Devasharman, Dhaumya, Hastikashyapa, Lomasha, Nachiketa, Lomaharshana Ugrashravas, and Bhrigu's son Chyavana. Thus is the number of Rishis gifted with Vedic learning.

48. They are primeval Rishis, O king, whose names, if taken, are capable of purifying one of every sin. After this I shall recite the names of the principal kings.

49—58 They are Nriga, Yayati, Nahusha, Yadu, highly energetic Puru, Sagara, Dhundhumara, Dilipa of great prowess, Krisashwa, Yauvanashwa, Chitrashwa, Satyavat, Dushmanta, Bharata who became an illustrious Emperor over many kings, Dasharatha, the heroic Rama, that destroyer of Rakshas, Shashavindu Bhagiratha, Harishchandra, Marutta, Dridharatha, the highly fortunate Alarka, Aila, Karandhama, that foremost of men, Kashmira, Daksha Amvarisha Kukura, highly illustrious Raivata, Kuru, Samvarana, Mandhatri of unmitigated prowess, the royal sage Muchukunda, Jahnu who was much favoured by Janhavi (Ganga), the first (in point of time) of all kings, viz., Prithu the son of Vena, Mitrabhanu, Priyankara, Trasadasyu, Shweta that foremost of royal sages, the celebrated Mahabhisha, Nimi Ashtaka, Ayu, the royal sage Kshupa, Kakshevat, Pratarddana, Divodasa, Sudasa, Koshaleshwara, Aila, Nala, the royal sage Manu, that lord of all creatures, Havirdhira, Prishadhra, Pratipa, Shantanu, Aja, the senior Varhi, Ikshaku of great fame, Anaranya, Janujangha the royal sage Kakshasena, and many others not named (in history).

59 That man, who rising early in the morning, takes the names of these kings at the two twilights, viz., at sunset and sunrise, with a pure body and mind and without distracted attention, wins great religious merit.

60. One should sing the praises of the celestials, the celestial Rishis, and the royal sages and say,—These lord of the creation will ordain my growth, longevity and fame.

61. Let no calamity visit me, let no sin defile me, and let there be no opponents or enemies of mine. Forsooth, I will always have victory and an auspicious end hereafter.

CHAPTER CLXVI.

Janamejaya said:—

1—2 When that foremost person among the Kauravas, viz., Bhishma, was lying on a bed of arrows—a bed that is always coveted by heroes—and when the Pandavas were sitting around him, my great-grandfather Yudhishthira of much wisdom, heard these expositions of mysteries about the subject of duty and had all his doubts removed.

3. He heard also what the ordinances are about gifts, and thus had all his doubts removed about the topics of virtue and wealth. You should, O learned Brahmana, tell me now what else did the great Pandava king do.

Vaishampayana said:—

4 When Bhishma became silent, the entire body of kings became perfectly silent. Indeed, they all sat motionless there, like figures painted on canvass.

5—6 Then Vyasa the son of Satyavati, having thought for a moment, addressed the royal son of Ganga, saying,—O king, the Kuru king Yudhishthira has been restored to his own nature, with all his brothers and followers.

7 With highly intelligent Krishna by his side he bends his head in respect to you. You should give him leave for returning to the city.

8. Thus addressed by the holy Vyasa, the royal son of Shantanu and Ganga dismissed Yudhishthira and his counsellors

9 Addressing his grandson in a sweet voice, the royal son of Shantanu, also said,—Do you return to your city, O king. Let the fever of your heart be removed.

10 Do you adore the celestials in various sacrifices distinguished by large gifts of food and riches like Yayati himself, O foremost of kings, gifted with devotion and self-control.

11. Devoted to the practices of the Kshatriya do you, O son of Pritha, please the departed manes and the celestials. You shall then acquire great benefits. Indeed let the fever of your heart be removed.

12. Do you please all your subjects. Do you assure them and establish peace among all. Do you also honor all your well-wishers with such rewards as they deserve.

13. Let all your friends and well wishers live, depending on you for their means, as birds live, depending for their means upon a full grown tree laden with fruits and standing on a sacred spot.

14 When the hour comes for departure from this world, do you come here, O king I shall relinquish my body when the Sun, stopping in his southward course, will begin to return northwards.

15 The son of Kunti answered,—'So be it!" and saluted his grandfather with respect and then started with all his relatives and followers, for the city of Hastinapur.

16—17. Headed by Dhritarashtra and also Gandhari who was greatly devoted to her husband and accompanied by the Rishis and Keshava as also by the citizens and the inhabitants of the country and by his counsellors, O monarch, that foremost one of Kuru's race, entered the city of Hastinapur.

CHAPTER CLXVII.

(ANUSHASANIKA PARVA)—Continued.

Vaishampayana said:

1. Then having duly honored the citizens and the inhabitants of the province, the royal son of Kunti dismissed them to their respective homes.

2. The Pandava king then consoled those women, who had lost their heroic husbands and sons in the battle, with profuse gifts of wealth

3 Having recovered his kingdom, Yudhishthira caused himself to be duly installed on the throne That foremost of men then assured all his subjects by various deeds of good will

4 That foremost of righteous men set himself to acquire the substantial blessings of the Brahmanas of the foremost military officers, and the leading citizens.

5 Having passed fifty nights in the capital, the blessed monarch recollected the time indicated by his grandfather as the hour of his departure from this world.

6 Accompanied by a number of priests he then left the city of Hastinapur having seen that the sun, ceasing to go southwards had begun to proceed in his northward course.

7—8 Yudhishthira, the son of Kunti took with him a large quantity of clarified butter and floral garlands and scents and silken cloths and excellent sandal wood and Aquilaria Agallocha and dark aloe wood, for cremating the body of Bhishma. Various kinds of rich garlands and gems also were among those stores.

9—11. Placing Dhritarashtra at the head and queen Gandhari celebrated for her virtues and his own mother Kunti and all his brothers also the highly intelligent Yudhishthira, accompanied by Krishna and wise Vidura, as also by Yuyutsu and Yuyudhana, and by his other relatives and followers forming a large train, proceeded, his praises sung the while by eulogists and bards The sacrificial fires of Bhishma were also borne in the procession.

12. Thus accompanied, the king started from his city like a second king of the celestials Soon he came upon the spot where the son of Shantanu was still lying on his bed of arrows.

13—16 He saw his grandfather waited upon with reverence by Parashara's intelligent, son Vyasa, by Narada, O royal sage, by Devala and Asita, and also by the surviving unslain kings assembled from various parts of the country Indeed the king saw that his great grandfather, as he lay on his heroic bed, was guarded on all sides by the warriors appointed for that duty. Getting down from his car, king Yudhishthira, with his brothers, saluted his grandfather, that chastiser of all enemies They also saluted the Rishis with the Island-born Vyasa at their head They were saluted in return by them.

17. Accompanied by his priests each of whom resembled the grandfather Brahman himself, as also by his brothers, Yudhishthira, of undecaying glory, then approached that spot whereon Bhishma lay on his bed of arrows surrounded by those reverend Rishis.

18—19. Then king Yudhishthira the just with all his brothers, addressed that foremost one of Kuru's race, the son of the River Ganga, as he lay on that bed of his saying,—I am Yudhishthira, O king. Salutations to thee, O son of the River Jahnavi If thou hearest me still, O, tell me what I am to do for thee.

20—21. Carrying with me thy sacrificial fires, I have come here, O king and wait upon thee at the hour appointed Preceptors of all branches of learning, Brahmanas, Ritwijas all my brothers, thy son the king Dhritarashtra of great energy, are all here with my counsellors as also Vasudeva of great prowess.

22 The remnant of unslain warriors, and all the denizens of Kurujangala, are also here Opening thy eyes, O chief of Kuru's race, do thou see them.

23. Whatever should be done on this occasion have all been arranged and provided for by me Indeed, at this hour which thou hadst spoken of, all things have been kept in readiness

Vaishampayana said :—

24 Thus addressed by the highly intelligent Kunti's son the son of Ganga opened his eyes and all the Bharatas assembled there and stood around him.

25. The mighty Bhishma then, taking the strong hand of Yudhishthira addressed him, in a voice deep as that of the clouds.

26 By good luck, O son of Kunti, you have come here with all your counsellors, O Yudhishthira. The thousand rayed maker of day, the holy Sun, has begun his northward course

27 I have been lying on my bed here for fifty eight nights. Stretched on these sharp pointed arrows, I have felt this period to be as long as if it was a century.

28 O Yudhisthira, the lunar month of Magha has come This is again, the lighted fortnight and a fourth part of it ought by this (according to my calculations) be over.

29 Having said so to Yudhishthira the son of Dharma Ganga's son Bhishma then saluted Dhritarashtra and said to him as follows.

Bhishma said :—

30 O king, you know well the duties All your doubts, again, relating to the science of wealth have been well solved You have served many learned Brahmanas

31. You know the subtile sciences connected with the Vedas, all the duties of religion, O king, and the whole of the four Vedas.

32 You should not grieve therefore, O son of Kuru That which was pre-ordained has come to pass. It could not be otherwise You have have heard the mysteries relating to the deities from the lips of the Island born Rishi himself.

33 Yudhisthira and his brothers are morally as much your sons as are the sons of Pandu Following the duties of religion, cherish and protect them. In their turn, they are always devoted to the service of their elders.

34. King Yudhishthira, the just, is pure souled He will always be obedient to you I know that he is given to the virtue of mercy or abstention from injury. He is devoted to his elders and preceptors.

35 Your sons were all wicked souled. They were full of anger and cupidity. Overwhelmed by envy they were all of wicked conduct You should not grieve for them.

Vaishampayana said :—

36 Having said this much to Dhritarashtra of great wisdom, the Kuru chief then addressed Vasudeva of great arms.

Bhishma said :—

37. O holy one, O god of all gods, O thou adored by all the deities and Asuras, O thou who didst cover the three worlds with three steps of thine I bow unto thee, O wielder of the conch, the discus, and the mace.

38 Thou art Vasudeva, thou art of golden body, thou art the one Purusha (or active agent), thou art the creator (of the universe) thou art of huge proportions Thou art sentiency Thou art subtile Thou art the Supreme and Eternal Soul

39 Do thou O lotus eyed one, save me, O foremost of all beings.

40 Do thou give me permission, O Krishna, to depart from this world, O thou who art supreme happiness, O foremost of all beings Thou shouldst always protect the sons of Pandu Thou art, indeed, already their sole refuge.

41 Formerly, I spoke to the foolish Duryodhana of wicked understanding that there is Virtue where Krishna is, and that there is victory where Virtue is.

42 I further advised him that depending on Vasudeva as his refuge, he should make peace with the Pandavas Indeed, I repeatedly told him —' This is the fittest time for you to make peace'

43 The foolish and wicked Duryodhana however did not do what I said Having caused a great havoc on Earth, at last, he himself gave up his life

44 I know thee O illustrious one, to be that ancient and best of Rishis who lived for many years in the company of Nara, in hermitage of Vadari

45 The celestial Rishi Narada told me this as also Vyasa of austere penances. Even they have said to me that Thyself and Arjuna are the old Rishis Narayana and Nara born among men.

46 Do thou, O Krishna, grant me leave. I shall renounce my body. Permitted by thee, I shall attain to the highest end.

Vasudeva said:—

47. I give you leave, O Bhishma, O king, to attain to the status of the Vasus O you of great splendour, you have not been guilty of a single sin, in this world.

48 O royal sage, you are devoted to your father. You are, therefore, like a second Markandeya. It is, therefore, that death depends upon your pleasure like a slave.

Vaishampayana said:—

49 Having said these words, the son of Ganga once more addressed the Pandavas headed by Dhritarashtra, and other friends and well-wishers of his.

50. I wish to renounce my life. You should give me leave. You should strive for attaining to truth. Truth forms the highest power.

51. You should always live with Brahmanas of righteous conduct, devoted to penances, ever abstaining from cruel conduct, and who have their souls under restraint.

52. Having said these words to his friends and embraced them all, the intelligent Bhishma once more addressed Yudhishthira, saying,—"O king, worship all Brahmanas, especially those who are gifted with wisdom, them who are preceptors, those who are priests capable of assisting at sacrifices.

CHAPTER CLXVIII.

(ANUSHASANIKA PARVA).—Continued.

Vaishampayana said:—

1. Having said so to all the Kurus, Bhishma, the son of Shantanu, remained silent for some time, O chastiser of enemies.

2 He then held forth his life breaths successively in those parts of his body which are indicated in Yoga. The vital airs of that great one, restrained duly, then rose up.

3 Those parts of the body of Shantanu's son, on account of the adoption of Yoga from which the vital airs went up, became sexless one after another.

4 In the midst of those great persons, including those great Rishis headed by Vyasa, the sight seemed to be a strange one, O king.

5. Within a short time, the entire body of Bhishma became arrowless and soreless. Seeing it, all those great personages, headed by Vasudeva, and all the ascetics with Vyasa, became filled with wonder.

6 The vital airs, restrained and unable to escape through any of the outlets, at last passed through the crown of the head and proceeded upwards to Heaven.

7. The celestial kettle-drums began to play and floral showers were rained down. The Siddhas and regenerate Rishis, filled with delight, exclaimed,—Excellent, Excellent.

8. The vital airs of Bhishma, piercing through the crown of his head, shot up through the sky like a large meteor and soon became invisible.

9 O great king, thus did Shantanu's son, that pillar of Bharata's race, unite himself with eternity.

10. Then the great Pandavas and Vidura, taking a large quantity of wood and various kinds of fragrant scents, made a funeral pyre.

11—12. Yuyutsu and others stood as spectators of the preparations. Then Yudhishthira and the great Vidura wrapped Bhishma' body with silken cloth and floral garlands Yuyutsu held an excellent umbrella over it.

13. Bhimasena and Arjuna both held in their hands a couple of pure white yak-tails. The two sons of Madri held two head-gears in their hands.

14. Yudhishthira and Dhritarashtra stood at the feet of the body, taking up palmyra fans, the wives of the lord of the Kurus stood around the body and began to fan it softly. The Pitri sacrifice of the great Bhishma was then duly performed. Many libations were poured upon the sacred fire. The singers of Samans sang many Samans.

16—17. Then covering the body of Ganga's son with sandal wood and black aloe and the dark wood and other fragrant fuel, and setting fire to the same, the Kurus, with Dhritarashtra and others, stood on the right side of the funeral pyre.

18. Having thus cremated the body of the son of Ganga those foremost ones of Kuru's race proceeded to the sacred Bhagirathi, accompanied by the Rishis.

19. They were followed by Vyasa, Narada, Asita, Krishna, by the ladies of the Bharata family, as also by such of the citizens of Hastinapore as had come to the place.

20. All of them, arrived at the sacred river, duly offered oblations of water to the great son of Ganga.

21. After those oblations of water had been offered by them to her son the goddess Bhagirathi, rose up from the river, weeping and distracted by sorrow.

22. In the midst of her lamentations, she addressed the Kurus, saying,—Ye sinless ones, listen to me as I say to you all that took place.

23 Gifted with royal conduct and disposition, and endued with wisdom and high birth, my son was the benefactor of all the elders of his family. He was devoted to his father and was of high vows.

24. He could not be defeated by even Rama of Jamadagni's race with his highly powerful celestial weapons; alas, that hero has been killed by Shikhandin.

25 Ye kings, forsooth, my heart is made of adamant, for it does not break even at the disappearance of that son from my view.

26. At the Swayamvara at Kashi, he defeated on a single car the assembled Kshatriyas and carried away the three princesses.

27. There was no one on Earth who equalled him in power; alas, my heart does not break upon hearing the slaughter of that son of mine by Shikhandin.

28—30. Hearing the goddess of the great river thus bewail the powerful Krishna consoled her with many soothing words. Krishna said,—"O amiable one, be comforted. Do not give way to sorrow, O you of beautiful features Forsooth, your son has gone to the highest region of happiness.

31 He was one of the Vasus of great energy. Through a curse, O you of beautiful features he had to take birth among men. You should not grieve for him.

32. According to Kshatriya duties, he was killed by Dhananjaya on the field of battle while engaged in battle. He has not been killed, O goddess, by Shikhandin.

33 The very king of the celestials himself could not kill Bhishma in battle when he stood with stretched bow in hand.

34 O you of beautiful face, your son has happily gone to Heaven All the gods assembled together could not kill him in battle.

35 Do not, therefore O goddess Ganga, grieve for that son of Kuru's race He was one of the Vasus, O goddess, your son has gone to Heaven. Let the fever of your heart be removed."

Vaishampayana said:—

36. Thus addressed by Krishna that foremost of all rivers cast off her grief, O great king, and became consoled.

37 O monarch, having honored that goddess duly all the kings there present, headed by Krishna, received her permission to go away from her banks.

ASHWAMEDHA PARVA.

CHAPTER I.

Having saluted Narayana and Nara the best of male beings as also the Goddess of Learning, let us cry success.

Vaishampayana said :—

1—2 After the king Dhritarashtra had offered libations of water, the mighty armed Yudhishthira, with his senses bewildered, keeping the former in his front, ascended the banks (of the river), his eyes filled with tears, and dropt down on the bank of the Ganga like an elephant pierced by the hunter.

3. Then, asked by Krishna, Bhima took him up sinking. This must not be so, said Krishna, the grinder of hostile armies.

4. The Pandavas, O king, beheld Yudhishthira, the son of Dharma troubled and lying on the ground, and also sighing again and again.

5. And seeing the king despondent and feeble, the Pandavas overladen with grief, sat down, surrounding him.

6 And gifted with high intelligence, and wise vision king Dhritarashtra greatly afflicted with grief for his sons, addressed the king, saying,— Rise up, O foremost of Kurus.

7 Do you now satisfy your duties. O Kunti's son, you have conquered this Earth like the Kshatriyas.

8 Do you now, O king enjoy her with your brothers and friends O foremost of the pious, I do not see why you should grieve O king, having lost a century of sons like wealth got in a dream, it is Gandhari and I, who should mourn.

9 Not having listened weighty words of the great Vidura, who sought our well being, I, of perverse senses, (now) repent

10 The virtuous Vidura gifted with divine insight, had told me —your family will be extinct for the sins of Duryodhana.

11—13. O king, if you wish for the well-being of your family, act up to my advice. Renounce this wicked king, Suyodhana, and let not either Karna or Shakuni by any means see him. Put down their gambling too, and anoint the pious king Yudhishthira. That one of controlled senses will righteously govern the Earth.

14—15 If you would not have king Yudhishthira, son of Kunti, then, O monarch, do you, celebrating a sacrifice, yourself take charge of the kingdom, and regarding all creatures impartially, O king, do you let your kinsmen, O you advancer of your kindred, subsist on your bounty.

16 When, O Kunti's son, the far-sighted Vidura said this, foolishly I followed the wicked Duryodhana.

17. Having paid no heed to the sweet words of that sedate one, I have obtained this powerful grief as a consequence, and have been plunged in an ocean of misery.

18. See your old father and mother, O king, plunged in misery But O master of men, I find no reason for your sorrow.

CHAPTER II.

(ASHWAMEDHIKA PARVA)—

Continued.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. Thus accosted by the intelligent king Dhritarashtra, Yudhisthira, gifted with understanding, became calm And then Keshava (Krishna) said to him.

2 If a person indulges excessively in sorrow for his departed manes he grieves them.

3 Do you (now) celebrate many a sacrifice with suitable presents to the priests; and do you please the celestials with Soma juice and the manes of your forefathers, with their due food and drink.

4 Do you also please your guests with meat and drink and the poor with gifts after their hearts A person of your high intelligence should not act thus

5 You know what ought to be known, you have performed what ought to be done, and you have heard the duties of the Kshatriyas, recited by Bhishma, the son of Bhagirathi by Krishna Dwaipayana, Narada and Vidura.

6 Therefore you should not act like a stupid, but following the course of your forefathers, sustain the burthen (of the Empire).

7 It is proper that a Kshatriya should attain the celestial region for certain by his (own) renown Of heroes, those who came to be killed never shall have to turn away.

8. Renounce your grief, O powerful king Indeed, what has taken place was destined to happen so You can in no way see those that have been killed in this war.

9 Having said this to Yudhishthira, prince of the pious, the high spirited Govinda stopped; and Yudhishthira answered him thus.

10 'O Govinda, I know full well your fondness for me You have ever favoured me with your love and friendship.

11 And, O holder of the mace and the discus, O scion of Yadu's race, O glorious one, if (now) do you gladly permit me to retire into the woods then you would do what is greatly desired by me.

12 After having killed my grandfather, and that foremost of men, Karna, who never fled from the field of battle, I find no peace.

13 Do you, O Janarddana, so ordain that I may be freed from this heinous sin and that my mind may be purified

14 As Pritha's son was speaking thus, the highly energetic Vyasa, knowing the truths of life, soothing him, spoke these excellent words.

15 My child, your mind is not yet calmed, and therefore you are again stupified by childish feelings And wherefore, O child do we over and over again third your words to the winds?

16 You know the duties of the Kshatriyas who live by warfare A king who has done his duty, should not allow himself to be overwhelmed by grief.

17. You have faithfully listened to the entire doctrine of salvation; and I have repeatedly removed your misgivings originating from desire.

18 But not paying due heed to what I have unfolded, you of perverse understanding have doubtless forgotten it clean. Be it not so. Such ignorance is not worthy of you.

19 O sinless one you are cognizant of all kinds of expiation; and you have also heard of the virtues of kings, as well as the merits of gifts.

20 Wherefore then, O Bharata, knowing every form of morality and versed in all the Agamas, are you overwhelmed (with grief) as if from ignorance.

CHAPTER III.

Vyasa said:—

1. O Yudhishthira, your wisdom, I conceive, is not sufficient. None does a work by his own power.

2 It is God who engages him in deeds, good or bad, O bestower of honor. What is the cause then for repentance?

3 You consider yourself as having perpetrated impious deeds Do you, therefore, O Bharata, listen to the way in which sins, may be removed.

4. O Yudhishthira, those who commit sins can always free themselves from them through penance, sacrifice and gifts.

5 O king, O foremost of men, sinful people are purified by sacrifice, austerities and charity.

6 The great celestials and Asuras celebrate sacrifices for acquiring religious merit; and therefore sacrifices are of great importance.

7 It is through sacrifices that the great celestials had grown so wondrously powerful, and having celebrated rites did they defeat the Danavas.

8. Do you, O Yudhishthira, prepare for the Rajasuya and the Horse-Sacrifice, as well as, O Bharata, for the Sarvamedha and the Naramedha.

9—10. And as Dasharatha's son, Rama, or as Dushmanta's and Shakuntala's son your ancestor, the lord of the Earth the exceedingly powerful king Bharata had done, do you according to the ordinance celebrate the Horse-Sacrifice with presents

11 Yudhishthira replied:—Undoubtedly, the Horse Sacrifice purifies princes But I have a purpose of which you should hear

12 Having caused this huge slaughter of kindred I cannot, O best of the twice-born ones, dispense gifts even on a small scale, I have no riches to give.

13 Nor can I for riches solicit these young sons of kings, living wretchedly with their wounds yet green, and undergoing suffering.

14 How, O foremost of twice born ones, having myself destroyed the Earth, can I, overwhelmed with sorrow, levy dues for celebrating a sacrifice?

15 Through Duryodhana's folly, O best of ascetics, the kings of the Earth have met with destruction, and we with ignominy

16 Duryodhana hath wasted the Earth for money; and the treasury of that wicked son of Dhritarashtra is empty.

17. (In this sacrifice), the Earth is the sacrificial gift, this is the rule that is prescribed in the first instance The learned observe the usual reversal of this rule though sanctioned

18 Nor, O ascetic, do I like to have a substitute In this matter, O reverend sir, you should favor me with your advice

19 Thus addressed by Pritha's son, Krishna-Dwaipayana, thinking for a while, spoke to the righteous king This treasury, (now) exhausted, shall be full. O son of Pritha, in the mountain Himavan (Himalaya) there is gold which had been left behind by Brahmanas at the sacrifice of the great Marutta.

22 Yudhishthira asked: How in that sacrifice] celebrated by Marutta, was so much gold collected? And, O foremost of speakers, when did he reign?

Vyasa said:—

23 If, O Pritha's son you are anxious to hear, about that king of the Karandhama line, then listen to me as I tell you when that highly powerful king having immense riches reigned

CHAPTER IV.

(ASHWAMEDHIKA PARVA)—Continued.

Yudhishthira said:—

1. O righteous one, I wish to hear the history of that royal sage Marutta Do you O Dwaipayana, describe this to me, O sinless one.

Vyasa said:—

2 O child, in the golden age Manu was lord wielding the sceptre His son was known under the name of Prasandhi

3. Prasandhi had a son named Kshupa. Kshupa's son was king Ikshwaku

4 He O king had a hundred sons possessed of pre-eminent piety. And all of them were made monarchs by king Ikshwaku.

5 The eldest of them Vinsha, became an ideal bowman Vinsha's son, O Bharata, was the auspicious Vivinsha.

6 Vivinsha, O king, had fifteen sons, all of them powerful archers, respecting Brahmanas and speaking the truth gentle and ever-speaking fair The eldest brother Khanmetra, oppressed all his brothers

8. And having conquered the entire kingdom shorn of all troubles, Khanmetra, could not retain his supremacy; nor were the people satisfied with him.

9 And dethroning him, they, O foremost of kings invested his son Suvarcha with the rights of sovereignty, and experienced joy.

10—11 Seeing the reverses of his father and his expulsion from the empire he was ever busy with encompassing the well being of the people, being devoted to Brahman, speaking the truth, practising purity and controlling his senses and thoughts And the subjects were well pleased with that great one constant in virtue.

12 But he being constantly engaged in virtuous works his treasures and vehicles became greatly reduced. And on his treasury having become exhausted, the feudatory princes gathered round him and began to give him trouble.

13 Being thus oppressed by many enemies while his treasury horses and vehicles were impoverished the king suffered great tribulation along with his retainers and the citizens

14 Although his power decreased greatly, yet the enemies could not kill the king, for his power, O Yudhishthira, was established in virtue,

15 And when he had reached the worst point of misery along with the citizens, he blew his hand, and from that there appeared a supply of forces.

16. And then he defeated all the kings living along the borders of his dominions And from this incident, O king, he hath been celebrated as Karandhama.

17. His son, Karandhama was born at the commencement of the Treta age, equalling Indra himself, gifted with grace, and invincible even by the immortals

18 At that time all the kings were under his control, and alike by virtue of his riches and of prowess, he became their emperor.

19 In short, the righteous king Avikshit became like Indra himself in heroism, and he was given to sacrifices, delighted in virtue and held his senses under control.

20. And in energy he resembled the sun and in patience, Earth herself, in intelligence, he was like Vrihaspati, and in calmness the mountain Himavan himself.

21. And that king pleased the hearts of his subjects by act, thought, speech, self-control, and forbearance.

22 The lords who celebrated hundreds of Horse Sacrifices, and whom the powerful and learned Angira himself served as priest.

23 His son excelled his father in the possession of good qualities, named Marutta, that lord of kings was righteous and of great fame, having the power of ten thousand elephants, and like unto Vishnu's second self.

24—25 Desirous of celebrating a sacrifice, that virtuous king, coming to Mount Meru on the northern side of Himavat, made thousands of shining golden vessels to be forged There on a huge golden hill he performed the rites

26. And goldsmiths made numberless basins and vessels and pans and seats

27. And the sacrificial ground was near this place. And that righteous king Marutta, with other princes, celebrated a sacrifice there.

CHAPTER V.

(ASHWAMEDHIKA PARVA.)—

Continued.

Yudhishthira said:—

1. O best of speakers, how that king waxed so powerful? And how, O twice-born one, did he get so much gold?

2 And where now, O reverend sire, is all his wealth? And, O ascetic, how can we secure the same?

Vyasa thereupon said:—

3—5 As the numerous children of the Prajapati Daksha, the Asuras, and the Celestials challenged each other, so in the same way Angira's sons, the highly energetic Vrihaspati and the ascetic Samvartta, of equal vows challenged each other, O king Vrihaspati began to worry Samvartta again and again

6 And always troubled by his elder brother, he, O Bharata, renouncing his riches, went to the forest with nothing to cover his body except the open sky.

7—9 (At that time), having defeated and destroyed the Asuras and gained the sovereignty of the celestial regions, Vasava had appointed as his priest Angira's eldest son, that best of Brahmanas, Vrihaspati. Formerly Angira was the family-priest of king Karandhama, peerless among men in might, power and character, powerful like Shatakratu, righteous-souled and of rigid vows.

10—11. O king, he had vehicles, and warriors, and many adherents, and beautiful and rich bedsteads, produced through meditation by the breath of his mouth And by his native virtues, the king had brought all the princes under his control

12—13 And having lived as long as he desired he ascended the celestial region in his bodily form. And his son named Avikshit—conqueror of enemies—righteous like Yayati, brought all the Earth under his sway And both in merit and power the king resembled his father.

14 He had a son named Marutta, gifted with energy and resembling Vasava himself. This earth clad in oceans felt herself attracted towards him.

15. He always used to defy the king of the celestials, and, O son of Pandu, Vasava also defied Marutta

16 And Marutta—master of Earth—was pure and perfect And despite his striving, Shakra could not prevail over him.

17 And unable to control him, he riding on the horse, along with the celestials summoning Vrihaspati, spoke to him thus.

18—19 O Vrihaspati, if we wish to do what is agreeable to me, do not perform priestly offices for Marutta on behalf of the celestials or the departed Manes I have, O Vrihaspati obtained the sovereignty of the three worlds while Marutta is merely the king of the Earth.

20 How, O Brahmana, having acted as priest to the immortal king of the celestials, will you unhesitatingly act as a priest to Marutta subject to death?

21. May you fare well Either take up my side or that of the king, Marutta, or forsaking Marutta, gladly come over to me.

22 Thus addressed by the king of the Vrihaspati, thinking for a moment, replied to the king of the celestials.

23 You are the Lord of creatures, and in you are the worlds established And you have killed Namuchi Vishwarupa and Vala.

24 You, O hero, alone, bring about the highest prosperity of the celestials and O slayer of Vala, you sustain the earth as well as the celestial region.

25 How, O foremost of the celestials, having officiated as your priest shall I, O destroyer of Paka, serve a mortal prince and listen to what I say.

26 Even if the god of fire cease to cause heat and warmth, or the earth change its nature, or the sun cease to give light, I shall never deviate from the truth.

Vaishampayana said :—

27. On hearing these words of Vrihaspati, Indra became freed from his envious feelings, and then lauding him he repaired to his own palace.

CHAPTER VI.

(ASHWAMEDHIKA PARVA)—

Continued.

Vyasa said:

1 Regarding it is cited the ancient legend of Vrihaspati and the wise Marutta

2 On hearing of the agreement made by Angira's son Vrihaspati with the king of the celestials, king Marutta made the necessary preparations for a great sacrifice

3 (Marutta) having conceived the idea of a sacrifice in his mind the eloquent grandson of Karandhama went to Vrihaspati and spoke to him thus

4—5 O worshipful ascetic I have intended to celebrate the sacrifice which you did propose to me once on a previous occasion, according to your instructions and I now wish to appoint you as officiating priest at this sacrifice, the materials whereof I have collected, O excellent one you are our family-priest, therefore do you take those sacrificial things and celebrate the sacrifice yourself

Vrihaspati said —

6 O king I do not wish to perform your sacrifice I have been appointed as priest by the King the Celestials and I have promised to him to act as such.

Marutta said :—

7 You are our hereditary family-priest, and therefore I cherish great regard for you, and I have acquired the right of being helped at sacrifices by you and therefore it is proper that you should officiate as priest at my sacrifice.

Vrihaspati said —

8 Having, O Marutta, acted as priest to the celestials, how can I act as such to mortal men, and whether you do leave this place or stay here, I tell you I have ceased to act as priest to any but the celestials.

9 O you of mighty arms, I am unable to act as your priest now And according to your own desire, you can appoint any one as your priest who will perform your sacrifice.

Vyasa said —

10 Thus told, king Marutta became confounded with shame, and while returning home with his mind stricken with anxiety, he met Narada on his way

11—12 And on seeing the divine Rishi Narada, that king stood before him with due salutation, and with his hands clasped together, and then Narada addressing him thus said,—O royal sage, you appear to be not well pleased in your mind, is all well with you where have you been, O sinless one, and why is this your mental disquietude?

13 And O king, if there be no objection to your telling it to me do you O best of kings, disclose to me so that O prince, I may remove the disquietude of your mind with all my efforts

14. Thus addressed by the great Rishi Narada, king Marutta informed him of the refusal he had received from his religious preceptor

Marutta said —

15 Trying to find out a priest to officiate at my sacrifice I went to that priest of the immortals Vrihaspati, the son of Angiras, but he did not choose to accept my offer.

16 Having met with this refusal from him I have no desire to live any longer now, for by his abandoning me thus, I have, O Narada, become sullied with sin.

Vyasa said —

17 Thus told by that king, Narada O powerful prince, made this reply to him with words which seemed to revive that son of Avikshit

Narada said:—

18—19 The virtuous son of Angiras Samvarta by name, is travelling over all the earth in a nude state to the amazement all creatures, do you, O prince, go to him, if Vrihaspati does not wish to officiate at your sacrifice, the powerful Samvarta, if pleased with you, will perform your sacrifice.

Marutta said:—

20—21. I feel as if filled with new life, by these your words, O Narada, but O the best of speakers, do you tell me where I can find Samvarta, and how I can remain by his side, and how I am to act so that he may not leave me, for I do not wish to live if I meet with a refusal from him also.

Narada said —

22. Desirous of seeing Maheshwara, O prince, he roves about at his pleasure in the city of Varanasi dressed as a maniac

23—24 And having reached the gate of the city, you must place a dead body somewhere near it, and the man who shall turn away on seeing the dead body, do you, O prince, know that man to be Samvarta, and knowing him, do you follow his footsteps wherever that powerful man wishes to go, and finding him (at length) in a lonely place you must seek his protection with your hands clasped together.

25 And if he acquire of you as to the person who has given you the information about his own self, do you tell him that Narada has informed you about Samvarta.

25 And if he should ask you to follow me, you must tell him unhesitatingly that I have entered into the fire.

Vyasa said:—

26 Having signified his consent to the proposal of Narada, that royal sage after duly adoring him and with his permission, went to the city of Varanasi, and having reached there, that famous prince did as he had been asked, and remembering the words of Narada, he placed a dead body at the gate of the city.

29 And by coincidence, that Brahmana also entered the gate of the city at the same time Then on seeing the dead body, he suddenly turned away.

30 And on seeing him turn back, that prince, the son of Avikshit followed his footsteps with his hands joined together, and with a view to receive instruction from him

31 And then finding him in a lonely place, Samvarta covered the king with mud and ashes and phlegm and spittle

32 And though thus worried and oppressed by Samvarta, the king followed that sage with his hands joined together in prayer and endeavouring to please him

33 At length overcome with fatigue, and reaching the cool shade of a fig tree with many branches, Samvarta desisted from his course and sat down to rest.

CHAPTER VII.

(ASHVAMEDHIKA PARVA)—

Continued.

Samvarta said —

1 How have you come to know me, and who has referred you to me, do you tell this to me truly, if you desire me to do what is good to you

2 And if you speak truly, you will gain all the objects of your heart, and should you tell a lie your head shall be cut into a hundred pieces

Marutta said:—

3 I have been told by Narada, wandering on his way, that you are the son of our family priest, and this (information) has bent my mind (towards you), with great satisfaction.

Samvarta said:—

4 You have told this to me truly, he (Narada) knows me to be a performer of sacrifices, now tell me where is Narada living at present.

Marutta said —

5 That king of celestial saints (Narada) having given me this information about you, and commended me to your care, has entered into the fire.

Vyasa said —

6 Hearing these words of the king Marutta, Samvarta was highly pleased, and he said! I too am perfectly able to do all that.'

7—9 Then, O prince, that Brahmana, having like a maniac, and continually scolding Marutta with rude words, again accosted him thus, I am afflicted with a brain disorder, and, I always act according to the fretful caprices of my own mind, why are you then bent upon having this sacrifice performed by a priest of such a peculiar nature my brother is able to officiate at sacrifices, and he has gone over to Vasava (Indra), and is engaged in celebrating his sacrifices, do you therefore have your sacrifice performed by him.

10—11. My elder brother has taken away by force from me all my household articles and mystical gods, and sacrificing clients, and has now left to me only this physical body of mine, and, O son of Avikshit, as he deserves all respect from me, I cannot by any means officiate at your sacrifice, unless he permits me.

12 You must therefore go to Vrihaspati first, and taking his permission you can return to me if you have any desire to celebrate a sacrifice, and then only shall I officiate at your sacrifice.

Marutta said:—

13 Do you listen to me, O Samvarta, I did go to Vrihaspati first, but wishing the patronage of Vasava, he did not wish to have me as his sacrificer.

14—15 He said—Having secured the priesthood of the Immortals, I do not wish to act for the mortals, and, I have been forbidden by Shakra (Indra) to officiate at Marutta's sacrifice, as he told me that Marutta having become king, was always filled with a desire to rival him And to this your brother agreed by saying to the destroyer of Vala (Indra), Be it so

16 Know, O best of ascetics that as he had succeeded in getting the protection of the King of the Celestials I went to him with gratified heart, but he did not agree to act as my priest.

17. And thus repulsed, I now wish to spend all I possess, to have this sacrifice performed by you and to outstrip Vasava by the merit of your good offices

18 As I have been repulsed by Vrihaspati for no fault of mine, I have now no desire, O Brahmana, to go to him to seek his help in this sacrifice.

Samvarta said:—

19—20 I can certainly, O king, do all that you wish, if only you agree to do all that I shall ask you to do, but I apprehend that Vrihaspati and Purashdara (Indra) when they will learn that I am engaged in celebrating your sacrifice, will be filled with anger, and do all they can to injure you

21 Therefore, do you assure me of your steadfastness, so as to ensure my coolness and constancy, as otherwise, if I am filled with anger against you, I shall reduce (destroy) you and your kindred to ashes.

Marutta said:—

22—23 If ever I forsake you, may I never attain the blessed regions as long as the mountains shall exist, and the thousand-rayed sun continue to pour heat; if I forsake you, may I never gain true wisdom, and remain for ever addicted to worldly (material) works.

Samvarta said:—

24—25 Listen O son of Avikshit, excellent as is your inclination to perform this act, so too O king, have I in my mind the ability to perform the sacrifice, I tell thee, O king, that your good things will become imperishable and that you shall lord it over Shakra and the Celestials with Gandharvas

26 For myself, I have no wish to hoard riches or sacrificial presents, I shall only do what is disagreeable to both Indra and my brother.

27 I shall certainly make you attain equality with Shakra, and I tell you truly that I shall do what is agreeable to you.

CHAPTER VIII.

Samvarta said:—

1 There is a peak named Munjavan on the summits of the Himalaya mountains, where the worshipful husband of Uma (Mahadeva) is constantly practising austere penances.

2—3 There the powerful and worshipful god of great power accompanied by his wife Uma and armed with his trident, and surrounded by wild goblins of many sorts, following his random wish or fancy, constantly lives in the shade of huge forest trees, or in the caves, or on the rugged peaks of the great mountain.

4—6 And there the Rudras the Sadhyas, the Vishwadevas the Vasus, Yama, Varuna, and Kuvera with all his followers, and the spirits and globins, and the two Ashwins the Gandharvas, the Apsaras, the Yakshas, as also the celestial sages, the Sun Gods, as well as the gods presiding over the winds and evil spirits of all sorts, adore the great lord of Uma, gifted with diverse characteristics.

7. And there, O king the adorable god sports with the wild and playful followers of Kuvera, having weird and ghastly appearances.

8 Shining with its own splendour, that mountain looks resplendent as the morning sun.

9 And no creature with his natural eyes made of flesh, can ever see its shape or figure, and neither heat nor cold prevails there, nor does the sun shine or the winds blow.

10. And, O king, neither does senility, nor hunger, nor thirst, nor death nor fear afflict any one there.

11. And O foremost of conquerors there exist mines of gold, resplendent as the solar rays on all sides of that mountain And, O king, desirous of doing good to him, the attendants of Kuvera protect these mines of gold from intruders, with uplifted arms.

18—31. Come here, and appease that adorable god who is known by the name of Sarva, Bedha, Rudra Shitikantha, Surupa, Suvarcha, Kapardi, Karala, Haryyaksha, Varada, Tryaksha, Pusl nodantabhid, Vamana, Shiva, Vamya, Avyaktarupa, Sadvritta, Shankara, Kshemya, Harishesha, Sthanu, Purusha, Harinetra, Munda Krisha, Uttarana, Bhaskara, Sutirtha, Devadeva, Ranha, Ushnishi, Suvaktra, Sahasraksha, Midhvan, Girisha, Prashanta, Yata, Chiravasa, Vilwadanda, Siddha, Sarvadándadhara, Mriga Vyadha Mahan, Dhanesha, Bhava, Vara, Somavaktra, Siddhamantra, Chakshu, Hiranyavahu, Ugra, Dikpati Lelihana Goshtha Shuddhamantra, Vrishnu, Pashupati, Bhutapati, Vrisha, Matribhakta Senani, Madhyama, Sruvahasta, Vati, Dhanvi, Bhargava, Aja, Krishnanetra Vimpaksha, Tikshnadanshtra, Tikshna, Vaishwanaramukha, Mahadyuti, Ananga, Sarva, Dikpati Bahuhasta, Dipta, Diptaksha, Mahauja, Vasuretas Suvapu, Prithu Kuttivasa, Kapalmali Suvarnamukuta, Mahedeva, Krishna, Tryamvaka, Anagha, Krodhana Nrishansa, Mridu, Vajrasahi, Dandi, Taptatapa, Akrurakarma, Sahasrashira, Sahasra-Charana, Swadhanwa-Rupa, Vahu Rupa, Danshtri, Ruaki, Maha-Deva, Maha-Yogi, Avyaya, Trishulahasta, Varada, Tryamvaka, Bhuvaneshwara, Tripuraghna, Trinayana, Trilokesha, Mahauja, Sarvabhuta-Prabhava, Sarvabhuta-Dharana, Dharanidhara Ishana Shankara, Sarva, Shiva, Vishweshwara, Bhava, Umapati Pashupati, Vishwarupa, Maheswara, Virupaksha, Dashabhuja, Vrishavadhwaja, Ugra, Sthanu Shiva, Raudra, Sharva, Girisha, Ishwara, Sitikantha, Aja, Shukra, Prithu, Prithubhara, Vara, Vishwarupa, Virupaksha, Vahurupa, Umapati Anangangahara, Hara, Sharanya, Mahadeva, Chaturmukha.

32. There bowing to that deity, you must seek his protection And thus, O prince, making your submission to that great Mahadeva of great energy, you will acquire that gold.

33 And the men who go there thus, succeed in getting the gold. Thus instructed, Marutta, the son of Karandhama, did as he was advised.

34 He made superhuman arrangements for the celebration of his sacrifice. And artisans made golden vessels for that sacrifice.

35—36 And hearing of the prosperity of Marutta, eclipsing that of the gods, Vrihaspati, too, became greatly sorry at heart, and, distressed at the thought that his rival Samvarta should become prosperous, became sick at heart, and the glow of his complexion left him, and his body became emaciated.

37 And when the king of the gods came to know that Vrihaspati was much aggrieved he went to him attended by the Immortals and spoke to him thus.

CHAPTER IX.

Indra said.—

1 Do you, O Vrihaspati, sleep in peace, and do you like your servants do you seek the welfare of the celestials, and do the celestials, O Brahmana, protect you.

Vrihaspati said.—

2 I do sleep in peace, in my bed O Lord of the celestials, and my servants are to my liking, and I always seek the well-being of the celestials, and they cherish me well.

Indra said :—

3 Whence then is this pain, mental or physical, and why are you pale and changed in appearance at present, tell me, O Brahmana, who those people are, who have caused you pain, so that I may slay them all.

Vrihaspati said :—

4. O Indra, I have heard that Marutta will celebrate a great sacrifice at which rich presents will be given by him (to Brahmanas) and that at his sacrifice Samvarta will act as the officiating priest, and, therefore, do I wish that he may not officiate as priest at that sacrifice.

Indra said :—

5 You, O Brahmana, has attained all the objects of your desire when you have become the excellent priest of the celestials, versed in all the sacred hymns, and have got over the influence of death and decrepitude, what can Samvarta do to you now?

Vrihaspti said :—

6. Prosperity of a rival is always painful, and do you, therefore, with your attendant gods persecute the Asuras with their kith and kin, and slay the most prosperous among them; hence, O Lord of the gods, am I changed in appearance at the thought that my rival is prospering, therefore, O Indra, do you, by all means, restrain Samvarta and king Marutta.

Indra turning to Agni said :—

8. Do you, O Jatavedá, following my direction, go to king Marutta to present Vrihaspati to him and say to him that this Vrihaspati will officiate at his sacrifice and make him immortal.

Agni said :—

9 I shall presently, O worshipful one, go there, as your messenger, to present Vrihaspati to king Marutta; and to make Indra's words true, and to shew respect to Vrihaspati. Agni departed.

Vyasa said—

10 Then the great Fire God went on his errand, laying waste all the forests and trees, like the powerful wind, roaring and resolving at random at the end of the winter season.

Marutta said :—

11. See! I find the Fire God come in his own embodiment, this day, therefore, do, ou O Muni, offer him a seat and water, and a cow and water for washing the feet.

Agni said :—

12. I accept your offerings of water, seat, and water for washing the feet, O sinless one, do you know me as the messenger of Indra, come to you as ordered by him.

Marutta said :—

13 O Fire-God, is the glorious King of the Celestials happy, and is he pleased with us, and are the other celestials loyal to him? Do you enlighten me duly on all these matters.

Agni said :—

14. O king, Shakra is perfectly happy, he is pleased with you, and wishes to make you free from decrepitude, and all the other gods are loyal to him, do you, O king, listen to the message of the King of the Celestials.

15 And the object for which he has sent me to you is to present Vrihaspati to Marutta; O prince, let this priest perform your sacrifice, and make you who are only a mortal, attain immortality.

Marutta said :—

16. This twice born Brahmana Samvarta will perform your sacrifice, and I pray to Vrihaspati, that he having acted as priest to Mahendra it does not appear well for him now to act as priest to mortal men.

Agni said :—

17. If this Vrihaspati officiate as your priest, then you will by the blessings of the King of the Celestials attain the highest place in the celestial mansion and acquiring fame you will, forsooth, conquer the heavenly region.

18. And, O king, if Vrihaspati act as your priest you will be able to conquer all the regions inhabited by men, and the heavenly regions and all the highest regions created by Prajapati and even the entire kingdom of the celestials.

Samvarta said :—

19 You must never come again thus to present Vrihaspati to Marutta, for know, O Pavaka, (Agni), if you do, I losing my temper, will burn you with my fierce evil eyes.

Vyasa said :—

20. Then fearing destruction by fire, and trembling like the leaves of the Ashwatth a tree (Ficus religiosa). Agni returned to the gods, and the great Shakra seeing that carrier of oblations (Agni) in the company of Vrishaspati said as follows.

Indra said —

21. You, O Jataveda (Agni), went to present Vrihaspati to Marutta according to my direction, now what did that sacrificing king say to you, and did he accept my command?

Agni said :—

22. Your message was not acceptable by Marutta and when urged by me, he clasping the hands of Vrihaspati, said again and again, that Samvarta would act as his priest.

23. And he also observed that he did not wish to attain the worldly and the heavenly regions, and all the highest regions of Prajapati, and that if he were so minded, he would accept the terms of Indra.

Indra said :—

24 Do you return to that king and meeting him, tell him these words of mine, full of meaning and if he obey them not, I shall strike him with my thunderbolt.

Agni said :—

25—26 Let this king of the Gandharvas go there as your messenger, O Vasava, for, I am afraid to go there myself Know, O Shakra, that highly enraged Samvarta, addicted to ascetic practices told me these words in anger 'I shall burn you with my fierce evil eyes if you on any account come again here to present Vrihaspati to king Marutta.'

as I do not strike the weak with my thunderbolt (Vritra got the better of me for a time) But who among mortals can live in peace by creating enmity with me

30 I have banished the Kalakeyas to the earth, and removed the Danavas from the celestial region and have terminated the existence of Prahlada in heaven can there be any man who can leave in peace by exciting my enmity.

Agni said :—

31—32 Do you, O Mahendra remember that formerly when the sage Chyavana officiated at the sacrifice of Sharyati with the twin gods Ashwins, and himself appropriated the Soma offering alone, you were filled with anger, and when bent upon preventing Sharyati's sacrifice, you did violently strike Chyavana with your thunderbolt, that Brahmana O Purandara, yielding to anger, was able by the power of his devotions to seize and hold fast your hand with your thunderbolt in it.

33—36 And in anger, he again created a terrible looking enemy of yours, the Asura named Mada assuming all shapes on seeing whom you did shut your eyes with fear, whose one huge jaw was placed on earth, and the other extended to the celestial regions and who looked terrible with his thousand sharp teeth extending over a hundred Yojanas, and had four prominent ones thick a set, and shining like a pillar of silver, and extending over two hundred Yojanas And when grinding his teeth he followed you with his terrible and uplifted pike with the object of slaying you, you on seeing that terrible monster, presented a (pitiful) sight to all the bystanders Then, O destroyer of Danavas, overcome with fear of the monster, with your hands clasped in prayer, you did seek the protection of the great sage.

patiently the insolent pride of Avikshita's son, and so shall I grind him with my thunderbolt.

2. Therefore, O Dhritarashtra, do you according to my direction go to king Marutta, attended by Samvarta, and deliver this now to him—'do you O prince, accept Vrihaspati as your spiritual preceptor, as otherwise I shall strike you with my dreadful thunderbolt.'

Vyasa said :—

3 Then Dhritarashtra went to that monarch's court and delivered this news to him from Vasava.

Dhritarashtra said :—

4—5 O king, know that I am Dhritarashtra the Gandharva, come here with the object of delivering to you the message of Indra, do you, O foremost of kings, listen to the words which the great lord of all the worlds meant for you —that one of incomprehensible deeds (Indra) only said this much—'do you accept Vrihaspati as your officiating priest for the sacrifice, or if you do not comply with my request I shall strike you with my dreadful thunderbolt.'

Marutta said :—

6 You, O Purandara, the Vishwadevas, the Vasus and the Ashwins ye all know, that, in this world there is no escape for the results of playing false to a friend, it is a great sin like that of Brahminicide.

7 Let Vrihaspati (therefore) officiate as priest to that Mahendra the supreme Deva (god) the highest one holding the thunderbolt, and, O prince, Samvarta will act as my priest, as neither his (Indra's) words, nor thine commend themselves to me.

The Gandharva said :—

8. Do you O foremost of kings, listen to the terrible war cry, of Vasava roaring in the sky, assuredly and openly will Mahendra hurl his thunderbolt at you, do you, therefore, think of your well being, for this is the time to do it.

Vyasa said :—

9 Thus addressed by Dhritarashtra, and hearing the roar of Vasava, the king communicated this news to Samvarta firm in devotion and the highest of all virtuous men

Marutta said :—

10. Indeed this rain cloud floating in the air, indicates that Indra must be near at present, therefore O prince of Brahmanas, I seek shelter from you, do you, O best of Brahmanas remove this fear of Indra from my mind.

11. The Holder of the Thunderbolt is coming encompassing the ten directions of space with his dreadful and superhuman refulgence and my assistants at this sacrificial assembly have been filled with fear.

Samvarta said :—

12 O foremost of kings, your fear of Shakra will soon be removed, and I shall soon remove this terrible pain by means of my magic (incantation), be calm and have no fear of being overpowered by Indra.

13 You have nothing to fear from the God of a Hundred Sacrifices I shall use my staying charms, O king, and the weapons of all the gods will avail them not.

14—15 Let the lightning flash in all the directions, and the winds entering into the clouds pour down rain in the midst of the forests, and the waters deluge the heavens and the flashes of lightning that are seen will avail not, you have nothing to fear, let Vasava pour down the rains and plat his terrific thunderbolt where he will, floating among the masses of (clouds) for your destruction, for the god Vahni (Agni) will protect you in every way, and make you attain all the objects of your desire.

Marutta said :—

16 This dreadful crash of the thunderbolt together with the roaring of the winds, seem dreadful to my ears and my heart is stricken again and again, O Brahmana, and my peace of mind is gone at present.

Samvarta said :—

17 O king, the fear in your mind from this terrible thunderbolt will leave you immediately I shall remove the thunder by the help of the winds, and setting aside all fear from your mind, do you accept a boon from me according to your heart's desire, and I shall do it for you

Marutta said :—

18. I wish, O Brahmana, that Indra all of a sudden should come bodily at this sacrifice, and accept the oblation offered to him, and that all the other celestials also come and take their appointed shares of the offerings and accept the libations of Soma offered to them.

Samvarta said :—

19 I have, by the power of my incantations, attracted Indra bodily to this sacrifice. See, O king, Indra coming with his horses, and adored by the other celestials hastening to this sacrifice.

Agni said :—

20. Then the King of the Celestials attended by the other deities and riding in his chariot drawn by the most excellent horses, approached the sacrificial altar of that son of Angirshit and drank the Soma libations of that peerless king.

21. And king Marutta with his priest rose to receive Indra coming with the host of celestials and well pleased in mind, he welcomed the King of Deities with due and foremost honors according to the Shastras.

Samvarta said :—

22. Welcome to you, O Indra, by your presence here, O learned one, this sacrifice has been made grand, O destroyer of Vala, and Vritra, do you, again, drink this Soma juice produced by me to-day.

Marutta said :—

23 Do you look with kindness upon me, I bow to you, O Indra, by your presence, my sacrifice has been perfected, and my life too blessed with good results. O Surendra this excellent Brahmana, the younger brother of Vrihaspati is engaged in celebrating my sacrifices.

Indra said :—

24 I know your priest, this highly energetic ascetic, the younger brother of Vrihaspati, at whose invitation I have come to this sacrifice, I am, O king, well pleased with you, and my anger against you is gone.

Samvarta said :—

25. If, O King of the Celestials, you are pleased with us, do you yourself give all the directions for this sacrifice, and O Surendra, yourself ordain the sacrificial portions (for the gods) so that, O god, all the world may know that it has been done by you.

Vasava said —

26 Thus addressed by the son of Angira, Shakra himself gave directions to all the celestials to erect the hall of assembly, and a thousand well furnished excellent rooms looking grand as in a canvass, and quickly to complete the staircase massive and durable, for the ascent of the Gandharvas and Apsaras and to furnish that portion of the sacrificial ground reserved for the dance of the Apsaras, like the palace of Indra in the celestial region.

28—29 O king, thus directed, the renowned denizens of heaven quickly carried out the directions of Shakra And then O king, Indra well pleased and worshipped, thus said to king Marutta —O prince, by associating with you at this sacrifice, your ancestors who have gone before you as well as the other celestials have been highly pleased and accepted the oblations offered by you.

30 And now, O king, let the foremost of twice born ones, offer on the sacrificial altar a red bull belonging to the Fire-God and a sacred and duly consecrated blue bull with a variegated skin, belonging to the Vishwedevas.

31 Then, O king, the sacrificial ceremony grew in splendour, wherein the celestias themselves collected the food, and Shakra the King of the Celestials, possessed of horses, and adored by the Brahmanas, became all assistant at the sacrifice.

32 And then the great Samvarta ascending the altar, and looking radiant as the second embodiment of the Burning Fire, *loudly addressing the celestials with satis*faction, offered oblations of clarified butter to the fire with incantation of the sacred hymns.

33 And then the Destroyer of Vala first drank the Soma juice, and then the assembly of other celestials who drank Soma, and then in happiness and with the king's permission they returned home well pleased and delighted.

34 Then that king, the destroyer of his enemies with a delighted heart, placed heaps of gold on various spots, and distributing the immense riches to the Brahmanas he looked glorious like Kuvera the King of Riches.

35 And with a pleased heart, the king filled his treasury with different kinds of wealth, and with the permission of his spiritual preceptor, he returned (to his kingdom) and continued to rule the entire kingdom extending to the limits of the sea.

36 So virtuous in this world was that king, at whose sacrifice such an enormous quantity of gold was collected, and now, O prince, you must collect that gold and adoring the gods with due rites, do you celebrate this sacrifice.

Vaishampayana said —

37. Then the Pandava prince Yudhishthira was delighted on hearing this speech of the son of Satyavati (Vyasa) and desirous of celebrating his sacrifice with those riches, he consulted again and again with his ministers.

CHAPTER XI.

(ASHWAMEDHIKA PARVA.)—
Continued

Vaishampayana said:—

1—3 When Vyasa of wonderful deeds had concluded his speech to the king, the highly powerful son of Vasudeva (Krishna) also addressed him Knowing the king the son of Pritha, afflicted in mind, and bereft of his relatives and kinsmen killed in battle, and appearing crest fallen like the sun darkened by eclipse, or fire smothered by smoke, that support of the Vrishni race (Krishna), comforting the son of Dharma, tried to address him thus.

Vasudeva said:—

4 All crookedness of heart brings on destruction, and all rectitude leads to Brahma This and this only is the aim and object of all true wisdom, what can mental distraction do (to him).

5. Your Karma has not yet been destroyed nor have your enemies been subjugated, for you do not yet know the enemies that live within your own body.

6 I shall (therefore) relate to you truly as I have heard it, the story of the war of Indra with Vritra as it happened

7—8 Formerly the Earth, O king, was encompassed by Vritra, and by this abstraction of earthly matter the seat of all smell, there arose bad odors on all sides, and the Performer of a Hundred Sacrifices (Indra), being much incensed by this deed, hurled his thunderbolt at Vritra.

9 And being deeply wounded by the thunderbolt of powerful Indra, Vritra entered into the (waters), and by doing so, he destroyed their property.

10 The waters being seized by Vritra, their liquid property left them At this Indra became wroth and again smote him with his thunderbolt.

11 And he (Vritra) smitten by the thunderbolt by the most powerful Indra went to the luminous matter and abstracted its inherent property.

12—14. The luminous matter being overwhelmed by Vritra and its property, color and form being thereby lost, the angry Indra again hurled his thunderbolt at him And thus wounded again by Indra of great power, Vritra entered all on a sudden into the gaseous matter, and thereafter made away with its inherent property.

15—16. And this matter being overpowered by Vritra and its property, touch being lost Indra became again angry and flung his thunderbolt at him. And wounded therein by the powerful (Indra), he overwhelmed the ether, and took away its inherent property, and the ether being overwhelmed by Vritra, and its property, sound, being destroyed, the God of a Hundred Sacrifices highly enraged, again smote him with his thunderbolt

17 And thus smitten by the powerful Indra he suddenly entered into his (Shakra's) body, and took away its essential attributes.

18—20 And overtaken by Vritra, he was filled with great illusion And, O venerable sir, the most powerful of Bharata's race, we have heard that Vashishtha comforted Indra and that the God of a Hundred Sacrifices killed Vritra in his body by means of his invisible thunderbolt, and know, O prince, that this religious mystery was recited by Shakra to the great sages, and they in turn told it to me.

CHAPTER XII.

(ASHWAMEDHIKA PARVA.)—
Continued.

Vasudeva said:—

1. There are two kinds of diseases, physical and mental They are produced by the mutual action of the body and mind on each other, and they never originate without the interaction of the two

2 The disease that is produced in the body, is called physical, and that which is produced in the mind, is called mental

3 The cold, the warm (phlegm and bile) as well as the windy humours, O king, are the essential changes created in the physical body, and when these humours are equally distributed, and are present in due proportions, they indicate good health

4—5 The warm humour is influenced by the cold and the cold by the warm. Goodness Darkess and Ignorance are the attributes of the soul, and it is said by the learned, that their presence in equal parts, indicates health (of the mind). But if any of the three preponderate, some remedy is laid down

6 Happiness is overcome by sorrow, and sorrow by pleasure Some people while afflicted by sorrow, wish to recall (past) happiness, while others, while in the enjoyment of happiness, wish to recall past sorrow.

7—11. But you, O son of Kunti, do neither wish to recall your sorrows nor your happiness, what else do you wish to recall barring this delusion of sorrow. Or, perchance, O son of Pritha, it is your innate nature, by which you are at present overpowered. You do not wish to recall to your mind the painful spectacle of Krishna standing in the hall of assembly with only one piece of cloth to cover her body, and while she was in her menses and before all the Pandavas. And it is not proper that you should brood over your departure from the city, and your exile with the hide of the antelope for your dress, and your wanderings in the great forest, nor should you recall to your mind the affliction from Jatasura the fight with Chitrasena, and your troubles from the Sindhavas

12—13 Nor it is meet, O son of Pritha and conqueror of your foes, that you should recall the incident of Kichaka's kicking Draupadi, during the period of your exile passed in absolute concealment, nor the incidents of the fight which took place between yourself and Drona and Bhishma The time has now arrived, when you must fight which each must do single handed with his mind

14 Therefore, O chief of Bharata's race, you must now prepare to carry the struggle against your mind, and by dint of abstraction and the merit of your own Karma, you must reach the other side of the mysterious and unintelligible (mind).

15 In this war there will be no need for any weapons nor for friends nor attendants The battle which is to be fought alone and single-handed has now arrived for you

16 And if defeated in this struggle, you shall find yourself in the most wretched condition, and, O son of Kunti, knowing this, and acting accordingly, shall you attain success

17 And knowing this wisdom and the destiny of all creatures, and following the conduct of your forefathers do you duly govern your kingdom

CHAPTER XIII.

(ASHWAMEDHIKA PARVA.)—

Continued.

Vasudeva said :—

1. O foremost of Bharata's race, salvation is not attained by removing the external things (like kingdom, etc), but by giving up things which satisfy the flesh (body).

2. The virtue and happiness which one attains who has renounced only the external objects, but who at the same time possessed by passions and weakness of the flesh, let these be the portion of our enemies.

3 The word with two letters is Mrityu (death,) and the word with three letters is Shashwata Brahman, or the eternal spirit The consciousness of ego, or the state of being addicted to worldly objects is Death, and the absence of that feeling is immortality.

4 And these two, Spirit and Death, O king, have their seats in the souls of all creatures, and remaining unseen, they, forsooth, rage war with each other.

5 And if, O Bharata, it be true that no creature is ever killed, then one commits no sin for the death of a creature by destroying its body.

6 What matters the world to a man, if having acquired the sovereignty of the entire earth with its mobile and immobile creation, he does not become attached to it

7 But if the man who having renounced the world, has adopted the forest mode of life, living on wild roots and edibles, O son of Pritha, has a craving for the earthly things, and is addicted to them he may be said to bear death in his mouth.

8 Do you, O Bharata, watch and observe the character of your external and internal enemies. And the man who is able to perceive the nature of the eternal reality is able to get over the influence of the great fear (perdition).

9—11. Men do not like the conduct of those who are engrossed in earthly desires, and there is no deed without having a desire (at its root) and all desires are as it were, the limbs of the mind Therefore, wise men knowing this, control their desires. The Yogi who communes with the Supreme Spirit knows Yoga to be the perfect way to salvation by reason of the practices of his many pristine births And remembering that, what the soul wishes, is not conducive of piety and virtue, but that the control of the desires is at the root of all true virtue, such men do not engage in the practice of charity, Vedic learning, asceticism, Vedic rites, whose object is attainment of earthly prosperity, ceremonies, sacrifices, religious rules and meditation, with the desires of securing any advantage thereby.

12 As an illustration of this truth, the sages, well read in ancient learning, recite these verses called by the name of Kamagita, do you, O Yudhishthira, listen to the recital of them in full.

13 (Kama says) No creature is able to destroy me without following the proper methods (viz., subjugation of all desires and practice of Yoga, etc.)

14—15 If a man knowing my power, tries to destroy me by muttering prayers, etc., I prevail over him by deluding him with the belief that I am the ego within him. If he desire to destroy me by means of sacrifices with many presents, I deceive him by appearing in his mind as a most virtuous creature amongst the mobile creation, and if he wish to destroy me by mastering the Vedas and its auxiliaries, I overreach him by appearing to his mind to be the soul of virtue amongst the immobile creation.

16—19 And if the man whose strength lies in truth, wish to overcome me by patience, I appear to him as his mind, and thus he does not perceive my existence, and if the man of austere religious practices, wish to destroy me by means of asceticism, I appear in the dress of asceticism in his mind, and thus he is prevented from knowing me, and the man of learning, who with the object of attaining salvation wish to destroy me, I frolic and laugh in the face of such a man intent on salvation. I am the everlasting one without an equal, whom no creature can kill or destroy.

20 Therefore, you too, O prince, divert your desires (Kama) to virtue, so that, by this means, you may attain what is for your good.

21. Do you, therefore make preparations for the due performance of the Horse-Sacrifice with presents, and various other sacrifices of great splendour, and accompanied with presents.

22. Let not, therefore, grief overpower you again on seeing your friends lying killed on the battle field. You cannot see the men killed in this battle alive again.

23 Therefore, should you perform magnificent sacrifices with presents, so that you may attain fame in this world, and reach the perfect way in the next.

CHAPTER XIV.

(ASHWAMEDHIKA PARVA)—Continued.

Vaishampayana said—

1. Those great ascetics consoled the royal saint Yudhishthira, bereft of his friends, with these words.

2—4 And, O monarch, that king exhorted by the worshipful Vishtarashraba himself, and by Dwaipayana (Vyasa), Krishna, Devasthana, Narada, Bhima, Nakula, Krishna (Draupadi), Sahadeva, and the sharp witted Vijaya as well as by other great men, and Brahmanas versed in the scriptures, became relieved of all mental suffering and sorrow originating from the death of his dear relations.

5 And that king Yudhishthira after performing the obsequial ceremonies of his departed friends, and honoring the Brahmanas and the celestials, brought the kingdom of the earth with its girdle of oceans, under his sway.

6. And having regained his kingdom, with a tranquil mind, that prince of Kuru's race thus addressed Vyasa, Narada and the other sages who were present.

7 I have been consoled by the words of so great, ancient and aged saints as yours lives, and I have now no cause left for the least sorrow.

8 And likewise I have attained great riches, with which I may adore the celestials, therefore, with your help, I shall now celebrate the sacrifice.

9—10 O the best of the twice borns, we have heard that those (Himalayan) regions are full of wonders; therefore, O Brahmana saint and grandfather do you so ordain that under your protection we may safely reach the Himalaya mountains, the performance of my sacrifice being entirely within your control, and then the worshipful celestial saint Narada and Devasthana have also addressed exquisite and well-meaning words for our behoof.

11 No unlucky man in times of great sorrow and distress, has ever the good fortune to secure the services of such preceptors and friends approved of all virtuous men.

12—13 Thus addressed by the king, those great saints, commending the king and Krishna and Arjuna to go the Himalayan regions, then and there vanished before the assembled multitude, and the king, the royal son of Dharma, thus seated himself there for some time.

14—16 And the Pandavas then on account of the death of Bhishma, were engaged in celebrating his funeral ceremonies And their time, while thus engaged, seemed too long in passing, and performing the last rites for the bodies of Bhishma, Karna and other foremost Kauravas, they gave away large presents to Brahmanas And then the foremost descendant of Kuru again performed with Dhritarashtra the funeral rites, and having distributed profuse riches amongst the Brahmanas the Pandava chief with Dhritarashtra in advance entered the city of Hastina Nagar, and consoling his uncle, having eyes of wisdom, that virtuous prince continued to govern the earth with his brothers.

CHAPTER XV.

Janamejaya said —

1 O best of the twice-borns, when the Pandavas had reconquered and pacified their kingdom, what did the two warriors Vasudeva and Dhananjaya do?

Vaishampayana said :—

2—4 O king, Vasudeva and Dhananjaya were highly pleased when the Pandavas had succeeded in regaining and pacifying their kingdoms, and they deported themselves with great glee, like Indra and his wife in the celestial regions, and amidst picturesque forest sceneries, and tablelands of mountains and sacred places of pilgrimage, and lakes and rivers, they travelled with great pleasure like the two Ashwins in the Nandana garden of Indra.

5 And, O Bharata, the great Krishna and the son of Pandu (Dhananjaya) entering the beautiful hall of assembly at Indraprastha, passed their time in great merriment.

6 And there, O prince, they passed their time in describing the stirring incidents of the war, and the sufferings of their past lives.

7 And those two great ancient sages pleased, recited the genealogy of the races of saints and gods

8 Then Keshava, knowing the full significance of all matters, addressed Partha in sweet and beautiful words of excellent style and meaning

9 And then Janarddana consoled the son of Pritha afflicted by the death of his sons, and thousands of other relatives.

10 And he of great ascetic merit and knowing the science of all things duly comforting him, rested for a while, as if a great burden had been removed from his own body.

11. Then Govinda (Krishna) comforting Arjuna with sweet speech, addressed these well-reasoned words to him.

Vasudeva said :—

12 O Arjuna, the terror of your enemies, this entire earth has been conquered by the king, the son of Dharma, depending on the power of your arms

13 And, O best of men, the virtuous king Yudhishthira now enjoys the sovereignty of the earth without a rival, by the power of Bhimasena and the twin brothers.

14—17 O you, who know what virtue is, it was by virtue alone, that the king has been able to regain his kingdom shorn of all enemies, and it was by the action of virtue, that king Suyodhana has been slain in battle, and, O son of Pritha and pillar of the Kuru race, the wicked sons of Dhritarashtra, avaricious, always rude in speech, and bent upon a sinful course of conduct, having been rooted out with their followers, the king, the son of Dharma and lord of the earth, now peaceably enjoys the entire kingdom of the earth with your help and I too, O son of Pandu, have been pleasantly passing away my time in your company, amidst woodland scenes.

18 O terror of your enemies what more need I tell you, but that where you and Pritha, and the king, the son of Dharma, and the powerful Bhimasena and the two sons of Madri are, there am I drawn with exquisite delight.

19—20. O descendant of Kuru, in these delightful and sacred and celestial halls of assembly, a long time has gone away in your company without my seeing Vasudeva, Valadeva and other leaders of the Vrishni race

21. And now I am desirous of going to the city of Dwaravati Do you, therefore, O most courageous of men, assent to my departure.

22 When king Yudhishthira was stricken heavily with sorrow, I with Bhishma, have recited to him many appropriate legends suited to the occasion with a view of dispelling his grief, and the pliant and great Yudhishthira though our sovereign, and versed in all learning, paid due heed to our words.

23—24 That son of Dharma honors truth, and is grateful and virtuous, therefore will his virtue, and good sense and the stability of his power always endure.

25 And now, O Arjuna, if it pleases you, do you go to that great prince and tell him of my desire to leave this place.

26—31 For, O you of mighty arms, even if death comes to me, I am reluctant to do anything that may displease him, what to speak of, my going to the city of Dwaravati, O son of Pritha, and descendant of Kuru, I now tell you truly desiring to do only what is good and agreeable to you, and there can be nothing equivocal in it in any way, that the necessity for my staying here no longer exists, when, O Arjuna, that monarch the son of Dhritarashtra, has been killed with his armies and attendants, and the earth, my friend, with its belt of seas, and its mountains and woods and forests, and the kingdom of the Kuru king filled with various gems, have passed under the control of that wise son of Dharma. And, O foremost prince of Bharata's race, may that virtuous prince govern the entire kingdom of the earth in virtue, and with the respect and approbation of numerous great Siddhas, and having his praises always extolled by the panegyrists.

32 Do you, O pride of Kuru's race, accompany me to day to the king, the great advancer of the Kuru race, and sound him of my intended return to Dwaraka.

33 As Yudhishthira the great king of the Kurus, always commands my love and respect, I have, O son of Pritha, placed this my body and all the riches that I have in my house, at his disposal.

34 And, O prince, Partha (son of Pritha) when this earth has come under your control and that of the worshipful Yudhishthira of excellent character, there no longer remains any need for my staying here, except for my love for you

35 And O king when the redoubtable Arjuna had been thus addressed by the noble-hearted Janarddana, he, shewing all the honors due to him, sorrowfully replied by merely saying 'be it so.'

CHAPTER XVI.

(ANUGITA PARVA)

Janamejaya said:—

1 When the great Keshava and Arjuna after killing their enemies went to the assembly rooms what conversation, O twice-born one took place between them?

2. The son of Pritha (Arjuna), having recovered his own kingdom, spent his time gladly, without doing anything else, in the company of Krishna, his heart filled with joy, in that palace of celestial beauty.

3. One day, those two listlessly went to a particular part of the palace that looked, O king, like a veritable portion of the celestial region. Themselves filled with joy, they were then surrounded by their relatives and attendants.

4. Pandu's son Arjuna, filled with joy in the company of Krishna, saw that delightful palace, and then addressed his companion, saying,—'O mighty-armed one, your greatness became known to me upon the approach of the battle.'

5 O son of Devaki, your form also as the Lord of the universe, then became known to me.

6 What your holy self said to me at that time, O Keshava, through love, has all been forgotten by me, O chief of men, on account of the fickleness of my mind.

7. However, I have been curious again and again on the subject of those truths You, too, O Madhava, will go to Dwaraka soon.

Vaishampayana said—

8 Thus addressed by him, Krishna of great energy, that foremost of speakers, embraced Phalguna and replied to him as follows.

Vasudeva said —

9 I made you listen to truths that are considered as mysteries I conferred on you eternal truths. Indeed, I described to you Religion in its true form and on all the eternal regions.

10 It is greatly disagreeable to me to learn that you did not, from folly, receive what I gave The recollection of all that I told you on that occasion will not come to me now

11. Forsooth, O son of Pandu you are destitute of faith and your understanding is not good It is impossible for me, O Dhananjaya, to repeat, in full, all that I said on that occasion

12 That religion is more than sufficient for understanding Brahma. I cannot describe it again in detail.

13 I described to you, O Supreme Brahma having concentrated myself in Yoga I shall now however, recite to you an old history upon the same subject

14. O foremost of all persons knowing duty, listen to everything I now say, so that, with an understanding adapted to my teaching, you may succeed in attaining to the highest end.

15. O chastiser of enemies, on one occasion, a Brahmana came to us from the celestial regions. Of irresistible energy, he came from the regions of the grandfather. He was duly respected by us

16. Listen, O son of Pritha, unhesitatingly to what he, O chief of Bharata's race, said, in answer to our enquiries, according to heavenly forms.

Brahmana said :—

17—18 That which you ask me, O Krishna, about the religion of Moksha (Emancipation), led by your compassion for all creatures,—that, indeed, which destroys all delusion,—O you gifted with Supreme power, I shall now tell you duly, O destroyer of Madhu. Do you listen with rapt attention as I discourse to you, O Madhava.

19. A Brahmana named Kashyapa, possessed of penances and the foremost of all persons knowing duties, came to a certain other Brahmana who had become conversant with all the mysteries of religion.

20. Indeed, the latter had mastered all the knowledge which the scriptures teach about the departure and reappearance of beings and possessed that direct knowledge of all things which Yoga gives He was well skilled in the truths of all subjects relating to the world He had mastered the truth about pleasure and pain.

21. He knew the truth about birth and death, and understood the distinctions between merit and demerit. He had seen the ends attained to by embodied creatures high and low on account of their deeds.

22—24 He lived like one freed from the world Crowned with ascetic success and gifted with perfect tranquillity of soul, he had all his senses under complete control. He seemed to shine with the resplendence of Brahma and capable of going everywhere at will He knew the science of disappearing at will from before the eyes of all He used to move about in the company of invisible Siddhas and celestial musicians He used to sit and talk with them on some spot retired from the bustle of humanity. He was as unattached to all things as the wind Kashyapa having heard of him truly, wished to see him. Gifted with intelligence, that foremost of all Brahmanas approached the sage.

25 Himself possessed of penances, Kashyapa, moved by the wish of acquiring merit, fell, with a rapt heart, at the feet of the sage when he had seen all those wonderful attributes.

26 Stricken with wonder at the sight of those extraordinary qualities, Kashyapa began to wait upon that foremost of all Brahmanas, with the dutiful respect of a disciple waiting upon his preceptor and succeeded in pleasing him

27. By his devotion, O scorcher of enemies, rendering to him the obedience due from a disciple to a preceptor, Kashyapa pleased that Brahmana who possessed all these qualities and was gifted besides with scriptural learning and excellent conduct.

28. Pleased with Kashyapa, the Brahmana one day addressed him cheerfully and spoke as follows, having the highest success in view. Listen to those words, O Janardana, as I repeat them.

The successful Ascetic said —

29 By various deeds, O son, as also by the help of merit, mortal, creatures attain to diverse ends here and residence in Heaven.

30 Nowhere one can enjoy the highest happiness; nowhere one can live for good. There are repeated falls from the highest regions acquired with such sorrow,

31. On account of my indulgence in sin, I had to come by various miserable and inauspicious ends, filled as I was with lust and anger, and deluded by cupidity.

32 I have repeatedly undergone death and re birth I have eaten various kinds of food, I have sucked at various breasts.

33 I have seen various kinds of mothers, and various fathers dissimilar to one another I have come by various kinds of happiness and misery, O sinless one.

34 On various occasions have I been separated from what was agreeable and united with what was disagreeable Having acquired wealth with great labour I have had to put up with its loss

35 I have received from king and relatives insults and excessive misery. I have suffered from severe mental and physical pain

36 I have undergone humiliations and death and imprisonment under circumstances of great severity I have had falls into Hell and have suffered great tortures in the domains of Yama.

37 I have again and again, suffered form decrepitude and diseases, and from frequent and great calamities In this world I have repeatedly suffered from all those afflictions which arise from a perception of all pairs of opposites.

38 After all this one day, laden with sorrow, despair came upon me I took refuge in the Formless. Suffering from great distress, I gave up the world with all its joys and sorrows.

39 Finding out then this path, I exercised myself in it in this world. Afterwards, through tranquillity of soul, I acquired the success you see.

40. I shall not have to come to this world again Indeed till I attain to absorption into eternal Brahma, till, in fact, the final dissolution of the universe, I shall look on those happy ends that will be mine and on those beings and that form this universe.

41. Having acquired this excellent success, I shall after departing from this world, proceed to what is above it and thence to what is higher.

42 Indeed, I shall come by the condition, which is unmanifest, of Brahma. Do not doubt this. O scorcher of enemies, I shall not return to this world of mortal creatures.

43 O you of great wisdom, I have become pleased with you. Tell me what I shall do for you The time has come for the accomplishment of that purpose for which you have come here.

44. I know that object for which you have sought me. I shall soon depart from this world. Hence it is that I have given you this hint.

45 O you of great wisdom and experience, I have been highly pleased with you for your behaviour. Do you question me! I shall discourse on what is beneficial to you as desired by you.

46 I think your intelligence is great. Indeed, I speak highly of it, for it was with the help of that intelligence that you were able to recognise me [Surely, O Kashyapa, you are endued with great intelligence.

CHAPTER XVII.

(ANUGITA PARVA)—

Continued.

Vasudeva said :—

1 Touching the feet of that sage the Brahmana asked him some very difficult questions. That foremost of all pious persons then described those duties that were referred to.

Kashyapa said :—

2 How does the body dissolve away, and how is another is acquired? How does one become liberated after passing through a repeated round of painful re-births?

3 Enjoying Nature for sometime, how does the Individual Soul cast off the particular body? How does the Individual Soul, freed from the body, attain to what is different from it, (viz., Brahman)?

4 How does a human being enjoy the good and bad deeds done by him? Where do the acts exist of one that is devoid of body?

The Brahmana said :—

5 Thus urged by Kashyapa, the Liberated Sage answered those questions one after another. Do you listen to me, O hero of the Vrishni race, as I recite to you the answers he gave.

The Liberated Sage said :—

6—7. Upon the exhaustion of those deeds capable of prolonging life and bringing on fame which are done in a particular body that the Individual Soul assumes, the embodied Jiva, with the span of his life shortened begins to do acts hostile to life and health On the approach of destruction, his understanding deviates from the proper course.

8 The man of impure soul, after even a correct understanding of his constitution and strength and of the season of both his own life and of the year, begins to eat at irregular intervals and to eat such food as is hostile to him.

9 At such a time he does practices that are greatly harmful He sometimes eats excessively and sometimes abstains altogether from food.

10. He eats bad food or bad meat or takes bad drinks, or food that has been made up of hostile ingredients He eats food that is heavy and more than what is beneficial, or [before the food previously taken, has been digested.

11 He indulges in physical exercise and sexual pleasure in excess, or through avidity for work, suppresses the urgings of his corporeal organism even when they become pronounced

12. Or, he takes juicy food or indulges in sleep during daytime. Food that is not properly digested, of itself excites the faults, when the times comes.

13 From such excitement of the faults in his body, he gets disease ultimately bringing on death Sometimes the person engages in unnatural deeds like strangling.

14 Through these causes the living body of the creature dissolves away. Understand correctly the manner as I declare it to you.

15 Urged on by the Wind which becomes violent, the heat in the body, becoming excited, and reaching every part of the body one after another, restrains all the vital airs

16. Know truly that excited all over the body, the heat becomes very strong, and pierces every vital part where life may be said to live

17—18 On account of this, the Individual Soul, feeling great pain, quickly takes leave of the body Know, O foremost of twice-born ones, that when the vital parts of the body become thus afflicted, Individual Soul passes away from the body, suffering from great pain All living creatures repeatedly suffer from birth and death

19—20 It is seen O chief of Brahmanas, that the pain which is felt by a person when renouncing his bodies is like to what is felt by him when first entering the womb or when coming out of it His joints become almost dislocated and he derives much distress from the waters.

21. Moved by (another) violent wind the wind in the body becomes excited through cold and dissolves away the union of matter into its five primal elements,

22 That wind which lives in the vital airs called Prana and Apana occurring within this compound of the five primal elements, rushes upwards from a situation of distress, leaving the embodied creature

23 It is thus that the wind leaves the body. Then is seen breathlessness. The man then becomes destitute of heat, of breath, of beauty, and of consciousness

24 Deserted by Brahma, the person is said to be dead By those canals through which he perceives all sensuous objects, the bearer of the body no longer perceives them

25 The Individual Soul creates in the body in those canals the vitals are formed by the food

26 The elements gathered together become in certain parts firmly united Know that those parts are called the vitals of the body It is said so in the Shastras.

27 When those vital parts are cut, the Individual Soul, rising up enters the heart of the living creature and restrains the principle of animation forthwith,

28 The creature then, though still possessed of consciousness fails to know anything The vital parts being all worked up, the the knowldge of the living creature becomes overwhelmed by darkness.

29—30 The Individual Soul then, who has been deprived of everything upon which to stay, is then agitated by the wind He then, deeply breathing a long and painful breath, goes out speedily, making the inanimate body to tremble Separated from the body, the Individual Soul, however, is surrounded by his deeds.

31—34 He becomes equipped on all sides with all his auspicious deeds of merit and with all his sins Brahmanas gifted with knowledge and equipped with the certain conclusions of the scriptures, know him, from marks, as to whether he is possessed of merit or with its demerit Even as men having eyes see the fire fly appearing and disappearing in the midst of darkness men having the eye of knowledge and crowned with success of penances, see, with spiritual vision, the Individual Soul as he leaves the body, as he is re born, and as he enters the womb It is seen that the Individul Soul has three regions assigned to him eternally.

35 This world where creatures live is called the field of action. Performing acts, good or bad, all embodied creatures attain to the fruits thereof.

36 On account of their own deeds, creatures acquire even here superior or inferior enjoyments Doers of evil deeds here, on account of those deeds of theirs, attain to Hell,

37 This condition of sinking with head downwards in which creatures are boiled is one of great misery It is such that a rescue therefrom is highly difficult Indeed, one should try hard for saving himself from this misery

38 Those regions where creatures live when they ascend from this world, I shall now declare truly. Do you listen to me attentively

39—40 By listening to what I say, you will acquire firmness of understanding and a clear apprehension of deeds Know that even those are the regions of all creatures of righteous deeds viz, the stellar worlds that shine in the sky, the lunar disc and the solar disc as well that shines in the universe in its own light

41. Upon the termination, again, of their merits, they fall away from those regions repeatedly There is distinction of inferior, superior and middling happiness even in the celestial region.

42 There is discontent at sight of prosperity more burning than one's own even in the celestial region Even these are the goals which I have mentioned in full,

43. I shall, after this describe to you the attainment by the Individual Soul of the condition of residence in the womb.

44 Do you hear me with rapt attention, O twice born one, as I speak to you.

CHAPTER XVIII.

(ANUGITA PARVA.)—
Continued.

The Brahmana said —

1 The acts, good and bad, that the Individual Soul, does are not subject to destruction Upon attainment of body after body, those deeds yield fruits corresponding with them.

2 As a fruit bearing tree, when the season for production comes, yields a large quantity of fruit, merit, achieved with a pure heart, likewise yields a large measure of happiness

3 Similarly, sin, committed with a sinful heart, produces a large quantity of misery The Individual Soul, placing the mind a head performs action

4 Hear then how the Individual Soul, equipt with all his deeds and overwhelmed with lust and anger, enters the womb

5 The vital seed, mixed with blood, enters the womb of females and becomes the field (of the Individual Soul), good or bad born of (his) deeds

6 On account of his subtlety and the condition of being unmanifest, the Individual Soul does not become attached to anything even after coming by a body. Therefore he is called Eternal Brahma

7—8 That (viz, Jiva or Brahma) is the seed of all creatures It is on account of Him that living creatures live. That, the Individual Soul entering all the limbs of the fœtus part by part, accepting the attribute of mind and living within all the regions that belong to vital air, supports (life). On account of this, the fœtus becoming possessed of mind, begins to move its limbs.

9 As liquified iron, poured (into a mould), takes the form of the mould so the entrance of the Individual Soul into the fœtus

10 As fire entering a mass of iron, heats it greatly, so is the manifestation of the Individual Soul in the fœtus.

11 As a lamp, burning in a room, discovers (all things within it) so does the mind discover the different limbs of the body

12 Whatever deeds good or bad the Individual Soul does in a former body, have certainly to be enjoyed or endured by him

13 By such enjoyment and endurance former deeds are exhausted, and other deeds again, accumulate till the Individual Soul succeed in acquiring a knowledge of the duties included in that contemplation which leads to Liberation

14 Regarding this, I shall tell you those deeds by which the Individual Soul, O best of men, while passing through a repeated round of re births, becomes happy

15—18 Gifts, observances of austerity, celibacy, bearing Brahma according to the ordinances laid down, self control, tranquility, mercy for all creatures restraint of passions, abstention from cruelty as also from appropriating others properties refraining from doing even mentally all deeds that are false and injurious to living creatures on the Earth, respectfully serving mother and father, honoring the celestials and guests, adoration of preceptors, pity, purity, constant control of all organs, and causing of all good deeds are said to form the conduct of the good From observance of such conduct, originates virtue which protects all creatures eternally.

19 Such conduct one would always see among good persons Indeed such conduct lives there for good That course of practices which persons of tranquil souls follow, indicates Virtue

20 Among them is thrown that course of practices which forms eternal Virtue He who would follow virtue would never have to come by a miserable end

21 It is by the conduct of the good that the world is restrained in the paths of Virtue when it falls away, He who is a Yogin is Liberated, and is therefore distinguished above these (viz, the good)

22 Deliverance from the world occurs, after a long time of one who acts righteously and well on every occasion as he should

23 A living creature thus always meets with his pristine deeds All these deeds form the cause in consequence of which he comes into this world in a state different from his true form

24 There is a doubt in the world about this question By what was the acceptance (by the Individual Soul) of a body first determined

25 Having first formed a body of his own, the Grandfather of all the worlds viz, Brahman, then created the three worlds, of mobile and immobile creatures

26 Having first himself taken a body, he then created Pradhana. That Pradhana is the material cause of all embodied creatures, by whom is all this covered, and whom all came to know as the greatest.

27 This which is seen is said to be destructible, while the other is immortal and indestructible This which (is seen) is said to be Kshara (the destructible), that, however, which is the other is the Immortal (also) Akshara (the Indestructible). Of each Purusha taken separately, the whole is duality among these three.

28 Seen first (to appear in an embodied form), Prajapati (then) created all the primal elements and all immobile creatures This is the ancient Shruti

29. Of that (acceptance of body), the Grandfather put down a limit about time, and migrations among various creatures and return or re-birth,

30. All that I say is proper and correct, as a person who has intelligence and who has seen his Soul, would say on this subject of previous births.

31—32. That person who considers pleasure and pain as inconstant, which, indeed, is the correct view who regards the body as an unholy collection, and destruction as ordained in action, and who remembers that what little of pleasure there is, is really all pain will succeed in crossing this terrible ocean of worldly migration which is so difficult to cross.

33. Though attacked by decrepitude and death and disease, he who understands Pradhana sees with an equal eye that Consciousness which lives in all beings gifted with Consciousness.

34 Seeking the supreme seat, he then becomes utterly indifferent to all (other) things O best of men, I shall now deliver instruction to you, according to truth, concerning this.

35 Do you, O learned Brahmana, understand in full what form the excellent knowledge, as I declare it, of that indestructible seat.

CHAPTER XIX.

The Brahmana said :—

1 He who becomes immerged in the one receptacle (of all things), freeing himself from even the thought of his own identity with all things,—indeed, ceasing to think of even his own existence—gradually renouncing one after another, will succeed in crossing this bonds.

2. That man who is the friend of all, who endures all, who is attached to tranquility, who has conquered all his senses, who is shorn of fear and anger, and who is of controlled soul, succeeds in liberating himself.

3. He who treats all creatures as his ownself, who is restrained, pure, free from vanity, and shorn of egoism, is considered as liberated from everything.

4. He also is liberated who considers in the same light life and death, pleasure and pain, gain and loss, agreeable and disagreeable.

5. He is in every way liberated who does not covet others' properties, who never disregards any body, who is above all pairs of opposites, and whose soul is shorn of attachments.

6. He is liberated who has no enemy, no kinsman, and no child, who has cast off religion, riches and pleasure, and who is freed from desire or cupidity.

7. He becomes liberated who acquires neither merit nor demerit, who casts off the merits and demerits accumulated in pristine births, who wastes the elements of his body for attaining to a tranquillised soul and who gets over all pairs of opposites.

8—9. He who abstains from all deeds, who is free from desire or cupidity, who considers the universe as unenduring or as like an Ashwattha tree, ever gifted with birth, death, and decrepitude, whose understanding is fixed on renunciation, and whose eyes are always directed towards his own faults soon succeeds in freeing himself from the fetters that bind him.

10 He who sees his soul void of smell, of taste and touch, of sound, of belongings, of vision, and unknowable, becomes liberated.

11. He, who sees his soul shorn of the attributes of the five elements, to be without form and cause, to be really destitute of attributes though enjoying them, becomes liberated.

12. Abandoning, with the help of the understanding, all purposes relating to body and mind, one gradually attains to cessation of separate existence, like a fire unfed with fuel.

13 One who is freed from all impressions, who is above all pairs of opposites, who is destitute of all belongings and who uses all his senses under the guidance of penances, becomes liberated.

14 Having become freed from all impressions one then attains to Brahma which is Eternal and supreme, and tranquil, and stable and enduring and indestructible

15 After this I shall describe the science of Yoga than which there is nothing superior, and how Yogins, by concentration, see the perfect soul.

16 I shall communicate the instructions about it duly Do you learn from me those doors by which directing the soul within the body one sees that which is without beginning and end

17. Withdrawing the senses from their objects, one should fix the mind upon the soul, having previously practised the severest austerities, one should practise that concentration of mind which leads to Liberation.

18 Observant of penances and always practising concentration of mind, the learned Brahmana, gifted with intelligence, should observe the precepts of the Science of Yoga, seeing the soul in the body.

19 If the good man succeeds in concentrating the mind on the soul, he then, used to exclusive meditation, sees the Supreme Soul in his own soul.

20 Self-controlled and always concentrated, and with all his senses completely conquered, the man of purified soul, on account of such complete concentration of mind, succeeds in seeing the soul by soul

21. As a person seeing some unseen individual in a dream recognises him, saying —This is he,—when he sees him after waking, similarly the good man having seen the Supreme Soul in the deep contemplation of Samadhi recognises it upon waking from Samadhi

22 As one sees the fibrous pith after extracting it from a blade of the Saccharum Munja, so the Yogin sees the Soul, extracting it from the body.

23 The body has been called the Saccharum Munja and the fibrous pith is called the Soul This is the excellent illustration given by persons knowing Yoga

24 When the bearer of a body adequately sees the Soul in Yoga he then has no one to master him, for he then becomes the lord of three worlds

25 He succeeds in assuming various bodies according as he wishes Turning away decrepitude and death, he neither grieves nor exults.

26 The self controlled man concentrated in Yoga can create (for himself) the godship of the very gods Renouncing his transient body he attains to immutable Brahma.

27. He does not fear even at on seeing all creatures falling victims to destruction. When all creatures are afflicted,—he can never be afflicted by any one.

28 Devoid of desire and gifted with a tranquil mind, the person in Yoga is never affected by pain and sorrow and fear and the dreadful effects of attachment and affection.

29 Weapons never pierce him, death does not exist for him Nowhere in the world can be seen any one who is happier than he.

30. Having adequately concentrated his soul, he lives firmly on himself Turning off decrepitude and pain and pleasure, he sleeps at ease.

31. Renouncing this human body he attains to (other) forms according to his pleasure While one is enjoying the sovereignty that Yoga bestows, one should never fall away from devotion to Yoga

32 When one, after adequate devotion to Yoga, sees the Soul in his ownself, he then ceases to have any regard for even him of a hundred sacrifices (Indra).

33—37 Hear now how one, habituating himself to exclusive meditation, succeeds in attaining to Yoga Thinking of that point of the compass which has the Sun behind it, the mind should be fixed, not outside, but in the interior of that palace in which one may happen to live. Living within that palace the mind should then, with all its (outward and inward (operations) see in that particular room in which one may live At that time when, having deeply meditated, one sees the All (viz, Brahma, the Soul of the Universe), there is then nothing external to Brahma where the mind may live Controlling all the senses in a forest that is free from noise and that is uninhabited with mind fixed thereon one should meditate on the All both outside and inside his body. One should meditate on the teeth the palate the tongue, the throat the neck likewise, one should also meditate on the heart and the ligatures of the heart.

The Brahmana said —

38 Thus addressed by me that intelligent disciple, O destroyer of Madhu, once more asked me about this religion of Liberation that is so difficult to explain

39 How does this food that is eaten from time to time become digested in the stomach? How does it become changed into juice? How, again, into blood?

40 How does it nourish the flesh, the marrow, the sinews, the bones? How do all these limbs of embodied creatures grow?

41. How does the strength grow of the growing man? How takes place the escape of all such elements as are not nutritive, and of all impurities separately?

42 How does this one inhale and again, exhale? Staying upon what particular part does the Soul live in the body?

43 How does the Individual Soul, exerting himself, bear the body? Of what colour and of what kind is the body in which he lives again?

44 O holy one, you should tell me all this accurately, O sinless one! Thus was I accosted by that learned Brahmana, O Madhava?

45—46. I replied to him, O you of mighty arms, as I myself had heard, O chastiser of all enemies! As one placing some precious object in his store room, should keep his mind on it, so placing the mind within one's own body, one should then, controlling all the senses, seek after the Soul, avoiding all carelessness.

47 One would, becoming always assiduous in this way and pleased with his own self, within a very short time, attain to that Brahma by seeing which one would become conversant with Pradhana.

48. He is not capable of being apprehended by the eye; nor even by all the senses. It is only with the lamp of the mind that the great Soul can be seen.

49 He has hands and feet on all sides; he has ears on all sides, he lives, pervading all things in this world

50 The Individual Soul beholds the Soul as extracted from the body. Then renouncing Brahma as invested with form, by holding the mind in the body he sees Brahma as freed from all qualities

51 He sees the Soul with his mind, smiling as it were at the time. Depending upon that Brahma, he then attains to Liberation in me.

52 O foremost of twice born ones all this mystery has now been declared by me I ask your permission, for I shall leave this place Do you (also) go wherever you like 53 Thus addressed by me, O Krishna, on that occasion that disciple of mine gifted with austere penances, that Brahmana of rigid vows, went away according to his pleasure.

Vasudeva said —

54 O son of Pritha, having said these words to me, on that occasion, about the Religion of Emancipation, that best of Brahmanas disappeared then and there.

55 Have you heard this discourse O son of Pritha, with mind directed solely towards it? This you did hear on that occasion while you were on your car.

56. I think, O son of Pritha, that this is difficult of being comprehended by one whose understanding is confused or who has acquired no wisdom by study, or who eats food, not suited to his body, or whose Soul is not purified.

57. O chief of Bharata's race, this is a great mystery among the celestials that has been declared. At no time or place, O son of Pritha, has this been heard by man in this world.

58 O sinless one save yourself no other man is worthy of hearing it It is not, at this time, capable of being easily understood, by one whose inner soul is confused.

59 The world of the celestials is filled, O son of Kunti, with those who follow the religion of actions The cessation of the body is not liked by the celestials

60 That goal, O son of Pritha is the highest which is formed by eternal Brahman where one, renouncing the body, attains to immortality and becomes always happy.

61. By following this religion, even they who are of sinful birth, such as women and Vaishyas and Shudras, come by the highest goal.

62 What need be said then, O son of Pritha, of Brahmanas and Kshatriyas endued with great learning, always devoted to the duties of their own orders and who are intent on the region of Brahma?

63 This has been laid down with the reasons; and also the means for its acquisition, and its complete attainment and fruit, viz., Liberation and the ascertainment of the truth about pain.

64—65 O chief of Bharata's race, there is nothing else which yields happiness greater than this That mortal, O son of Pandu, who, gifted with intelligence, and faith and prowess, renounces as unsubstantial what is considered as substantial by the world, succeeds within a short time in obtaining the Supreme by these means.

66 This is all that is to be said —there is nothing else which is higher than this He, O son of Pritha, who devotes himself to its constant practice for a period of six months, succeeds in attaining to Yoga.

CHAPTER XX.

Vasudeva said.—

1 Regarding it is cited the old narrative, O son of Pritha, of the discourse that took place between a married couple.

2—3. A certain Brahmana's wife, seeing the Brahmana, her husband, who was a complete master of every kind of knowledge and wisdom, seated in seclusion, said to him—Into what region shall I go, depending on you as my husband,—you who are seated, having cast off all (religious) acts, who are harsh in your conduct towards me, and who are so undiscerning?

4 We have heard that a wife attains to those regions which are acquired by her husband What, indeed, is the goal that I shall attain, having obtained you for my husband.

5 Thus questioned, that Brahmana of tranquil soul then said to her, smilingly,—O blessed dame, I am not offended with these words of yours, O sinless one.

6 Whatever acts exist which are adopted with the help of others, which are seen, and which are true, are done, as acts, by men devoted to acts.

7. Those persons who are destitute of knowledge, only store delusion by deeds Freedom from acts, again, cannot even be momentarily attained in this world.

8 From birth to the attainment of a different form, action good or bad, and accomplished by deeds, mind, or speech, exists in all beings.

9 Those paths (of action) which are characterised by visible objects (such as Soma juice and clarified butter for libations) being destroyed by Rakshasas, turning away from them I have perceived the seat (of the soul) that is in the body, with the help of the soul.

10 There lives Brahma transcending all pairs of opposites, there Soma with Agni; and there the mover of the understanding, (viz, Vayu) always moves, upholding all creatures.

11. It is for that seat that the Grandfather Brahman and others concentrated in Yoga, adore the Indestructible It is for that seat that men of learning and excellent vows, of tranquil souls, and of senses completely controlled, strive 12 That is not capable of being smelt by the sense of smell, nor tasted by the tongue, or touched by the organs of touch. It is by the mind that that is attained.

13 It is incapable of being conquered by the eye It is above the sense of hearing It is shorn of scent, taste, touch, and form as attributes.

14—15 It is that from which proceeds the well ordained universe, and it that upon which it depends The vital airs called Prana, Apana, Samana, Vyana and Udana, flow from it, and it is that into which they again enter. The vital airs Prana and Apana move between Samana and Vyana.

16 When the soul sleeps both Samana and Vyana are absorbed Between Apana and Prana, Udana lives, pervading all.

17 Hence, Prana and Apana do not desert a sleeping person. On account of its controlling all the vital airs, the controlling breath is so called Udana.

18—22 Hence, utterers of Brahma practise penances which have myself for their goal In the midst of all those vital airs which swallow up one another and move within the body, shines forth the fire called Vaishwanara made up of seven flames. The nose, the tongue, the eye, the skin, the ear which numbers the fifth, the mind, and the understanding,—these are the seven tongues of that Vaishwanara's flame That which is smelt that which is seen, that which is drunk that which is touched, as also that which is heard, that which is thought of and that which is understood —these are the seven sorts of fuel for me That which smells, that which eats, that which sees, that which touches, that which sees, that which touches, that which hears, numbering the fifth, that which thinks, and that which understands —these are the seven great officiating priests

23—26 Mark O blessed one, learned sacrificers duly casting seven libations in seven ways in the seven fires, viz, that which is smelt, that which is drunk that which is seen that which is touched, as also that which is heard, that which is thought of, and that which is understood, create them in their own wombs Earth, Wind, Ether, Water, and Light numbering as the fifth, Mind and Understanding —these seven are called wombs (of all things) All the attributes which form the sacrificial offerings enter into the attribute that is born of the fire, and having lived within that dwelling become reborn in their respective wombs. There also viz, in that which generates all beings they remain absorbed during the period for which dissolution lasts.

27—28. From that is produced smell, from that is produced taste, from that is produced color, and from that is produced touch, from that is produced sound, from that originates doubt; and from that is produce a resolution. Thus is what is known as the sevenfold creation.

29 It is thus that all this was comprehended by the ancients. By the three full and final libations, the full become full with light.

CHAPTER XXI.

The Brahmana said:—

1. Regarding it is cited the following ancient story. Do you understand, of what kind the institution is of the ten Hotris (sacrificing priests).

2. The ear, the skin, the two eyes, the tongue, the nose, the two feet, the two hands, the genital organ, the lower duct, and speech,—these, O beautiful one, are the ten sacrificing priests.

3 Sound, touch, color, taste, scent, speech, action, motion, and the discharge of vital seed, of urine, and of excreta, are the ten libations.

4 The points of the compass, wind, Sun, Moon, earth, fire, Vishnu, Indra, Prajapati, and Mitra,—these, O beautiful one, are the ten (sacrificial) fires.

5—6. The ten organs (of knowledge and action) are the sacrificing priests. The libations, O beautiful one, are ten. The objects of the senses are the fuel that are thrown into these ten fires, as also the mind, which is the ladle, and the wealth (viz., the good and bad acts of the sacrificer.) What remains is the pure, highest knowledge. We have heard that all this universe was well differentiated (from knowledge)

7 All objects of knowledge are Mind Knowledge only perceives it. The Individual Soul, encased in subtle form, lives within the gross body that is produced by the vital seed.

8 The bearer of the body is the Garhapatya fire From that is produced another Mind is the Ahavaniya fire. Into it is poured the oblation.

9. From that was produced the Veda or Word) (then was born Mind), Mind (desirous of creation) sets itself on the Veda (or the Word) Then arises form or color) undistinguished by particular colors. It runs towards the Mind.

The Brahmana's wife said:—

10. Why did Word first arise and why did Mind arise afterwards, seeing that Word comes into being after having been thought upon by Mind?

11. Upon what authority can it be said that Mati (Prana) takes refuge in Mind. Why, again, in dreamless sleep, though separated from Mind, does not Prana apprehend (all objects)? What is that which controls it then?

The Brahmana said:—

12. The Apana air, becoming the lord, on account of such lordship over it, makes it at one with itself. That restrained motion of the Prana air has been said to be the motion of the mind. Hence the mind depends upon Prana.

13 But since you ask me a question about word and mind, I shall, therefore, describe to you a discourse between them.

14 Both Word and Mind, repairing to the Soul of matter, asked him,—Do you say who amongst us is superior. Do you, O powerful one, remove our doubt.

15 On that occasion, the holy one made this answer,—The mind undoubtedly (is superior)?—To him Word said,—I grant you the fruition of all your desires.

The Brahmana said:—

16 Know that I have two minds, immovable and movable. That which is immovable is, indeed, with me, the movable is in your dominion.

17 That mind is indeed called movable which, in the form of Mantra, letter, or voice, is referrible to your dominion. Hence, you are superior.

18. But since, coming of your own accord, O beautiful one, you enter into the engagement, therefore, filling myself with breath, I utter you.

19 The goddess Word used always to live between Prana and Apana. But, O blessed one, sinking into Apana, though urged upwards, on account of becoming dissociated from Prana, she ran to Prajapati and said,—Be pleased with me, O holy one.

20 Then Prana appeared, once more fostering Word. Hence, Word, encountering deep exhalation, never utters anything.

21. Word always comes as endued with utterance or unendued with it. Amongst those two, Word without utterance is superior to Word with utterance.

22. Like a cow having milk, she yields various kinds of meaning This one always gives the Eternal (viz, Emancipation), speaking of Brahma.

23 O you of beautiful smiles, Word is a cow, on account of her power which is both divine and not divine See the distinction of these two subtle forms of Word that flow.

The Bramana's wife said :—

24 What did the goddess of Word then say, formerly when, though moved by the wish to speak, speech could not come out?

The Brahmana said :—

25. The Word that is made in the body by Prana, then attains to Apana from Prana Then changed into Udana and coming out of the body, it covers all the quarters, with Vyana,

26. After that, she lives in Samana. Even thus did Word formerly speak. Hence Mind, on account of being immovable, is distinguished, and the goddess Word, on account of being movable, is also distinguished.

CHAPTER XXII.

(ANUGITA PARVA.)—

Continued.

The Brahmana said :—

1. Regarding it is cited the ancient story, O blessed one of what the institution is of the seven sacrificing priests.

2. The nose, the eye, the tongue, the skin, and the ear numbering the fifth, the mind, and the understanding —these are the seven sacrificing priests standing distinctly from one another.

3 Living in subtle space, they do not perceive one another. Do you, O beautiful one, know these sacrificing priests that are seven by their nature.

The Brahmana's wife said :—

4 How is it that living in subtle space, these do not perceive one another? What are their (respective) natures, O holy one? Do you tell me this, O lord.

The Brahmana said :—

5 Not knowing the qualities is ignorance, while knowledge of the qualities is knowledge. These seven never succeed in apprehending or knowing the qualities of one another.

6 The tongue, the eye, the ear too, the skin, the mind, and the understanding, do not succeed in apprehending smells It is the nose alone which apprehends them.

7. The nose, the eye, the ear too, the skin, the mind, and the understanding, never succeed in apprehending tastes. The tongue alone apprehends them.

8 The nose, the tongue, the ear also, the skin, the mind, and the understanding, never succeed in apprehending colors It is the eye alone which apprehends them.

9 The nose, the tongue, the eye too, the ear, the understanding, and the mind, never succeed in apprehending sensations of touch. It is the skin alone that apprehends them.

10. The nose, the tongue, the eye, the skin, the mind, and the understanding, never succeed in apprehending sounds It is the ear alone which apprehends them

11. The nose, the tongue, the eye, the skin, the ear, and the understanding, never succeed in appreheng doubt. It is the mind which apprehends it.

12. The nose, the tongue, the eye, the skin, the ear, and the mind, never succeed in apprehending determination. It is the understanding alone which apprehends it.

13 Regarding it is cited, O beautiful lady, this ancient discourse between the senses and the mind.

The Mind said :—

14—15 The nose does not smell without me (Without me) the tongue does not apprehend taste. The eye does not perceive color, the skin does not feel touch, the ear does not apprehend sound, when deprived of me I am the eternal and foremost one among all the elements.

16 It always occurs that without myself, the senses never shine, like habitations empty of inmates or fires whose flames have been quenched.

17. Without me, all creatures cannot apprehend qualities and objects, with even the senses exerting themselves, as fuel that is wet and dry cannot catch fire.

18 Hearing these words, the Senses said,—This what you think would be true, if, you could enjoy pleasures without either ourselves or our objects.

19—20 If, when we are no more, there be gratification and support of life, and a continuation of your enjoyments, then what you think would be true, or, if, when we are absorbed and objects are existing, you can't have your enjoyments by your desire alone, as truly as you have them with our help.

21. If, again, you consider your power over our objects to be always complete, do you then seize color by the nose, and taste by the eye.

22 Do you also take smells by the ear, and sensations of touch by the tongue Do you also take sounds by the skin, and likewise touch by the understanding.

23 The powerful do not acknowledge the control of any rules Rules exist only for the weak Do you seize enjoyments unenjoyed before, you should not enjoy what has been tasted before (by others)

24—25 As a disciple goes to a preceptor for the sake of the Shrutis, and then, having acquired the Shrutis, lives on their meaning, so do you regard as yours those objects which are shown by us past or future, in sleep or in wakefulness

26 Of creatures, again, who have little intelligence, when their mind becomes distracted and cheerless, life is seen to be upheld upon our objects discharging their functions

27 It is seen also that a creature after having made many purposes and indulged in dreams, when afflicted by the desire to enjoy, runs to objects of sense alone

28 One entering upon enjoyments depending on purposes alone and unconnected with actual objects of sense always meets with death upon the exhaustion of the vital airs like an enkindled fire upon the exhaustion of fuel

29 True it is that we have connections with our respective attributes, true it is, we have no knowledge of one another's attributes But without us you can have no perception. Without us no happiness can come to you.

CHAPTER XXIII

(ANUGITA PARVA.)—

Continued.

The Brahmana said —

1. Regarding it, O blessed lady, is cited the ancient story of what kind the institution is of the five sacrificing priests.

2 The learned know this to be a great principle that Prana and Apana and Udana and Samana and Vyana are the five sacrificing priests.

The Brahmana's wife said :—

3 I naturally believed that there are seven sacrificing priests Let the great principle be declared to me as to how, indeed, the number is five of the sacrificing priests

The Brahmana said :—

4 The wind nursed by Prana afterwards takes birth in Apana. The wind nursed in Apana then becomes developed into Vyana

5 Nursed by Vyana the wind is then developed into Udana Nursed in Udana, the wind is then generated as Samana

6 Those good beings formerly asked the first-born Grandfather, saying,—Do you say who amongst us is the foremost. He alone will be our chief.

—Brahman said :—

7 He upon whose extinction all the vital airs become extinct in the bodies of living creatures, he upon whose moving they move, is, indeed, the foremost. Do you go where you like.

—Prana said —

8 Upon my extinction all the vital airs become extinct in the bodies of living creatures Upon my moving they once more move. I am the foremost. See, I go into extinction.

The Brahmana said :—

9—10 Prana then became extinct and once more moved about Then Samana and Udana also, O blessed one, said these words,—You do not live here, pervading all this, as we do You are not the foremost amongst us, O Prana! (Only) Apana is under your dominion!—Prana then moved about, and to him Apana spoke.

—Apana said —

11. When I become extinct, all the vital airs become extinct in the bodies of living creatures When I move about, they again move about I am, therefore, the foremost See, I go into extinction.

The Brahmana said —

12 To Apana who said so both Vyana and Udana said —O Apana, you are not the foremost (Only) Prana is under your dominion

13 Then Apana began to move about. Vyana once more addressed him, saying,—I am the foremost of all. Listen, for what reason

14 When I become extinct, all the vital airs become extinct in the bodies of living creatures When I move about they once more move about I am (therefore) the foremost See I go into extinction.

The Brahmana said —

15—17 Then Vyana became extinct and once more began to move about At this, Prana and Apana and Udana and Samana addressed him, saying —You are not the foremost among us, O Vyana! (Only) Samana is under your dominion — Vyana then began to move about and Samana said to him —I am the foremost of you all! Listen, for what reason When I become extinct, all the vital airs become extinct in the bodies of living creatures When I begin to move about, they once more move about, Hence, I am the foremost See, I become extinct.

18 Then Samana began to move about To him Udana said —I am the foremost of all the vital airs Listen, for what reason.

19 When I become extinct, all the vital airs become extinct in the bodies of living creatures When I move about they once more move about Hence, I am the foremost Behold I become extinct.

20 Then Udana, after having become extinct began to once more move about. Prana and Apana and Samana and Vyana said to him —O Udana, you are not the foremost one among us. (Only) Vyana is under your dominion.

The Brahmana said:—

21 To them assembled together, the Lord of creatures Brahman said —Ye are all foremost and not foremost Ye are all gifted with the attributes of one another.

22 All are foremost in their own spheres, and all possess the attributes of one another!—The Lord of all creatures thus said to them, that were assembled together

23 There is one that is unmoving, and one that is moving On account of special attributes, there are five vital airs My own self is one That one accumulates into many forms

24 Becoming friendly to one another, and pleasing one another, depart in peace Blessings to ye, do ye uphold one another.

CHAPTER XXIV.

(ANUGITA PARVA.)—

Continued

The Brahmana said:—

1. Regarding it is cited the ancient discourse between Narada and the Rishi Devamata

Devamata said —

2 What, indeed, comes first into existence, of a creature that takes birth? Is it Prana, or Apana, or Samana o Vyana, or Udana?

Narada said —

3 By whatever the creature is created, that first comes to him which is other. The vital airs are to be known as existing in pairs viz, those which move transversely, upwards, and downwards

Devamata said —

4 By whom is a creature produced? Who (amongst) them comes first? Tell me what the pairs are of the vital airs, which move transversely, upwards, and downwards

Narada said:—

5 From wish originates Pleasure It also arise from sound It arises also from taste, it arises too from color

6 From the semen, united with blood, first originates Prana Upon the semen being modified by Prana flows Apana

7. Pleasure originates from the semen as well It arises from taste also This is the form (effect) of Udana Pleasure is produced from union

8—9 Semen is formed by desire From desire is produced the menstrual flow In the union of semen and blood generated by Samana and Vyana the pair that consists of Prana and Apana, enters moving transversely and upwards Vyana and Samana both form a pair which move transversely

10 Agni (fire) is all the celestials This is the teaching of the Veda The knowledge of Agni arises in a Brahmana, with intelligence

10 The smoke of that fire is of the form of Darkness The quality that is known by the name of Passion is in its ashes. The quality of goodness originates from that portion of the fire into which the oblation is poured

11. They who are conversant with sacrifices know that Samana and Vyana are from the quality of Goodness Prana and Apana are portions of the oblation (of clarified butter) Between them is the Fire

12 That is the excellent form (or seat) of Udana as the Brahmanas know Listen as I say which is distinct from the pairs

13 Day and Night form a pair Between them is the Fire That is the excellent seat of Udana as the Brahmanas know

14 The existent and the non existent form a pair Between them is the Fire That is the excellent seat of Udana as the Brahmanas know

15 First is Samana Then Vyana The latter's function is managed through it (vis, Samana) Then, secondly, Samana, once more comes to work.

16 Only Vyana exists for tranquillity Tranquillity is eternal Brahma This is the excellent seat of Udana as the Brahmanas know.

CHAPTER XXV.

(ANUGITA PARVA)—

Continued.

The Brahmana said:—

1. Regarding it is recited the ancient story of what the institution is of the Chaturhotra (sacrifice).

2 The ordinances are now being duly declared in full Listen to me, O fair lady, as I describe this wonderful mystery

3 The instrument, the action, the agent and liberation—these, O beautiful lady, are the four sacrificing priests by whom the universe is covered

4—7 Hear fully of causes The nose, the tongue, the eye the skin, the ear for the fifth the mind and the understanding—these seven should be understood as the causes of qualities. Smell taste, color, sound, touch, numbering the fifth, the objects of the mind, and the objects of the understanding—these are the seven causes of action He who smells, he who eats he who sees, he who speaks, he who hears, numbering the fifth, he who thinks, and he who understands,—these seven should be known as the causes of action. Endued with qualities, these enjoy their own qualities, agreeable or disagreeable.

8—9 As regards the soul that is destitute of qualities. These seven are the causes of Liberation. With them who are learned and gifted with sufficient understanding, the qualities, which are in the position of celestials eat the oblations each in its proper place, and according to what has been ordained The person who is shorn of learning, eating various kinds of food, becomes seized with the sense of egoism.

10. Digesting food for himself, he becomes ruined through the sense of egoism The eating of food that should not be eaten and the drinking of wine, ruin him

11 He destroys the food (he takes), and having destroyed that food he becomes destroyed himself. The learned man, however, gifted with power, destroys his food for reproducing it.

12—14 The minutest sin does not arise in him from the food he takes Whatever is thought of by the mind, whatever is uttered by words, whatever is heard by the ear, whatever is seen by the eye, whatever is touched by touch, whatever is smelt by the nose, form oblations of clarified butter which should all, after controlling the senses with the mind numbering the sixth, be poured into that fire of high merits which burns within the body, vis, the Soul.

15 The sacrifices formed by Yoga is going on as regards myself The spring whence that sacrifice proceeds is that which gives the fire of knowledge. The upward vital air Prana is the Stotra of that sacrifice. The downward vital air Apana is its Shastra The renunciation of everything is the excellent present of that sacrifice.

16 Consciousness, Mind, and Understanding, which are all Brahma, are its Hotri Adhwaryyu, and Udgatri. The Prashastri, his Shastra, is truth Cessation of separate existence (or Emancipation) is the Honorarium

17 People conversant with Narayana, recite some Richs on this subject Formerly animals were offered to the divine Narayana.

18 Then are sung some Samans There is an authority on this subject—O timid one, know that the divine Narayana is the Soul of all.

CHAPTER XXVI.

(ANUGITA PARVA.)—

Continued.

The Brahmana said:—

1 There is one Ruler There is no second beside him He who is Ruler lives in the heart. I shall speak now of him. Moved by Him, I move as directed like water along an inclined plane.

2. There is one Preceptor. There is no second but him. He lives in the heart, and of him I shall now speak. Instructed by that preceptor, all snakes in the world are always possessed of feelings of enmity.

3. There is one kinsman. There is no second except him. He lives in the heart of him I shall now speak. Instructed by him, kinsmen become possessed of kinsmen, and the seven Rishis, O son of Pritha, shine in the sky.

4. There is one dispeller. There is no second but him. He lives in the heart Of him I shall now speak. Having lived with that instructor, under the proper mode of living with an instructor, Shakra gained the sovereignty of all the worlds.

5. There is one enemy. There is no second but him He lives in the heart Of him I shall now speak Instructed by that preceptor all snakes in the world are always possessed of feelings of enmity.

6 Regarding it is cited the ancient story of the instruction of the snakes, the celestials, and the Rishis by the Lord of all creatures.

7—8 The celestials and the Rishis, the snakes and the Asuras, seated around the Lord of all creatures, asked him, saying,—Let that which is highly beneficial for us be said —To them who enquired about what is highly beneficial, the holy one uttered only the word Om, which is Brahma in one syllable Hearing this, they ran away in various directions.

9 Amongst them that thus ran in all directions from desire of self instruction the tendency for biting first arose in snakes

10. The tendency for ostentatious pride first arose in the Asuras. The celestials betook themselves to gifts, and the great Rishis to self-control.

11. Having gone to one teacher, and having been instructed (refined) by one word, the snakes the celestials, the Rishis and the Danavas, all betook themselves to various different dispositions.

12 It is that one who hears himself when speaking, and understands it duly O ice, again, is that heard from him when he speaks There is no second preceptor.

13 It is in obedience to his advice that action afterwards originates The instructor, the apprehender, the hearer, and the enemy, are placed within the heart.

14. By acting sinfully in the world it is he who becomes a person of sinful deeds By acting auspiciously in the world, it is he who becomes a person of auspicious deeds.

15 It is he who becomes a person of controlled conduct by becoming addicted to the pleasures of sense, moved by desire. It is he who becomes a Brahmacharin by always devoting himself to the control of his senses.

16 It is he, again, who casts off vows and actions and takes refuge on Brahma alone By moving in the world, identifying himself the while with Brahma, he becomes a Brahmacharin

17 Brahma is his fuel; Brahma is his fire; Brahma is his origin; Brahma is his water; Brahma is his preceptor; he is immerged in Brahma.'

18 Brahmacharyya is even so subtle, as understood by the wise Having understood it, they followed it, instructed by the Kshetrajna.

CHAPTER XXVII.

The Brahmana said:—

1—2 Having crossed that impassable fortress (of the world) which has purposes for its gadflies and mosquitoes, grief and joy for its cold and heat, heedlessness for its blinding darkness, cupidity and diseases for its reptiles, wealth for its one danger on the road, and lust and anger its robbers, I have entered the extensive forest (of Brahma)

The wife of the Brahmana said:—

3 Where is that foremost, O you of great wisdom? What are its trees? What are its rivers? What its mountains and hills? How far is that forest?

The Brahmana said:—

4 There exists nothing that is separate from it There is nothing more delightful than it There is nothing that is unseparated from it There is nothing more afflicting than it

5 There is nothing smaller than that. There is nothing huger than that There is nothing minuter than that. There is no happiness that can resemble it

6 Twice born persons, entering into it, at once get over both joy and sorrow. They (then) never stand in fear of any creature, nor does any creature stand in fear of them.

7 In that forest are seven large trees, seven fruits, and seven guests. There are seven hermitages seven (forms of) Yoga concentration, and seven (forms) of initiation. This is a description of that forest

8 The trees which stand filling that forest, yield excellent flowers and fruits of five colors.

9 The trees which stand there filling that forest yield flowers and fruits which are of excellent colors and which are, besides, of two kinds.

10 The trees which stand there filling that forest, yield fragrant flowers and fruits of two colors

11 The trees which stand there filling that forest, yield fragrant flowers and fruits of one color.

12 The two trees which stand filling that forest, produce many flowers and fruits which are of unmanifest colors

13 There is one fire here, possessed of a good mind That is connected with Brahman The five senses are the fuel here The seven forms of Liberation originating from them are the seven forms of Initiation The qualities are the fruits, and the guests eat those fruits

14 There, in various places the great Rishis accept hospitality When they, having been adored become annihilated, then another forest shines forth.

15 In that forest, Intelligence is the tree, Liberation is the fruit; Tranquillity is the shade of which it is possessed It *has knowledge for its resting house, con*tentment for its water, and the Kshetrajna for its sun.

16 Its end cannot be determined upwards downwards, or horizontally.

17 Seven females always live there, with faces downwards, endued with effulgence and the cause of generation They take up all the different tastes from all creatures, even as insconstancy sucks up truth.

18 In that itself live, and from that emerge, the seven Rishis who are crowned with ascetic success, having Vashishtha for their foremost 19 Glory, effulgence, greatness, enlightenment victory, perfection, and energy—these seven always follow this same like rays following the sun.

20 Hills and mountains also exist there, in a body, and rivers and steams carrying waters in their course, waters that are born of Brahma.

21 And there is a confluence also of rivers in the secluded spot for sacrifice, Hence those who are contented with their own souls proceed to the Grandfather

22 They whose wishes have been reduced, whose wishes have been directed to excellent vows, and whose sins have been consumed by penances merging themselves in their souls, succeed in attain-to Brahma

23 Tranquillity is lauded by those who are conversant with the forest of knowledge Keeping that forest in view, they take birth so as not to lose courage.

24 Such is that sacred forest that is understood by Brahmanas" and understanding it, they live as directed by the Kshetrajna.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

(ANUGITA PARVA)—

Continued.

The Brahmana said —

1 I do not smell scents I do not get tastes I do not see colors I do not likewise hear the various sounds Nor do I entertain purposes of any kind.

2 It is Nature which desires such objects as are liked; it is Nature which hates such objects as are disliked Desire and hatred originate from Nature like the upward and the downward vital airs when souls have entered animate bodies

3 Separated from them are others; in them are eternal dispositions, Yogins would see in the body the soul of all creatures Living in that, I am never attached to anything through desire and anger, and decrepitude and death.

4 Not having any desire for any object of desire and not having any hatred for any evil, there is no taint on my natures, as there is no taint of a drop of water on the lotus

5—6 Of this fixed (principle) which looks upon various natures they are fickle possessions Though actions are performed yet the collection of enjoyments does not attach itself to them, as the collection of rays of the sun does not attach to the sky Regarding it is recited an ancient discourse between an Adhwaryu and a Yati, Do you hear it, O glorious lady.

7 Seeing an animal sprinkled with water at a sacrifice, a Yati said to the Adhwaryu seated there these words in censure,—This is destruction of life.

8 To him the Adhwaryu replied,—This goat will not be destroyed. The animal meets with great good if the Vedic declaration on this subject be true.

9 That part of this animal which is of earth will go to earth That part of this one which is of water, will enter into water

10. His eye will enter the sun his ear will enter the various points of the horizon, his vital airs will enter the sky. I who follow the scriptures commit no sin.

The Yati said :—

11 If you see such good to the goat in this dissociation with (his) vital airs, then this sacrifice is for the goat. What need have you for it?

12. Let the brother, father, mother, and friend give you their approval in this Taking him (to them) do you consult them This goat is especially dependent.

13 You should see them who can give their consent in this After hearing their consent, the matter will become a worthy topic for consideration.

14 The vital airs of this goat have been made to return to their respective sources Only the inanimate body remains behind This is what I think.

15 Of those who wish to enjoy pleasure by means of the inanimate body (of an animal) which can be compared with fuel, the fuel (of sacrifice) is after all the animal himself.

16 Abstention from cruelty is the foremost of all duties This is the teaching of the elders We know that no cruel action should be done.

17 This is the proposition, viz.,—No destruction (of living creatures —If I say anything further, then various kinds of faulty actions are capable of being done by you

18 Always abstaining from cruelty to all creatures is what is lauded We establish this from what is directly perceptible We do not rely on what is beyond direct perception.

The Adhwaryu said :—

19—20 You enjoy the properties of smell which belong to the earth You drink the tastes which belong to water You see colors which belong to luminous bodies You touch the properties which originate from wind, you hear the sounds which originate from ether. You think thoughts with the mind. All these entities, you hold, have life.

21 You do not then abstain from taking life Really, you are engaged in slaughter. There can be no movement without destruction Or, what do you think, O twice-born one

The Yati said —

22 The Indestructible and the Destructible form the twofold manifestation of the soul Of these the Indestructible is existent The Destructible is said to be exceedingly non-existent

23—24 The vital air, the tongue, the mind, the quality of goodness along with the quality of passion, are all existent. Of him who is freed from these existent objects, who is above all pairs of opposites, who does not cherish any expectation, who is alike to all creatures, who is freed from the idea of mineness, who has governed himself, and who is released from all his surroundings, no fear exists from any source.

The Adhwaryu said :—

25. O foremost of intelligent men, one should live with the good Hearing your opinion my understanding shines with light.

26. O illustrious one I come to you, believing you to be a god, and I say I have no fault O twice-born one, by performing these rites with the help of Mantras

The Brahmana said —

27 With this conclusion, the Yati remained silent after this The Adhwaryu also went on with the great sacrifice, freed from delusion

28. The Brahmanas understand Liberation, which is exceedingly subtle, to be of this kind, and having understood it, they live accordingly, directed by the Kshetrajna, that seer of all topics.

CHAPTER XXIX.

The Brahmana said —

1. About it is cited the ancient story, O lady, of the discourse between Karttavirya and the Ocean.

2 There was a king named Karttavirya Arjuna who had a thousand arms. He conquered, with his bow, the Earth extending to the ocean.

7 We have heard that, once on a time, as he was walking on the shores of the sea, proud of his power, he showered hundreds of arrows on that vast receptacle of waters.

4. The Ocean, bowing down to him, said, with joined hands—Do not, O hero, discharged your arrows (at me)! Say, what shall I do to you.

5. With these strong arrows shot by you those creatures which have taken shelter in me are being killed, O foremost of kings! Do you, O lord, grant them security.

Arjuna said:—

6 If any holder of the bow exists that is equal to me in battle, and that would stand against me in the field, do you name him to me.

The Ocean said:—

7 If you have heard, O king, of the great Rishi Jamadagni, his son is competent to duly receive you as a guest.

8 Then that king proceeded, becoming highly irate. Arrived at that hermitage, he found Rama himself.

9 With his kinsmen he began to do many deeds while were hostile to Rama, and caused much trouble to that great hero

10 Then the energy, which was immeasurable, of Rama shone forth, burning the troops of the enemy, O lotus eyed one.

11. Taking up his battle-axe, Rama suddenly displayed his power, and hacked that thousand-armed hero, like a tree of many branches.

12 Seeing him killed and laid low on the earth, all his kinsmen, collected in a body, and taking up their darts rushed at Rama, who was then seated, from all sides

13 Rama also taking up his bow and quickly getting on his car, discharged showers of arrows and punished the army of the king.

14 Then, some of the Kshatriyas, stricken with the terror of Jamadagni's son, entered mountain fastnesses, like deer afflicted by the lion

15 Of them that were unable, through fear of Rama, to perform the duties ordained for their order, the progeny became Vrishalas owing to their inability to find Brahmanas

16 Thus the Dravidas and Abhiras and Pundras together with the Shavaras, became Vrishalas through those men who had Kshatriya duties assigned to them, falling away (from them)

17. Then the Kshatriyas that were begotten by the Brahmanas upon Kshatriya women who had lost their heroic children, were repeatedly destroyed by Jamadagni's son.

18—19 The destruction proceeded one and twenty times At its conclusion a bodiless voice, sweet and coming from the celestial region, and which was heard by all people, spoke to Rama,—O Rama, O Rama, stop! What merit do you see, O son, in thus destroying repeatedly these inferior Kshatriyas?

20 Thus, O blessed dame, his grandsires, headed by Richika, addressed that great one, saying,—Do you, desist.

21. Rama, however, unable to forgive the destruction of his father, replied to those Rishis, saying, you should not forbid me.

22. The departed manes then said,—O foremost of all victorious men, you should not kill these inferior Kshatriyas! It is not proper that your self being a Brahmana, should kill these kings.

CHAPTER XXX.

(ANUGITA PARVA)—

Continued.

The Pitris said:—

1. Regarding it is cited this old, history. Having heard it you should act according to it, O foremost of all twice born persons.

2 There was a royal sage, named of Alarka gifted with the austerest of penances. He knew all duties was truthful in speech, of high soul, and exceedingly firm in his vows Having with his bow, conquered the whole Earth extending to the seas and thereby performed a highly difficult feat, he set his mind on that which is subtle

4 While sitting at the root of a tree, his thoughts, O you of great intelligence, abandoning all those great deeds, turned towards that which is subtle!

Alarka said —.

5 My mind has become strong. Having conquered the mind one's conquest becomes permanent Though surrounded by enemies, I shall (henceforth) discharge my arrows at other objects

6 Since on account of its wastefulness, it sets all mortals to perform acts, I shall shoot very sharp pointed arrows at the mind!

The mind said :—

7. These arrows O Alarka, will never cut me through. They will pierce only your own vital parts Your vital parts being pierced, you shall die.

8 Do you look out for other arrows with which to kill me!—Hearing these words and and reflecting upon them, he said as follows.

Alarka said :—

9 Smelling many perfumes, (the nose) hankers after them only Hence I shall discharge whetted arrows at the nose.

The nose said :—

10 These arrows will never pass through me, O Alarka! They will pierce only your own vital parts and your vital parts being pierced, you shall die.

11 Do you look for other arrows with which to destroy me!—Hearing these words and thinking upon them, he said as follows.

Alarka said :—

12. This one enjoying "savoury" tastes, hankers after them only. Hence I shall discharge whetted arrows at the tongue.

The tongue said :—

13 These arrows, O Alarka, will not cut through me They will only pierce your own vital parts and your vital parts being pierced, you shall die.

14 Do you look for other arrows with which to kill me!—Hearing these words and thinking upon them, he said as follows.

Alarka said :—

15 The skin, touching various objects of touch, hankers after them only. Hence, I shall tear off the skin with various arrows equipt with the feathers of the Kanka.

The skin said :—

16 These arrows will not, O Alarka, pass through me They will pierce your own vital parts only, and your vital parts being pierced, you shall die.

17 Do you look for other arrows with which to kill me!—Hearing these words and thinking on them, he said as follows.

Alarka said :—

18 Hearing various sounds, (the ear) hankers after them only. Hence, I shall discharge whetted shafts at the ear.

The ear said :—

19 These arrows will not, O Alarka pass through me. They will pierce your own vital parts only, and your vital parts being pierced, you shall die.

20 Do you then look for other arrows with which to kill me!—Hearing these words and thinking upon them, he said as follows.

Alarka said :—

21 Seeing many colors, the eye longs for them only Hence, I shall destroy the eye with sharp-pointed arrows.

The eye said :—

22. These arrows will not, O Alarka, pass through me at all They will pierce your own vital parts only, and your vital parts being cut, you shall die.

23 Do you then look for other arrows with which to kill me!—Hearing these words and reflecting upon them, he said as follows.

Alarka said :—

24 This forms many determinations with the help of ratiocination Hence, I shall discharge whetted arrows at the understanding.

The understanding said :—

25 These arrows will not, O Alarka, pass through me at all They will pierce your vital parts only, and your vital parts being pierced, you shall die. Do you then look for other arrows with which to kill me.

The Brahmana said :—

26 Then Alarka, engaging himself, even there, on penances difficult to perform and greatly austere, failed to obtain, by the high power (of his penances) arrows for casting at these seven

27—28 Gifted with power, he then with mind well concentrated, began to reflect. Then, O best of twice born ones, Alarka, that foremost of intelligent men, having thought for a long time, could not obtain anything better than Yoga Setting his mind on one object he remained perfectly still, engaged in Yoga.

29 Gifted with energy, he speedily killed all the senses with one arrow, having entered by Yoga into his soul and thereby acquired the highest success.

30 Stricken with wonder, that royal sage then sang this verse Alas it is a pity that we should have performed all acts that are external.

31. Alas, that we should have, gifted with the thirst for enjoyment, courted sovereignty before now! I have learnt this afterwards! There is no happiness that is higher than Yoga

32 Do you know this O Rama! Cease to kill the Kshatriyas! Do you practise the austerest of penances! You will then attain to what is good 33 Thus addressed by his grandfathers Jamadagni's son performed the austerest penances and having practised them that highly blessed one acquired that success which is difficult to reach.

CHAPTER XXXI

(ANUGITA PARVA)—

Continued.

The Brahmana said —

1 There are three enemies in the world They are said to be ninefold, according to their qualities Exultation, satisfaction and joy,—these three qualities belong to Goodness

2 Cupidity, anger and hatred, these three qualities are said to belong Darkness. Lassitude, procrastination and delusion, these three qualities belong to Ignorance

3 Cutting these with showers of arrows, the intelligent man free from idleness possessed of a tranquil soul, and with his senses under control, ventures to defeat others

4 About it, persons conversant with ancient cycles recite some verses which were sung formerly by king Amvarisha who had acquired a tranquil soul

5 When various kinds of faults were reigning supreme and when the righteous were afflicted, the illustrious Amvarisha put forth his strength for assuming sovereignty.

6. Subduing his own faults and adoring the righteous, he acquired great success and sang these verses.

7 I have controlled many faults I have slain all enemies But there is one, the greatest, vice which deserves to be destroyed but which has not been destroyed by me

8 Urged by that fault, this individual soul fails to attain to freedom from desire Possessed by desire, one runs into ditches without knowing it

9 Urged by that fault one indulges in forbidden deeds Do you cut off, cut off, that cupidity with sharp edged swords

10 From cupidity originates desire. From desire originates anxiety The man who yields to desire acquires many qualities which belong to Darkness.

11 When these have been acquired he gets many qualities which belong to Ignorance

12 On account of the qualities, he repeatedly takes birth, with the fetters of body united and is moved to action Upon the expiration of life, with body becoming separated and scattered he once meets with death which is due to birth itself.

13 [illegible] duly understanding this, and governing cupidity by intelligence, one should desire for sovereignty in his soul This is (true) sovereignty There is no other sovereignty here. The soul properly understood, is the king

14 Even these were the verses sung by the illustrious king Amvarisha on the subject of sovereignty which he kept before him —that king who had severed the one foremost fault viz, cupidity.

CHAPTER XXXII.

(ANUGITA PARVA)—

Continued

The Brahmana said —

1. Regarding it is cited the old discourse between a Brahmana and (king) Janaka

2 King Janaka (on a certain occasion), desirous of punishing him said to a Brahmana who had become guilty of some offence —You shall not live within my dominions

3 Thus addressed, the Brahmana replied to that best of kings saying,—Tell me, O king, what the limits are of the territories subject to you

4 I wish, O lord, to live within the dominions of another king Indeed, I wish to obey your command, O king, according to the scriptures

5 Thus addressed by that celebrated Brahmana the king, hearing repeated and hot sighs, said not a word in reply.

6 Like the planet (Rahu) possessing the Sun, a cloudedness of understanding suddenly overwhelmed that king of incomparable energy as he sat plunged in thought.

7. When that cloudedness of understanding departed and the king became comforted, he spoke after a short time these words to that Brahmana.

Janaka said:—

8 Although a (large) inhabited dominion is subject to me within this ancestral kingdom of mine, yet I fail to find my dominion, searching through the whole Earth

9 When I could not find it on the Earth, I then searched Mithila (for it) When I could not find it in Mithila, I then searched for it among my own children.

10. When I could not find it even there, a cloudedness of understanding came over me After that cloudedness of understanding departed, intelligence came back to me

11 Then I thought that I have no dominion, or that everything is my dominion This body is not mine, or the whole Earth is mine.

12. At the same time, O best of twice-born persons, I think that that is as much mine as it is of others Do you, therefore, live (here) as long as your choice leads you and do you enjoy as long as you please

The Brahmana said:—

13 When there is a large inhabited tract in your ancestral kingdom, tell me, depending upon what understanding, has the idea of mineness been got rid of by you

14 What also is that understanding depending upon which you have come to the conclusion that everything forms your dominion? What, indeed, is the notion through which you have no dominion, or everything is your dominion?

Janaka said:—

15 All conditions here in all affairs, I understand, are liable to come to an end Hence, I could not find that which should be called mine,

16 (Considering) whose is this, I thought of the Vedic text about anybody's property I could not, therefore, find, through my understanding, what should be (called) mine.

17. Depending upon this notion, I got rid of the idea of mineness Hear now what that notion is depending upon which I arrived at the conclusion that I have dominion everywhere.

18 I do not wish for my own self those smells which are even in my nose Therefore, the earth, subjugated by me, is always under me

19 I do not wish for my own self those tastes which exist in contact with even my tongue Therefore, water, subjugated by me, is always under me.

20 I do not wish for my own self the color or light which belongs to my eye. Therefore, light subjugated by me, is always under me.

21. I do not wish for my own self those sensations of touch which are in contact with even my skin Therefore, the wind, subjugated by me, is always under me.

22 I do not wish for own self those sounds, which are in contact with even my ear. Therefore, sounds, subjugated by me, are always under me.

23 I do not wish for my own self the mind that is always in my mind. Therefore the mind, subjugated by me, is under me.

24 All these acts of mine are for the sake of the celestials, the departed manes, the Bhuttas, together with guests.

25 The Brahmana then, smiling, once more said to Janaka—Know that I am Dharma, who come here to day for examining you

26 You are indeed the one person for setting this wheel in motion,—this wheel that has the quality of Goodness for its circumference, Brahma for its nave, and the understanding for its spokes, and which never turns back!

CHAPTER XXXIII.

(ANUGITA PARVA.)—

Continued.

The Brahmana said —

1. I do not, O timid one, move in this world in the manner which you according to your own understanding, censure I am a Brahmana endued with Vedic knowledge. I am liberated I am a hermit, I follow the duties of a householder. I observe vows

2 I am not what you see me in good and bad deeds I pervaded everything that exists in this universe.

3 I am the destroyer of all creatures that exist in the world, mobile or immobile, as fire destroys all kinds of wood

4 Sovereignty over the whole Earth or over the Heaven can be compared with this knowledge of my oneness with the universe) This knowledge is my wealth.

5. This is the path for Brahmanas by which they who understand it proceed to destruction, or abide in the forest, or residence with preceptors, among medicaments.

6. When a person unconfused symbols, and one's mental faculties are fixed. Those who, without the symbols and marks of the world, they [illegible], have acquired an understanding having tranquillity and firmness, attain to that state in unity and various facets all meeting the Ocean.

7. His path can be trodden with the help of the understanding and not of the body. Actions have but the coming and end, and the body has actions for its fetters.

8. Hence, O blessed lady, you need have no fear at all in the world hereafter. With your heart intent upon the real object, it is my soul into which you will be received.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

The Brahmana's wife said:—

1. This cannot be understood by a weak-minded person as also by one whose soul has not been purified. My intelligence is very little and contracted, and confused.

2. Tell me the means by which the knowledge may be acquired. I wish to learn from you the source from which this knowledge comes.

The Brahmana's said:—

3. Know that intelligence about Brahma is the lower Arani, the preceptor is the upper Arani; penances and conversance with the scriptures are what make attrition. From this is originated the fire of knowledge.

The Brahmana's wife said:—

4. About this symbol of Brahma, which is designated Kshetrajna, where, indeed, is a description of it by which it is capable of being seized?

The Brahmana said:—

5. He is without symbols, and without qualities. Nothing exists that may be considered as his cause. I shall, however, tell you the means by which he can be apprehended or not.

6. A good means may be found, which is perceived as by bees. That means consists of an understanding purified by action. Those whose understandings have not been purified consider that entity, through their own ignorance, as invested with the properties of knowledge and others.

7. It is not that does that this should be done, or that this should not be done in the matter of acquiring knowledge. [illegible] that state, from the knowledge of the soul is gained only to him who sees and hears.

8. One's understanding has many parts, manifest and unmanifest by hundreds and thousands as one is capable of comprehending here.

9. Indeed, one should comprehend with one's perceptions signs, sounds, and all kinds of direct perception. Then will he rise from practice to that above which nothing exists.

The holy one said:—

10. Then the mind of that Brahmana's wife, upon the destruction of the Kshetrajna, became that which is beyond Kshetrajna, on account of the knowledge of Kshetra.

Arjuna said:—

11. Where, indeed, is that Brahmana's wife, O Krishna, and where is that foremost of Brahmanas, by both of whom was such success acquired. Tell me about them, O you of undecaying glory.

The blessed and holy one said:—

12. My mind is the Brahmana and that my understanding is the Brahmana's wife. He who has been spoken of as Kshetrajna is I myself, O Dhananjaya.

CHAPTER XXXV.

Arjuna said:—

1. You should explain Brahma to me,—that which is the highest object of knowledge. Through your favour my mind is delighted with these subtle disquisitions.

Vasudeva said:—

2. Regarding it is recited the old discourse between a preceptor and his disciple on the subject of Brahma.

3. Once on a time, O destroyer of enemies, an intelligent disciple questioned a certain Brahmana of rigid vows who was preceptor, as he was seated, saying,—What, indeed, is the highest good?

Rishis, gifted with humility, asked him this grave question about the highest good 30 How should a good man act? How would one be freed from sin? What paths are auspicious for us? What is truth, and what is sin?

31 By what action are the two paths, northern and southern, obtained? What is destruction? What, Liberation? What is birth and what death of all existent objects?

32 I shall tell you O disciple what the Grandfather, thus addressed said to them, according to the scriptures Do you listen

—Brahman said —

33 It is from Truth that all creatures, mobile and immobile have been born They live by penance (or action) Understand this, O ye of excellent vows! On account of their own actions they live, transcending their own origin

34 For Truth when united with qualities becomes always possessed of five marks Brahman is Truth. Penance is truth Prajapati is truth

35—37 It is from Truth that all creatures have originated Truth is the universe of being It is for this that Brahmanas who are always devoted to Yoga, who have got over anger and sorrow, and who always consider Religion as the causeway, take refuge in Truth I shall now speak of those Brahmans who are controlled by one another and endued with knowledge of the orders and of those who belong to the four modes of life

38 The wise say that Religion or duty is one, having four quarters Ye twice born ones I shall speak to you now of that path which is auspicious and yields good

39 That path has constantly been trod over by wise men in order to acquire an identity with Brahma I shall speak now of that path which is the highest and which is highly difficult of being understood

40 Do you understand, in all its fullness ye highly blessed ones what is the highest seat The first step has been said to be the mode of life that belongs to Brahmacharins

41 The second step is domesticity. After this is the residence in the forest After that it should be known is the highest step viz, that belongs to Adhyatma

42 Light ether, sun wind, Indra, and Prajapati —one sees these as long as one does not acquire Adhyatma.

43—44 I shall declare the means Do ye first understand them. The forest mode of life that is followed by ascetics living in the forest and subsisting upon fruits and roots and air is laid down for the three twice born classes The domestic mode of life is ordained for all the orders

45 The wise say that Religion or duty has Faith for its characteristic mark Thus have I declared to you the paths leading to the celestials They are adopted by the good and wise by their acts Those paths are the causeways of piety.

46 That person of rigid vows who follows any one of these modes separately, always succeeds in time to understand the production and destruction of all creatures

47 I shall now declare, accurately and with reasons the elements which live in parts in all objects.

48—49 The great soul, the unmanifest, egoism the eleven organs (of knowledge and action), the five great elements, the characteristics of the five elements —these form the eternal creation The number of elements has been said to be twenty four, and one (more).

50. That wise person who understands the production and destruction of all these elements that man among all creatures, never meets with delusion

51 He who understands the elements accurately, all the qualities all the celestials, succeeds in purifying himself of all sin. Freed from all fetters, such a man succeeds in enjoying all regions of spotless purity.

CHAPTER XXXVI.

(ANUGITA PARVA.)—

—Brahman said —

1 That which is unmanifest which is indistinct all prevading, everlasting, immutable should be known to become the city of nine portals, possessed of three qualities and consisting of five ingredients.

2 Encompassed by eleven including Mind which distinguishes (objects) and having Understanding for the ruler, this is an aggregate of eleven.

3 The three ducts that are in it, support it always These are the three Nadis. They run continually, and have the three qualities for their essence.

4. Ignorance, Darkness, and Goodness, hese are called the (three) qualities These ire connected with one another. They exist lepending on one another.

5 They take refuge in one another, and ollow one another. They are also joined vith one another. The five (principal) elements are marked by (these) three qualities.

6. Goodness is also the match of Ignorance Of Goodness the match is Darkness Goodness is also the match of Darkness, and of Goodness the match is Ignorance

7 There where Ignorance is restrained, Darkness is seen to flow There where Darkness is restrained, Goodness is seen to ow.

8 Darkness should be known to have the ight for its essence. It has three marks, nd is (otherwise) called Delusion It has sin lso for its mark, and it is always present in ll sinful deeds This is the nature of Ignorance and it appears also as confined with thers

9 Darkness is said to have activity for s essence It is the cause of successive leeds When it predominates, its mark, mong all beings, is production.

10 Splendour, lightness, and faith,— hese are the form, that is light, of Goodness mong all creatures, as considered by all ood men.

11. The true nature of their marks will ow be declared by me, with reasons These hall be stated in aggregation and separaon. Do ye understand them.

12—18 Complete delusion, Ignorance, liberality, indecision about action, sleep, aughtiness, fear, cupidity, grief, censure of ood deeds, loss of memory, unripeness of dgment, absence of faith, violation of all ules of conduct, want of discrimination, indness, vileness of conduct, boastful assertions of performance when there has been o performance, presumption of knowledge when there is ignorance unfriendliness (or hostility), evilness of disposition, absence of faith, stupid reasoning crookedness, incapacity for association, sinful action, senselessness stolidity lassitude, absence of self control degradation —all these qualities are known as belonging to Ignorance Whatever other states of mind, connected with delusion, exist in the world all belong to Ignorance, Frequent ill speaking of other people, censuring the celestials and the Brahmanas, illiberality vanity, delusion anger unforgiveness, hostility towards all creatures are considered as the characterestics of Ignorance

19. Whatever undertakings exist which are unmeritorious, what gifts there are which are unmeritorious, vain eating,— these also belong to Ignorance.

20. Indulgence in calumny, unforgiveness, animosity, vanity, and absence of faith are also said to be characteristics of Ignorance.

21. Whatever men there are in this world, who are characterised by these and other faults of a similar kind, and who break through the restraints are all considered as belonging to the quality o Ignorance.

22. I shall now declare the wombs where these men, who are always of sinful deeds, have to take their birth. Ordained to go to hell, they sink in the order of being. Indeed, they sink into the hell of the brute creation.

23—24 They become immobile entities, or animals, or beasts of burden, or carnivorous creatures, or snakes, or worms, insects and birds, or creatures of the oviparous order, or quadrupeds of various species, or lunatics, or deaf or dumb human beings, or men who are afflicted by dreadful maladies and considered as unclean.

25. These men of evil conduct, always show the marks of their deeds, sink in Ignorance. Their course is always downwards. Belonging to the quality of Ignorance, they sink in Ignorance.

26. I shall, after this, declare what the means are of their improvement and ascent, indeed, by what means they succeed in acquiring the regions which exist for men of pious deeds.

27—28 Those men who take birth in orders other than human beings, by growing up in view of the religious ceremonies of Brahmanas devoted to the duties of their own caste and desirous of doing good to all creatures succeed through the help of such purificatory rites, in ascending upwards. Indeed, struggling, they at last attain to the same regions with these pious Brahmanas Indeed they go to the celestial region This is the Vedic Shruti.

29 Born in orders other than humanity and growing old in their respective deeds, even thus they become human beings that are, of course, ordained to return

30—31 Coming to sinful births and becoming Chandalas or human beings that are deaf or who lisp indistinctly they attain to higher and higher castes, one after another in proper turn, getting above the Sudra order and other inconsequences of qualities which belong to Ignorance and who abide in it in course of migrations in this world.

32 Attachment to objects of desire is considered as great delusion. Here Rishis and Munis and celestials become deluded, desirous of pleasure.

33 Ignorance, delusion, the great delusion, the great obscurity called anger, and death, that blinding obscurity. As regards anger, that is the great obscurity.

34. With respect then to its color, its characteristics, and its source, I have, ye learned Brahmanas, declared to you, accurately and in due order, everything, about Ignorance.

35. Who is there that truly gets over it? Who is there who truly sees it? That, indeed, is the characteristic of Ignorance, viz, the seeing of reality in what is not real.

36. The qualities of Ignorance have been declared to you in various ways Duly has Ignorance, in its higher and lower forms been described to you. That man who always bears in mind the qualities mentioned here will surely succeed in becoming freed from all marks which belong to Ignorance.

CHAPTER XXXVII.

Brahman said.—

1. Ye best of beings, I shall now declare to you accurately what (the quality of) Darkness is. Ye highly blessed ones do you understand what those qualities are that belong to Darkness.

2—14 Injuring (others), beauty, toil pleasure and pain cold and heat, lordship (or power), war, peace, argument, dissatisfaction, endurance, power, valour, pride, anger, exertion, quarrel (or collision) jealousy, desire, malice, battle, the sense of mineness, protection (of others) destruction fetters and affliction, buying and selling, lopping off cutting, piercing, and cutting off the coat of mail that another has worn, fierceness, cruelty, vilifying, pointing out the faults of others, thoughts entirely devoted to wordly affairs, anxiety, animosity, vilification of others, false speech, false or vain gifts hesitancy and doubt, boastfulness of speech dispraise and praise, laudation, prowess, defiance, attendance, obedience, service or ministrations, harbouring of thirst or desire, cleverness or dexterity of conduct, policy, carelessness, contumely, possessions, and various decorations which prevail in the world among men, women, animals, inanimate things, houses, grief, incredulousness, vows and regulations, actions with expectation (of good results) various acts of public charity, the rites of Swaha, salutations, rites of Swadha and Vashat, officiating at the sacrifices of others, imparting of instruction, performance of sacrifices, study, making of gifts, acceptance of gifts, rites of expiation, auspicious acts, the wish to have this and that, affection caused by the merits of the object for which or whom it is felt, treachery deception, disrespect and respect, theft, killing, desire of concealment, vexation, wakefulness, ostentation, pride, attachment, devotion, contentment, exultation, gambling, indulgence in scandal, all relations arising out of women attachment to dancing, instrumental music, and songs,—all these qualities, ye learned Brahmanas, have been said to belong to Rajas or Darkness.

15. Those men on Earth who meditate on the past, present, and the future, who are devoted to the threefold objects of life, viz, Religion, Profit, and Pleasure, who, acting from the impulse of desire, exult on acquiring riches in respect of every desire, are said to be covered by Darkness. These men have downward courses.

17. Repeatedly reborn in this world, they addict themselves to pleasure. They covet what belongs to this world as also all those fruits of the world to come They make gifts, accept gifts offer oblations to the departed manes, and pour libations on the sacrificial fire.

18 The qualities of Darkness have (thus) been declared to you in their manifold aspects The course of conduct also to which it leads has been properly described to you The man who always understands these qualities, succeeds in always liberating himself from all of them which belong to Darkness.

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

Brahman said.—

1. I shall, after this, describe to you that excellent quality which is the third. It is beneficial to all creatures in the world, and unblamable, and forms the conduct of the good.

2—3 Joy, satisfaction, nobility, enlightenment, and happiness, absence of stu gi-ness, absence of fear, contentment, disp st-tion for faith, forgiveness, courage, abstention from injuring any creature, equability, truth, straightforwardness absence of anger, absence of malice, purity, cleverness, prowess, belong to the quality of Goodness.

4. He who is devoted to the duty of Yoga, considering knowledge to be vain conduct to be vain, service to be vain, and mode of life to be vain, attains to what is highest in the next world.

5 Freedom from egoism, freedom from expectations, looking on a l impartially, and freedom from desire,—these form the eternal religion of the good.

6—9 Confidence, modesty, forgiveness, renunciation, p rity, absence of laziness absence of cruelty, absence of delusion mercy to all creatures, absence of the disposition to calumniate, exultation, satisfaction, rapture, humility, good conduct, purity in all acts having for their object the attainment of tranquility, righteous understanding, liberation, indifference, celibacy, complete renunciation freedom from the idea of mineness, freedom from expectations, unbroken observance of virtue, belief that gifts are vain, sacrifices are vain study is vain vows are vain acceptance of gifts is vain, observance of duties is vain, and penances are vain

10 Those Brahmanas in this world, whose conduct is marked by these virtues who follow virtue, who abide in the Vedas, are said to be wise and possessed of correctness of vision.

11. Freed from sins and grief, those wise men attain to the celestial region and create various bodies (for themselves)

12 The power of governing everything, self-control minuteness, these great ones make by operations of their own mind like the gods themselves living in the celestial region.

13. Such men are said to have their courses directed upwards They are veritable gods capable of modifying all things Attaining to the celestial region, they modify all things by their very nature.

14 They get whatever objects they desire and enjoy th em Th is have I ye lo emost of twice-born ones, described to you what that conduct is which belongs to the q ality of goodness. Understanding these duly, one acquires whatever objects one desires 15 The qualities which belong to goodness have been declared particularly. The conduct which those qualities form, has also been properly described. That man who always understands these qualities, succeeds in enjoying the qualities without being attached to them.

CHAPTER XXXIX.

(ANUGITA PARVA)—
Continued.

Brahman said:—

1. The qualities are incapable of being described as completely separate from one anoth er. Darkness and Goodness and Ignorance are seen ex sting in a state of unison.

2 They are attached to one another. They depend on one another. The have one another for their support. They likewise follow one another.

3 As long as goodness exists, so long does Darkness exist. There is no doubt in this As long as Ignorance and Goodness exist, so long does Darkness exist.

4 They travel together, in union and moving collectively. They move i a body, when they act with cause or without cause.

5 Of all these which work with one another however much they may differ in their developemen , the manner in which the r increase and diminution take place will now be described

6 There where Ignorance exists in an increased measu re, in the lower creatures (for examp le) Darkness exists in a smaller measure and Goodness in a still lesser degree

7 There where Darkness predominates, in creatures of mid lle course, Ignorance exists in a sm aller measure and Goodness in a still smaller quantity.

8 There where G odness predominates in creatures of upward c urse Ignorance should be known to ex st in a smal measur, and D ness in a still lesser qua tity.

9 Goodness is the spring w ich causes the modifications of the sens Es It is, again th e great enlightener. No duty has been laid down that is higher than Goodness

10. They who abide in 'Go dness proceed upwar ds They who abide in Darkness remain in the middle. Th ey who abide in Ignorance being characterised by qua'ities that are low, sink downwards.

11. Ignorance is in the Shudra, Darkness in the Kshatriya, and Goodness, which is the highest, in the Brahmana. The three qualities exist thus in the three castes.

12 From a distance, the three qualities of Goodness, Darkness and Ignorance, are seen to exist in a state of union and more collectively. They are never seen in a state of separation.

13 Seeing the Sun rising, men of evil deeds become filled with fear. Travellers on their way become afflicted with heat, and suffer distress.

14. The Sun is Goodness developed; men of evil deeds represent Ignorance, the heat which travellers on their way feel, is said to be a quality of Darkness

15. The Sun representing light is Goodness, the heat is the quality of Darkness, the shading (or eclipse) of the Sun on Parvan days, should be known to represent Ignorance

16 Thus, the three qualities exist in all luminous bodies They act by turns in various places in various ways.

17 Among immobile objects, the quality of Ignorance predominates The qualities belonging to Darkness are those properties of theirs which suffer constant changes Their oleaginous qualities belong to Goodness

18 The Day should be understood as threefold. The Night has been ordained to be threefold So also are fortnights, months, years, seasons, and conjunctions

19 The gifts are threefold Threefold is sacrifice Threefold are the worlds, threefold the celestials, threefold is knowledge, and threefold the path or end

20 The Past the Present, and the Future, Religion Profit and Pleasure Prana, Apana, and Udana, these also are permeated by the three qualities

21. Whatever object exists in this world, everything in it, is fraught with the three qualities The three qualities act by turns in all things and in all circumstances

22 Indeed the three qualities always act in an unmanifest form The creation of those three, viz, Goodness, Darkness and Ignorance is eternal.

23—24. The unmanifest, consisting of the three qualities, is said to be darkness, unperceived, holy, constant, unborn, womb, eternal Nature, change or modification, destruction, Pradhana, production and absorption undeveloped, not small (i.e, vast), unshaking immovable, fixed, existent and non existent.

25 All these names should be known by those who meditate on matters about the soul

26 That person who accurately knows all the names of the unmanifest, and the qualities, as also the pure actions, well conversant with the truth about all distinctions and freed from the body, becomes emancipated from all the qualities and enjoys absolute happiness.

CHAPTER XL.

(ANUGITA-PARVA)—

Continued.

Brahman said:—

1 From the unmanifest first originated the Great Soul, gifted with great intelligence the source of all the qualities That is said to be the first creation

2—3 The Great Soul has these synonymous words—the Great Soul, Intelligence, Vishnu, Jishnu Shambhu of great valour, the Understanding, the means of acquiring knowledge, the means of perception as also fame courage, and memory. Knowing this, a learned Brahmana has never to meet with delusion.

4 It has hands and feet on every side. It has ears on every side It pervades every thing in the universe.

5 Of great power, that Being is stationed in the heart of all Minuteness Lightness and Affluence, are his. He is the Lord of all, and at one with effulgence, and knows not decay.

6—7 In Him are all those who comprehend the nature of the understanding, all those who are devoted to goodness of disposition, all those who practise meditation who are always devoted to Yoga, who are firm in truth, who have governed their senses who are gifted with knowledge, who are freed from cupidity, who have conquered anger, who are of cheerful hearts, who are gifted with wisdom, who are liberated from ideas of mine and thine, and who are devoid of egoism

8 All these, shorn of all attachments attain to the status of Greatness. That person who understands that holy and high goal, viz, the Great Soul, becomes freed from delusion.

9 The self create Vishnu becomes the Lord in the primary creations. He who thus knows the Lord lying in the cave the Supreme, Ancient Being, of universal form, the golded one, the highest goal of all persons gifted with understanding,—that intelligent man lives, transcending the understanding.

CHAPTER XLI.

Brahman said:—

1. That Mahat or principle of greatness who was first produced is called Egoism. When, it originated as I, it came to be called as the second creation.

2. That Egoism is said to be the source of all creatures, for these have originated from its modifications It is pure effulgence and is the supporter of consciousness. It is Prajapati

3 It is a deity, the creator of deities, and of mind. It is that which creates the three worlds It is said to be that which feels—I am all this

4 That is the eternal world existing for those sages who are contented with knowledge about the soul, who have meditated on the soul, and who have acquired success by Vedic study and sacrifices

5 By consciousness of soul one enjoys the qualities That source of all creatures, that creator of all creatures, creates thus It is that which causes all changes It is that which causes all beings to move. By its own light it lights up the universe likewise.

CHAPTER XLII.

Brahman said:—

1. From Egoism were, indeed, born the five great elements They are earth, air, ether, water, and light numbering the fifth

2 In these five great elements, as the matter of the operations of sound, touch, colour, taste, and smell, all creatures become deluded.

3 When at the close of the destruction of the great elements, the dissolution of the universe comes, O wisemen, a great fear possesses all living creatures.

4. Every existent object is dissolved into that from which it is produced. The dissolution takes place in an order that is the reverse of that in which creation occurs. Indeed, as regards birth, they are born from one another.

5 Then, when all existent objects, mobile and immobile, become dissolved, wise men possessed of a powerful memory never dissolve.

6 Sound, touch, colour, taste, and smell numbering the fifth, are effects They are, however, inconstant, and called by the name of delusion.

7—9 Generated by the production of cupidity, not different from one another, without reality, connected with flesh and blood, and depending upon one another, existing outside the soul, these are all helpless and powerless Prana and Apana, and Udana and Samana and Vyana —these five vital airs are always closely attached to the soul. Together with speech, mind, and understanding, they form the universe of eight ingredients.

10—11. He whose skin, nose ear, eyes, tongue, and speech are controlled, whose mind is pure, and whose understanding deviates not (from the right path), and whose mind is never burnt by those eight fires, succeeds in acquiring that auspicious Brahma than which nothing superior exists.

12 I shall now, O twice-born ones, mention particularly, those which have been called the eleven organs and which have originated from Egoism

13 They are the ear, the skin the two eyes, the tongue, the nose for the fifth, the two feet, the lower duct, the organ of generation, the two hands, and speech forming the tenth.

14. These form the group of organs, with mind numbering as the eleventh. One should first subdue this group. Then will Brahma shine forth (in him).

15 Five amongst these are called organs of knowledge, and five, organs of action. The five beginning with the ear are connected with knowledge.

16 The rest, however, which are connected with action, are without distinction. The mind should be considered as belonging to both The understanding is the twelfth in the top.

17. Thus have been enumerated the eleven organs in due order Learned men, having understood these, think they have done everything.

18 I shall, after this, enumerate all the various organs Space (or Ether) is the first. As connected with the soul, it is called the ear.

19 As connected with objects it is sound The presiding deity (of this) is the quarters The Wind is the second As connected with the soul, it is known as the skin.

20. As connected with objects, it is known as objects of touch, and the presiding deity there is touch The third is said to be Light As connected with the soul, it is known as the eye.

21. As connected with objects it is color, and the sun is its deity The fourth shou'd be known as Water. As connected with the soul, it is said to be the tongue.

22. As connected with objects, it is taste, and the presiding deity there is Soma The fifth is Earth. As connected with the soul, it is said to be the nose.

23 As connected with objects it is scent, and the presiding deity there is the wind Thus has the manner been described of how the five entities are divided into sets of three

24 After this I shall describe everything about the various (other) organs Brahmanas knowing the truth say that the two feet are mentioned as connected with the soul

25 As conneced with objects, it is motion; and Vishnu is there the presiding deity The Apana air, whose motion is downward, as connected with the soul, is called the lower duct

26 As connected with objects, it is the excreta that is ejected, and the presiding deity there is Mitra As connected with the soul, the organ of generation is mentioned, the producer of all beings.

27 As connected with objects, it is the vital seed, and the presiding deity is Prajapati The two hands are mentioned as connected with the soul by persons knowing the relations of the soul

28. As connected with objects, it is actions, and the presiding deity there is Indra Next, connected with the soul is speech which relates to all the celestials.

29 As connected with objects, it is what is spoken. The presiding deity there is Agni. As connected with the soul, the mind is mentioned, which moves within the soul of the five elements.

30 As connected with objects, it is the mental operation, and the presiding deity is the moon As connected with the soul is Egoism, which is the cause of the entire course of worldly life.

31 As connected with objects, it is consciousness of self, and the presiding deity there is Rudra. As connected with the soul is the understanding, which moves the six senses

32 As connected with objects, it is that which is to be understood, and the presiding deity there is Brahman. Three are the seats of all existent objects A fourth is not possible.

33 These are land, water, and ether. The birth is fourfold Some are born of eggs, some are born of germs which spring upwards, passing through the earth, some are born of filth, and some are born of fleshy balls in wombs.

34 Thus the birth of all living creatures is of four kinds Now, there are other inferior beings and likewise those which range the sky

35 These should be known to be born of eggs as also those which crawl on their breasts Insects are said to be born of filth as also other creatures of a like description.

36—40 This is said to be the second mode of birth and is inferior. Those living creatures which take birth after the lapse of sometime bursting through the earth, are said to be germ born beings, O foremost of twice-born persons! Creatures of two feet or of many feet, and those which move crookedly, are the beings born of wombs. Among them are some which are deformed, ye best of men! The eternal womb of Brahma should be known to be of two kinds, viz., penance and meritorious acts Such is the doctrine of the learned Action should be understood to be of various kinds, such as sacrifice, gifts made at sacrifices, and the meritorious duty of study for every one that is born, such is the teaching of the ancients He who duly understands this, comes to be considered as possessed of Yoga, ye chief of twice born persons

41. Know also that such a man becomes freed too from all his sins. I have thus described to you duly the doctrine of spiritual science.

42 Ye Rishis knowing all duties, a knowledge of this is gained by those who are considered as persons of knowledge. Uniting all these together, viz., the senses, the objects of the senses, and the five great elements, one should keep them in the mind.

43 When everything is immersed in the mind one no longer regards highly the pleasures of life Learned men, whose understandings are furnished with knowledge, consider that as true happiness

44 I shall, after this, tell you of renunciation about all entities by means gentle and hard, which produces attachment to subtle topics and which is fraught with auspiciousness.

45 That conduct which consists in treating the qualities as not qualities which is shorn of attachment, which is living alone, which does not recognise distinctions, and which is full of Brahma, is the root of all happiness.

46 The learned man who takes all desires into himself from all sides like the tortoise withdrawing all its limbs, who is devoid of passion, and who is freed from everything, becomes always happy.

47. Controlling all desires within the soul, killing his thirst, concentrated in meditation, and becoming the friend of good heart towards all creatures he succeeds in becoming fit for assimilation with Brahma.

48 Through suppression of all the senses which always hanker after their objects, and abandonment of inhabited places, the spiritual fire blazes forth in the man of contemplation.

49 As a fire, fed with fuel, becomes bright on account of the burning flames it puts forth, so, on account of the repression of the senses, the great soul puts forth its effulgence.

50 When one with a tranquil soul sees all entities in his own heart, then, lighted by his own effulgence, one attains to that which is subtler than the subtle and which is peerless in excellence.

51—53 It is settled that the body has fire for color, water for blood and other liquids, wind for sense of touch, earth for the hideous holder of mind (viz, flesh and bones, etc.), space (or ether) for sound; that it is pervaded by disease and sorrow, that it is overwhelmed by five currents, that it is made up of the five elements, that it has nine doors and two deities, that it is full of passion, that it is unfit to be seen, that it made up of three qualities, that it has three elements (viz, wind bile, and phlegm), that it is delighted with attachments of every kind, that it is full of delusion.

54 It is difficult of being moved in this mortal world, and it rests on the understanding as its stay That body is, in this world, the wheel of Time that is continually revolving.

55 That (body), indeed, is a terrible and unfathomable ocean and is called delusion It is this body which stretches forth, contracts, and awakens the universe with the immortals.

56 By controlling the senses, one renounces lust anger, fear, cupidity, enmity, and falsehood which are eternal and, therefore, highly difficult to renounce.

57 He who has controlled these in this world, viz, the three qualities and the five elements of the body, has the Highest for his seat in the celestial region. By him is Infinity attained

58 Crossing the river which has the five senses for its steep banks, the mental inclinations for its powerful waters, and delusion for its lake, one should control both lust and anger.

59 Such a man, freed from all faults, then sees the Highest, concentrating the mind within the mind and seeing self in self.

60 Understanding all things, he sees his self, with self, in all creatures, sometimes as one and sometimes as various, changing form from time to time

61. Forsooth, he can perceive numerous bodies like a hundred lights from one light. Indeed, he is Vishnu, and Mitra, and Varuna and Agni, and Prajapati.

62 He is the Creator and the ordainer; he is the powerful Lord, with faces turned in all directions In him, the heart of all creatures, the great soul, becomes resplendent.

63 All the learned Brahmanas, celestials, Asuras, Yakshas, Pishachas, the departed manes, birds, Rakshasas, goblins, and all the great Rishis, laud Him.

CHAPTER XLIII.

(ANUGITA PARVA.)—

Continued.

Brahman said:—

1—2 Among men, the royal Kshatriya is gifted with the middle quality. Among vehicles, the elephant (is so), and among dwellers of the forest the lion, among all (sacrificial) animals, the sheep, among all those that live in holes, is the snake, among cattle, the bull, among females, the male

3 There is no doubt in this that in this world, the Nyagrodha, the Jamvu, the Pippala, the Shalmali, the Shimshapa, the Meshashringa, and the Kichaka, are the foremost ones among trees

4—5 Himavat, Paripatra, Sahya, Vindhya, Trikutavat, Shweta Nila, Bhasa, Koshthavat, Guruskandha, Mahendra, and

Malyavat,—these are the foremost of mountains Likewise the Maruts are the foremost of the Ganas

6 The Sun is the lord of all the planets, and the Moon of all the constellations Yama is the lord of the departed manes; Ocean is the lord of all rivers.

7. Varuna is the king of the waters Indra is said to be the king of the Maruts Arka is the king of all hot bodies, and Indra of all luminous bodies.

8. Agni is the eternal lord of the elements, and Vrihaspati of the Brahmanas Soma is the lord herbs, and Vishnu is the foremost of all that are gifted with might.

9 Tashtri is the king of Rudras, and Shiva of all creatures Sacrifice is the foremost of all initiatory rites, and Maghavat of the celestials.

10. The North is the lord of all the points of the compass, the energetic Soma is the lord of all learned Brahmanas Kuvera is the lord of all precious gems, and Purandara of all the celestials.

11. Such is the highest creation among all entities. Prajapati is the lord of all creatures. Of all entities whatever, I, who am full of Brahma, am the foremost.

12. There is no entity that is higher than myself or Vishnu. The great Vishnu, who is full of Brahma, is the king of kings over all Know him to be the king, the creator, the uncreated Hari.

13 He is the ruler of men and Kinnaras and Yakshas and Gandharvas, and snakes and Rakshasas, and celestials and Danavas and Nagas.

14 Among those that are followed by persons full of desire is the great goddess Maheswari having beautiful eyes

15 She is otherwise called by the name of Parvati. Know that the goddess Uma is the foremost and the most auspicious of women. Among women who are a source of pleasure, the foremost are the Apsaras who are endued with great splendour.

16. Kings are desirous of acquiring piety, and Brahmanas are causeways of piety. Therefore, the king should always strive to protect the twice born ones.

17 Those kings in whose kingdoms good men languish are considered as bereft of the virtues of their order. Hereafter they have to go into wrong paths.

18. Those kings in whose territories good men are protected, rejoice in this world and enjoy happiness in the next.

19 Indeed, those great ones attain to the highest seat. Understand this, ye foremost of twice born ones! I shall after this describe the eternal characteristics of duties.

20 Abstention from injury is the highest duty. Injury is a mark of sin. Splendour is the mark of the deities. Men have acts for their characteristics.

21 Ether (or space) has sound for its characteristic. Wind has touch for its characteristic. The characteristic of luminous bodies is color, and water has taste for its characteristic

22. Earth, which holds all entities, has smell for its characteristic. Speech has words for its characteristic, refined into vowels and consonants.

23 Mind has thought for its characteristic. Thought has, again, been said to be the characteristic of the understanding. The things thought of by the mind are determined with accuracy by the understanding.

24. There is no doubt in this, viz, that the understanding, by perseverance, perceives all things. The characteristic of mind is meditation The characteristic of the good man is that he does not allow his acts to be noticed.

25. Devotion has acts for its characteristic Knowledge is the characteristic of renunciation. Therefore, keeping knowledge before his view, the man of understanding should practise renunciation.

26. The man who follows renunciation and who is endued with knowledge, who is above all pairs of opposites, as also darkness, death, and decrepitude, attains to the highest goal.

27. I have thus described to you duly what the characteristics are of duty. I shall, after this tell you of the comprehension of qualities

28 Smell, which belongs to earth, is seized by the nose The wind which dwells in the nose is likewise appointed (as an agent) in the perception of smell

29 Taste is the essence of water. That is perceived by the tongue. Soma, who lives in the tongue, is appointed likewise in the perception of taste.

30. The quality of a lighted body is color. That is apprehended by the eye. Aditya who always lives in the eye has been appointed in the perception of color.

31. Touch always belongs to the wind (as its quality). That is perceived by the skin. The wind that always lives in the skin has been appointed in apprehending touch.

32 The quality of a ether is sound. That is seized by the ear. All the quarters, which live in the ear, have been appointed in apprehending sound

33 The quality of the mind is thought That is seized by the understanding. The upholder of consciousness, living in the heart, has been appointed in apprehending the mind

34 The understanding is apprended in the form of determination or certitude, and principle of Greatness in the form of knowledge The unperceived (Nature) has been, it is evident, appointed for the seizure of all things after certitude. There is no doubt in this

35 The Kshetrajna which is eternal and is shorn of qualities about its essence, is incapable of being seized by symbols Hence, the characteristic of the Kshetrajna, which is without symbols, is purely knowledge

36 The unmanifest lives in the symbol called Kshetra, and is that in which the qualities are produced and absorbed I always see, know, and hear it (though) it is hidden.

37 Purusha knows it, therefore is he called Kshetrajna The Kshetrajna perceives also the actions of the qualities and absence of their actions.

38 The qualities which are created repeatedly, do not know themselves being unintelligent, as entities to be created and gifted with a beginning, middle, and end.

39 No one else, but the Khsetrajna, comes by that which is the highest and great and which is above the qualities and those entities which are born of the qualities

40 Hence, one who understands duties, renounces qualities and the understanding and having his sins destroyed, and transcending the qualities, enters the Kshetrajna

41 One who is free from all pairs of opposites who never bends his head to any one who is divested of Swaha who is immovable, and Homeless, is the Kshetrajna He is the Supreme Lord.

CHAPTER XLIV.

(ANUGITA PARVA.)—
Continued.

Brahmana said —

1. I shall now tell you truly about all that which has a beginning, middle, and end, and which has name and characteristics, together, the means of apprehension.

2 It has been said that the Day came first. Then came Night The Months are said to have the lighted fortnights first. The constellations have Shrávaná for their first, the Seasons have that of dews (viz., Winter) for their first.

3 Earth is the source of all smells, and Water of all tastes. The solar light is the source of all colours, the wind of all sensations of touch

4 Likewise of sound the source is space (or Ether) These are the qualities of elements I shall, after this, describe that which is the first and the highest of all entities.

5 The sun is the first of all luminous bodies Fire is said to be the first of all the elements Savitri is the first of all branches of learning. Prajapati is the first of all the celestials

6 The syllable Om is the first of all the Vedas, and the vital air Prana is the first of all winds Savitri is the first of all religious observances

7 The Gayatri is the first of all metres. goat is the first of all (sacrificial) animals, Kine are the first of all quadrupeds. The twice born ones are the first of all human beings

8 The hawk is the first of all birds. Of sacrifices the first is the pouring of clarified butter on the fire Of all reptiles the first O foremost of twice-born ones, is the snake

9 The Krita is the first of all the cycles, there is no doubt in this Gold is the first of all precious things

10 Barley is the first of all plants Food is the first of all things to be eaten or swallowed Water is the first of all liquid substances to be drunk

11 Of all immovable objects without distinction Plaksha is said to be the first, that ever holy field of Brahman.

12 Of all the Prajapatis I am the first. There is no doubt in this Of inconceivable soul the self existent Vishnu is said to be my superior.

13 Of all the mountains the great Meru is said to be the first-born Of all the cardinal and subsidiary points of the horizon the eastern is said to be the foremost and first-born

14 Ganga having three courses is said to be first born of all rivers Likewise, of all wells and reservoirs of waters, the ocean is said to be the first born.

15 Ishwara is the Supreme Lord of all the celestials and Danavas and ghosts and Pishachas and snakes and Rakshasas, and human beings and Kinnaras and Yakshas.

16 The great Vishnu, who is full of Brahma, than whom there is no higher being in the three worlds, is the first of all the universe

17 Of all the modes of life, that of the householder is the first. Of this there is no doubt The Unmanifest is the source of all the worlds as well as is the end of every thing.

18 Days end with the sun's setting and Nights with the sun's rising The end of pleasure is always sorrow, and the end of sorrow is always pleasure.

19 All collections have expenditure for their end and all ascents have falls for their end All associations have dissociations for their end, and life has death for its end.

20 All action ends in destruction, and all that is born is certain to meet with death Every mobile and immobile thing in this world is fickle.

21 Sacrifice, gift penances study, vows, observances —all these have destruction to their end. Of Knowledge, there is no end

22 Hence, one who has a tranquil soul who has subjugated his senses, who is freed from the sense of mineness, who is devoid of egoism is freed from all sins by pure knowledge.

CHAPTER XLV.

(ANUGITA PARVA)—

Brahman said —

1. The wheel of life moves on. It has the understanding for its strength, the mind for the pole, the group of senses for its fetters the (five) great elements for its nave, and home for its circumference.

2. It is possessed by decrepitude and sorrow and it has diseases and calamities for its progeny. That wheel relates in time and place. It has toil and exercise for its noise.

3 Day and Night are the rotations of that wheel It is encircled by heat and cold Pleasure and pain are its joints, and hunger and thirst are the nails fixed into it.

4 Sun-shine and shade are the ruts. It is capable of being moved during even such a short space of time as is taken up by the opening and the closing of the eyelid. It is covered with the dreadful waters of delusion It is ever revolving and void of consciousness

5 It is measured by months and half-months. It is not uniform (being ever-changing) and moves through all the worlds Penance and vows are its mud, Passion's force is its mover.

6 It is lighted up by the great egoism, and is sustained by the qualities Vexations are the fastenings that bind it around. It revolves in the midst of grief and destruction

7 It has actions and the instruments of action It is large and is extended by attachments. It is rendered unsteady by cupidity and desire It is produced by variegated Ignorance.

8 It is full of fear and delusion, and is the cause of the delusion of all beings. It moves towards joy and pleasure, and has desire and anger for its possession.

9 It is made up of principles beginning with greatness and ending with the gross elements It is marked by production and destruction going on ceaselessly. Its speed is like that of the mind, and it has the mind for its limit

10 This wheel of life which is connected with pairs of opposites and devoid of consciousness, the universe with the very immortals should cast away, abridge, and check.

11 That man who ever understands correctly the motion and stoppage of this wheel of life, is never seen to be deluded, among all creatures.

12 Freed from all impressions, divested of all pairs of opposites, freed from all sins, he attains to the highest goal

13. The householder, the Brahmachari, the hermit and the mendicant,—these four modes of life have all been said to have the householder's mode for their root.

14 The observance of every system of rules is prescribed in this world. Such observance has always been highly spoken of.

15 He who has been first purified by ceremonies, who has duly observed vows, who belongs by birth to a family of high qualifications, and who understands the Vedas, should return (from his preceptor's house).

16 Always devoted to his married wife, acting like a good man, with his senses under control and full of faith, one should in this world perform the five sacrifices.

18—17 He who eats the residue after feeding celestials and guests, who is given to the observance of Vedic rites, who duly celebrates, according to his means, sacrifices and gifts, who is unduly active with his hands and feet, who is unduly active with his eye, who is devoted to penances, who is not unduly active with his words and limbs, comes under the category of Shista or the good.

19 One should always bear the sacred thread, wear white (clean) clothes, observe pure vows, and should always mix with good men, making gifts and practising self-control.

20 One should govern his lust and stomach practise universal compassion, and be characterised by good conduct One should bear a bamboo stick, and a water-pot filled with water.

21 Having studied one should teach likewise should celebrate sacrifices himself and officiate at the sacrifices of others. One should also make gifts unto oneself. Indeed, one's conduct should be marked by these six deeds.

22 Know that three of these acts should form the livelihood of the Brahmanas, viz., teaching (pupils), officiating at the sacrifices of others, and the acceptance of gifts from a person who is pure.

23 As to the other duties which remain, numbering three, viz., making of gifts, study, and sacrifice, these are accompanied by merit.

24 Observant of penances, self controlled, practising universal mercy and forgiveness, and looking upon all creatures impartially, the man who is conversant with duties should never be careless about those three acts.

25 The learned Brahmana of pure heart, who leads the domestic mode of life and practises rigid vows, thus devoted and thus performing all duties to the best of his power, succeeds in conquering the celestial region.

CHAPTER XLVI.

Brahman said:—

1—3 Properly studying thus to the best of his power, in the way described above, and likewise living as a Brahmacharin, one who performs the duties of his own order, endued with learning, observant of penances, and with all the senses under control, devoted to what is agreeable and beneficial to the preceptor, steady in practising the duty of truth, and always pure, should, with the permission of the preceptor, eat his food without decrying it. He should eat Havishya made from what is got in alms, and should stand, sit, and take exercise (as directed).

4 He should pour libations on the fire twice a day, having purified himself and with concentrated mind He should always carry a staff made of Vilwa or Palasha.

5 The raiments of the twice-born man should be linen, or of cotton, or deer skin, or a cloth that is entirely brown red.

6 There should also be a girdle made of Munja-grass He should bear matted locks on head, and should perform his ablutions daily He should bear the sacred thread, study the scriptures, divest himself of cupidity, and be steady in the observance of vows.

7 He should also satisfy the celestials with oblations of pure water, his mind being controlled the while Such a Brahmacharin is worthy of being lauded.

8 With vital seed drawn up and mind concentrated, one who is thus devoted, succeeds in conquering the celestial region. Having attained to the Highest seat, he has not to return to birth.

9 Cleansed by all purificatory rites and having lived as a Brahmacharin, one should next go out of his village and next live as an ascetic in the forest, having cast off (all attachments).

10. Clad in animal skins or barks of trees, he should perform his ablutions morning and evening Always living well in the forest, he should never return to an inhabited place.

11 Honoring guests when they come, he should give them shelter, and himself live upon fruits and leaves and common roots, and Shyamaka

12. He should, without being idle, live on such water as he gets, and air, and all forest products He should live upon these, in due order, according to the regulations of his initiation

13 He should honor the guest that comes to him with alms of fruits and roots He should then without idleness, always give whatever other food he may have.

14 Controlling speech the while he should eat after satisfying celestials and guests His mind should be shorn of envy. He should eat little, and depend always on the celestials.

15. Self controlled, practising universal mercy, and endued with forgiveness, he should wear both beard and hair. Celebrating sacrifices and devoting himself to the study of the scriptures, he should be steady in the observance of the duty of truth

16 With body always in a state of purity, gifted with cleverness, ever living in the forest, with concentrated mind, and senses in subjection, a hermit thus devoting himself, would conquer the celestial region

17 A householder, or Brahmacharin, or forest recluse who would wish to acquire Liberation, should have recourse to that which has been called the best course of conduct.

18 Having granted to all creatures the pledge of utter abstention from harm, he should renounce all action He should contribute to the happiness of all creatures, practise universal friendliness, govern all his senses, and be an ascetic.

19 Living upon food got without asking and without trouble, and that has come to him spontaneously, he should make a fire He should go for alms to a place whence smoke has ceased to curl up and where all the inhabitants have already eaten.

20. The person who is conversant with the conduct that leads to Liberation should seek for alms after the vessels (used in cooking) have been washed He should never rejoice when he gets anything, and never lose heart if he gets nothing

21. Seeking just what is necessary for supporting life, he should, with concentrated mind, go about for alms, waiting for the proper time He should not wish for earnings in common with others, nor eat when honoured.

22 The mendicant should conceal himself for avoiding gifts with honour. While eating, he should not eat the residue of another's dish, nor such food as is bitter, or astringent, or pungent.

23 He should not also eat such kinds of food as have a sweet taste He should eat only so much as is necessary to keep him alive.

24—26 The person conversant with Liberation should obtain his livelihood without obstructing any creature In his rounds of mendicancy he should never follow another He should never show his piety, he should move about in a solitary place, freed from passion He should resort to either an empty house, or a forest, or the foot of some tree, or a river, or a mountain-cave for shelter. In summer he should pass only one night in an inhabited place, in the rainy season he may live in one place

27 He should move about the world like a worm, having his path pointed out by the Sun From mercy for creatures, he should walk on the Earth with his eyes directed towards it.

28 He should never amass riches and should avoid living with friends The man knowing Liberation should every day do all his acts with pure water.

29—30 Such a man should always perform his ablutions with water that has been taken (from the river or tank) Abstention from harm, celibacy, truth, simplicity, freedom, from anger, freedom from deceiving others self control and habitual freedom from back biting, with senses controlled, he should steadily pursue these eight vows.

31. He should always practise a sinless mode of conduct, which is not deceptive or crooked Shorn of attachments he should always make one who comes as a guest eat (at least) a morsel of food.

32. He should eat just enough for livelihood the maintenance of life. He should eat only such food as has been got by fair means, and should not pursue the dictates of desire.

33. He should never accept any other thing than food and clothing only. He should, again, accept only as much as he can eat and nothing more.

34 He should not be induced to accept gifts from others, nor should he make gifts to others Owing to the helplessness of creatures the wise man should always share with others

35. He should not misappropriate others' belongings, nor should he take anything without being asked He should not, having enjoyed anything, become so attached to it as to seek for it once more.

36 One should take only earth water, pebbles, leaves flowers, and fruits, which are not owned by any body, as they come, when one wishes to do any act

37 One should not live by the occupation of an artisan, nor should he covet gold One should not hate, nor teach, nor should one have any belongings.

38 One should eat only what is consecrated by faith. One should shun controversies One should follow the nectarine course of conduct One should never be attached to anything, and should never enter into relations of intimacy with any creature.

39 One should not perform, nor cause to perform, any such deed as involves expectation of fruit or destruction of life or the hoarding of riches or articles.

40. Rejecting all objects, content with a very little, one should move about (homeless) pursuing an equal conduct towards all creatures mobile and immobile.

41. One should never annoy another being, nor should one be annoyed with another. He who is trusted by all creatures is considered as the foremost of those persons who understand Liberation.

42 One should not think of the past nor feel anxious about the future One should disregard the present, biding time, with fixed mind

43 One should never defile anything by eye, mind, or speech Nor should one do anything which is wrong, openly or in secret

44 Withdrawing his senses like the tortoise withdrawing its limbs one should govern his senses and mind, cultivate a thoroughly peaceful understanding, and seek to master every subject

45 Freed from all pairs of opposites, never bending his head in respect, abstaining from the rites requiring the utterance of Swaha one should be free from mineness, and egoism With purified soul, one should never seek to acquire what one has not and protect what one has

46 Free from expectations, shorn of qualities, endued with tranquility, one should be free from all attachments and should depend on none Attached to one's own self and understanding all subjects, one becomes, forsooth, liberated.

47—49 Those who perceive the self, which is without hands and feet and back, which is without head and without stomach, which is free from the action of all qualities, which is absolute, untainted, and stable, which is without smell, without taste and touch, without color, and without sound, which is to be comprehended (by close study,) which is unattached, which is without flesh, which is free from anxiety, unfading, and divine, and, lastly, which though living in a house resides in all creatures, succeed in escaping death

50 There the understanding reaches not, nor the senses, nor the celestials nor the Vedas, nor sacrifices, nor the regions (of superior bliss), nor penance, nor vows.

51 The attainment to it by those who are endued with knowledge is said to be without comprehension of symbols Hence the man who knows the properties of that which is shorn of symbols, should practise the truths of piety.

52 The learned man, living as a householder, should adopt that conduct which is conformable to true knowledge. Though undeluded, he should practise piety like one that is deluded, without finding fault without it

53 Without finding fault with the practices of the good he should act in such a way for practising piety as may induce others to always disregard him

54—57 That man who is gifted with such a conduct is said to be the foremost of ascetics The senses, the objects of the senses, the (five) great elements • mind, understanding, egoism, the unmanifest, Purusha also, after comprehending these duly with the help of correct inferences, one attains to the celestial region released from all fetters One conversant with the truth, understanding these at the time of the termination of his life, should meditate, exclusively resting on one point Then, depending on none one acquires Liberation. Freed from all attachments like the wind in space with his hoarded up means exhausted, without distress of any sort, he attains to the highest goal.

CHAPTER XLVII.

(ANUGITA PARVA)—Continued.

Brahman said —

1 The ancients who always used to speak truth say that Renunciation is penance Brahmanas, living in that which has Brahma for its origin, understand Knowledge to be high Brahma.

2. Brahma is very far off, and its attainment depends upon a knowledge of the Vedas. It is free from all pairs of opposites, it is shorn of all qualities; it is eternal; it is gifted with unthinkable qualities, it is supreme.

3. It is by knowledge and penance that those gifted with wisdom see that which is the highest. Indeed, they who are of unsullied minds, who are purged of every sin, and who have transcended all passion and darkness (succeed in seeing it.)

4. They who are always given to renunciation, and who are conversant with the Vedas, succeed in attaining to the supreme Lord who is at one with the path of happiness and peace, by the help of penance.

5. Penance, it has been said, is light. Conduct leads to piety. Knowledge is said to be the highest. Renunciation is the best penance.

6 He who understands self through accurate determination of all subjects, undisturbed, which is at one with Knowledge, and which lives in all principles, succeeds in going everywhere.

7. That learned man who sees association and dissociation, and unity in diversity, is freed from misery.

8. He who never desires for anything, who despises nothing, becomes eligible, even when living in this world, for assimilation with Brahma.

9. He who is conversant with the truths about qualities of Greatness, and understands the Pradhana as existing in all principles, who is free from mineness and egoism, forsooth, becomes liberated.

10. He who is freed from all pairs of opposites, who does not bend his head to any body, who has got over the rites of Swaha, succeeds by the help of tranquility alone in attaining to that which is free from pairs of opposites, which is eternal, and which is shorn of qualities.

11. Renouncing all action, good or bad, developed from qualities, and casting off both truth and falsehood, a creature, forsooth, becomes liberated.

12—15. Having the unmanifest for the seed of its origin, with the understanding for its trunk, with the great principle of egoism for its collection of boughs, with the senses for the cavities of its little sprouts, with the (five) great elements for its large branches, the objects of the senses for its smaller branches, with leaves that are ever present, with flowers that always embellish it, and with fruits both agreeable and disagreeable always produced, is the eternal tree of Brahma which forms the support of all creatures. Cutting and piercing that tree with knowledge of truth as the sword, the wise man, abandoning the fetters which are made of attachment and which cause birth, decrepitude, and death, and freeing himself from mineness and egoism, forsooth, becomes liberated.

16 These are the two birds, which are immutable, which are friends, and which should be known as unintelligent. That other who is different from these two is called the Intelligent.

17. When the inner self, which is shorn of knowledge of nature, which is (as it were) unintelligent, becomes conversant with that which is above nature, then, understanding the Kshetra, and gifted with an intelligence that is above all qualities and apprehends everything, becomes released from all sins.

CHAPTER XLVIII.

(ANUGITA PARVA.)—

Continued.

Brahman said:—

1. Some consider Brahma as a tree. Some consider Brahma as a great forest. Some consider Brahma as unmanifest. Some consider it as transcendant and freed from every distress.

2—5. They think that all this is produced from and absorbed into the unmanifest. He who, even for the short space of time covered by a single breath, when his end comes, becomes equable, attaining to the self, fits himself for immortality Controlling the self in the self, even for the space of a wink one goes through the tranquility of the self, to that which forms the endless acquisition of those that are endued with knowledge Restraining the vital airs again and again by controlling them according to the method called Pranayama (suppression of vital airs), by the ten or the twelve, he attains to that which is beyond the four and twenty. Thus having first acquired a tranquil soul, one attains to the fruition of all his desires.

6. When the quality of Goodness predominates in what originates from the Unmanifest, it becomes fit for immortality. They who are conversant with Goodness speak highly of it, saying that there is nothing superior to Goodness.

7. By inference we know that the Purusha is dependent on Goodness. O best of twice born ones, it is impossible to attain to Purusha by any other means.

8. Forgiveness, courage, abstention from injury, equability, truth, sincerity, knowledge, gift, and renunciation, are said to be the marks of that course of conduct which arises out of Goodness.

9 It is by this inference that the wise believe in the oneness of Purusha and Goodness There is no doubt in this.

10 Some learned men that are devoted to knowledge hold that Kshetrajna and Nature are one. This, however, is not correct.

11. If it is said that Nature is different from Purusha, that also will indicate a want of consideration.

12. Distinction and association should be truly known. Unity and diversity are likewise laid down That is the doctrine of the learned Even both unity and diversity are seen in the gnat and Udumvara.

13. As a fish in water is different from it, so is the relation of the two (viz., Purusha and Nature) Indeed, their relation is like that of water drops on the leaf of the lotus

The preceptor said:—

14. Thus addressed, those learned Brahmanas, who were the foremost of men, felt some doubts and (therefore) they once more questioned the Grandfather.

CHAPTER XLIX.

(ANUGITA PARVA.)—

Continued.

The Rishis said:—

1 Which among the duties is considered to be the most worthy of being performed? The various modes of duty, we see, are contradictory.

2. Some say that it continues after the body (is destroyed). Others say that it does not exist Some say that everything is doubtful Others have no doubts

3 Some say that the eternal (principle) is not eternal. Some say that it exists, and some that it exists not. Some say it is of one form, or twofold, and others that it is mixed.

4. Some Brahmanas who are conversant with Brahma and utterers of truth consider it to be one Others, that it is distinct, and others again that it is manifold.

5. Some say that both time and space exist; others, that it is not so Some bear matted locks on their heads and are clad in deer-skins Others have shaven heads and go entirely naked.

6. Some abstain entirely from bathing, and some are for bathing Such differences of views may be seen among celestials and Brahmanas conversant with Brahma and gifted with perceptions of truth.

7 Some are for taking food; while some are given to fasts Some speak highly of action. Others speak highly of perfect tranquility.

8. Some applaud Liberation. Some, various sorts of enjoyments.

9. Some desire various kinds of riches. Some, poverty. Some say that means should be resorted to. Others, that this is not so.

10 Some are given to a life of abstention from injury. Others are inclined to destruction. Some are for merit and glory. Others say that this is not so.

11. Some are devoted to goodness. Others are established on doubt. Some are for pleasure. Some are for pain. Other people say that it is meditation.

12 Other learned Brahmanas say that it is Sacrifice. Others, again, say that it is gift. Others speak highly of penances. Others, the study of the scriptures.

13. Some say that knowledge and renunciation (should be followed) Others who ponder on the elements, say that it is Nature. Some speak too much of everything. Others, nothing.

14 O foremost of the celestials, duty being thus confused and full of contradictions of various kinds, we are deluded and unable to arrive at any conclusion.

15 People stand up for acting, saying,—This is good,—This is good,—He who follow a certain duty speaks highly of that duty as the best.

16 Therefore our understanding breaks down and our mind is distracted. We, therefore, wish, O best of all beings, to know what is good

17. You should declare to us, after this, what is (so) mysterious, and what is the cause of the connection between the Soul and Nature

18. Thus addressed by those learned Brahmanas, the illustrious creator of the worlds, endued with great intelligence and possessed of a righteous soul, described to them accurately what they asked.

CHAPTER L.

Brahman said:—

1. Well then, I shall describe to you what you ask. Learn what was told by a preceptor to a disciple who came to him.

2 Hearing it all, do you settle properly (what it should be). Abstention from injuring any creature is considered as the foremost of all duties.

3 That is the highest seat, shorn of anxiety and forming a mark of holiness The ancients who had seen the certain truth, have said that knowledge is the highest happiness.

4—6 Hence, one becomes freed of all sins by pure knowledge They who are engaged in destruction and harm, they who are infidels in conduct, have to go to Hell on account of their being gifted with cupidity and delusion. Those who, without idleness, perform acts moved thereto by expectation, become repeatedly born in this world and sport in happiness Those men who gifted with learning and wisdom, perform acts with faith, free from expectations, and possessed of concentration of mind, are said to perceive clearly.

7—8 I shall, after this, describe how the association and the disassociation takes place of Soul and Nature Ye best of men, listen The relation here is said to be that between the object and the subject

9 Purusha is always the subject; and Nature the object It has been explained, by what has been said in a previous part of the discourse where it has been pointed out, that they exist after the manner of the gnat and the Udumvara

10. An object of enjoyment as it is, Nature is unintelligent and knows nothing He, however, who enjoys it, is said to know it, Soul being enjoyer, Nature is enjoyed.

11. The wise have said that Nature is always made up of pairs of opposites Soul is, on the other hand destitute of pairs of opposites, devoid of parts, eternal, and free, about its essence, from qualities.

12 He lives in everything alike, and walks with knowledge He always enjoys Nature as a lotus leaf (enjoys) water.

13. Endued with knowledge, he is never tainted even if brought into contact with all the qualities.

14 Forsooth, Purusha is unattached like the unsteady drop of water on the lotus-leaf. This is the certain conclusion that Nature is the property of Purusha.

15—16 The relation between these two (viz, Purusha and Nature) is like that existing between matter and its maker. As one goes into a dark place carrying a light with him, so those who wish for the Supreme, proceed with the light of Nature. As long as matter and quality exist, so long the light shines.

17. The flame, however, becomes put out when matter and quality (or oil and wick) are exhausted. Thus Nature is manifest; while Purusha is said to be unmanifest.

18 Understand this, ye learned Brahmanas! Well I shall now tell you something more With even a thousand (explanations), one who has a bad understanding succeeds not in acquiring knowledge.

19 One, however, who is gifted with intelligence succeeds in acquiring happiness, through only a fourth share (of explanations) Thus should the accomplishment of duty be understood as dependent on means.

20 For the intelligent man, having knowledge of means, succeeds in acquiring supreme happiness.

21. As some man travelling along a road without provisions of his journey, proceeds with great uneasiness and may even meet with destruction before he reaches the end of his journey, so should it be known that in deeds there may or may not be fruits.

22—24 The examination of what is agreeable and what disagreeable in one's own self, yields benefit The progress in life of a man who is devoid of the perception of truth is like that of a man who rashly journeys on a long road unseen before. The progress, however, of those who are gifted with intelligence is like that of men who journey along the same road, riding on a car to which are yoked (fleet) horses and which moves with swiftness. Having ascended to the top of a mountain, one should not cast his eyes on the surface of the earth

25 Seeing a man, even though travelling on a car, afflicted and rendered insensible by pain, the intelligent man journeys on a car as long as there is a car-path.

26 The learned man, when he sees the car-path end, abandons his car for going on. Thus does the intelligent man who knows the ordinances about truth and Yoga, proceed.

27. Knowing the qualities, such a man, proceeds, comprehending what is next and next.

57 One who knows which is superior and inferior among existent creatures, who is conversant with the ordinances about all deeds, and who forms himself the soul of all creatures, attains to the Unfading Soul.

CHAPTER LI.

(ANUGITA PARVA)—
Continued.

Brahmana said —

1. Since the mind is the ruler of these five elements, for controlling and bringing them forth the mind, therefore, is the soul of the elements.

2. The mind always presides over the great elements The understanding proclaims power, and is called the Soul

3 The mind yokes the senses as a charioteer yokes good horses. The senses, the mind, and the understanding are always joined to the Soul.

4 The individual soul, mounting the chariot to which big horses are yoked and which has the understanding for the reins, drives about on all sides.

5 With all the senses attached to it (for steeds), with the mind for the charioteer, and the understanding for the eternal reins, exists the great Brahma car.

6 Indeed, that man gifted with learning and wisdom who always understands the Brahma car in this way, is never possessed by delusion in the midst of all entities

7—9 This forest of Brahma begins with the unmanifest and ends with gross objects It includes mobile and immobile objects, and gets light from the radiance of the sun and the moon, and is decorated with planets and constellations It is decked, again, on all sides with nets of rivers and mountains It is always embellished likewise by various kinds of waters It is the means of livelihood for all creatures. It is, again, the end of all living creatures In that forest the Kshetrajna always moves about.

10. Whatever exist in this world mobile and immobile, are the very first to be dissolved away After this (are dissolved) those qualities which compose all entities.

11—12. After the qualities (are dissolved) the five elements Such is the gradation of entities. Celestials, men, Gandharvas, Pishachas, Asuras, (and) Rakshasas have all originated from Nature, and not from actions, nor from a cause The Brahmanas, who are creators of the universe, are born here again and again

13 All that originates from them dissolves, when the time comes in those very five great elements like billows in the ocean

14 All the great elements are beyond those elements which form the universe. He who is released from those five elements goes to the highest goal

15 The powerful Prajapati created all this by the mind only Similarly Rishis attained to the status of celestials by the help of penance

16 Likewise, those who have acquired perfection, who were capable of the concentration of Yoga, and who live on fruits and roots, likewise perceive the triple world by penance.

17. Medicines and herbs and all the various sciences are acquired by means of penance alone, for all acquisition has penance for its root.

18 Whatever is difficult of acquisition, difficult to learn, difficult to defeat, difficult to pass through, can all be acquired by penance, for penance is irresistible.

19. One who drinks alcoholic liquors, one who kills a Brahmana, one who steals, one who destroys a fœtus, one who violates one's preceptor's bed, becomes cleansed of such sin by penance well performed

20—21. Human beings, departed manes, deities, (sacrificial) animals, beasts and birds, and all other creatures mobile and immobile, by always devoting themselves to penances, become successful by penance alone Similarly the celestials gifted with great powers of illusion, have attained to the celestial region.

22 Those who without idleness perform deeds with expectations, being full of egoism, approach the presence of Prajapati.

23 Those great ones, however, who are devoid of mineness and freed from egoism through the pure contemplation of Yoga, acquire the great and highest regions.

24 Those who understand best the self, having acquired Yoga contemplation and having their minds always cheerful, enter into the unmanifest accumulation of happiness

25 Those persons who are freed from egoism and who are re born after having attained to the fulness of Yoga contemplation, enter into the highest region reserved for the great, viz., the Unmanifest.

26—27 Born from that same unmanifest (principle) and attaining to the same once more, freed from the qualities of Darkness and Ignorance and adhering to only the quality of Goodness, one becomes freed from every sin and creates all things Such a one should be known to be Kshetrajna in perfection He who knows him knows the Veda.

28 Attaining to pure knowledge from (restraining) the mind, the ascetic should sit self-controlled One necessarily becomes that on which one's mind is set. This is an eternal mystery

29 That which has the unmanifest for its beginning and gross qualities for its end has been said to have Nescience for its mark But do you understand that whose nature is shorn of qualities.

30. Of two syllables is Mrityu (death), of three syllable is the eternal Brahma Mineness is death, and the opposite of mineness is the eternal

31. Some men who are led by bad understanding speak highly of action. Those, however, who are unmbered among the great ancients never speak highly of action

32 By action is a creature born with body which is made up of the sixteen. (True) Knowledge swallows up Purusha This is what is highly acceptable to eaters of ambrosia.

33 Therefore, those whose vision extends to the other end have no attachment to actions This Purusha, however, is full of knowledge and not full of action.

34 He dies not who understands Him who is immortal, immutable, incomprehensible, eternal and indestructible—Him who is the restrained Soul and who is above all attachments

35 He who thus understands the Soul to which there is nothing prior, which is uncreated, immutable, unconquered, and incomprehensible even to those who are eaters of nectar, certainly becomes himself incomprehensible and immortal through these means.

36. Removing all impressions and controlling the soul in the soul, he understands that auspicious Brahma than which nothing greater exists.

37. Upon the understanding becoming clear, he succeeds in acquiring tranquility The mark of tranquility is like that what takes place in a dream.

38. This is the end of those liberated ones who are intent on knowledge. They see all those movements which are born of successive developments.

39 This is the end of those who are unattached to the world This is the eternal practice. This is the acquisition of men of knowledge. This is the uncensured mode of conduct.

40 This end is capible of being attained by one who is alike to all creatures, who is without attachment, who is without expectations, and who looks equally on all things.

41 I have now described everything to you, O foremost of twice-born Rishis! Do you act thus immediately, you will then acquire success.

The Preceptor said:—

42. Thus addressed by the preceptor Brahman, those great sages acted accordingly and then attained to many happy regions

43 Do you also, O blessed one, duly act according to the words of Brahman as described by me, O you of pure soul. You will then acquire success

Vasudeva said:—

44 Thus instructed in the principles of high religion by the preceptor, the pupil, O son of Kunti, did everything accordingly and then attained to Liberation.

45 Having done all that he should have done, the pupil, O perpetuator of Kuru's race attained to that seat going where one has not to grieve.

Arjuna said:—

46 Who, indeed, was that Brahmana, O Krishna, and who the pupil, O Janardana! Truly, if am worthy of hearing it, do you then tell me, O Lord!

Vasudeva said:—

47 I am the preceptor, O mighty-armed one, and know that the mind is my pupil Through my affection for you, O Dhananjaya, I have described this mystery to you

48. If you have any love for me, O perpetuator of Kuru family, do you then, after having heard these instructions about the Soul, always act duly, O you of excellent vows

49 Then when this religion has been duly practised O destroyer of foes, you will become freed from all your sins and attain to perfect liberation.

50. Formerly, when the hour of battle came, this very religion, O you of mighty-arms, was described by me. Do you, therefore, set your mind on it.

51. And now, O chief of Bharata's race, it is long since that I saw the lord my father. I wish to see him again, with your leave, O Phalguna.

Vaishampayana said:—

52. Dhananjaya replied to Krishna who had said so—We shall go to-day from this town to Hastinapur.

53 Meeting king Yudhishthira of virtuous soul there, and informing him you shall then go to your own city.

CHAPTER LII.

(ANUGITA PARVA.)—

Continued.

Vaishampayana said:—

1 After this Krishna ordered Daruka, saying,—'Let my car be yoked.' Within a very short space of time Daruka informed (his master), saying,—'It has been yoked.'

2 The son of Pandu then ordered all his attendants, saying—'Prepare yourselves and be ready. We shall go to day to Hastinapur.

3 Thus addressed, O king, the army got themselves ready, and it formed Pritha's son of immeasurable energy, saying,—Everything is ready.'

4 Then those two friends viz. Krishna and the son of Pandu ascended their car and proceeded on the journey, engaged in delightful conversation.

5. To Vasudeva seated on the car, the highly energetic Dhananjaya once more said these words, O chief of the Bharatas.

6 O perpetuator of the Vrishni race, the king has got victory through your grace All his enemies have been killed, and he has recovered his kingdom without a thorn in it.

7 O destroyer of Madhu, on you the Pandavas have got a powerful protector Having obtained you for our raft we have crossed the Kuru ocean.

8 O you who have this universe for your handiwork, salutations to you, O Soul of the universe, O best of all beings in the universe I know you in that measure in which I am approved by you.

9 O destroyer of Madhu, the soul of every creature is always born of your energy. Playful sport is yours. Earth and sky, O lord, are your illusion.

10. This entire universe, consisting of mobile and immobile objects, is established on you You create, by modification, the four orders of Being.

11. You create the Earth, the Sky, and Heaven, O Destroyer of Madhu. The stainless lunar light is your smile. The seasons are your senses.

12. The "ever-moving" wind is your breath, and death, existing eternally is your anger. In your grace is the goddess of prosperity. Indeed, Shree is always established in you, O you of the highest intelligence.

13 You are the sport; you are their contentment, you their intelligence, you their forgiveness, you their inclinations, you their beauty. You are the universe with its mobile and immobile objects At the end of the age, it is you, O sinless one, who are called destruction.

14 I am incapable of reciting all your qualities in course of even a long period. You are the Soul and the Supreme Soul I bow to you O you of eyes like the (petals of the) lotus.

15—18 O you who are irresistible I have learnt it from Narada and Devala and the island-born (Vyasa), and the Kuru grandfather also that all this (universe) rests on you You are the one Lord of all creatures This, O sinless one, that you have described to me on account of your favour for myself, I shall duly accomplish in full, O Janarddana! Highly wonderful is this which you have done from desire of doing what is agreeable to us, viz. the destruction in battle of the Kaurava (prince) the son of Dhritarashtra. That army had been burnt by you which I (subsequently) defeated in battle

19—20 That feat was achieved by you on account of which victory became mine! By the power of your intelligence was shown the means by which was duly effected the destruction of Duryodhana in battle, as also of Karna, as of the sinful king of the Sindhus, and Bhurishravas.

21. I shall accomplish all that which, O son of Devaki, pleased with me you have declared to myself. I do not entertain any doubt in this.

22 Going to king Yudhishthira of righteous soul, I shall, O sinless one, urge him to dismiss you, O you who are conversant with every duty.

23 O lord, I approve of departure for Dwaraka You shall soon see my maternal uncle, O Janarddana.

24 You shall also see the irresistible Valadeva and other chiefs of the Vrishni race!"—Thus conversing with each other, the two reached the city of Hastinapur.

25 They then, with cheerful hearts, and without any anxiety, entered the palace of Dhritarashtra which resembled the mansion of Shakra.

26—28. They then saw, O monarch, king Dhritarashtra, and highly intelligent Vidura, and king Yudhishthira; and the irresistibly Bhimasena, and the two sons of Madri by Pandu, and king Dhritarashtra seated; and the unvanquished Yuyutsu, and Gandhari of great wisdom, and Pritha, and the beautiful Krishna, and the other ladies of Bharata's race with Subhadra for the first.

29—31. They also saw all those ladies who used to wait upon Gandhari Then approaching king Dhritarashtra, those two chastisers of enemies announced their names and touched his feet. Indeed, those great ones also touched the feet of Gandhari and Pritha and king Yudhishthira the just, and Bhima. Embracing Vidura also, they enquired after his well being.

32—33 In the company of all those persons, Arjuna and Krishna then approached king Dhritarashtra (again) Night came and then the intelligent king Dhritarashtra dismissed all those perpetuaters of Kuru's race as also Janarddana for retiring to their respective rooms. Permitted by the king, all of them entered their respective apartments.

34—36 Krishna of great energy proceeded to the apartments of Dhananjaya. Adored duly and furnished with every object of comfort and enjoyment, Krishna of great intelligence passed the night in happy sleep with Dhananjaya as his companion. When the night passed away and morning came, the two heroes, finishing their morning rites and adoring their persons properly, proceeded to the palace of king Yudhishthira the just There Yudhishthira the just, of great might, sat with his ministers.

37 The two great ones, entering that well adorned chamber, saw king Yudhishthira the just like the two Ashwins seeing the chief of the celestials.

38. Meeting the king, he of Vrishni's race, as also that foremost hero of Kuru's race, getting the permission of Yudhishthira who was highly pleased with them, sat themselves down.

39. Then the king, gifted with great intelligence, seeing those two friends, became desirous of addressing them. Soon that best of kings, that foremost of speakers, addressed them in the following words.

Yudhishthira said:—

40. Ye heroes, ye foremost ones of Yadu's and Kuru's race, it appears that ye two are desirous of saying something to me. Do ye say what is in your mind. I shall soon satisfy it. Do not hesitate.

41. Thus addressed, Phalguna, well conversant with speech, humbly approached king Yudhishthira the just and then said these words.

42. Highly powerful Vasudeva here, O king, is long absent from home He wishes, with your permission, to see his sire.

43 Let him go, if you think it proper, to the city of the Anarttas! You should, O hero, grant him permission.

Yudhishthira said:—

44. O lotus eyed one, blessed be you! O slayer of Madhu, do you go this very day to the city of Dwaravati for seeing, O powerful one, that foremost one of Sura's race.

45 O mighty armed Keshava, your departure is approved by me! You have not seen my maternal uncle as also the goddess Devaki for a long time.

46 Meeting my maternal uncle and going to Valadeva also, O giver of honors, you will, O you of great wisdom, adore both of them at my word as they deserve.

47 Do you also think of me daily as also of Bhima, that foremost of powerful men, and of Phalguna and Nakula and Sahadeva, O giver of honours.

48 Having seen the Anarttas, and your father, O mighty-armed one, and the Vrishnis, you will return to my horse-sacrifice, O sinless one!

49 Do you then go, taking with you various kinds of gems and various sorts of wealth Do you, O hero of the Satwata race, also take with you whatever else you like.

50. It is through your grace, O Keshava that that the whole Earth, O hero, has come under our sway and all our enemies have been killed.

51. When king Yudhishthira the just of Kuru's race said so, Vasudeva, that foremost of men, said these words (in reply).

Vasudeva said:—

52. O mighty-armed one, all jewels and gems, all riches and the entire Earth, belong to you alone. Whatever wealth exists in my house, you, O lord, are always the owner thereof.

53 To him Yudhishthira, the son of Dharma, said,—Be it so'—and then duly adored (Krishna) the eldest brother, gifted with great energy, of Gada. Vasudeva then proceeded to his paternal aunt (Kunti) Duly honouring her, he circumbulated her body.

54 He was properly accosted by her in return, and then by all the others having Vidura for their first. The four armed eldest brother of Gada then started from Nagapura on his excellent car.

55 Placing his sister, the lady Subhadra, on the car, the mighty-armed Janarddana, then, with the permission of both Yudhishthira and (Kunti) his paternal aunt, started, accompanied by a large train of citizens.

56 The hero who had the foremost of apes on his banner, as also Satyaki and the two sons of Madravati, and Vidura of incomparable intelligence, and Bhima himself whose tread resembled that of a prince of elephants, all followed Madhava:

57 Janarddana of great energy, causing all those extenders of the Kuru kingdom and Vidura also to return, addressed Daruka, and Satyaki, saying,—'Urge the horses to speed'

58 Then that grinder of enemies, viz., Janarddana of great prowess, accompanied by Satyaki, the foremost one of Shini's race, proceeded to the city of the Anarttas after having killed all his enemies, like He of a hundred sacrifices proceeding to the celestial region.

CHAPTER LIII.

(ANUGITA PARVA)—Continued.

Vaishampayana said:—

1. As he of Vrishni's family was going to Dwaraka, those foremost princes of Bharata's race, those chastisers of enemies, embraced him and fell back with their attendants.

2. Phalguna repeatedly embraced the Vrishni hero, and as long as he was within the range of eye-sight he repeatedly turned his eyes towards him.

3 With great difficulty, the son of Pritha withdrew his look that had fallen on Govinda. The undefeated Krishna also (did the same).

4 The marks which were displayed on the occasion of that great one's departure, I shall now fully describe. Do you listen to me.

5 The wind blew with great force before the car, clearing the path of sand-grains and dust and thorns.

6 Vasava rained pure and fragrant showers and celestial flowers before the holder of Sharanga.

7. As the mighty-armed hero went on he came upon the desert ill-supplied with water. There he saw that foremost of ascetics, named Utanka, of immeasurable energy.

8 The hero of large eyes and great energy adored that ascetic He was then adored by the ascetic in return. Vasudeva then enquired after his well-being.

9 That foremost of Brahmanas viz., Utanka, politely accosted by Madhava, honoured him duly and then addressed him in these words

10 O Shauri, having gone to the palaces of the Kurus and the Pandavas, have you succeeded in establishing a durable understanding between them such as should exist between brothers? You should tell me every thing.

11. Do you come, O Keshava, after having united them in peace,—them who are your relatives and who are ever dear to you, O foremost one of Vrishni's race.

12 Will the five sons of Pandu, and the children of Dhritarashtra, O destroyer of enemies, sport in the world in joy with you?

13 Will all the kings enjoy happiness in their respective kingdoms, on account of the pacification of the Kauravas brought about by you?

14 Has that trust, O son, which I had always reposed on you, borne fruit about the Kauravas?

The blessed and holy one said —

15—16. I tried my best at first, for bringing about a good understanding, about the Kauravas. When I could not by any means establish them on peace, it happened that all of them, with their relatives and kinsmen, died. It is impossible to transgress destiny by either intelligence or power

17 O great Rishi, O sinless one, this also cannot be unknown to you They (the Kauravas) disregarded which Bhishma and Vidura gave them referring to me

18 Encountering one another, they then became guests of Yama's palace Only the five Pandavas form the remnant of the unslain, all their friends and all their children having been destroyed All the sons Dhritarashtra also, with their children and kinsmen, have been killed.

19 When Krishna had said these words, Utanka, filled with anger, and with eyes expanded in rage, addressed him in these words.

Utanka said :—

20 Since, though able, O Krishna, you did not rescue those foremost ones of Kuru's race who were your relatives and, therefore dear to you, I shall, forsooth, curse you

21. Since you did not forcibly compel them to forbear, therefore, O destroyer of Madhu I shall, filled with anger denounce a curse on you

22 It seems, O Madhava, that, though fully able (to save them), you were indifferent to these foremost of Kurus who overwhelmed by insincerity and hypocrisy, have all met with destruction.

Vasudeva said :—

23 O scion of Bhrigu's race listen, to what I say in full Do you accept my apologies also O you of Bhrigu's race, you are an ascetic!

24 After having heard my words about the soul, you may then utter your curse. No man is able, by a little ascetic merit, to put me down.

25 O foremost of ascetics, I do not wish to see the destruction of all your penances! You have a large measure of blazing penances You have passed your preceptors and seniors

26 O foremost of twice-born ones I know that you have observed the rules of Brahmacharyya from your infancy. I do not, therefore, wish the loss or diminution of your penances acquired with so much pain!

CHAPTER LIV.

(ANUGITA PARVA.)—

Continued.

Utanka said :—

1 Do you O Keshava tell me that faultless spiritual science Having heard your discourse I shall ordain what is for your good or imprecate a curse to you O Janardana!

Vasudeva said :—

2 Know that the three qualities of Ignorance, Darkness and Goodness exist, depending on me as their refuge So also, O twice born one, know that the Rudras and the Vasus have originated from me.

3 In me are all creatures, and in all creatures do I exist, Know this Let no doubt arise in your mind about this

4 So also O twice born one, know that all the tribes of the Daityas, all the Yakshas, Gandharvas, Rakshasas Nagas, Apsaras, have originated from me.

5 Whatever has been called existent and non existent, whatever is manifest, and not manifest, whatever is destructible and indestructible, all have me for their soul

6 Those fourfold courses of duty which, O ascetic, are known to attach to the (four) modes of life, and all the Vedic duties, have me for their soul

7 Whatever is non-existent, whatever is existent and non existent, and whatever is above that which is existent and non-existent —all these which form the universe —are from me There is nothing higher (or beyond) me who am the eternal god of gods

8 O perpetuater of Bhrigu's race, know that all the Vedas beginning with (the original syllable) OM are at one with me. Know, O son of Bhrigu's race, that I am the sacrificial stake, I am the Soma (drunk in sacrifices), I am the Charu (cooked in sacrifices for being offered to the deities), I am the Homa (that is performed); I am those deeds which sacrificers perform for pleasing the celestials, I am even the pourer of the sacrificial libation, and I am the Havi or libation that is poured I am the Adhvaryu I am the Kalpaka, and I am the highly sanctified sacrificial Havi. It is me whom the Udgatri, in the great sacrifice, hymns by the sound of his songs. In all rites of expiation, O Brahmana, the utterers of auspicious Mantras and benedictions fraught with peace sing my praises who am the artificer, O foremost of twice-born ones, of the universe.

11. Know, O best of twice-born persons, that Dharma is my eldest born offspring, originated from my mind, O learned Brahmana, whose essence is mercy for all creatures.

12. Constantly changing myself, I take birth in various wombs, O best of men, for upholding that son of mine, with the help of men now existing in or departed from the world. Indeed, I do this for protecting Virtue and for establishing it.

13 In those forms that I assume for the purpose, I am known, O son of Bhrigu's race, in the three worlds as Vishnu and Brahman and Shakra. I am the origin and I am the destruction of all things.

14 I am the creator of all existent objects and I am their destroyer. Knowing no change myself, I am the destroyer of all those creatures that live in sinfulness.

15 In every cycle I have to repair the causeway of Virtue, entering into various kinds of wombs from desire of doing good to my creatures.

16 When, O son of Bhrigu's race, I live in the order of the celestials, I then indeed, act in every respect as a celestial.

17 When I live in the order of the Gandharvas, I then, O son of Bhrigu's race, act in every respect as a Gandharva

18. When I live in the order of the Nagas I then act as a Naga, and when I live in the order of Yakshas or that of Rakshasas, I act after the manner of that order.

19 Born now in the order of men I must act a human being I appealed to them (the Kauravas) most piteously But stupefied as they were and deprived of their senses, they refused to take my words

20. I frightened them, filled with anger referring to some great fear. But once more I showed themselves my usual human form.

21. Possessed as they were of unrighteousness, and assailed by the virtue of time, all of them have been righteously killed in battle, and have, forsooth, gone to the celestial region.

22 The Pandavas also, O best of Brahmanas have acquired great fame. I have thus told you all that you had asked me.

CHAPTER LV.

Utanka said :—

1. I know you, O Janarddana, to be the creator of the universe Forsooth, this knowledge that I have is the result of your grace towards me.

2 O you of unfading glory, my heart is possessed of cheerful tranquillity on account of its being devoted to you Know, O chastiser of enemies, that my heart is no longer inclined to curse you.

3 If, O Janarddana, I deserve the least grace from you, do you then show me once your supreme form.

Vaishampayana said :—

4 Pleased with him, the holy one then showed Utanka that eternal Vaishnava form which Dhananjaya of great intelligence had seen.

5 Utanka saw the great Vasudeva of universal form, gifted with mighty arms. The effulgence of that form was like that of a burning fire or a thousand suns. It stood before him filling all space. It had faces on every side.

6 Seeing that high and wonderful Vaishnava form of Vishnu, in fact, seeing the Supreme Lord in (that guise) the Brahmana Utanka became filled with wonder.

Utanka said :—

7. O you whose handiwork is the universe, I bow to you, O soul of the universe, O parent of all things! With your feet you have covered the entire Earth, and with your head you fill the firmament.

8 That which lies between the Earth and the firmament has been filled by your stomach All the points of the compass are covered by your arms. O you of unfading glory, you are all this.

9. Do you withdraw this excellent and indestructible form of yours I wish to see you now in your own (human) form which, too, is eternal.

Vaishampayana said :—

10—11. To him, O Janamejaya Govinda of contented spirit said these words—Do you ask for some boon! To him Utanka, however said, this is a sufficient boon from you for the present, O you of great splendour, in that, O Krishna, I have seen this form of yours, O foremost of all beings!

12. Krishna, however, once more said to him,—'Do not scruple in this matter! This must be done! A sight of my form cannot be fruitless!

Utanka said :—

13 I must accomplish that, O lord, which you think should be done! I wish to have water wherever my wish for it may arise. Water is scarce in such deserts!

14. Withdrawing that energy, the Supreme Lord then said to Utanka,—Whenever you will require water, think of me!' Having said so, he proceeded towards of Dwaraka.

15. Subsequently, one day, the illustrious Utanka, solicitous of water and greatly thirsty, wandered over the desert. In course of his wanderings he thought of Krishna of unfading glory.

16 The intelligent Rishi then saw in that desert a naked hunter (of the Chandala class), all besmeared with dirt, surrounded by a pack of dogs.

17 Extremely fierce-looking, he carried a sword and was armed with bow and arrows. That foremost of twice-born ones saw copious streams of water issuing from the urinary organs of that hunter.

18 As soon as Utanka had thought of Krishna, that hunter smilingly addressed him, saying,—O Utanka, O you of Bhrigu's race, do you accept this water from me.

19. Seeing you afflicted by thirst I have felt great mercy for you! Thus addressed by the hunter, the ascetic showed no inclination to accept that water.

20. The intelligent Utanka even began to blame Krishna of undecaying glory. The hunter, however, again and again addressed the Rishi, saying,—'Drink!'

21—22 The ascetic refused to drink the water thus given. On the other hand, with heart stricken with hunger and thirst, he even became angry. Disregarded by the great Rishi through that conviction, the hunter, O king, with his pack of dogs, disappeared there and then. Seeing that disappearance, Utanka felt himself ashamed.

23—27. He even thought that Krishna, that destroyer of enemies, had beguiled him. Soon after, the holder of the conch and discus and mace, gifted with great intelligence, came to Utanka by the way (along which the hunter had come) Addressing Krishna, the Brahmana said,—'O foremost of beings, it was hardly proper for you to offer water to foremost of Brahmanas in the form of a hunter's urine, O lord! Utanka who said these words, Janarddana of great intelligence replied, comforting him with many soft words,—'That form which it was proper to assume for offering you water, in that form was water was water offered to you! But, alas, you could not understand it! The holder of the thunderbolt, Purandara, was requested by me for your sake.

28. My words to that powerful celestial were,—Do you give nectar in the form of water to Utanka.—The king of the celestials replied to me, saying,—It is not meet that a mortal should become immortal!

29. Let some other boon be granted to Utanka!—O son of Bhrigu's race, these words were repeatedly addressed to me. The husband of Shachi, however, was once more requested by me in these words, viz, even nectar should be given to Utanka!

30—32. The king of the celestials then, comforting me, said,—If, O you of great intelligence, nectar is to be given to him, I shall then assume the form of a hunter and give it to that great descendant of Bhrigu. If that son of Bhrigu accepts it thus, I then go to him, O lord, for giving it to him! If, however, he sends me away from disregard, I shall not then give it to him by any means.

33—36 Having made this agreement with me, Vasava appeared before you, in that disguise, for giving thee nectar. You, however, did disregard him and send him away, seeing that the illustrious one had put on the guise of a Chandala. Thy fault has been great. Once more, about your desire, I am prepared to do what is in my power. Indeed, this painful thirst of yours, I shall arrange, shall be satisfied. On those days, O twice born one, in which you will feel a desire for water, clouds well-charged with water will rise over this desert. Those clouds, O son of Bhrigu's race, will give you savoury water to drink Indeed, those clouds will become known in the world as Utanka-clouds.

37. Thus addressed by Krishna, Utanka became glad, and to this day, O Bharata, Utanka clouds (appear and) shower rain on arid deserts.

Janamejaya said :—

1 'With what penances was the great Utanka endued so that he entertained the wish to imprecate a curse on Vishnu himself, who is the source of all power ?

Vaishampayana said .—

2. O Janamejaya, Utanka was gifted with austere penances. He was devoted to his preceptor. Gifted with great energy, he abstained from adoring anybody else.

3 All the children of the Rishis, O Bharata, entertained even this desire, viz., that their devotion to preceptors should be as great as that of Utanka.

4 Gautama's gratification with and affection for Utanka, among his numberless disciples, were very great, O Janamejaya.

5. Indeed, Gautama was greatly pleased with the self-control and purity of conduct that marked out Utanka, and with his acts of prowess and the services he did to him.

6 One after another, thousands of disciples received the preceptor's permission to return home On account, however, of his great affection for Utanka Gautama could not permit him to leave his hermitage.

7 Gradually, in course of time, O son, decrepitude overtook Utanka, that great ascetic. The ascetic, however, on account of his devotion to his preceptor, was not conscious of it

8 One day, he started, O King, for fetching fuel for his preceptor Soon after Utanka brought a heavy load of fuel

9. Toil-worn and hungry and afflicted by the load he carried on his head, O chastiser of enemies, he threw the load down on the Earth, O king

10 One of his matted locks, white as silver, had become entangled with the load Accordingly, when the load was thrown down, with it fell on the earth that matted lock of hair.

11 Oppressed as he had been by that load and overcome by hunger, O Bharata, Utanka, Seeing that sign of old age began to bewail aloud from excess of sorrow

12—13 Knowing every duty, the daughter of his preceptor then, who had eyes resembling lotus petals, and lips that were full and round, at the command of her father, sought, with downcast face to hold Utanka's tears in her hands Her hands seemed to burn with those tear-drops that she held. Unable, accordingly, to hold them longer, she was compelled to throw them down on the Earth.

14—15 The Earth herself was unable to hold those tear drops of Utanka. With a pleased heart, Gautama then said to the twice-born Utanka,—'Why, O son is your mind so afflicted with grief to-day ? Tell me calmly and quietly, O learned Rishi, for I wish to hear it in full.

Utanka said .—

16—17 With mind entirely devoted to you, and wholly bent upon doing what is agreeable to you, with my heart's devotion turned to you, and with thoughts entirely living on you, (I have lived here till) decrepitude has overtaken me without my knowing it at all. I have not again known any happiness Though I have lived with you for a century yet you have not granted me permission to depart.

18 Many disciples of yours, who were my juniors, have, however, been permitted by you to return. Indeed, hundreds and thousands of foremost Brahmanas have, gifted with knowledge, been favored with your permission.

Gautama said :—

19 Through my love and affection for you, and on account of your dutiful services to me, a long time has passed without my knowing it, O foremost of Brahmanas

20. If, however, O you of Bhrigu' race, you desire to leave this place, do you go without delay, with my permission.

Utanka said :—

21 What shall I present to my preceptor ? Tell me this, O best of twice-born persons Having brought it, I shall go hence, O lord, with your permission.

Gautama said :—

22 The good say that the satisfaction of the preceptor is the final fee Forsooth, O twice born one, I have been highly pleased with your conduct.

23—24 Know, O perpetuater of Bhrigu's race, that I have been highly pleased with your conduct Know, O perpetuater of Bhrigu's race, that I have been very much pleased with you for this. If you become a young man to day of sixteen years, I shall confer on you, O twice born one, this my own daughter for becoming your wife No other woman except this one is capable of waiting upon your energy.

25—26. At these words of Gautama, Utanka once again became a youth and accepted that famous maiden for his wife Receiving the permission of his preceptor, he then addressed his preceptor's wife, saying,—What shall I give you as final fee for my preceptor? Do you command me. I wish to do, with riches, or even my life, what is agreeable and beneficial to you

27 Whatever gem, exceedingly wonderful and of great value, exists in this world, I shall bring for for you with the help of my penances I have no doubt in this.

Ahalya said:—

28 I am highly pleased with you, O learned Brahmana, with your unceasing devotion, O sinless one This is enough. Blessed be you, go wherever you like.

Vaishampayana said:—

29 Utanka, however, O king, once more said these words —Do you command me, O mother It is proper that I should do something that is agreeable to you.

Ahalya said:—

30 Blessed be you, bring for me those celestial ear rings which are worn by the wife of Saudasa. That which is due to your preceptor will then be well discharged

31. Replying her,—'So be it,'—Utanka went away, O Janamejaya, determined upon bringing those ear-rings for doing what his preceptor's wife liked.

32 That foremost of Brahmanas, Utanka, proceeded forthwith to Saudasa who had become a cannibal, in order to solicit the ear-rings from him.

33. Gautama meanwhile said to his wife—'Utanka is not to be seen to day. Thus addressed, she informed him how he had gone for fetching the jewelled ear-rings (of Saudasa's queen).

34 At this, Gautama said —'You have not acted wisely. Cursed (by Vasishtha), that king will, indeed, kill Utanka.

Ahalya said:—

45. Without knowing this, O holy one! I have engaged Utanka in this task He shall not, however, come by any danger through your grace.

36. Thus addressed by her, Gautama said,—'Let it be so' Meanwhile Utanka met king Saudasa in a deserted forest.

Vaishampayana said:—

1. Seeing the king, who had become so, of frightful appearance, wearing a long beard smeared with the blood of human beings, the Brahmana Utanka, O king, did not become moved.

2—3 That highly energetic monarch, inspiring terror in every breast and looking like a second Yama, rising up addressed Utanka, saying,—'By good luck, O best of Brahmanas, you have come to me at the sixth hour of the day when I am in search of food.

Utanka said:—

4. O king, know that I have come here in course of my wanderings for the sake of my preceptor. The wise have said that while one is engaged for the sake of one's preceptor, one should not be injured.

The king said:—

5 O best of Brahmanas, food has been ordained for me at the sixth hour of the day. I am hungry. I cannot, therefore, allow you escape to-day.

Utanka said:—

6 Let it be so, O king! Let this agreement be made with me! After I have ceased to wander for my preceptor I shall once more come and put myself within your power.

7 I have heard, O best of kings, that the object I seek for my preceptor is under your control, O king, therefore, O king, I beg you for it.

8 You every day give many foremost of gems to superior Brahmanas You are a giver, O king, from whom gifts may be accepted Know that I too am a worthy object of charity present before you, O best of kings.

9—10. Having accepted from you in gift that object for my preceptor, which is under your control, I shall, O king, on account of my agreement, once more come back to you and put myself under your power. I assure you truly of this. There is no falsehood in this Never before have I spoken any falsehood, no, not even in jest! What shall I say then of other occasions?

Saudasa said:—

Saudasa said —

11 If the object you seek for your preceptor is capable of being placed in your hands by me, If I be considered as one from whom a gift may be accepted, do you then say what that object is!

Utanka said:—

12. O foremost of men, O Saudasa, in my estimation you are a worthy person from whom gifts may be accepted. I have, therefore, come to you for begging of you the jewelled ear-rings (worn by your queen).

Saudasa said:—

13 Those jewelled ear-rings, O learned and twice born Rishi, belong to my wife, They should be asked from her. Do you therefore, solicit some other things from me I shall give it to you, O you of excellent vows!

Utanka said:—

14 If we be considered as any authority, do you cease then to urge this pretext. Do you give those jewelled ear-rings to me. Be truthful in speech, O king.

Vaishampayana said:—

15—16 Thus addressed, the king once more addressed Utanka and said to him,—Do you, at my word, go to my venerable queen O best of men, and ask her saying,—'Give!'—She of pure vows, thus begged by you will certainly, at my command, give you, O foremost of twice-born persons, those jewelled ear-rings of hers without doubt.

Utanka said:—

17. Where, O king, shall I be able to meet your queen? Why do you not yourself go to her?

Saudasa said —

18 You will find her to-day near a forest fountain. I cannot see her to-day as the sixth hour of the day has come.

Vaishampayana said:—

19 Thus addressed, Utanka, O chief of Bharata's race, then left that place Seeing Madayanti, he informed her of his object.

20. Hearing the order of Saudasa, that lady of large eyes replied to the highly intelligent Utanka, O Janamejaya, in these words.

21. It is even so, O twice-born one. You should, however, O sinless one, assure me that you do not say what is untrue! You should bring me some signet from my husband.

22. These celestial ear-rings of mine, made of rich gems, are such that the celestials and Yakshas and great Rishis always watch for opportunities for taking them away.

23 If placed at any time on the Earth, this costly article would then be stolen by the Nagas If worn by one who is impure on account of eating, it would then be taken away by the Yakshas If the wearer falls asleep, the celestials would then take them away.

24 O best of Brahmanas, these ear-rings are capable of being taken away, when such opportunities come, by celestials and Rakshasas and Nagas, if worn by a careless person.

25. O best of twice-born ones, these ear-rings, day and night, always produce gold. At night, they shine brightly, attracting the rays of stars and constellations.

26 O holy one, if worn by any one, he would be freed from hunger and thirst and fear of every sort. The wearer of these ear-rings is freed also from the fear of poison and fire and every kind of danger.

27 If worn by one of short stature, these become short. If worn by one of tall stature, these grow in size

28 Even of such virtues are these ear-rings of mine They are lauded and honoured everywhere Indeed, they are known over the three worlds. Do you, therefore, bring me some sign.

CHAPTER LVIII.

Vaishampayana said.—

1 Returning to king Saudasa who was always well disposed towards all his friends, Utanka solicited him for some sign. That foremost one of Ikshaku's race then gave him a sign.

Saudasa said.—

2. Thus my present condition is intolerable I do not see any refuge. Knowing this to be my wish, do you give away the jewelled ear-rings.

3 Thus addressed by the king, Utanka returned to the queen and reported to her the words of her husband Hearing those words, the queen gave to Utanka her jewelled ear-rings.

4 Having got the ear-rings, Utanka returned to the king and said to him,—I wish to hear, O king, what the meaning is of those mysterious words which you said as a sign to your queen.

Saudasa said :—

5 Kshatriyas are seen to honour the Brahmanas from the very beginning of the creation. Towards the Brahmanas, however, many offences originate (on the part of the Kshatriyas).

6 As for myself, I am always bent in humility before them. I am overtaken by a calamity through a Brahmana. Possessed of Madayanti, I do not see any other refuge.

7. Indeed, O foremost of all persons, having a high goal, I do not see any other refuge for myself in the matter of approaching the celestial gates or in continuing here, O best of twice born ones.

8 It is impossible for a king that is hostile to Brahmanas to continue living in this world or in acquiring happiness in the next.

9 Hence have I given you these my my jewelled ear-rings which were coveted by you Do you now keep the agreement which you have made with me to-day.

Utanka said :—

10. O king, I shall certainly carry out my promise I shall truly return and place myself under your power. There is, however, a question, O scorcher of enemies which I wish to ask you.

Saudasa said :—

11. Say, O learned Brahmana, what is in your mind. I shall certainly reply to your words I shall remove whatever doubt may be in your mind. I have no hesitation in this.

Utanka said :—

12. Those who are skilled in the rules of duty, say that Brahmanas are of controlled speech. One who acts wrongly towards friends is considered as vile as a thief.

13 You, again, O king, have become my friend to-day. Do you then, O foremost of men, give me such advice as is approved by the wise.

14. As for myself, I have now obtained the fruition of my wishes. You, again, are a cannibal. Is it proper for me to return to you or not.

Saudasa said —

15 If it is proper (for me), O foremost of superior Brahmanas, to say what you ask, I should then, O best of twice-born ones, tell you that you should never return to me.

16 O perpetuater of Bhrigu's race, by acting thus, you will secure your well-being. If you return, O learned Brahmana, you will surely meet with death.

Vaishampayana said :—

17. Thus addressed by the intelligent king about what was beneficial for him, Utanka took leave of the king and set out for the presence of Ahalya.

18. Desirous of doing what was agreeable to the wife of his preceptro, he took the ear-rings with him and started with great speed for reaching the hermitage of Gautama.

19 Protecting them even in the manner directed by Madayanti,—that is, binding them within the folds of his black deer-skin,—he proceeded on his way.

20. After he had proceeded for some distance, he became stricken with hunger. He there saw a Vilwa tree covered down with the weight of (ripe) fruits. He climbed that tree.

21. Causing his deer-skin, O chastiser of enemies, to hang on a branch, that foremost of twice-born ones, then began to pluck some fruits.

22—23. While he was engaged in plucking those fruits with eyes set towards them, some of them dropped, O king, on that deer-skin, in which those ear-rings had been carefully tied by that foremost of Brahmanas. With the strokes of the fruits, the knot became loosened.

24 Suddenly that deer-skin, with the ear-rings in it, dropped down. When the knot being unfastened, the deer-skin fell down on the ground, a snake who was there saw those jewelled ear-rings.

25—27. That snake belonged to the race of Airavata. Promptly he took up the ear-rings in his mouth and then entered an ant-hill. Seeing the ear-rings taken by that snake, Utanka, filled with anger and in great anxiety of mind, came down from the tree. Taking his staff he began to pierce that ant-hill.

28 That best of Brahmanas, burning with anger and the desire for revenge, continually busied himself for thirty-five days in that work.

29. The goddess Earth, unable to bear the force of Utanka's walking staff and with body torn therewith, became greatly anxious.

too. He then took his seat with all the Vrishnis sitting around him.

21. Having washed his feet and removed his fatigue, Krishna of mighty energy, as he sat there, then described the chief events of the great battle in answer to the questions put to him by his father.

CHAPTER LX.

(ANUGITA PARVA)—
Continued.

Vasudeva said :—

1. O you of Vrishni's race, I have repeatedly heard men speaking of the wonderful battle.

2 You, however, O mighty-armed one, have seen it with your own eyes Do you, therefore, O sinless one, describe the battle in full.

3—4 Indeed, tell me how that battle took place between the great Pandavas and Bhishma and Karna and Kripa and Drona and Shalya and others, between, in fact, numerous other Kshatriyas well-skilled in arms, differing from one another in conduct and dress and coming from various kingdoms.

Vaishampayana said :—

5. Thus addressed by his father, he having eyes like lotus-petals, described, in the presence of his mother also, how the Kaurava heroes had been killed in battle.

Vasudeva said :—

6. The feats were highly wonderful which were achieved by those great Kshatriyas. On account of their large number, they are incapable of being described in even hundreds of years.

7. I shall, however, mention only the foremost of them Do you listen, therefore, to me as I mention in brief those feats won by the kings of Earth, O you of godlike splendour.

8 Bhishma of Kuru's race became the Commander-in chief, having eleven divisions of the Kaurava princes under his command, like Vasava of the celestial forces.

9 Highly intelligent Shikhandin, protected by the blessed Arjuna, became the leader of the seven divisions of the sons of Pandu

10. The battle between the Kurus and the Pandavas went on for ten days. It was so dreadful as to make one's hair stand erect.

11. Then Shikhandin, in great battle, helped by the holder of Gandiva, killed, with innumerable arrows, the son of Ganga, fighting bravely.

12. Lying on a bed of arrows, Bhishma waited like an ascetic till the sun leaving his southward path entered on his northerly course when that hero died.

13 Then Drona, that foremost of all persons conversant with arms, that greatest of men under Duryodhana, like Kavya himself of the lord of the Daityas, became the Commander-in chief.

14. That foremost of twice-born persons, ever boasting of his prowess in battle, was supported by the residue of the Kaurava-army consisting then of nine Akshauhinis, and protected by Kripa and Vrisha and others.

15 Dhrishtadyumna familiar with many powerful weapons, and gifted with great intelligence, became the leader of the Pandavas. He was protected by Bhima like Varuna protected by Mitra.

16 That great hero, always desirous of comparing his strength with Drona, supported by the Pandava-army, and recollecting the wrongs inflicted (by Drona) on his father (Drupada, the king of the Panchalas) performed great feats in battle.

17. In that battle between Drona and the son of Prishata, the kings assembled from various realms were nearly rooted out.

18. That furious battle lasted for five days. At the conclusion of that period, Drona, exhausted, succumbed to Dhrishtadyumna.

19 After that, Karna became the Commander-in-chief of Duryodhana's forces. He was supported in battle by the residue of the Kaurava-army which numbered five Akshauhinis

20. Of the sons of Pandu, there were then three Akshauhinis. After the destruction of innumerable heroes, protected by Arjuna, they came to battle.

21. The Suta's son Karna, though a dreadful warrior, encountering Partha, came to his end on the second day, like an insect encountering a burning fire.

22 After the fall of Karna, the Kauravas became dispirited and lost all energy. Numbering three Akshauhinis, they gathered round the king of the Madras

23 Having lost many car-warriors and elephants and horsemen, the residue of the Pandava army, numbering one Akshauhini and overtaken with depression, supported by Yudhishthira.

24. The Kuru king Yudhishthira, in the battle that took place, accomplished the most difficult feats and killed, before half the day was over, the king of the Madras.

25 After the fall of Shalya, the great Sahadeva, of immeasurable prowess, killed Shakuni the man who had brought about the quarrel.

26 After the fall of Shakuni, the royal son of Dhritarashtra, whose army had suffered an extensive carnage and who on that account had become greatly dispirited, fled from the field, armed with his mace.

27 Then Bhimasena of great prowess, filled with anger, pursued him and discovered him within the waters of the Dwaipayana lake.

28 With the residue of their army, the Pandavas surrounded the lake and, filled with joy, met Duryodhana concealed within the waters

29 Their wordy arrows, penetrating through the waters pierced Duryodhana Rising up from the lake, the latter approached the Pandavas, armed with his mace, desirous of battle

30 Then, in the great battle that took place, the royal son of Dhritarashtra was killed by Bhimasena, displayed his great prowess, in the presence of many kings

31. After this the residue of the Pandava army as it slept in the camp, was killed at night time by Drona's son who was unable to put up with the destruction of his father (at the hands of Dhrishtadjumna)

32. Their sons killed their forces killed, their friends killed, only the five sons of Pandu, are alive with myself and Yuyudhana.

33 With Kripa and the Bhoja prince Kritavarman, the son of Drona represents the unkilled residue of the Kaurava-army Dhritarashtra's son Yuyutsu also has escaped slaughter on account of his having adopted the side of the Pandavas.

34 Upon the destruction of the Kaurava-king Suyodhana with all his followers and allies, Vidura and Sanjaya have come to the presence of king Yudhishthira the just.

35 Thus did that battle take place, O lord, for eighteen days Many kings of Earth, killed therein, have ascended the

Vaishampayana said :—

1—2 After the great Vasudeva of great prowess had finished his narration of the great battle of the Bharatas before his father, it was plain that that hero had passed over the destruction of Abhimanyu The motive of the great one was that his father might not hear what was highly unpleasant to him.

3 Indeed, the intelligent Krishna did not wish that his father Vasudeva should, on hearing the dreadful intelligence of the death of his daughter's son, be afflicted with sorrow and grief.

4 (His sister) Subhadra, noticing that the slaughter of her son had not been mentioned, addressed her brother, saying,—Do you narrate the death of my son, O Krishna!—and dropped down on the earth (in a swoon).

5 Vasudeva saw his daughter fallen on the ground As soon as he saw this, he also fell down, deprived of his senses by grief.

6—7 (Regaining his senses) Vasudeva, afflicted with grief at the death of his daughter's son, O king, addressed Krishna, saying,—O lotus eyed one, you are famed on Earth for being truthful in speech. Why, however, O destroyer of enemies, do you not tell me to day of the death of my daughter's son?

8 O powerful one, tell me in full of the destruction of your sister's son! Having eyes resembling thine, alas, how was he killed in battle by enemies

9 Since my heart does not from grief break into a hundred pieces, it seems, O you of the Vrishni race, that it does not die with men when its hour does not come.

10 Oh, at the time of his fall, what words did he give utterance to, addressing his mother? O lotus eyed one, what did that darling of mine, having restless eyes, say to me?

11 I hope he has not been killed by enemies while retreating from battle with the just, summoned all his brothers, viz, Arjuna and Bhimasena and the twin sons of Madri, in proper time and then said to them—Ye heroes, you have heard the words which the highly intelligent and great Krishna has said from his friendship for and the desire of doing good to the Kurus! Indeed, you have heard those words that have been uttered by that ascetic of profuse penances, that great sage desirous of conferring prosperity on his friends, that preceptor of righteous conduct, viz, Vyasa of wonderful feats! You have heard what Bhishma also said, and what Govinda too of great intelligence has uttered.

7. Remembering those words, ye sons of Pandu, I wish to obey them duly! By obeying those words of theirs great blessedness will belong to all of you.

8. Those words spoken by those utters of Brahma are certain (if obeyed) to produce considerable benefit. Ye perpetuaters of Kuru's race, the Earth has become divested of her riches.

9—17. Ye kings, Vyasa, therefore, informed us of the wealth of Marutta. If you think that wealth abundant or sufficient, how shall we bring it? What, O Bhima, do you think about this? When the king, O perpetuater of Kuru's race, said these words, Bhimasena, joining his hands, said these words in reply,—The words you have said, O you of mighty arms, on the subject of bringing the riches indicated by Vyasa, are approved by me? If, O powerful one, we succeed in getting the riches kept there by the son of Avikshita, then this sacrifice, O king, purposed by us will be easily accomplished! This is what I think. We shall, therefore, bowing our heads to the great Girisha, and offering due adoration to that deity, bring that wealth. Blessed be you. Pleasing that god of gods as also his companions and followers in words, thought, and deed, we shall, forsooth, obtain that wealth. Those Kinnaras of dreadful appearance who are protecting that treasure will certainly yield to us if the great deity having the bull for his sign becomes pleased with us! Hearing these words uttered by Bhima, O Bharata, king Yudhishthira the son of Dharma, became highly pleased. The others, headed by Arjuna, at the same time, said,—So be it.

18. The Pandavas then, having resolved to bring that wealth, ordered their forces to march under the constellation Dhruba and on the day called by the same name.

19. Making the Brahmanas utter benedictions on them, and having duly adored the great god Maheshwara, the sons of Pandu started (on their enterprise).

20. Pleasing that great deity with Modakas and frumenty and with cakes made of meat, the sons of Pandu started with cheerful hearts.

21. While they thus started, the citizens, and many foremost of Brahmanas, with cheerful hearts, uttered auspicious blessings (on their heads).

22. The Pandavas, going round many Brahmanas who daily adored their fires, and bending their heads unto them, proceeded on their journey.

23—24. Taking the permission of king Dhritarashtra who was stricken with grief on account of the death of his sons, his queen (Gandhari), and Pritha also of large eyes, and keeping the Kaurava-prince Yuyutsu the son of Dhritarashtra, in the capital, they started, adored by the citizens and by many Brahmanans endued with great wisdom.

1. They then started with cheerful hearts, and accompanied by men and animals all of whom and which were equally cheerful. They filled the whole Earth with the loud clatter of their wheels.

2. Their praises sung by eulogists and Sutas and Magadhas and bards, and supported by their own army they appeared like so many Suns adorned with their own rays.

3. With the white umbrella held over his head king Yudhishthira shone with beauty like the lord of the stars on the night when he is at full.

4. That foremost of men the eldest son of Pandu, accepted, with due forms, the blessings and cheers of his gladdened subjects as he went on his way.

5. About the soldiers who followed the king, their confused murmurs seemed to fill the entire sky.

6. That army crossed many lakes and rivers and forests and pleasure gardens. They at last came upon the mountains.

7. Arrived at that region where that wealth was buried. O king, Yudhishthira fixed his camp with all his brothers and troops.

8—13 The region selected for the purpose O chief of Bharata's race, was perfectly level and auspicious. There the king pitched his camp, placing in his van such Brahmanas as were gifted with penances and learning and self-control, as also his priest Agniveshya, O you of Kuru's race, who was well-conversant with the Vedas and all their branches. Then the royal sons of Pandu, and the other kings, and the Brahmanas and priests well-skilled in sacrificial rites having duly performed same propitiatory ceremonies, spread themselves all over that spot. Having duly placed the king and his ministers in the middle, the Brahmanas caused the camp to be pitched by laying out six roads and nine divisions. King Yudhishthira caused a separate encampment to be duly made for the inmates elephants who accompanied his army. When everything was complete, he addressed the Brahmanas, saying,—Ye foremost of Brahmanas, do that which you think should be done in view of the matter at hand Indeed, let an auspicious day and constellation be fixed for it. Let not a long time pass away over our heads as we wait in suspense here Ye foremost of learned Brahmanas, having formed this resolution, do what should be done after this! Hearing these words of the king, the Brahmanas with those amongst them who were well skilled in the performance of religious rites, became filled with gladness and desirous of doing what was agreeable to king Yudhisthira the just, said these words in reply,—This very day is an auspicious one with a auspicious constellation We shall, therefore, try to celebrate those high rites we propose. We shall to-day, O king, live upon water alone. Do you all fast also to-day.

16. Hearing those words of those foremost Brahmanas, the royal sons of Pandu passed that night, abstaining from all food, and lying confidently on beds of Kusha-grass, like burning fires in a sacrifice.

17. And the night wore away as they listened to the discourses of the learned Brahmanas When the cloudless morning came, those foremost of Brahmanas addressed the royal son of Dharma, (saying as follows).

CHAPTER LXV.

(ANUGITA PARVA.)—

The Brahmanas said:—

1. Let offerings be made to the great Mahadeva of three eyes. Having duly dedicated those offerings, O king, we shall then try to gain our object.

2. Hearing these words of those Brahmanas, Yudhisthira caused offerings to be duly made to that deity who loved to lie down on mountain-breasts.

3. Pleasing the (sacrificial) fire with (libations of) sanctified butter according to the ordinance, the priest (Dhaumya) cooked Charu with the aid of Mantras and performed the necessary rites.

4. He took up many flowers and sanctified them with Mantras, O king. With Modakas and frumenty and meat, he made offerings to the deity.

5. With various kinds of flowers and with fried paddy, of very superior kind, Dhaumya, well versed in the Vedas, performed the remaining rites

6 He next presented offerings according to the ordinance to those ghostly beings who formed Mahadeva's train. And offerings were next made to Kuvera the king of the Yakshas, and to Manibhadra also.

7—8 To the other Yakshas also and to them who were the foremost ones among the ghostly companions of Mahdeva, the priest offered due adoration, having filled many jugs with food, with Krisharas and meat and Nivapas mixed with sesame seeds The king gave away unto the the Brahmanas thousands of kine

9—16 He then directed the presentation, according to due rites, of offerings to those night ranging beings(who live with Mahadeva) Surcharged, as it were, with the scent of Dhupas and filled with the fragrance of flowers, that region, sacred to the deity of deities, O king became highly delightful. Having performed the adoration of Rudra and of all the Ganas, the king, placing Vyasa ahead, went towards the place where the treasure was buried. Once more adoring the Lord of riches, and bowing to him with respect and saluting him properly, with various kinds of flowers and cakes and Krishara, having adored those foremost of gems, viz. Shankha and Nidhi and those Yakshas who are the lords of gems, and having adored many foremost of Brahmanas and caused them to utter blessings, the king gifted with great power, strengthened by the energy and the auspicious benedictions of those Brahmanas, caused that spot to be excavated. Then numerous vessels of various and delightful forms, Bringaras, Katahas, Kalasas, Bardhamanakas, and innumerable Bhajanas of beautiful forms, were dug out by king Yudhishthira the just.

his back towards them? I hope, O Govinda, that his face did not become cheerless while fighting?

12 He was possessed, O Krishna, of great energy. From a spirit of childishness, that powerful hero, boasting (of his prowess) in my presence, used to speak of his skill (in battle).

13 I hope that boy does not lie on the field, killed deceitfully by Drona and Karna and Kripa and others? Do you tell me this.

14. That son of my daughter always used to challenge Bhishma and that foremost of all powerful warriors, viz., Karna, in battle.

15—16. His father who, from excess of grief, bewailed thus, Govinda, more afflicted than he, answered in these words,—His face did not become cheerless as he fought in the van of battle. Dreadful though that battle was, he did not turn his back upon it.

17. Having killed hundreds and thousands of kings of Earth, he was distressed by Drona and Karna and at last was killed by the son of Dushasana.

18 If, O lord, he had been encountered, one to one, without intermission, he was incapable of being killed in battle by even the holder of the thunder bolt.

19 When his father Arjuna was withdrawn from the main body by the Samsaptakas Abhimanyu was surrounded by the enraged Kaurava heroes headed by Drona in battle.

20 Then, O father, after he had killed a very large number of enemies in battle, your daughter's son at last succumbed to the son of Dushasana.

21 Forsooth, he has gone to the celestial region! Kill this grief of thine, O you of great intelligence! They who are of purified understandings never languish when they meet with any calamity.

22 He by whom Drona and Karna and others were checked in battle—heroes who were equal to Indra himself in power—why would not he ascend to the celestial region.

23 O irresistible one, do your kill this grief of thine! Do not allow yourself to be swayed by anger. That conqueror of hostile cities has attained to that sanctified end which depends upon death at the edge of weapons

24 After the fall of that hero this my sister Subhadra stricken with grief, bewailed aloud, when she saw Kunti, like a female as prey.

25. When she met Draupadi, she asked her in grief,—O reverend lady, where are all our sons? I wish to see them.

26 Hearing her lamentations, all the Kaurava-ladies embraced her and wept sitting around her.

27. Seeing (her daughter-in-law) Uttara, she said,—O blessed girl, where has your husband gone? When he returns, do you without losing a moment apprise me of it.

28 Alas, O daughter of Virata, as soon he heard my voice, he used to come out of his chamber without the loss of a moment. Why does not your husband come out today.

29 Alas, O Abhimanyu, your maternal uncles—powerful car-warriors—are all hale. They used to bless you when they saw you come here prepared to go out for battle.

30 Do you tell me the incidents of battle to-day as before, O chastiser of enemies. Oh, why do you not answer me to-day—me who am weeping so bitterly?

31—32. Hearing these lamentations of this daughter of the Vrishni-race, Pritha, deeply stricken with grief, addressed her and slowly said,—O Subhadra, though protected by Vasudeva and Satyaki and by his own father, your youthful son has yet been killed. That slaughter is due to the influence of Time

33 O daughter of Yadu's race, mortal your son was Do not grieve. Irresistible in battle, your son has, forsooth, attained to the highest end.

34 You are born in a high family of great Kshatriyas Do not grieve, O you of restless glances, O girl of eyes like lotus-petals!

35 Do you cast your eyes on Uttara, who is quick with child. O blessed lady, do not give way to grief. This auspicious girl will soon bring forth a son to that hero!

36—39 Having comforted her, thus, Kunti, knowing every duty, O perpetuater of Yadu's race, casting off her grief, O irresistible one, made arrangements for Abhimanyu's obsequial rites, with the permission of king Yudhishthira and Bhima, and the twins (viz., Nakula and Sahadeva) who in prowess resembled Yama himself. She also made many presents to the Brahmanas, and bestowed upon them many kine, O perpetuater of Yadu's race Then the Vrishni-dame (Kunti), comforted a little, addressed the daughter of Virata, saying,—O faultless daughter of Virata, you should not grieve! For the sake of your husband,

O you of round hips, protect the child in your womb.

40. Having said these words, O you of great splendour, Kunti ceased. With her permission I have brought Subhadra here.

41 It was thus, O giver of honours, that your daughter's son was killed Cast off your burning grief, O irresistible one! Indeed, do not set your heart on sorrow.

CHAPTER LXII.

Vaishampayana said:—

1. Having heard these words of his son, Vasudeva, that descendant of Shura, of righteous soul, renouncing grief, made excellent obsequial offerings (to Abhimanyu).

2 Vasudeva also performed those rites for the ascension (to Heaven) of his great nephew that hero who was ever the darling of his father (Vasudeva).

3 He duly fed six millions of Brahmanas, gifted with great energy, with edibles possessed of every recommendation.

4—5 Presenting many clothes to them, Krishna satisfied the thirst for wealth of those Brahmanas Wonderful were the heaps of gold, the number of kine and of beds and cloths, that were then given away. The Brahmanas loudly declared,—Let (Krishna's wealth) increase

6. Then Vasudeva of Dasharha's race, and Valadeva, and Satyaki, and Satyaka, each performed the obsequial rites of Abhimanyu.

7 Greatly stricken with grief, they could find no comfort. The same was the case with the sons of Pandu in the city of Hastinapore.

8—9 Deprived of Abhimanyu, they could get no peace of mind. The daughter of Virata, O king, for many days, totally abstained from all food, greatly afflicted by grief on account of the death of her husband At this all her relatives, became plunged into excess of grief. They were all afraid that the embryo in her womb might be destroyed.

10—12. Then Vyasa, ascertaining the state of things by his spiritual vision, arrived there The highly intelligent Rishi, gifted with great energy, arrived (at the palace), addressed Pritha of large eyes, as also Uttara herself, saying,—Let this grief be given up! O famous lady, a son gifted with great energy will be born to you, through the power of Vasudeva and at my word That son will rule the Earth after the Pandavas.

13—14 Seeing Dhananjaya, he said to him, in the hearing of king Yudhishthira, the just and pleasing him with his words, O Bharata,—Your grandson, O highly blessed one, will become a great prince! He will righteously govern the whole Earth to the verge of the sea.

15. Therefore O foremost one of Kuru's race, renounce this grief, O mower of enemies! Do not doubt this! This will truly take place.

16 That which was uttered by the Vrishni-hero on a former occasion, will, surely, happen! Do not think otherwise.

17 As regards Abhimanyu, he has gone to the regions of the celestials, conquered by him with his own deeds. That hero should be grieved for by you or, indeed, by the other Kurus.

18 Thus addressed by his grandfather, Dhananjaya of righteous soul, O king, renounced his grief and even became cheerful.

19 Your father, O prince, who are conversant with all duties, began to grow in that womb O you of great intelligence, like the Moon, in the lighted fortnight.

20 Then Vyasa urged the royal son of Dharma for celebrating the Horse-Sacrifice. Having said so, he made himself invisible there and then.

21 The intelligent king Yudhishthira, the just, hearing the words of Vyasa, set his mind on the journey for bringing wealth.

CHAPTER LXIII.

(ANUGITA PARVA)—

Janamejaya said:—

1. Having heard these words, O twice-born one, that were spoken by the great Vyasa about the Horse-Sacrifice, what steps were taken by Yudhishthira.

2 Tell me, O foremost of twice-born ones, how the king succeeded in obtaining the riches which Marutta had buried in the Earth!

Vaishampayana said:—

3—6 Having heard the words of the Island-born ascetic, king Yudhishthira

The wealth thus dug out was placed in large 'as Karaput' (wooden chests united with each other by chains or cords, and carried by bullocks or camels) for protection.

17. A portion of the wealth was caused to be carried upon the shoulders of men in stout balances of wood with baskets slung like scales at both ends Indeed, O king, there were other methods of conveyance there for carrying away that wealth of the son of Pandu.

18. There were sixty thousands of camels, and a hundred and twenty thousand horses, and of elephants, O king, there were one hundred thousand

19. Of cars there were as many, and of carts too as many, and of she elephants as many. Mules and men were of unlimited number.

20 That wealth which Yudhishthira caused to be dug out was even so much Sixteen thousand coins were placed on the back of each camel; eight thousand on each car, and twenty-four thousand on each elephant.

21—22. Having loaded these vehicles with that wealth and once more adoring the great deity Shiva, the son of Pandu started for the city of Hastinapur, with the permission of the Island born Rishi, and placing his priest Dhaumya in the van That foremost of men, viz, the royal son of Pandu, made short marches of four miles every day.

23 That powerful army, O king afflicted with the weight they bore, returned carrying that wealth, towards the capital, pleasing the hearts of all those perpetuaters of the Kuru- ace.

CHAPTER LXVI.

(ANUGITA PARVA)—

Vaishampayana said:—

1 Meanwhile, the highly energetic Vasudeva, accompanied by the Vrishnis, came to the city of Hastinapore.

2 While leaving that city for returning to his own Dwaraka, he had been requested by the son of Dharma to come back. Hence, knowing, that the time fixed for the Horse-Sacrifice had come, that foremost of men returned to Hastinapore.

3—4. Accompained by the son Rukmini, by Yuyudhana, by Charudeshna, by Shamva by Gada, by Kritavarman, by the heroic Sarana, by Nishatha and by Unmukha, Vasudeva came, with Valadeva at the head of the train, and with Subhadra also accompanying him.

5 Indeed, that hero came for seeing Draupadi, Uttara and Prithu and for comforting those renowned Kshatriya-ladies who had been bereft of many of their protectors.

6 Seeing those heroes come, king Dhritarashtra, as also the great Vidura, received them with due honours.

7. That foremost of men, viz, Krishna of great energy, worshipped by Vidura and Yuyutsu, continued to live in the Kuru capital.

8. It was while the Vrishni heroes O Janamejaya, were living in the Kuru city, O king, that your father, that destroyer of hostile heroes, was born.

9 The royal Parikshit, O monarch, afflicted by the Brahma-weapon of Ashwatthaman), upon coming out of the womb, lay still and motionless for he had no life. By his birth he had pleased the citizens but soon plunged them into grief.

10. The citizens, learning of the birth of the prince, uttered a leonine shout. That noise proceeded to the utmost limit of every point of the compass. Soon, however, that noise ceased.

11. Krishna, his senses and mind considerably affected, with Yuyudhana in his company, entered speedily the inner apartments of the palace

12 He saw his own paternal aunt (Kunti) coming, loudly weeping and calling upon him repeatedly.

13 Behind her were Draupadi and the famous Subhadra, and the wives of the relatives of the Pandavas, all weeping piteously.

14 Meeting Krishna, Kunti, that daughter of the Bhoja race, said to him in a voice choked with tears, O foremost of monarchs.

15 O Vasudeva, O mighty-armed hero Devaki by having borne you, has come to be considered as an excellent genetrix! You are our refuge and our glory! This race (of Pandu) depends upon you for its protector.

16 O Yadava hero, O powerful one this child of your sister's son, has come, out of the womb, killed by Ashwatthamane, O Keshava, do you revive him!

17. O delighter of the Yadavas, this was vowed by you, O powerful one, when Ashwatthaman had inspired the blade of grass into a Brahma-weapon of great energy! Indeed, O Keshava, your words were these —I shall revive that child if he comes out of the womb dead!

18—19 That child, O son has been born dead! See him, O foremost of men You should, O Madhava, rescue Uttara and Subhadra and Draupadi and myself, and Dharma's son (Yudhishthira), and Bhima and Phalguna, and Nakula and the irresistible Sahadeva

20—21 In this child are fettered the life-breaths of the Pandavas and myself! O you of the Dasharha-race, on him depends the obsequial cake of Pandu as also of my father-in-law, and of Abhimanyu too, blessed be you that favourite nephew of yours who was so very like you! Do you do to-day what will be beneficial to all these! I urge you earnestly, O Janarddana.

22 Uttara, O destroyer of enemies, always repeats the words said to her by Abhimanyu Forsooth, O Krishna, those words were highly agreeable to her.

23 O you of the Dasharha-race, Arjuna's son said to this daughter of Virata,—Your son, O blessed girl, will go to my maternal uncles.

24 Taking up his quarters with the Vrishnis and Andhakas, he will obtain from them the science of arms, indeed, various wonderful weapons and the whole of the science of polities and morality.

25 These were the words, O son, that that destroyer of hostile heroes, viz, the son of Subhadra, that irresistible hero, said to Uttara from his love for her.

26 O destroyer of Madhu, bowing our heads to you, we pray you for making those words of Abhimanyu true! In view also of the time that has come, do you accomplish what is highly beneficial.

27. Having said these words to that hero of the Vrishni's race, Pritha of large eyes, raised her arms upwards and with the other ladies in her company, dropped down on the Earth.

28 All of them, with eyes rendered muddy by tears, repeatedly exclaimed, saying,—Alas, the son of Vasudeva's nephew has been born dead.

29 After Kunti had said so, Janarddana took hold of her, O Bharata, and gently raising her from the Earth, comforted her as follows.

CHAPTER LXVII.

(ANUGITA PARVA.)—

Vaishampayana said —

1—2 After Kunti had sat up, Subhadra, seeing her brother, began to weep aloud, and stricken with excessive grief, said,—O you having eyes like lotus petals, look at the grandson of Arjuna of great intelligence! Alas, the Kuru-race having been thinned, a child has been born that is feeble and dead.

3 The blade of grass, uplifted by Drona's son for bringing about the destruction of Bhimasena, fell upon Uttara and Vijaya and myself.

4 Alas that blade, O Keshava, is still existing (unextracted) in me, after having pierced my heart, since I do not, O irresistible hero, see this child with my son.

5 What will the righteous-souled king Yudhishthira the just say? What will Bhimasena and Arjuna, and the two sons of Madravati also say?

6 Hearing that Abhimanyu's son was born and dead, the Pandavas, O you of Vrishni's race, will consider themselves as imposed upon by Ashwatthaman.

7. Abhimanyu, O Krishna, was forsooth, the minion of all the Pandava-brothers. Hearing this intelligence, what will those heroes, defeated by the weapon of Drona's son, say?

8 What grief, O Janarddana, can be greater than this, viz, that Abhimanyu's son should be born and dead?

9 Bowing to you with my head, O Krishna I seek to please you to-day! See O foremost of men, these two standing here, viz, Pritha and Draupadi

10—11. When, O Madhava, the son of Drona tried to destroy the embryos even in the wombs of the ladies of the Pandavas, at that time O grinder of enemies, you said in anger to Drona's son (even these words). —O wretch of a Brahmana, O vilest of men, I shall disappoint your wish! I shall revive the son of Kunti's son.

12. Hearing these words of yours and well-knowing your power, I seek to gratify you, O irresistible hero! Let the son of Abhimanyu be revived.

13 If having pledged yourself previously you do not accomplish your auspicious vow do you then know for certain, O chief of the Vrishni race, that I shall put an end to my life.

14 If, O hero, this son of Abhimanyu does not revive when you, O irresistible one, are alive and near, of what other use will you be to me?

15 Do you, therefore O irresistible one revive this son of Abhimanyu—this child who has eyes similar to his—even as a rain charged cloud revives the lifeless crops (on a field)

16 You, O Keshava, are righteous-souled truthful and of prowess incapable of being baffled You should, O chastiser of enemies make your words truthful

17 If only you wish it, you can revive the three worlds (of beings) if dead! What need I say, therefore, of this darling child, born but dead, of your sister's son?

18 I know your power, O Krishna! Therefore do I solicit you! Do you show this great favour to the sons of Pandu

19 You should, O mighty armed one, show mercy to this Uttara, or to me, thinking that I am your sister or even a mother who has lost her son, and one who has thrown herself upon your protection.

CHAPTER LXVIII.

(ANUGITA PARVA.)—

Continued.

Vaishampayana said:—

1. Thus addressed, O king, the destroyer of Keshin greatly possessed by sorrow answered,—So be it!—These words were uttered with sufficient loudness and they pleased all the inmates of the inner apartments of the palace

2 The powerful Krishna, that foremost of men, by uttering these words pleased all the people assembled there, like one pouring cold water on a person afflicted with sweat.

3—5 He then quickly entered the lying-in room in which your father was born It was duly sanctified, O king, with many garlands of white flowers, with many well-filled water-pots arranged on every side, with char-coal, soaked in clarified butter of Tinduka wood, and mustard seeds, O you of mighty arms, with shining weapons properly arranged and several fires on every side And it was filled with many agreeable and aged dames summoned for waiting.

6—7 It was also surrounded by many well skilled and clever physicians, O you of great intelligence! Gifted with great energy, he also beheld there all articles that are destructive of Rakshasas, duly placed by persons knowing the subject. Seeing the lying in room in which your father was born thus equipt, Hrishikesha became very glad and said,—Excellent, Excellent!'

8—9 When he of Vrishni's race said so and presented such a cheerful look, Draupadi, going there quickly, addressed the daughter of Virata, saying,—O blessed lady, here comes to you your father-in-law, the destroyer of Madhu, that ancient Rishi of inconceivable soul, that unvanquished one

10 Virata's daughter, checking her tears said these words in a voice chocked with grief Covering herself properly, the princess waited for Krishna like the celestials reverentially waiting for him

11. The helpless lady with heart agitated by sorrow, seeing Govinda coming, bewailed, saying,—

12 O lotus eyed one, see us two deprived of our child! O Janarddana, both Abhimanyu and myself have been equally killed.

13 O you of Vrishni's race, O destroyer of Madhu, I seek to please you by bending my head, O hero, to you! Do you revive this child of mine who has been consumed by the weapon of Drona's son.

14—15 If king Yudhishthira the just, or Bhimasena, or yourself, O lotus eyed one, had, on that occasion, said,—Let the blade of grass destroy the unconscious mother,—O powerful one, then I would have been destroyed and this would not have taken place.

16 Alas, what benefit has been reaped by Drona's son by doing this cruel deed, viz, the destruction of the child in the womb by his Brahma weapon.

17. That self same mother now seeks to please you O slayer of enemies, by bending her head! Surely, O Govinda, I shall kill myself if this child does not revive.

18 In him, O righteous one, I placed many expectations! Alas, when these have been frustrated by Drona's son, what necessity have I, O Keshava, to carry on the burden of life?

19 I hoped O Krishna, that with my child on my lap, O Janarddana I would salute you with respect! Alas, O Keshava, that hope has been destroyed.

20 O foremost of all beings, at the death of this heir of Abhimanyu of restless eyes, all my hopes have been destroyed.

21. Abhimanyu of restless eyes, O destroyer of Madhu, was exceedingly dear to you B hold this child of his killed by the Brahma-weapon.

22 This child is very ungrateful and very heartless, like his father, for, see, disregarding the prosperity and affluence of the Pandavas, he has gone to Yama's house

23 I had, before this vowed, O Keshava, that if Abhimanyu fell on the field of battle, O hero, I would follow him immediately.

24 I did not, however, keep my vow, cruel that I am and fond of life! If I go to him now, what, indeed, will Phalguna's son say?

Vaishampayana said:—

1 The helpless Uttara, desirous of getting back her child, having thus bewailed, dropped down in sorrow on the earth like a demented creature.

2. Seeing the princess fallen on the earth deprived of her son and with her body uncovered, Kunti as also all the other) Bharata-ladies, deeply afflicted, began to weep aloud.

3. Resounding with the voice of lamentation, the palace of the Pandavas, O king, was soon converted into a house of sorrow where nobody could remain.

4 Greatly stricken with grief on account of her son, Virata's daughter, O king seemed to be struck down for sometime by sorrow and cheerlessness.

5 Regaining consciousness, O chief of Bharata's race Uttara took up her child on her lap and said these words

6 You are the child of one who knew every duty Are you not conscious then of the sin you commit since you do not salute this foremost one of the Vrishni's race?

7—8 O son, going to your father tell him these words of mine, viz,—It is difficult for living creatures to die before their time comes, because through reft of you, my husband, and now deprived of my child also, I am yet alive when I should die, unendued as I am with everything auspicious and everything valuable.

9 O mighty-armed one, with the permission of king Yudhishthira the just, I shall swallow some dreadful poison or cast myself on the burning fire.

10. O father, difficult of destruction is my heart since, though I am deprived of husband and child, that heart of mine does not break into a thousand pieces.

11. Rise, O son, and see this your afflicted greatgrandmother! She is deeply stricken with grief, bathed in tears, exceedingly cheerless, and plunged in an ocean of sorrow.

12. See the reverend princess of Panchala, and the helpless princess of the Sattata race! Look at myself, exceedingly afflicted with grief, and resembling a deer pierced by a hunter.

13 Rise, O child, and look at the face of this king, who is gifted with great wisdom, and possessed of eyes like lotus petals and resembling your father of restless glances.

14 Seeing Uttara, who bewailed thus, fallen on the earth, all those ladies, raising her, caused her to sit up.

15. Having sat up, the daughter of the king of the Matsyas, summoning her patience, joined her hands in respect and touched the earth with her head for saluting Keshava having eyes like lotus-petals

16 Hearing those heart-rending lamentations of hers, that foremost of persons touched water and withdrew the (force of the Brahma weapon.

17—18 That hero of undecaying glory, belonging to the race of the Dasharhas, promised to revive the child Then he of pure soul, said these words in the hearing of the whole universe—'O Uttara, I never utter a falsehood My words will prove true I shall revive this child before all creatures.

19 Never before have I uttered a falsehood even in jest. Never have I turned back from battle (By the merit of those deeds) let this child revive

20. As virtue is dear to me, as Brahmanas are especially dear to me, let Abhimanyu's son, who is born dead, revive.

21. Never has a misunderstanding arisen between me and my friend Vijaya. Let this dead child revive by that truth

22 As truth and virtue are always established in me, let this dead child of Abhimanyu revive.

23 As Kansa and Keshi have been righteously killed by me, let this child revive to day by that truth.

24 After these words were uttered by Vasudeva, that child, O foremost one of Bharata's family, became animate and began gradually to move, O king.

CHAPTER LXX

Vaishampayana said:—

1. When the Brahma weapon was withdrawn by Krishna at that time, the lying-in-room was lighted up by your father with his energy.

2 All the Rakshasas were forced to leave the room and many of them were killed In the sky a voice was heard, saying,—Excellent, O Keshava, Excellent.

3 The burning Brahma weapon then returned to the Grandfather Your father got back His, O king

4 The child began to move according to his energy and power The Bharata-ladies became all filled with joy.

5 At the command of Govinda, the Brahmanas were made to utter benedictions All the ladies filled with joy, lauded Janarddana.

6 Indeed the wives of those Bharata-heroes viz, Kunti and Drupada's daughter and Subhadra and Uttara, and the wives of other leading men, like (ship wrecked) persons who have reached the shore after having got a boat became greatly pleased

6—8 Then wrestlers and actors and astrologers and those who enquire after the sleep (of princes), and bands of bards and eulogists all uttered the praises of Janarddana while uttering benedictions filled with the praises of the Kurus, O chief of the Bharatas.

9 Uttara, rising up at the proper time, with a pleased heart and bearing her child in her arms reverentially saluted the delighter of the Yadus

10—14 Rejoicing greatly, Krishna made gifts to the child of many valuable gems The other chiefs of the Vrishni race, did the same Then the powerful Janarddana, firmly following truth, bestowed a name on the infant who was your father, O monarch — Since this child of Abhimanyu has been born at a time when this family has become nearly extinct, let his name be Parikshit' This is what he said Then your father, O king, began to grow and please all the people, O Bharata When your father was a month old, O hero, the Pandavas returned to their capital, bringing with them abundant riches Hearing that the Pandavas were near, those foremost ones of the Vrishni race went out

15. The citizens decked the city of Hastinapur with many garlands of flowers, with beautiful pennons and standards of various kinds.

16 The citizens also, O king, adorned their respective palaces Desirous of doing what was beneficial to the sons of Pandu, Vidura ordered various kinds of adoration to be offered to the celestials established in their respective temples The principal streets of the city were adorned with flowers.

18—21. Indeed, the city was filled with the noise of thousands of voices which resembled the softened roar of distant ocean waves With dancers all engaged in their business, and with the voice of singers, the (Kuru) city then resembled the palace of Vaishravana himself Bards and eulogists, O king, accompanied by beautiful women, were seen to adorn various retired spots in the city The pennons were made by the wind to float gaily on every part of the city, as if bent upon showing the Kurus the southern and the northern points of the compass. All the officers also of the government loudly proclaimed that that was to be a day of rejoicing for the whole kingdom as a mark of the success of the enterprise for bringing a profusion of gems and other valuables.

CHAPTER LXXI.

(ANUGITA PARVA)—

Vaishampayana said:—

1. Hearing that the Pandavas were near, that destroyer of enemies viz, Vasudeva, accompanied by his ministers, went out for seeing them

2 The Pandavas then, uniting with the Vrishnis according to the usual formalities, together entered, O king, the city of Hastinapur.

3 With the voices and the clatter of cars of that powerful host, the Earth and the sky, and the firmament itself, became, as it were, entirely filled

4 With rejoicing hearts, the Pandavas, accompanied by their officers and friends, entered the capital, placing that treasure in their van.

5 Going, according to custom, to king Dhritarashtra first, they adored his feet, announcing their respective names

6 Those foremost ones of Bharata's race, O chief of kings then paid their respectful salutations to Gandhari, the daughter of Suvala, and to Kunti

7 They next adored (their uncle) Vidura and Yuyutsu, the son of Dhritarashtra by his Vaishya wife. Those heroes were then adored by others and they shone forth in beauty, O king.

8 After this, O Bharata, those heroes heard the news of that highly wonderful and marvellous and gladsome birth of your father.

9 Hearing of that feat of the highly intelligent Vasudeva, they all adored Krishna, the delighter of Devaki, who was every way worthy of adoration.

10 Then, after a few days, Vyasa, the son of Satyavati, gifted with great energy, came to the city of Hastinapur.

11. The perpetuaters of Kuru's race adored the great Rishi according to the usual custom Indeed, those heroes, with those foremost princes of the Vrishnis and the Andhaka-races worshipped the sage.

12—13 After having conversed on various topics, Dharama's son Yudhishthira addressed Vyasa and said,—This treasure, O holy one, which has been brought through your favour, I desire to devote to that great Horse Sacrifice.

14 O best of ascetics, I wish to have your permission We are all, O Rishi, at your disposal, and at that of the great Krishna.

Vyasa said :—

15 I give you permission, O king. Do what should be done after this Do you adore the deities duly by performing the Horse-Sacrifice with profuse gifts.

16 The Horse-Sacrifice, O king, is a purifier of all sins Forsooth, having adored the deities by that sacrifice you will surely be purged of all sins.

Vaishampayana said :—

17 Thus addressed, the Kuru King Yudhishthira of righteous soul, O monarch, began to make the necessary preparations for the Horse-Sacrifice.

18—19 Having represented all this to the Island born Krishna, the king gifted with great eloquence, approached Vasudeva and said,—O foremost of all beings, the goddess Devaki has, through you come to be considered as the most fortunate of mothers O you of undecaying glory, do you perform what I shall now tell you, O mighty-armed one

20 O delighter of the Kurus, the various enjoyments we enjoy, have all been acquired through your power. The whole Earth has been subjugated by you with the help of your prowess and intelligence.

21. Do you, therefore, cause yourself to undergo the rites of initiation. You are our highest preceptor and master. If you perform the sacrifice, O you of the Dasharha-race, I shall be purified from every sin.

22. You are Sacrifice! You are the Indestructible! You are this All! You are Virtue! You are Prajapati! You are the goal of all creatures! This is my certain conclusion.

Vasudeva said :—

23 O mighty-armed one, what you say is worthy of you O chastiser of enemies! You are the goal of all creatures. This is my certain conclusion.

24 Of the heroes of the Kuru-race, you shine to-day in great glory for your virtue! They have all been cast into the shade, O king, by you! You are our king, and you are our senior.

25 With my approval freely granted, do you worship the celestials in the sacrifice suggested Do you, O Bharata, appoint us to whatever task you like Truly, do I pledge myself that I shall accomplish all, O sinless one, that you mayst bid me accomplish.

26 Bhimasena and Arjuna and the two sons of Madravati will be sacrificing when you, O king, sacrifice.

CHAPTER LXXII.

(ANUGITA PARVA)—

Vaishampayana said :—

1. Thus addressed by Krishna Yudhishthira, the son of Dharma, gifted with great intelligence, saluted Vyasa and said these words :—

2 Do you cause me to be initiated when the proper hour, as you truly know, come for that rite This my sacrifice entirely depends on you

Vyasa said :—

3 Myself, O son of Kunti, and Paila and Vaisampayana, shall, undoubtedly, achieve every rite at the proper time.

4 The rite of initiating you will be performed on the day of full moon belonging to the month of Chaitra. Let all the necessaries of the sacrifice, O foremost of men, be got ready.

5 Let Sutas well versed in the science of horses and let Brahmanas also possessed of the same learning, select, after examination, a worthy horse in order that your sacrifice may be completed.

6. Loosening the animal according to the injunctions of the scriptures, let him wander over the whole Earth with her belt of seas, showing your effulgent glory, O king.

Vaishampayana said :—

7. Thus addressed (by the Rishi), Yudhishthira, the royal son of Pandu, answered,—'So be it!'—and then, O monarch, he accomplished all that that utterer of Brahma had said.

8. All the articles necessary for the sacrifice, O king, were duly procured.

9 The royal son of Dharma, gifted with immeasurable soul, having procured all the necessaries, informed the Island born Krishna of it.

10 Then the highly energetic Vyasa said to the royal son of Dharma,—'As regards ourselves, we are all prepared to initiate you in view of the sacrifice.

11. Let the Sphya and the Kurcha and all the other articles that, O you of Kuru's race, may be necessary for your sacrifice, be made of gold.

12 Let the horse also be loosened to-day, for wandering on the Earth, according to the ordinances of the scriptures Let the animal, duly protected, wander over the Earth.'

Yudhishthira said :—

13 Let arrangements be made by you, O twice-born one about loosening this horse for enabling it to wander over the Earth at its will.

14. You should, O ascetic say who will protect this horse while roaming over the Earth freely according to its will.

Vaishampayana continued :—

15—16 Thus addressed (by king Yudhishthira), O king, the Island born Krishna said —He who is born after Bhimasena, who is the foremost of all bowmen who is called Jishnu, who is gifted with great patience and capable of overcoming all resistance,—he will protect the horse That destroyer of the Nivatakavachas can conquer the whole Earth.

17. In him are all celestial weapons, His body is like that of a celestial in its powers of endurance. His bow and quivers are celestial. He will follow this horse.

18 He is well-versed in both Religion and Profit. He is a master of all the sciences O foremost of kings he will, according to the scriptures, cause the horse to roam and graze at its will.

19 This mighty-armed prince, of dark color, is endued with eyes resembling lotus-petals That hero, the father of Abhimanyu, will protect the horse.

20. Bhimasena also is gifted with great energy That son of Kunti is possessed of immeasurable power. He is competent to protect the kingdom, helped by Nakula, O monarch.

21 Gifted with great intelligence and fame, Sahadeva will, O you of Kuru's race, duly attend to all the relatives who have been invited to your capital.

22. Thus addressed by the Rishi, that perpetuator of Kuru's race, viz., Yudhishthira, performed every injunction duly and appointed Phalguna to attend to the horse.

Yudhishthira said :—

23 Come, O Arjuna, let the horse, O hero, be protected by you You alone are competent to protect it, and none else.

24. Those kings O mighty-armed hero who will come forward to encounter you, try O sinless one, to avoid battles with them to the best of your power.

25 You should also invite them all to this sacrifice of mine. Indeed, O mighty-armed one, go forth but try to establish friendly relations with them.

Vaishampayana said :—

26 Having said so to his brother Savyasachin, the righteous-souled king Yudhishthira commanded Bhima and Nakula to protect the city.

27. With the permission of king Dhritarashtra, Yudhishthira then set Sahadeva, that foremost of warriors, to wait upon all the invited guests.

CHAPTER LXXIII.

(ANUGITA PARVA)—

Vaishampayana said:—

1. When the hour for initiation came, all those great Ritwijas duly initiated the king for the Horse-Sacrifice.

2 Having finished the rites of binding the sacrificial animals, the son of Pandu, viz., king Yudhishthira the just, gifted with great energy, the initiation being over, shone with great splendour along with those Ritwijas.

3 The horse that was brought for the Horse-Sacrifice was let loose according to the injunctions of the scriptures, by that utterer of Brahma, viz., Vyasa himself of great energy.

4. Then king Yudhishthira the just, O king, after his initiation adorned with a garland of gold around his neck, shone like a burning fire.

5. Having a black deer skin for his upper garment, carrying a staff in hand, and wearing a cloth of red silk, the son of Dharma, gifted with great splendour, shone like a second Prajapati seated on the sacrificial altar.

6 All his Ritwijas also, O king, were clad in similar dresses. Arjuna also shone like a burning fire.

7. Dhananjaya, to whose car were yoked white horses, then duly prepared, O king, to follow that horse of the complexion of a black deer, at the command of Yudhishthira.

8. Repeatedly drawing his bow, named Gandiva, O king, and casting his hand in a fence made of iguana skin, Arjuna, O monarch, prepared to follow that horse, O king, with a cheerful heart.

9. All Hastinapur, O king, with the very children, came out at that spot from desire of seeing Dhananjaya, that foremost of the Kurus, on the eve of his journey.

10 So great was the crowd of spectators that came to see the horse and the prince who was to follow it, that on account of the pressure of bodies, it seemed a fire was created.

11. Loud was the noise which arose from that crowd of men who assembled together for seeing Dhananjaya the son of Kunti, and it seemed to fill all the points of the compass and the entire sky.

12 And they said,—There goes the son of Kunti, and there that horse of burning beauty. Indeed, the mighty-armed hero follows the horse, having armed himself with his excellent bow.

13 These were the words which the intelligent Jishnu heard The citizens also blessed him, saying,— Let blessings be yours' Go safely and return, O Bharata'

14 Others, O chief of men, uttered these words —'So great is the crowd that we do not see Arjuna. His bow, however, we see.

15 That is the celebrated bow Gandiva of terrible twang Blessed be you Let all dangers fly from your path Let fear nowhere inspire you.

16 When he returns we shall see him, for it is certain that he will return. The great Arjuna repeatedly heard these and similar other sweet words of men and women O chief of the Bharatas A disciple of Yajnavalkya, who was well-versed in all sacrificial rites, and who was a complete master of the Vedas proceeded with Partha for performing auspicious rites in favour of the hero Many Brahmanas also, O king, all knowing Vedas well, and many Kshatriyas too, followed the great hero, at the command, O monarch, of Yudhishthira the just.

20 The horse then travelled, O foremost of men wherever he liked over the Earth already conquered by the Pandavas with the power of their weapons.

21 In course of the horse's wanderings, O king many great and wonderful battles were fought between Arjuna and many kings. These I shall describe to you.

22 The horse, O king, travelled over the whole Earth. Know, O monarch, that from the north it turned towards the East.

23 Grinding the kingdoms of many kings that excellent horse wandered And it was followed slowly by the great car-warrior Arjuna of white horses.

24 O monarch, many Kshatriyas and kings, who fought with Arjuna on that occasion, were rendered miserable for having lost their kinsmen on the field of Kurukshetra.

25—26 Many Kiratas also, O king, and Yavanas, all excellent bowmen, and various tribes of Mlechchas too, who had been discomfited before (by the Pandavas on the field of Kurukshetra), and many Aryan kings, possessed of soldiers and animals gifted with great alacrity, and all irresistible in fight, met the son of Pandu in battle.

27. Thus took place innumerable battles in various countries, O monarch, between Arjuna and the kings of various realms who came to encounter him.

28 I shall, O sinless king, describe to you those battles only which raged with great fury and which were the principal ones among all he fought.

CHAPTER LXXIV.

(ANUGITA PARVA.)—Continued.

Vaishampayana said:—

1. A battle took place between the diadem-decked (Arjuna) and the sons and grandsons of the Trigartas whose hostility the Pandavas had incurred before and all of whom were well-known as powerful car-warriors

2 Having learnt that that foremost of horses which was intended for the sacrifice, had come to their kingdom, those heroes, accoutering themselves in coats mail, surrounded Arjuna.

3 Mounted on their cars, drawn by excellent and well decked steeds and with quivers on their backs, they surrounded that horse, O king, and tried to capture it.

4 Thinking of that attempt of theirs, the diadem decked Arjuna, forbade those heroes, with conciliatory words, O chastiser of enemies.

5 Disregarding Arjuna's message, they attacked him with their arrows The diadem decked Arjuna resisted those warriors who were under the control of darkness and passion.

6 Jishnu, addressed them smilingly and said ,—'Desist, ye unrighteous ones! Life is a blessing.'

7. At the time of his starting, he had been earnestly ordered by king Yudhishthira the just not to kill those Kshatriyas whose kinsmen had been killed before on the field of Kurukshetra.

8 Remembering these behests of king Yudhishthira the just who was gifted with great intelligence, Arjuna asked the Trigartas to forbear. But they disregarded Arjuna's injunction

9 Then Arjuna defeated Suryavarman, the king of the Trigartas, in battle, by shooting countless arrows at him and laughed in scorn.

10 The Trigarta warriors, however filling the ten points with the sound of their cars and car-wheels, rushed towards Dhananjaya.

11 Then Suryavarman, showing great lightness of hand, pierced Dhananjaya with hundreds of straight arrows, O king!

12. The other great bowmen, who followed the king and who were all desirous of bringing about the destruction of Dhananjaya, shot showers of arrows on him

13. With numberless arrows shot from his own bowstring, the son of Pandu, O king, cut off those clouds of arrows upon which they fell down

14 Gifted with great energy, Ketuvarman, the younger brother of Suryavarman, and gifted with youthful vigour, fought, for the sake of his brother, against Pandu's son endued with great fame

15 Seeing Ketuvarman approaching towards him for battle, Vibhatsu, that destroyer of hostile heroes, killed him with many sharp-pointed arrows.

16. Upon Ketuvarmana's fall, the powerful car-warrior Dhritavarman, rushing on his car towards Arjuna, showered a perfect downpour of arrows on him.

17 Seeing that lightness of hand shown by the youth Dhritavarman, Gudakesha of great energy and great prowess became highly pleased with him.

18 The son of Indra could not see when the young warrior took out his arrows and when he placed them on his bowstring aiming at him. He only saw showers of arrows in the air.

19 For a brief space of time, Arjuna pleased his enemy and mentally admired his heroism and skill.

20 The Kuru hero, smiling the while, fought with that youth who took after an angry snake. The mighty armed Dhananjaya glad as he was in seeing the courage of Dhritavarman, did not take his life.

21. While, however, Partha of immeasurable energy fought mildly with him without wishing to kill him, Dhritavarman shot a burning arrow at him.

22 Deeply pierced in the hand by that arrow, Vijaya became stupefied and his bow Gandiva dropped down on the Earth from his relaxed grasp.

23 The form of that bow, O king, when it fell from the grasp of Arjuna, resembled, O Bharata, that of the bow of Indra

24. When that great and celestial bow dropped down, O king, Dhritavarman laughed loudly in battle.

25 At this, Jishnu, worked up with rage wiped the blood from his hand and once more taking up his bow, showered a perfect downpour of arrows

26 Then a loud and confused noise arose filling the sky and touching the very heavens, as it were, from various creatures who spoke highly of that feat of Dhananjaya.

27—28 Seeing Jishnu inflamed with wrath and looking like Yama himself as he appears as the end of the cycle, the Trigarta warriors hastily surrounded him rushing from their posts and desirous of rescuing Dhritavarman. Seeing himself surrounded by his enemies, Arjuna became more angry than before.

29 He then quickly despatched eighteen of their foremost warriors with many arrows of keen iron which resembled the arrows of the great Indra himself.

30. The Trigarta warriors then began to fly. Seeing them retreat, Dhananjaya, quickly shot many shafts at them which resembled angry snakes of dreadful poison, and laughed aloud.

31. The powerful car-warriors of the Trigartas, with dispirited hearts, fled in all directions, greatly afflicted by Dhananjaya with his arrows.

32 They then addressed that foremost of men, that destroyer of the Samsaptaka army, saying,—'We are your slaves! We yield to you.

33 Do you command us, O Partha! Lo, we wait here as the most docile of your servants!—O delighter of the Kurus, we shall execute all your commands'

34. Hearing these words expressive of their submission, Dhananjaya said them,—'Do ye, O kings, save your lives, to and accept my dominion.'

CHAPTER LXXV.

(ANUGITA PARVA.)—

Continued.

Vaishampayana said:—

1. That foremost of horses then proceeded to the kingdom of Pragjyotisha and began to wander there At this, Bhagadatta's son who was greatly courageous in battle, came out.

2. King Vajradatta, O chief of the Bharatas, finding the (sacrificial) horse arrived within his kingdom, fought (for detaining it)

3 The royal son of Bhagadatta, coming out of his city, afflicted the horse which was coming (and seizing it), marched back towards his own place

4 Marking this the mighty armed chief of the Kuru race, speedily stretched his Gandiva, and suddenly rushed towards his enemy.

5 Stupefied by the arrows shot from Gandiva, the heroic son of Bhagadatta, letting loose the horse, fled from Partha

6 Once more entering his capital, that foremost of kings, irresistible in battle, cased himself in mail, and mounting on his prince of elephants, came out.

7. That powerful car-warrior had a white umbrella held over his head, and was fanned with a milk-white yak tails

8 Moved by childishness and folly, he challenged Partha, the powerful car warrior of the Pandavas famed for dreadful deeds in battle, to an encounter with him.

9 The enraged prince then urged towards Arjuna that elephant of his which resembled a veritable mountain, and from whose temples and mouth came out streams of juice showing excitement.

10 Indeed, that elephant showered its secretions like a great mass of clouds pouring rain Capable of resisting hostile feats of its own species, it had been equipped according to the ordinances of the treatises (on war-elephants) Irresistible in battle, it had become so infuriate as to be beyond control.

11 Urged on by the prince with the iron-hook, that powerful elephant then seemed as if it would cut through the sky (like a flying hill).

12 Seeing it advance towards him, O king, Dhananjaya, filled with anger and standing on the earth, O Bharata, met the prince on its back.

13 Filled with anger, Vajradatta quickly shed at Arjuna a number of broad-headed arrows gifted with the energy of fire and resembling (as they coursed through the air) a cloud of speedily-moving locusts.

14 Arjuna, however, with arrows sped from Gandiva, cut off those arrows, some into two, and some into three, pieces He cut them off in the sky itself with those arrows of his passing through the sky.

15 The son of Bhagadatta, seeing his broad-headed arrows thus cut off quickly sped at Arjuna a number of other arrows in a continuous line.

16 Filled with anger at this, Arjuna more quickly than before, shot at Bhagadatta's son a number of straightly coursing arrows equipped with golden wings.

17 Vajradatta of powerful energy, struck with great force and pierced with those arrows in that fierce encounter, fell down on the Earth. Consciousness, however, did not leave him.

18 Mounting on his prince of elephants again in the midst of that battle, the son of Bhagadatta, desirous of victory, very coolly shot a number of arrows at Arjuna.

19. Filled with anger, Jishnu then shot at the prince a number of arrows which looked like burning flames of fire and which appeared to be so many snakes of dreadful poison.

20. Pierced therewith, the powerful elephant, emitting a large quantity of blood, looked like a mountain of many springs discharging rillets of water coloured with red chalk.

CHAPTER LXXVI.

(ANUGITA PARVA)—
Continued.

Vaishampayana said:—

1. Thus went on that battle, O chief of the Bharatas, for three days between Arjuna and that prince like the encounter between him of a hundred sacrifices and Vritra.

2—3 On the fourth day, Vajradatta of great power laughed loudly and addressing Arjuna, said these words:—'Wait, wait, O Arjuna! You shall not escape me alive! Killing you I shall duly discharge the water-rite of my father.

4. My aged father Bhagadatta, who was the friend of your father, was killed by you on account of his weight of years. Do you, however, fight me who am but a boy.

5 Having said these words, O you of Kuru's race, king Vajradatta, filled with anger, urged his elephant towards the son of Pandu.

6 Urged on by the highly intelligent Vajradatta, that prince of elephants, as if desirous of cutting through the sky, rushed towards Dhananjaya.

7. That best of elephants drenched Arjuna with a shower of juice emitted from the end of his trunk, like a mass of blue clouds drenching a hill with its down-pour.

8 Indeed, urged on by the king, the elephant, repeatedly roaring like a cloud, rushed towards Phalguna, sending forth deep noise from its mouth.

9 Indeed, urged on by Vajradatta that prince of elephants quickly moved towards the powerful car-warrior of the Kurus, with the tread of one that seemed to dance in excitement.

10 Seeing that beast of Vajradatta advance towards him, that destroyer of enemies, viz., the powerful Dhananjaya, relying on Gandiva, stood his ground without shaking with fear.

11. Recollecting what an obstacle Vajradatta was proving to the performance of his task, and remembering the old enmity of the house, the son of Pandu became greatly excited with rage against the king.

12. Worked up with rage, Dhananjaya impeded the course of that beast with a shower of arrows like the shore resisting the surging sea.

13 That best of elephants and beautiful in appearance, thus impeded by Arjuna, stopped in its course, with body pierced with many an arrow, like a porcupine with its quills erect.

14. Seeing his elephant impeded in its course, the royal son Bhagadatta, deprived of sense by anger, shot many whetted arrows at Arjuna.

15. The mighty-armed Arjuna baffled all those arrows with many foe-destroying arrows of his. The feat appeared to be exceedingly wonderful.

16 Once more the king of the Pragjyotishas, worked up with rage, forcibly urged his elephant, which resembled a mountain, at Arjuna.

17. Seeing the beast once more advancing towards him, Arjuna shot with great strength an arrow at it which resembled a veritable flame of fire.

18. Cut to the quick, O king, by the son of Pandu, the beast suddenly dropped down on the Earth like a mountain-summit loosened by a thunder-bolt.

19 Struck with Dhananjaya's arrow, the elephant, as it lay on the Earth, looked like a huge mountain cliff lying on the ground, loosened by the bolt of Indra.

20. When the elephant of Vajradatta was prostrated on the ground, the son of Pandu addressing the king who had fallen down with his beast, said,—'Do not fear.'

21. Indeed, Vasudeva of great energy said to me while commissioning me for this task even these words, viz., 'You should not, O Dhananjaya, kill those kings (who may give you battle).

22 O foremost of men, you should consider your task as accomplished if only you disable those hostile kings! You should not also, O Dhananjaya, kill the warriors of those kings who may come forth to fight you.

23 They should be requested to come, with all their kinsmen and friends, to the Horse-Sacrifice of Yudhishthira.

24 Having heard these commands of my brother, I shall not kill you, O king! Rise up; let no fear be yours; return to your city safe and sound, O king.

25 When the day of full moon in the month of Chaitra comes, you shall O great king, go to that sacrifice of king Yudhishthira the just, for it takes place on that day!

26 Thus addressed by Arjuna, the royal son of Bhagadatta, defeated by the son of Pandu, said,—'So be it.'

CHAPTER LXXVII.

(ANUGITA PARVA.)—Continued.

Vaishampayana said:—

1. There took place a great battle between the diadem decked Arjuna and the hundreds of Saindhavas who still lived after the destruction of their clan.

2 Hearing that he of white horses had entered their territories, those Kshatriyas came out against him, unable to bear that foremost one of Pandu's race.

3. Those warriors who were as terrible as dreadful poison finding the horse within their dominion, seized it without being filled with any fear of Partha who was the younger brother of Bhimasena.

4 Advancing against Vibhatsu who waited on foot, armed whith his bow, upon the sacrificial horse, they attacked him from a near point

5 Defeated in battle before, those Kshatriyas of great energy, moved by the desire of victory, surrounded that foremost of men.

6. Proclaiming their names and families and their various feats, they showered their arrows on Partha.

7. Pouring showers of arrows of such fierce energy as were capable of obstructing the course of hostile elephants, those heroes surrounded the son of Kunti, desirous of defeating him in battle.

8 Themselves seated on cars, they fought Arjuna of dreadful feats who was on foot.

9. From every side they began to strike that hero, that destroyer of the Nivata-kavachas that destroyer of the Samsaptakas, that destroyer of the king of the Sindhus.

10 Surrounding him on all sides as within a cage by means of a thousand cars and ten thousand horse, those brave warriors expressed their joy.

11—12. Recollecting the destruction by Dhananjaya of Jayadratha in battle, O you of Kuru's race, they poured heavy showers of arrows on that hero like a mass of clouds showering a heavy downpour. Overwhelmed with that arrowy shower, Arjuna looked like the sun covered by a cloud.

13. That foremost son of Pandu, in the midst of that cloud of arrows, resembled a bird in the midst of an iron cage, O Bharata.

14. Seeing the son of Kunti thus afflicted with arrows, cries of oh and alas were uttered by the three worlds, and the Sun himself became shorn of his splendour.

15 Then, O king, a terrible wind began to blow, and Rahu swallowed up both the Sun and the Moon simultaneously.

16 Many meteors struck the solar disc and then shot in different directions. The prince of mountains, viz., Kailasa, began to tremble.

17. The seven (celestial) Rishis, as also the other Rishis of Heaven, stricken with fear, and afflicted with grief and sorrow, breathed hot sighs.

18. Piercing through the sky, those meteors fell on the lunar disc as well All the points of the compass became filled with smoke and assumed a strange aspect.

19 Reddish clouds, with flashes of lightning playing in their midst and the bow of Indra measuring them from side to side, suddenly covered the sky and poured flesh and bloods on the Earth.

20 Such was the aspect which all nature assumed when that hero was overwhelmed with showers of arrows Indeed, when Phalguna, that foremost one among the Bharatas, was thus afflicted, those marvels were witnessed.

21 Overwhelmed by that dense cloud of arrows, Arjuna became stupefied His bow, Gandiva, fell down from his relaxed grip and his leathern fence also dropped down.

22 When Dhananjaya became stupefied, the Saindhava warriors once more shot forthwith at that senseless warrior, numberless other arrows.

23 Understanding that the son of Pritha was insensible, the celestials, with hearts stricken with fear, began to seek his well being by uttering various benedictions

24 Then the celestial Rishis, the seven Rishis and the twice born Rishis, became engaged in silent recitations from desire of giving victory to the highly intelligent son of Pritha's.

25 When at last the energy of Partha blazed forth through those deeds of the dwellers of the celestial region, that hero, who was conversant with celestial weapons of great efficacy, stood immovable like a hill.

26 The delighter of the Kurus then drew his celestial bow And as he repeatedly stretched the bowstring, the twang that followed resembled the loud sound of some strong machine

27 Like Purandara pouring rain, the powerful Arjuna then, with that bow of his, poured incessant showers of arrows on his enemies.

28 Pierced by those arrows, the Saindhava warriors with their chiefs became invisible like trees covered with locusts.

29 Terror stricken at the very sound of Gandiva and filled with consternation they fled away. In grief of heart they shed tears and cried aloud.

30 The powerful warrior moved amidst that host of enemies with the celerity of a fiery wheel, all the time piercing those warriors with his arrows

31 Like the great Indra, the holder of the thunder-bolt, that destroyer of enemies, viz., Arjuna, shot from his bow in every direction that shower of arrows which resembled a sight produced by magic

32 The Kaurava hero, piercing the hostile army with showers of arrows looked resplendent like the autumnal Sun when he disperses the clouds with his powerful rays

CHAPTER LXXVIII.

(ANUGITA PARVA.)—

Vaishampayana said:—

1. The irresistible holder of Gandiva, ready for battle stood immovable on the field like Himavat himself.

2 The Saindhava warriors, once more rallying, showered in great rage repeated down-pours of arrows on him

3 The mighty armed hero, laughing at his enemies, who had once more sallied but who were on the point of death, addressed them in these soft words:—

4 Do ye fight to the best of your power and do ye try to defeat me. Do ye, however, accomplish all necessary deeds, for a great danger awaits you all.

5. See, I fight all of you, baffling your clouds of arrows! Bent as you are on battle, wait a little. I shall soon quell your pride.

6. The holder of Gandiva, having said these words in anger, recollected, however, the words, O Bharata, of his eldest brother.

7—8 Those words were —You should not, O child, kill those Kshatriyas who will come against you for battle! They should, however, be defeated by you! That foremost of men Phalguna, had been thus addressed by king Yudhishthira the just, of great soul He, therefore, began to reflect thus. Thus was I commissioned by my brother. Warriors advancing against me should not be killed.

9 I must act in such a way as not to falsify the words of king Yudhishthira the just.

10 Having arrived at this conclusion, Phalguna, that foremost of men, then said to those Saindhavas who were all dreadful in battle, these words.

11. I say what is for your benefit. Though staying before me, I do not wish to kill you. He amongst you who will say to me that he has been defeated by me and that he is mine, will be spared by me.

12 Having heard these words of mine, act towards me in that way which may best secure your well being. By acting in a different way you will place yourselves in a situation of great fear and danger.

13 Having said these words to those heroic warriors, the chief of the Kurus began to fight them. Arjuna was worked up with rage His enemies, desirous of victory, were equally enraged.

14 The Saindhavas then, O king, shot hundreds and thousands of straight arrows at the wielder of Gandiva.

15. Dhananjaya, with his own whetted arrows, cut off those arrows of sharp and terrible points, resembling snakes of dreadful poison, before they could come up to him.

16 Having cut off those sharp arrows bedecked with Kanka-feathers, Arjuna pierced each of the warriors opposed to him with a whetted arrow.

17. The Saindhava Kshatriyas, recollecting that it was Dhananjaya who had killed their king Jayadratha, then hurled at him darts and javelins with great force.

18. The diadem decked Dhananjaya of great power baffled their aim by cutting off all those weapons before any of them could reach him. At length the son of Pandu became highly angry.

19 With many straight and broad-headed arrows, he cut off the heads of many of those warriors who were rushing at him from desire of victory.

20. Many fled, many rushed at Arjuna; many moved not; all of them, however, uttered such a loud noise that it resembled the roar of the ocean.

21. As they were killed by Partha of immeasurable power, they fought him, each according to his strength and prowess.

22. Their animals being all exhausted, Partha succeeded in depriving a large number of those warriors of their senses by means of his sharpest arrows in that battle.

23 Then Dusshala, their queen, the daughter of Dhritarastra, knowing that they were rendered cheerless by Arjuna, took her grandson in her arms and went to Arjuna.

24. The child was the son of Suratha (the son of Jayadratha). The brave prince proceeded to his maternal uncle on his car for the safety of all the Saindhava warriors.

25 The queen, arrived before Dhananjaya, began to weep in sorrow. Seeing her, the powerful Dhananjaya cast off his bow.

26—27. Leaving off his bow, Partha duly received his sister and enquired of her as to what he could do for her. The queen replied to him, saying,—O chief of the Bharatas, this child is the son of your sister's son He salutes you, O Partha. Look at him, O foremost of men.

28. Thus addressed by her, Partha enquired after his son (Suratha), saying — Where is he?

29 Dusshala answered him, saying,— Burning with grief on account of the destruction of his father, the heroic father of this child died broken-hearted. Listen to me as to how he died.

30—33 O Dhananjaya, he had heard before that his father Jayadratha had been killed by you, O sinless one. Exceedingly afflicted with grief at this, and hearing of your arrival here as the follower and protector of this sacrificial horse, he at once fell down and gave up his life Indeed, deeply afflicted with grief, as he was, as soon as he heard of your arrival, he gave up his life. Seeing him prostrate on the Earth, O lord, I took his infant son with me and have come to you, seeking your protection. Having said these words, the daughter of Dhritarashtra began to lament in deep sorrow.

34 Arjuna stood before her in great cheerlessness of heart. His face was turned towards the Earth. The cheerless sister then said to her brother, who was equally cheerless, these words: See your sister. See the child of your sister's son.

35. O perpetuater of Kuru's race, O you who are fully conversant with every duty, you should show mercy to this child, forgetting the Kuru prince (Duryodhana) and the wicked Jayadratha.

36 As that destroyer of hostile heroes, Pariksbit, has been born of Abhimanyu, so has this mighty-armed child, my grandson, originated from Suratha.

37. Taking him with me, O king, I have come to you desirous of the safety of all the warriors! Do you listen to these words of mine.

38 This child of that wicked enemy of yours has now come to you, O mighty-armed hero You should, therefore, show mercy to this infant.

39 O chastiser of enemies this infant seeks to please you by bending his head. He solicits you for peace! O mighty-armed hero, be inclined to make peace.

40. O you who know every duty, be pleased with the child whose friends and kinsmen have all been killed and who himself knows nothing of what has taken place. Do not yield to anger.

41 Forgetting his disreputable and cruel grandfather, who offended against you so highly, it is but fit that you should extend your grace towards this child.

42 Recollecting queen Gandhari and king Dhritarashtra, Dhananjaya, afflicted with grief, addressed Dusshala who had said so to him, and answered her, censuring Kshatriya practices all the time.

43 Fie on Duryodhana, that mean person, covetous of kingdom and full of vanity! Alas, it was for him that all my kinsmen have been sent by me to the abode of Yama.

44 Having said so, Dhananjaya comforted his sister and became inclined to make peace. Cheerfully, he embraced her and then dismissed her, asking her to return to her palace.

45 Dusshala asked all her warriors to desist from that great battle, and adoring Partha, she of beautiful face returned towards her palace.

46 Having defeated those heroes, viz, the Saindhavas, thus, Dhananjaya began to follow that horse which ranged at its will.

47. The heroic Arjuna duly followed that sacrificial horse even as the divine holder of Pinaka had in days of yore followed the deer through the sky.

48 The horse, at its will, passed through various kingdoms successively, multiplying the feats of Arjuna.

49 In course of time, O king, the horse wandering at its pleasure, at last arrived within the kingdom of Manipura, followed by the son of Pandu

CHAPTER LXXIX.

(ANUGITA PARVA.)—

Vaishampayana said.—

1. Hearing that his father Arjuna had arrived within his kingdom, the king of Manipura, Vabhruvahana went out with humility, with a number of Brahmanas and some treasure in his van.

2 Remembering, however, the duties of Kshatriyas the highly intelligent Dhananjaya, seeing the king of Manipura arrive in that guise, did not approve of it.

3 The righteous-souled Phalguna angrily said,—Your conduct is not proper. You have certainly fallen away from Kshatriya duties.

4. I have come here as the protector of Yudhishthira's sacrificial horse. Why, O son, will you not fight me, seeing that I have come within your territories?

5 Fie on you, O you of foolish understanding, fie on you who have deviated from Kshatriya duties! Fie on you who would receive me peacefully even though I have come here for fighting with you

6—8 In thus receiving me peacefully you act like a woman O you of wretched understanding, if I had come to you, leaving aside my arms, then would this conduct of yours have been fit, O worst of men! Learning that these words were addressed by her husband, the daughter of the Snake King, viz., Ulupi, unable to tolerate it, pierced through the Earth and came up there She saw her son standing there perfectly cheerless and with face hanging down.

9—10. Indeed, the prince was repeatedly rebuked by his father who was desirous of battle with him, O monarch! The daughter of the Snake, possessed of beautiful limbs, viz, Ulupi, said these words consistent with righteousness and duty to the prince who himself was conversant with righteousness and duty. Know that I am your mother Ulupi that am the daughter of a snake.

11. Do you perform my order, O son! for you would then acquire great merit; Fight your father, this foremost one of Kuru's race, this hero who is irresistible in battle.

12 Forsooth, he will then be pleased with you. Thus was king Vabhruvahana incited against his father by his (step) mother.

13—14 At last, gifted as he was with great energy, he made up his mind, O chief of the Bharatas, to fight Dhananjaya. Putting on his armour of bright gold and his shining head-dress, he got upon an excellent car which had hundreds of quivers ready on it. That car was equipt with necessaries for battle and had horses yoked to it which were fleet like the mind.

15 It had excellent wheels and a strong Upashkara, and was adorned with golden ornaments of every sort. Raising his standard which was decorated most beautifully and which bore the device of a lion in gold, the beautiful prince Vabhruvahana proceeded against this father for battle.

16 Coming upon the sacrificial horse which was protected by Partha, the heroic prince caused it to be seized by persons well-versed in veterinary science.

17. Seeing the horse seized, Dhananjaya became filled with joy Standing on the Earth, that hero began to oppose the advance of his son who was on his car.

18 The king afflicted the hero with repeated showers of arrows gifted with whetted points and resembling snakes of dreadful poison.

19 Incomparable was the battle which took place between the father and son. It resembled the battle between the celestials and the Asuras of old Each was pleased with obtaining the other for an antagonist.

20. Then Vabhruvahana, laughing, cut the diadem-decked Arjuna, that foremost of men, in the shoulder with a straight arrow.

21. Equipt with feathers, that arrow penetrated Arjuna's body like a snake penetrating an anthill. Piercing the son of Kunti through, the arrow went deep into the Earth.

22. Feeling acute pain, the intelligent Dhananjaya rested awhile, supporting himself on his excellent bow. He stood, having recourse to his celestial energy and seemed externally like one dead.

23—24 That foremost of men, then regaining consciousness, lauded his son highly Possessed of great splendour, the son of Shakra said,—Excellent, Excellent, O mighty-armed one, O son of Chitrangada! O son, seeing this feat, so worthy of you, I am highly pleased with you

25 I shall now discharge these arrows at you, O son! Stand for fight (without running away). Having said these words, that destroyer of enemies shot a shower of arrows on the prince.

26 King Vabhruvahana, however, with his own broad headed arrows, cut all those arrows, which were discharged from Gandiva, and which resembled the thunderbolt of Indra in splendour, some in two, and some into three, parts.

27. Then the standard, decked with gold and resembling a golden palmyra, on the king's car was cut off by Partha with some excellent arrows of his.

28. The son of Pandu, laughing, next killed the king's horses of large size and great speed.

29 Descending from his car, the king, worked up with rage, fought his father on foot.

30. Pleased with the prowess of his son, that foremost one of the sons of Pritha, viz, the son of the wielder of the thunderbolt, began to afflict him greatly.

31. The powerful Vabhruvahana, thinking that his father was no longer able to face him, again afflicted him with many arrows resembling snakes of dreadful poison.

32. From a spirit of childishness he then vigorously cut his father in the breast with a whetted arrow having excellent wings.

33—35 That arrow, O king, penetrated the body of Pandu's son and reaching his very vitals caused him great pain. The delighter of the Kurus, Dhananjaya, deeply pierced therewith by his son, then dropped down in a swoon on the Earth, O king! When that hero, that bearer of the burthens of the Kurus, fell down, the son of Chitrangada also became unconscious. The latter's swoon was owing to his exertions in battle as also to his grief at seeing his father killed.

36 He had been pierced deeply by Arjuna with clouds of arrows He, therefore dropped down at the van of battle embracing the Earth.

37. Hearing that her husband had been killed and that her son had fallen down on the Earth, Chitrangada, in great agitation of mind, went to the field of battle.

38. Her heart burning with sorrow, weeping piteously the while, and trembling all over, the mother of the king of Manipura saw her killed husband.

CHAPTER LXXX.

(ANUGITA PARVA.)—

Continued.

Vaishampayana said:—

1. That lady having eyes like lotus-petals, having bewailed much, and burning with grief, at last lost her senses and dropped down on the Earth.

2—3. Regaining consciousness and seeing Ulupi, the daughter of the Snake-Chief, queen Chitrangada gifted with celestial beauty, said to her these words.—See, O Ulupi, our ever victorious husband killed in battle, though you, by my son of tender years.

4. Do you know the practices of the respectable? Are you a wife devoted to your husband? It is through your deed, that your husband is laid low, slain in battle.

5. If Dhananjaya has offended against you in every respect, do you forgive him! I solicit you, do you revive that hero.

6 O righteous lady, you know piety. You are, O blessed one, known (for your virtues) over the three worlds! How is it that having caused your husband to be killed by your son, you do not indulge in grief?

7. O daughter of the Snake Chief, I do not grieve for my killed son! I grieve for only my husband who has received this hospitality from his son.

8—9 Having said these words to the queenly Ulupi the daughter of the Snake-King, the illustrious Chitrangada went to where her husband lay on the Earth and addressing him, said,—Rise, O dear husband, you occupy the foremost place in the affections of the Kuru-King (Yudhishthira)!

Here is that horse of yours! It has been liberated by me

10. Indeed O powerful one, this sacrificial horse of king Yudhishthira the just, should be followed by you. Why then do you lie still on the Earth.

11 My life breaths depend on you O delighter of the Kurus How is it that he who is the giver of other people's life-breaths renounces his own life breaths to day?

12. See, O Ulupi, this beautiful form of your husband lying prostrate on the ground How is it that you do not grieve, having caused him to be killed through your son whom you did excite with your words?

13 It is fit that this boy should yield to the power of death and lie thus on the ground besides his own father Oh, let Vijaya, let him that is called Gudakesha, let this hero with reddish eyes return to life

14 O blessed lady, polygamy is no fault with men Women only commit sin by taking more than one husband. Do not, therefore, cherish such thoughts (of vengeance).

15 This relationship was ordained by the Supreme Creator himself It is, besides, an eternal and unchangeable one Do you attend to that relationship Let your union (with Dhananjaya) be made true

16 If, having killed your husband through your son, you do not revive him to day before my eyes, I shall then renounce my own life-breaths

17. Forsooth, O reverend lady, afflicted as I am with grief and deprived as I am of both husband and son, I shall sit here to day in Praya-vow before your presence.

18 Having said so to the daughter of the Snake-Chief, who was a co wife with her to Arjuna, the princess Chitravahini sat in Praya, O king, restraining speech.

Vaishampayana said:—

19 Ceasing to lament, the cheerless queen, taking upon her lap the feet of her husband sat there, sighing heavily and desiring also for the restoration of her son to life.

20—21 King Babhruvahana then, regaining consciousness, saw his mother seated in that guise on the field of battle Addressing her he said—What can be more painful than the sight of my mother, who has been brought up in luxury, lying on the naked Earth beside her heroic husband stretched thereon.

22. Alas, this destroyer of all enemies, this foremost of all wielders of weapons, has been killed by me in battle. It is clear that men do die, till their hour comes 23 Oh, the heart of this princess seems to be very hard since it does not break even on seeing her mighty armed and broad chested husband lying dead on the ground.

24 It is clear that one does not die till one's hour comes, since neither myself, nor my mother is deprived of life.

25 Alas, alas, the golden coat of mail of this foremost hero of Kuru's race, killed by me, his son knowingly, is lying on the ground, cut off from his body.

26 Alas, ye Brahmanas, see my heroic father lying prostrate on the Earth, on a hero's bed, killed by his son

27 What benefit is done to this hero, killed by me in battle, by those Brahmanas who were commissioned to attend upon this foremost one of Kuru's race engaged in following the horse?

28 Let the Brahmanas direct what expiation should now be done by me, a cruel and sinful wretch, who has killed his own father in battle.

29 Having killed my own father, I should, suffering every sort of misery, wander over the Earth, cruel that I am, covering myself with his skin.

30 Give me the two halves of my sire's head to-day, for there is no other expiation for me who have killed my own father.

31 See, O daughter of the foremost of Snakes your husband killed by me Indeed, by killing Arjuna in battle I have accomplished what is pleasant to you

32 I shall to day follow in the track by which my father has gone. O blessed one, I cannot comfort myself.

33 Be happy to day, O mother, seeing myself and the wielder of Gandiva both embrace death to day. I swear to you by truth itself.

34—35 Having said these words, the king, sorely afflicted with grief, O monarch, touched water, and exclaimed in sorrow—Let all creatures mobile and immobile, listen to me! Do you also listen to me, O mother! I say the truth, O best of all daughters of the snakes.

36 If this best of men, Jaya, my father does not rise up, I shall emaciate my own body, sitting on the field of battle

37 Having killed my father, there is no rescue for me Afflicted as I am with the sin of patricide, I shall, forsooth, have to sink in Hell.

38 By killing a heroic Kshatriya one becomes cleansed by making a gift of a hundred kine By killing my father, however, so dreadful has been my sin that my rescue is impossible.

39 Thus Dhananjaya, the son of Pandu, was the one hero gifted with mighty energy. Possessed of righteous soul, he was the creator of my being How can I be rescued after having killed him?

40 Having bewailed thus, the great son of Dhananjaya, king Vabhruvahana, touched water and became silent, vowing to starve himself to death.

Vaishampayana said :—

41—42. When the king of Manipura, that chastiser of enemies, afflicted with grief, along with his mother, sat down to starve himself to death, Ulupi then thought of the gem that has the virtue of reviving a dead man The gem, the great refuge of the Snakes, thus thought of, arrived there.

43 The daughter of the Prince of Snakes, taking it up, uttered these words which highly gladdened the combatants standing on the field.

44 Rise up O son! Do not grieve! Jishnu has not been vanquished by you! This hero is incapable of being defeated by men as also by the celestials headed by Vasava himself.

45 I have exhibited this illusion, deceiving your senses, for the benefit of this foremost of men, viz., your illustrious father.

46 O son of Kuru's race, desirous of ascertaining the prowess of yourself, his son, this destroyer of hostile heroes, O king, came here for fighting with you

47 It was, therefore, O son, that you were urged by me to fight O powerful king O son, do not suspect that you have committed any, even the least, fault, by his challenge

48 He is a Rishi, of a powerful soul, eternal and indestructible O dear son, Shakra himself is incapable of defeating him in battle.

49 This celestial gem has been brought by me, O king It always revives the snakes as often as they die.

50 O powerful king, do you place this gem on the breast of your father. You shall then see the son of Pandu revive 51 Thus addressed, the prince who had committed no sin, moved by love for his father, then placed that gem on the breast of Partha's son of incomparable energy.

52 After the gem had been placed on his breast, the heroic and powerful Jishnu became revived Opening his red eyes, he rose up like one who had slept long.

53 Seeing his father, the great hero of inexhaustible energy, restored to consciousness and quite at his ease, Vabhruvahana adored him with respect.

54 When that foremost of men, O powerful one, awoke from the slumber of death with every auspicious sign of life, the chastiser of Paka rained down celestial flowers.

55 Kettle-drums struck by nobody, produced their music deep as the muttering of the clouds A loud uproar was heard in the sky consisting of the words—Excellent, Excellent.

56 The mighty-armed Dhananjaya, rising up and well comforted, embraced Vabhruvahana and smelled his head

57—58 He saw sitting at a distance from his son, this latter's mother stricken with grief, in the company of Ulupi. Dhananjaya asked,—Why is it that every thing in the field of battle seems to bear the marks of grief, wonder and joy? If O destroyer of enemies, you know the cause, do you then tell me

59 Why has your mother come to the field of battle? Why, also has Ulupi the daughter of the Prince of Snakes, come here?

60 I know that you had fought this battle with me at my own command I wish to know what the cause is which has brought out the ladies.

61 Thus questioned by Dhananjaya, the intelligent king of Manipura gratified him by bending his head in respect, and then said,—Let Ulupi be asked.

CHAPTER LXXXI.

(ANUGITA PARVA)—

Continued.

Arjuna said :—

1. What brings you here, O daughter (-in law) of Kuru's race, and what, also, is the cause of the arrival on the field of battle of her who is the mother of the king of Manipura?

2 Do you entertain friendly motives towards this king, O daughter of a snake? O you of restless glances, do you wish good to me too?

3 I hope, O you of ample hips, that neither I, nor this Vabhruvahana here, have, O beautiful lady, done any injury to you unconsciously?

4 Has Chitrangada of faultless limbs, descended from the line of Chitravahana, done you any wrong?

5. To him the daughter of the Prince of Snakes answered smilingly,—You have not offended me, nor has Vabhruvahana done me any wrong.

6 Nor this prince's mother who is always obedient to me as a hand maid. Listen, how all this has been caused by me.

7 You should not be angry with me. Indeed, I seek to please you by bending my head in respect O you of Kuru's race all this has been done by me for your good, O powerful one!

8—10. O mighty-armed Dhananjaya, Hear all that I have done In the great battle of the Bharata-Princes, you had killed the royal son of Shantanu by unfair ways. What I have done has expiated your sin You did not overthrow Bhishma while fighting with you!

11—12 He was engaged with Shikandin Relying on him as your help, you did bring about the overthrow of Shantanu's son If you had died without having expiated your sin you would then have fallen, forsooth, into Hell on account of that sinful deed of yours Even this which you have got from your son is the expiation of that sin!

13 Formerly, O king, I heard this said by the Vasus while they were in the company of Ganga, O you of great intelligence

14—15 After the fall of Shantanu's son, those celestials viz, the Vasus, coming to the banks of Ganga, bathed in her waters, and calling the goddess of that stream, they uttered these terrible words having the sanction of Bhagirati herself, viz,—Shantanu's son Bhishma has been killed by Dhananjaya.

16. Indeed, O goddess, Bhishma then was engaged with another, and had ceased to fight. For this fault we shall to-day imprecate a curse on Dhananjaya!

17 To this, the goddess Ganga readily agreed, saying,—Be it so!—Hearing these words I became very much distressed and penetrating into the nether regions represented everything to my father.

18—19 Informed of what had taken place, my father became plunged in grief. Going to the Vasus, he begged them for your sake, again and again gratifying them by every means in his power. They then said to him,—Dhananjaya has a highly blessed son who, youthful as he is, is the king of Manipura.

20 He will, standing on the field of battle, cast Dhananjaya down on the Earth. When this will take place, O Prince of Snakes, Arjuna will be freed from our curse!

21. Do you return!—Thus addressed by the Vasus, he came back and informed me of what had taken place. Having learnt all this, O hero I have freed you from the curse of the Vasus in this.

22 The king of the celestials himself is incapable of defeating you in battle. The son is one's own self. It is for this that you have been defeated by him.

23 I cannot be held, O powerful one, to have committed any sin How, indeed, would you hold me censurable?

24 Thus addressed (by Ulupi), Vijaya became cheerful of heart and said to her,—All this you have done, O goddess, is highly agreeable to me.

25—26 After this, Jaya addressed his son, the king of Manipura, and said to him in the hearing of Chitrangada, the daughter (in law) of Kuru's race 'the Horse-Sacrifice of Yudhishthira will take place on the day of full moon in the coming month of Chaitra. Come there, O king, with your mother and your counsellors and officers!'

27—28 Thus addressed by Partha, king Vabhruvahana of great intelligence, with tearful eyes, said these words to his father,—'O you who are conversant with every duty, I shall certainly go at your command, to the great Horse Sacrifice, and take upon myself the task of distributing food among the twice-born ones!

29 For, however, showing your grace towards me, do you enter your own city with your two wives Do not cherish any scruple about this, O you who are fully acquainted with every duty!'

30 O lord, having lived for one night in your own palace in happiness, you may then follow the horse, O foremost of victorious warriors!

31—32 The ape-bannered son of Kunti, thus addressed by his son, answered the child of Chitrangada, saying —You know, mighty-armed one, what vow I am observing? O you of large eyes till the termination of this my vow, I cannot enter your city.

33 O foremost of men, this sacrificial horse wanders at will. Blessings on you. I must go away I have no place to rest for even a short while!

live yet, O monarch, although you have offended me in battle.

26. Thus addressed, the king of Magadha considered himself defeated and spared Thinking then that it was his duty to do so, he approached Arjuna and joining his hands in respect adored him.

27 And he said,—Defeated have I been by you! Blessed be you, I do not venture to continue the battle. Tell me what I am to do now for you! Consider your command as already carried out.'

28 Comforting him again, Arjuna once more said to him —You should go to the Horse Sacrifice of our king which takes place at the coming full moon of Chaitra.

29 Thus addressed by him the son of Sahadeva said —So be it,—and then duly adored that horse as also Phalguna, that foremost of warriors.

30. The sacrificial horse then, having beautiful manes, proceeded at his will along the seacoast, going to the countries of the Bangas, the Pundras, and the Koshalas

31. In those kingdoms Dhananjaya, with his bow Gandiva, O king, defeated numberless Mlechchha armies one after another.

CHAPTER LXXXIII.

(ANUGITA PARVA.)—

Vaishampayana continued —

1. Adored by the king of Magadha, Pandu's son having white horses yoked to his car, proceeded along the south, following the (sacrificial) horse.

2. Turning round in course of his wanderings at will, the strong horse came upon the beautiful city of the Chedis called after the oyster.

3 Sharabha, the son of Shishupala, gifted with great strength, first met Arjuna in battle and then adored him with due honours.

4 Adored by him, O king, that best of horses then proceeded to the kingdom of the Kashis, the Angas, the Koshalas, the Kiratas, and the Langanas.

5 Receiving due honours in all those kingdoms Dhananjaya turned his course Indeed the son of Kunti then proceeded to the country of the Dasharnas.

6 The ruler of that people was Chitrangada who was gifted with great strength and was a crusher of enemies Between him and Vijaya took place a very dreadful battle.

7 Bringing him under his control the diadem decked Arjuna, that foremost of men, went to the kingdom of the Nishada king viz, the son of Ekalavya

8 The son of Ekalavya received Arjuna in battle! The encounter took place between the Kuru hero and the Nishadas was so furious as to make the hairs stand erect.

9 Unvanquished in battle, the brave son of Kunti defeated the Nishada king who proved an impediment to the sacrifice.

10 Having subjugated the son of Ekalavya, O king the son of Indra duly adored by the Nishadas, then proceeded towards the southern ocean

11. In those regions battles took place between the diadem decked hero and the Dravidas and Andhras and the dreadful Mahishakas and the hillmen of Kolwa.

12 Subjugating those tribes without having to perform any terrific feats Arjuna proceeded to the country of the Surashtras, his footsteps guided by the horse.

13 Arrived at Gokarna, he went thence to Prabhasa Then he proceeded to the beautiful city of Dwaravati protected by the heroes of the Vrishni race.

14 When the beautiful sacrificial horse of the Kuru king reached Dwaravati, the Yadava youths, used force against that foremost of horses.

15—16 King Ugrasena, however, soon went out and forbade those youths from doing what they thought Then the king of the Vrishnis and the Andhakas, issuing out of his palace, with Vasudeva, the maternal uncle of Arjuna, in his company, cheerfully met the Kuru hero and received him with due rites.

17. The two elderly chiefs honoured Arjuna duly Getting their permission, the Kuru prince then proceeded to where the horse he followed led him.

18 The sacrificial horse then proceeded along the coast of the western ocean and at last reached the country of the five waters full of population and prosperity.

19 Thence, O king, the horse proceeded to the country of the Gandharas Arrived there, it roamed at will, followed by the son of Kunti

20 Then took place a dreadful battle between the diadem-decked hero and the king of the Gandharas, viz, the son of Shakuni, who had a bitter remembrance of the grudge his father bore to the Pandavas.

CHAPTER LXXXIV.

(ANUGITA PARVA.)—
Continued.

Vaishampayana said:—

1. The heroic son of Shakuni, who was a powerful car-warrior among the Gandharas, accompanied by a large army, proceeded against the Kuru hero of curly hair. That force contained elephants, horses and cars, and was adorned with many flags and banners.

2. Unable to bear, and, therefore, burning to avenge, the destruction of their king Shakuni, those warriors, armed with bows, rushed together at Partha.

3. The unvanquished Vibhatsu of virtuous soul addressed them peacefully, but they were reluctant to accept the beneficial words of Yudhishthira.

4 Though forbidden by Partha with sweet words, they still gave themselves up to anger and surrounded the sacrificial horse. At this, the son of Pandu became filled with rage.

5. Then Arjuna, carelessly shooting from Gandiva many arrows with razor-like heads that blazed with splendour, cut off the heads of many Gandhara warriors.

6. While thus killed by Partha, the Gandharas, O king, exceedingly afflicted, liberated the horse, moved by fear and desisted from battle.

7. Resisted, however, by those Gandhara combatants who still surrounded him on all sides, the son of Pandu, gifted with great energy, cut off the heads of many, previously naming those whom he thus killed.

8 When the Gandhara warriors were thus being killed all around him in battle, the royal son of Shakuni came forward to resist the son of Pandu.

9 To the Gandhara king who was fighting with him, moved by Kshatriya duty, Arjuna said,—I do not intend to kill the kings who fight with me, on account of the commands of Yudhishthira.

10. Cease, O hero, to fight with me Do not seek defeat.

11. Thus addressed, the son of Shakuni, stupefied by folly, disregarded that advice and covered with many swift shafts the Kuru hero who resembled Shakra himself in the feats he performed in battle.

12. Then Partha, with a crescent shaped arrow, cut off the head-gear of his enemies. Of immeasurable soul, he also caused that head-gear to be borne along a great distance like the head of Jayadratha.

13 Seeing this feat, all the Gandhara warriors became stricken with wonder. They full well understood that Arjuna voluntarily spared their king.

14. The prince of the Gandharas then began to fly away from the field, followed by all his warriors who resembled a flock of frightened deer.

15. The Gandharas, through fear, lost their senses and wandered over the field, unable to escape. Arjuna, with his broad-headed arrows, cut off the heads of many.

16 Many there were who lost their arms on account of Arjuna's arrows, but so stupefied were they with fear that they were not aware of the loss of that limb. Indeed, the Gandhara army was greatly afflicted with those large arrows which Partha discharged from Gandiva.

17. That army, which then consisted of frightened men and elephants and horse, which lost many warriors and animals, and which had been disordered and routed, began to wander and wheel about the field again and again.

18 Among those enemies who were thus being killed, none could be seen standing in front of the Kuru hero famed for foremost of feats. No one could be seen who was able to bear the prowess of Dhananjaya.

19 Then the mother of the king of the Gandharas, filled with fear, and with all the aged ministers of state, came out of her city, taking an excellent Arghya for Arjuna.

20. She forbade her brave son of steady heart from fighting any longer, and pleased Jishnu who was never fatigued with toil.

22 The powerful Vibhatsu adored her and became inclined to show mercy towards the Gandharas. Comforting the son of Shakuni, he said —You have not, O mighty-armed hero, done what is agreeable to me by adopting these hostile measures! O destroyer of heroes, you are my brother, O sinless one.

23 Recollecting my mother Gandhari, and for the sake of Dhritarashtra also, I have not taken your life. It is for this, O king, that you live still. Many of your followers, however, have been killed by me.

24 Let not such a thing happen again. Let hostilities cease. Let not your understanding again go wrong You should go to the Horse-Sacrifice of our king which takes place on the day of full moon of the month of Chaitra.

CHAPTER LXXXV.

(ANUGITA PARVA.)—
Continued.

Vaishampayana said:—

1. Having said these words, Partha started, following the horse which roamed at will. The sacrificial horse then turned towards the road leading to the city of Hastinapur.

2. Yudhishthira heard from his intelligence-bearers that the horse had turned back And hearing also that Arjuna was hale and hearty, he became filled with joy.

3. Hearing also the feats, performed by Vijaya in the country of the Gandharas as also in other kingdoms, the king became highly pleased.

4—6 In the meantime, seeing that the twelfth day of the lighted fortnight in the month of Magha had come, and marking also that the constellation was favourable, king Yudhishthira the just summoned all his brothers, viz, Bhima and Nakula and Sahadeva. Gifted with great energy, the king, O you of Kuru's race, that foremost of all persons knowing duties, said these words in proper time. Indeed, that foremost of all speakers, addressing Bhima, the first of all smiters, said,

7. Your younger brother (Arjuna), O Bhimasena, is returning with the horse. I have learnt this from those men who had followed Arjuna.

8. The time is come The sacrificial-horse is near. The day of full moon of the month of Magha is also near. The month is about to expire, O Vrikodara

9 Let, therefore, learned Brahmanas knowing the Vedas look for a sacrificial spot for the celebration of the Horse Sacrifice.

10. Thus addressed, Bhima obeyed the royal command He became very glad upon hearing that Arjuna of curly hair was about to return.

11. Then Bhima went out with a number of men knowing the rules of laying out sacrificial grounds and constructing buildings. And he took with him many Brahmanas well versed in all the rites of sacrifices.

12. Bhima selected a beautiful place and caused it to be duly measured out for laying the sacrificial compound. Numberless houses and mansions were constructed on it and high and broad roads also were laid out.

13 Soon enough the Kaurava hero filled that ground with hundreds of excellent palaces The surface was levelled and made smooth with jewels and gems, and adorned with various golden structures.

14. Columns were raised, ornamented with bright gold and high and wide triumphal arches also were made on that sacrificial compound. All these were made of pure gold.

15 The righteous-souled prince also caused apartments to be duly constructed for the accomodation of ladies and of the numerous kings who, coming from many kingdoms, were expected to grace the sacrifice with their presence.

16 The son of Kunti also caused many palaces to be duly erected for Brahmanas who were expected to come from various kingdoms.

17. Then the mighty-armed Bhimasena, at the command of the king, sent out messengers to the great kings of the Earth.

18. Those best of kings came to the Horse Sacrifice of the Kuru king for doing what was agreeable to him. And they brought many gems with them and many female slaves and horses and weapons

19 The sounds which arose from those great kings who lived within those pavilions touched the very heavens and resembled the noise made by the roaring ocean.

20 King Yudhishthira, the delighter of the Kurus, assigned to the monarchs who thus came to his sacrifice various kinds of food and drink, and beds also of celestial beauty.

21 The chief of the Bharatas, viz, king Yudhishthira the just, assigned several stables well filled with different kinds of corn and sugar cane and milk to the animals.

22. To that great sacrifice of king Yudhishthira the just who was gifted with high intelligence, there also came a large number of ascetics all of whom were utterers of Brahma

23 Indeed, O king, all the foremost ones among the twice born class that were then alive came to that sacrifice, accompanied by their disciples. The Kuru king received them all

24 King Yudhishthira of great energy, renouncing all pride, himself followed all his guests to the pavilions that had been assigned for their residence.

25 Then all the mechanics and engineers, having completed the arrangements of the sacrifice, informed king Yudhishthira of it.

26. Hearing that everything was ready, king Yudhishthira the just, full of alertness and attention, became highly pleased along with his brothers all of whom honoured him duly.

Vaishampayana said :—

27. When the great sacrifice of Yudhishthira began, many eloquent dialecticians started diverse propositions and disputed thereon, desirous of defeating one another.

28 The (invited) kings saw the excellent preparations of that sacrifice, resembling those of the king himself of the celestials, made, O Bharata, by Bhimasena.

29. They saw many triumphal arches made of gold, and many beds and seats and other articles of enjoyment and luxury, and crowds of men collected at different parts.

30. There were also many jars and vessels and cauldrons and jugs and lids and covers. The invited kings saw nothing there that was not made of gold.

31. Many sacrificial stakes also were set up, made, according to the directions of the scriptures, of wood, and adorned with gold Gifted with great effulgence, these were duly planted and dedicated (with scriptural Mantras).

32 The kings, again, saw all animals of land and water, collected there on the occasion.

33—44. And they also saw many kine and many buffaloes and many old women, and many aquatic animals, many beasts of prey, and many species of birds, and many specimens of viviparous and oviparous creatures, and many that are filth-born and many belonging to the vegetable kingdom, and many animals and plants which live or grow on mountains.

35 Seeing the sacrificial compound thus adorned with animals and kine and corn, the invited kings became filled with wonder.

36. Large masses of costly sweetmeats were kept ready for both the Brahmanas and the Vaishyas. And when the feeding was over of a hundred thousand Brahmanas, drums and cymbals were beat.

37 And so large was the number fed that the sounds of drums and cymbals were heard again and again Indeed, those sounds continued from day to day.

38. Thus was performed that sacrifice of the intelligent king Yudhishthira. Many hills of food, O king, were dedicated on the occasion Many large tanks were seen of curds and many lakes of clarified butter.

39 In that great sacrifice, O monarch, was seen the entire population of Jamvudwipa, with all its kingdoms and provinces, collected together.

40—41 Thousands of nations and races were there A large number of men, O chief of Bharata's race, adorned with garlands and wearing bright ear-rings made of gold, taking numberless vessels in their hands, distributed the food to the twice-born classes by hundreds and thousands.

42 The attendants of the Pandavas gave away to the Brahmanas various kinds of food and drink which were, besides, so costly as to be worthy of being eaten and drunk by kings themselves.

CHAPTER LXXXVI.

(ANUGITA PARVA)—

Vaishampayana said :—

1—2. Seeing those kings—lords of Earth—all conversant with the Vedas, arrive, king Yudhishthira, addressing Bhimasena, said,—O chief of men, let proper honors be paid to these kings who have come, for these foremost of men are all worthy of the highest honors.

3. Thus addressed by the illustrious king Yudhishthira, Pandu's son Bhimasena of mighty energy did as he was ordered, assisted by the twins.

4 The foremost of all men, viz, Govinda, came there, accompanied by the Vrishnis, and with Valadeva in the van.

5. He was accompanied by Yuyudhana and Pradyumna and Gada and Nishatha and Shamva and Kritavarman

6 The powerful car-warrior Bhima offered them the most respectful adoration. Those princes then entered the palaces, adorned with gems, which were assigned to them.

7. At the end of a conversation he had with Yudhishthira, the destroyer of Madhu referred to Arjuna who had been emaciated on account of many fights

8 The son of Kunti repeatedly asked Krishna, that chastiser of enemies, about Arjuna To Dharma's son, the lord of all the universe began to speak about Jishnu, the son of Shakra.

9 O king, a confidential agent of mine living in Dwarka came to me. He had seen Arjuna, that foremost of Pandu's sons. Indeed, the latter has been very much emaciated with the fatigue of many battles.

10. O powerful monarch, that agent of mine informed me that the mighty-armed hero is very near to us. You begin to celebrate your Horse-Sacrifice.

11. Thus addressed, king Yudhishthira the just said him,—By good luck, O Madhava, Arjuna comes back safely!

12 I wish to ascertain from you, O delighter of the Yadavas, what has been said in this matter by that mightiest of heroes amongs the sons of Pandu!

13—14 Thus addressed by king Yudhishthira the just, the lord of the Vrishnis and the Andhakas, that foremost of eloquent men, said these words to that monarch of righteous soul —My agent, reported the words of Partha thus to me, O great king,—Yudhishthira, O Krishna, should be told these words of mine when the time comes!

15 O chief of the Kauravas, many kings will come (to your sacrifice)! When they arrive, high honours should be paid to them. This would, indeed, be worthy for us

16—17. O giver of honours, the king should further be informed at my request that he should do what is necessary for preventing a distinction similar to what occurred at the time of presenting the Arghya (on the occasion of the Rajasuya Sacrifice) Let Krishna also approve of this Let not, O king, through the ill feeling of kings, the people be destroyed.

18. My man further reported, O king, these words of Dhananjaya. Listen as I repeat them.

19 O monarch, the king of Manipura, my dear son Vabhruvahana, will come at the sacrifice.

20. Do you honour him duly for my sake, O powerful one, he is always attached and deeply devoted to me

21. Hearing these words, king Yudhishthira the just approved of them and said as follows.

CHAPTER LXXXVII.

(ANUGITA PARVA)—Continued.

Yudhishthira said —

1. I have heard, O Krishna, your agreeable words. They are worthy of you Gladsome and sweet as nectar are they Indeed, they fill my heart with great joy, O powerful one.

2. O Hrishikesha, I have heard that Vijaya has fought numberless battles with the kings of the Earth.

3 Why is Partha, always dissociated from ease and comfort? Vijaya is exceedingly intelligent. Thus, therefore, pains my heart very much.

4 I always, O Janarddana, think, when I am withdrawn from business, of Kunti's son Jishnu. The lot of that delighter of the Pandus is highly miserable.

5. His body has every auspicious mark. What, however, O Krishna, is that sign in his excellent body for which he has always to suffer misery and discomfort?

6 That son of Kunti has to bear a large share of misery. I do not see any censurable mark in his body. You should explain the cause to me if I deserve to hear it.

7. Thus addressed, Hrishikesha, that enhancer of the glory of the Bhoja princes, having thought for a long time, answered as follows:—I do not see any censurable mark in this prince, except that the cheek-bones of this foremost of men are a little too high

9 For this that that foremost of men has always to be on the road I really do not see anything else for which he could be made so unhappy.

10. Thus answered by the intelligent Krishna, that foremost of men, viz., king, Yudhishthira, said to the chief of the Vrishnis that it was even so.

11. The princess Draupadi, however, looked angrily and askance at Krishna. The destroyer of Keshi, viz., Hrishikesha, approved of that mark of love (for his friend) which the princess of Panchala, who also was his friend, showed.

12 Bhimasena and the other Kurus, including the sacrificial priests, who heard of the agreeable triumphs of Arjuna in course of his following the horse, became highly pleased.

13 While they were still engaged in talking about Arjuna, a messenger came from that great hero bearing message from him.

14 Going to the presence of the Kuru king the intelligent messenger bowed his head in respect and informed him of the arrival of that foremost of men, viz., Phalguna.

15 On receipt of this news tears of joy covered the king's eyes Large gifts were made to the messenger for the very sweet tidings he had brought 16 On the second day from that date, a loud din was heard when that foremost of men, that chief of the Kurus, came.

17 The dust raised by the hoofs of that horse as it walked close to Arjuna, looked as beautiful as that raised by the celestial horse Uchchaishravas

18 And as Arjuna advanced, he heard many pleasing words uttered by the citizens By good luck, O Partha, you are out of danger. Praise to king Yudhishthira.

19 Who else than Arjuna could return after having caused the horse to wander over the whole Earth and after having defeated all the kings in battle?

20. We have not heard of such a feat having been done by even Sagara and other great kings of yore.

21. Future kings also will never be able to perform so difficult a feat, O foremost one of Kuru's race, as this which you have done.

22. Listening to such words, agreeable to the ear, of the citizens, the righteous souled Phalguna entered the sacrificial compound.

23 Then king Yudhishthira with all his ministers, and Krishna, the delighter of the Yadus, placing Dhritarashtra in their van, went out for receiving Dhananjaya

24 Saluting the feet of his uncle (Dhritarashtra), and then of wise king Yudhishthira the just, and then adoring Bhima and others, he embraced Keshava

25 Adored by them all and worshipping them in return according to due rites, the mighty-armed hero, accompanied by those princes, took rest like a ship wrecked man tossed on the waves resting on reaching the shore

26 Meanwhile the wise king Vabhruvahana, accompanied by his mothers (Chitrangada and Ulupi), came to the Kuru capital.

27 The mighty-armed prince duly saluted all his elders of Kuru's race and the other kings present there, and was honored by them all in return He then entered the excellent abode of his grandmother Kunti.

CHAPTER LXXXVIII.

(ANUGITA PARVA.)—Continued.

Vaishampayana said:—

1. "Entering the palace of the Pandavas the mighty-armed prince saluted his grandmother in soothing and sweet words.

2 Then queen Chitrangada, and (Ulupi) the daughter of (the snake) Kauravya, together humbly approached Pritha and Krishna They then met Subhadra and the other ladies of the Kuru race with due formalities

3 Kunti gave them many gems and costly things Draupadi and Subhadra and the other ladies of Kuru's race all made presents to them.

4 The two ladies took up their residence there, using costly beds and seats, treated with affection and honor by Kunti herself from desire of doing what was agreeable to Partha.

5 King Vabhruvahana of great energy, duly honored (by Kunti), then met Dhritarashtra according to due rites

6 Going then to king Yudhishthira and Bhima and the other Pandavas the mighty prince of Manipura saluted them all with humility,

7 They all embraced him with great love and honored him duly. And those powerful car-warrior highly pleased with him, made large gifts of wealth to him

8 The king of Manipura then humbly approached Krishna, that hero armed with the discus and the mace like a second Pradyumna approaching his father Krishna gave to the king a very costly and excellent car adorned with gold and to which were yoked excellent horses

10 Then king Yudhishthira the just, and Bhima, and Phalguna and the twins, each separately honored him and made costly presents to him

11—12 On the third day, the sage Vyasa the son of Satyavati, that foremost of eloquent men approaching Yudhishthira, said,—From this day, O son of Kunti, do you begin your sacrifice The time for it has come! The moment for undertaking the rite is at hand The priests are urging you

13 Let the sacrifice be performed in such a way that no limb may become defective On account of the very large quantity of gold that is required for this sacrifice, it has come to be called the sacrifice of profuse gold.

14 Do you also, O great king, make the Dakshina of this sacrifice three times of what is enjoined Let the merit of your sacrifice increase threefold. The Brahmanas are competent for the purpose.

15. Acquiring the merits then of three Horse-Sacrifices, each with profuse presents, you shall be freed, O king, from the sin of having killed your kinsmen,

16 The bath which one performs upon completion of the Horse-Sacrifice, O king, is highly powerful and productive of the highest merit. That merit will be yours, O king of Kuru's race

17 Thus addressed by Vyasa of incomparable intelligence, the righteous souled Yudhishthira of great energy underwent the initiation for performance of the Horse-Sacrifice.

18. The mighty-armed king then performed the great Horse Sacrifice characterised by gifts of food and presents in profusion and capable of fructifying every desire and producing every merit.

19 The priests, well-conversant with the Vedas, did every rite, duly, moving about in all directions. They were all well-trained, and possessed of omniscience.

20 In nothing was there any deviation from the ordinances, and nothing was done improperly Those foremost of twice-born persons followed the procedure as laid down as it should be followed in those points about which no directions are given

21. Those best of twice-born ones having first performed the rite called Pravargya otherwise called Dharma, then duly performed the rite of Abhishava, O king

22 Those foremost of Soma Drinkers O monarch, extracting the juice of the Soma, then performed the Savana rite, following the injunctions of the scriptures.

23 Among those who came to that sacrifice none could be seen who was cheerless, none who was poor, none who was hungry, none who was plunged into grief, and none that seemed to be vulgar.

24. Bhimasena of great energy, at the command of the king, caused food to be ceaselessly distributed among those who desired to eat.

25. Following the injunctions of the scriptures, priests, well versed in sacrificial rites of every kind, performed every day all the acts necessary to complete the great sacrifice.

26 Amongst the Sadasyas of king Yudhishthira of great intelligence there was none who was not a master of the six branches of (Vedic) learning. There was none among them who was not an observer of vows, none who was not an Upadhyay, none who was not well-versed in dialectical disputations.

27. When the time came for erecting the sacrificial stake, O chief of Bharata's race, six stakes were set up which were made of Vilwa, six which were made of Khadira, and six which were made of Sarvavarnin.

28. Two stakes were set up by the priests which were made of Devadaru in that sacrifice of the Kuru king, and one which was made of Shleshmataka.

29 At the behest of the king, Bhima caused some other stakes to be set up, for the sake of beauty only, which were made of gold.

30 Adorned with fine cloths supplied by the royal sage, those stakes shone there like Indra and the deities with the seven celestial Rishis standing around them in Heaven.

31. A number of golden bricks were made for making therewith a Chayana. The Chayana made resembled in beauty that which had been made for Daksha, the lord of creatures.

32. The Chayana measured eight and ten cubits and had four stories or lairs. A golden bird, of the shape of Garuda, was then made, having three angles.

33 Following the injunctions of the scriptures, the priests endued with great learning then duly tied to the stakes both animals and birds, assigning each to its particular deity.

34 Bulls, possessed of such marks as are mentioned in the scriptures, and aquatic animals were properly tied to the stakes after the rites of the sacrificial fire had been performed.

35. In that sacrifice of the great son of Kunti, three hundred animals were tied to the stakes set up, including that foremost of horses.

36 That sacrifice looked greatly beautiful as if adorned with the celestial Rishis, with the Gandharvas singing in chorus and the various tribes of Apsaras dancing in merriment.

37 It teemed, besides, with Kimpurushas and was adorned with Kinnaras. All around it were houses of Brahmanas crowned with ascetic success.

38 There were daily seen the disciples of Vyasa, those foremost of twice-born ones, who are compilers of all branches of learning, and well conversant with sacrificial rites.

39 There was Narada, and there was Tumburu of great splendour. There were Vishwavasu and Chitrasena and others, all of whom were proficient in music.

40 At intervals of the sacrificial rites, those Gandharvas skilled in music and well-versed in dancing, used to please the Brahmanas who were engaged in the sacrifice.

CHAPTER LXXXIX.

(ANUGITA PARVA.)—Continued.

Vaishampayana said:—

1. Having cooked, according to due rites, the other excellent animals which were sacrificed, the priests then sacrificed, according to the injunctions of the scriptures, that horse (which had wandered over the whole world).

2 After cutting that horse into pieces, according to scriptural directions, they caused Draupadi of great intelligence, who was possessed of the three requisites of Mantras things, and devotion, to sit near the divided animal.

3 The Brahmanas then, with cool minds taking up the marrow of that horse, cooked it duly, O chief of Bharata's race.

4 King Yudhishthira the just, with all his younger brothers, then smelled, according to the scriptures, the smoke, capable of purging one from every sin, of the marrow that was thus cooked.

5 The remaining limbs, O king, of that horse, were poured into the fire by the sixteen sacrificial priests possessed of great wisdom.

6 Having thus completed the sacrifice of that monarch who was gifted with the energy of Shakra himself, the illustrious Vyasa with his disciples eulogised the king greatly.

7. Then Yudhishthira gave away to the Brahmanas a thousand crores of golden nishkas, and to Vyasa he gave away the whole Earth.

8—9 Satyavati's son Vyasa, having accepted the Earth, addressed that foremost one of Bharata's race, viz, king Yudhishthira the just, and said —O best of kings, the Earth which you have given me I return to you! Do you give me the purchasing value, for Brahmanas are desirous of wealth

10 The great Yudhishthira of great intelligence staying with his brothers in the midst of the kings invited to his sacrifice, said to those Brahmanas:—

11. The Dakshina ordained in the scriptures for the great Horse-Sacrifice is the Earth Hence, I have given away to the sacrificial priests the Earth conquered by Arjuna.

12 Ye foremost of Brahmanas, I shall enter the forest. Do ye divide the Earth among yourselves! Indeed, do you divide the Earth into four parts according to what is done in the Chaturhotra-Sacrifice.

13 Ye best of twice-born ones, I do not wish to appropriate what now belongs to the Brahmanas

14 This, ye learned Brahmanas, has been the intention of myself and my brothers When the king said these words, his brothers and Draupadi also said —'Yes, it is even so.' Great was the sensation created by this announcement.

15 Then, O Bharata, an invisible voice was heard in the sky, saying —'Excellent, Excellent! The multitudes of Brahmanas as they spoke, arose.

17 The Island born [illegible] loudly applauding him, once [illegible] Yudhishthira before [illegible] ing —'The Earth has been [illegible] time! I, however, give her back to you! Do you give to these Brahmanas gold Let the Earth be yours!'

18 Then Vasudeva, addressing king Yudhishthira the just, said —You should do as you are ordered by the illustrious Vyasa'

19 Thus addressed, that foremost one of Kuru's race, along with all his brothers, became pleased and gave away millions of golden coins, in fact, trebling the Dakshina ordained for the Horse-Sacrifice.

20. No other king will be able to accomplish what the Kuru king did on that occasion like Marutta.

21. Accepting that wealth, the Island-born sage, Krishna of great learning, gave it to the sacrificial priests, dividing it into four parts

22. Having paid that wealth as the price of the Earth, Yudhishthira, purged of his sins and assured of Heaven, rejoiced with his brothers

23 The sacrificial priests, having got that unlimited quantity of riches, distributed it among the Brahmanas gladly and according to the desire of each recipient.

24 The Brahmanas, also divided amongst themselves, according to Yudhishthira's permission the various ornaments of gold which were in the sacrificial compound [illegible] cutting the triumphal arches, the stakes, the jars, and various kinds of vessels.

25 After the Brahmanas had taken as much as they wished, the wealth that remained was taken away by Kshatriyas and Vaishyas and Shudras and various tribes of Mlechchhas

26 Thus pleased with presents made by king Yudhishthira of great intelligence, the Brahmanas, filled with joy, returned to their respective abodes.

27. The holy and illustrious Vyasa respectfully presented his own share, which was very large, of that gold to Kunti.

28 Receiving that gift of affection from her father-in-law, Pritha became pleased and devoted it to the performance of various acts of merit.

29 King Yudhishthira, having bathed at the conclusion of his sacrifice and become purged of all his sins, shone in the midst of his brothers, honoured by all, like the king of the deities in the midst of the dwellers of the celestial region.

30 The sons of Pandu, surrounded by the assembled kings, looked as beautiful, O king, as the planets in the midst of the stars

31 To those kings they made presents of various jewels and gems, and elephants and horses and ornaments of gold, and female slaves and cloths and immense quantity of gold.

32 Indeed, Pritha's son, by distributing that untold riches among the invited kings, shone, O king, like Vaishravana, the lord of riches.

33. Summoning next the heroic king Vabhruvahana, Yudhishthira, gave to him various kinds of wealth in profusion and gave him permission to return home.

34. The son of Pandu, for pleasing his sister Dusshala, established her infant grandson in his paternal kingdom.

35. The Kuru king Yudhishthira, having by full mastery over his senses, then dismissed the assembled kings all of whom had been properly classed and honoured by him.

36—37. The illustrious son of Pandu, that chastiser of foes, then duly adored the great Govinda and Valadeva of great prowess and the thousands of other Vrishnis heroes having Pradyumna for their first. Assisted by his brothers, he then dismissed them for returning to Dwaraka.

38 Thus was celebrated that sacrifice of king Yudhishthira the just, which was distinguished by a profusion of food and wealth and jewels and gems, and oceans of wines of different kinds.

39 There were lakes whose mire consisted of clarified butter and mountains of food. There were, also, O chief of Bharata's race, many rivers made of drinks having the six kinds of taste.

* Of men employed in making and selling the sweetmeats called Khandavaragas, and of animals killed for food, there was no end.

41. The vast compound was filled with men inebriated with wine, and with young ladies filled with joy. The extensive grounds constantly echoed with the sounds of drums and the blare of conchs. With all these, the sacrifice became highly delightful.

42. 'Let agreeable things be given away,'—'Let agreeable food be eaten,'—These were the sounds which were repeatedly heard day and night in that sacrifice It was like a great festival, full of rejoicing and contented men. People of various kingdoms speak of that sacrifice to this day.

43 Having showered wealth in torrents, and various objects of desire, and jewels and gems, and drinks of various kinds, the foremost one of Bharata's race, purged of all his sins, and his purpose fulfilled, entered his capital.

CHAPTER XC.

(ANUGITA PARVA)—
Continued.

Janamejaya said :—

1 You should tell me of any wonderful incident which took place in the sacrifice of my grandsire.

Vaishampayana said : —

2 Hear, O chief of kings, of a most wonderful event which took place, O powerful monarch, at the conclusion of that great Horse-Sacrifice.

3—5. On all the foremost of Brahmanas and all the kinsmen and relatives and friends, and all the poor, the blind, and the helpless ones, being gratified, O chief of Bharata's race, when the gifts made in profusion were being spoken of on all sides, indeed when flowers were rained down on the head of king Yudhishthira the just, a blue eyed mungoose, O sinless one, with one side of his body converted into gold, came there and spoke in a voice that was as loud and deep as thunder.

6—7 Repeatedly uttering such deep sounds and thereby frightening all animals and birds, that proud dweller of a hole, with large body spoke in a human voice and said,—'Ye kings, this great sacrifice is not equal to a prastha of powdered barley given away by a liberal Brahmana of Kurukshetra who was observing the Unchcha vow.

8 Hearing these words of the mungoose, O king, all those foremost of Brahmanas became stricken with wonder.

9. Approaching the mungoose, they then asked him, saying,—'Whence have you come to this sacrifice, this resort of the good and the pious?

10 What is the extent of your power? What your learning? And what your refuge? How should we know you who thus censure this our sacrifice?

11. Without having disregarded any portion of the scriptures, everything that should be done has been done here according to the scriptures and according to reason, with the help of various sacrificial rites.

12 Those who are deserving of adoration, have been duly adored here according to the way pointed out by the scriptures Libations have been poured on the sacred fire with the help of proper Mantras That which should be given, has been given away without pride.

13 The twice born class have been pleased with gifts of various kinds The Kshatriyas have been pleased with battles fought according to just methods The grandfathers have been pleased with Shraddhas

14 The Vaishyas have been pleased by the protection offered to them, and many foremost of women have been pleased by accomplishing their desires The Shudras have been pleased by kind speeches, and others with the residue of the profuse wealth collected on the spot

15 Kinsmen and relatives have been pleased by the purity of conduct shown by our king. The celestials have been pleased by libations of clarified butter and acts of merit, and dependants and followers by protection.

16 That, therefore, which is true, do you truly declare to these Brahmanas Indeed do you declare what is according to the scriptures and to actual experience asked by the Brahmanas who are eager to know.

17 Your words are creditable You are wise You have have also, a celestial form You have come into the midst of learned Brahmanas You should explain yourself'

18 Thus addressed by those twice born persons, the mungoose, smiling, answered them as follows — Ye twice-born ones the words I have uttered are not false Neither have I spoken them from pride.

19 You have all heard what I have said You foremost of twice born persons, this sacrifice is not equal in merit to the gift of a prastha of powdered barley.

20 Forsooth, I should say this, O foremost of Brahmanas Listen to me with rapt attention as I truly describe to you what took place

21 Wonderful and excellent was the event that happened It was seen by me and its consequences were felt by me The incident relates to a liberal Brahmana living in Kurukshetra in the observance of the Unchcha vow.

22. On account of that incident he attained to Heaven, O twice-born ones along with his wife and son and daughter in-law. And in consequence of what then took place half my body became changed into gold

23. O twice born ones, I shall presently tell you what the excellent fruit was of the gift made by a Brahmana, of a very little measure (of powdered barley) acquired by fair means.

24 On that righteous spot of ground known by the name of Kurukshetra, which is the habitation of many righteous persons, there lived a Brahmana observing the Unchcha vow. That mode of living is like that of the pigeon.

25 He lived there with his wife and son and daughter in law and practised penances Of righteous soul, and with senses completely controlled, he adopted the mode of living which is followed by a parict.

26—28 Of excellent vows, he used to eat every day at the sixth division If there was nothing to eat at the sixth division of the day, that excellent Brahmana would fast for that day and eat the next day at the sixth division On one occasion ye Brahmanas, there took place a dreadful famine in the Land. During that time there was nothing stored in the abode of that righteous Brahmana The herbs and plants were all dried up and the whole kingdom became void of food stores

29 When the habitual hours came for eating, the Brahmana had nothing to eat. This happened day after day All the members of his family were stricken with hunger but were obliged to pass the days as best they could.

30 One day, in the month of Jyaishtha, while the Sun was in the meridian, the Brahmana was engaged in picking up grains of corn —Afflicted by heat and hunger, he was practising this penance.

31. Unable to obtain grains of corn, the Brahmana soon became exhausted with hunger and toil. Indeed, with all the members of his family, he had no food to eat.

32 That best of Brahmanas passed the days in terrible suffering. One day, after the sixth division came, he succeeded in getting a prastha of barley.

33—34 That barley was then reduced by those ascetics to powder for making what is called Saktu of it. Having finished their silent recitations and other daily rites, and having duly poured libations on the sacred fire, those ascetics divided that little quantity of powdered barley amongst themselves so that the share of each came up to the measure of Kudava (twelve double handfuls) As they were about to sit down for eating, there came to their abode a guest.

35 Seeing the person who came as a guest, all of them became highly pleased Indeed, seeing him, they saluted him and made the usual enquiries of health and happiness.

36. They were of pure minds, self-controlled, and gifted with faith and control over the passions. Freed from malice, they had conquered anger. Possessed of piety, they were never pained at seeing other people's happiness.

37—38. They had renounced pride and haughtiness and and anger Indeed, they knew every duty, O foremost of twice born ones! Informing their guest of their own penances and of the race or family to which they belonged, and ascertaining from him in return those particulars, they caused that hungry guest of theirs to enter their cottage. Addressing him they said,—This is the Arghya for you. This water is for washing your feet There are scattered some Kusha grass for your seat, O sinless one.

39 Here is some clean Saktu acquired by lawful means. O powerful one! Given by us, O foremost of twice-born persons, do you accept it.

40. Thus addressed by them, that Brahmana accepted the Kudava (twelve double handfuls) of powdered barley which was offered to him and ate it all. But his hunger, O king, was not satisfied with what he ate.

41. The Brahmana while observing the Unchcha vow, seeing that his guest's hunger was still unsatisfied, began to think of what other food he could place before him for pleasing him.

42. Then his wife said to him,—Let my share be given to him! Let this foremost of twice-born persons be pleased and let him then go wherever he will.

43 Knowing that his chaste wife who said so, was herself stricken with hunger, that best of Brahmanas could not approve of her share of the powdered barley being given to the guest.

44—46 Indeed, that best of Brahmanas endued with learning, knowing from his own state that his aged toil worn, cheerless, and helpless wife was herself afflicted by hunger, and seeing that lady who had been emaciated into mere skin and bones, was quivering with weakness, addressed her and said,—'O beautiful one, with even animals, with even worms and insects, wives are fed and protected. You should not, therefore, say so. The wife treats her husband with kindness and feeds and protects him.

47 Everything connected with religion, pleasure, and wealth, careful nursing, offspring for perpetuating the race, are all dependent on the wife Indeed, the merits of a person himself as also of his deceased ancestors depend also on her.

48. The wife should know her husband by his deeds. Indeed, that man who fails to protect his wife, earns great infamy here and goes into Hell hereafter. Such a man falls down from even a position of great fame and never succeeds in acquiring happy regions hereafter.

49 Thus addressed, she answered him, saying,—O twice born one, our religious acts and wealth are united Do you take a fourth of this barley! Indeed, be pleased with me.

50. Truth, pleasure, religious merit, and Heaven, as acquirable by good qualities, of women, as also all the objects of their desire, O foremost of twice born ones, depend on the husband.

51. In the production of children the mother contributes her blood The father contributes his seed. The husband is the highest deity of the wife. Through the favour of the husband, women get both pleasure and offspring as the reward.

52. You are my Pati (lord) for the protection you give me You are my Bhartri for the means of sustenance you give me. You are, again, boon-giver to me on account of your having presented me a son. Do you therefore, take my share of the barley and give it to the guest.

53 Overcome by decrepitude, you are of advanced years. Afflicted by hunger, you are greatly weakened. Worn out with fasts, you are very much emaciated.

54 Thus addressed by her, he took her share of the powdered barley, and addressing his guest, said,—O twice-born one, O best of men, do you accept this quantity of powdered barley as well.

55. The Brahmana, having accepted that quantity, immediately ate it up, but his hunger was not yet satisfied. Seeing him ungratified, the Brahmana in the observance of the Unchcha vow became thoughtful 56 His son then said to him,—'O best of men, taking my share of the barley do you give it to the guest! I consider this act of mine as one of great merit. Therefore, I do it.

57 You should be always maintained by me with great care. Maintenance of the father is a duty which the good always covet.

58 The maintenance of the father in his old age is the duty laid down for the son. This is the eternal Shruti (audition) current in the three worlds, O learned Rishi.

59 By living on barely you are capable of practising penances. The life-breath is the great deity which lives in the bodies of all embodied creatures.'

The father said :—

60. If you attain to the age of even a thousand years, you will still seem to me to be only a little child Having begotten a son, the father achieves success through him.

61. O powerful one, I know that the hunger of children is very strong I am old I shall somehow succeed in holding my life breaths. Do you, O son, become strong.

62 Old and decrepit as I am, O son, hunger scarcely afflicts me I have, again, for many years, practised penances. I have no fear of death.

The son said :—

63 I am your offspring. The Shruti declares that one's offspring is called Putra, because one is rescued by him. One's own self, again, takes birth as his son. Do you, therefore, rescue yourself by your own self.

The father said :—

64 In form you are like me. In conduct and in self-control, also, you are my like You have been examined on various occasions by me. I shall, therefore, accept your share of the barley, O son!

65. Having said this, that foremost of twice-born persons cheerfully took his son's share of the barley and smilingly presented it to his twice-born guest.

66 Having eaten that barley also, the guest's hunger was not satisfied. The righteous-souled host in the observance of the Unchcha vow became ashamed.

67—68. Desirous of doing what was agreeable to him, his chaste daughter-in-law then, bearing her share of the barley, approached him and said,—Through your son, O learned Brahmana, I shall obtain a son Do you, therefore, take my share of the barley and give it to this guest.

69 Through your grace, numerous regions of beatitude will be mine for eternity. Through a grandson one obtains those regions going where one has not to suffer any kind of misery.

70. Like the three fold objects of life beginning with Religion, or the three fold sacred fires, there is a triple aggregate of everlasting Heavens, depending upon the son, the grandson, and the great-grandson.

71. The son is called Putra because he frees his ancestor's debt. Through sons and grandsons one always enjoys the happiness of those regions which are reserved for the pious and the good.

The father-in-law said :—

72—73 O you of excellent vows and conduct, seeing you wasted by wind and sun, deprived of your very complexion, emaciated, and almost destitute of consciousness through hunger, how can I be such a transgressor against the rules of virtue as to take your share of the barley? O auspicious damsel, you should not say so, for the sake of those auspicious results for which every family must try.

74 O auspicious lady, how can I hold you at even this, the sixth division of the day abstaining from food and observing vows? You are gifted with purity and good conduct and penances Alas, even you have to pass your days in so much misery.

75. You are a child, afflicted by hunger, and belong to the softer sex You should be always protected by me! Alas, I have to see you worn out with fast, O you who are the delighter of all your kinsmen.

The daughter-in-law said:—

76 You are the senior of my senior, since you are the deity of my deity. You are, indeed, the god of my god. Do you, therefore, O powerful one, take my share of the barley.

77 My body, life breaths, and religious rites, have all one object, viz, the service of my elder. Through your favour, O learned Brahmana, I shall obtain many regions of happiness hereafter.

78 I deserve to be looked after by you. Know, O twice-born one, that I am wholly devoted to you. Cherishing also this thought, viz, that my happiness is your concern, you should take this my share of the barley.

The father-in-law said :—

79 O chaste lady, on account of such conduct of yours you will for ever shine in glory for endued with vows and steadiness in religious rites your eyes are directed to that conduct which should be observed towards elders.

80 Therefore O daughter-in law, I shall take your share of the barley. You deserve not to be deceived by me, considering all your virtues. You are truly, O blessed damsel, the foremost of all persons observing the duties of righteousness.

81 Having said so to her, the Brahmana took her share of the barley and gave it to his guest. At this the guest became pleased with that great Brahmana gifted with great piety.

82—83 With gratified soul, that first of twice-born persons, endued with great eloquence, who was none else than the deity of Virtue in a human form then addressed that foremost of Brahmanas and said,—'O best of twice born ones, I am highly pleased with this pure gift of yours, this gift of what was acquired by fair means by you, and which you did freely part with, according to the rules of virtue.

84 Indeed, this gift of yours is being bruited about in Heaven by the dwellers of that happy region. Mark flowers have been rained down from the sky on the Earth.

45 The celestial Rishis the deities the Gandharvas those who walk before the deities and the celestial messengers, are all landing you, struck with wonder at your gift.

86 The twice born Rishis who live in the regions of Brahma, seated on their cars, are anxious to see you. O foremost of twice-born persons, go to Heaven.

87 The Pitris living in their own region, have all been rescued by them. Others, also, who have not attained to the position of Pitris, have equally been rescued by you for countless cycles.

88 For your Brahmacharyya, your gifts, your sacrifices your penances, and your acts of piety done with a pure heart, go you to Heaven.

89 O you of excellent vows, you practise penances with great devotion. Your gifts have, therefore, pleased the deities highly, O best of twice born ones.

90 Since you have made this gift, in a season of great difficulty, with a pure heart, you have by this act of yours, conquered the celestial region.

91 Hunger destroys one's wisdom and drives off one's righteous understanding. One whose intelligence is overwhelmed by hunger renounces all fortitude.

92 He, therefore, who conquers hunger, conquers Heaven, forsooth. One's righteousness is never destroyed as long as he cherishes the inclination of making gifts.

93 Disregarding filial affection, disregarding the affection one feels for his wife, and reckoning virtue as the foremost, you have paid no attention to the cravings of nature.

94. The acquisition of riches is an act of slight merit. Its gift to a worthy person is fraught with greater merit. Of still greater merit is the (proper) time. Lastly, devotion is fraught with the highestr merit.

95 The door of Heaven is very difficult to see. Through carelessness men cannot see it. The bar of Heaven's door has cupidity for its seed. That bar is kept fastened by desire and affection. Indeed, Heaven's door is unapproachable.

96 Those men who have subdued anger and conquered their passions those Brahmanas who are gifted with penances and who make gifts according to the extent of their ability, succeed in seeing it.

97. It has been said that he who gives away a hundred, having a thousand, he who gives away ten having a hundred, and he who gives a handful of water, having no money, are all equal as regards the merit they acquire.

98 King Rantideva, when divested of all his riches, gave a small quantity of water with a pure heart. Through this gift, O learned Brahmana, he went to the celestial region.

99 The deity of righteousness is never pleased so much with large gifts of costly things as with gifts of even worthless things, if acquired lawfully and given away with devotion and faith.

100 King Nriga had made gifts of thousands of kine to the twice born class-

By giving away only one cow which did not belong to him, he fell into Hell

101. Ushinara's son Shivi of excellent vows, by giving away the flesh of his own body, is rejoicing in the celestial region, having attained to the regions of the pious

102 Mere wealth is not merit Good men acquire merit by exerting to the best of their power and with the help of righteousness One does not acquire such merit by means of even various sacrifices as with even a little wealth that has been acquired by fair means.

103 Through anger, the fruits of gifts are destroyed Through cupidity one fails to go to the celestial region. One conversant with the merits of gift, and leading a just course of conduct, succeeds, through penances, in enjoying the celestial region

104 The fruit, O Brahmana, of this gift made by you (of a prastha of powdered barley) is much greater than what one acquires by many Rajasuya-Sacrifices with profuse gifts or many Horse-Sacrifices.

105 With this prastha of powdered barley you have conquered the eternal region of Brahman Go you in happiness, O learned Brahmana, to the house of Brahman who is without the stain of darkness

106 O foremost of twice-born persons, a celestial car is here for all of you Do you ascend it as you please! O Brahmana I am the deity of Righteousness Behold me!

107 You have rescued your body The fame of your achievement will last in the world With your wife, your son, and your daughter-in-law, go now to the celestial region.

108 After the deity of Righteousness had said these words, that Brahmana with his wife, son daughter in law, proceeded to the celestial region

109 After that learned Brahmana knowing all duties, had thus ascended to the celestial region with his son, daughter in-law and wife numbering the fourth, I came out of my hole

110—112 There with the scent of that powdered barley, with the mire caused by the water (which the Brahmana had given to his guest) with the contact (of my body) with the celestial flowers which had been rained down with the particles of the barley powder which that good man had given away and the penances of that Brahmana, my head became gold. See, on account of the gift of that Brahmana who was firm in truth and his penances half of this my ample body has become golden.

113 O twice-born ones, for converting the rest of my body into gold I repeatedly go, with a cheerful heart to the hermitages of ascetics and sacrifices performed by kings

114 Hearing of this sacrifice of the Kuru king, gifted with great wisdom, I came here with hopes I have not, however, been made gold

115 O foremost of Brahmanas it was for this that I uttered those words viz., that this sacrifice can by no means compare with (the gift of) that prastha of powdered barley.

116 With the grains of that prastha of powdered barley, I was made gold on that occasion This great sacrifice, however, is not equal to those grains. This is my opinion.

117 Having said those words to all those foremost of Brahmanas, the mungoose disappeared from their view Those Brahmanas then returned to their respective homes.

Vaishampayana said:—

118 O conquerer of hostile towns, I have now told you all about that wonderful incident which took place in that great Horse-Sacrifice.

119 You should not, O king, think highly of sacrifice Millions of Rishis have ascended to the celestial region with the help of only their penances

120 Abstention from injury to all creatures, contentment, conduct, sincerity, penances, self control, truthfulness and gifts, are each equal in point of merit to sacrifice.

CHAPTER XCI.

Janamejaya said:—

1. O powerful Rishi, kings are attached to sacrifices The great Rishis are attached to penances Learned Brahmanas observe tranquility of mind, peacefulness of conduct and self control.'

2. Hence it appears that nothing can be seen in this world which can compare with the fruits of sacrifices This is my conviction. That conviction, again, seems to be surely correct.

3 Numberless kings, O best of twice-born persons, having adored the celestials in sacrifices acquired high fame here and obtained the celestial region hereafter.

4 Gifted with great energy, the powerful king of the deities, viz, Indra of a thousand eyes, obtained the sovereignty over the deities through the many sacrifices he performed with gifts in profusion and attained to the fruition of all his desires

5—6 When king Yudhishthira, with Bhima and Arjuna by him, resembled the king of the deities himself in prosperity and prowess, why then did that mungoose depreciate that great Horse-Sacrifice of the great monarch,

Vaishampayana said :—

7. Do you listen to me, O king, as I describe to you duly, O Bharata, the excellent ordinances about sacrifice and the fruits also, O king, that sacrifice yields

8 Formerly, on one occasion Shakra celebrated a particular sacrifice While the limbs of the sacrifice were spread out, the Ritwijas became busy in performing the various rites ordained in the scriptures.

9—10 The pourer of libations, possessed of every qualification, became engaged in pouring libations of clarified butter. The great Rishis were seated around The celestials were summoned one by one by contented Brahmanas of great learning uttering scriptural Mantras in sweet voices Those foremost of Adhwaryyus, not fatigued with what they did, recited the Mantras of the Yajurveda in soft accents

11. The time came for killing the animals When the animals selected for sacrifice were seized, the great Rishis, O king, felt mercy for them.

12 Seeing that the animals had all become dispirited, those Rishis, gifted with wealth of penances, approached Shakra and said to him,—'This method of sacrifice is not auspicious'

13 Desirous of winning great merit as you are, this is, indeed, a mark of your ignorance of the rites of sacrifice. O Purandara, animals have not been ordained to be killed in sacrifices.

14 O powerful one, these preparations of yours are destructive of merit! This sacrifice is not consistent with virtue. The destruction of creatures can never be said to be an act of virtue!

15 If you wish it, let your priests perform your sacrifice according to the Agama. By performing a sacrifice according to the scriptural ordinances, great will be the merit acquired by you.

16 O you of a hundred eyes do you perform the sacrifice with seeds of grain which have been kept for three years This, O Shakra, would be fraught with great virtue and productive of fruits of high efficacy.

17 The deity of a hundred sacrifices, however, moved by pride and overwhelmed by stupefaction, did not accept these words uttered by the Rishis.

18 Then O Bharata, a great dispute arose in that sacrifice of Shakra between the ascetics as to how sacrifices should be performed that is, should they be performed, with mobile creatures or with immobile objects

19 All of them were exhausted with disputation The Rishis, then, those beholders of truth, having made a compact with Shakra, asked king Vasu —

20 O highly blessed one, what is the Vedic declaration about sacrifices? Is it preferable to perform sacrifices with animals or with seeds and juices

21. Hearing the question, king Vasu, without at all judging the merits of the arguments advanced on both sides, at once answered saying —'Sacrifices may be performed with any of the two kinds of objects ready'

22 Having answered the question thus, he had to enter the nether regions Indeed, the powerful king of the Chedis had to undergo that misery for having answered falsely.

23. Therefore, when a doubt arises, no person, however wise, should singly decide the matter, unless he be the powerful and self-born Lord himself of creatures.

24 Gifts made by a sinner with an impure heart, for this even when very large, become lost. Such gifts go for nothing.

25 By the gifts made by a person of unrighteous conduct,—one, that is, who is of sinful soul and who is a destroyer, just fame is never acquired either in this world or in the next.

26 That person of little intelligence, who, from desire of acquiring merit, celebrates sacrifices with wealth acquired by unfair means, never succeeds in acquiring merit.

27. That low wretch of sinful soul who hypocritically assuming a garb of virtue makes gifts to Brahmanas only creates the conviction in men about his own virtue.

28. That Brahmana of uncontrolled conduct, who acquires wealth by sinful deeds, overwhelmed by passion and stupefaction, attains at last to the goal of the sinful.

29. Some one, overwhelmed by cupidity and stupefaction, becomes bent on storing riches. He is seen to persecute all creatures, urged by a sinful and impure understanding.

30. He who, having acquired riches by such means, makes gifts or performs sacrifices therewith, never enjoys the fruits of those gifts or sacrifices in the other world on account of the wealth having been acquired by unfair means.

31. Men having wealth of penances, by giving away, to the best of their power, grains of corn picked up from the fields or roots or fruits or potherbs or water or leaves, acquire great merit and proceed to the celestial region.

32—33 Such gifts are fraught with virtue and equal to high austerities. Such gifts, as also mercy to all creatures, and Brahmacharyya, truthfulness of speech, and kindness, and fortitude, and forgiveness, form the eternal foundations of virtue which itself is eternal. We hear of Vishvamitra and other kings of ancient times

34—35 Indeed, Vishmvamitra, and Asita, and king Janaka, and Kakshasena and Arshtisena and king Sindhudwipa, these and many other kings, gifted with wealth of penances, having made gifts of articles acquired by fairness, have attained to high success.

36. Those amongst Brahmanas and Kshatriyas, Vaishyas and Shudras, who perform penances, O Bharata, and who purify themselves, by gifts and other deeds of righteousness, proceed to the celestial region.

CHAPTER XCII.

[ANUGITA PARVA.]—Concluded.

Janamejaya said:—

1. If, O illustrious one, celestial region is the fruit of riches acquired by fair means, do you fully describe it to me. You are well-conversant with the subject and, it is, therefore, proper for you to explain it.

2. O twice-born one, you have said to me what the high fruit was that accured to that Brahmana, who lived according to the Unchcha mode, through his gift of powdered barley. Forsooth, all you have said is true.

3. In what way, however, was the attainment held certain of the highest end in all sacrifices? O foremost of twice-born persons, you should fully expound all this to me.

Vaishampayana said:—

4. Regarding it is cited this old narrative, O chastiser of enemies, of what took place formerly in the great sacrifice of Agastya.

5. Formerly, O king, Agastya of great energy, devoted to the well-being of all creatures, entered into a Diksha extending for twelve years.

6. In that sacrifice of the great Rishi many Hotris were engaged who resembled blazing fires in the splendour of their bodies. Among them were men who lived upon roots or fruits, or who used two pieces of stone only for husking their corn, or who were supported by only the rays (of the moon).

7. Among them were also men who never took any food unless it was placed before them by others desirous of feeding them, and those who never ate anything without having first served the celestials, the departed Manes, and guests, and those who never washed the food which they took. There were also Yatis and Vikshus among them, O king.

8. All of them were men who had obtained a sight of the deity of virtue in his embodied form. They had subjugated anger and acquired a complete mastery over all their senses Living in the observance of self-control, they were freed from pride and the desire of injuring others.

9. They were always observant of a pure conduct and were never obstructed by their senses. Those great Rishis attended that sacrifice and performed its various rites.

10. The illustrious Rishi (Agastya) acquired the food which was collected in that sacrifice and that came up to the required quantity, by lawful means according to the best of his power.

11—13 Numerous other ascetics at that time celebrated large sacrifices. As Agastya, however, was engaged in that sacrifice of his, the thousand-eyed Indra, O best of the Bharatas, ceased to pour rain (on the Earth) At the intervals, O king, of the sacrificial rites, this talk took place among those Rishis of purified souls about the great Agastya, viz,—'This Agastya, engaged in sacrifice, is making gifts of food with heart purged of pride and vanity.

14. The deity of the clouds, however, has ceased to pour rain. How, indeed will food grow? This sacrifice of the Rishi, ye Brahmanas, is great and extends for twelve years.

15—20 The deity will not pour rain for these twelve years Thinking on this you should do some favour to this Rishi of great intelligence, viz, Agastya of severe penances' When these words were said, Agastya of great prowess pleasing all those ascetics by bending his head said — 'If Vasava does not pour rain for these twelve years I shall then perform the mental sacrifice This is the eternal ordinance If Vasava does not pour rain for these twelve years I shall then perform the Touch Sacrifice This is the eternal sacrifice If Vasava does not pour rain for these twelve years I shall then putting forth all my exertions make arrangements for other sacrifices characterised by the observance of the most difficult and severe vows This present sacrifice of mine, with seeds, has been arranged for by me with labour of many years

21 I shall with seeds do much good No obstacle will arise This my sacrifice is incapable of being baffled

22—23 It matters little whether the deity pours rain or no downpours come Indeed, if Indra does not of his own will, show any regard for me, I shall, in that case, change myself into Indra and keep all creatures alive Every creature, on whatever food he has been nourished, will continue to be nourished on it as before

24 I can even repeatedly create a different order of things Let gold and whatever else of riches there is, come to this place to day.

25—27 Let all the wealth which is in the three worlds come here to day of its own accord' Let all the tribes of celestial Apsaras, all the Gandharvas along with the Kinnaras and Vishwavasu, and others there are (of that order) approach this sacrifice of mine' Let all the wealth which exists among the Northern Kurus come of their own accord to these sacrifices Let Heaven and all those who have Heaven for their home, and Dharma himself, come here'

28 After the ascetic had uttered these words everything took place as he desired, by virtue of his penances, for Agastya was gifted with a mind which resembled a burning fire and was possessed of extraordinary energy

29 The Rishis who were there saw the power of penances with rejoicing hearts Filled with wonder they then said these words of grave significance.

The Rishis said —

30. We have been highly pleased with words you have uttered We do not, however, wish that your penances should suffer any diminution Those sacrifices are approved by us which are performed by fair means Indeed, we wish duly those sacrifices which rest on lawful means.

31. Acquiring our food by lawful means and observant of our respective duties we shall seek to go through sacrificial initiations and the pouring of libations on the sacred fire and the other religious rites

32—33 We should worship the celestials, practising Brahmacharyya by lawful means. Completing the period of Brahmacharyya we have come out of our house, observing lawful methods. That understanding which is freed from the desire of inflicting any kind of injury on others is approved by us

34 You should, always, O powerful one, commend such abstention from injury in all sacrifices We shall then be highly pleased O foremost of twice born ones. After the completion of your sacrifice, when dismissed by you, we shall then, leaving this place, go away

35 As they were saying these words, Purandara, the king of the deities, gifted with great energy, seeing the power of Agastya's penances poured rain

36 Indeed, O Janamejaya, till the completion of the sacrifice of that Rishi of great prowess, the deity of rain poured rain which met the wishes of men both about quantity and time.

37 Placing Vrihaspati before him the king of the deities came there, O royal sage, and pleased the Rishi Agastya.

38 On the termination of that sacrifice, Agastya, filled with joy, adored all those great Rishis duly and then sent them all away.

Janamejaya said —

39 Who was that mungoose with a golden head, which said all those words in a human voice? Asked by me, do you tell me this.

Vaishampayana said —

40 You did not ask me before and, therefore I did not tell you Hear as I tell you who that mungoose was and why he could assume a human voice

41 Formerly, the Rishi Jamadagni desired to perform a Shraddha His Homa Cow came to him and the Rishi milked her himself.

41 He then placed the milk in a vessel which was new, durable, and pure. The deity Dharma, assuming the form of anger, entered that vessel of milk.

43 Indeed, Dharma was desirous of determining what that foremost of Rishis would do when seeing some injury done to him Having thought thus, Dharma spoiled that milk.

44 Knowing that the spoiler of his milk was Anger, the ascetic was not at all enraged with him Anger, then, assuming the form of a Brahmana lady, showed himself to the Rishi.

45 Indeed, Anger, finding that he had been vanquished by that foremost one of Bhrigu's race, addressed him, saying —'O chief of Bhrigu's race, I have been conquered by you There is a saying among men that the Bhrigus are very wrathful. I now find that that saying is false, since I have been subdued by you 46 You are endued with a powerful soul You are endued with forgiveness I stand here to-day, acknowledging your sway I fear your penances, O righteous one! Do you, O powerful Rishi, show me favour.

Jamadagni said :—

47 I have seen you, O Anger, in your embodied form. Go you wherever you like, without any anxiety. You have not done me any injury to-day. I have no grudge against you.

48 Those for whom I had kept this milk are the highly blessed Pitris. Present yourself before them and ascertain their intentions.

49 Thus addressed, stricken with fear, Anger vanished from the sight of the Rishi. Through the curse of the Pitris he became a mungoose.

50. He then began to please the Pitris in order to bring about an end of his curse. By them he was told these words —'By speaking disrespectfully of Dharma you shall attain to the end of your curse'

51. Thus addressed by them, he wandered over places where sacrifices were performed and over other sacred places, employed in censuring great sacrifices It was he who came to the great sacrifice of king Yudhishthira.

52. Dispraising the son of Dharma by a reference to the prastha of powdered barley, Anger became freed from his curse, for Yudhishthira (as Dharma's son) was Dharma's self.

53 This is what took place in the sacrifice of that great king. The mungoose disappeared there in our very presence.

ASHRAMAVASIKA PARVA.

CHAPTER I.

Having saluted the Supreme Deity (Narayana) and the highest of all male beings (Nara) and also the Goddess of Learning (Saraswati), let us cry success.

Janamejaya said :—

1. After having gained their kingdom, how did my grandfathers, the great Pandavas treat the high-souled king Dhritarashtra?

2 How indeed, did that king who had all his counsellors and sons killed who was without a support, and whose wealth had vanished, behave? How also did the illustrious Gandhari act?

3 For how many years did my noble grandfather rule the kingdom? You should tell me all this.

Vaishampayana said :—

4 Having regained their kingdom, the great Pandavas, their enemies all killed, ruled the earth, placing Dhritarashtra at their head.

5 Vidura, Sanjaya and the highly intelligent Yuyutsu, who was Dhritarashtra's son by his Vaishya wife, used to wait upon Dhritarashtra.

6. The Pandavas used to consult that king in all matters. Indeed, for fifteen years, they did all things under the advice of the old king.

7. Those heroes used very often to go to that king and sit beside him, after having adored his feet, according to the wishes of king Yudhishthira the just.

8 They did all things under the command of Dhritarashtra who smelt their heads in love The daughter of king Kuntibhoja also obeyed Gandhari in all matters

9. Draupadi and Subhadra and the other ladies of the Pandavas treated the old king and the queen as if they were their own father-in-law and mother in law.

10—11. Yudhishthira gave the king costly beds, dresses and ornaments and food and drink and other enjoyable articles in profusion and of such superior kinds as were worthy of royal use Likewise Kunti behaved towards Gandhari as towards a senior.

12 Vidura, Sanjaya, and Yuyutsu, O you of Kuru's race, used to always wait upon the old king whose sons had all been killed.

13 The dear brother-in law of Drona, viz, the very superior Brahmana, Kripa, that powerful bowman, also, attended upon the king.

14. The holy Vyasa also used to often meet with the old king and recite to him the histories of old Rishis and celestial ascetics and Pitris and Rakshasas.

15. Vidura, under the orders of Dhritarashtra, superintended the performance of all religious acts and the administration of the law.

16 Through the excellent policy of Vidura, by the expenditure of very little money, the Pandavas got numerous agreeable services from their feudatories and followers

17 King Dhritarashtra freed prisoners and pardoned those who were condemned to death. King Yudhishthira the just never said anything to this.

18 On those occasions when the son of Ambika went on pleasure trips the highly energetic Kuru king Yudhishthira used to give him every article of enjoyment.

19 Araikas, and juice makers and makers of Ragakhandavas waited on king Dhritarashtra as before.

20 Pandu's son collected costly dresses and garlands of various kinds and daily offered them to Dhritarashtra

21. Maireya wines, fish of various kinds, and sherbets and honey, and various kinds of food agreeably prepared by the admixture, of many articles, were caused to be made for the old king as in his prosperous days.

22. Those kings who came there one after another, all used to wait upon the old Kuru king as before.

23—26 Kunti Draupadi, and she of the Sattwata race possessed of great fame, and Ulupi the daughter of the Naga king, and queen Chitrangada, and the sister of Dhrishtaketu, and the daughter of Jarasandha,—these and many other ladies, O king, used to wait upon the daughter of Suvala like maids of all work. Yudhishthira always enjoined upon his brothers that Dhritarashtra, who was deprived of all his children, might not feel himself unhappy in any way. They also, on their part, listening to these pregnant commands from king Yudhishthira, showed particular obedience to the old king.

27. There was one exception however It was Bhimasena. All that had followed from that match at dice which had been brought about by the wicked understanding of Dhritarashtra, did not go away from the heart of that hero

CHAPTER II.

(ASHRAMAVASIKAS PARVA.)—Continued.

Vaishampayana said:—

1. Thus adored by the Pandavas, the royal son of Ambika passed his time happily as before, waited upon and honoured by the Rishis.

2 That perpetuater of Kuru's race used to make those foremost of offerings which should be given to the Brahmanas The royal son of Kunti always placed those articles at Dhritarashtra's command.

3—4 Shorn of malice as king Yudhishthira was, he was always affectionate towards his uncle Addressing his brothers and ministers, the king said,— King Dhritarashtra should be honoured both by myself and you all. He indeed, is a well wisher of mine who obeys the commands of Dhritarashtra.

5—6. He, on the other hand, who treats him otherwise, is my enemy Such a man should certainly be punished by me On days of performing the rites ordained for the Pitris, as also in the Shraddhas performed for his sons and all well wishers, the great Kuru king Dhritarashtra, gave away to Brahmanas, as each deserved immense quantity of wealth after his heart.

7. King Yudhishthira the just, and Bhima, and Arjuna, and the twins desirous of doing what was liked by the old king, used to execute all his commands.

8 They always took care that the old king who was afflicted with the destruction of his sons and grandsons,—with, that is, grief caused by the Pandavas themselves,—might not die of his grief.

9 Indeed, the Pandavas treated him in such a way that that Kuru hero might not be deprived of that happiness and all those articles of enjoyment which he had during his sons' life-time.

10 The five brothers, viz, the sons of Pandu treated thus Dhritarashtra, living under his command

11 Dhritarashtra also, seeing them so humble and obedient to his commands and acting towards him as disciples towards preceptors, treated them also like a loving preceptor in return.

12 Gandhari by performing the various rites of the Shraddha and making gifts to Brahmanas of various objects of enjoyment, became freed from the debt she owed to her slain children.

13 Thus did that foremost of righteous men, viz. king Yudhishthira the just, endued with great intelligence, along with his brothers, adored king Dhritarashtra.

Vishampayana said:—

14 Endued with great energy, that perpetuater of Kuru's race, viz, the old king Dhritarashtra, could not see any ill-will in Yudhishthira.

15. Seeing that the great Pandavas were in the observance of a wise and righteous conduct, king Dhritarashtra, the son of Ambika, became pleased with them.

16 Suvala's daughter, Gandhari, renouncing all sorrow for her (slain) children, began to show great love for the Pandavas as if they were her own children.

17 Gifted with great energy, the Kuru king Yudhishthira never did anything that was disliked by the royal son of Vichitravirya. On the other hand, he always treated him in a highly agreeable way.

18—19. Whatever acts grave or light, were directed by king Dhritarashtra or the helpless Gandhari to be done, were all done with respect, O monarch, by that destroyer of hostile heroes, viz, the Pandava king.

20 The old king became highly pleased with such conduct of Yudhishthira. Indeed, he was grieved at the remembrance of his own wicked son.

21 Rising every day at early dawn, he purified himself and went through his recitations, and then blessed the Pandavas by wishing them victory in battle

22 Making the usual gifts to the Brahmanas and making them utter benedictions, and pouring libations on the sacred fire, the old king prayed for long life to the Pandavas

23 Indeed, the king had never derived that great happiness from his own sons which he always did from the sons of Pandu.

24 King Yudhishthira at that time became as agreeable to the Brahmanas as to the Kshatriyas, and the various bands of Vaishyas and Shudras of his kingdom

25 King Yudhishthira forgot whatever wrongs were done to him by the sons of Dhritarashtra, and saluted his uncle.

26—27 If any man did anything that was not liked by the son of Ambika, he became thereby an object of hatred to the intelligent son of Kunti Indeed through fear of Yudhishthira nobody could talk of the evil deeds of either Duryodhana or Dhritarashtra.

28. Both Gandhari and Vidura also were well pleased with the power which the king having no enemies showed for beating wrongs. They were, however not so pleased O destroyer of foes, with Bhima

29 Dharma's son Yudhishthira, was truly obedient to his uncle Bhima, however on seeing Dhritarashtra, became very dispirited.

30. That destroyer of enemies, seeing Dharma's son pay his respects to the old king, saluted him outwardly with a very reluctant heart."

CHAPTER III.

(ASHRAMAVASAIKA PARVA.)—Continued.

Vaishampayana said,—

1 The people who lived in the Kuru kingdom, could not mark any difference in the cordiality which existed between king Yudhishthira and the father of Duryodhana.

2 When the Kuru king recollected his wicked son, he then could not but feel unfriendly, in his heart, towards Bhima.

3. Bhimasena also O king, moved by a wicked heart, was unable to put up with king Dhritarashtra.

4. Vrikodara secretly did many deeds that were disagreeable to the old king. Through deceitful servants he caused the commands of his uncle to be disobeyed.

5—7. Recollecting the evil advice of the old king and some deeds of his, Bhima, one day, in the midst of his friends slapped his armpits, in the hearing of Dhritarashtra and of Gandhari The angry Vrikodara, recollecting his enemies Duryodhana and Karna and Dussasana, gave way to a fit of passion, and said these harsh words — 'The sons of the blind king, capable of fighting with various kinds of weapons, have all been despatched by me to the other world with these arms of mine which resemble pair of iron clubs.

8 Indeed these are those two arms of mine, looking like maces of iron, and invincible by enemies, coming within whose clasp the sons of Dhritarashtra have all been killed.

9 These are those two well-developed and round arms of mine resembling a pair of elephantine trunks Coming within their clasp, the foolish sons of Dhritarashtra have all been killed.

10 'Smeared with sandal-paste and deserving of that adornment are those two arms of mine by which Duryodhana has been sent to the other world along with all his sons and kinsmen'

11 Hearing these and many other words, O king, of Vrikodara, which were so many darts, king Dhritarashtra gave way to cheerlessness and sorrow.

12 Queen Gandhari, however, who was conversant with every duty and endued with great intelligence, and who knew what Time brings on its course, considered them as untrue.

13 Then, after fifteen years had passed away, O monarch, king Dhritarashtra, afflicted (constantly) by the wordy arrows of Bhima, became stricken with despair and sorrow

14 King Yudhishthira the son of Kunti, however knew it not, nor Arjuna of white horses, nor Kunti, nor Draupadi possessed of great fame, nor the two sons of Madri, knowing every duty and who were always engaged in acting after the wishes of Dhritarashtra.

15 Employed in doing the behests of the king, the twins never said anything that was disagreeable to the old king. Then Dhritarashtra one day honoured his friends by his confidence Addressing them with tearful eyes, he said these words.

Dhritarashtra said —

16 You know how the destruction of Kurus has happened All that was brought about by my fault, though the Kauravas approved of all my counsels.

17. Fool that I was, I installed the wicked minded Duryodhana, that enhancer of the terrors of kinsmen, to rule over the Kurus

18—20 Vasudeva had said to me —'Let this sinful wretch of wicked understanding be slain along with all his friends and counsellers'—I did not listen to those words of great significance All wise men gave me the same beneficial advice Vidura, Bhishma, Drona, and Kripa said the same thing. The holy and great Vyasa repeatedly said the same, as also Sanjaya and Gandhari Overwhelmed, however, by filial affection, I could not follow that advice. Bitter repentance is now my lot for my neglect

21 I also repent for not having bestowed that blazing prosperity, derived from sires and grandsires on the great Pandavas possessed of every accomplishment

22 The eldest brother of Gada foresaw the destruction of all the kings Janarddana, however, considered that destruction as highly beneficial.'

23 So many battalions of troops belonging to me, have been destroyed! Alas my heart is pierced with thousands of darts on account of all these results.

24 Of wicked understanding as I am, now after the lapse of fifteen years, I am trying to expiate my sins

25 Now at the fourth division of the day or sometimes at the eighth division, with the regularity of a vow, I eat a little food for simply satisfying my thirst. Gandhari knows this

26 All my attendants believe that I eat as usual Through fear of Yudhishthira alone I concealed my deeds, for if the eldest son of Pandu came to know of my vow, he he would feel great pain.

27 Clad in deer-skin I lie down on the Earth, spreading a small quantity of Kusha grass and pass the time in silent recitations The illustrious Gandhari also, passes her time in the observance of similar vows

28 Thus do we both act, we who have lost a hundred sons none of whom ever retreated from battle. I do not, however, grieve for those children of mine. They have all died while performing Kshatriya duties.

29 Having said these words, the old king then addressed Yudhishthira in particular and said,—'Blessed be you, O son of the princess of Yadu's race! Listen now to what I say.

30 Cherished by you, O son, I have lived these years very happily. I have (with your help) made large gifts and performed Shraddhas repeatedly.

31. I have O son, to the best of my power, acquired merit largely. This Gandhari though destitute of sons, has lived with great fortitude, looking all the while at me.

32 They who inflicted great wrongs on Draupadi and robbed you of your affluence —those cruel men—have all left the world, killed in battle according to the practice of their order.

33 I have nothing to do for them, O delighter of the Kurus! Killed with their faces towards battle, they have attained to those regions which are reserved for the wielders of weapons.

34 I should now, do what is beneficial and meritorious for me as also for Gandhari. O great king, you should grant me permission'

35. You are the foremost of all righteous persons You are always devoted to virtue. The king is the preceptor of all creatures. It is for this that I say so.

36 With your permission, O hero, I shall retire into the forest, clad in rags and barks, O king, along with this Gandhari

37—38 I shall live in the forest, always blessing you It is proper, O son, for the members of our family, to make over sovereignty, when old age comes to children and lead the forest mode of life. Living there on air alone, or abstaining from all food, I shall with this wife of mine, O hero, practise severe austerities.

39 You shall be a sharer of those penances, O son for you are the king. Kings are sharers of both auspicious and inauspicious acts done in their kingdom.

Yudhishthira said —

40. When you, O king, are thus subject to grief, sovereignty does not please me at all. Fie on me who am of wicked understanding, devoted to the pleasures of rule, and absolutely negligent of my true concerns.

41 Alas I, with all my brothers, was ignorant of yourself having so long been stricken with grief, emaciated with fasts, abstaining from food, and lying on the naked earth.

42 Alas, foolish that I am, I have been deceived by you who have great intelligence, inasmuch as, having filled me with confidence at first you have latterly undergone such grief.

43 What need have I of kingdom or of articles of enjoyment, what need of sacrifices or of happiness, when you, O king, have undergone so much affliction.

44 I consider my kingdom as a disease, and myself also as afflicted. Plunged though I am in sorrow, what, however, is the use of these words that I am addressing you?

45 You are our father, you are our mother, you are our foremost of superiors Deprived of your presence, how shall we live.

46 O best of kings, let Yuyutsu, the son of your loins, be made king, or indeed, anybody else whom you may wish.

47 I shall go into the forest. Do you rule the kingdom. You should not burn me who am already burned by infamy.

48 I am not the king. You are the king I am dependent on your will. How can I dare grant permission to you who are my preceptor?

49 O sinless one, I cherish no resentment in my heart on account of the wrongs done to us by Suyodhana It was ordained that it should be so Both ourselves and others were stupefied (by fate)

50 We are your children as Duryodhana and others were My conviction is that Gandhari is as much my mother as Kunti.

51 If you, O king of kings, go to the forest leaving me, I shall then follow you. I swear by my soul

52. This Earth, with her belt of seas, so full of riches, will not be a source of joy to me when I am deprived of your presence

53 All this belongs to you. Bending my head low I make my obeisance. We are all dependent on you, O king of kings. Let the fever of your heart be removed 54 I think, O king, that all this that has come upon you is due to destiny. By good luck, I had thought, that waiting upon you and executing your commands obediently, I would rescue you from the fever of your heart.

Dhritarashtra said :—

55 O delighter of the Kurus, my mind is fixed, O son, on penances. O powerful one, it is proper for our family that I should retire into the forest.

56 I have lived long under your protection, O son. I have for many years been served by you with respect. I am now old. You should, O king, grant me permission.

Vaishampayana said :—

57—58 Having said these words to king Yudhishthira the just, king Dhritarashtra, the son of Amvika, trembling all the while and with hands joined together, further said to the great Sanjaya and the great car-warrior Kripa these words — I wish to solicit the king through you

59 My mind has become dispirited, my mouth has become dry, through the weakness of age and the exertion of speaking.

60. Having said so, that perpetuator of Kuru's race, viz , the pious old king, blessed with prosperity, leaned to Gandhari and suddenly looked like one dead.

61. Seeing him thus seated like one shorn of consciousness, that destroyer of hostile heroes, viz , the royal son of Kunti, became penetrated by a piercing grief.

Yudhishthira said —

62 Alas, he whose strength was equal to that of a hundred thousand elephants, alas, that king sits to-day, leaning on a woman.

63 Alas, he by whom the iron image of Bhima on a former occasion was reduced to pieces, leans to-day on a weak woman.

64 Fie on me who am exceedingly unrighteous. Fie on my understanding Fie on my knowledge of the scriptures Fie on me for whom this king lies to-day in a manner that is not worthy of him.

65 I also shall fast even as my preceptor. Indeed I shall fast if this king and Gandhari of great fame abstain from food.

Vaishampayana said :—

66. The Pandava king, knowing every duty, using his own hand, then softly rubbed with cold water the breast and the face of the old king,

67. At the touch of the king's hand which was auspicious and fragrant, and on which, were jewels and medicinal herbs, Dhritarashtra regained his consciousness.

Dhritarashtra said —

68. Do you, again, touch me, O son of Pandu, with your hand, and do you embrace me. O you having eyes like lotus petals, I am restored to my senses through the auspicious touch of your hand.

69. O king, I wish to smell your head. The clasp of your arms is highly gratifying to me.

70. This is the eighth division of the day and therefore, the hour for taking my food. For just having taken my food, O scion of Kuru's race, I am so weak that I cannot move.

71. Great has been my exertion while soliciting you. Rendered cheerless by it, O son, I had fainted.

72. O perpetuator of Kuru's race, I think that receiving the touch of your hand, which is like nectar in its vivifying effects I have been restored to my senses.

Vaishampayana said:—

73. Thus addressed, O Bharata, by the eldest brother of his father, the son of Kunti, from affection, gently touched every part of his body.

74. Regaining his life, king Dhritarashtra embraced the son of Pandu with his arms and smelled his head.

75. Vidura and others wept aloud in great sorrow. On account, however of the poignancy of their sorrow, they said nothing to either the old king or the son of Pandu.

76. Gandhari, knowing every duty, bore her sorrow with patience, and loaded as her heart was, O king, said nothing.

77. The other ladies, Kunti among them became greatly afflicted. They wept, shedding profuse tears, and sat surrounding the old king.

78. Then Dhritarashtra once more addressing Yudhishthira, said these words:— 'Do you, O king, permit me to practise penances.

79. By speaking repeatedly, O son, my mind becomes weakened. You should not, O son, afflict me after this.

80. When that foremost one of Kuru's race was saying so to Yudhishthira a loud sound of wailing arose from all the warriors there present.

81—82. Seeing his royal father of great splendour, emaciated and pale, reduced to a state unworthy of him, worn out with fasts, and looking like a skeleton covered with skin, Dharma's son Yudhishthira shed tears of grief and once more said these words:

83. 'O foremost of men, I do not wish for life and the Earth! O scorcher of enemies, I shall engage myself in doing what is pleasant to you.

84. If I deserve your favour, if I am dear to you, do you eat something. I shall then know what to do.'

85. Gifted with great energy, Dhritarashtra then said to Yudhishthira:—'I wish, O son, to take some food, with your permission.'

86. When Dhritarashtra said these words to Yudhisthira, Satyavati's son Vyasa came there and said as follows.

CHAPTER IV.

(ASHRAMVASIKA PARVA.)—Continued.

Vyasa said —

1. O mighty armed Yudhishthira, do unhesitatingly what Dhritarashtra of Kuru's family has said.

2. This king is old. He has, again, been made sonless. I think he will not be able to bear his grief long.

3. The highly blessed Gandhari, endued with great wisdom and kindly speech, bears with fortitude her excessive grief owing to the loss of her sons.

4. I also tell you (what the old king says.) Do you obey my words. Let the old king have your permission. Let him not die an inglorious death at home.

5. Let this king follow the path of royal sages of old. Indeed, all royal sages, retire into the woods at last.

Vaishampayana said:—

6—7. Thus addressed at that time by Vyasa of wonderful deeds, king Yudhishthira the just, gifted with mighty energy, said to the great ascetic these words,—'Your holy self is held by us in great reverence. You alone are our preceptor. You alone are the refuge of this our kingdom as also of our family.

8. I am your son. You O holy one, are my father! You are our king, and you are our preceptor! The son should, as dictated by every duty, obey the commands of his father.

Vaishampayana said:—

9—10 Thus addressed by the king, Vyasa, that foremost of all persons knowing the Vedas, that foremost of poets gifted with great energy, once more said to Yudhishthira these words,—' It is so, O mighty armed one! It is as you say, O Bharata! This king has reached old age He is now in the last stage of life.

11. Permitted both by me and you, let this king do what he wishes. Do not stand as an obstacle in his way.

12. This is the highest duty, O Yudhishthira, of royal sages They should die either in battle or in the forest according to the scriptures.

13 Your royal father, Pandu O king of kings, respected this old king as a disciple reveres his preceptor.

14. (At that time) he worshipped the celestials in many great sacrifices with profuse gifts consisting of hills of wealth and jewels, and ruled the Earth and protected his subjects wisely and well

15 Having obtained a good number of children and a prosperous kingdom, he enjoyed great riches for thirteen years while you were in exile, and gave away much wealth

16 Yourself also, O king, with your servants, O sinless one, have worshipped this king and the famous Gandhari with that ready obedience which a disciple pays to his preceptor.

17. Do you grant permission to your father. The time has come for him to attend to the practice of penances He does not cherish, O Yudhishthira even the slightest anger against any of you'

Vaishampayana said:—

18. Having said these words, Vyasa soothed the old king Yudhishthira, then, answered him saying — So be it' The great ascetic then left the palace for, proceeding to the forest

19—21. After the holy Vyasa had departed, the royal son of Pandu softly said these words to his old father, bending himself in humility — What the holy Vyasa has said, what is your own purpose, what the great bowmen Kripa has said what Vidura has said, and what has been asked for by Yuyutsu and Sanjaya I shall quickly do All these deserve my respect, for all of them are well wishers of our family

22 'This, however, O king, I beg of you by bending my head Do you first eat and afterwards go to your forest retreat.'

CHAPTER V.

(ASHRAMVASIKA PARVA)—Continued.

Vaishampayana said:—

1. Having received the king's permission the highly energetic king Dhritarashtra, then went to his own palace, followed by Gandhari

2 With weakened strength and slow motion that highly intelligent king walked with difficulty, like the leader, exhausted with age, of an elephantine herd.

3 He was followed by the highly learned Vidura and his charioteer Sanjaya as also that powerful bowman Kripa the son of Sharadwata

4 Entering his palace, O king, he performed the morning rites and, after pleasing many foremost of Brahmanas, he took some food.

5. Gandhari knowing every duty, as also the highly intelligent Kunti adored with offers of various articles by their daughters in law, then took some food, O Bharata.

6 After Dhritarashtra had eaten, and Vidura also and others had done the same, the Pandavas, having finished their meals, approached and sat around the old king.

7—8 Then the son of Ambika, O monarch addressing Kunti's son who was seated near him, and touching his back with his hand, said — You should always, O delighter of the Kurus, act vigilantly about everything connected with your kingdom consisting of eight limbs, O foremost of kings and in which the claims of virtue should ever be kept foremost

9 You are O son of Kunti endued with intelligence and learning Listen to me O king I tell you what the means are by which, O son of Pandu the kingdom is capaple of being gloriously protected.

10 You should always O Yudhishthira, honour those persons who are old in learning You should listen to what they would say, and act accordingly without any scruple.

11. Rising early in the morning, O king, adore them with due rites, and when the time comes for action you should consult them about your (intended) acts

12 When, led by the desire of knowing what would be beneficial to you about your measures, you honour them, they will, O son, always declare what is for your behoof, O Bharata!

13 You should always keep your senses as you keep your horses, They will then prove beneficial to you, like riches that is not wasted.

14. You should employ only those ministers who have passed the tests of honesty, who are hereditary officers of state, possessed of pure conduct, self controlled, expert in the discharge of business, and endued with righteous conduct.

15. You should always gather information through spies in various disguises, whose faithfulness have been tested, who are natives of your kingdom, and who should not be known to your enemies.

16. Your citadel should be properly protected with strong walls and arched gates On every side such walls, with watch-towers on them standing close to one another, should be made as will admit six persons walking side by side on their top.

17. The gates should all be large and sufficiently strong. Kept in proper places, those gates should be carefully guarded.

18—19 Let your purposes be accomplished through men whose families and conduct are well-known. You should always protect your body also with care in matters connected with your food, O Bharata, as also in the hours of sport and eating and in matters connected with the garlands you wear and the beds you lie upon. The ladies of your household should be properly protected, looked over by aged and trusted servitors, of good conduct, well born, and possessed of learning, O Yudhishthira.

20. You should make ministers of Brahmanas possessed of learning, endued with humility, well-born, knowing religion and profit, and adorned with simplicity of behaviour.

21. You should hold consultations with them. You should not, however, admit many persons into your consultations On particular occasions you may consult with the whole of your council or with a portion of it.

22. Entering a chamber or spot that is well-protected (from intruders) you should hold your consultations You may hold your consultation in a forest that is divested of grass. You should never consult at night time.

23 Apes and birds and other animals which can imitate human beings should all be excluded from the council chamber, as also idiots and lame and palsied individuals.

24. I think that the evils which originate from the divulgence of the counsels of kings are such that they cannot be remedied.

25. You should repeatedly refer, in the midst of your counsellors to the evils which arise from the divulgence of counsels, O chastiser of enemies, and to the merits which flow from counsels properly kept.

26 You should, O Yudhishthira, act in such a manner as to determine the merits and faults of the inhabitants of your city and the provinces.

27. Let your laws, O king, be always administered by trusted judges placed in charge thereof, who should also be contented and of good conduct. Their acts should also be ascertained by you through spies.

28. Let your judicial officers, O Yudhishthira, mete out punishments, according to the law, on offenders after careful determining the gravity of the offences.

29—30 They who take bribes, they who are the violaters of the chastity of other people's wives, they who inflict heavy punishments, they who are liars, they who are revilers, they who are stained by cupidity, they who are murderers, they who are doers of rash deeds, they who are disturbers of assemblies and the sports of others, and they who bring about a confusion of castes, should, according to considerations of time and place, be punished with either fines or death.

31. In the morning you should see those who are employed in making your disbursements. After that you should look to your toilet and then to your food.

32. You should next supervise your arms, pleasing them on every occasion. You should devote your evenings to envoys and spies.

33 The latter end of the night should be devoted by you to settle what acts should be done by you in the day. Midnights and middays should be devoted to amusements and sports. At all times, however, you should think of the means for the execution your projects.

34 At the proper time, adorning your body, you should sit prepared to make gifts in profusion The turns for different deeds, O son, ceaselessly revolve like wheels.

35 You should do your best to fill your treasuries of various kinds by fair means. You should avoid all unlawful means for that purpose.

36. Learning through your spies who your enemies are, who are bent on finding out your shortcomings, you should, through trusted agents, cause them to be destroyed from a distance.

37. Examining their conduct, you should, O perpetuater of Kuru's race, appoint your servants. You should cause all your deeds to be accomplished through your servitors whether they are appointed for those acts or not.

38 The commandant of your army should be of firm conduct, courageous, capable of bearing hardships, loyal, and devoted to your well-being.

39 Artizans and mechanics, O son of Pandu, living in your provinces, should always do your acts like kine and asses.

40 You should always, O Yudhishthira, be careful to ascertain your own shortcomings as also those of your enemies The shortcomings also of your own men as also of the men of your enemies should equally be known.

41. Those men of your kingdom, who are well-skilled in their respective callings, and are devoted to your good, should be patronized by you with adequate means of support.

42 A wise king, O chief of men, should always see that the accomplishments of his subjects might be kept up They would then be firmly devoted to you, seeing that they did not fall away from their skill.

CHAPTER VI.

Dhritarashtra said :—

1. You should always ascertain the Mandalas which belong to you, to your enemies, to neutrals, and to those who are disposed equally towards you and your enemies, O Bharata.

2 The Mandalas also of the four kinds of enemies, of those called Atatayins and of allies, and the allies of enemies, should be distinguished by you, O crusher of enemies.

3. You should see that the ministers of state, the people of the provinces, the garrisons of forts, and the forces O foremost one of Kuru's race, are not tampered with.

4. The twelve (enumerated above), O son of Kunti, form the principal concerns of kings. These twelve, as also the sixth having Ministers for their foremost, should be looked after by the king.

5 Politicians call these by the name of Mandala. Understand, O Yudhishthira, that the six incidents (of peace, war, march, halt, sowing dissensions, and conciliation) depend upon these.

6 Growth and diminution should also be understood, as also the condition of being stationary. The attributes of the sixfold incidents, O you of mighty arms, as resting on the seventytwo (already enumerated), should also be carefully understood.

7 When one's own side has become strong and the side of the enemy has become weak, it is then, O son of Kunti, that the king should fight against the enemy and try to acquire victory.

8. When the enemy is strong and one's own side is weak, then the weak king if he has intelligence, should try to make peace with the enemy.

9 The king should collect a large quantity of articles (for his commissariat). When able to march out, he should on no account make a delay, O Bharata.

10. Besides, he should on that occasion set his men to work for which they are fit, without being moved by any other consideration. He should, (when obliged to part with a portion of his territories), give his enemy such land as are not productive of a plentiful harvest.

11. (When obliged to pay coins), he should give gold containing much base metal. (When obliged to surrender a portion of his army), he should give such men as are not noted for strength. One who is skilled in treaties should, when taking land or gold or men from the enemy, take what is possessed of attributes the reverse of this.

12—13 In making treaties of peace, the son of the king should be demanded as a hostage, O chief of the Bharatas A contrary course of conduct would not be wholesome, O son. If a calamity come over the king, he should, with knowledge of means and counsels, try to liberate himself from it. The king, O foremost of kings, should maintain the cheerless and the destitute among his people.

14 Himself protecting his own kingdom the king, endued with great might, should direct all his efforts, either successively or simultaneously, against his enemies He should afflict and obstruct them and seek to drain their treasury.

15 The king who desires his own advancement, should never injure his subordinate chiefs who are under his sway O son of Kunti, you should never try your strength with that king who is desirous of conquering the whole Earth.

16—17. You should try to steal a march by producing, with the help your ministers, dissensions among his aristocracy and feudatory chiefs. A powerful king should never seek to root out weak kings, for these do good to the world by cherishing the good and punishing the wicked. O foremost of kings you should live, conducting yourself like a cane

18 If a strong king advances against a weak one, the latter should make him desist, by adopting conciliatory and other modes

19 If these measures fail, he should, then, with the help of those who are interested in his welfare fall upon the enemy for fighting him out. Indeed, with his ministers, treasury and citizens, he should thus adopt force against the invader.

20 If the issue of the battle turns against him, he should then, fall, sacrificing all his resources one after another.

20. Renouncing his life in this way, he will acquire freedom from all sorrow.

CHAPTER VII.

Dhritarashtra said:—

1. O best of kings you should, also, reflect properly on war and peace Each is of two kinds The means are various, and the circumstances also, under which war or peace may be made, are various, O Yudhishthira.

2. O you of Kuru's race, you should with coolness, reflect on the two (viz, thy strength and weakness) with regard to yourself. You should not suddenly march against an enemy who has contented and healthy soldiers, and who is gifted with intelligence On the other hand, you should think carefully of the means of defeating him.

3 You should march against an enemy who is not provided with contented and healthy combatants When everything is favourable the enemy may be beaten After that, however, the victor should retire.

4 He should next cause the enemy to be plunged into various calamities, and sow dissensions among his allies He should afflict the enemy and inspire terror in his heart, and, attacking him, weaken his forces.

5 The king, conversant with the scriptures, who marches against an enemy, should think of the three kinds of strength, and indeed, reflect on his own strength and the strength of his enemy

6 Only that king, O Bharata, who is gifted with alacrity, discipline and strength of counsels should march against an enemy. When his position is otherwise, he should avoid offensive works.

7 The king should provide himself with power of wealth, power of allies, power of foresters power of paid soldiery, and power of the mechanical and trading classes, O powerful one.

8 Among all these, power of allies and power of riches are superior to the rest. The power of classes and that of the standing army are equal.

9 The power of spies is considered by the king as equal in efficacy to either of the above, on many occasions, when the time comes for applying each.

10 Calamity, O king, with which rulers are overtaken, is of many forms Listen O you of Kuru's race, as to what those various forms are

11. Indeed, calamities, O son of Pandu, are many You should, always count them, distinguishing their forms, O king, and try to meet them by applying the well-known ways of conciliation and the rest

12 The king should, when possessed of a good army, march (out against a foe), O scorcher of enemies He should, also, mark the considerations of time and place, while preparing to march, as also the forces he has collected and his own merits.

13 That king who seeks his own growth and advancement should not march unless he has cheerful and healthy warriors. When strong, O son of Pandu, he may march in even an unfavourable season.

14 The king should make a river having quivers for its stones, horses and cars for its current, and standards for the trees which cover its banks, and which is miry with foot-soldiers and elephants. Such a river should the king apply for the destruction of his enemy.

15 According to the science known to Ushanas arrays called Shakata, Padma, and Vajra, should be formed, O Bharata, for fighting the enemy.

16 Knowing every thing about the enemy's strength through spies and examining his own strength himself, the king should begin war either within his own territories or within those of his enemy.

17 The king should, always, ple se, his army, and hurl all his strongest warriors (against the enemy). First determing the state of his kingdom, he should apply conciliation or the other well-known means.

18 By all means, O king, should the body be protected One should do what is highly beneficial for one both in this world and in the next.

19. The king, O monarch, by acting properly according to these ways attains to Heaven hereafter, after ruling his subjects pio isly in this world.

20. O foremost one of Kuru's race, it is thus that you should always seek the well-being of your subjects for attaining to both the worlds.

21. You have been instructed in all duties by Bi ishma, by Krishna, and by Vi lura, I should, also, O best of kings, from the affection I bear you, give you these instructions.

22. O giver of profuse presents in sacrifices, you should duly d) all this. You shall, by acting thus become dear to your s ibjects and acquire happiness in the celestial region.

23 That king who worships the celestials in a hundred horse-sacrifices, and he who rules his subjects piously, acquire merit that is equal.

CHAPTER VIII.

(ASHRAMAVASIKA PARVA.)—

Continued.

Yudhishthira said :—

1 O king, I shall do as you order me O foremost of kings, I should be further instructed by you.

2 Bhishma has ascended to Heaven. The destroyer of Madhu, has departed (for Dwaraka). Vidura and Sanjaya, also (will accompany you to the forest) Who else, therefore, save you, will teach me.

3. I shall, certainly, follow those instructions which you have to-day given, desirous of do ng good to me. O lord of Earth. Be you assured of this, O king.

Vaishampayana said :—

4 Thus ad lressed by the highly intelligent and j ist king Yudhishthira, the royal Sage, Dhritarashtra, O chief of the Bharatas, wished to obtain the king's permission.

5 And he sai l,—'Cease, O son. I have been tired greatly' Having said these words, the old king entered the apartments of Gandhari

6—7. Pious Gandhari knowing the opportune moments, said these timely words to that husband of hers who resemb ed a second Lord of all creatures, while resting on a seat —'You have got the permission of that great Rishi, viz, Vyasa himself. When, however, will you go to the forest, with the permission of Yudhishthira?

Dhritarashtra said :—

8 O Gandhari, I have received the permission of my great sire. With the permission of Yudhishthira (next obtained) I shall soon retire into the forest.

9 I wish however, to give away some riches capable of following the status of Preta, for all those sons of mine who were addicted to calamitous dice Indeed, I wish to make those gifts,, inviting all the people to my palace to Having said so (to Gandhari, Dhritarashtra sent for Yudhishthira. The latter, ordered by his uncle, brought all the articles necessary.

11. Many Brahmanas living in Kurujangala, many Kshatriyas many Vaishyas, and many Shudras also, came to Dhritarashtra's palace, with gratified hearts.

12 The old king, coming out of the inner apartments, saw them all as also his subjects collected together.

13—15 Seeing all those assembled and citizens and inhabitants of the provinces and his well wishers also thus collected together, and the large number of Brahmanas arrived from various kingdoms king Dhritarashtra of great intell gence, O monarch sai l these words —'Ye all 'and the Kurus have lived together for many lo ig years, well-wishers of each other, and each doing good to the other.

16 What I shall now say in view of the opportunity that has come should be do e by you a l even as disciples accomplish the orders of their preceptors.

17 I have set my heart upon ret ring into the forest, along with Gandhari as my companion Vyasa has approved of this, also the son of Kunti.

18—19 Let me have your permission too Do not hesitate in this That good will, which has always existed between you and us, is not to be seen I believe, in other kingdoms between the rulers and the ruled.

I am worn out with age on my head. I am destitute of children.

20. Ye sinless ones, I am emaciated with fasts, along with Gandhari The kingdom having passed to Yudhishthira, I have enjoyed great happiness.

21. Ye foremost of men, I think that happiness has been greater than what I could expect from Duryodhana's sovereingty What other refuge can I have, old as I am and destitute of children, except the forest? Ye highly blessed ones, you should grant me the permission I seek.

22. Hearing these words of his, all the residents of Kurujangala bewailed aloud, O best of the Bharatas, with voices choked by tears.

23. Desirous of telling those grief-stricken people something more, the highly energetic Dhritarashtra once more addressed them and said as follows.

CHAPTER IX.

Dhritarashtra said:—

1. Shantanu duly ruled this Earth Likewise, Vichitravirya also, protected by Bhishma, ruled you. Forsooth, you know all this

2 You know also how Pandu, my brother, was dear to me as also to you He also ruled you duly.

3. Ye sinless ones I have also served you Whether those services have come up to the ideal or fallen short of it, you should forgive me, for I have attended to my duties carefully.

4. Duryodhana also enjoyed his kingdom without a thorn in his side. Foolish as he was and possessed of wicked understanding, he did not, however, do any wrong to you.

5 Through the fault, however, of that prince of wicked understanding, and through his pride, as also through my own impolicy, a great destruction of the Kshatriyas has taken place.

6 Whether I have, in that matter acted rightly or wrongly, I pray you with joined hands to remove all recollections of it from your hearts

7 This one is old, this one has lost all his children, this one is stricken with sorrow, this one was our king; this one is a descendant of former kings;—considerations like these should induce you to forgive me

8 This Gandhari, also, is dispirited and old She, too, has lost her children and is helpless Stricken with grief for the loss of her sons, she solicits you with me.

9 Knowing that both of us are old and afflicted and destitute of children, grant us the permission we seek. Blessed be you, we seek your protection.

10. This Kuru king, Yudhishthira the son of Kunti, should be looked after by you, all, in weal and woe.

11. He who has, four such brothers of abunant prowess for his counsellors will never fall into distress All of them are conversant with both Virtue and Profit, and resemble the very guardians of the world.

12 Like the illustrious Brahman himself, the Lord of the universe with all its creatures, this Yudhishthira of great energy will rule you.

13 That which should certainly be said is now said by me. I make over to you this Yudhishthira here as a charge. I entrust you, also, to the hands of this hero.

14 You should all forget and forgive whatever injury has been done to you by those sons of mine who are no longer alive, or, indeed, by any one else belonging to me.

15 Ye never cherished any anger against me on any previous occasion I join my hands before you who are famous for loyalty. Here, I bow to you all

16 Ye sinless one, I, with Gandhari by my side, beg your pardon now for anything done to you by those sons of mine, of restless understandings, sullied by cupidity, and ever acting as their desires prompted

17. Thus addressed by the old king all those citizens and dwellers of the provinces, filled with tears, said nothing but only looked at one another.

CHAPTER X.

Vishampayana said:—

1. Thus addressed, O you of Kuru's race, by the old king the citizens and the inhabitants of the provinces stood sometime like men shorn of consciousness.

2—3 King Dhritarashtra, finding them silent, with their throats choked by grief, once more addressed them, saying,—'Ye best of men, old as I am, and sonless and through cheerlessness of heart, bewailing along with this my wedded wife, I have obtained the permission, in the matter of my retirement into the forest, of my sire, the Island born Krishna himself, as also of king Yudhishthira, who knows every duty, ye righteous dwellers of this kingdom.

5 Ye sinless ones I, with Gandhari repeatedly solicit you with bent heads, You should all grant us permission.

Vaishampayana said:—

6 Hearing these pitiable words of the Kuru king, O monarch, the assembled dwellers of Kurujangala all began to weep

7 Covering their faces with their hands and upper garments, all those men, burning with grief, wept for a while as fathers and mothers would weep

8 Bearing in their hearts, from which every other thoughts had been removed the sorrow born of Dhritarashtra's desire to leave the world, they looked like men shorn of consciousness

9 Checking that agitation of heart due to the announcement of Dhritarashtra's desire of going to the forest they gradually were able to address one another, expressing their wishes

10. Settling their words briefly, O king, they charged a certain Brahmana therewith and thus replied to the old king.

11 That learned Brahmana, of good conduct, chosen by unanimous consent conversant with all subjects, master of all the Richs, and named Samba, tried to speak.

12 Taking the permission of the whole assembly and with its full approbation that learned Brahmana of great intelligence, conscious of his own powers, said these words to the king.

13 'O monarch, the answer of this assembly has been committed to my care I shall speak it out, O hero! Do you receive it, O king.

14 What you say, O king of kings is all true, O powerful one. There is nothing in it that is in even slightly tinctured with untruth you are our well-wisher, as, indeed, we are yours

15 Indeed, in this royal family, there never was a king who coming to rule his subjects, became unpopular with them.

16. Ye have ruled us like fathers or brothers. King Duryodhana never did us any wrong.

17. Do that, O king, which that righteous souled ascetic, the son of Satyavati, has said He is, indeed, our foremost of instructors

18 Left by you, O king, we shall have to pass our days in grief and sorrow, remembering hundreds of virtues possessed by you.

19—20 We were well protected and ruled by king Duryodhana even as we had been ruled by king Shantanu, or by Chitrangada, or by your father, O monarch who was protected by the prowess of Bhishma, or by Pandu, that ruler of Earth, who was overlooked by you in all his deeds

21. Your son, O monarch, never did us the slightest wrong We lived, depending on that king as trustfully as on our own father.

22 It is known to you how we lived (under that ruler) Similarly we have enjoyed great happiness O king, for thousands of years, under the rule of Kunti's son of great intelligence and wisdom

22—23 This righteous-souled king who celebrates sacrifices with profuse gifts, follows the conduct of the royal sages of old belonging to your race, of meritorious deeds, having Kuru and Samvara and others and the highly intelligent Bharata among them

25 There is nothing, O monarch that is even slightly censurable in the matter of this Yudhishthishta's rule Protected and ruled by you, we have all lived in great happiness.

26—27. The slightest omission cannot be laid at your doors and your sons. Regarding what you have said about Duryodhana in the matter of this destruction of kinsmen, I beg you O delighter of the Kurus, (to listen to me)'

28 The carnage that has overtaken the Kurus was not caused by Duryodhana. It was not brought about by you Nor was it brought about by Karna and Suvala's son 29 We know that it was encompassed about by Destiny and that it was incapable of being counteracted Destiny is not capable of being resisted by human exertion.

30—32 Eighteen Akshauhinis of soldiers, O monarch, were collected In eighteen days that army was destroyed by the foremost of Kuru warriors, viz, Bhishma and Drona and others, and the great Karna, and the heroic Yuyudhana and Dhritadyumna, and by the four sons of Pandu, that is, Bhima and Arjuna and the twins. This destruction, O king, could not happen without the influence of Destiny

33 Forsooth, by Kshatriyas in particular, should enemies be killed and death encountered in battle. By those foremost of men, gifted with science and might of arms, the Earth has been exterminated with her horses and cars and elephants.

35 Your son was not the cause of that destruction of great kings You were not the cause, nor your servants, nor Karna, nor Suvala's son

36. The destruction of those foremost ones of Kuru's race and of kings by thousands, know, was engendered by Destiny Who can say anything else in this.

37. You are regarded as the preceptor and the master of the whole world We, therefore, in your presence, absolve your righteous-souled son.

38 Let that king, with all his associates, obtain the regions reserved for heroes Permitted by foremost of Brahmanas, let him sport blissfully in the celestial region.

39 You, also, shall attain to great merit, and unswerving steadness in virtue O you of excellent vows, follow fully the duties laid down in the Vedas.

40. It is not necessary for either you or ourselves to look after the Pandavas They are capable of ruling the very Heavens, what need then be said of the Earth?

41. O you of great intelligence, in weal as in woe, the subjects of this kingdom, O foremost one of Kuru's race, will obey the Pandavas who have conduct for their ornament.

42. The son of Pandu makes those valuable gifts which are always to be made to foremost of twice-born persons in sacrifices and in obsequial rites, after the manner of all the great kings of yore.

43 The great son of Kunti is mild, and self-controlled, and is always disposed to spend as if he were a second Vaishravana. He has great ministers who attend on him.

44 He is compassionate to even his enemies Indeed, that foremost one of Bharata's race is of pure conduct. Gifted with great intelligence, he is perfectly straightforward in his dealings and rules and protects us like a father his children.

45. From association with him who is the son of Dharma, O royal sage, Bhima and Arjuna and others will never wrong us in the least.

46 They are mild, O you of Kuru's race, to them that are mild, and fierce like snakes of dreadful poison to them who are fierce. Endued with great energy, those high souled ones are always devoted to the well being of the people

47. Neither Kunti, nor your (daughter-in law) Panchali, nor Ulupi, nor the princess of the Sattwata race, will do the least wrong to these people.

48. The affection which you have shown towards us and which in Yudhishthira is seen to exist in a still larger measure, is incapable of being forgotten by the people of the city and the provinces.

49 Those powerful car-warriors, viz, the sons of Kunti, themselves devoted to the duties of virtue, will protect and cherish the people even if these happen to be unrighteous.

50. Do you, therefore, O king, removing all anxiety of heart on account of Yudhishthira, set yourself to the accomplishment of all meritorious deeds, O foremost of men.

Vaishampayana said:—

51. Hearing these words, fraught with virtue and merit, of that Brahmana and approving of them every person in that assembly said,—'Excellent, Excellent' and accepted them as his own.

52. Dhritarashtra, also, repeatedly speaking highly of those words, slowly dismissed that assembly of his subjects.

53 Thus honoured by them and looked upon with auspicious looks, the old king, O chief of Bharata's race, joined his hands and honoured them all in return.

54. He, then, entered his own palace with Gandhari Listen now to what he did after that night had passed away.

CHAPTER XI.

(ASHRAMAVASIKA PARVA.)—Continued.

Vaishampayana said:—

1. After that night had passed away, Dhritarashtra, the son of Ambika, sent Vidura to Yudhishthira's palace.

2—3. Gifted with great energy and the foremost of all persons endued with intelligence, Vidura, having arrived at Yudhishthira's palace, addressed that foremost of men, that king of undecaying glory, in these words:—'King Dhritarashtra has performed the preliminary rites for accomplishing his purpose of retiring into the forest. He will start for the woods, O king, on the coming day of full moon of the month of Kartika.

4—5 He now solicits from you, O foremost of Kuru's race, some money. He wishes to perform the Shraddha of the great son of Ganga, as also of Drona and Somadatta and Valhika of great intelligence and of all his sons as also of all other wishers of his who have been killed and, if you permit it, of that wicked king of the Sindhus.

6 Hearing these words of Vidura, both Yudhishthira, and Pandu's son Arjuna of curly hair, became very glad and applauded them highly.

7—9 Bhima, however, of great energy and an unappeasable anger, did not accept those words of Vidura in good spirits recollecting the acts of Duryodhana. Understanding the thoughts of Bhimasena, the diadem decked Phalguna, slightly bending his face downwards, addressed that foremost of men in these words:— 'O Bhima, our royal father who is old, has resolved to retire into the forest.

10 He wishes to make gifts for advancing the happiness of his killed kinsmen and well wishers now in the other world. O you of Kuru's race, he wishes to give away wealth that belongs to you by conquest.

11—13 Indeed, O mighty-armed one, it is for Bhishma and others that the old king is desirous of making those gifts. You should grant your permission. By good luck it is, O you of mighty arms, that Dhritarashtra to-day begs wealth of us he who was formerly begged by us. Mark the reverses brought about by time. That king who was before the lord and protector of the whole Earth, now wishes to go into the forest, his kinsmen and associates all killed by enemies. O king, let not your views deviate from granting the permission asked.

14 O mighty-armed one, refusal, besides bringing infamy, will yield demerit. Do you learn your duty in this matter from the king, your eldest brother, who is lord of all.

15 You should give instead of refusing, O chief of Bharata's race!' Vibhatsu who was saying so was applauded by king Yudhishthira the just.

16—18. Yielding to anger Bhimasena said these words:—'O Phalguna, it is we that shall make gifts in the matter of Bhishma's obsequies, as also of king Somadatta and of Bhurishravas, of the royal sage Valhika, and of the great Drona, and of all others. Our mother Kunti shall make such obsequial offerings for Karna. O foremost of men, let not Dhritarashtra perform those Shraddhas.

19 This is what I think. Let not our enemies be gladdened. Let Duryodhana and others sink from a miserable to a more miserable position.

20—21. Alas, it was those wretches of their family who caused the whole Earth to be exterminated. How have you been able to forget that anxiety of twelve long years and our living in deep forest in cognito that was so painful to Draupadi? Where was Dhritarashtra's affection for us then?

22 Clad in a black deer-skin and divested of all your ornaments, with the Princess of Panchala in your company, did you not follow this king?

23 Where were Bhishma and Drona then, and where was Somadatta? You had to live for thirteen years in the forest depending on the products of the wilderness.

24—25 Your eldest father did not then look at you with eyes of parental affection. Have you forgotten, O Partha, that it was this wretch of our family, of wicked understanding, who enquired of Vidura, when the match at dice was going on — What has been won?' Hearing thus far, king Yudhishthira the son of Kunti, gifted with great intelligence, rebuked him and told him to be silent.

CHAPTER XII.

Arjuna said:—

1. O Bhima, you are my elder brother and, therefore, my senior and preceptor. I dare not say anything more than what I have already said. The royal sage Dhritarashtra deserves to be honoured by us in every way.

2 They who are good, they who are distinguished above the common level, they who break not the distinctions which characterise the good, remember not the wrongs done to them but only the benefits they have got.

3—5 Hearing these words of the great Phalguna, the righteous-souled Yudhishthira the son of Kunti, addressed Vidura and said these words — Instructed by me, O Kshattri do you say to the Kuru king that I shall give him as much wealth from my treasury as he wishes to give away for the obsequies of his sons, and of Bhishma and others among his well wishers and benefactors Let not Bhima be dispirited at this.

Vaishampayana said:—

6 Having said these words, king Yudhishthira the just highly applauded Arjuna Meanwhile Bhimasena began to cast angry looks at Dhananjaya.

7. Then Yudhishthira, gifted with great intelligence, once more addressed Vidura and said,—King Dhritarashtra should not be angry with Bhimasena.

8 His Bhima of great intelligence was greatly afflicted by cold and rain and heat and by a thousand other griefs while living in the forest All this you know.

9 Do you, however, instructed by me, say to the king, O foremost one of Bharata's family, that he may take from my house whatever articles he wishes and in whatever measure also he likes.

10 You shall also tell the king that he should not suffer his heart to remember this show of pride in which Bhima, deeply afflicted, has indulged

11. Whatever wealth I have and whatever Arjuna has in his house, the owner thereof is king Dhritarashtra. Thus you should tell him.

12. Let the king make gifts to Brahmanas! Let him spend as largely as he likes Let him liberate himself from the debt he owes to His sons and well-wishers.

13 Let him be told besides,—'O monarch this very body of mine is at your disposal, and all the riches I have! Know this and let there be no doubt in this'

CHAPTER XIII.

Vaishampayana said:—

1—2. 'Thus addressed by king Yudhishthira, Vidura, that foremost of intelligent persons, returned to Dhritarashtra and said to him these words of great significance — 'I at first reported your message to king Yudhishthira. Reflecting on your words, Yudhishthira of great splendour spoke highly of them.

3 The highly energetic Vibhatsu, also, places all his palaces with all the riches therein, as also his very life-breaths, at your disposal.

4 Your son, king Yudhishthira, too, offers you, O royal sage, his kingdom and life breaths and riches and all else which belongs to him

5. Bhima, however, of mighty-arms, recollecting all his numberless sorrows has with difficulty given his consent, breathing many heavy sighs.

6 That mighty-armed hero, O monarch, was solicited by the righteous king as also by Vibhatsu, and induced to treat you cordially.

7—8. King Yudhishthira the just has prayed you not to be displeased for the improper conduct which Bhima has shown at the recollection of former hostilities — Thus is generally the conduct of Kshatriyas in battle, O king, and this Vrikodara is devoted to battle and the practices of Kshatriyas.

9—10 Both myself and Arjuna, O king, repeatedly beg you for pardoning Vrikodara Be gracious to us You are our lord O king, you can give away as you like whatever money we have You O Bharata, are the master of this kingdom and of all lives in it.

11—12. Let the foremost one of the Kuru race give away for [the] obsequial rites of his sons, all those foremost of gifts which should be given to the Brahmanas Indeed, let him make those gifts to persons of the twice-born caste, taking away from our palaces jewels, gems, and kine, and slaves both male and female, and goats and sheep Let gifts be made to also those who are poor or blind or in great distress, selecting the objects of his charity as he likes.

13 Let, O Vidura, large pavilions be made, rich with food and drink of various tastes collected in abundance Let reservoirs of water be made for enabling kine to drink, and let other meritorious works be done'

14. 'These were the words said to me by the king as also by Pritha's son Dhananjaya. You should say what should be done next.

15 After Vidura had said these words, O Janamejaya, Dhritarashtra expressed his satisfaction at them and made up his mind for making large presents on the day of full moon in the month of Kartika.

CHAPTER XIV.

(ASHRAMAVASIKA PARVA.)—Continued.

Vaishampayana said:—

1 Thus accosted by Vidura, king Dhritarashtra became highly pleased, O monarch, with the act of Yudhishthira and Jishnu.

2—6. Inviting then, after proper examination, thousands of worthy Brahmanas and superior Rishis, for the sake of Bhishma, as also of his sons and friends and causing a large quantity of food and drink to be prepared, and cars and other vehicles and clothes, and gold and jewels and gems, and slaves both male and female, and goats and sheep, and blankets and rich articles to be collected, and villages and fields, and other kinds of wealth to be kept ready, as also elephants and horses decked with ornaments, and many beautiful maidens who were the best of their sex, that foremost of kings gave them away for the behoof of the dead, naming each of them in due order as the gifts were made. Naming Drona, Bhishma, Somadatta, Valhika, and king Duryodhana, and each one of his other sons, and all his well-wishers with Jayadratha as the first, those gifts were made in due order.

7. With the approval of Yudhishthira, that Shraddha-sacrifice became marked by large gifts of wealth and profuse presents of jewels and gems and other kinds of riches.

8—9 Tellers and scribes on that occasion under the orders of Yudhishthira, ceaselessly asked the old king,—Do you command, O king what gifts should be made to these. All things are ready here!—As soon as the king spoke, they gave away what he directed.

10. A thousand was given to him that was to receive a hundred, and ten thousand was given to him that was to receive a thousand, at the command of the royal son of Kunti

11. Like the clouds refreshing the crops with their downpours, that royal cloud pleased the Brahmanas by downpours of riches.

12 After all those gifts had been distributed, the king, O you of great intelligence, then deluged the assembled guests of all the four castes with repeated surges of food and drink of various tastes.

13—14 Indeed, the Dhritarashtra-ocean, swelling high, with jewels and gems for its waters, rich with the villages and fields and other foremost of gifts making its verdant islands, heaps of various kinds of precious articles for its rich caves, elephants and horses for its alligators and whirlpools, the sound of Mridangas for its deep roars, and clothes and wealth and precious stones for its waves, deluged the Earth.

15 It was thus, O king, that that monarch made gifts for the behoof in the other world, of his sons and grandsons and departed manes as also of himself and Gandhari.

16 At last when he became tired with the work of making such profuse gifts, that great Gift-Sacrifice ended.

17. Thus did that king of Kuru's race celebrate his Gift-Sacrifice Actors and mimes continually danced and sang on the occasion and contributed to the pleasure of all the guests Food and drink of various tastes were given away in profusion.

18 Making gifts in this way for ten days, the royal son of Ambika, O chief of Bharata's race, became liberated from the debts he owed to his sons and grandsons.

CHAPTER XV.

(ASHRAMAVASIKA PARVA.)—Continued.

Vaishampayana said —

1. Having settled the hour of his departure for the forest, the royal son of Ambika, viz., Dhritarashtra, summoned those heroes, the Pandavas.

2—3 Endued with great intelligence, the old king, with Gandhari, duly accosted those princes Having caused the minor rites to be performed, by Brahmanas knowing the Vedas on that day which was the day of full moon in the month of Kartika, he caused the fire which he adored daily to be taken up Casting off his proper dress he wore deer skins and barks, and accompanied by his daughters-in law, he left his palace.

4 When the royal son of Vichitravirya thus started, the Pandava and the Kaurava ladies as also other women belonging to the Kaurava race, began to bewail aloud.

5 The king adored the palace in which he had lived with friendly and excellent flowers of various kinds He also honoured all his servants with gifts of wealth, and then leaving that house set out on his journey.

6 Then, O son, king Yudhishthira, trembling all over, with words choked by tears, said these words in a loud voice, viz —O righteous king, where do you go?—and fell down in a swoon

7 Arjuna, burning with great grief, spoke repeatedly That foremost of Bharata princes telling Yudhishthira that he should not behave thus stood cheerlessly with heart plunged into distress.

8 Vrikodara, the heroic Phalguna the two sons of Madri, Vidura, Sanjaya Dhritarashtra's son by his Vaishya wife, Kripa and Dhaumya and other Brahmanas all followed the old king with voices choked in grief

9 Kunti walked first, carrying on her shoulders the hand of Gandhari who walked with her bandaged eyes King Dhritarashtra walked confidently behind Gandhari, placing his hand on her shoulder

10 Draupadi's daughter Krishna she of the Sattwata race, Uttara the daughter in law of the Kauravas who had recently become a mother Chitrangada, and other ladies attached to the royal house, all followed the old king

11 The wail they uttered at that time, O king, from sorrow resembled the loud lamentations of a swarm of she ospreys The wives of the citizens—Brahmanas Kshatriyas and Vaishyas and Shudras—who came out into the streets from all sides

12 At Dhritarashtra's departure, O all the citizens of Hastinapore became as distressed as they had been O when they had seen the departure the Pandavas in former days after their defeat at the match at dice

13 Ladies who had never seen the sun the moon came out into the streets on occasion in great sorrow, when king Dhritarashtra proceeded towards the great

Vaishampayana said —

What was the uproar, at that time both men and women standing races of palaces or on the Earth

Then with great intelligence the joined hands and trembling passed with difficulty along street which was crowded of both sexes

3 He left the city of Hastinapur by the principal gate, and then repeatedly asked that crowd of people to return to their homes

4 Vidura had made up his mind for going to the forest with the king The Suta Sanjaya also the son of Gavalgani the chief minister of Dhritarashtra was of the same heart

5 King Dhritarashtra however, caused Kripa and the powerful car-warrior Yuyutsu to refrain from following him He made them over to Yudhishthira's hands

6 After the citizens had ceased following the monarch, king Yudhishthira, with the ladies of his house, prepared to stop, at the command of Dhritarashtra.

7 Seeing that his mother Kunti was desirous of retiring into the forest, the king said to her —"I shall follow the old king. Do you desist

8 You should O queen return to the city accompanied by these your daughters-in-law! This king goes to the forest, determined upon practising penances

9 Though king Yudhishthira said these words to her, with his eyes bathed in tears, Kunti however, without answering him, continued to go catching hold of Gandhari.

Kunti said —

10 O king, never neglect Sahadeva He is very much attached to me, O monarch, and to you also always

11 You should always bear in mind Karna who never retreated from battle Through my folly that hero has been killed in the field of battle

12 Surely my son this heart of mine is made of steel since it does not break into a hundred pieces at not seeing that child born of the Sun God.

13 When such has been the case, O chastiser of enemies what can I now do? I am very much to blame for not having said the truth about the birth of Surya's child

14 O crusher of enemies, I hope you will with all your brothers, make excellent gifts for the sake of that son of the Sun-God.

15 O mower of enemies you should always do what is agreeable to Draupadi. You should look after Bhimasena and Arjuna and Nakula and Sahadeva. The charge of the Kuru race have now fallen on you, O king

16 I shall live in the forest dhari, besmear[illegible] body w[illegible]

gaged in the practice of penances and devoted to the service of my father in law and mother in law.

Vaishampayana said :—

17 Thus addressed by her, the virtuous Yudhishthira, with passions under complete restraint, became, with all his brothers, plunged into great sorrow Gifted with great intelligence, the king said not a word.

18 Having thought for a moment, king Yudhishthira the just, dispirited and plunged in anxiety and sorrow, said to his mother, saying,—

19 What, indeed is your object? You should not do it I can never grant you permission! You should show us mercy.

20 Formerly, when we were about to leave Hastinapore for the forest, O you of agreeable features, it was you who reciting to us the story of Vidula's instructions to her son, stimulated us to exertion You should not leave us now

21. Having killed the kings of Earth, I have acquired sovereignty, guided by your wise words communicated through Vasudeva.

22 Where now is that understanding of yours about which I had heard from Vasudeva? Do you wish now to deviate from those Kshatriya practices about which you had instructed us?

23 Leaving ourselves, this kingdom, and this illustrious daughter-in law of yours, how will you live in the inaccessible forest? Do you relent.

24 Kunti, with tears in her eyes, heard these words of her son but continued to go her way. Then Bhima addressed her, saying,—

25 When, O Kunti, sovereignty has been acquired, and when the time has come for you to enjoy that sovereignty thus acquired by your children, when the duties of royalty await discharge by you whence has this desire entered into your mind?

26 Why then did you cause us to exterminate the Earth? Why would you leave all and wish to take up your residence in the forest?

27. We were born in the forest Why then did you bring us from the forest while we were children? See, the two sons of Madu are overwhelmed with sorrow and grief

28 Relent O mother! O you of great fame do not go into the forest now! Do you enjoy that prosperity which, acquired by power, has become Yudhishthira's to-day

29 Firmly resolved to retire into the forest, Kunti disregarded these lamentations of her sons

30 Then Draupadi, with a cheerless face accompanied by Subhadra, followed her weeping mother-in law who was proceeding on from desire of going into the forest.

31 Highly wise and firmly resolved on retirement from the world, the blessed dame walked on frequently looking at her weeping children.

32 The Pandavas, with all their wives and servitors, continued to follow her. Restraining then her tears, she addressed her children in these words

---

CHAPTER XVII.

Kunti said —

1. What you say, O mighty-armed son of Pandu is, indeed, true! O kings, formerly, when you were all dispirited, indeed, I excited you all

2 Seeing that your kingdom was taken away from you by a match at dice, seeing that you all fell from happiness, seeing that you were governed over by kinsmen, I instilled courage and high thoughts into your minds.

3 O foremost of men, I encouraged you so that the sons of Pandu might not be lost, so that their fame might not be lost.

4 You are all equal to Indra Your prowess resembles that of the very celestials. I acted thus so that you might not live, depending upon others

5 I instilled courage into your hearts so that you who are the foremost of all righteous persons who are equal to Vasava, might not again go into the forest and live in misery

6 I instilled courage into your hearts so that this Bhima who has the strength of ten thousand elephants and whose prowess and manliness are widely known, might not sink into insignificance and ruin.

7 I instilled courage into your hearts so that this Vijaya, who was born after Bhimasena and who is equal to Vasava himself, might not be cheerless

13 The great Shatayupa instructed Dhritarashtra in all the rites of the forest mode, at the command of Vyasa

14. Thus the great Dhritarashtra set himself to the practice of penances, and all his followers also to the same course of conduct.

15. Queen Gandhari also, O monarch, along with Kunti, put on barks of trees and deer-skins, and began to observe the same vows as her husband.

16 Restraining their senses in thought, words, and deeds, as well as by eye, they began to perform severe austerities.

17. Shorn of all stupefaction of mind king Dhritarashtra began to practise vows and penances like a great Rishi, reducing his body to skin and bones, for his flesh was all dried up, bearing matted locks on head, and his person clad in barks and skins.

18 Vidura, conversant with the true interpretations of Virtue, and gifted with great intelligence, as also Sanjaya, waited upon the old king with his wife Both of them with souls under control, Vidura and Sanjaya also reduced themselves, and wore barks and rags.

CHAPTER XX.

(ASHRAMAVASIKA PARVA)—Continued

Vaishampayana said —

1 Those foremost of ascetics, viz, Narada, Parvata and Devala of austere penances, came there to see king Dhritarashtra.

2. The Island-born Vyasa with all his disciples, and other persons gifted with great wisdom and crowned with ascetic success, and the royal sage Shatayupa of advanced years and possessed of great merit, also came

3 Kunti adored them with due rites, O king. All those ascetics were highly pleased with the adorations offered to them

4 Those great Rishis pleased the high-souled king Dhritarashtra with discourses on religion and virtue.

5 At the conclusion of their converse, the celestial Rishi Narada, seeing all things as objects of direct perception, said the following words.

Narada said :—

6 There was a king of the Kekayas, possessed of great prosperity and perfectly fearless His name was Sahasrachitya and he was the grandfather of this Shatayupa

7 Resigning his kingdom to his highly virtuous eldest son, the virtuous king Sahasrachitya retired into the forest.

8 Reaching the other end of blazing penances, that king, gifted with great splendour, attained to the region of Purandara where he continued to live in his company.

9 On many occasions, while visiting the region of Indra O king, I saw that monarch, whose sins had all been consumed by penances, living in Indra's palace

10. Similarly, king Shailalaya, the grandfather of Bhagadatta, attained to the region of Indra by the power alone of his penances.

11. There was another king, O monarch, of the name of Prishadhra who resembled the holder of the thunder-bolt himself. That king also by his penances proceeded from the Earth to the celestial region

12 In this very forest, O king, that king, viz, Purukutsa, the son of Mandhatri, acquired great success.

13. That foremost of rivers, viz, Narmada, became the consort of that king. Having practised penances in this very forest, that king proceeded to the celestial region.

14 There was another king, highly righteous, of the name of Shashaloman. He, too, performed severe austerities in this forest and then ascended to the celestial region.

15 You also, O monarch, having arrived at this forest, shall, through the grace of the Island born attain to a very high end and which is difficult of attainment.

16 You also, O foremost of kings, at the termination of your penances, shall become gifted with great prosperity and accompanied by Gandhari, attain to the end reached by those great ones.

17 Living in the presence of the destroyer of Vala, Pandu thinks of you always. He will, O monarch certainly assist you in the attainment of prosperity.

18 Through serving you and Gandhari, this daughter-in-law of yours possessed of great fame, will attain to residence with her husband in the other world.

19 She is the mother of Yudhishthira who is the eternal Dharma We see all this, O king, with our spiritual vision.

20 Vidura will [illegible] high-soul[illegible] meditation, will ascend from this world into the celestial region.

Vaishampayana said :—

21 That great chief of Kuru's race, endued with learning, having, with his wife, heard these words of Narada, praised them and adored Narada with unprecedented honors.

22 The assembly of Brahmanas there present became filled with great joy, and desirous of pleasing king Dhritarashtra, O monarch themselves worshipped Narada with great respect.

23—24 Those foremost of twice born persons also lauded the words of Narada Then the royal sage Shatayupa, addressing Narada, said,—Your holy self has increased the devotion of the Kuru king, of all those people here, and of myself also, O you of great splendour.

25 I wish to ask you something Listen to me as I say it It is about king, Dhritarashtra, O celestial Rishi, that are adored of all the worlds

26 You know the truth of every affair. Gifted with celestial vision, you behold, O twice born Rishi, what the various ends are of human beings.

27 You have said what the end has been of the kings mentioned by you, viz, association with the king of the celestials. You have not, however, O great Rishi, declared what those regions are which will be acquired by this king.

28 O powerful one, I wish to hear from you what region will be acquired by the royal Dhritarashtra You should tell me truly the kind of region that will be his and the time when he will attain to it.

29 Thus addressed by him, Narada of celestial vision and endued with austere penances, said in the midst of the assembly these words highly agreeable to the minds of all.

Narada said :—

30 Going at my will to the palace of Shakra, I have seen Shakra the lord of Sachi, and there, O royal sage, I have seen king Pandu

31. There is a talk arose, O monarch, about this Dhritarashtra and those highly austere penances which he is performing 32 There I heard from the lips of Shakra himself that there are three years yet of the period of life of this king.

33 After that, king Dhritarashtra, accompanied by his wife Gandhari, will go to the regions of Kuvera and be highly honored by that king of kings He will go there on a car moving at his will, his body adorned with celestial ornaments.

34—35 He is the son of a Rishi; he is highly blessed; he has exhausted all his sins by his penances Gifted with a righteous soul, he will roam at will through the regions of the celestials, the Gandharvas, and the Rakshasas That about which you have enquired is a mystery to the gods Through my affection for you, I have said this high truth

36 You all are possessed of the wealth of Shrutis and have burnt all your sins by your penances.

Vaishampayana said —

37 Hearing these sweet words of the celestial Rishi, all the persons there assembled, as also king Dhritarashtra, became greatly pleased.

38 Having cheered Dhritarashtra of great wisdom with such talk, they left the place, going away by the path that belongs to those who are crowned with success.

CHAPTER XXI.

(ASHRAMAVASIKA PARVA.)—Continued.

Vaishampayana said :—

1 Upon the retirement of the king of the Kurus into the forest, the Pandavas, O king, afflicted besides by grief on account of their mother, became very dispirited ;

2. The citizens also of Hastinapore were possessed by deep sorrow. The Brahmanas always talked of the old king

3 How, indeed, will the king, who has become old, live in the solitary forest? How will the highly blessed Gandhari, and Pritha, the daughter of Kuntibhoja, live there?

4 The royal sage has always lived in the enjoyment of every comfort. He will certainly be very miserable Arrived in the deep forest, what is now the condition of that personage of royal descent, who is, again bereft of vision?

5 Difficult is the feat that Kunti has performed by separating herself from her sons Alas renouncing royal prosperity, she chose a life in the forest.

6 What, again, is the condition of Vidura who is always devoted to the service of his elder brother? How also is the intelligent son of Gavalgani who is so faithful to the salt given him by his master?

7. The citizens, including even the minors meeting together, asked one another these questions.

8. The Pandavas also, greatly stricken with grief, bewailed for their old mother, and could not live in their city long.

9 Thinking also of their old sire, the king, who had lost all his children, and the highly blessed Gandhari, and Vidura of great intelligence, they could not enjoy peace of mind.

10. They had no pleasure in sovereignty, nor in women, nor in the study of the Vedas.

11. Despair entered their souls as they thought of the old king and as they repeatedly thought of that terrible destruction of kinsmen.

12—13. Indeed, thinking of the destruction of the youthful Abhimanyu on the field of battle, of the mighty armed Karna who never retreated from fight, of the sons of Draupadi, and of other friends of theirs, those heroes became highly dispirited.

14 They could not get peace of mind upon repeatedly thinking that the Earth had become divested of both her heroes and her riches

15 Draupadi had lost all her children, and the beautiful Subhadra also had become childless They, too, were of cheerless hearts and grieved greatly.

16 Seeing, however, the son of Virata's daughter, viz, your sire Parikshit, your grandsires somehow lived.

CHAPTER XXII.

(ASHRAMAVASIKA PARVA)—Continued.

Vaishampayana said—

1. Those foremost of men the heroic Pandavas,—those defenders of their mother—became greatly stricken with grief.

2 They who had formerly been always engaged in royal offices, did not at that time attend to those deeds at all in their capital.

3. Stricken with deep sorrow, they could not find pleasure from anything. If any body asked them, they never honored him with an answer.

4. Although those irresistible heroes were grave like the ocean, yet they were now deprived of their knowledge and their very senses by the grief they felt

5 Thinking of their mother, the sons of Pandu became anxious as to how their emaciated mother was serving the old pair.

6. How, indeed, is that king, whose sons have all been killed and who is without refuge, living alone, with only his wife, in the forest haunted by beasts of prey?

7. Alas, how does that highly blessed queen, Gandhari, whose dear ones have all been killed, follow her blind husband in the solitary forest

8 Such was the anxiety shown by the Pandavas when they talked with one another. They then set their hearts upon beholding the king in his forest asylum.

9 Then bowing down to the king, Sahadeva said,—"I think you wish to see our sire.

10. From my respect for you, however, I could not speedily speak on the subject of our journey to the forest. The time for that sojourn is now come

11 By good luck I shall see Kunti performing penances with matted locks on her head practising severe austerities and emaciated by sleeping on blades of Kusha and Kasha.

12 She was brought up in palaces and nursed in every comfort and luxury Alas, when shall I see my mother who is now toil-worn and plunged into great misery.

13 Forsooth, O chief of Bharata's race, the ends of men are exceedingly uncertain, since Kunti, who is a princess by birth, is now living in misery in the forest

14 Hearing these words of Sahadeva, queen Draupadi that foremost of all women duly honoring the king, said, with proper salutations—

15 Alas, when shall I see queen Pritha, if, indeed she is alive! I shall consider my life as not passed in vain if I succeed in seeing her once more, O king.

16. Let this sort of understanding be ever firm in you Let your mind always take a pleasure in such virtue as is involved, O king of kings in your desire of granting such a high boon on us.

17. Know O king that all these ladies of your house are staying with their feet raised for the journey, from desire of seeing Kunti [illegible] father-in-law.

18 Thus addressed by queen Draupadi, the king, O chief of Bharata's race, summoned all the leaders of his army to his presence and told them —

19 'Cause my army, full of cars and elephants to march out I shall see king Dhritarashtra who is now living in the forest'

20 To the officers in charge of the ladies' ward the king gave the order,—'Let various kinds of conveyances be properly equipt as also all my closed litters counting by thousands

21 Let carriages and granaries and wardrobes, and treasuries, be equipt and ordered out, and let mechanics have the command to march out. Let men in charge of treasuries go out on the way leading to the ascetic hermitage of Kurukshetra.

22 Whoever amongst the citizens wishes to see the king, is allowed to do so without any restriction. Let him proceed, properly protected

23 Let cooks and superintendents of kitchens, and the whole culinary establishment, and various kinds of edibles and viands be ordered to be borne out on carts and conveyances

24 Let it be proclaimed that we march out to morrow Indeed, let no delay take place Let pavilions and resting houses of various kinds be erected on the way

25 These were the commands which the eldest son of Pandu gave with his brothers When morning came, O monarch, the king started with a large following of women and old men

26 Going out of his city, king Yudhishthira waited five days for such citizens as might accompany him and then went towards the forest.

Vaishampayana said—

1. That foremost one of Bharata's race, then ordered his troops, which were protected by heroes who were headed by Arjuna and who resembled the very guardians of the universe, to march out.

2 Immediately a loud clamour arose consisting of the words—Equip Equip!—of horse men, O Bharata, engaged in equipping their horses.

3 Some proceeded on carriages and vehicles, some on quick coursing horses, and some on cars made of gold and effulgent like blazing fires.

4 Some proceeded on powerful elephants and some on camels, O king. Some proceeded on foot, which belonged to that class of combatants which is armed with tiger like claws.

5 The citizens and inhabitants of the provinces desirous of beholding Dhritarashtra followed the king on various kinds of conveyances.

6 The preceptor Kripa also, of Gotama's race, that great leader of army, taking all the forces with him, proceeded, at the command of the king, towards the old king's hermitage.

7—8. The Kuru king Yudhishthira, that perpetuater of Kuru's race, surrounded by a large number of Brahmana's, his praises lauded by a large band of Sutas and Magadhas and bards, and with a white umbrella held over his head, and surrounded by a large number of cars, started on his journey.

9 Vrikodara, the son of the Wind-God, went on an elephant huge as a hill, equipt with strong bow and machines and weapons of attack and defence.

10. The twin sons of Madri went on two quick-coursing horses, well cased in mail, well protected, and equipt with banners.

11. Arjuna of great energy, with senses under restraint, proceeded on an excellent car effulgent like the sun to which were yoked excellent white horses.

12 The royal ladies headed by Draupadi proceeded in closed litters protected by the superintendents of women They scattered showers of wealth as they went on.

13 Teeming with cars and elephants and horses, and echoing with the blare of trumpets and the music of Vinas the Pandava army, O monarch, shone with great beauty.

14 Those chiefs of Kuru's race proceeded slowly, resting by delightful banks of rivers and lakes, O monarch

15 Yuyutsu of great energy, and Dhaumya, the priest, at the command of Yudhishthira, were engaged in protecting the city.

16—17 By slow marches king Yudhishthira reached Kurukshetra, and then crossing the Yamuna, that highly sacred river, he saw from a distance the great sage, O you of Kuru's race, of the royal sage of great wisdom and of Dhritarashtra.

18. Then all the men became filled with joy and quickly entered the forest, filling it with loud sounds of joy, O chief of Bharata's race.

CHAPTER XXIV.

(ASHRAMAVASIKA PARVA.)—Continued.

Vaishampayana said:—

1. The Pandavas got down at a distance, from their cars and proceeded on foot to the hermitage of the king, bending themselves in humility.

2. All the combatants also, and the citizens and the wives of the Kuru chiefs, followed them on foot.

3 The Pandavas then reached the sacred hermitage of Dhritarashtra which abounded with herds of deer and which was adorned with plantain plants.

4 Many ascetics of rigid vows, filled with curiosity, came there for seeing the Pandavas who had arrived at the hermitage.

5. The king, with tears in his eyes, asked them, saying,—'Where has my eldest sire the perpetuater of Kuru's race, gone?

6 They answered, O monarch, telling him that he had gone to the Yamuna, for his ablutions, as also for fetching flowers and waters.

7. Proceeding quickly on foot along the path pointed out by them, the Pandavas saw all of them from a distance

8. Desirous of meeting with their sire they walked rapidly. Then Sahadeva ran quickly towards the spot where Pritha was.

9. Touching the feet of his mother, he began to weep aloud With tears running down her cheeks, she saw her darling child.

10 Raising her son up and embracing him with her arms, she informed Gandhari of Sahadeva's arrival

11. Then seeing the king Bhimasena, Arjuna, and Nakula, Pritha tried to advance quickly towards them

12 She was walking in advance of the childless old pair, and was dragging them forward. Seeing her, the Pandavas fell down on the earth.

13 The powerful and the great monarch, gifted with great intelligence, recognising them by their voices and also by touch, comforted them one after another.

14. Shedding tears, those great princes, with due formalities, approached the old king and Gandhari, as also their own mother.

15. Indeed, regaining their senses, and once more consoled by their mother, the Pandavas took away from the king and their aunt and mother the jars full of water which they had been carrying.

16 The ladies of those leading men, and all the women of the royal household, as also all the inhabitants of the city and the provinces, then saw the old king.

17. King Yudhishthira presented all those individuals one after another to the old king, repeating their names and families and then himself adored his eldest sire with respect.

18. Surrounded by them all, the old monarch, with eyes bathed in tears of joy, considered himself as once more staying in the midst of the city of Hastinapore.

19 Saluted with respect by all his daughters in law headed by Krishna, king Dhritarashtra, gifted with great intelligence, with Gandhari and Kunti became filled with joy.

20 He then reached his forest retreat which was highly spoken of by Siddhas and Charanas and that then was filled up with vast crowds of men all desirous of seeing him like the sky teeming with myriads of stars.

CHAPTER XXV.

(ASHRAMAVASIKA PARVA)—Continued.

Vaishampayana said —

1 The king, O chief of Bharata's race, with those foremost of men viz his brothers who all had eyes resembling lotus-petals took his seat in the hermitage of his eldest sire.

2 There sat around him many highly-blessed ascetics coming from various regions from desire of seeing the sons of that lord of Kuru's race, viz, the Pandavas of wide chests

3 They said —'We wish to know who amongst these is Yudhisthira, who are Bhima and Arjuna the twins, and who is the illustrious Draupadi?'

4 Then the Suta, Sanjaya, in answer to their queries, pointed out to them the Pandavas, naming each, and Draupadi too as also the other ladies of the Kururace.

Sanjaya said :—

5 This one fair like pure gold, who is endued with a body which looks like that of a full grown lion, who is possessed of a large aquiline nose, and wide and expansive eyes of a coppery hue, is the Kuru king

6 This one whose tread is like that of an infuriate elephant, whose complexion is as fair as that of heated gold whose frame is of large and expansive proportions, and whose arms are long and stout, is Vrikodara. See him well.

7 The powerful bowmen who sits besides him, of darkish color and youthful frame, who resembles the leader of an elephant time herd whose shoulders are as high as those of a lion, who walks like a sporting elephant, and whose eyes are as expansive as the petals of a lotus, is the hero called Arjuna

8. Those two foremost of men, who are sitting beside Kunti are the twins resembling Vishnu and Mahendra In the entire world, they have not their equals in beauty and strength and excellence of conduct.

9 This lady having eyes expansive as lotus-petals, who seems to have touched the middle age of life, whose complexion resembles that of the blue lotus, and who looks like a goddess, is Krishna, the embodied form of the goddess of prosperity.

10. She who sits besides her possessed of the complexion of pure gold, who looks like the embodied rays of the moon, in the midst of other ladies, O foremost of twice-born ones, is the sister that unrivalled hero who holds the discus.

11. This other, as fair as pure gold, is the daughter of the Naga king and wife of Arjuna This other whose complexion is like that of pure gold or like that of Madhuka flowers, is the princess Chitrangada.

12 This one, whose complexion is like an assemblage of blue lotuses, is the sister of that monarch, that lord of hosts who used to always challenge Krishna. She is the foremost wife of Vrikodara.

13 This is the daughter of the king of Magadha who was known by the name of Jarasandha Possessed of the complexion of an assemblage of Champakas, she is the wife of the youngest son of Madravati.

14 Possessed of a complexion dark as the blue lotus, she who sits there on the earth, and whose eyes are as expansive as lotus petals, she is the wife of the eldest son of Madravati.

15 This lady whose complexion is as fair as that of heated gold and who sits with her child on her lap, is the daughter of king Virata She is the wife of that Abhimanyu who while divested of his car, was killed by Drona and others fighting from their cars.

16 These ladies, the hair on whose heads shows not the parted line, and who are clad in white, are the widows of the killed sons of Dhritarashtra. They are the daughters in law of this old king, the wives of his hundred sons, now deprived of both their husbands and children who have been killed by heroic enemies.

17. I have now pointed them out in the order of precedence. On account of their devotion to Brahmanas, their understandings and hearts are divested of every kind of crookedness Possessed of pure souls, they have all been pointed out by men,—these princesses of the Kaurava line,—in answer to your queries.

Vaishampayana said :—

18 Thus that aged king of Kuru's race, having met with those sons of him that was a celestial among men, enquired about their well being after all the ascetics had departed.

19 The warriors who had accompanied the Pandavas, leaving the retreat, sat themselves down at a little distance, getting down from their cars and the animals they rode Indeed, after all the crowd, viz, the ladies the old men and the children, had been seated, the old king duly addressed them after making the usual polite enquiries.

CHAPTER XXVI.

Dhritarashtra said :—

1 O Yudhishthira, are you in peace and happiness, with all your brothers and the dwellers of the city and the provinces?

2 Are they who depend on you also happy? Are your ministers, and servitors, and all your seniors and preceptors also, happy?

3 Are those also who live in your kingdom free from fear? Do you follow the old and traditional conduct of kings?

4. Is your treasury filled without disregarding the restraints imposed by justice and equity? Do you behave as you should towards foes, neutrals, and allies?

5—6 Do you duly look after the Brahmanas, always making them the first gifts? What need I say of the citizens, and your servants, and kinsmen, are your foes, O chief of Bharata's race pleased with your conduct? Do you, O king of kings, adore with devotion the Pitris and the deities?

7. Do you adore guests with food and drink, O Bharata? Do the Brahmanas in your kingdom perform the duties of their order, walk along the path of virtue?

8 Do the Kshatriyas and Vaishyas and Shudras also within your kingdom, and all your relatives, perform their respective duties? I hope the women, the children, and the old, among your subjects, do not grieve (under distress) and not beg (the necessaries of life).

9 Are the ladies of your household duly honoured in your house, O best of men? I hope, O king that this race of royal sages having got you for their king, have not fallen away from fame and glory?

Vaishampayana said —

10 To the old king who said so, Yudhishthira, knowing morality and justice and well-skilled in acts and speech, spoke as follows, putting some questions about his well being.

Yudhishthira said —

11. Does your peace O king, your self control, your tranquillity of heart, grow? Is this my mother able to serve you without fatigue and trouble.

12—13 Will, O king, her residence in the forest yield fruit? I hope this queen who is my eldest mother, who is emaciated with (exposure to cold and wind and the toil of walking and who is now given to the practice of severe austerities no longer yields to grief for her children of great energy, all of whom performing the duties of the Kshatriyas, have been killed on the field of battle

14 Does she accuse us sinful wretches, who are responsible for their destruction? Where is Vidura, O king? We do not see him here I hope this Sanjaya, performing penances, is in peace and happiness.

Vaishampayana said —

15—16 Thus addressed Dhritarashtra answered king Yudhishthira, saying—O son Vidura is well. He is practising austere penances, living on air alone, for he abstains from all other food. He is emaciated and his arteries and nerves have become visible Sometimes he is seen in this empty forest by Brahmanas.

17. While Dhritarashtra was saying this Vidura was seen at a distance He had matted locks on his head, and gravels in his mouth, and was greatly emaciated. He was perfectly naked His body was besmeared all over with filth, and with the dust of various wild flowers.

18 When Kshattri, was seen from a distance, the fact was communicated to Yudhishthira Vidura suddenly stopped, O king, looking towards the retreat

19 King Yudhishthira pursued him alone, as he ran and entered the deep forest, sometimes seen and sometimes not seen by the pursuer.

20 He said aloud—'O Vidura, O Vidura I am king Yudhishthira, your favourite'—Exclaiming thus Yudhishthira, with great exertion, followed Vidura

21. Having reached a solitary spot in the forest that foremost of intelligent men, viz, Vidura, stood still, leaning against a tree.

22 He was greatly emaciated. He retained only the shape of a human being. Yudhishthira of great intelligence recognised him, however

23 Standing before him, Yudhishthira addressed him saying—'I am Yudhishthira' Indeed adoring Vidura properly, Yudhishthira said these words in the hearing of Vidura

24 Meanwhile Vidura looked at the king steadfastly Casting his look thus on the king, he stood motionless in Yoga

25 Endued with great intelligence, he then (by his Yoga power) entered the body of Yudhishthira, limb by limb. He united his vital airs with those of the king, and his senses with the king's senses.

26 Indeed with the help of Yoga power, Vidura, burning with energy, thus entered the body of king Yudhishthira the just.

27 Meanwhile the body of Vidura continued to lean against the tree, with eyes fixed The king soon saw that life had fled out of it.

28—29 At the same time, he felt that he himself had become stronger than before and that he had gained many additional virtues and accomplishments Gifted with great learning and energy, O monarch, Pandu's son king Yudhishthira the just, then recollected his own state before his birth among men. Possessed of mighty energy, he had heard of Yoga practice from Vyasa.

30—31. King Yudhishthira the just, endued with great learning, became desirous of doing the last rites to the body of Vidura, and wished to cremate it duly. An invisible voice was then heard saying,—'O king, this body which belonged to him called Vidura should not be cremated. In him is your body also He is the eternal deity of Virtue.

32 Those happy regions which pass by the name of Santanika will be his, O Bharata He performed the duties of Yatis You should not, O scorcher of enemies, grieve for him at all.

33 Thus addressed king Yudhishthira the just returned from the place, and represented everything to the royal son of Vichitravirya

34 At this, that effulgent king, all those men, and Bhimasena and others, became filled with wonder.

35. Hearing what had taken place, king Dhritarashtra became pleased and then, addressing the son of Dharma said,—'Do you accept from me these gifts of water and roots and fruits' It has been said O king, that one's guest should take what one takes himself.'

36 Thus addressed, Dharma's son answered the king, saying—'So be it!' The mighty-armed king ate the fruits and roots which he gave.

37. Then they all spread their beds under a tree and passed that night thus having eaten fruits and roots and drunk the water that the old monarch had given them.

CHAPTER XXVII.

(ASHRAMAVASIKA PARVA)—Continued.

Vaishampayana said —

1 They passed that night which was marked out by auspicious constellations thus, O king, in that hermitage of pious ascetics.

2 The conversation that took place was marked by many reflections on morality and wealth Consisting of delightful and sweet words it was graced with various citations from the Shrutis

3 The Pandavas O king, leaving costly beds, lay themselves down, near their mother, on the naked earth.

4 Indeed, those heroes passed that night, having eaten the food which was the food of the great king Dhritarashtra.

5. After the night had passed away, king Yudhishthira, having performed his morning rites proceeded to survey that hermitage in the company of his brothers.

6 With the royal ladies, the servants, and his priest, the king roved about the hermitage in all directions as he pleased, at the command of Dhritarashtra

7. He saw many sacrificial altars with sacred fires burning on them and with many ascetics seated on them, who had performed their oblations and poured libations in honour of the celestials

8. Those altars were covered with fruits and roots of the forest, and with heaps of flowers The smoke of clarified butter curled upwards from them They were graced, besides, with many ascetics possessed of bodies which appeared like the embodied Vedas and with many laymen.

9 Herds of deer were grazing or resting here and there, shorn of fear. Countless birds also were there engaged in uttering their sweet notes, O king!

10 The entire forest seemed to resound with the notes of peacocks and Datyuhas and Kokilas and the sweet songs of other warblers

11. Some spots were echoed with the chaunt of Vedic hymns recited by learned Brahmanas Some were adorned with large heaps of fruits and roots gathered from the forest.

12—13 King Yudhishthira then distributed amongst those ascetics golden or copper jars which he had brought for them, and many deer-skins and blankets and wooden sacrificial ladles and Kamandalus and wooden platters, and pots and pans, O Bharata.

14 Various kinds of vessels made of iron, and smaller vessels and cups of various sizes, were also given away by the king, the ascetics taking them away, each as many as he liked.

15 Pious king Yudhishthira having thus roved through the forest and seen the various retreats of ascetics and made many gifts, returned to the place where his uncle was.

16 He saw king Dhritarashtra, seated at ease, with Gandhari besides him, after having finished his morning rites.

17 The righteous souled monarch beheld also his mother, Kunti, seated not much remote from that place, like a disciple with bent head, gifted with humility.

18 He saluted the old king giving his name 'Sit down,' were the words the old king said With Dhritarashtra's permission, Yudhishthira sat himself down on a mat of Kusha grass.

19 Then the other sons of Pandu with Bhima among them, O you of Bharata's race, saluted the king and touched his feet and sat themselves down, with his order.

20 The old Kuru king, surrounded by them looked highly beautiful, Indeed, he blazed with a Vedic splendour like Vrihaspati in the midst of the celestials.

21. After they had sat themselves down, many great Rishis, viz, Shatayupa, and others, who were inhabitants of Kurukshetra came there.

22. The illustrious and learned Vyasa, gifted with great energy and respected by even the celestial Rishis, showed himself at the head of his numerous disciples to Yudhishthira

23 The Kuru king Dhritarashtra, Kunti's son Yudhishthira of great energy, and Bhimasena and others, stood up and going a few steps, saluted those guests.

24. Approaching near, Vyasa, surrounded by Shatayupa and others, addressed king Dhritrashtra, saying,—'Be seated.'

25 The illustrious Vyasa then took an excellent seat made of Kusha grass placed upon a black deer-skin and covered with a piece of silken cloth. They had reserved that seat for him.

26 After Vyasa had been seated all those foremost of twice-born persons, gifted with profuse energy, sat themselves down, with the permission of Krishna-Dwaipayana.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

(ASHRAMAVASIKA PARVA.)—Continued.

Vaishampayana said:—

1—2 After the noble Pandavas had all been seated, Satyavati's son Vyasa said,—'O Dhritarashtra of mighty-arms, have you been able to achieve penances? Is your mind, O king, pleased with your living in the forest?

3 Has your grief begotten of the destruction of your sons in battle, disappeared from your heart? Are all your perceptions, O sinless one, now clear?

4. Do you practise the ordinances of forest-life after having made your heart firm? Does my daughter-in-law, Gandhari, suffer herself to be overwhelmed by grief?

5. She is endued with great wisdom. Endued with intelligence, that queen understands both virtue and profit She is well conversant with the truths which relate to both prosperity and adversity. Does she still grieve?

6 Does Kunti, O king, who for her devotion to the service of her seniors, left her children, attend to your wants and serve you with all humility?

7 Have the high-minded and great king Yudhishthira, the son of Dharma, and Bhima and Arjuna, and the twins, been sufficiently comforted?

8 Do you feel delight at seeing them? Has your mind become freed from every strain? Has your disposition, O king become pure on account of the increase of your knowledge?

9 These three, O king, are the foremost of all concerns, O Bharata, viz, abstension from injury to any creation, truth, and freedom from anger.

10. Does your forest life any longer prove painful to you? Are you able to acquire with your own exertions the products of the forest for your food? Do fasts pain you now?

11. Have you learnt O king, how the great Vidura, who was Dharma's self, left this world?

12 Through the curse of Mandavya, the deity of Virtue became born as Vidura. He was gifted with great intelligence. Endued with high penances, he was great and high minded

13 Even Vrihaspati among the celestials, and Shukra among the Asuras, had not intelligence like that foremost of persons.

14. The eternal deity of Virtue was stupefied by the Rishi Mandavya with an expenditure of his penances acquired for a long time with great care.

15. At the command of the grandfather and through my own energy, the highly intelligent Vidura was procreated by me upon a soil owned by Vichitraviryya

16 A deity of deities, and eternal, he was, O king, your brother The learned know him to be Dharma on account of his practices of concentration and abstraction.

17 He grows with truth, self-restraint, tranquility of heart, mercy, and gifts. He is always engaged in penances, and is eternal.

18. From that deity of Virtue, through Yoga-Power, the Kuru king Yudhishthira also took his birth. Yudhishthira, therefore, O king, is Dharma of great wisdom and immeasurable intelligence.

19 Dharma exists both in this world and in the next, and is like fire or wind or water or earth or space.

20. He is, O king of kings, capable of going everywhere and exists, pervading the entire universe. He is capable of being seen by only those who are the foremost of the deities and those who are purged of every sin and crowned with ascetic success.

21. He who is Dharma, is Vidura, and he who is Vidura is the (eldest) son of Pandu. That son of Pandu, O king, is capable of being perceived by you He is before you as your servitor.

22 Gifted with great Yoga-Power, your high-souled brother, that foremost of intelligent men, seeing the high souled Yudhishthira, the son of Kunti has entered into his body.

23 O chief of Bharata's race, I shall unite you also with great benefit Know, O son, that I am come here for removing your doubts

24. I shall show you some feat which has never been accomplished before by any of the great Rishis—some wonderful effect of my penances.

25 What object is that, O king, whose accomplishment you wish from me? Tell me what is that which you wish to see or ask or hear? O sinless one, I shall accomplish it.

CHAPTER XXIX.

(PUTRADARSHANA PARVA).

Janamejaya said —

1—3 Tell me O learned Brahman, what that wonderful feat was, which the great Rishi Vyasa of great energy accomplished after he had his made promise to the old king, when Dhritarashtra, that foremost one of Kuru's race had taken up his residence in the forest with his wife and with his daughter-in law Kunti; and after, indeed, Vidura had left his own body and entered into Yudhishthira, and at the time when all the sons of Pandu were living in the hermitage

4 For how many days did the Kuru king Yudhishthira of undecaying glory, stay with his men in the forest.

5 Of what food O powerful one, did the great Pandavas support themselves with their men, and wives, while they lived in the forest? O sinless one, do you tell me this.

Vaishampayana said :—

6—7 With the permission of the Kuru king, the Pandavas, O monarch, with their troops and the ladies of their household, lived on various kinds of food and drink and passed about a month in great happiness in that forest. Towards the close of that period, O sinless one, Vyasa came there.

8. While all those princes sat around Vyasa, engaged in conversation on various topics, other Rishis came there.

9 They were Narada, Parvata, Devala of austere penances, Vishwavasu, Tumvuru, and Chitrasena, O Bharata.

10. Gifted with severe penances, the Kuru king Yudhishthira, with the permission of Dhritarashtra, adored them according to due rites.

11. Having got that worship from Yudhishthira, all of them sat down on sacred seats (made of Kusha grass as also on excellent seats made of peacock feathers.

12. After they had all been seated, the Kuru king of great intelligence took his seat there, surrounded by the sons of Pandu.

13 Gandhari Kunti and Draupadi, and she of the Sattwata race, and other ladies of the royal household also sat down.

14 The conversation which then arose was excellent and had reference to subjects, connected with piety and the Rishis of old, and the celestials and the Asuras.

15—21. At the close of that conversation the highly energetic Vyasa that foremost of eloquent men that first of all persons knowing the Vedas highly pleased, addressed the blind monarch and once more said.— Burning as you are with grief on account of your children, I know, O king of kings what object is cherished by you in your heart I know the sorrow which always exists in the heart of Gandhari, that which exists in the heart of Kunti and that also which is cherished by Draupadi in her heart, and that burning grief, on account of the death of her son, which Krishna's sister Subhadra also cherishes Hearing of this meeting O king of yours with all these princes and princesses of your house, I have come here, O delighter of the Kauravas, for removing your doubts Let the celestials and Gandharvas and all these great Rishis, see to day the energy of those penances which I have acquired for these long years. Therefore, O king, tell me what wish of yours I shall grant to-day.

22—25 I am powerful enough to grant you a boon. See the fruit of my penances.' Thus addressed by Vyasa of great understanding, king Dhritarashtra thought for a moment and then prepared to speak He said,—'I am greatly fortunate. Lucky am I in obtaining your favour. My life is crowned with success to day,—since this meeting has taken place between me and you all of great piety. To day I shall attain to that highly happy end which is reserved for me, since, ye ascetics who have penances for wealth, ye who are equal to Brahma himself, I have succeeded in obtaining this meeting with you all There is not the least doubt that this sight that I have obtained of you all has purged me of every sin.

26—27. O sinless ones, I have no longer any fear about my end in the next world. Full as I am of love for my children, I always remember them My mind, however, is always pained by the recollection of the various acts of wrong which my wicked son of exceedingly evil understanding perpetrated Having a sinful understanding, he always persecuted the innocent Pandavas.

28—30 Alas, the whole Earth has been devastated by him, with her horses, elephants and men Many great kings, rulers of various kingdoms, came for helping my son and succumbed to death Alas, leaving their beloved father and wives and their very life-breaths, all those heroes have become guests of the king of the dead. What end, O twice-born one, has been attained by those men who have killed, for the sake of their friend, in battle? What end also has attained by my sons and grandsons who have fallen in the battle? My heart is always pained at the thought of my having brought about the destruction of the powerful Bhishma, the son of Shantanu, and of Drona that foremost of Brahmanas, through my foolish and sinful son who was an injurer of his friends.

33 Desirous of getting the sovereignty of the Earth, he caused the Kuru race, blazing with prosperity, to be annihilated Thinking of all this, I burn day and night with grief.

34 Deeply afflicted with pain and grief, I am unable to get peace of mind Indeed O sire thinking of all this, I have no peace of mind.

Vishampayana said :—

35 Hearing these lamentations expressed in various ways, of that royal sage the grief, O Janamejaya of Gandhari, became fresh.

36. The grief, also, of Kunti, of the daughter of Drupada, of Subhadra, and of the other members, male and female, and the daughters-in-law, of the royal house of Kuru became equally great.

37—38 Queen Gandhari, with bandaged eyes, joining her hands addressed her father-in-law Deeply afflicted with grief on account of the destruction of her sons, she said :—O foremost of ascetics, this king has passed sixteen years grieving for the death of his sons and shorn of peace of mind.

39 Afflicted with grief on account of the destruction of his children, this king Dhritarashtra, always breathes heavily, and never sleeps at night, O great Rishi.

40. Through the power of your penances you are competent to create new worlds. What need I say then about showing this king his children who are now in the other world?

41. This Krishna, the daughter of Drupada, has lost all her kinsmen and children. Therefore, she who is the dearest of my daughters-in law grieves greatly.

42. The sister of Krishna, viz, Subhadra of sweet words, burning with the loss of her son, grieves as deeply.

43 This lady who is respected by all, who is the wife of Bhurishravas, stricken with grief on account of the fate of her husband, always indulges in heart rending lamentations

44 Her father-in law was the intelligent Valhika of Kuru's race. Alas, Somadatta also was killed, along with his father, in the great battle.

45. Alas, a hundred sons, heroes who never retreated from battle, belonging to this son of yours, this king of great intelligence and great prosperity, has been killed in battle.

46 The hundred wives of those sons are all grieving and repeatedly increasing the grief of both the king and myself. O great ascetic, stricken by that great onslaught, they have gathered round me.

47. Alas those great heroes, those great car-warriors, my fathers in-law Somadatta and others —alas, what end has been theirs, O powerful one.

48. Through your favour, O holy one, that will take place for which this king, myself and this daughter-in law of yours, viz, Kunti, shall all become freed from our grief.

49 After Gandhari had said so, Kunti, whose face had become wasted through observance of many hard vows, began to think of her secret-born son gifted with solar effulgence.

50. The boon-giving Rishi Vyasa capable of both seeing and hearing what took place at a remote distance, saw that the royal mother of Arjuna was afflicted with grief.

51. To her Vyasa said,—'Tell me, O blessed one, what is in your mind. Tell me what you wish to say.'

52. At this, Kunti, bending her head to her-father-in-law, and overcome with bashfulness, said these words to him, recounting the past incidents of her life.

CHAPTER XXX.

(PUTRBDARSHANA PARVA.)—

Continued.

Kunti said :—

1. O holy one, you are my father-in-law and, therefore, my deity of deities You are my god of gods. Hear my words of truth.

2—3. A twice-born ascetic named Durvasas, who is full of anger, came to my father's house for begging alms I succeeded in pleasing him by the purity of my conduct and of my minds as also by refusing to notice the many wrongs he did I did not yield to anger although there was much in his conduct quite capable of exciting that passion.

4 Served with care, the great ascetic became highly pleased with me and disposed to grant me a boon 'You must accept the boon I shall give,' were his words to me.

5—6. Fearing his curse, I answered him saying,—'So be it.' The Rishi once more said to me,—'O blessed damsel, O you of beautiful face, you will become the mother of Dharma Those deities whom you will summon will obey you'

7. Having said these words, the twice-born one vanished away from my sight I became filled with wonder. The Mantra, however, which the Rishi gave, has lived in my memory at all times.

8. One day, sitting within my chamber I saw the sun rising. Desiring to bring the maker of day before me, I recollected the words of the Rishi.

9 Without any consciousness of the fault I committed, I called the deity from mere childishness. The deity, of a thousand rays, came before me.

10. He divided himself in two parts. With one portion he was in the sky, and with the other he stood on the Earth before me. With one he heated the worlds and with another he came to me.

11. He told me, while I was trembling at his sight, these words — Do you ask a boon of me' Bowing to him with my head I asked him to leave me.

12. He replied to me, saying,—'I cannot bear the idea of coming to you fruitlessly. I shall consume you as also that Brahmana who gave you the Mantra as a boon.

13 I wished to protect, from Surya's curse, the Brahmana who had done no evil. I, therefore, said,—'Let me have a son like you, O god'

14. The deity of thousand rays then entered me with his energy and stupefied me completely. He then said to me,— You will have a son,' and then returned to the firmament.

15 I continued to live in the inner apartments and desirous of saving the honour of my father, I cast into the waters my infant son named Karna who thus came into the world secretly.

16 Forsooth, through the grace of that god, I once more became a virgin, O twice-born one, even as the Rishi Durvasas had said to me.

17. Foolish that I am, although he knew me for his mother when he grew up, yet I did not try to acknowledge him. This burns me, O Rishi, as is well known to you.

18. Whether it is sinful or not so, I have told you the truth. You should, O holy one, satisfy the craving I feel for seeing that son of mine.

19 O foremost of ascetics, let this king also, O sinless one, obtain the fruition to-day of that desire of his which he cherishes in his bosom and which has become known to you'

20 Thus addressed by Kunti, Vyasa, that foremost of all persons, said to her in reply,—'Blessed be you, all that you have said to me will happen.

21. You are not to blame at all. You were restored to virginity. The deities are possessed of (Yoga) power. They are able enter human bodies.

22 There are many deities. They beget (offspring) by thought alone By word, by sight, by touch, and by sexual union, also they beget children. These are the five methods

23 You belong to the order of humanity You have no fault. Know this, O Kunti! Let the fever of your heart be removed.

24 Everything is becoming for those who are mighty Everything is pure for those that are mighty. Everything is meritorious for those that are mighty. Everything is their own for those who are mighty.'

CHAPTER XXXI.

(PUTRADARSHANA PARVA.)—Continued.

Vyasa said :—

1. Blessed be you, O Gandhari, you shall see your sons and brothers and friends and kinsmen along with your sires this night like men risen from sleep.

2 Kunti also shall see Karna, and she of Vadu's race shall see her son Abhimanyu Draupadi shall see her five sons, her fathers and her brothers also

3 Even before you had asked me, this was the thought in my mind. I entertained this purpose when I was urged to that effect by the king, by you, O Gandhari, and by Kunti!

4 You should not grieve for those foremost of men. They met with death on account of their devotion to the practices of Kshatriyas.

5 O faultless one, the work of the gods could not but be done It was for accomplishing that object that those heroes came down on earth. They were all portions of the celestials.

6—7. Gandharvas, Apsaras, Pishachas, Guhyakas and Rakshasas, many pure persons many individuals crowned with success (of penances), celestial Rishis, deities and Danavas, and heavenly Rishis of spotless character, met with death on the battle-field of Kurukshetra

8 It is heard that he who was the intelligent king of the Gandharvas, and named Dhritarashtra, took birth in the world of men as your lord Dhritarashtra

9 Know that Pandu of unfading glory and distinguished above all others originated from the Maruts Kshattri and Yudhisthira are both portions of the deity of Virtue.

10 Know that Duryodhana was Kali, and Shakuni was Dwapara O you of good features know that Dushasana and others were all Rakshasas.

11. Bhimasena of great power that chastiser of enemies, is from the Marutas Know that this Dhananjaya, the son of Pritha, is the ancient Rishi Nara

12—14 Hrishikesha is Narayana, and the twins are the Aswinis. That foremost of heat-giving ones, viz., Surya, having divided his body in two parts continued with one portion to give heat to the worlds and with another to live as Karna He who was born as the son of Arjuna, that gladdener of all, that heir of the properties of the Pandavas who was killed by six car-warriors (fighting together) was Soma. He was of born Subhadra Through Yoga-power he had divided himself in two parts.

15 Dhrishtadyumna who originated with Draupadi from the sacrificial fire, was an auspicious portion of the deity of Fire. Shikhandin was a Rakshasa

16. Know that Drona was a portion of Vrihaspati and that Drona's son was born of a portion of Rudra Know that Ganga's son Bhishma was one of the Vasus who became born as a man.

17. Thus, O you of great wisdom, the deities had taken birth as human beings, and after having accomplished their purposes have returned to the celestial region.

18. I shall to day, dispel that sorrow which is in the hearts of you all, about the return of these to the other world.

19 Do you all go towards the Bhagirathi Yo I will then see all those who have been killed on the field of battle.

Vaishampayana said :—

20 All the persons there present having heard the words of Vyasa, raised a loud leonine shout and then went towards the Bhagirathi.

21 Dhritarashtra with all his ministers and the Pandavas as also with all those foremost of Rishis and Gandharvas who had come there, started as directed.

22 Arrived at the banks of Ganga, that sea of men took up their abode as pleased them

23 The king, endued with great intelligence with the Pandavas, took up his abode in a desirable spot, along with the ladies and the aged ones of his household.

24 They passed that day as if it were a whole year, waiting for the approach of the night when they would see the deceased princes.

25 The Sun then reached the sacred mountain in the west and all those persons having bathed in the sacred river finished their evening rites.

CHAPTER XXXII.

(PUTRADARSHANA PARVA.)—Continued.

Vaishampayana said:—

1. When night came, all those persons, having finished their evening rites, approached Vyasa.

2 Dhritarashtra, with purified body and with mind solely directed towards it, sat there with the Pandavas and the Rishis in his company.

3 The royal ladies sat with Gandhari in a secluded spot. All the clergy and the inhabitants of the provinces ranged themselves according to their years.

4—5 Then the great ascetic, Vyasa, of great energy, bathing in the sacred waters of the Bhagirathi, summoned all the deceased warriors viz., those who had fought on the side of the Pandavas, those who had fought for the Kauravas, including highly blessed kings belonging to the various kingdoms.

6 At this, O Janamejaya, a deafening uproar was heard to arise from within the waters, resembling that which had formerly been heard of the armies of the Kurus and the Pandavas.

7. Then those kings, headed by Bhishma and Drona, with all their armies, arose by thousands from the waters of the Bhagirathi,

8 There were Virata and Drupada, with their sons and forces. There were the sons of Draupadi and the son of Subhadra, and Rakshasa Ghatotkacha.

9 There were Karna, Duryodhana and the powerful car-warrior Shakuni and the other children, possessed of great strength, of Dhritarashtra, headed by Dusshasana

10. There were the son of Jarasandha, Bhagadatta, Jarasandha of great energy, Bhurishravas, Shala Shalya and Vrishasena with his younger brother.

11 There were prince Lakshmana, and the son of Dhrishtadyumna and all the children of Sikhandin, and Dhrishtaketu with his younger brother.

12 There were Achala Vrishaka, the Rakshasa Alayudha, Valhika Somadatta, and the king Chekitana.

13 These and innumerable others, appeared on that occasion All of them rose from the waters of the Bhagirathi, with charming bodies.

14 Those kings appeared, each clad in that dress and equipt with that standard and that vehicle which he had while fighting on the field.

15 All of them were dressed in celestial vestments and all had brilliant earrings. They were free from all animosity and pride and divested of anger and jealousy.

16 Gandharvas sang their praises, and bards waited on them, chanting their deeds. Robed with celestial raiments and wearing celestial garlands, each of them was waited upon by bands of Apsaras.

17. At that time through the power of his penances, the great ascetic, the son of Satyavati, gratified with Dhritarashtra, gave him celestial vision.

18. Gifted with celestial knowledge and strength, the illustrious Gandhari beheld all her children as also all those who had been killed in battle.

19 All persons assembled there saw with steadfast gaze and hearts filled with wonder that amazing and inconceivable scene which made the hairs stand erect.

20. It looked like a high carnival of pleased men and women That wondrous scene looked like a picture painted on the canvass.

21. Dhritarashtra seeing all those heroes with their celestial vision attained through the favour of that sage, became full of joy, O chief of Bharata's race.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

Vaishampayana said —

1—2 Then those foremost of men, shorn of anger and jealousy, and purged of every sin met with another according to those high and auspicious ordinances which have been laid down by regenerate Rishis All of them were happy of hearts and looked like celestials moving in celestial regions.

3 Sons met with father or mother wives with husbands brother with brother, and friend with friend, O king.

4 The Pandavas full of joy, met with the powerful bowman Karna as also with the son of Subhadra, and the children of Draupadi.

5 With pleased hearts the son of Pandu approached Karna, O king, and became reconciled with him.

6. All those warriors, O chief of Bharata's race, meeting with one another through the favour of the great ascetic, became reconciled with one another.

7. Renouncing all unfriendliness, they became established on amity and peace. It was thus that all those foremost of men, viz, the Kauravas and other kinsmen of theirs as also with their children. They passed in great happiness the whole of that night.

9—12. Indeed, the Kshatriya warriors, on account of the happiness they experienced, considered that place as Heaven itself. There was no grief, no fear, no suspicion, no discontent, no reproach in that region, as those warriors, O king, met with one another on that night. Meeting with their sires and brothers and husbands and sons, the ladies renounced all grief and felt great joy. Having sported with one another thus for one night, those heroes and those ladies, embracing one another taking one another's leave, came back to the places they had come from. Indeed, that foremost of ascetics dismissed that collection of warriors.

13—15. Within the twinkling of an eye that large crowd disappeared in the very sight of all those persons. Those great persons, plunging into the sacred river Bhagirathi, proceeded, with their cars and standards to their respective abodes. Some went to the regions of the gods, some to the region of Brahman, some to the region of Varuna, and some to the region of Kuvera. Some among those kings went to the region of Surya.

16 Amongst the Rakshasas and Pishachas, some proceeded to the country of the Uttara-Kurus Others, moving delightfully, went in the company of the celestials.

17—20. Thus did all those great persons disappear with their vehicles and animals and with all their followers. After all of them had departed, the great sage, who was standing in the waters of the sacred rivers, viz, Vyasa of great virtue and energy that benefactor of the Kurus, then addressed those Kshatriya ladies who had become widows, and said these words,—'Let those amongst these foremost of women who are desirous of attaining to the regions acquired by their husbands cast away all idleness and quickly plunge into the sacred Bhagirathi'—Hearing these words of his, those foremost ladies, placing faith in them, took the permission of their father-in-law, and then plunged into the waters of the Bhagirathi.

21. Freed from human bodies, those chaste ladies then went, O king, with their husbands to the regions acquired by the latter.

22. Thus, those ladies of various conduct, devoted to their husbands, entering the waters of the Bhagirathi, became freed from their mortal bodies and attained to the companionship of their husbands in the regions acquired by them.

23. Possessed of celestial forms,—and adorned with celestial ornaments, and wearing celestial garments and garlands they proceeded to those regions where their husbands were living.

24. Endued with excellent conduct and many virtues, their anxieties all removed, they were seen to ride on excellent cars, and gifted with every accomplishment, they found those regions of felicity which were theirs by right.

25 Devoted to the duties of piety, Vyasa, at that time, becoming a giver of boons, granted to all the men there collected the fruition of the desires they respectively cherished.

26 People of various kingdoms, hearing of this meeting between the hallowed dead and living human beings, became highly pleased.

27. That man who duly listens to this discourse meets with everything that is dear to him. Indeed, he obtains all agreeable objects both in this world and in the next.

28—29 That man of learning and science that foremost of pious persons, who recites this narrative for the hearing of others wins great fame here and an auspicious end hereafter, as also a union with kinsmen and all desirable objects Such a man has not to work hard for his maintenance and meets with all sorts of auspicious objects in life. These are the rewards reaped by a person who gifted with devotion to Vedic studies and with penances, recites this narrative in the hearing of others.

30—31. Those persons who endued with good conduct, devoted to self-control, purged of all sins by the gifts they make, endued with sincerity, having tranquil souls, freed from falsehood and the desire of injuring others, adorned with faith, belief in the scriptures, and intelligence, listen to this wonderful book, surely attain to the highest end hereafter.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

(PUTRADARSHANA PARVA)—
Continued.

Sauti said :—

1 Hearing this story of the reappearance and departure of his forefathers, the highly intelligent king Janamejaya became greatly pleased

2 Filled with joy, he once more asked Vaishampayana on the subject of the reappearance of dead men, saying,— How is it possible for persons whose bodies have been destroyed to reappear in those very forms?

3 Thus asked that foremost of twice-born persons, viz, the disciple of Vyasa, that first of speakers possessed of great energy, thus answered Janamejaya

Vaishampayana said :—

4. This is certain, viz, that acts are never destroyed. Bodies O king, are born of acts, so also are features.

5. The great primal elements are eternal on account of the union with them of the Lord of all beings They exist with what is eternal Accordingly, they have no destruction when the non eternal are destroyed.

6 Acts done without exertion are true, and foremost, and yield real fruit The soul united, however, with such acts as require exertion for their performance, enjoys pleasure and pain.

7 Though united so yet it is a certain inference that the soul is never modified by them, like the reflection of creatures in a mirror. It is never destroyed.

8 As long as one's deeds are not exhausted (by enjoyment or endurance of their fruits good and bad), so long does he consider the body to be his ownself The man, however, whose acts have been exhausted without considering body to be self, takes the self to be something otherwise.

9 Various existent objects, attaining to a body, become united as one Those very objects become eternal to men of knowledge who understand the difference

10 In the Horse-Sacrifice, this Shruti is heard in the matter of the killing of the horse The certain possessions of embodied creatures, viz, their vital airs (and the senses etc) exist eternally even when they are borne to the other world

11. I shall, you what is beneficial if it be agreeable to you, O king You have, while employed in your sacrifices, heard of the celestial paths.

12. When preparations were made for any sacrifice of yours the celestials became beneficially inclined to you When, indeed, the celestials were thus disposed and came to your sacrifice, they were lords in the matter of the passage.

13 Therefore, the eternal ones (viz., Jivas), by adoring the deities in sacrifices, succeed in attaining to excellent ends. When the five primal elements are eternal, when the soul also is eternal, he called Purusha is equally so.

14 When such is the case, he who sees a creature as disposed to take various forms, is considered as having an erroneous understanding He who indulges in too much grief at separation, is, I think, a foolish person.

15 He who sees evil in separation should give up union By standing aloof, no unions are formed, and sorrow is renounced for sorrow in the world is born of separation

16 Only he who understands the distinction between body and self, and not another, becomes freed from the erroneous belief. He who knows the father viz self) attains to the highest understanding and becomes freed from error.

17 As regards creatures, they appear from an invisible state, and once more disappear into invisibleness I do not know him He also does not know me As regards myself, renunciation is not yet mine

18 He, who is not possessed of power, enjoys or endures the fruits of all his deeds in those bodies in which he does them.

19 If the act be a mental one, its fruits are enjoyed or endured mentally, if it be done with the body its results are to be enjoyed or endured in the body.

CHAPTER XXXV.

(PUTRADARSHANA PARVA)—
Continued.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. King Dhritarashtra had never seen his own sons. Getting eye-sight through the favour of the Rishi, he saw for the first time, O perpetuater of Kuru's race, those children of his who were very like his own self.

2. That foremost of men, viz, the Kuru king had learnt all the royal duties as also the Vedas and the Upanishadas, and had acquired certitude of understanding.

3. Highly wise Vidura acquired great success through the power of his penances Dhritarashtra also acquired great success for having met the ascetic Vyasa.

Janamejaya said:—

4. If Vyasa, disposed to grant me a boon, kindly show me my father in that form which he had, clad as he used to be clad, and as old as he was when he left this world, I may then believe all that you have told me

5 Such a sight will be most agreeable to me Indeed, I shall consider myself crowned with success I shall have gained a certainty of conclusion. O let my wish be satisfied through the favour of that foremost of Rishis!'

Sauti said —

6 After king Janamejaya had said these words, the highly energetic and intelligent Vyasa, showed his favour and brought Parikshit.

7. King Janamejaya saw his royal father possessed of great beauty, brought down from the celestial region, in the same form that he had and of the same age as he was (at the time of leaving this world)

8. The great Shamika also and his son Shringin, were similarly brought there All the counsellers and ministers of the king saw them

9 King Janamejaya, performing the final bath in his sacrifice became highly pleased He poured the sacred water on his father even as he caused it to be poured on himself.

10—11. Having performed the final bath, the king addressed the twice-born Astika who had originated from the race of the Yayavaras and who was the son of Jaratkaru, and said these words — O Astika, this sacrifice of mine is fraught with many wonderful incidents, since this my sire has been seen by me, he who has removed all my sorrows.

Astika said:—

12. The performer of that sacrifice in which the ancient Rishi, Dwaipayana Vyasa, that vast receptacle of penances is present, is sure, O foremost one of Kuru's race, to conquer both the worlds.

13 O son of the Pandavas you have heard a wonderful history. The snakes have been reduced into ashes and have followed the footsteps of your father.

14 Through your truthfulness, O king, Takshaka has with difficulty escaped a painful fate. The Rishis have been all adored. You have seen also the end that has been acquired by your great father.

15 Having heard this sin cleansing history you have acquired abundant merit. The knots of your heart have been untied through seeing this foremost of persons.

16 They who are the supporters of the wings of Virtue, they who are of good conduct and excellent disposition, they on seeing whom sins disappear, we should all bow to them.

Sauti said:—

17. Having heard this from that foremost of twice-born ones, king Janamejaya adored that Rishi, repeatedly honouring him in every way.

18 Knowing all duties, he then asked the Rishi Vaishampayana of undecaying glory about the sequel, O best of ascetics, of king Dhritarashtra's residence in the forest.

CHAPTER XXXVI.

(PUTRADARSHANA PARVA.)—

Continued.

Janamejaya said:—

1 Having seen his sons and grandsons with all their friends and followers what, indeed, did that king, viz, Dhritarashtra, and king Yudhishthira also, do?

Vaishampayana said:—

2 Seeing that highly wonderful spectacle, viz, the re-appearance of his children; the royal sage, Dhritarastra renounced his grief and returned to his hermitage.

3 The common people and all the great Rishis sent away by Dhritarashtra, came back to the places they respectively wished.

4 The great Pandavas accompanied by their wives and with a small retinue, went to the hermitage of the great monarch.

5—7 Then Satyavati's son, who was honoured by twice-born Rishis and all other persons, arrived at the hermitage, addressed Dhritarashtra, saying,—'O mighty armed Dhritarashtra, O son of Kuru's race, listen to what I say! You have heard various discourses from Rishis of great knowledge and sacred deeds, having penances for wealth and excellence of blood, knowledge of the Vedas and their branches, of piety and years, and of great eloquence.

8. Do not set your mind again on sorrow. He who is wise is never moved at ill luck. You have also heard the mysteries of the deities from Narada of celestial form.

9 Your children have all attained, through performance of Kshatriya practices to that auspicious end which is sanctified by weapons. You have seen how they move about at will in great happiness.

10 He is Yudhishthira of great intelligence is awaiting your permission with all his brothers and wives and kinsmen.

11. Do you send him away. Let him return to his kingdom and rule it! They have passed more than a month in thus living in the forest.

12. The station of sovereignty should always be well-guarded, O king! O you of Kuru's race, kingdom has many enemies!

13—14 Thus addressed by Vyasa of incomparable energy, the Kuru king, well versed in words summoned Yudhishthira and said to him —'O you having no enemies, blessings on you! Do you listen to me, with all your brothers! Through your grace, O king, grief no longer stands in my way.

15 I am living as happily, O son, with you here as if I were in the city of Hastinapore. With you as my protector, O learned one, I am enjoying all agreeable objects.

16 I have obtained from you all those services which a son renders to his sire I am highly pleased with you I have not the least dissatisfaction with you, O mighty-armed one Go now, O son, without waiting here any longer.

17. Meeting with you, my penances are being slackened. This my body, gifted with penances, I have been able to sustain only on account of my meeting with you.

18. These two mothers of yours, living now upon fallen leaves of trees, and observing vows similar to mine, will not live long.

19 We have seen Duryōdhana and others, who have become dwellers of the other world, through the power of Vyasa's penances and through (the merit of) this my meeting with you.

20. O sinless one, I have gained the object of my life. I now wish to practise the austerest of penances. You should grant permission.

21. The obsequial cake, the fame and achievements, and the family of our ancestors, now depend upon you entirely, O mighty-armed one, do you then go either to-morrow or this very day. Do not tarry, O son.

22 O chief of Bharata's race, you have repeatedly heard what the duties are of kings I do not see what more I can say to you I have no longer any necessity with you, O you of great power.'

Vaishampayana continued :—

23 King Yudhishthira replied to the (old) king who said so, saying,—'O you who know every rule of virtue, you should not cast me off in this way. I am guilty of no fault.

24. Let all my brothers and followers go as they like. With steadfast vows I shall wait upon you and upon these two mothers of mine.'

25 Gandhari then said to him,—'O son, let it not be so. Listen, the family of Kuru is now dependant on you. The obsequial cake also of my father-in-law depends on you Depart then, O son.

26 We have been sufficiently honoured and served by you You should do what the king says Indeed, O son you should obey the command of your sire

27 Thus addressed by Gandhari, king Yudhishthira, rubbing his eyes which were bathed in tears of affection, said these words bewailingly.

28 The king is renouncing me, as also the illustrious Gandhari. My heart, however, is bound to you How shall I, stricken as I am with sorrow, leave you.

29 I do not, however, at the same time, venture to obstruct your penances, O righteous lady! There is nothing higher than penances. It is by penances that one acquires the Supreme.

30 O queen, my heart no longer turns as of old towards kingdom. My mind is wholly set upon penances now.

31. The entire Earth is empty now. O auspicious lady, she does not please me any longer! Our kinsmen have been reduced in number. Our strength is no longer what it was before.

32 The Panchalas have been wholly rooted out. Only nominally they exist. O auspicious lady, I do not see any one who may assist at their re-establishment and growth.

33. All of them have been reduced to ashes by Drona on the field of battle

The remnant were killed by Drona's son at night.

34 The Chedis and the Matsyas who were our friends, no longer exist Only the tribes of the Vrishnis are all that remain, Vasudeva having kept them up

35 Seeing only the Vrishnis I wish to live. My desire of life, however, is due to my wish of acquiring merit and not riches or enjoyment. Do you cast auspicious looks upon us all. It will be difficult for us to see you

36—37. The king will commence to practice the most austere and unbearable of penances!' Hearing these words, that king of battle, the 'mighty-armed Sahadeva with eyes bathed in tears, addressed Yudhishthira, saying,—' O chief of Bharata race, I dare not leave my mother.

38—39 Do you return to the capital soon I shall practise penances, O powerful one!' Even here I shall reduce my body by penances engaged in serving the feet of the king and of these my mothers!' To Kunti, after embracing that mighty-armed hero, addressed him thus,—Depart, O son! Do not say so

40. Obey my behest! Do all of you go hence. Let peace be yours! Ye sons, let happiness be yours!

41. By your stay here, our penances will be impeded. Fettered by the ties of my affection for you, I shall fall off from my high penances.

42. Therefore, O son, leave us. Short is the period of our existence, O you of great power.

43. By these and various other speeches of Kunti, the minds of Sahadeva and king Yudhishthira were composed Those foremost ones of Kuru's race, having received the permission of their mother as also of the (old) monarch, saluted the latter and began to take his leave.

Yudhishthira said :—

44 Delighted by auspicious blessings, we shall return to the capital Indeed, O king, having received your permission we shall leave this hermitage freed from every sin.

45. Thus addressed by the great king Yudhishthira the just, that royal sage, viz, Dhritarashtra, blessed Yudhishthira and gave him permission

46 The king comforted Bhima, that foremost of all persons gifted with great strength. Gifted with great energy and great intelligence, Bhima showed his submissiveness to the king.

47. Embracing Arjuna and clasping those foremost of men viz, the twins also, and blessing them repeatedly, the Kuru king gave them permission to go.

48—49 They adored the feet of Gandhari and received her blessings also Their mother Kunti then smelt their heads, and dismissed them They then went round the king like calves, when prevented from sucking their dams Indeed they repeatedly walked round him, looking steadfastly at him

50 Then all the ladies of the Kaurava household, headed by Draupadi, adored their father in law according to the rites laid down in the scriptures, and departed.

51. Gandhari and Kunti embraced each of them, and blessing them bade them go. Their mothers-in law instructed them as to how they should behave themselves Getting leave, they then, departed, with their husband

52 Then loud sounds were heard, uttered by the charioteers that said,—'Yoke, yoke,'—as also of camels that grunted aloud and of horses that neighed briskly

53 King Yudhishthira, with his wives and troops and all his kinsmen, started for Hastinapura.

CHAPTER XXXVII.

(NARADAGAMANA PARVA.)—

Vaishampayana said :—

1. After two years had passed from the date of the return of the Pandavas (from the retreat of their sire), the celestial Rishi, Narada, O king, came to Yudhishthira.

2—3 The mighty-armed Kuru king, that foremost of speakers, viz, Yudhishthira, having duly adored him, made him take a seat After the Rishi had rested awhile, the king asked him (saying,—'It is after a long time that I see your holy self arrived at my court. Are you in peace and happiness, O learned Bhimasena?

4 What are those countries which you have passed through? What can I do for you? Do you tell me You are the foremost of twice born ones, and you are our highest refuge.

Narada said :—

5 I have not seen you for a long time. Hence it is that I have come to you from my asylum. I have seen many sacred waters, and the sacred rivers Ganga, also, O king.

Yudhishthira said :—

6 People living on the banks of Ganga report that the great Dhritarashtra is practising the austerest of penances

7. Have you seen him there? Is that perpetuater of Kuru's race in peace? Are Gandhari and Pritha, and the Suta's son Sanjaya also, in peace?

8. How, indeed, is that royal sire of mine doing? I wish to hear this, O holy one if you have seen the king.

Narada said —

9 Listen, O king, with calmness to me as I tell you what I have heard and seen in that asylum.

10 After your return from Kurukshetra, O delighter of the Kurus, your sire, O king, proceeded towards Gangadwara.

11 That intelligent king took with him his (sacred) fire Gandhari and his daughter-in-law Kunti as also Sanjaya of the Suta caste, and all the Yajakas.

12. Having penances for wealth, your sire set himself to the practice of severe austerities He held pebbles of stone in his mouth and had air alone for his food, and abstained altogether from speech.

13 Engaged in severe penances, he was adored by all the ascetics in the forest In six months the king was reduced to only a skeleton.

14 Gandhari lived on water alone while Kunti took a little food at intervals of a month Sanjaya, O Bharata, lived, eating a little every sixth day.

15 The sacred fire O monarch, (belonging to the Kuru king) was duly adored by the sacrificing assistants who were with him, with libations of clarified butter poured on it They did this whether the king saw the rite or not.

16 The king had no fixed dwelling He became a wanderer through those forests The two queens, as also Sanjaya, followed him

17 Sanjaya acted as the guide on even and uneven land The faultless Pritha, O king, became the eye of Gandhari

18 One day, that best of kings went to a spot on the margin of Ganga He then bathed in the sacred river and finishing his ablutions turned his face towards his hermitage

19 The wind rose high. A fierce wild fire set in. It began to burn that forest all around.

20. When the herds of animals were being burnt all around, as also the snakes which inhabited that region, herds of wild boars began to take themselves to the nearest marshes and waters.

21 When that forest was thus afflicted on all sides and such distress came upon all the living creatures living there, the king, who had taken no food, was incapable of moving or exerting himself at all.

22—23. Your two mothers also exceedingly emaciated could not move The king, seeing the fire approach him from all sides, addressed the Suta Sanjaya, that foremost of skillful charioteers, saying,—'Go, O Sanjaya, to such a place where the fire may not burn you.

24. 25 As regards ourselves, we shall allow our bodies to be destroyed by this fire and attain to the greatest end. To him, Sanjaya, that foremost of speakers, said —'O king this death, brought on by a fire that is not sacred, will prove calamitous to you I do not, however, see any means by which you can escape from this fire.

26—28 That which should next be done should be marked by you Thus addressed by Sanjaya the king once more said,—'This death cannot be calamitous to us, for we have left our home of our own accord Water, fire wind, and abstention from food are laudable for ascetics. Do you therefore, leave us, O Sanjaya, forthwith' Having said these words to Sanjaya, the king concentrated his mind.

29 Facing the east he sat down with Gandhari and Kunti Seeing him in that attitude Sanjaya walked round him

30 Gifted with intelligence Sanjaya said —'Do you concentrate your mind, O powerful one!' The son of a Rishi and himself endued with great wisdom the king acted as he was told

31 Governing all the senses he remained like a post of wood The highly blessed Gandhari and your mother Pritha too, remained in the same attitude

32 When your royal sire was overtaken by the wild fire Sanjaya his minister, succeeded in escaping from that fire

33 I saw him on the banks of Ganga in the midst of ascetics Gifted with great energy and great intelligence He bade them farewell and then started for the mountains of Himavat

34 Thus the great Kuru king met with his death, and it was thus that Gandhari and Kunti, your two mothers, also met with death, O monarch.

35. In course of my wanderings at will, I saw the bodies of that king and those two queens, O Bharata.

36 Many ascetics came to that asylum, having heard of the end of king Dhritarashtra. They did not at all grieve for that end of theirs.

37. There, O best of men, I heard all the details of how the king and the two queens, O son of Pandu, had been burnt.

38 O king of kings, you should not grieve for him. The monarch, of his own will, as also Gandhari and your mother, got that contact with fire.

Vaishampayana said :—

39 Hearing of the departure of Dhritarashtra from this world, the great Pandavas all bewailed.

40. Loud sounds of wailing were heard within the inner apartments of the palace The citizens also, hearing of the end of the old king, bewailed aloud.

41. 'O fie,' cried king Yudhishthira in great agony, raising his arms aloft. Thinking of his mother, he wept like a child All his brothers too, headed by Bhimasena, did the same.

42. Hearing that Pritha had met with such a fate, the royal ladies bewailed aloud in grief

43. All the people grieved upon hearing that the old king, who had become childless had been burnt to death and that the helpless Gandhari too had shared his fate

44 When those sounds of wailing ceased for a while king Yudhishthira the just stopping his tears by summoning all his patience, said these words.

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

(NARADAGAMANA PARVA)—

Continued.

Yudhishthira said :—

1—2. When such a fate overtook that great king who was engaged in austere penances despite the fact of his having such kinsmen as ourselves all alive, it seems to me O twice born one, that the end of human beings is difficult to guess. Alas, who would have thought that the son of Vichitravirya [illegible] thus burnt to death.

3. He had a hundred sons each gifted with mighty arms and possessed of great prosperity! The king himself had the strength of ten thousand elephants Alas, even he has been burnt to death in a wild fire.

4 Alas, he who had formerly been fanned with palm leaves by the fair hands of beautiful women, was fanned by vultures with their wings after he had been burnt to death in a wild fire.

5 He was formerly roused from sleep every morning by bands of Sutas and Magadhas had to sleep on the naked earth through the acts of my sinful self.

6 I do not grieve for the famous Gandhari who had been deprived of all her children. Observing the same vows as her husband, she has acquired those very regions which have become his.

7 I grieve, however, for Pritha who renouncing the blazing prosperity of her sons, became desirous of living in the forest

8 Fie on this sovereignty of ours, fie on our prowess, fie on the practices of Kshatriyas! Though alive, we are really dead.

9. O foremost of superior Brahmanas, the course of time is very subtle and difficult to understand, inasmuch as Kunti, casting off sovereignty, became desirous of living in the forest.

10. How is it that she who was the mother of Yudhishthira, of Bhima of Vijaya, was burnt to death like a hepless creature! Thinking of this I become stupefied,

11 In vain was the god of fire pleased at Khandava by Arjuna! Ingrate that he is forgetting that service, he has burnt to death the mother of his benefactor.

12 Alas how could that deity burn the mother of Arjuna! Putting on the guise of Brahmana he had formerly come to Arjuna, for begging a favour! Fie on the deity of fire! Fie on the celebrated success of Partha's arrows.

13—14 This is another incident, O holy one, which appears to me to be productive of greater misery, for that king, met with death by union with a fire that was not sacred! How could such a death overtake that royal sage of Kuru's family who, after having governed the whole Earth, was engaged in the practice of penances! In that great forest there were fires that had been sanctified with Mantras Alas, my father has made his departure from this world, coming in contact with an unsanctified fire.

15. I suppose that Pritha, emaciated and reduced to a form in which all her herves became visible, must have trembled in fear and cried aloud, saying,—O son Yudhishthira!—and awaited the terrible approach of the fire.

16 She must have also said,—O Bhima, save me from this danger!—when she, my mother, was surrounded on all sides by that dreadful fire.

17. Among all her sons, Sahadeva was her darling. Alas, that heroic son of Madravati did not rescue her!'

18. Hearing these bewailings of the king, all those persons who were present there began to weep, embracing each other. In fact, the five sons of Pandu were so stricken with grief that they resembled living creatures at the time of the dissolution of the universe.

19 The sound of lamentations uttered by those weeping heroes, filling the spacious chambers of the palace, escaped therefrom and penetrated the very sky.

CHAPTER XXXIX.

(NARADAGAMANA PARVA)

Concluded.

Narada said:—

1. The king has not been burnt to death by an unsanctified fire. I have heard this there. I tell you, O Bharata, such has not been the fate of Vaichitravirya.

2. We have heard that when the old king gifted with great intelligence and living on air alone entered the forest (after his return from Gangadwara), he caused his sacrificial fires to be duly ignited. Having performed his sacred rites therewith, he abandoned them all.

3 Then the Yajaka Brahmanas he had with him cast off those fires in a solitary part of the forest and went away as they liked, O foremost one of Bharata's race.

4. The fire that cast off grew in the forest. It then produced a general conflagration in the forest. This is what I have heard from the ascetics living on the banks of Ganga.

5 United with that (sacred) fire of his own, O chief of the Bharatas, the king, as I have already said to you, met with death on the banks of Ganga.

6 O sinless one, this is what the ascetics have told me, those, viz., whom I saw on the banks of sacred Bhagirathi, of Yudhishthira.

7. Thus, O lord of Earth, king Dhritarashtra coming into contact with his own sacred fire, departed from this world and attained to that high end that has been his.

8 Through service rendered by her to her seniors, your mother, O king, has acquired very great success. There is not the slightest doubt of this.

9 You should, O king of kings, now perform the rites of water to their honour, with all your brothers. Let, therefore, the necessary steps be taken.

Vaishampayana said:—

10. Then that lord of Earth, that foremost of men, that upholder of the burthens of the Pandavas, went out, accompanied by all his brothers as well as the ladies of his household.

11. The inhabitants of the city as also those of the provinces, actuated by their loyalty, also went out. They all proceeded towards the banks of Ganga, every one clad in only a single piece of cloth.

12. Then all those foremost of men, having plunged into the river, placed Yuyutsu at their head, and began to offer oblations of water to the great king. And they also gave similar oblations to Gandhari and Pritha, naming each separately and mentioning their families.

13 Having finished those rites which purify the living, they returned but without entering their capital lived outside of it. They also sent a number of trusted people well conversant with the ordinances relating to the cremation of the dead, to Gangadwara where the old king had been burnt to death.

14. The king, having rewarded those men beforehand, commanded them to perform those rites of cremation which the bodies of Dhritarashtra and Gandhari and Kunti still awaited.

15. On the twelfth day, the king, properly purified, duly performed the Shraddhas of his deceased relations, which were marked by profuse gifts.

16. Referring to Dhritarashtra, Yudhishthira made many gifts of gold and silver, of kine and costly beds.

17. Uttering the names of Gandhari and Pritha, the king, gifted with great energy, made many excellent gifts.

18 Every man received what thing he wished and as much of it as he wished. Beds and foods, and cars and conveyances, and jewels and gems, and other wealth were given away profusely.

19 Indeed, the king, referring to his two mothers, gave away cars and conveyances, dresses and coverlets, various kind of food, and female slaves adorned with various ornaments

20 Having thus made many kinds of gift in profusion that king then entered his capital named Hastinapore.

21 Those men men who had gone to the banks of Ganga at the command of the king having disposed of (by cremation) the remains of the king and the two queens, returned to the city.

22 Having duly honoured those remains with garlands and scents of various kinds and disposed of them, they informed Yudhisthira of the accomplishment of their task.

23. The great Rishi Narada, having comforted king Yudhishthira of righteous soul went away to where he liked.

24 Thus did king Dhritarashtra make his departure from this world after having passed three years in the forest and fifteen years in the city.

25 Having lost all his children in battle, he had made many gifts in honour of his kinsmen, relatives, and friends, his brethren and own people

26 King Yudhishthira, after the death of his uncle became very cheerless. Deprived of his kinsmen and relatives he somehow bore the burthen of sovereignty.

27. One should listen with attention to this Ashramavasika Parvan, and having heard it recited one should feed Brahmanas with Havishya honouring them with scents and garlands.

MAUSALA PARVA.

CHAPTER I.

Having saluted Narayana and Nara the best of male beings as also Sarasvati the Goddess of Learning, let us cry success.

Vaishampayana said :—

1 When the thirty sixth year (after the battle) arrived the delighter of the Kurus, viz., Yudhishthira, saw many unusual portents

2 Winds, dry and strong, and showering gravels, blew from all sides Birds began to wheel, making circles from right to left.

3 The great rivers ran in opposite courses The horizon on every side seemed to be always covered with fog. Meteors, showering coals, dropped on the Earth from the sky.

4 The Sun's disc, O king, seemed to be always covered with dust. At its rise, the Sun was shorn of splendour and seemed to be crossed by headless trunks.

5 Terrible circles of light were seen every day around both the Sun and the Moon These circles showed three colors Their edges seemed to be black and rough and ashy red in color.

6 These and many other omens, foreshadowing fear and danger, were seen, O king, and struck the hearts of men with anxiety.

7 A little while after the Kuru king Yudhishthira heard of the wholesale destruction of the Vrishnis on account of the iron bolt.

8 The son of Pandu, hearing that only Vasudeva and Rama had escaped alive, summoned his brothers and consulted with them as to what they should do

9 Meeting with one another, they became greatly stricken with sorrow upon hearing that the Vrishnis had met with destruction through the Brahmana's rod of punishment.

10. Those heroes could not believe the death of Vasudeva, like the drying up of the ocean In fact, they could not believe the destruction of the holder of Sharnga.

11. Informed of the incident about the iron bolt, the Pandavas became stricken with grief and sorrow In fact, they sat down, utterly cheerless and stricken with blank despair.

Janamejaya said :—

12 Indeed, O holy one, how was it that the Andhakas along with the Vrishnis, and those great car-warriors, viz., the Bhojas met with destruction before the very eyes of Vasudeva?

Vaishampayana said :—

13 When the thirty-sixth year arrived (after the great battle) a great calamity overtook the Vrishnis Moved by Time, they all met with destruction on account of the iron bolt.

Janamejaya said :—

14 Cursed by whom did those heroes, viz., the Vrishnis, Andhakas and the Bhojas met with destruction? O foremost of twice-born persons, do you fully explain all this to me

Vaishampayana said :—

15 One day, the Vrishni heroes numbering Sarana amongst them, saw Vishwamitra and Kanwa and Narada arrived at Dwaraka

16—17 Afflicted by the rod of punishment held by the celestials, those heroes, causing Shamva to be disguised like a woman, approached those ascetics and said—'This one is the wife of Vabhru of great energy who is desirous of having a son Ye Rishis do you know for certain what this one will produce?'

18—19 Hear now, O king, what those ascetics, attempted to be thus imposed on, said,—'This heir of Vasudeva, by name Shamva, will produce a dreadful iron bolt for the destruction of the Vrishnis and the Andhakas.

20 O wicked and cruel ones, intoxicated with pride, through that iron bolt you will become the exterminators of your family with the exception of Rama and Janarddana

21. The blessed hero armed with the plough will enter the ocean, renouncing his body, while a hunter of the name of Jara will pierce the great Krishna while lying on the ground.'

22 Attempted to be deceived by those wicked ones, those ascetics, with eyes red in anger, looked at each other and uttered those words Having said so they then went to see Keshava.

23 The destroyer of Madhu, informed of what had occurred, summoned all the Vrishnis and told them of it. Gifted with great intelligence and fully acquainted with what the end of his family would be, he simply said that that which was destined would surely take place.

24 Hrishikesha having said so entered his palace. The Lord of the universe did not wish to ordain otherwise

25 When the next day came, Shamva actually produced an iron bolt through which all the individuals in the family of the Vrishnis and the Andhakas became reduced to ashes.

26. Indeed, for the destruction of the Vrishnis and the Andhakas, Shamvas brought forth, through that curse, a dreadful iron bolt that looked like a huge messenger of death. The fact was duly reported to the king.

27. In great distress of mind, the king (Ugrasena) caused that iron bolt to be reduced into fine powder Men were engaged, O king, to cast that powder into the sea.

28—30. At the command of Ahuka, of Janardana, of Rama, and of great Vabhru it was, again, proclaimed throughout the city, that from that day, among all the Vrishnis and the Andhakas no one should manufacture wines and intoxicating liquors of any kind, and that whoever would secretly manufacture wines and spirits should be impaled alive with all his kinsmen.

31. Through fear of the king, and knowing that it was the order of Rama also of unimpeachable deeds, all the citizens bound themselves by a rule and abstained from manufacturing wines and spirits.

CHAPTER II.

(MAUSALA PARVA.)—Continued.

Vaishampayana said:—

1. While the Vrishnis and the Andhakas were thus trying (to avoid the impending calamity), the embodied form of Time (Death) every day wandered about their houses.

2 He looked like a man of terrible and fierce aspect. Of bald head, he was black and of twany color. Sometimes he was beheld by the Vrishnis as he peered into their houses.

3 The powerful bowmen among the Vrishnis shot hundreds and thousands of arrows at him but none of these succeeded in piercing him, for he was none else than the Destroyer of all creatures.

4 Day by day strong winds blew, and many were the evil omens which arose, awful and foreboding the destruction of the Vrishnis and the Andhakas

5. The streets swarmed with rats and mice Earthen pots showed cracks or broken from no visible cause At night, the rats and mice ate away the hair and nails of sleeping men.

6 Sharikas chirped sitting within the houses of the Vrishnis The noise made by those birds ceased not for even a short while by day or by night.

7. The Sarashas were heard to imitate the hooting of the owl, and goats imitated the cries, O Bharata, of jackals.

8 Many birds appeared, moved by Death, which were pale of color, but that had legs red of hue Pigeons were seen to always disport in the houses of the Vrishnis.

9 Asses were born of kine, and elephants of mules Cats were born of bitches, and mouse of the mungoose.

10 The Vrishnis, committing sinful deeds, were not seen to feel any shame They showed disregard for Brahmanas and the departed manes and the celestials.

11. They insulted and humiliated their preceptors and elders Only Rama and Janarddana acted differently Wives deceived their husbands, and husbands deceived wives.

12 Fires, when ignited, cast their flames towards the left Sometimes they threw out flames whose color was blue and red.

13 The Sun, whether when rising or setting over that city, seemed to be sucrounded by headless trunks of human beings.

14 In cook rooms, upon food that was clean and well boiled, were seen, when it was served out for eating, innumerable worms of various kinds.

15 When Brahmanas, receiving gifts, blessed the day or the hour fixed for this (or that undertaking) or when great men were engaged in silent recitations, the heavy tread was heard of many men running about but no one could be seen to whom the sound of such sound could be ascribed.

16 The constellations were repeatedly seen to be struck by the planets. None amongst the Yadavas could, however, see the constellation of his birth

17 When the Panchajanya was blown in their houses, asses of dissonant and awful voice, brayed aloud from all sides.

18 Seeing these signs which showed the perverse course of Time, and seeing that the day of the new moon coincided with the thirteenth (and the fourteenth) lunation, Hrishikesha, summoning the Yadavas, said to them these words:—

19 'The fourteenth lunation has been made the fifteenth by Rahu once more. Such a day had appeared at the time of the great battle of the Bharatas. It has once more appeared, it seems, for our destruction.'

20—21. The destroyer of Kesin, viz., Janardana, thinking upon the omens that time showed, understood that the thirty-sixth year had come, and that what Gandhari, burning with grief on account of the death of her sons, and deprived of all her kinsmen, had said was about to take place.

22 'The present is exactly similar to that time which Yudhishthira had marked at sight of those dreadful omens which appeared when the two armies were arranged in battle-order

23 Vasudeva, having said so tried to bring about those occurrences which would make Gandhari's words true. That chastiser of enemies commanded the Vrishnis to make a pilgrimage to some sacred water

24 The messengers immediately proclaimed at the command of Keshava that the Vrishnis should make a journey to the sea-coast for bathing in the sacred waters of the ocean.

CHAPTER III.

(MAUSALA PARVA.)
Continued.

Vaishampayana said:—

1. At that time the Vrishni ladies dreamt every night that a woman of black color and white teeth, entering their abodes, laughed aloud and ran through Dwaraka, snatching from them the auspicious threads on their wrists.

2 The men dreamt that dreadful vultures, entering their houses and fire-chambers, gorged themselves on their bodies.

3 Their ornaments and umbrellas and standards and armour were seen to be taken away by dreadful Rakshasas

4 Before the very eyes of the Vrishnis, the discus of Krishna, given by Agni, made of iron and having its nave composed of hardest adamant, ascended into the sky.

5 In the very sight of Daruka, the excellent car of Vasudeva, effulgent like the sun, and properly equipt, was taken away by the horses yoked to it. Those foremost of horses, numbering four, and fleet like the mind, fled away, dragging the car after them along the surface of the ocean,

6 The two great standards of Krishna's car and Valadeva's car, having the emblems of Garuda and palmyra, which were reverently adored those two heroes, were taken away by Apsaras who, day and night, called upon the Vrishnis and the Andhakas to start on a pilgrimage to some sacred water.

7. When these omens were seen and heard those foremost of men, viz., the powerful car-warriors of the Vrishnis and the Andhakas, became desirous of setting out, with their whole families, on a pilgrimage to some sacred water,

8 They prepared various kinds of viands and edibles and various kinds of wines and meat.

9 The troops of the Vrishnis and the Andhakas, blazing with beauty and gifted with fierce energy, then set out from the city on cars and horses and elephants

10 The Yadavas then, with their wives, proceeded to Prabhasa and took up their residence there each in the (temporary) habitation which was assigned to him and all having profuse provisions consisting of edibles and drink

11 Hearing that they had taken up their abode on the sea coast, Uddhava, the wisest of men, who was, besides, well versed in Yoga, went there and took their leave (for departing)

12 Krishna, with joined hands, saluted Uddhava, and seeing him bent on departing (from the world) and knowing that the destruction of the Vrishnis was nigh, did not feel any disposition to prevent him.

13 The powerful car-warriors among the Vrishnis and the Andhakas, whose hour had come, then saw Uddhava proceed on his great journey, filling the entire sky with his effulgence.

14 The Vrishnis, mixing with wine the food that had been cooked for great Brahmanas, gave it away to monkeys and apes.

15 Those heroes of fierce energy then began to revel with drink, at Prabhasa The entire field echoed with the blare of hundreds of trumpets and abounded with actors and dancers.

16. In the very sight of Krishna, Rama began to drink, with Kritavarman, Yuyudhana and Gada and Vabhru also did the same.

17—18. Then Yuyudhana, inebriated with wine, derisively laughing at and insulting Kritavarman in the midst of that assembly, said,—'What Kshatriya is there who, armed with weapons, will kill men locked in the embraces of sleep and, therefore, already dead? Hence, O son of Hridika, the Yadavas will never tolerate what you have done.'

19 When Yuyudhana had said these words, Pradyumna, that foremost of car-warriors, applauded them expressing his disregard for the son of Hridika.

20. Greatly enraged at this, Kritavarman, emphasising his disregard for Satyaki by pointing to him with his left hand, said these words —

21. 'Professing yourself to be a hero, how could you so cruelly kill the armless Bhurishravas who, on the field of battle, sat fasting.

22. Hearing these words of his, Keshava, that destroyer of hostile heroes, giving way to anger, cast an angry look at Kritavarman

23 Then Satyaki informed the destroyer of Madhu as to how Kritavarman had behaved towards Satrajit for taking away from him the celebrated gem Syamantaka.

24 Hearing the narrative, Satyabhama, giving way to anger and tears, approached Keshava, and sitting on his lap increased his anger (for Kritavarman).

25—27 Then rising up in anger, Satyaki said,— I swear to you by truth that I shall soon cause this one to follow the five sons of Draupadi, and of Dhrishtadyumna and Sikhandin,—they, viz, who were killed by this sinful wretch, while they were asleep, with the help of Drona's son O you of slender waist, Kritavarman's period of life and fame has come to an end'

28 Having said these words, Satyaki rushed at Kritavarman and cut off his head with a sword in the very sight of Keshava

29 Yuyudhana, having performed this feat, began to strike down others there present Hrishikesha ran to prevent him from doing further mischief.

30 At that time, however, O king, the Bhojas and Andhakas moved by the perverseness of the hour that had come upon them, all became as one man and surrounded the son of Shini

31 Janarddana of great energy, knowing the character of the hour stood unmoved without giving way to anger, seeing those heroes rushing in anger at Satyaki from every side

32 Urged by fate and inebriated with drink, they began to strike Yuyudhana with the pots from which they had been eating.

33. When the son of Shini was being thus assaulted, Rukmini's son became greatly enraged He rushed forward for rescuing Satyaki who was engaged with the Bhojas and the Andhakas.

34 Gifted with might of arms and wealth of energy, those two heroes acted with great courage. But as the odds were overwhelming both of them were killed before the very eyes of Krishna

35 Seeing his own son, and the son of Shini too, killed the delighter of the Vrishnis took up, in anger, a handful of the Eraka grass which grew there.

36 That handful of grass became a terrible bolt of iron gifted with the energy of the thunder-bolt With it Krishna destroyed all those who came before him.

37 Then the Andhakas and the Bhojas, the Shaineyas and the Vrishnis, urged by time, struck one another in that dreadful fight

38 Indeed, O king whoever amongst them took up in anger a few blades of the Eraka grass, these, in his hands, became soon converted into a thunder-bolt, O powerful one.

39 Every blade of grass then was seen to be converted into a terrible iron bolt

All this, know, O king, was due to the curse imprecated by Brahmanas.

40 He who hurled a blade of grass saw that it pierced through even such things as were utterly impenetrable In fact, every blade was seen to become a dreadful bolt having the force of thunder

41. Son killed father, and father killed son O Bharata! Inebriated with wine, they rushed and fell upon one another.

42 The Kukuras and the Andhakas met with destruction like insects rushing at a burning fire As they were thus being destroyed no one among them thought of escaping by flight.

43 Knowing that the hour of destruction had come, the mighty-armed Keshava stood there, seeing everything. Indeed, the destroyer of Madhu stood, raising a bolt of iron formed of a blade of grass

44 Seeing that Shamva was killed, as also Charudeshna and Pradyumna and Aniruddha, Madhava became filled with anger.

45 Seeing Gada lying dead on the ground, his anger became enhanced The holder of Sharnga and the discus and the mace then rooted the Vrishnis and the Andhakas.

46 Hear, O king, what that conqueror of hostile towns, viz., Vabhru of great energy and Daruka, then said to Krishna,

47 'O holy one, a very large number of men has been killed by you Turn now to where Rama has gone! We wish to go there where he has gone.'

CHAPTER IV.

(MAUSALA PARVA)—Continued.

Vaishampayana said:—

1. Then Daruka, Keshava and Vabhru left that place following Rama They saw that hero of great energy sitting thoughtfully, reclining his back against a tree, in a solitary place

2. Finding Rama of great soul, Krishna ordered Daruka, saying,—'Going to the Kurus, inform Partha of this great carnage of the Yadus.

3 Let Arjuna come here speedily, hearing of the destruction of the Yadavas through the Brahmanas' curse' Thus addressed Daruka, deprived of his senses by sorrow, proceeded on a car to the capital of the Kurus.

4 After Daruka had departed, Keshava, seeing Vabhru waiting on him told him these words:—'Do you go speedily for protecting the ladies Let not robbers do them any injury, tempted by the riches.

5 Thus ordered by Keshava, Vabhru, still helpless with wine but cheerless at the destruction of his kinsmen, went away. He had rested for a while by the side of Keshava, but as soon as he had gone to a distance, the iron-bolt, attached to a mallet in the hands of a hunter, suddenly sprang of itself upon that solitary survivor of the Yadava family and killed him who also had been included in the curse of the Brahmanas.

6. Seeing Vabhru killed, Keshava of great energy addressed his elder brother and said,—'Do you, O Rama, wait for me here till I put the ladies under the care of kinsmen.'

7 Entering the city of Dwaravati, Janardana said these words to his father,—'Do you protect all the ladies of our house, till Dhananjaya comes.

8. At the skirts of the forest Rama is waiting for me. I shall meet him to day. This great destruction of the Yadus has been seen by me even as I beheld before the carnage of those Kshatriyas who were the foremost ones of Kuru's race.

9. It is impossible for me to see this city of the Yadavas without the Yadus beside me Know that going to the forest I shall practise penances with Rama in my company.'

10 Having said these words, Krishna touched the feet of his father with his head, and quickly left him Then a loud wail of sorrow arose from the ladies and children of his house.

11 Hearing that loud sound of wailing uttered by the weeping ladies, Keshava returned and said to them—Arjuna will come here. That foremost of men will relieve you of your sorrow.

12 Proceeding then to the forest, Keshava saw Rama sitting in a solitary place He also saw that Rama had set himself to Yoga and that from out his mouth was issuing a powerful snake.

13 The color of that snake was white. Leaving the human body, that great Naga, of a thousand heads and having a form as large as that of a mountain, endued besides with red eyes proceeded along the way leading to the ocean.

14—16 Ocean himself, and many celestial snakes, and many sacred Rivers were there, for receiving him with honor. There were Karkotaka, Vasuki, Takshaka, Prithushravas, and Varuna, Kunjara, Mishri, Shankha and Kumuda and Pundarika, and the great Dhritarashtra, and Hrada and Kratha and Shitikantha of fierce energy, and Chakramanda and Atishanda, and that foremost of Nagas called Dhumikha, and Amvarisha, and king Varuna himself, O king. Advancing forward and offering him the Arghya and water to wash his feet, and with various other rites, they all adored the powerful Naga and saluted him by making the usual enquiries.

17 After his brother had thus gone from the (human) world, Vasudeva of celestial vision, who was fully acquainted with the end of all things, wandered for sometime in that solitary forest thoughtfully. Gifted with great energy he then sat down on the naked earth.

18 He had thought before this of everything which had been foreshadowed by the words uttered by Gandhari in former days. He also recollected the words that Durvasas had spoken at the time his body was smeared by that Rishi with the residue of the Payasa he had eaten.

19 The high-souled one, thinking of the destruction of the Vrishnis and the Andhakas, as also of the previous destruction of the Kurus, concluded that the hour (for his own departure from the world) had come. He then controlled his senses (in Yoga)

20 Knowing the truth of every topic, Vasudeva, though he was the Supreme Deity, wished to die for removing all doubts and establishing a certainty of results, simply for upholding the three worlds and for making the words of Atri's son true.

21 Having controlled all his senses, speech, and mind, Krishna laid himself down in high Yoga A fierce hunter of the name of Jara then came there, for finding a deer.

22 The hunter mistaking Keshava, who was stretched on the earth in high Yoga, for a deer, pierced at him at the heel with an arrow and quickly came to that spot for capturing his prey.

23 Coming up Jara saw a man dressed in yellow robes, rapt in Yoga, and gifted with many arms Considering himself an offender, and filled with fear, he touched the feet of Keshava

24 The high-souled one comforted him and then ascended upwards, filling the entire sky with splendour.

25 When he reached the celestial region, Vasava and the twin Ashwins and Rudra and the Adityas and the Vasus and the Vishwedevas, and Munis and Siddhas and many foremost ones among the Gandharvas, with the Apsaras, advanced to receive him.

26 Then O king, the illustrious Narayana of dreadful energy, the Creator and Destroyer of all,—that preceptor of Yoga—filling Heaven with his splendour, reached his own inconceivable region.

27 Krishna then met the deities and (celestial) Rishis and Charanas, O king, and the foremost ones among the Gandharvas and many beautiful Apsaras and Siddhas and Saddhyas All of them bending in humility, adored him.

28 The celestials all saluted him, O monarch, and many foremost of ascetics and Rishis adored him as the Lord of all, The Gandharvas waited on him singing his praises, and Indra also joyfully praised him.

CHAPTER V.

(MAUSALA PARVA)—Continued

Vaishampayana said :—

1. Meanwhile Daruka, going to the Kurus and seeing those powerful car-warriors, viz, the sons Pritha, informed them of how the Vrishnis had killed one another with iron bolts.

2 Hearing that the Vrishnis along with the Bhojas and Andhakas and Kukuras had all been killed, the Pandavas, burning with grief, became highly moved.

3 Then the Arjuna, the dear friend of Keshava, bidding them farewell, started for seeing his maternal uncle, He said that destruction would soon overtake everything

4 Proceeding to the city of the Vrishnis with Daruka in his company, O powerful king, that hero saw that the city of Dwaraka looked like a woman reft of her husband.

5 Those ladies who had before this, the very Lord of the universe for their protector, were now lordless Seeing that Partha, had come for protecting them, they all bewailed aloud

6 Sixteen thousand ladies had been wedded to Vasudeva. Indeed, as soon as they beheld Arjuna arrive, they uttered a loud cry of sorrow.

7 As soon as the Kuru prince met those beautiful ladies deprived of the protection of Krishna and of their sons as well he was unable to look at them, his vision being obstructed by tears.

8—10. The Dwaraka-river had the Vrishnis and the Andhakas for its water, horses for its fishes, cars for its rafts, the sound of musical instruments and the rattle of cars for its waves, houses and mansions and public squares for its lakes. Gems and precious stones were its moss. The walls of adamant were the garlands of flowers that floated on it. The streets and roads were the strong currents running in eddies along its surface. The great open squares were the large lakes in its course. Rama and Krishna were its two mighty alligators. That agreeable river now seemed to Arjuna to be the dreadful Vaitarani bound up with Time's net.

11. Indeed, the son of Vasava, gifted with great intelligence, beheld the city to look even thus, left as it was of the Vrishni heroes.

12. Shorn of beauty, and perfectly cheerless, it presented the aspect of a lotus flower in the season of winter. Seeing the sight that Dwaraka presented, and seeing the numerous wives of Krishna, Arjuna bewailed aloud with eyes bathed in tears and fell down on the earth.

13. Then Satya the daughter of Satrajit, and Rukmini too, O king, fell down beside Dhananjaya and bewailed.

14. Raising him then they caused him to be seated on a golden seat. The ladies sat around that great one, giving expression to their feelings.

15. Praising Govinda and talking with the ladies, the son of Pandu comforted them and then proceeded to see his maternal uncle.

CHAPTER VI.

(MAUSALA PARVA)—Continued.

Vaishampayana said:—

1. The Kuru prince saw the heroic and great Anakadundubhi lying on the ground and burning with grief on account of his sons.

2. The broad chested and mighty-armed son of Pritha more afflicted than his uncle with his eyes bathed in tears, touched his uncle's feet, O Bharata.

3. The mighty-armed Anakadundubhi wished to smell the head of his sister's son but could not do it, O destroyer of enemies.

4. The old man of mighty-arms, deeply afflicted, embraced Partha with his arms and wept aloud, remembering his sons, brothers, grandsons, daughter's sons, and friends.

Vasudeva said:—

5. Without seeing those heroes, O Arjuna, who had subjugated all the kings of the Earth and the Daityas a hundred times, I am still alive! I see, that I cannot die!

6. Those two heroes who were the dear disciples of Arjuna, and who were much respected by him, alas, O Partha, through their fault, the Vrishnis have been destroyed.

7—8. Those two who were considered as Atirathas amongst the foremost of the Vrishnis, and referring to whom in course of conversation you were wont to indulge in pride, and who, O chief of Kuru's race, were ever dear to Krishna himself,—alas, those two, O Dhananjaya, have been the chief causes of the destruction of the Vrishnis.

9. I do not censure the son of Shini or the son of Hridika, O Arjuna! I do not censure Akrura or the son of Rukmini. No doubt, the curse (of the Rishis) is the sole cause.

10—12. How is it that that lord of the universe, viz., the destroyer of Madhu, who had shown his prowess for killing Keshin, Kansa, and Chaidya swelling with pride, and Ekalavya the son of the king of the Nishadas, and the Kalingas and the Magadhas and the Gandharas and the king of Kashi, and many rulers assembled together in the midst of the desert, many heroes belonging to the East and the South, and many kings of the mountainous regions—alas, how could he remain indifferent to such a calamity as the curse denounced by the Rishis?

13. Yourself, Narada, and the Munis, knew him to be the eternal and sinless Govinda, the Deity of unfading glory.

14. Alas being powerful Vishnu himself, he saw without interfering, the destruction of his kinsmen! My son must have himself allowed all this to happen.

15. He was the Lord of the universe. He did not however, wish to falsify the words of Gandhari and the Rishis, O destroyer of enemies.

16. Before the very eyes O hero, your grandson, who had been killed by Ashwatthaman, was revived through his energy.

17—18 That friend however, of yours did not wish to protect his kinsmen Seeing his sons and grandsons and brothers and friends lying dead, he said to me these words, O Bharata's race,—The destruction of this our family has at last come.

19 Vibhatsu will come to this city, viz, Dwaravati Tell him what has taken place viz, this great destruction of the Vrishnis

20 I have no doubt that as soon as he will hear of the destruction of the Yadus, that hero of mighty energy will come here forthwith.

21. Know, O father, that I am Arjuna and Arjuna is myself. That should be done by you which he would say.

22 The son of Pandu will do what is best for the women and the children. Even he will perform your funeral rites.

23 This city of Dwaravati, after Arjuna's departure will, with its walls and edifices, be speedily swallowed up by the ocean

24 As for myself, retiring to some sacred place, I shall pass my time with the intelligent Rama in my company, observing strict vows all the while.

25 Having said these words to me, Hrishikesha of inconceivable prowess, leaving me with the children, has gone away some where which I do not know.

26 Thinking of those two great brothers of yours as also of the dreadful destruction of my kinsmen, I have abstained from all food, and am emaciated with grief.

27 I shall neither eat, nor live By good luck you meet me, O son of Pandu Do you accomplish all, O Partha, that Krishna has said

28 This kingdom, with all these women, and all the wealth here, is your now, O son of Pritha! As for myself, O destroyer of foes, I shall renounce my life however dear it may be.

CHAPTER VII.

(MAUSALA PARVA.)—

Continued.

Vaishampayana said:—

1—2. That scorcher of enemies, viz, Vibhatsu, thus addressed by his maternal uncle, replied, with great cheerlessness of heart, to Vasudeva who was equally cheerless, saying,—'O uncle, I am unable to look at this Earth when she is reft of that hero of Vrishni's race and those my other kinsmen.

3 The king and Bhimasena and Sahadeva and Nakula and Yajnasena, are of the same mind with myself, in this matter.

4 The time has come for the departure of the king also. Know this that the hour of our departure too is near You are the foremost of those who are well conversant with the course of time.

5 I shall, however, O chastiser of enemies, first remove to Indraprastha the women of the Vrishni race as also the children and the aged'

6 Having said so to his uncle, Arjuna, next addressed Daruka saying—'I wish to see forthwith the chief officers of the Vrishni heroes.'

7 Having uttered these words, the heroic Arjuna, grieving for those great car-warriors, entered the great hall of the Yadavas, called Sudharma.

8 When he had taken his seat there, all the citizens, including the Brahmanas, and all the ministers of state, came and stood surrounding him.

9 Then Partha, more grieved than they, addressed those grieving and cheerless citizens and officers who were, more dead than alive, and said these words which were well suited to the occasion.

10 'I shall take away with me the remnants of the Vrishnis and the Andhakas! The sea will soon engulf this city.

11. Equip all your cars and place on them all your riches This Vajra will be your king at Shakraprastha.

12. On the seventh day from this at sunrise, we shall start Make your preparations immediately.'

13 Thus addressed by Pritha's son of pure deeds all of them hastened their preparations with eagerness for securing their safety

14 Arjuna passed that night in the palaces of Keshava He was suddenly overwhelmed with great sorrow and stupefaction.

15 When morning dawned Vasudeva of great energy and prowess attained, through the help of Yoga, to the highest end

16 A loud and heart-rendering sound of wailing was heard in Vasudeva's palace, uttered by the weeping ladies.

17. They were seen with dishevelled hair and divested of ornaments and garlands. Beating their breasts with their hands, they indulged in heart rendering lamentati

18 Those foremost of women, viz, Devaki and Bhadra and Rohini and Madira threw themselves on the bodies of their lord

19 Then Partha caused the body of his uncle to be carried out on a rich vehicle borne on the shoulders of men

20 It was followed by all the citizens of Dwaraka and the people of the provinces all of whom greatly stricken with grief, had been well disposed towards the deceased hero

21 Before that vehicle were borne the umbrella which had been held over his head at the conclusion of the horse sacrifice he had performed while living and also the burning fires he had daily adored with the priests who had used to attend to them

22 The body of the hero was followed by his wives decked in ornaments and surrounded by thousands of women and thousands of their daughters in law

23 The last rites were then performed at that spot which he liked while he was alive

24 The four wives of that hero's son of Shura ascended the funeral pyre and were consumed with the body of their husband All of them attained to those happy regions which were his

25 The son of Pandu burnt the body of his uncle together with those four wives of his using various kinds of scents and perfumed wood

26 As the funeral pyre blazed up a loud sound was heard of the burning wood and other combustible materials along with the clear chant of Samans and the lamentation of the citizens and others who saw the rite

27 After it was all over the boys of the Vrishnis and Andhaka races, headed by Vajra as also the ladies offered oblations of water to the great hero

28 Phalguna who was careful in observing every duty having caused the duty to be performed went O chief of Bharata's race, next to the place where the Vrishnis were killed.

29 The Kuru prince seeing them lying killed all around became exceedingly cheerless He however did what required to be done in view of that which had taken place

30 The last rites were performed according to the order of seniority to the bodies of those heroes killed by the iron bolts born by virtue of the curse denounced by the Brahmanas, of the blades of Eraka grass

31 Searching out the bodies then of Rama and Vasudeva Arjuna caused them to be burnt by expert persons.

32 The son of Pandu having next performed duly those rites that are done to the manes of the dead quickly started on the seventh day, mounting on his car.

33 The widows of the Vrishni heroes wailing aloud followed the great son of Pandu viz, Dhananjaya on cars drawn by bullocks and mules and camels

34 All were in deep sorrow The servants of the Vrishnis, their horsemen, and their car warriors too, followed the procession.

35 The citizens and the inhabitants of the country, at the command of Pritha's son started at the same time and proceeded, surrounding that cavalcade destitute of heroes and numbering only women and the aged and the children.

36 The warriors who fought from the backs of elephants proceeded on elephants as huge as hills The infantry also set out, together with the reserves

37—38 The children of the Andhaka, and the Vrishni races all followed Arjuna. The Brahmanas and Kshatriyas and Vaishyas and rich Shudras started keeping before them the sixteen thousand women who had formed Vasudeva's harem and Vajra, the grandson of the intelligent Krishna

39 The widows of the other heroes of the Bhoja the Vrishni and the Andhaka races lordless now that started with Arjuna numbered many millions

40 That foremost of car warriors that conqueror of hostile towns viz the son of Pritha escorted this huge procession of Vrishnis which still abounded with wealth, and which looked like a veritable ocean

41 After all the people had started the ocean filled with sharks and alligators, flooded Dwaraka which still teemed with riches of every kind, with its waters

42 Whatever portion of the ground was passed over ocean immediately flooded over with his waters

43 Seeing this wonderful spectacle the inhabitants of Dwaraka walked faster and faster, saying —'Wonderful is the course of fate'

44 Dhananjaya after abandoning Dwaraka proceeded by slow marches causing the Vrishni women to rest in charming forests and mountains and by the sides of delightful rivers

45 Arrived at the country of the five waters, the powerful Dhananjaya encamped in the midst of a land that abounded with corn and kine and other animals.

46. Seeing those widows escorted by Pritha's son alone, O Bharata, the robbers felt a great temptation.

47. Then those sinful wretches, with hearts possessed by cupidity, viz, those Abhiras of ill omen, assembled together and held a consultation.

48. They said,—'Here there is only one bowman, viz, Arjuna. The party consists of children and the old. He escorts them, alone. The warriors (of the Vrishnis) are without energy.'

49 Then those robbers, numbering by thousands, and armed with clubs, rushed towards the procession of the Vrishnis for looting them.

50. Urged by the perverse course of time, they fell upon that party, frightening it with loud leonine shouts and desirous of slaughter.

51—52. The son of Kunti, suddenly ceasing to advance along the path, turned, with his followers, towards the place where the robbers had attacked the party. Smiling the while, that mighty-armed warrior addressed the assailants, saying,—'Ye sinful wretches, stop, if ye love your lives! Ye will rue this when I cut your bodies with my arrows and take your lives'

53. Though thus addressed by that hero, they disregarded his words, and though repeatedly dissuaded, they fell upon Arjuna.

54 Then Arjuna tried to string his large, indestructible, celestial bow with some effort.

55 He succeeded with great difficulty in stringing it, when the battle had become furious He then began to think of his celestial weapons but they would not come to his mind.

56 Seeing that furious battle, the loss of the might of his arm, and the non-appearance of his celestial weapons, Arjuna became greatly ashamed.

57. The Vrishni warriors including the infantry, the elephant-warriors, and the car-men, failed to rescue those Vrishni women who were being snatched away by the robbers

58. The concourse was very large. The robbers attacked it at different points Arjuna tried his best to protect it, but could not succeed.

59 Before the eyes of all the warriors, many foremost of ladies were dragged away, while others went away with the robbers of their own accord.

60. The powerful Arjuna, supported by the servants of the Vrishnis, struck the robbers with arrows shot off Gandiva.

61. Soon, however, O king, his arrows were exhausted. In former days his arrows had been inexhaustible. Now, however, they proved otherwise.

62. Finding his arrows exhausted, he became deeply afflicted with grief. The son of Indra then began to strike the robbers with the horns of his bow.

63 Those Mlechchhas, however, O Janamejaya, in the very sight of Partha, retreated, taking away with them many foremost ladies of the Vrishnis and Andhakas.

64—65 The powerful Dhananjaya considered it all as the work of destiny. Filled with sorrow he breathed heavy sighs at the thought of the non-appearance of his (celestial) weapons, the loss of the might of his arms, the refusal of his bow to obey him; and the exhaustion of his arrows.

66 Considering it all as the work of destiny, he became greatly cheerless He then ceased, O king, to make further efforts, saying, he had not the power which he had before.

67. The high-souled one, taking with him the residue of the Vrishni women, and the wealth that was still with them, reached Kurukshetra.

68 Thus bringing with him the remnant of the Vrishnis, he established them at different places.

69 He established the son of Kritavarman at the city called Martti kavat, with the remnant of the women of the Bhoja king.

70 Escorting the remainder, with children and old men, and women, the son of Pandu established them, who were reft of heroes, in the city of Indraprastha.

71. The dear son of Yuyudhana, with a number of old men and children and women, the righteous-souled Arjuna established on the banks of the Saraswati.

72 The rule of Indraprastha was given to Vajra. The widows of Akrura then wished to retire into the forest. Vajra asked them repeatedly to desist, but they did not hear him.

73 Rukmini the princess of Gandhara, Saivya Haimavati, and queen Jamvavati, ascended the funeral pyre.

74 Satyabhama and the other dear wives of Krishna entered the forest, O king, resolved to practise penances.

75 They began to live on fruits and roots and pass their time in the contemplation of Hari Going beyond the Himavat, they took up their residence in a place called Kalapa.

76 Those men who had followed Arjuna from Dwaravati were divided into groups, and bestowed upon Vajra

77. Having done all these acts suited to the occasion, Arjuna, with eyes bathed in tears, then entered the hermitage of Vyasa. There he saw the Dwarpayana seated at his ease.

CHAPTER VIII.

(MAUSALA PARVA.)—

Concluded.

Vaishampayana said:—

1 As Arjuna entered the hermitage of the truthful Rishi he saw the son of Satyavati seated in a solitary spot

2 Approaching that Rishi of high vows and gifted with a knowledge of all duties he said—'I am Arjuna'—and then awaited his pleasure

3 Satyavati's son, endued with high penances, answered, saying,—'Welcome!' Of tranquil soul the great ascetic further said—'Take your seat'

4—5 Seeing that the son of Pritha was greatly cheerless and breathing heavy sighs repeatedly and filled with despair Vyasa, addressed him saying—Have you been sprinkled with water from anybody's hairs or hair or the end of anybody's cloth, or from the mouth of a jar? Did you know any woman before the cessation of her menses? Have you killed a Brahmana?

6 Have you been defeated in battle? You look like one shorn of prosperity! I do not know that you have been defeated by any one Why then, O chief Bharata's race this exceedingly dejected look? You should O of Pritha tell me all, if, indeed, there be no harm in telling it.

Arjuna said:—

7 He whose complexion was like that of a cloud, he whose eyes were like pair of large lotus petals, viz., Krishna, has, with Rama, renounced his body and ascended to heaven

8 At Prabhasa, through iron bolts caused by the curse denounced by Brahmanas the destruction has taken place of the Vrishni heroes That destruction has been awful and not even a single hero has escaped.

9. The heroes of the Bhoja, the Andhaka, and the Vrishni races O Brahmana, who were all gifted with high-souls, great might, and feminine pride, have killed one another in battle.

10. Possessed of arms which looked like maces of iron, and capable of bearing the strokes of heavy clubs and darts, alas they have all been killed with blades of Eraka grass See the perverse course of Time.

11. Five hundred thousand mighty-armed warriors have thus been killed Encountering one another, they have met with destruction.

12. Thinking repeatedly of this destruction of the Yadava warriors of immeasurable energy and of the illustrious Krishna, I cannot get peace of mind.

13 The death of the holder of Sharnga is as incredible as the drying up of the ocean the displacement of a mountain, the falling down of the heaven, or the cooling property of fire.

14 Deprived of the company of the Vrishni heroes, I wish not to live in this world.

15 Another event has taken place that is more painful than this, O you having penances for wealth Repeatedly thinking of it, my heart is breaking.

16 In my very sight, O Brahmana, thousands of Vrishni ladies were carried away by the Abhiras of the country of the five waters who attacked us

17 Taking up my bow, I found myself unequal to even string it. The power that had existed in my arms seemed to have disappeared on that occasion.

18 O great ascetic, my weapons of various kinds failed to appear. Soon, again, my arrows became exhausted.

19 That person of immeasurable soul, of four arms, holding the conch the discus, and the mace clad in yellow robes, dark of complexion and possessing eyes resembling lotus petals is no longer seen by me! Alas, reft of Govinda, what have I to live for, dragging my life in sorrow?

20 He who used to stalk in advance of my car, that divine form gifted with great splendour and unfading power, consuming as he proceeded all hostile warriors, can no longer be seen by me

21—22 No longer seeing him who by his energy first burnt all hostile troops whom I afterwards killed with arrows shot off Gandiva, I am filled with grief and my head swims O best of men! Penetrated with cheerlessness and despair, I cannot get peace of mind.

CHAPTER I.

Having saluted Narayana and Nara the best of male beings, as also Saraswati the Goddess of Learning, let us cry success.

Janamejaya said :—

1 Having heard of that fighting with iron bolts between the heroes of the Vrishni and the Andhaka races, and having been informed also of Krishna's departure from this world, what did the Pandavas do?

Vaishampayana said :—

2—3 Having heard the particulars of the great destruction of the Vrishnis, the Kaurava king was determined on leaving the world. He addressed Arjuna saying,— 'O you of great intelligence, it is Time which cooks every creature (in his cauldron), I think that what has taken place is due to the cords of Time (with which he binds us all) You should also see it'

4 Thus addressed by his brother, the son of Kunti only repeated the word— 'Time, Time!'—and fully endorsed the view of his eldest brother endued with great intelligence.

5. Knowing the resolution of Arjuna, Bhimasena and the twins fully endorsed the words which [illegible] in Shakraprastha You should protect him' Never set your heart on sin.'

10—11. Having said these words, king Yudhishthira, the just, along with his brothers, promptly offered oblations of water to Vasudeva of great intelligence, as also his old maternal uncle, and Rama and others He then duly performed the Shraddhas of all those kinsmen.

12. The king, in honor of Hari, and naming him repeatedly, fed the Dwaipayana Vyasa, and Narada, and Markandeya having penances for wealth, and Yajnavalkya of Bharadwaja race, with many delicious food.

13—15 In honor of Krishna, he also gave away many jewels and gems, and dresses and clothes, and villages, and horses and cars, and female slaves by hundreds and thousands to foremost of Brahmanas. Calling the citizens Kripa was installed as the preceptor and Parikshit was made over to him as his disciple, O chief of Bharata's race! Then Yudhishthira once more summoned all his subjects

16—17 The royal sage informed them of his desire The citizens and the villagers, hearing the king's words became stricken with anxiety and disapproved of them. 'This should never be done'—said they to the king.

bless them in the accomplishment of their design, those foremost of men renounced their sacred fires to the water. Seeing the princes in that guise the ladies wept aloud

23 They seemed to look as they had looked formerly when with Draupadi forming the sixth in number they had left the capital after their defeat at dice All the brothers, however, were infinitely delighted at the prospect of their retirement.

24—25 Ascertaining the desire of Yudhishthira and seeing the destruction of the Vrishnis no other course of action could satisfy them then. The five brothers, with Draupadi forming the sixth, and a dog forming the seventh, started on their journey. Thus did king Yudhishthira depart, himself heading a party of seven, from the city of Hastinapur. The citizens and the royal ladies followed them for some distance.

26 None of them, however, could venture to address the king for persuading him to give up his intention. The citizens then returned.

27. Kripa and others stood around Yuyutsu as their centre Ulupi the daughter of the Naga chief, O you of Kuru's race, entered the waters of Ganga.

28. The princess Chitrangada started for the capital of Manipur. The other ladies who were the grandmothers of Parikshit gathered around him.

29. Meanwhile the great Pandavas, O you of Kuru's race, and the illustrious Draupadi, having observed the preliminary fast, started with their faces towards the east.

30. Setting themselves on Yoga, those great ones, resolved to observe the religion of Renunciation, passed through various countries and reached various rivers and seas.

31—32 Yudhishthira proceeded first Behind him was Bhima, next walked Arjuna; after him were the twins in the order of their birth; behind them all, O foremost one of Bharata's race, went Draupadi, that first of women, endued with great beauty of dark complexion, and having eyes like lotus petals.

33 While the Pandavas started for the forest, a dog followed them Proceeding on, those heroes reached the sea of red waters

34 Dhananjaya had not thrown off his celestial bow Gandiva nor his couple of inexhaustible quivers actuated, O king by the coveted for valuable things.

35 The Pandavas there saw the God of Fire standing before them like a hill. Closing their way, the god stood there in his embodied form.

36. The deity of seven flames then addressed the Pandavas, saying —'O heroic sons of Pandu, know me as the God of Fire.

37. O mighty-armed Yudhishthira O Bhimasena who are a scorcher of enemies, O Arjuna and O twins of great courage, listen to what I say!

38 O foremost ones of Kuru's race, I am the God of Fire. The forest of Khandava was burnt by me, through the power of Arjuna and of Narayana himself.

39 Let your brother Phalguna proceed to the forest after casting off Gandiva, that great weapon. He has no longer any necessity for it.

40. That precious discus, which was with the great Krishna has disappeared (from the world) When the time again comes, it will return into his hands.

41 This foremost of bows viz, Gandiva, was procured by me from Varuna for the use of Partha Let it be made over to Varuna himself."

42 At this, all the brothers requested Dhananjaya to do what the god said. He then threw into the waters (of the sea) both the bow and the couple of inexhaustible quivers.

43 After this O chief of Bharata's race the God of Fire disappeared then and there The heroic sons of Pandu, next went on with their faces turned towards the south.

44. Then, by the northern coast of the salt sea, those princes of Bharata's race, went to the south-west.

45 Turning next towards the west, they saw the city of Dwaraka covered by the ocean.

46. Turning next to the north those foremost ones went on Observant of Yoga, they were desirous of going round the whole earth.

CHAPTER II.

(MAHAPRASTHANIKA PARVA)—Continued.

Vaishampayana said:—

1. Those princes of controlled souls and devoted to Yoga, proceeding to the north, saw Himavat, that huge mountain.

2. Crossing the Himavat, they saw a vast desert of sand They then saw the powerful mountain Meru, the foremost of all high-peaked mountains.

3 As those powerful ones were proceeding quickly all rapt in Yoga, Yajnasena, falling off from Yoga, dropped down on the Earth.

4—5 Seeing her fallen down, Bhimasena of great strength addressed king Yudhishthira the just, saying,—'O scorcher of enemies, this princess never did any sinful deed Tell us what the cause is for which Krishna has fallen down on the Earth.'

Yudhishthira said:—

6. She had great partiality for Dhananjaya in particular. She obtains the fruit of that conduct to-day, O best of men.

Vaishampayana said:—

7. Having said this, that foremost one of Bharata's race went on. Of righteous soul, that foremost of men, gifted with great intelligence, went on, with mind intent on itself,

8—9 Then the all wise Sahadeva dropped down on the Earth Seeing him drop down, Bhima addressed the king, saying,—'He who with great humility used to serve us all, alas, why is that son of Madravati fallen down on the Earth?'

Yudhishthira said:—

10. He never thought anybody 'his equal in wisdom. It is for that sin that prince has dropped down.

Vaishampayana said:—

11. Having said this, the king proceeded, leaving Sahadeva there. Indeed, Kunti's son Yudhishthira went on, with his brothers and with the dog.

12 Seeing both Krishna and the Pandava Sahadeva fallen down, the brave Nakula, whose love for kinsmen was very great, fell down himself.

13—14 Upon the falling down of the heroic Nakula of great beauty, Bhima once more addressed the king, saying,—'This brother of ours who was gifted with full righteousness and who always obeyed our commands, this Nakula who was peerless for beauty, has fallen down!'

15 Thus addressed by Bhimasena, Yudhishthira said, with respect to Nakula, these words —'He was of righteous soul and the foremost of all persons gifted with intelligence.

16. He, however, thought that there was nobody who equalled him in personal beauty. Indeed, he considered himself as superior to all in that matter.

17 It is for this that Nakula has fallen down Know this, O Vrikodara! That, O hero, which has been ordained for a person, must have to be borne by him.'

18 Seeing Nakula and the others fall down Pandu's son Arjuna of white horses, that destroyer of hostile heroes, fell down in great grief of heart.

19—20. When that foremost of men, who was gifted with the energy of Shakra, had fallen down, indeed, when that invincible hero was on the point of death, Bhima said to the king,—'I do not recollect any untruth uttered by this great one Indeed, not even in jest did he say anything false. What then is that for whose evil consequence this one has dropped down on the Earth?'

Yudhishthira said:—

21. Arjuna had said that he would consume all our enemies in a single day. Proud of his heroism, he did not, however, do what he had said. Hence has he fallen down.

22. This Phalguna disregarded all wielders of bows. One desirous of prosperity should never entertain such thoughts.

Vaishampayana said:—

23—24 Having said so, the king went on. Then Bhima fell down, Having fallen down, Bhima addressed king Yudhishthira the just, saying —'O king, see! I who am your darling have fallen down! Why have I dropped down? Tell me if you know it.'

Yudhishthira said:—

25 You were a great eater, and you used to boast of your strength. You never did attend, O Partha, to the wants of others while eating. It is for that, O Bhima, that you have fallen down.

26 Having said these words, the mighty-armed Yudhishthira went on, without looking back. He had only one companion, viz, the dog of which I have repeatedly spoken to you which followed him now.

CHAPTER III.

(MAHAPRASTHANIKA PARVA.)—Concluded.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. Causing the Heaven and the Earth to be filled by a loud sound, then Shakra came to the son of Pritha on a car and asked him to ascend it.

2—3 Seeing his brothers fallen on the Earth, king Yudhishthira the just said to that deity of a thousand eyes these words,—'My brothers have all dropped down here! They must go with me Without them by me I do not wish to go to the celestial region, O lord of all the celestials.

4 The delicate princess (Draupadi) deserving of every comfort, O Purandara should go with us! You should permit this.'

Shakra said :—

5 You shall behold your brothers in the celestial region They have reached it before you Indeed you shall see all of them there, with Krishna Do not give way to grief O chief of the Bharatas!

6 Having renounced their human bodies they have gone there, O chief of Bharata's race! As for you, it is ordained that you shall go there in this very body of yours."

Yudhishthira said :—

7 This dog, O lord of the Past and the Present, is highly devoted to me He should go with me My heart is full of mercy for him.

Shakra said :—

8 You have acquired to-day Immortality and a status equal to mine, O king, prosperity extending in all directions and high success, and all the felicities of heaven Do you cast off this dog. In this there will be no cruelty.

Yudhishthira said :—

9 O you of a thousand eyes, O you, who are of righteous conduct, it is extremely difficult for one that is of righteous conduct to perpetrate an act which is unrighteous I do not wish that union with prosperity for which I shall have to cast off one that is devoted to me.

India said :—

10 There is no place in the celestial region for persons with dogs Besides the Krodhavashas take away all the merits of such persons Thinking of this, act, O king Yudhishthira the just! Do you abandon this dog There is no cruelty in this.'

Yudhishthira said :—

11. It has been said that the abandonment of one that is devoted is sinful beyond measure It is equal to the sin of Brahminicide. Hence, O great Indra, I shall not cast off this dog to-day from desire of my happiness

12 This is my vow, viz, that I never give up a person that is terrified, nor one that is devoted to me, nor one that seeks my help, saying, that he is destitute, nor one that is afflicted, nor one that has come to me, nor one that is weak in protecting oneself, nor one that begs for life I shall never give up such a one till my own life goes away.

Indra said —

13 Whatever gifts, or sacrifices spread out, or libations poured on the sacred fire, are seen by a dog, are taken away by the Krodhavashas. Do you, therefore, renounce this dog. By renouncing this dog you will acquire the region of the celestial.

14 Having abandoned your brothers and Krishna, you have, O hero, acquired a region of happiness by your own deeds. Why are you so stupefied? You have renounced everything Why then do you not renounce this dog?

Yudhishthira said :—

15 This is well known in all the worlds that there is neither friendship nor enmity with the dead When my brothers and Krishna died, I was unable to revive them. Hence it was that I renounced them I did not however, renounce them as long as they were alive.

16 To frighten one that has sought protection the killing of a woman, the theft of what belongs to a Brahmana, and injuring a friend each of these four, O Shakra is, I think equal to the abandonment of one that is devoted.

Vaishampayana said —

17 Hearing these words of king Yudhishthira the just, (the dog became transformed into) the deity of Virtue, who well pleased, said words to him in a sweet voice fraught with praise.

Dharma said :—]

18. You are well born, O king of kings, and endued with the intelligence and the good conduct of Pandu! You have mercy for all creatures O Bharata, of which this is a bright example!

19 Formerly, O son, you were once examined by me in the forest of Dwaita, where your brothers of great prowess met with (an appearance of) death.

20 Disregarding both your brothers Bhima and Arjuna, you did wish for the revival of Nakula from your desire of doing good to your (step) mother.

21. On the present occasion, thinking the dog to be devoted to you, you have renounced the very car of the celestials instead of renouncing him. Hence, O king, there is no one in Heaven that is equal to you.

22. Hence, O Bharata, regions of inexhaustible happiness are yours? You have acquired them, O chief of the Bharatas, and yours is a celestial and high end.

Vaishampayana said.—

23—24. Then Dharma and Shakra, and the Maruts, and the Ashwins and other deities and the celestial Rishis, causing Yudhishthira to ascend on a car, went to the celestial region. Those beings crowned with success and capable of going everywhere at will, rode their respective cars.

25 King Yudhishthira, that perpetuater of Kuru's race, riding on that car, ascended quickly, causing the entire sky to blaze with his effulgence.

26—27 Then Narada, that foremost of all speakers, gifted with penances, and conversant with all the worlds, from amidst that concourse of celestials, said these words —'All those royal sages who are here have their achievements transcended by those of Yudhishthira.

28 Covering all the worlds by his fame and splendour and by his wealth of conduct, he has attained to the celestial region in his own (human) body! None else than the son of Pandu has been heard to achieve this.'

29—30 Hearing these words of Narada, the righteous-souled king saluting the celestials and all the royal sages there present, said,—'Happy or miserable, whatever the region be that is now (my brothers, I wish to proceed to. I do not wish to go anywhere else.'

31—32. Hearing this speech of the king, the chief of the celestials, Purandura, said these words pregnant with noble meaning,—'Do you live in this place, O king of kings, which you have acquired by your meritorious deeds! Why do you still cherish human affections?

33 You have acquired great success, the like of which no other man has ever been able to attain. Your brothers, O delighter of the Kurus, have succeeded in acquiring happy regions.

34 Human affections still touch you. This is Heaven. See these celestial Rishis and Siddhas who have attained to the region of the gods.'

35—36 Endued with great intelligence, Yudhishthira answered the king of the deities once more, saying,—'O conqueror of Daityas, I venture not to live anywhere, separated from them! I wish to go there where my brothers have gone!

37. I wish to go there where that foremost of women, Draupadi, of ample proportions and darkish complexion and gifted with great intelligence and righteousness of conduct, has gone!'

CHAPTER I.

Having saluted Narayana and Nara the best of male beings as also Saraswati the Goddess of Learning let us cry success.

Janamejaya said:—

1. Having attained to Heaven, what regions were respectively attained by my grandsires of old viz, the Pandavas, and the sons of Dhritarashtra?

2 I wish to hear this. I think that you know everything, having been taught by the great Rishi Vyasa of wonderful feats.

Vaishampayana said:—

3 Listen now to what your grandsires, Yudhishthira and others, did after having attained to Heaven, that place of the deities

4 Arrived at Heaven, king Yudhishthira the just saw Duryodhana gifted with prosperity and seated on an excellent seat.

5 He was effulgent like the sun and wore all the signs of heroic glory And he was in the company of many celestials of blazing effulgence and of Sadhyas of righteous deeds

6 Yudhishthira, seeing Duryodhana and his prosperity became suddenly overpowered with anger and turned back from the sight

7. He loudly addressed his companions saying,— I do not wish to share regions of bliss with Duryodhana who was stained by cupidity and possessed of little foresight

8 It was for him that friends, kinsmen, over the whole Earth destroyed by us were whom he had greatly afflicted in the deep forest

9 It was for him that the virtuous princess of Panchala, Draupadi of faultless features, our wife was dragged into the midst of the courtiers before all our elders

10. Ye gods I have no wish to even see Suyodhana! I wish to go there where my brothers are.'

11. Narada, smiling, told him,—'It should not be so O king of kings! In Heaven, all enmities cease.

12. O mighty-armed Yudhishthira, do not say so about king Duryodhana. Hear my words.

13 Here is king Duryodhana He is adored with the celestials by those righteous men and those foremost of kings, who are now dwellers of Heaven.

14 By causing his body to be poured as a libation on the fire of battle, he has obtained the end which consists in attainment of the region for heroes You and your brothers, who were veritable gods on Earth, were always persecuted by this one.

15 Yet through his observance of Kshatriya practices he has acquired this region. This king was not terrified in a dreadful situation.

16 O son, you should not bear in mind the woes inflicted on you on account of the match at dice You should not remember the sufferings of Draupadi.

17. You should not remember the other miseries which you suffered for the deeds of your kinsmen,—the miseries, viz, that were due to battle or to other situations.

18—26 Do you meet Duryodhana now politely. This is Heaven O king! There can be no enmities here!'—Though thus addressed by Narada, the Kuru king Yudhishthira, gifted with great intelligence, enquired about his brothers and said —'If these eternal regions reserved for heroes be Duryodhana's that unrighteous and sinful wretch, that man who was the destroyer of friends and of the whole world that man for whose sake the entire Earth was devastated with all her horses and elephants and human beings, that man for whose sake we were burnt with anger in thinking of how best we might remedy our wrongs, I wish to see what regions have been attained by those great heroes, my brothers of high vows, steady achievers of promises, truthful in speech, and distinguished for courage. The great Karna, the son of Kunti, incapable of being baffled in battle, Dhrishtadyumna, Satyaki, the sons of Dhrishtadyumna and those other Kshatriyas who met with death in the observance of Kshatriya duties, where are those kings, O Brahmana? I do not see them here, O Narada! I wish to see, O Narada, Virata and Drupada and the other great Kshatriyas headed by Dhrishtaketu, as also Shikhandin, the Panchala prince, the sons of Draupadi, and Abhimanyu, irresistible in battle.'

CHAPTER II.

(SWARGAROHANIKA PARVA.)—Continued.

Yudhishthira said:—

1—2 'Ye deities, I do not see here Radha's son of incomparable prowess, as also my large-hearted brothers, and Yudhamanyu and Uttamaujas, those great car-warriors who poured their bodies (as libations) on the fire of battle, those kings and princes who met with death for my sake in battle.

3. Where are those great car-warriors who possessed of the prowess of tigers? Have those foremost of men gained this region?

4. If those great car-warriors have obtained these regions, then only do you know, O gods, that I shall live here with those great ones.

5. If this auspicious and eternal region has not been gained by those kings, then, know, O gods, that without those brothers and kinsmen of mine, I shall not live here.

6. At the time of celebrating the Kaitri rites (after the battle), I heard my mother say,—Do you offer oblations of water to Karna! From the time of hearing those words of my mother, I am burning with grief.

7—8. I grieve also continually at this, O gods, that when I marked the resemblance between the feet of my mother and those of Karna of high soul, I did not immediately place myself under the orders of that destroyer of hostile ranks! Ourselves joined with Karna, Shakra himself would have been unable to defeat in battle.

9. Wherever may that child of the Sun be, I wish to see him. Alas, not knowing his relationship with us, I caused him to be killed by Arjuna.

10—11. 'Bhima also of dreadful prowess and dearer to me than my life. Arjuna too, resembling Indra himself, the twins also who resembled the Destroyer himself in prowess, I wish to see! I wish to see the princess of Panchala, of good conduct: I wish not to stay here. I tell you the truth.

12 O foremost of the deities, what is Heaven to me if I am separated from my brothers? That is Heaven where those brothers of mine are. This, in my opinion, is not Heaven.'

The deities said:—

13 'If you wish to be there, go then, O son, forthwith. At the command of the king of the celestials, we are ready to do what you like.'

Vaishampayana said:—

14—15 Having said so, the celestials then ordered the celestial messenger, O destroyer of enemies, saying—'Do you show to Yudhishthira his friends and kinsmen'—Then the royal son of Kunti and the celestial messenger went together, O foremost of kings, to that place where those chiefs of men were.

16 The celestial messenger went first, followed by the king. The path was difficult and trodden by men of sinful deeds.

17—18 It was covered with thick darkness, and covered with hair and moss forming its grassy vesture. Polluted with the smell of sinners, and miry with flesh and blood, it was filled with gad flies and stinging bees and gnats and was endangered by the inroads of grisly bears. Rotting corpses lay here and there.

19 Overspread with bones and hair, it was noisesome with worms and insects. It was bounded all along with a burning fire.

20. It was infested by crows and other birds and vultures, all having beaks of iron, as also by evil spirits with long mouths pointed like needles. And it was filled with inaccessible fastnesses like the Vindhya mountains.

21. Human corpses were scattered over it, smeared with fat and blood, with arms and thighs cut off, or with entrails torn out and legs severed.

22. Along that path so disagreeable with the stench of corpses and awful with other incidents, the righteous-souled king went filled with various thoughts.

23. He saw a river full of boiling water and, therefore, difficult to cross, as also a forest of trees whose leaves were sharp swords and razors.

24 There were plains full of fine white sand highly heated, and rocks and stones made of iron. There were many jars of iron all around, with boiling oil in them.

25. Many a Kuta-shalmalika was there, with sharp thorns, and therefore, greatly painful to the touch The son of Kunti saw also the tortures inflicted upon sinful men.

26. Seeing that inauspicious region full of every sort of foulness, Yudhishthira asked the celestial messenger, saying,—'How far shall we go along a path like this?

27. You should tell me where those brothers of mine are. I wish also to know what region is this of the celestials.'

28 Hearing these words of king Yudhishthira the just, the celestial messenger stopped in his course and replied, saying,—'Thus far is your way.

29. The dwellers of the celestial region ordered me that having come thus far, I am to stop! If you are tired, O king of kings, you may return with me.'

30. Yudhishthira, however, was sorely disconsolate and stupefied by the foul stench Resolved to return, O Bharata, he retraced his steps.

31 Stricken with sorrow and grief, the righteous souled king turned back Directly then he heard piteous cries all around.

32. 'O son of Dharma, O royal sage, O you of holy birth, O son of Pandu, do you stay a moment for favouring us.

33 At your approach, O invincible one, a delightful breeze has begun to blow, bearing the sweet smell of your body. We have been greatly relieved at this.

34 O foremost of kings, seeing you, O best of men, we have been highly pleased O son of Pritha, let that happiness last longer through your stay here for a few moments more.

35 Do you remain here, O Bharata, for even a short time! As long as you are here, O you of Kuru's race, tortures cease to afflict us.'

36 The king heard there these and many similar words, uttered piteously by persons in distress, reaching his ears from all sides.

37 Hearing those words of beings in distress, Yudhishthira of compassionate heart exclaimed aloud—'Alas, how painful!' and the king stood still.

38 The words of those woe-begone and afflicted persons seemed to the son of Pandu to be uttered in voices that he had heard before although he could not, then, recognise them.

39. Unable to recognise the voices, Dharma's son, Yudhishthira, enquired, saying,—'Who are you? Why also do you stay here?'

40 Thus addressed they answered him from all sides, saying,—'I am Karna!'—'I am Bhimasena!'—'I am Arjuna!'

41. 'I am Nakula'—'I am Sahadeva!'—'I am Dhrishtadyumna!'—'I am Draupadi!'—'We are the sons of Draupadi!'—thus O king, did those voices speak.

42 Hearing those cries, O king, uttered in voices of pain suitable to that place the royal Yudhishthira asked himself—'What perverse destiny is this?'

43—44. What are those sinful deeds which were committed by those great beings, viz, Karna and the sons of Draupadi and the slender-waisted princess of Panchala, so that they have been compelled to live in this region of fœtid smell and great distress. I am not aware of any sin that can be attributed to these persons of auspicious deeds

45 What is that deed by doing which Dhritarashtra's son, king Suyodhana, with all his sinful followers, has acquired such prosperity?

46. Gifted with prosperity like that of the great Indra himself, he is reverently worshipped. What is that deed for which these (high souled ones) have fallen into Hell?

47. All of them knew duty, were heroes, were devoted to truth and the Vedas; were observant of Kshatriya practices, were righteous in their deeds, were performers of sacrifices, and givers of large presents to Brahmanas.

48 Am I asleep or awake? Am I conscious or unconscious? Or, is all this an aberration of the intellect?'

49. Overwhelmed by sorrow and grief, and with his senses ruffled by anxiety, king Yudhishthira indulged in such thoughts for a long time.

50. The royal son of Dharma was, then filled with righteous indignatio Indeed, Yudhishthira then censured the celestials as also Dharma himself.

51. Affected by the very foul smell, he addressed the celestial messenger, saying—'Return to the presence of those whose messenger you are.

52 Tell them that I shall not return to where they are [illegible]

here, since, on account of my companionship, these afflicted brothers of mine have become comforted'

53 Thus addressed by the intelligent son of Pandu, the celestial messenger returned to the place where the king of the celestials was, viz, he of a hundred sacrifices.

54. He represented to him the acts of Yudhishthira Indeed, O king, he informed Indra of all that Dharma's son had said.

CHAPTER III.

(SWARGAROHANIKA PARVA.)—Continued.

Vaishampayana said:—

1. King Yudhishthira the just, the son of Pritha, had not waited there for more than a moment when, O you of Kuru's race, all the celestials headed by Indra came there

2. The God of Righteousness, in his embodied form, also came to that place where the Kuru king was for seeing that monarch.

3 Upon the coming of those celestials of resplendent bodies and sanctified and noble deeds the darkness that had covered that region immediately disappeared

4—5. The tortures undergone by beings of sinful deeds were no longer seen. The river Vaitarani, the thorny Shalmali, the iron jars, and the boulders of rock, so terrible to look at, also vanished from sight The various repulsive corpses also, which the Kuru king had seen, disappeared at the same time.

6. Then a breeze, delicious and fraught with pleasant smell, pefectly pure, and delightfully cool, O Bharata, began to blow on that spot on account of the presence of the celestials.

7—8 The Maruts, with Indra, the Vasus with the twin Ashwins, the Sadhyas, the Rudras, the Adityas, and the other dwellers of Heaven, as also the Siddhas, and the great Rishis, all came there where Dharma's royal son of great energy was.

9—10 Then Shakra, the lord of the celestials, gifted with blazing prosperity, addressed Yudhishthira and consoling him, said,—'O Yudhishthira of mighty arms, come, come, O king! These illusions have ended, O powerful one.

11 You have acquired success O mighty-armed one, and have attained to eternal happy regions You should not give way to anger Listen to these words of mine.

12 Hell, O son, should, forsooth be seen by every king. There is enough of good and bad, O king.

13 He who enjoys first the fruits of his good deeds must afterwards suffer Hell. He, on the other hand, who first endures Hell, must afterwards enjoy the celestial region.

14 He whose sinful deeds are many, enjoys the celestial region first. It is for this, O king, that desirous of doing you good, I caused you to be sent for having a view of Hell.

15 You had by a pretence, deceived Drona about his son You have, therefore, been shown Hell by an act of deception.

16 Like yourself, Bhima and Arjuna and Draupadi, have all been shown the place of sinners by an act of deception.

17 Come, O king, all of them have been purged of their sins

18 All those kings who had sided you and who have been killed in battle, have all acquired the celestial region Come and see them, O foremost one of Bharata's race.

19. Karna, the powerful bowman, that foremost of all wielders of weapons for whom you are grieving, has also acquired high success.

20 See, O powerful one, that foremost of men, viz, the son of the Sun He is in that place which is his own, O mighty-armed one Kill this grief of yours, O king.

21. Look at your brother, and others, those kings, that is, who had taken your side. They have all attained to their respective places Let the fever of your heart be removed 22 Having suffered a little misery first, from this time, O son of Kuru's race, do you sport with me in happiness, shorn of grief and all ailments.

23. O mighty-armed one, do you now enjoy, O king, the rewards of all your virtuous deeds, of those regions which you have acquired yourself by your penances, and of all your gifts.

24. Let celestials and Gandharvas, and celestial Apsaras, dressed in pure robes and beautiful ornaments, wait upon and serve you for your happiness.

25 Do you, O mighty-armed one, enjoy now those happy regions which you have acquired through the Rajasuya-Sacrifice performed by you and whose felicities have been increased by the sacrificial gratuities employed by you May you enjoy the great fruit of your penances.

26 Your regions, O Yudhishthira, are above, far above, those of kings. They are equal to those of Harishchandra, O son of Pritha Come, and sport there in bliss!

27 Sharing the blissful region acquired by the royal sage Mandhatri, king Bhagiratha, Dushmanta's son Bharata, you will sport there in bliss.

28 Here is the celestial river, sacred and sanctifying the three worlds. It is called celestial Ganga Plunging into it, you will go to your own regions.

29 Having bathed in this river, you will be divested of your human nature. Indeed, your grief dispelled, your ailments conquered, you will be freed from all enmities'

30—31. While, O Kuru king, the chief of the celestials was saying so to Yudhishthira, the god of Righteousness, in his embodied form, then addressed his own son and said,—'O king, I am highly pleased, O you of great wisdom, with you, O son, by your devotion to me, by your truthfulness of speech, and forgiveness, and self control.

32 This, indeed, is the third test, O king, to which I put you You are incapable, O son of Pritha, of being swerved from your nature or reason.

33 Before this, I had examined you in the Dwaita forest by my questions, when you had come to that lake for recovering a couple of fire-sticks You stood it well.

34 Assuming the shape of a dog, I examined you once more, O son when your brothers with Draupadi had fallen down.

35 This has been your third test, you have expressed your wish to stay at Hell for the sake of your brothers You have become cleansed, O highly blessed one. Purified of sin, be you happy.

36 O son of Pritha, your brothers, O king, were not such as to deserve Hell All this has been an illusion created by the king of the celestials

37 Forsooth, all kings, O son, must once see Hell. Hence have you for a little while been subjected to this great sorrow.

38 O king, neither Arjuna, nor Bhima, nor any of those foremost of men, viz., the twins, nor Karna, ever truthful in speech and endued with great courage, could be deserving of Hell for a long time.

39. The princess Krishna too, O Yudhishthira, could not be deserving of that place of sinners. Come, come, O foremost of the Bharatas see Ganga, who spreads her current over the three worlds.'

40 Thus addressed, the royal sage viz., your grandsire proceeded with Dharma and all the other celestials.

41. Having bathed in the celestial river Ganga, sacred and purifying and ever worshipped by the Rishis, he renounced his human body.

42 Assuming then a celestial form, king Yudhishthira the just, on account of that bath, became divested of all his enmities and grief.

43. Surrounded by the celestials, the Kuru king Yudhishthira then went away from that place He was accompanied by Dharma, and the great Rishis uttered his praises.

44. Indeed, he reached that place where those foremost of men those heroes, viz., the Pandavas and the Dhartarashtras freed from (human) wrath, were enjoying each his respective position.

CHAPTER IV.

(SWARGAROHANIKA PARVA)—Continued.

Vaishampayana said:—

1. King Yudhishthira, thus honored by the celestials, the Maruts and the Rishis, went to that place where those foremost ones of Kuru's race were.

2 He saw Govinda gifted with his Brahma form It took after that form of his which had been seen before and which, therefore, helped the recognition

3 Shining in that form of his he was adorned with celestial weapons such as the dreadful and discus and others in their respective embodied forms.

4 He was being worshipped by the heroic Phalguna, who also was gifted with a blazing effulgence the son of Kunti saw the destroyer of Madhu in also his own form.

5 Those two foremost of Beings worshipped by all the celestials, seeing Yudhishthira, received him with proper honours

6 In another place, the delighter of the Kurus saw Karna, that foremost one among all holders of weapons, resembling a dozen Suns in splendour.

7. In another part he saw Bhimasena of great power, sitting in the midst of Maruts, and gifted with a blazing form.

8 He was sitting by the side of the god of wind in his embodied form Indeed he was then in a celestial form gifted with Krishna, a million sins, numbering such grave ones as Brahmanicide and the rest, are washed off.

41. The departed manes of that man who recites even a small portion of this history at a Shraddha, obtain inexhaustible food and drink.

42 The sins that one commits during the day by one's senses or the mind are all washed off before evening by reciting a portion of the Mahabharata.

43 Whatever sins a Brahmana may commit at night in the midst of women, are all washed off before dawn by reciting a portion of the Mahabharata.

44. The great race of the Bharatas is its topic. Hence it is called Bharata And because of its grave meaning as also of the Bharatas being its topic, it is called Mahabharata.

45 He who is versed in interpretations of this great work becomes purged of every sin Such a man lives in virtue, profit and pleasure, and acquires Liberation also, O chief of Bharata's race.

46. That which is in this is elsewhere, that which does not occur here occurs nowhere else This history is known by the name of Jaya. It should be heard by every one desirous of Liberation.

47. It should be read by Brahmanas, by kings, and by women big with children. He who desires Heaven attains to Heaven; and he who desires victory achieves it.

48. The woman big with child gets either a son or a daughter highly blessed. The powerful Island-born Krishna, who will not have to come back, and who is Liberation incarnate, made an abstract of the Bharata, moved by the desire of helping the cause of virtue.

49. He made another compilation consisting of sixty lakhs of verses.

50 Thirty lakhs of these were placed in the region of the celestials In the region of the Pitris, fifteen lakhs, it should be known are current; while in that of the Yakshas fourteen lakhs are current.

51—52. One lakh is current among human beings. Narada recited the Mahabharata to the gods; Asita-Devala to the Pitris, Shuka to the Rakshasas and the Yakshas; and Vaishampayana to human beings This history is sacred, and of deep significance, and considered as equal to the Vedas.

53. That man, O Shaunaka, who hears this history, placing a Brahmana before him, acquires both fame and the fruition of all his desires.

51—55 He who, with fervid devotion, listens to a recitation of the Mahabharata, attains (hereafter) to great success on account of the merit that becomes his through understanding even a very small part thereof. All the sins of that man who recites or listens to this history with devotion are washed off

56 Formerly, the great Rishi Vyasa, having composed this work, caused his son Shuka to read it with him, along with these four verses.

57. Thousands of mothers, and fathers, and hundreds of sons and wives arise in the world and depart from it. Others will arise and similarly go away.

58 There are thousands of occasions for joy and hundreds of occasions for fear. These affect only him who is ignorant but never him that is wise.

59 With uplifted arms I am crying aloud but nobody hears me From Virtue originate Profit and Pleasure Why should not Virtue, therefore, be sought?

60 For the sake neither of pleasure, nor of fear, nor of cupidity should any one renounce Virtue. Indeed, for the sake of even life, one should not renounce Virtue. Virtue is eternal Pleasure and Pain are not eternal Jiva is eternal. The cause, however, of Jiva's being covered with a body is not so.

61. That man who, rising early in the morning, reads this Savitri of the Bharata, acquires all the rewards attached to a recitation of this history and ultimately attains to the highest Brahma.

62. As the sacred Ocean, as the Himavat mountain, are both considered as mines of precious gems, so is this Bharata.

63 The learned man, by reciting to others this Veda or Agama composed by (the Island-born) Krishna, acquires wealth. There is no doubt in this that he who, with rapt attention, recites this history called Bharata, acquires great success.

64 What need has that man of a sprinkling of the waters of Pushkara who attentively listens to this Bharata, while it is recited to him? It represents the nectar that dropped from the lips of the Island born. It is immeasurable, sacred, sanctifying, sin-cleansing, and auspicious.

CHAPTER VI.

(SWARGAROHANIKA PARVA.)

Continued.

Janamejaya said:—

1. O holy one, according to what rites should the learned listen to the Bharata? What are the fruits? What deities are to be adored during the several Paranas?

2. What should be the gifts that one should make, O holy one, at every Parva or sacred day (during the continuance of the recitation)? What should be the qualifications of the reciter to be engaged? Tell me all this.

Vaishampayana said:—

3 Hear, O king, what that procedure is, and what the fruits, O Bharata, are which will originate from one's listening (to a recitation of the Bharata). This, O king of kings, is what you ask me.

4. The deities, O king, came to this world for sport. Having achieved their task, they ascended once more to the celestial region.

5. Listen to what I tell you briefly Is the Mahabharata is to be found the births of Rishis and deities on the Earth.

6—9 In this work, called Bharata, O foremost one of Bharata's race, are to be seen in one place the eternal Rudras, the Saddhyas, and the Vishwedevas; the Adityas, the two deities named the Ashwins, the regents of the World, the great Rishis, the Guhyakas, the Gandharvas, the Nagas, the Vidyadharas, the Siddhas, the diverse deities, the Self-born visible in a body, with many ascetics; the Hills and Mountains, Oceans and Seas, and Rivers; the various tribes of Apsaras; the Planets, the Years, the Half-Years, and the Seasons; and the whole universe of mobile and immobile objects, with all the celestials and Asuras

10. Hearing their celebrity, and on account of a recitation of their names and achievements, a man, who has committed even terrible sins, will be cleansed.

11—14 Having, with a concentrated soul and purified body, heard this history duly, from the beginning, and having reached its end one should make Shraddha-offerings, O Bharata, to them (of whom one has heard) To the Brahmanas also, O chief of Bharata's race, should, with due devotion and according to one's power, be made large gifts and various kinds of gems and kine, and vessels of white brass for milking kine and maidens decked with every ornament, and possessed of every accomplishment suited to the enjoyment, as also various kinds of conveyances, beautiful palaces, plots of land and cloths.

15. Animals also should be given, such as horses and elephants, and beds, and covered conveyances borne on the shoulders of men, and well-decked cars.

16. Whatever objects are in the house, of the foremost kind, whatever wealth of great value is in it, should be given away to Brahmanas. Indeed, one should give away one's ownself, wives and children.

17 One desirous of hearing the Bharata, should hear it without a doubting heart, with cheerfulness and joy; and as he goes on listening to its recitation, he should, according to the extent of his power, make gifts with great devotion.

18. Hear how a person who is devoted to truth and sincerity, who is self-controlled, pure (in mind), and observant of those deeds which lead to purity of body, that is endued with faith, and that has subjugated anger, acquires success.

19—20. He should appoint as reciter one who is pure (of body), who is endued with good and pious conduct, who should be robed in white, who should have a complete mastery over his passions, who is cleansed of all offences, who is conversant with every branch of learning, who is endued with faith, who is free from malice, who is possessed of handsome features, who is blessed, self controlled, truthful and with passions under control, and who is beloved of all for the gifts he makes and the honors of which he is the possessor.

21—22. The reciter, seated at his ease, free from all bodily complaints, and with rapt attention, should recite the text without slowness, without a labouring voice, without being fast or quick, quietly, with sufficient energy without confusing the letters and words together, in a sweet intonation and with such accent and emphasis as would show the sense, giving full utterance to the three and sixty letters of the alphabet from the eight places of their formation.

23 Saluting Narayana, and to Nara, that foremost male-beings, as also to the goddess Saraswati, should the word Jaya be uttered.

24 Listening to the Bharata, O king, when recited O you of Bharata's race, by a reader of this kind, the listener, observant of vows the while and purified by purificatory rites, acquires valuable fruits.

25 When the first Parana is reached, great beauty, and had acquired with highest success.

9. In the place belonging to the Aswins, the daughter of the Kurus saw Nakula and Sahadeva, each blazing with his own effulgence.

10. He also saw the princess of Panchala, decked in garlands of lotuses. Having acquired the celestial region, she was sitting there, gifted with a form effulgent like the Sun.

11—12. King Yudhishthira suddenly wished to question her. Then the illustrious Indra, the king of the celestials, spoke to him,—'This one is goddess of prosperity herself. It was for your sake that she took birth, as the daughter of Drupada, among human beings, coming not from any mother's womb, O Yudhishthira, gifted with agreeable perfume and capable of delighting the entire world.

13. For your satisfaction she was created by the wielder of the trident. She was born in the race of Drupada and was enjoyed by you all.

14. These five highly blessed Gandharvas gifted with the effulgence of fire, and endued with great energy, were, O king, the sons of Draupadi and yourself.

15. Look at Dhritarashtra, the king of the Gandharvas, endued with great wisdom. Know that this one was the eldest brother of your father.

16. This one is your eldest brother, the son of Kunti, gifted with the effulgence of fire. The son of Surya, your eldest brother the foremost of men, even this one was known as the son of Radha.

17—18. He moves in the company of the Sun God. Behold this foremost of Beings! Among the tribes of the Sadhyas, the celestials, the Vishwedevas, and the Maruts, see, O king of kings, the mighty car-warriors of the Vrishnis and the Andhakas, viz., those heroes having Satyaki for their first, and those powerful ones among the Bhojas.

19. Look at the son of Subhadra, invincible in battle, now staying with Soma. He is the powerful bowman Abhimanyu, now gifted with the gentle effulgence of the Moon.

20. Here is the powerful bowman Pandu, now united with Kunti and Madri. Your father frequently comes to me on his excellent car.

21. Look at the royal Bhishma, the son of Shantanu, now in the midst of the Vasus. Know that this one by the side of Vrishaspati is your preceptor Drona.

22. These and other kings, O son of Pandu, who had fought on your behalf now walk with the Gandharvas or Yakshas or other sacred beings.

23. Some have attained to the dignity of Guhyakas, O king. Having renounced their bodies, they have conquered the celestial region by the merit they had acquired through word, thought, and deed.'

CHAPTER V.

Janamejaya said:—

1—4. Bhishma and Drona, those two great persons, king Dhritarashtra, and Virata and Drupada, and Shankha and Uttara, Dhrishtaketu and Jayatsena, and king Satyajit, the sons of Duryodhana, and Shakuni the son of Suvala, Karna's sons of great prowess, king Jayadratha, Ghatotkacha and others whom you have not mentioned, the other heroic kings of shining forms,—tell me for what period they remained in the celestial region.

5. O best of twice-borns, did they live in Heaven for ever? What was the end acquired by those best of men when their acts terminated.

6. I wish to hear this, O foremost of twice-born persons, and, therefore, have I asked you. By virtue of your blazing penances you see all things.

Sauti said:—

7. Thus accosted, that twice born Rishi, receiving the permission of the great Vyasa, began to answer the question of the king.

Vaishampayana said:—

8. Every one, O king, is not capable of returning to his own nature at the end of his deeds. Whether this is so or not, is, undoubtedly, a good question asked by you.

9—10. Hear, O king, this which is a mystery of the celestials. O chief of Bharata's race! It was explained (to us) by Vyasa of great energy, celestial vision, and great prowess, that ancient ascetic, O Kauravya, who is the son of Parashara and who always practises high vows, who is of immeasurable understanding, who is omniscient, and who, therefore, knows the end of all deeds.

11. Bhishma of great energy and great effulgence acquired the dignity of the Vasus. Eight Vasus, O chief of Bharata's race, are now seen.

11 Drona entered into Vrihaspati, that foremost one of Angirasa's descendants. Hridika's son Kritavarman entered the Maruts.

13 Pradyumna entered Sanatkumara whence he had come. Dhritarashtra obtained the regions so difficult of acquisition, belonging to Kuvera.

14 The famous Gandhari gained the same regions with her husband Dhritarashtra. With his two wives, Pandu went to the abode of the great Indra.

15—17. Both Virata and Drupada, and king Dhrishtaketu, as also Nishatha, Akrura, Shamva, Bhanukampa, and Vidurathа, and Bhurishravas and Shala and king Bhuri, and Kansa, and Ugrasena, and Vasudeva, and Uttara, that foremost of men, with his brother Shankha,—all these foremost of persons entered the celestials.

18. Soma's son of great prowess, named Varchas of mighty energy, became Abhimanyu, the son of Phalguna, that foremost of men.

19 Having fought, according to Kshatriya practices, with bravery such as none else had ever been able to show,—that mighty armed and right-eyed-looking being entered Soma. Killed on the field of battle, O foremost of men, Karna entered the Sun. Shakuni entered into the Dwapara, and Dhrishtadyumna into the God of Fire.

21. The sons of Dhritarashtra were all Rakshasas of great power. Sanctified by death caused by weapons, those great beings of great prosperity all succeeded in acquiring the celestial regions.

22 Both Kshattri and king Yudhishthira entered into the God of Virtue. The holy and illustrious Ananta (who had taken birth as Balarama) went to the region below the Earth.

23 Through the command of the Grandsire, he, helped by his Yoga power, supported the Earth. Vasudeva was a part of that eternal god of gods called Narayana. Accordingly, he entered into Narayana.

24 Sixteen thousand women had been married to Vasudeva as his wives. When the time came, O Janamejaya, they plunged into the Saraswati.

25 Renouncing their (human) bodies there they re-ascended to the celestial region. Transformed into Apsaras, they approached the presence of Vasudeva.

26 Those heroic and powerful car-warriors viz., Ghatotkacha and others, who were killed in the great battle, attained to the status, some of celestials and some of Yakshas.

27 Those who had fought on the side of Duryodhana are said to have been Rakshasas. Gradually, O king, they have all attained to excellent regions of happiness.

28. Those foremost of men have gone, some to the abode of Indra, some to that of highly intelligent Kuvera of great intelligence, and some to that of Varuna.

29 I have now told you, O you of great splendour, everything about the acts, O Bharata, of both the Kurus and the Pandavas.

Sauti said :—

30 Hearing this, O foremost of twice-born ones, at the intervals of sacrificial rites, king Janamejaya became filled with wonder.

31. The sacrificial priests then finished the rites which remained to go through. Astika, having rescued the snakes (from a fiery death) became filled with joy.

32 King Janamejaya then pleased all the Brahmanas with profuse presents. Thus adored by the king, they returned to their respective abodes.

33 Having dismissed those learned Brahmanas, king Janamejaya returned from Takshashila to Hastinapur.

34 I have now told you everything that Vaishampayana described, at the command of Vyasa, to the king at his snake sacrifice.

35 Called a history, it is sacred purifying and excellent. It has been composed by the ascetic Krishna, O Brahmana, of truthful speech.

36—37. He is omniscient, conversant with all ordinances, endued with a knowledge of all duties, filled with piety, capable of perceiving what is beyond the perception of the senses, pure, having a soul purified by penances, possessed of the six high attributes, and devoted to Sankhya Yoga. He has composed this, seeing everything with a celestial eye which has been cleansed (strengthened) by varied lore.

38 He has done this, desiring to spread the fame, throughout the world, of the great Pandavas as also of other Kshatriyas endued with profuse energy.

39 That learned man who recites this history on sacred days in the midst of an attentive audience becomes purged of every sin, conquers the celestial region, and attains to the status of Brahma.

40. Of that man who listens with rapt attention to the recitation of the whole of this Veda composed by (the Island-born) the hearer should satisfy Brahmanas with presents of all desirable objects.

25 By doing this, one acquires the fruits of the Agnishtoma sacrifice.

26 He acquires a large (celestial) car full of various orders of Apsaras With a glad heart and with the celestials in his company, he proceeds to the celestial region, his heart rapt (in felicity).

27 When the second Parana is reached, the hearer acquires the fruits of the Atiratra vow Indeed, he ascends a celestial car made entirely of costly gems

28 Wearing celestial garlands and dresses, and decked with celestial unguents and always shedding a celestial fragrance around, he receives great honours in the celestial region.

29 When the third Parana is reached, he acquires the fruits of the Dwadashaha vow Indeed, he lives in the celestial region for myriads of years, like a god.

30—31. At the fourth Parana he acquires the fruits of the Vajapeya sacrifice At the fifth, he acquires twice those fruits Ascending a celestial car which resembles the rising sun or a blazing fire, and with the deities for his companions, he goes to the celestial region and sports happily for myriads of years in the abode of Indra.

32—34. At the sixth Parana, he acquires twice, and at the seventh, thrice those fruits Ascending a celestial car which resembles the summit of the Kailasa mountains (in beauty), which is equipt with an altar made of stones of lapis lazuli and other precious gems that is surrounded by beautiful objects of various kinds, that is decked with gems and corals, that moves at the will of the rider, and that teems with waiting Apsaras, he roves through all the happy regions like a second deity of the Sun At the eighth Parana he acquires the fruits of the Rajasuya sacrifice.

35 He ascends a car as beautiful as the rising moon, and to which are yoked horses white as the rays of the moon and fleet like thought.

36 He is served by most beautiful women whose faces are more charming than the moon He hears the music of the garlands that encircle their waists and the Nupuras encircling their ankles.

37. Sleeping with his head resting on the laps of women of great beauty, he awakes greatly refreshed. At the ninth Parana he acquires, O Bharata, the fruits of that foremost of sacrifices, viz., the Horse-Sacrifice.

38. Ascending on a car equipt with a chamber consisting of a top supported by columns of gold furnished with a seat made of stones of lapis lazuli, with windows on all sides made of pure gold, and full of Apsaras and Gandharvas and other celestials, he blazes forth in splendour.

39—40 Wearing celestial garlands and dresses, and decked with celestial unguents, he sports happily, with deities for his companions in the celestial region, like a second deity himself.

41—43 Reaching the tenth Parana and pleasing Brahmanas, he acquires a car which tinkles with innumerable bells, which is decked with flags and banners, which is equipt with a seat made of precious gems, which has many arches made of lapis lazuli, which has a net-work of gold all round, which has turrets made of corals which is adorned with Gandharvas and Apsaras expert in singing, and which is fit for the residence of the Righteous

44—45 Crowned with a diadem of the complexion of fire, decked with ornaments of gold, his body smeared with celestial sandalpaste, garnished with celestial garlands he passes through all celestial regions, enjoying all celestial objects of enjoyment, and gifted with great splendour, through the grace of the deities

46—49 Thus accoutred, he receives great honours in the celestial region for many long years With Gandharvas in his company, for full twenty-one thousand years, he sports in bliss with Indra himself in the abode of Indra He roves at pleasure every day through the various celestial regions, riding on celestial cars and conveyances, and surrounded by celestial damsels of great beauty He is able to go to the abode of the Sun, of the Moon and of Shiva, O king Indeed, he succeeds in living in the same region with Vishnu himself It is even so, O monarch. There is no doubt in this

50 A person listening with faith becomes even so My preceptor has said this To the reciter should be given all such objects as he may wish 51—52 Elephants and horses and cars and conveyances, especially animals and the vehicles they draw, a bracelet of gold a pair of ear-rings, sacred threads, beautiful dresses, and perfumes in especial (should be given. By adoring him as a deity one acquires the regions of Vishnu.

53—54 After this I shall declare what should be given away, as each Parvan is reached of the Bharata in course of its recitation, to Brahmanas after ascertaining their birth country, truthfulness, and greatness,

O chief of Bharata's race, as also their inclination for piety, and to Kshatriyas too, O king, after ascertainment of similar details.

55 Causing the Brahmanas to utter benedictions, the business of recitation should be begun When a Parvan is finished, the Brahmanas should be adored to the best of one's power.

56 At first, the reciter, clad in good dresses, and smeared with perfumed paste, should O king, be duly fed with honey and frumenty of the best kind

57. When the Astika Parva is being recited, Brahmanas should be entertained with fruits and roots, and frumenty, and honey and clarified butter, and rice boiled with raw sugar.

58 When the Sabha Parva is being recited, Brahmanas should be fed with Havishya along with Apupas and Pupas and Modakas, O king.

59 When the Aranyaka Parva is being recited great Brahmanas should be fed with fruits and roots When the Aranyaka Parva is reached, water pots full of water should be distributed.

60 Many superior kinds of sweet food, also rice and fruits and roots and good food, should be presented to the Brahmanas

61—66 During the recitation of the Virata Parva, various kinds of dresses should be given away; and during that of the Udyoga Parva, O chief of the Bharatas the twice born ones, after being decked with perfumes and garlands, should be entertained with good food. During the recitation of the Bhishma Parva, O king of kings after giving them excellent cars and conveyances, food should be given which is pure and well cooked and possessed of every desirable quality During the Drona Parva food of every superior kind should be given to learned Brahmanas as also beds O monarch, and bows and good swords During the recitation of the Karna Parva, food of the foremost kind, which is besides pure and well cooked, should be presented to the Brahmanas by the householder with rapt mind During the recitation of the Shalya Parva, O king of kings food with confectionery and rice boiled with raw sugar, as also cakes of wheat and soothing and nutritive articles of food, and drink should be presented During the recitation of the Gada Parva, Brahmanas should be treated with food mixed with Mudga

67—68 During the recitation of the Stree Parva foremost of Brahmanas should be served with gems and precious stones and during the recitation of the Aishika Parva, rice boiled in clarified butter should first be given, and then food pure and well-cooked, and possessed of every desirable attribute, should be presented During the recitation of the Shanti Parva, the Brahmanas should be fed with Havishya.

69 When the Ashwamedhika Parva is reached, agreeable food should be served and when the Ashramavasika is reached, Brahmanas should be served with Havishya.

70 When the Mausala is reached, scents and garlands should be given away. During the Mahaprasthanika, similar presents should be made, possessed of every good quality.

71 When the Swarga Parva is reached, the Brahmanas should be fed with Havishya Upon the conclusion of the Harivansha, a thousand Brahmanas should be fed

72 To each of them should be presented a cow accompanied with a piece of gold, Half of this should be presented to each poor man, O king.

73 Upon the conclusion of all the Parvas, the wise housel older should give to the reciter a copy of the Mahabharata with a piece of gold

74 When the Harivansha Parva is being recited, Brahmanas should be fed with frumenty at each successive Parana, O king.

75—76 Having finished all the Parvas, one versed in the scriptures, dressing himself in white, wearing garlands, decked with ornaments and properly purified, should place a copy of the Mahabharata on an auspicious spot and cover it with a piece of silken cloth and adore it according to due rites, with scents and garlands, offering each at a time

77 Indeed O king the several volumes of this work should be adored by one with devotion and rapt mind Offerings should be made to them of various kinds of food and garlands and drinks and various auspicious articles of enjoyment.

78 Gold and other precious metals should be given as Dakshina The names should then be taken of all the celestials as also of Nara and Narayana

79 Then, worshipping the persons of some foremost of Brahmanas with scents and garlands they should be satisfied with various kinds of gifts of enjoyable and very superior or costly articles.

80 By doing this, one acquires the merits of the Atiratra sacrifice Indeed, at each successive Parva he acquires the merits which belong to the performance of a sacrifice.

81 The reciter, O chief of the Bharatas, should be endued with learning and endued with a good voice and a clear utterance about both letters and words Such a man should, O chief of the Bharatas, recite the Bharata.

82 After entertaining a number of foremost Brahmanas, presents should be made to them according to the ordinances The reciter also O chief of the Bharatas should be decked with ornaments and fed sumptuously.

83 The reciter being satisfied, the house holder acquiring an excellent and auspicious contentment. If the Brahmanas are satisfied all the deities are gratified

84 After this O chief of the Bharatas Brahmanas should be duly served with various kinds of enjoyable articles and superior things

85 I have thus indicated the ordinances O foremost of men, (about the manner of reciting these scriptures) in response to your enquiries You should observe them with faith

86 In listening to a recitation of the Bharata and at each Parana O best of kings, one who desires to acquire to the highest good should listen with the greatest care and attention

87 One should listen to the Bharata every day One should proclaim the merits of the Bharata every day One who has the Bharata in his house, has in his hands all those scriptures which are known by the name of Jaya.

88 The Bharata is purifying and sacred In the Bharata are various topics The Bharata is adored by the very gods The Bharata is the highest end

89 The Bharata, O chief of the Bharatas is the foremost of all scriptures One acquires Liberation through the Bharata This that I tell you is certain truth

90 One who proclaims the merits of this History called the Mahabharata of the Earth of the cow of Saraswati (the goddess of speech) of Brahmanas and of Keshava, has never to languish.

91 In the Veda in the Ramayana and in the sacred Bharata O chief of Bharata's race Hari is sung in the beginning, the middle, and the end

92 That in which occurs excellent discourse about Vishnu and the eternal Shrutis should be listened to by men desirous of acquiring the highest end

93 This treatise is purifying. This is the highest indicator as regards duties, this is endued with every merit. One desirous of prosperity should listen to it.

94 Sins committed by means of the body, by means of words and by means of the mind, are all dissipated (through listening to the Bharata) as Darkness at sunrise.

95 One devoted to Vishnu acquires (through this) that merit which is acquired by listening to the eighteen Puranas There is no doubt in this.

96 Men and women (by listening to this) would certainly acquire the status of Vishnu Women desirous of children should certainly listen to this which proclaims the fame of Vishnu

97 One desirous of acquiring the fruits which belong to a recitation of the Bharata should according to one's power give unto the reciter Dakshina as also an honorarium in gold.

98 One desirous of one's own behoof should give to the reciter a Kapila cow with horns cased in gold and accompanied by her calf, covered with a cloth.

99 Ornaments, O chief of Bharata's race, for the arms, as also those for the ears, should be given Besides these, other kinds of riches should be presented 100 To the reciter, O king of men, gift of land should be made. No gift like that of land could ever be or will be.

101 The man who listens (to the Bharata) or that recites it to other people, becomes purged of all his sins and acquires at last the status of Vishnu

102 Such a man rescues his ancestors to the eleventh degree as also himself with his wives and sons O chief of Bharata's race After concluding a recitation of the Bharata one should O king, perform a Homa with all its ten parts

103 I have thus O king, told everything in your presence

104 He who listens with devotion to this Bharata from the beginning becomes purged of every sin even if he be guilty of Brahmanicide or the violation of his preceptor's bed or even if he be a drinker of alcohol or a robber of other people's goods, or even if he be born in the Chandala order.

105 Destroying all his sins like the maker of day destroying darkness such a man forsooth sports happily in the region of Vishnu like Vishnu himself.

FINIS SWARGAROHANIKA PARVA
